Zhao Xi's expression was as hideous as a living ghost's. With a pop, a vein really did burst out of his flesh. The blood spurted several zhang away. At the same time, in the place on the Hong River that corresponded to his burst vein, the water rose and burst its banks in both directions!

Lin Chi abruptly raised his head. "The Territory Map!"

Xi Ping said, “What?”

“Great Wan has many watercourses. Tradition says that when the spiritual mountains took shape and divided the national borders, their spiritual veins flowed through the whole country, reflecting the courses of all the rivers and streams. This was called the Territory Map. The Southern Sage saw that it was created by reflecting the spiritual veins and the veins of the earth, feared that it would give rise to turbulence in the land, and wished to seal it...”

Xi Ping said, “I get it, Zhao Yin stole it.”

“No,” said Lin Chi, “the Territory Map was born from the watercourses and was by nature unwilling to be confined to a single place. It resisted fiercely and pulled a disciple who was passing by into the map. The Southern Sage had no alternative but to destroy it. He watched over it for many days, helping that disciple to comprehend its mysteries, escape it, and succeed in reaching an ascended spirit. That disciple was Zhao...Elder Zhao. The Zhao family has actually acquired a portion of the Territory Map’s authority!”

No sooner had he spoken than the blue luan trembled, and even in the reincarnation wood, Xi Ping felt that the spiritual energy around them was in chaos. It wasn’t only Xuanyin’s mountain seal that was in turmoil, even Flying Jade Peak’s seal of voluntary seclusion was in imminent danger.

The nine Zhao peak masters working together had shaken Xuanyin's mountain seal. The disordered spiritual energy made it hard for the other peak masters to approach.

Flying Jade Peak's fragile north slope was in imminent danger once more; the shaking of the snow-capped mountain made Xi Ping burn with anger. Afraid that Zhi Xiu would force himself to act once more, Xi Ping quickly asked, "Peak Master Lin, where is the true Bell of Tribulation? How do you ring it?"

Lin Chi said, "The Bell of Tribulation can only be used when encountering demons. These nine shixionsg haven't lost their minds to the point of becoming demons...and anyway, the person who rings the bell must have strong enough cultivation! Do you think just anyone could use the Bell of Tribulation to break up the remaining power of a shed skin?"

Xi Ping said angrily, "Is this insanity not enough to count as becoming demons?! Do what I say!"

Lin Chi was stupefied by his nominal shizhi's lousy idea. "...huh?"

Just then, there was a huge sound. The nine Zhao peak masters had broken through Xuanyin's mountain seal and were about to run toward the human world.

At the same time, all of Great Wan was swaying. This had previously been a year of rare favorable weather, with moderate rain. The rivers and lakes had calmly nourished all living things as the harvest approached, but now they began to roar like infuriated beasts.

The world's rudest shizhi once again addressed a senior by name: "Lin Chi, stop dawdling!"

Lin Chi took an immortal tool like a dandelion out of his mustard seed. It scattered in the wind. The fight of the ascended spirit peak masters who had turn open the mountain seal was just sending astral winds in all directions. The fragmented "seeds" of the immortal tool were quickly blown all over the place.

Through his spirit, Lin Chi said to Xi Ping, I never saw the Southern Sage.

Xi Ping said, Well, who has? The two who have seen him aren't home!

Lin Chi said, This...this is such disgraceful behavior!

Xi Ping said, Then you can sit here and watch them destroy the country!

Lin Chi sucked in a breath. The next moment, a statue of the Southern Sage a full hundred zhang high fell out of nowhere like a mountain. The “seeds” of the “dandelion” immortal tool that had scattered in all directions spoke at the same time: “Zhao Yin lost his mind and became a demon. Heaven and earth cannot abide his Way of the Heart.”

The clamor coming from all sides merged together, vibrating among the thirty-six peaks, as if ten thousand bells were ringing simultaneously. For a time it was like a heavenly oracle descending, frightening your soul out of your body.

The Zhao ascended spirit peak masters came back to themselves. When they understood what the “oracle” was saying, their faces turned deathly pale: if heaven and earth could not abide Zhao Yin’s Way of the Heart, then wouldn’t all the disciples who had inherited his Way of the Heart become demons?

Next, a deafening tolling began to resound, identical to when the Bell of Tribulation had rung before. It was completely convincing!

Naturally an ascended spirit grade immortal tool could shake ascended spirits into dizziness. The nine peak masters’ Ways of the Heart were seriously shaken.

Only Princess Duanrui, hurrying back from the Latent Cultivation Temple, having cultivated the way of clarity to merely a step away from its highest degree and being unmoved by external objects, turned a deaf ear and delivered a lash of the Remorseless Whip.

Xi Ping said, “Ah, at least Duanrui-shishu is reliable.”

Unlike you good-for-nothings.

Lin Chi was simply speechless.

At the ringing of the false Bell of Tribulation, Flying Jade Peak’s north slope at last had yet another avalanche, as if shizun were dropping his jaw in shock at his rebellious disciple.

Just then, a wind blew past.

This wind was no stronger than the breeze on the Lingyang River at the start of spring, but somehow, all the cultivators present felt their hearts skip a beat.

Instantly, all the ascended spirits flying hither and thither could no longer keep steady on their swords. One after another, they fell out of the sky. The wind blew past the Xuanyin Mountains and spread outward. All inscriptions dimmed, all spiritual stones escaped the arrays they were placed in.

The irregular immortal tools made of hammers, chisels, axes, and saws became true hammers, chisels, axes, and saws. The Zhao family descendants, who had never done a day's physical labor in their lives, suddenly lost their cultivation. One person was hit over the head with a hammer, and it actually bashed his brains out on the spot.

The one who had been bashed was astonished; breathing his last, he still didn't understand what had happened to his head.

The one who had done the bashing was also astonished.

The Barrier Dispeller Bow in Pang Jian's hands disappeared, and "Zhao Yu," controlled by the paperman, froze in place, turning into a puppet.

In that instant, all the territory within Great Wan's borders turned entirely into the mortal world. Cultivators became mortals, immortal tools became ordinary metal, and the spiritual energy departed!

Only the Riverward inside the Resurrection Vortex ignored all this, continuing to protect its master.

His communication tools lost power, and Zhou Ying abruptly lost contact with Bai Ling, but he didn't panic in the least. He only changed his sitting posture—what was the rush? When the two shed skins left the mountains, their consciousnesses could cover all of Great Wan. The two old fellows had yet to reach the East Sea, so presumably they had something to attend to.

The Zhao family had profound secrets, but what shed skin hadn't come up from the period of the Great War of Gods and Demons? They all knew each other.

It was unsuitable for shed skin sages to meddle in a fight between the ants in the mortal world, but when the ants were about to chew through the roots, could they still fail to act?

Just then, inside the Resurrection Vortex, the previously very wide Riverward suddenly contracted, its thin smoke almost clinging to Zhou Ying. The smoke quivered slightly with unease.

Zhou Ying had a thought—the shed skins were here in person.

Lin Zongyi and Zhang Jue appeared in the East Sea practically one after the other. The two of them had left the Xuanyin Mountains together, but now they had come separately, one from the north and one from the south.

Zhang Jue said, “The spiritual veins have been severed. It will require ten days to repair them completely. Let them finish their mortal world business in the mortal world.”

Lin Zongyi nodded and pointed to the East Sea.

Then the two shed skins no longer discussed the world-shaking revolt. They quickly inspected the demon seal at the bottom of the Impassable Sea.

“There is nothing out of the ordinary. The Dignitary of Rites did indeed lose his mind.” Zhang Jue sighed and said, “Lin-shixiong, you’ve felt it, too, haven’t you?”

Lin Zongyi removed his mouth seal. “There are signs that this was brought about deliberately, but I searched through the four northern provinces without tracking down the one behind it.”

Right now, Zhou Ying, the one behind it, just happened to be in the whirlpool at Lin Zongyi’s feet. This desperate criminal seemed by nature not to know what guilt was. He lay calmly inside the Riverward, listening to the two shed skin elders discussing how to capture him.

“It is the same in the south,” Zhang Jue said. “The Zhao family has been truly disgraceful this time. How fortunate that we have the assistance of the Kaiming Department.”

Lin Zongyi was silent—he couldn’t respond to this statement; whether he spoke in approval or in opposition, as soon as the words left his mouth, they would become a judgment. He had to be extremely cautious.

After a while, he asked, “Where is Zhou Ying?”

Hearing this, the Dignitary of Fate High Elder began to divine on his fingers.

When the consciousness of the master of the Sea of Stars began to move, the Riverward’s thin smoke immediately seeped anxiously into Zhou Ying. He took on a half-transparent quality. The legendary demonic tool that was outside the laws silently resisted Xuanyin Mountain’s observation.

Zhou Ying was like an ant hidden in the fur of a huge beast, listening to the heavy breathing that could instantly blow him away. His spine tensed unconsciously, but his eyes glowed.

He was like a gambling addict. The more critical the situation was, the more excited he would become.

He waited for the Dignitary of Fate's verdict as if waiting for the lid of a dice cup to be removed.

After a moment, he heard Zhang Jue say, "He is in Jingzhou—on the way back to Jinping from Yuzhou."

"Very good," said Lin Zongyi. "His relationship to the Impassable Sea is profound. I have always feared that there was something wrong with him."

"The Kaiming and the Luwu do in fact have considerable ambitions. Fortunately this person is only a half-immortal. He can still be controlled."

Zhou Ying tsked, as if half-regretful. Shaking his head, he began to laugh.

With the spiritual energy dissipated, the human world calmed down. The world-shaking battle of cultivators changed into all the local garrisons apprehending the renegades.

The evil-expelling bells on the Azure Dragon Towers, which had trembled for several days, stopped moving.

Xi Yue, looking after the Heart Tower, at last breathed a sigh of relief.

Just then, he heard the voice of the Marquis Manor's page Haozhong.

“Young Master Yue! Young Master Yue!”

His call made the roots of Xi Yue’s ears go numb. For some reason, he had a bad feeling.

Haozhong didn’t dare to approach the Azure Dragon Tower. He only shifted around like an ant on a hot pan.

Xi Yue raised a hand to make a hand seal, but he couldn’t direct spiritual energy. Only then did he remember that all his arrays had turned into decorative designs. He had to walk to the window and reach out to open it.

Jinping City on the Lingyang River was half of the weak spot on Zhou Ying’s underbelly. Normally this was hidden very deep, so no one could see—mostly it was demonstrated by the fact that even if he wanted to throw the whole world into chaos, he would still unconsciously protect the bright pearl of Jinping.

This time, apart from some quiet skulduggery in the inner courtyard of the imperial palace, everything in Jinping had been as usual. Outside, shed skins were dying, thugs were fighting for their lives, and mantises were wrestling with orioles; but in the Marquis Manor, everything was going as usual.

But while human strength could shake the fierce winds and make the veins of the earth tremble, it couldn't return a single quietly fallen flower to the branch.

On her birthday, old Madam Xi had insisted on listening to opera all night. The next day, she didn't get up.

At first the family thought the old lady was tired. They called a few times without getting an answer and went inside to look. That was when they found that she was delirious from fever. Elderly people fell ill easily. Everyone quickly turned up the pills His Highness Prince Zhuang had sent back over several years.

But the elixirs that could restore a person to perfect health overnight, like the prohibited weapons and spiritual energy, had lost effect.

In the end, mortals had their mortal fates.

CHAPTER 93 - Traveler Abroad (Final)

In Yanyang, at Jingzhou's northern extremity, Bai Ling, having just received word from the government post, was rushing wildly, driving a carriage.

The carriage roads between the provinces had yet to be opened, and the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon's tracks had been broken in several places by the earthquakes caused by the Territory Map. The waterways were jammed, and the land routes weren't clear, either. Transportation within Great Wan had nearly crumbled altogether. Immortal tools and downgraded immortal tools had also stopped working. By the time Bai Ling received Xi Yue's message from the post station after it had passed through many hands, it was already several days later.

But even if he could have put on wings and flown back, it would have been no use, because the "Zhou Ying" in the carriage was made of paper.

With Bai Ling's cultivation level, the paperman had originally been convincing. A cultivator of his level or below at least wouldn't have seen any difference between it and a real person. But now all magic within Great Wan's borders had lost effect, and the paperman had also returned to its original form. Though it was considerably finer work than casually plastered together funeral goods would have been, it still wasn't the real thing—it rustled when the wind blew, and if he wasn't careful its face would turn all the way toward its back.

This paperman was a substitute Bai Ling had created for his prince, imprinted with a spiritual image, with a drop of Zhou Ying's heart's blood inside it. If there was a social event he didn't want to attend—for example, dull occasions like the emperor's ascension to the throne—he would send the paperman over to pass itself off as him. There were no established foundations in Jinping, anyway.

Right now, Bai Ling wasn't dragging a paperman around all over the place because he had some peculiar hobby; it was because after Zhou Ying had left, the heart's blood in the substitute paperman he had left behind had suddenly “spat” out the Riverward's smoke. The thin smoke had enlarged as it billowed, at last perfectly covering the life-sized paperman.

Right now, the half-demon had to act as coachman himself, but the Riverward enveloping the paperman didn't move a hair. Could it be that it didn't need spiritual energy to operate? Could it really keep the eyes of the shed skins away?

Bai Ling didn't know. He was currently completely collected on the surface, but inside he was so anxious he was about to catch fire—since he had lost contact with Zhou Ying, all the news from Jinping that had come to his hands had been old.

The shed skins still in the human world might descend at any time.

If the paperman had still been usable, Bai Ling might have felt some sense of security about the Riverward protecting it like this. But the Riverward couldn't keep it from rustling when the wind blew. If someone got close enough to touch it, never mind a shed skin, even a mortal would have been able to tell that it wasn't a flesh and blood body.

The half-demon who had been able to eat spiritual stones since he was born found for the first time that a mortal's road was so long, that horses were so slow, that the mail was so uncertain.

Suddenly, Bai Ling hauled on the reins to stop the horse. "Whoa—"

The road ended.

Jingzhou had the most mountains and watercourses in all of Great Wan. Falling boulders had blocked the road ahead.

"My lord," said Bai Ling, taking a deep breath, speaking to the paperman as respectfully as though speaking to Zhou Ying, "please be patient. I will go see what can be done.”

Without spiritual energy to support it, the paperman couldn't respond. Bai Ling put on a bamboo hat and ran over like a mortal.

From the north of Jingzhou, with the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon cut off, this was the only road that could still be traveled. Bai Ling wasn't the only one being detained. There were freight shippers who had been forced to go by road after the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon had stopped, there were those going to the capital to study or find relatives...or to attend funerals.

All walks of life were mixed together. In front of them were uncrossable high mountains and huge boulders. When Bai Ling arrived, people were using their hands to clear the road. The half-demon stared blankly amid the flying dust. He could only roll up his sleeves and enter the mortal world.

Without the protection of spiritual energy, the dust treated everyone impartially. Bai Ling's elegant robes, cleaner than paper, were soon covered in dust. Not long after, it began to rain. The rain mixed with the dust into mud. Bai Ling's nose and throat were full of grit. He didn't know how it had gotten in and ground his tongue against his teeth.

He hadn't been in such dire straits even in the Impassable Abyss!

After half a day's delay, the slow-moving steam-powered truck from Yanyang at last arrived. The wild steam puffed everywhere, leaving everyone's fields of vision empty, mixing powerfully with the rain and mud. Bai Ling felt that he had nearly turned into rotten paper pulp. His hands, after exerting too much strength moving stones, were shaking uncontrollably.

Not long after, he heard that the road had been opened. But before he could put on a happy look and report to "his lord" in the carriage, he heard a huge sound as the inconsiderate rain rolled down another pile of boulders.

Amid the steam, the people whose outlines were blurred cried out loudly. Bai Ling was swallowed up by the flood of people, involuntarily retreating. He had been a secret guard for Zhou Ying, had been a killer, had been the Luwu's secretive "Mr. Bai." He had never been this close to mortals. With the hands of a crowd of strangers pushing and pulling, shoving and yanking at him, he was simply a little bewildered.

A man in his thirties or forties began to wail, his voice so loud that Bai Ling gave a start. The man went to his knees and beat the earth with his hands, banging his head on the ground. He said, "I won't be in time to see my mother, please clear the road, I'm begging you...I'm begging you..."

In his desperate need, it was unclear whom he was begging.

The people around him could only get out of the way and avert their gazes, not looking directly at him, feeling sadness well up.

Along with the other travelers going through hardships, Bai Ling could only direct his gaze, which had nowhere to rest, toward the indifferent landscape, extending to the horizon.

When he no longer knew where he had come from or where he was going, a gaze came down from the sky. The two shed skin sages whose existence was tied to heaven and earth and who were not constrained by the spiritual veins of the mortal world were returning to the immortal mountains; they just happened to be passing by here.

Xuanyin had met a calamity this time. One of the four great families had been pulled up by the roots, and the whole country was in chaos. Zhang Jue and Lin Zongyi's expressions were both very grave. They hadn't spoken the whole way.

Zhang Jue, as if sensing something, opened his eyes, sending the gaze of his snow-white pupils toward the human world. At a glance, he saw the half-demon mixed in amidst the mortals.

Oh? The Zhou family's final set of spiritual bones was here?

For some reason, the Dignitary of Fate kept thinking that there was something wrong about the divination he had performed in the East Sea. This Prince Zhuang's spiritual bones had spent over twenty years soaking in a den of demons outside the reaches of law and civilization; the Sea of Stars had never been able to distinguish him very clearly. Great Wan was over a thousand li from east to west and even longer from north to south; its territory could be called vast. It had several hundred million inhabitants. Yet he had just happened to encounter Zhou Ying at this moment. There seemed to be something hidden stirring the Dignitary of Fate High Elder's spiritual sense.

Zhang Jue was just about to take a closer look, but when his gaze swept down, he saw the rain bringing down the mountain. The horse drawing the carriage was a little startled. Bai Ling wasn't in time to hold it, and the carriage shook. The "Zhou Ying" inside the carriage miserably flew forward, landing halfway under the seat.

Zhang Jue only had time for a quick glance when his eyes were seared by the sight of the man beside the carriage desperately kowtowing.

The Dignitary of Fate High Elder couldn't bear to watch this. He sighed, waved a sleeve, and it was as if the rain had been blocked by an invisible screen. A path opened among the mud and boulders blocking the road.

The sages had finally performed a miracle.

“The lives of the people are hard.” Zhang Jue looked away and closed his eyes once more. He said to Lin Zongyi, “Let’s go.”

With Great Wan’s spiritual veins broken, the immortals and demons outside the borders all retreated. The various spiritual beasts being kept by Jinping’s wealthy families all seemed ready to go into hibernation, becoming drowsy.

The busiest person was Xi Ping.

His consciousness not only had to shuttle back and forth between the Xuanyin Mountains and Western Chu—Xu Rucheng had changed his identity and quietly mixed in among the team “receiving” the Zhaos, becoming an unremarkable page to be ordered around, and Wei Chengxiang was also waiting for her chance to act in Western Chu—apart from that, he was also afraid san-ge would get lonely, so he had to go over to the East Sea to harass Zhou Ying, tell him in real time that “the shed skin elders have returned to the mountains,” “the inner sect is beginning to settle accounts,” “Princess Duanrui is going to stand in as Dignitary of Rites,” and other such firsthand news, as well as asking some very inconsiderate questions, along the lines of “San-ge, everything is safe over there, why won’t you come out of the Riverward, is it because you can’t swim?”; when he was finished asking, he would usually be shooed away from Zhou Ying's spirit and receive a complimentary "Scram."

While Zhou Ying couldn't use spiritual energy and was trapped in the Resurrection Vortex, unable to get out, his "eyes" in the Xuanyin Mountains gave him the most commanding view of the whole situation from beginning to end.

It gave him a false impression that he was omniscient and could hold everything in the palm of his hand.

Apart from Zhou Ying, who had overheard the shed skins talking, no one knew when the spiritual veins would be repaired. Bai Ling could only travel night and day as he attempted hundreds of times to use immortal tools to send a message to Zhou Ying.

The horse collapsed from exhaustion, and the immortal tools gave no response.

Until the ninth day after the spiritual veins had been severed.

That day at sunset, the deadly still inscriptions at last showed a faint brilliance. The stagnant spiritual energy began to flow once more.

Zhou Ying was just listening to Xi Ping saying that the nine Zhao peak masters had been collectively “sent into seclusion,” with concrete arrangements to be discussed later; perhaps they would have to wait until the Heavenly Questions had been restored and listen to the opinions of Heaven’s Design Pavilion and the court.

“Had the Zhaos not thought of touching the Territory Map, perhaps this could have been passed off as a misunderstanding,” Zhou Ying said casually. “But they played their final card too quickly...oh?”

A paperman leapt from his body. Before it could open its mouth to speak, its energy was exhausted, and it flimsily lay down. Zhou Ying pinched the paperman between his fingers, feeling the scant spiritual energy at his fingertips. “The spiritual veins are beginning to circulate, the Heavenly Questions should be in position soon. You wait and see. I’m also curious about what His Majesty will decide.”

Hearing this, Xi Ping thought, What’s there to see? He’ll probably get out of Xuanyin Mountain’s way.

He had even temporarily put Xu Rucheng and Wei Chengxiang in Western Chu on hold, gathering up all his consciousness, completely absorbed in waiting for san-ge to take him back to Jinping. He had all but trotted over with a leash in his mouth.

Zhou Ying said, smiling, “People aren’t as sensitive as low-level immortal tools for sending information. For flying on swords, or for Bai Ling to use his paperman substitutes, I think it will take until daylight at least to work unimpeded.”

At this point, he paused. Because he had seen that after flimsily lying down, the paperman was once again struggling to get up, clinging to his sleeve with all its limbs, seeming to be struggling... What was the matter with Bai Ling?

Zhou Ying suddenly felt uneasy, so he didn’t meditate as usual. As he waited for communications to be restored, he repeatedly reviewed everything that had happened recently, considering what might have been omitted.

First, blurry writing flashed on the paperman, disappearing before it could be distinguished. Then it happened again and again... Bai Ling had sent him countless messages, exhausting the paperman. Its limbs curled up at the edges, and it rolled onto the little piece of reincarnation wood Zhou Ying was toying with.

“Hey, san-ge,” Xi Ping said from the reincarnation wood, “I think Bai Ling-da-ge has filled up the front, the writing has even gone to the back, it says...”

His voice abruptly cut off. At the same time, Zhou Ying picked up the paperman.

This time, the handwriting was finally clear. What the paperman said was:
Old Madam Xi is gravely ill.

The first autumn rain fell in Jinping. The osmanthus had already prepared its buds. The mornings and evenings were cool.

With spiritual stones unusable, at least thirty or forty percent of the factories in the southern outskirts, built around gold smelting furnaces, couldn't operate. The sky became distinctly clearer. Flocks of wild geese would soon be flying back from Northern Li.

On the emperor's orders, the Director of the Office of Imperial Physicians went in person to the Yongning Marquis Manor along with a few other old imperial physicians. They prescribed medicines and performed acupuncture. At this point, the old lady couldn't take any more medicine, and she no longer recognized anyone.

The Marquis himself saw the Director out the door. The grey-bearded old Director cupped his hand and didn't ask him to escort him any further.

“You ought to prepare the clothing she will need to be changed into. Acupuncture is painful, let us not make the old lady suffer any more.”

The Marquis said, “The old lady is waiting for some people. In your opinion...”

The Director waved a hand. “I have heard that all the roads have been severed outside, and letters can’t get out, either. At a time like this, there’s nothing to be done... Alas, there’s nothing to be done.”

The Director was already prepared to retire; he was very elderly. Saying this, his mind wandered slightly as he remembered somebody in the rustling early autumn. After a long moment, the old Director shakily patted the Marquis on the arm. Whether counseling him or speaking to himself, he said, “Among blood relations, there are close ties and distant ties. Sometimes they can be picked up in the next life, and sometimes they are exhausted before the present life has even ended. You and I are both mortal. This cannot be forced, so let it go.”

Having said this, leaning on his disciple’s arm, he walked away, his stride uneven.

The Marquis watched the old Director go. After a long time, he lowered his head as if in acknowledgment of something. He called a servant. “Send someone with a letter to the palace... We should tell the Dowager Imperial Consort.”

In the west of Guangyun Palace, Yuying Palace.

As Dowager Imperial Consort Xi got older, she shunned noise more and more. Inside Yuying Palace, people usually all wore soft-soled shoes. Anyone whose clothing was likely to rustle had to keep their sleeves and pant legs tight. They spoke amongst each other in whispers. But right now, a young palace maid was running like mad.

Her soft-soled shoes made dull thuds as they hit the bluestone tiles. The sound of the footsteps was unpleasant, making the voiceless dogs inside the palace bark.

She opened the door of the inner rooms. The smell of snow wine hadn't dissipated. The refreshing scent coolly curled around her face, and the hot sweat on the maid's forehead instantly disappeared. She shivered from cold.

She dropped to her knees with a thud, kneeling before the drunkenly swaying Imperial Consort.

Inside the fragrant jade miasma, Dowager Imperial Consort Xi was a carefree girl. Their family had always been like this. If the boys wanted to pursue a distinguished career, of course that was great, but it was no problem if they amounted to nothing; everything was fine as long as they didn't go out and commit crimes. And for the girls, it would be hard for them to go out and commit crimes even if they wanted to, so they were left even more to their own devices; the shrewd had their own shrewd approaches to life, and the fools were foolish.

At home, even the crooked plum blossom tree that didn't bloom once in three years and the cats and dogs picked up off the streets would become treasures if they stayed long enough, never mind a little girl carved from jade.

She had muddled through her needlework and never studied properly. Apart from coming up with new ways to get spending money out of her big brother's pockets, all she cared about were her looks. She was absolutely unrestrained. All the distinguished young ladies in Jinping wanted to be like her, and Cui Ji's young mistress had also come along to make friends... though she had found out afterward that Young Mistress Cui had ulterior motives.

Those had been the good days.

With her eyes open, the Dowager Imperial Consort was still sunk in the amber-like past when she heard someone say something like "His Majesty has permitted the Dowager Imperial Consort to leave the palace to pay a visit to her mother, to see the old lady one last time.” In her confusion, she didn’t understand very well. In a daze, she had her maids attend to her clothing and makeup, thinking, I’m allowed to go home?

The palace maid Xiao Song who had come to the palace with her had now become Auntie Song. She had become careless with age, accidentally knocking over a bottle of lotion. The jade bottle broke into pieces when it hit the ground. The crisp sound forced Dowager Imperial Consort Xi into wakefulness. Without warning, the young girl amid the fragrant jade miasma met the eyes of the woman in the mirror, who had passed half a century.

As if she had been frightened, she knocked the mirror on the dressing case away.

The palace maids and eunuchs knelt everywhere amid the thick fragrance. The Dowager Imperial Consort stared blankly for a moment, then wearily waved a hand. “I’m not going.”

Auntie Song followed a few steps after her, shuffling on her knees. She said urgently, “My lady, they say at the manor that it won’t go well this time. If you don’t see her now, then...”

“I won’t see her. I’m not going.”

Why should she see her? To show her mother how the frail little orchid she had painstakingly nurtured had steeped in snow wine until its roots had rotted?

The Dowager Imperial Consort pulled out her hairpin, and her hair fell over her shoulders like water bursting a dyke. There was no undulation in her tone as she said, “Warm another pot of snow wine for me.”

Looking out from the fragrant jade miasma, it was all the same. And anyway, Dangui Lane wasn’t her home.

A lifetime’s joys and sorrows were like illusions. Why would anyone want to wake up?

Why would she want to wake up?

For a moment, Xi Ping thought irrelevantly that if he were still the “Tai Sui” of Tao County, who didn’t know where he came from, a spirit in some rotten wood, then couldn’t he have avoided experiencing the ordeal of suffering?

Zhou Ying clutched the reincarnation wood, as if he could grab hold of Xi Ping through that piece of rotten wood.

“Don’t worry, Shiyong.” His voice was so low it was unclear whose benefit he was saying it for. “It’s not necessarily... Let me think of something.”

Xuanyin Mountain’s old fool had said “Jingzhou” before, so Bai Ling had still been held up in Jingzhou then. He wouldn’t have been able to fly after the spiritual veins had been severed. The Zhaos had touched the Territory Map without authorization, he didn’t know what state the roads were in. Bai Ling might not make it in time...

The veins stood out on the back of Zhou Ying’s hand as he squeezed the reincarnation wood. He calmed himself down and quickly sent Bai Ling a message: Have the half-puppet make a transport array and receive something, then take a drop of Grandmother’s blood...

Before he had finished writing the last line, the writing vanished from the paper.

These were the faint shackles of the demon seal currently under his feet—he couldn’t reveal this information.

Damn it!

Zhou Ying tore a corner of the paperman.

“San-ge.” Just then, Xi Ping’s voice sounded in his spirit. Unexpectedly, Xi Ping was very calm.

He had lingered by the Xia River for five years and was used to being calm. The “little young master in the lap of luxury” seemed only like an old piece of clothing that he could put on to relive an old dream. When he came back to himself and pulled it off, in the blink of an eye he was once again the Tai Sui among the evil cultivators of Tao County.

“Don’t worry. If the spiritual veins start circulating tonight, then you’ll take me back tonight. If they start circulating tomorrow, then you’ll take me tomorrow. If you really can’t make it in time, that’s still...”

Zhou Ying turned a deaf ear. In a flash, he sent a sketchier message through the paperman: Half-puppet, transport array.

This time the message went through. Zhou Ying “composedly” said, “Bai Ling should be able to guess my general intentions, and that half-puppet was with you before, he knows about reincarnation wood, too, right?”

Xi Ping sighed. “With the demon seal operating, reincarnation wood that has held my consciousness can’t pass through a transport array. Don’t waste...”

Zhou Ying seemed to have gone deaf. Before Xi Ping could finish, the transport array was complete. Zhou Ying quickly pared a small piece off the reincarnation wood, but before he could put it into the array, the wood disintegrated and vanished in midair.

Ferocity suddenly flashed in Zhou Ying’s seemingly tranquil eyes. Xi Ping suspected he was regretting not having smashed the demon seal.

“San-ge.” Xi Ping quickly hid all his disquieting anxiety and restlessness and said, “Let’s wait together for a while. If there are no elixirs, there will still be imperial physicians. Even when she was eating a bowl of curd cheese, the old lady would leave me some. Of course she’ll wait for me. Hey, san-ge, why don’t you tell me about what’s been going on at home...”

Zhou Ying ignored him. Suddenly, he pared off another piece of reincarnation wood. A transport array took shape in his other hand. Before Xi Ping could catch up, he pierced his own finger and pinched the Riverward that was wrapped around him.

The Riverward reacted instantly to his thought, gathering in the palm of his hand, wrapping around that piece of wood that shouldn't have existed, lightly dropping it into the transport array.

At the same time, Zhou Ying, having lost the protection of the Riverward, landed at once in the Resurrection Vortex.

“San-ge!”

“Go. It won't kill me.”

Brooking no argument, Zhou Ying drove him out of his spirit. Wrapped in the Riverward, the reincarnation wood and Xi Ping's consciousness together flew toward distant Jinping. The moment they fell into Xi Yue's hand, the Riverward's thin smoke dissipated. Zhou Ying had used the last precious “ferry” on the mortal world.

Xi Yue stared blankly for a moment at the piece of reincarnation wood that still had bloodstains at its edges, suddenly realized something, then took to his heels and ran.

Is it you? You've come back... How could you have waited so long to come back!

Familiar buildings and gates flashed in front of Xi Ping's eyes. But while the carved railings were unchanging, the forms of the moss altered, the plants grew and withered, and people aged. Everything had become strange.

“Grandmother...Grandmother!”

The unfilial child who had said he would come back from the mountains after a year came knocking at the door. The dying woman's spirit was like a tottering sandcastle, constantly collapsing under the urging of time.

A light like a sudden burst of radiance before the end flashed in old Madam Xi's eyes. “Xiaobao...”

The demon seal covered up her voice. The family only saw her lips moving and drew close, uncomprehending, but they didn't hear anything.

Old Madam Xi said, “Why have you come so early?”

Xi Ping went blank. At first, he didn't know whether the old lady was confused or ironically rebuking him.

Then he heard old Madam Xi gently and quietly negotiating with him: “Grandmother knows you're lonely on your own, just wait a little longer, wait for your aunt and brother, I know my baby understands...”

Just like when he had been little, impatiently looking at the Southern Shu candies and little spiritual beasts that Cui Ji had delivered, and his old grandmother had sent someone to call her other lonely grandson out of the palace to play while coaxing Xi Ping to wait a little.

The old lady thought he had come from “the other side” to get her.

The ordinary old woman in the big compound didn't know anything, yet she knew everything.

Xi Ping curled up in her constantly crumbling spirit, wanting to tell her a funny story, but after thinking for a long time, he found that there were no funny stories. All he could do was make something up, listening to her answering voice becoming weaker and weaker, quieter and quieter.

Then day broke, Xi Ping's vision blurred, and his consciousness returned to the reincarnation wood, just as it had rebounded back to the divine image in Wild Fox Country countless times.

He heard suppressed crying and methodical voices and knew that everything was already prepared at home.

Spiritual energy flowed through the calendar block hanging on the wall, and it lit up once again. Writing popped up on it, saying today would be clear—how curious, why was the Marquis Manor using downgraded immortal tools now?

Zhou Ying nearly tripped over the threshold of the Marquis Manor. He had climbed out of some unknown awful place. There were bloodstains on him, and his hair was still wet.

The most self-restrained and well-mannered man in Jinping City hadn't washed or changed his clothes, abandoning decorum. When he saw the Marquis Manor's servants coming to greet him, he realized something. He tried and failed to hold himself up against the courtyard wall, slowly sinking to his knees.

There had been a pair of guileless eyes in this world waiting to see him, not a prince, not an offering, not the head of the Kaiming and the Luwu, not a demon throwing the world into chaos, but only Zhou Ying.

But though they had kept looking until they were weary, he hadn't come in time for them to see him.

CHAPTER 94 - Unbound Knife (1)

After the spiritual veins were restored, the wind of the great turbulence in the Xuanyin Mountains at last blew into the mortal world, and suddenly people were saying all kinds of things: of those focused on the big picture, some said this was the Zhou clan's conspiracy, some said it was the Li clan's revenge, and some rather overthought things and said that a new full moon position might have opened up, and perhaps the shed skin sages were scheming against each other. But what worried more people was, now that one of the pillars of Xuanyin's great palace had fallen, who would come in to fill the vacancy? Would the immortal mountains build up a new clan? With half of Heaven's Design Pavilion collapsed, what would they do about the missing numbers? In a few years, it would be time for the Grand Selection again—would they expand admissions?

For each emptied seat, hundreds upon thousands of butts were itching to sit down. Instantly, the thoughts of anyone with a bit of money or a bit of influence were activated; they believed that the spring wind of renewal would blow into their own home and sang the praises of this ever more flourishing golden age.

But this excitement was all for other people.

The increasing prosperity and wild uproar outside had nothing to do with the Yongning Marquis Manor at present.

When Zhou Ying woke up, he first smelled a faint chamomile scent. He turned his head and saw a pot of chamomile tisane being kept warm by a small heater beside his pillow.

The old lady had been worried about not sleeping well at night, so she wouldn't drink much tea after noon. Normally she would only drink sun-dried chamomile steeped in water with a bit of crystal sugar added for flavor.

People long unseen were strange to the eye, and sounds long unheard were confusing to the ear; only smells seemed capable of sticking a needle into a person's heart and following them for the rest of their life. As soon as he smelled this scent, even with his eyes closed, Zhou Ying knew he had come to the Marquis Manor.

He propped himself up and poured a bowl of chamomile tisane, but he couldn't taste it.

With a half-immortal's paramount spiritual sense attached to his sense of taste, when he put food in his mouth, he could know all the hands the dish had passed through, from making to carrying... How could it be that he couldn't taste a bowl of sweetened water? So he drank another mouthful and carefully attended to it. His numb sense of taste and his spiritual sense slowly awakened. In the water, the taste of the flower, of the sugar, of the implements, of the people...all gradually appeared to him. All that was missing was the smell of clove cream on her hands.

Zhou Ying squeezed the glittering and translucent little jade cup and quietly said, "Bai Ling."

The room was quiet—receiving the Marquis's order, Bai Ling had disrespected his superior and knocked him out. Now he didn't dare to show himself.

"I know you're there," Zhou Ying said. "Come out."

The room remained quiet. Only the distant strains of the Soul Calling Melody floated in from the mourning shed. After a moment, a distinctive whistling mixed in with the Soul Calling Melody, drawn out and sparse. Hearing it, Zhou Ying knew that Bai Ling had left.

"Shiyong."

The whistling stopped.

Xi Ping said, “Has Bai Ling left? I have a few things to say to you, and then I’ll leave, too. I know you want to be alone.”

“All right.” Zhou Ying’s reactions seemed a little slow today. Out of nowhere, he said, “Did you make it in time? What did she say?”

Xi Ping didn’t respond.

Zhou Ying’s pupils contracted slightly. A little flustered, he pulled out the small piece of reincarnation wood hanging around his neck. “...Didn’t you?”

“I made it in time,” Xi Ping finally said. “First I’m going to talk to you about something else. I’ll tell you in a little while.”

Zhou Ying stared blankly. It was as if he had been in too much of a hurry and had left his soul back on the road. It hadn’t caught up to him yet, and his mind was empty, not very clear.

“If there’s any leftover reincarnation wood, give Xi Yue a piece for me. That way, next time information can’t flow freely, there’ll be someone here in Jinping to keep an eye on things for you,” Xi Ping said. “As for the piece of reincarnation wood my parents have, just tell them it’s something I carried around with me. They’ll keep it safe, and I’ll be able to see if anything goes wrong at home. For the rest...for the rest, it's uncertain what the future holds, and anyway, with the restrictions of the demon seal, it would be hard for you to explain the whole story. How about you just don't say anything?"

Zhou Ying knew what he meant. "I'll let Bai Ling handle it."

"Okay, good. Master Lin says he can give you some spiritual image masks that will cover the wearer's spiritual image. There won't be much of a problem getting around ascended spirits and below, though it's hard to say for shed skins, he doesn't dare to give a guarantee," Xi Ping said. "The shed skin boundary is one that all ascended spirits can neither touch nor comprehend, apart from Hui Xiangjun... I'm going to Sanyue to search for her relics, not just to get the Unbound Furnace to repair Zhaoting."

What was so great about immortals?

Mortals looked up to the immortal mountains, thinking that they were lofty, omnipotent, that to look too long was to infringe—but couldn't the immortals also die terrified? Didn't they also feel love, hate, greed, and anger? Outside the Riverward, inside the Law Breaker, couldn't the rules of heaven be pulled apart?

He didn't believe that the mountains couldn't fall.

“If you want the Unbound Furnace, have Lin Chi and Wen Fei take the aboveboard path, submit a request to the Principal Peak, then contact Bai Ling. Don’t sneak around.” Zhou Ying had drunk half the pot of camomile tisane, and the empty look in his eyes had settled. “Lin Chi shouldn’t think making tools is as easy as lifting a finger. Nearly all ascended spirit immortal tools require rare materials. Once he gets started, Moon Plated Peak’s accounts won’t be so easy to balance. Then there’s the fact that after the business with the Zhao family, the immortal mountains will monitor Heavenly Questions. Don’t get your head turned by how covert you think you are. The demon seal was laid down by those two old fools from Xuanyin Mountain.”

Xi Ping knew that he had “woken up.”

Having said this, Zhou Ying was silent for a long moment, seeming to be hunting through his marrow for a bit of courage. Xi Ping was also silent, waiting patiently.

They weren’t in a rush, anyway.

After a long time, Zhou Ying at last quietly said, “What did the old lady... say to you?”

He had heard that when a person died, they could remember all the people they had known and all the events they had experienced in their life. He didn't know whether she would have remembered him for a moment, and he had never dared to think closely about whether, since he never came, the old lady might have guessed something, whether she would have resented him.

He was like a candidate for a county imperial examination who, though the roll hadn't yet been released, already knew that he had failed.

Xi Ping softly said a few sentences into his ear, then said, "San-ge, I'm going to see my dad."

Squeezing the empty cup, Zhou Ying sat alone in the shadow of the guest room's bed curtain. He waved a hand that seemed to have rusted toward Xi Ping. Then he took off the reincarnation wood and sealed it in his mustard seed, cutting off Xi Ping's consciousness.

The green jade cup shattered.

The Marquis, keeping vigil for the night in the mourning hall, was repeatedly stroking the piece of reincarnation wood only slightly larger than a game piece.

The old lady had been clutching this in her hand just before her death. It had taken ages to pry it out. According to Xi Yue, his Xiaobao had had a profound connection to this kind of wood, had used this thing as a communication device. His Highness had used an array to send it over along with a cracked piece of colored glass...as if these were old relics.

What was inside?

The Marquis considered it, then also smeared a drop of blood from his fingertip on it. He waited quietly.

Where he couldn't see, Xi Ping's consciousness was roaming beside him. Upon seeing this, he softly called out, "Dad."

The paper money burning in the brazier crackled, and people came and went outside the mourning shed, so the Marquis didn't hear anything.

Great Wan was Great Wan. Apart from a dying person's fading spirit, where he could briefly shelter, there was no refuge for him here—and it was no wonder that the old lady had taken him for a person come from the underworld. On the point of death, people likely had some unusual sensitivity.

“San-ge said that back then, you colluded with people from Northern Li and were planning to flee to the Beijue Mountains to raise sheep. Pardon my oversight, father, you really can’t judge a person by appearances. My jaw dropped when I heard that,” Xi Ping said to himself. “Tsk, why didn’t you go? A big bowl of fermented milk and a big chunk of mutton would be plenty. It’s a delightful thought. If the Beijue Mountains had produced a rare wonder like me, all the hundred-year-old or thousand-year-old snow lotuses or magic funguses would have had to move aside. Those mountains could stand up and claim to have sturdier backs than all the rest.”

Naturally no one would make a clamor around a mourning hall, and the Marquis also didn’t speak, so the scene gave Xi Ping the impression that the Marquis really was quietly listening to him talk.

So he said a great deal all at once, practically all of it irrelevant nonsense—when Xi Ping came home, he would usually take off his head and hang it up along with his outer clothes, babbling about nothing to the point.

When a whole pan of paper money had been burned, outside they began to sing the Soul Calling Melody.

“Raise the casket, hang two mats, shelter it fully seven days. The Great Way touches Heaven and sends you back home—”

Xi Ping stopped talking. He suddenly remembered that when Jiangli's bunch of self-aggrandizing little evil cultivators had been making trouble at the Azure Dragon Towers, they'd had the corpses sing precisely this tune to start it off.

Back then he had thought that the corpses wailing at midnight hadn't come from the land of the living, and now he himself was no longer part of the "land of the living." Hearing the song again, he actually felt a trace of affection.

"If that silly girl Chen Baishao, who was too blind to see what was right in front of her eyes, were still living, she'd have to kneel and burn incense for me. I'm the genuine 'Tai Sui', much more purebred than the one she blindly worshipped back then," Xi Ping said to the Marquis. "If she's watching from heaven, I suppose she's happy now... If she could look after our old lady on account of me having gotten revenge for her, that would be good. I figure Grandmother would like hearing her sing."

The Marquis was a little lost in thought, cocking an ear to listen to the Soul Calling Melody, massaging the piece of reincarnation wood, not knowing what use it was.

"Dad, I'm going far away again." Xi Ping said to the Marquis, suddenly becoming serious again. "Can you and Mom wait a few more years?"

Just then, a page walked in and requested instructions from the Marquis about something. The Marquis came back to himself and nodded to the page.

“Fine, it’s settled. A man keeps his word, anyone who doesn’t pay his debts is a puppy,” Xi Ping said. “I don’t have my knees or my head with me right now, I can’t kowtow, so I’ll have to owe you. One day...”

Before, he had imagined that san-ge would bring the reincarnation wood with his consciousness in it home and make a few little knickknacks, put one each in his parents’ and his grandmother’s rooms. That way, he could be a lucky charm for them like the karma beasts, guard the house and expel evil, come over when he wasn’t doing anything. Each night before they went to sleep, when they had sent the servants away, he would come to creak a bit, act cute, pay his respects.

Now he no longer wanted that.

Why?

Why, when he had been born as a mighty human, did he have to skulk around, a ghost unfit to see the light of day or speak to people?

He had lost the body he had received from his parents at the bottom of the Impassable Sea. How was he supposed to explain that?

The bailiffs had determined that A-Xiang's grandfather was disorderly, the immortal clan had determined that the Chen family's green ore field should belong to the Zhaos, and Xuanyin's Bell of Tribulation was high above it all, determining who was a god and who was a demon.

Wasn't that ridiculous?

The bailiffs and the lackeys at the former water transport and canal departments had already been thoroughly dealt with by the previous emperor, and now the Zhao family was a sinking ship that the rats were fleeing, waiting for the slaving vultures to swoop down and gorge themselves. The Bell of Tribulation's turn had come.

Xi Ping looked profoundly at old Madam Xi's memorial tablet standing to one side and engraved her image in his mind. Then he callously withdrew his consciousness.

Mom, Dad, Grandmother, forgive your child for not having the time to act cute.

There was a lump in his chest as firm as the four spiritual mountain ranges, an eternal knife that would hum ceaselessly unless it drank blood.

First he had to go make a scene.

What kind of self-deceiving lucky charm was he supposed to be, sneaking around like this?

Lucky my ass.

There would come a day when he would come to the front gate in one piece, kneel before his grandmother's memorial tablet and kowtow several times, then let his dad give him a beating with the discipline rod—for how unfilial he had been in going so far away.

If he couldn't do that...he wouldn't come back.

His spiritual sense was faintly touched. A strange yet familiar person was holding the reincarnation wood where his consciousness was hidden. Xi Yue came after him, clutching a piece of blood-soaked reincarnation wood.

The half-puppet he had abandoned along the way was red-eyed, babbling as he cursed him up and down.

“Hey, the little mute has learned to curse.” Xi Ping laughed, making Xi Yue kneel and cover his eyes, gathering blood or tears.

Xi Ping didn’t bother him. He withdrew his consciousness.

“Do not linger—”

Where no one could hear, he began to sing, finishing that Soul Calling Melody. It wasn’t to bid his grandmother farewell. He was sending himself off, full-voiced, the sound of it jubilant: “A lifetime’s joys and sorrows are like illusions. Go to the West...go to the West!”

To the West—he headed toward Western Chu.

At the end of the seventh month, the harvest was about to begin along the lower reaches of the Xia River. Wei Chengxiang, with her Silver Tray Lottery traveling bag on her back, walked over a ridge on the border of Tao County.

Reasonably speaking, the soil on both banks of the river ought to have been fertile, but there were too many cultivators coming and going in the area of the Xia River each year. Though the vast majority of them had their own spiritual stones, it was inevitable that a few impoverished evil cultivators would “pilfer heaven’s order.” As time went on, the land had become more and more barren each year. It could only sparsely grow a few half-dead rice shoots.

This year, there weren't even any sparse rise shoots. After the Silver Moon had shone, all of Tao County's vitality had nearly dried up.

Wei Chengxiang looked around and saw nothing but devastation. Nearby, a whole family was carefully turning over the earth, hoping to harvest a bit of grain—this year, they hadn't even been able to earn money at the Wild Fox Country Great Market. They would have to rely on begging to get through the winter... Many people might not make it through.

As they turned the earth, they prayed to the local forbidden evil god.

“Bless us, Tai Sui...”

“Tai Sui...”

With her spiritual sense gathered in her ears, a half-immortal could hear whispers a hundred meters away. Wei Chengxiang thought, “He doesn't like it when people call him that. He'll be mad.”

Just then, someone knocked on her spirit. She heard the senior say into her ear, “What are you up to?”

“Measuring the area of Tao County,” Wei Chengxiang answered, not showing alarm. “I want to calculate how many spiritual stones it would take to heal this earth, and I want to see how many people have suffered from the disaster... Senior, have Great Wan’s spiritual veins been restored?”

“Yes,” Xi Ping said. Across the river, he was much more “free.” No matter where he was, he didn’t need to worry about turning into a mute while he talked. And after the Wild Fox Country Great Market, practically all the reincarnation wood in Tao County had once held his consciousness. Though Xi Ping couldn’t use spiritual energy the way he had been able to inside the Law Breaker, at least within Tao County, his consciousness could wander all over following the people calling for Tai Sui.

“Stop measuring. Even if you measure it all, you don’t have that much money. Get ready to come with me. We’re going to Dongheng’s Sanyue to get the money.”

“But how will they get through this year?”

“This year, it was the Silver Moon that seized heaven’s order. Sanyue will allocate funds for disaster relief—and we’ve just picked up the Zhaos, so we’ll have them pay out some of their ill-gotten gains, too, cough up enough pocket lint to cook a winter's worth of porridge. Don't worry, I'll look after it."

You had to leave behind what you took. Afterward, if he found someone pilfering heaven's order, he would keep them to use as fertilizer.

Wei Chengxiang wasn't very sure why this senior from Great Wan wanted to look after people in Chu. "Senior, they're calling you Tai Sui..."

Xi Ping said, "Then I am Tai Sui."

Wei Chengxiang stared blankly, remembering that when she had first started to call him Tai Sui, this person had groused and shrieked as if someone had stepped on his tail. "Senior, why aren't you angry?"

Xi Ping indifferently said, "It's only a name."

The fake Tai Sui had died beneath the Bell of Tribulation. Now, he was the real Tai Sui, and he was going to smash the Bell of Tribulation.

CHAPTER 95 - Unbound Knife (2)

The nation of Chu, the county of Yu Family Bend.

Yu Family Bend was located to the northeast of Tao County, somewhat higher on the reaches of the Xia River, squeezed among the mountains.

Looked at from above, there was hardly any level ground in the whole county. If there were ten mu of land, that was enough to throw together a town. If the locals wanted to borrow an onion from their neighbors, they'd have to climb several dozen steps. Thin, zigzagging mountain roads like threads linked different parts of the county together, presenting a terrifying sight, as if they would snap when the wind blew. Most people would scrape together a few bits of bare earth in their front or back yards, planting a bit of rations wherever they saw an opening. Their livelihoods, meanwhile, mostly relied on two ores. In the west of Yu Family Bend were iron ore mines, surrounded by the gold smelting factories that relied on them. It was said that one third of Great Chu's Moon Plated Gold came from here. Toward the north, meanwhile, was a big green ore mountain carved into terraced fields that produced a large quantity of medicinal herbs annually.

In this world, apart from kidnapping people for ransom and practicing evil arts, there truly weren't many professions that brought in more ill-gotten gains than gold smelting factories or green ore fields. Yu Family Bend was a piece of precious land with a foul atmosphere.

In the southwest corner of Yu Family Bend, there was a hill a little taller than the others around it that was called Longevity Peak, a name picked out by some mean person that seemed to be hinting at something—this hill was bald.

Perhaps there was something wrong with its fengshui; this Longevity Peak often attracted lightning strikes, now and then experiencing a fire, burning it full of bumps and potholes starting from midway up. There was also a dilapidated temple at the summit, of which only charred ruins remained. The ragged banner hanging at the door was blackened, sobbing when the wind blew. The local villagers avoided this place, especially at night. Everyone said the dilapidated temple was haunted.

The westering sun had already sunk amid the mountains. The evening wind was a little chilly. A young person with a big wooden case on their back went up along stone steps overgrown with weeds.

The young person took off a worn-out bamboo hat with holes in it and looked up at the inscribed board on the dilapidated temple. Empty-handed, they drew a few strokes in the air. Spiritual energy stirred at this person's fingertips, and a talisman without medium took shape and nimbly flew out.

There was a crash, and the dilapidated temple, like the moon reflected in the water, was shattered by the talisman. The charred courtyard walls vanished, revealing a small building quite full of Western Chu style.

At the door of the small building stood a pair of dwarf half-puppets around three chi high. They might have been born identical twins, or they might have been altered to look the same afterward. Sticking out long, thin tongues like a snake's, they watched the visitor covetously. In unison, they said, "Welcome, visitor. Please come in."

It turned out that this was a way station specifically devoted to receiving cultivators, and it was rather haughty, too—many of the upstarts of Western Chu filled themselves up with elixirs and spiritual stones for decades to open their spiritual eyes. These people didn't cultivate; they opened their spiritual eyes purely to extend their lifespans and preserve their youthful looks. They didn't know a thing about talismans, arrays, and inscriptions. They were more ordinary than ordinary. There was a camouflage array on the outside of the small building. You could only glimpse its true appearance if you had the skills to cut through the camouflage, clearly showing that those fake cultivators weren't welcome.

"The half-puppets get tipped with spiritual stones." Xi Ping's voice sounded in the ears of the young person—of Wei Chengxiang. "Give them some."

Wei Chengxiang already felt she had wasted spiritual stones drawing a talisman to enter. “I won’t. The local customs are inappropriate.”

Xi Ping said, laughing, “Aren’t you worried they’ll put something in your food?”

Wei Chengxiang lowered her head, pretending not to see the half-puppets’ expressions. “I’m poor. They can poison me to death, and I still won’t give them anything.”

This cheapskate found a dark corner to sit in and put aside the big wooden case containing the Silver Tray Lottery. This thing was cumbersome, and it took up space. It quickly drew sidelong glances from people nearby. She took no notice, letting Xi Ping help her read through the menu written in Chu writing, which she didn’t understand very well. She memorized many characters and ordered the cheapest noodles.

In a way station specifically devoted to receiving cultivators, the food usually had medicinal herbs added to it, but the cheap dishes didn’t; they were purely for satisfying hunger. The half-puppet, not receiving a tip, had understood that this was a pauper, so he rolled his eyes and said, “Pay first. We take spiritual stones.”

“Half a qian of fourth-grade green ore.” Wei Chengxiang pointed to the unfamiliar Chu writing on the menu. Frowning, she grumbled, “Why not just go out looting?”

Then, in full public gaze, she took out a small set of scales of the kind used in medicine shops. Barehanded, she scraped a few crumbs off a piece of low grade green ore the size of a fingernail and weighed them—no more and no less, precisely half a qian. Then she carefully gathered the crumbs into a paper bag and offered it to the half-puppet. “Here.”

The half-puppet: “...”

Xi Ping: “...”

In the field of miserliness, even Pang Wenchang would have to concede defeat.

The half-puppet recovered and snatched away the paper bag, then left, cursing.

“Wei-laoban,” Xi Ping said with a sigh, “you did after all enter the Way eating blue jade.”

“I was young and ignorant, and you didn’t warn me. If I had known back then how much blue jade cost, I wouldn’t have taken it even if it meant turning into a rotten melon.” Wei Chengxiang still grudged the cost.

“Senior, couldn’t the person you arranged for me to see have gone somewhere else? Did we have to come to such an expensive place?”

If she had been on her own, she could have gotten all the way to Dongheng nibbling on a pocketful of flatbread. This meal cost enough to buy a whole cartload of noodles!

“This was the place he chose. This is an important person, very cautious, unwilling to show himself outside of his own territory,” Xi Ping said unhurriedly. “The Zhao family remnants came ashore in Yu Family Bend, and we’ll have to rely on them to get into Dongheng. This is on our way.”

Wei Chengxiang asked, “Who is he?”

Xi Ping said, “Have you heard of ‘worm masters’?”

Hearing this, Wei Chengxiang automatically looked up at the dwarf half-puppets bustling around the shop.

Having traveled widely, of course she knew what a ‘worm master’ was—it was a specific kind of toolmaking path; the materials it used weren’t spiritual beasts or spiritual stones, but living creatures.

When evil cultivators pilfered heaven's order in a place for a long time, it would impact the surrounding mortals, especially pregnant women and small children. Newborns were often deformed, and babies would contract peculiar diseases. If they weren't taken care of, they would soon die young. So there was an unorthodox practice that made these half-dead children into half-puppets. Well-made half-puppets even had cultivation and magic powers as soon as they were created.

Because these half-puppets were also called "earworm half-puppets," the toolmaking masters were known as "worm masters."

Using living people as toolmaking materials decreased one's merit, so the profession of the worm masters had many restrictions, the first among them being that they couldn't deliberately harm people and could only use "living ghosts"—in other words, people who had been infected by evil influence and were dying. On one hand, worm masters pulled these dying people back into the human world, performing a life-saving miracle; on the other hand, these half-puppets could only live by eating spiritual stones, and they were often taken as costly slaves and ill-used, living lives worse than death, like Xi Yue when he had been little. So it was hard to say whether what the worm masters did was good or bad. Anyway, they were always carrying on with all kinds of evil cultivators, and in the eyes of the orthodox sects, they were all just as bad as each other.

Wei Chengxiang's heart tightened, remembering the full moon scab she had found on the child in Tao County. "What?"

"After what you said last time, I looked around and found that quite a few worm masters had come to Tao County," Xi Ping said. "The way not even a blade of grass was left growing where the Silver Moon had passed reminded me right away of pilfering heaven's order. I suspect they've all come looking for 'materials.'"

Wei Chengxiang said, "But doesn't 'pilfering heaven's order' happen in the long term?"

Spiritual energy in the mortal world was sparse and unevenly distributed to begin with. Even if the Silver Moon had drained all of Tao County dry in one gulp, there was no lid over it. The wind would soon blow spiritual energy from other places there. The frail seedlings dead in the ground would be hard to bring back to life, but the mortals shouldn't have been so easily impacted.

"I don't know... He's here, ask him."

Hardly had Xi Ping spoken than Wei Chengxiang smelled a scent of pine. Then her vision blurred, and a person seemed to appear out of nowhere across from her.

This person was wearing gloves and a brocade robe that was at odds with the surroundings; he was so ceremonious it was a little odd. He was tall and thin, with a limber figure and precisely-sculpted features, but put together, for some reason, all of this...wasn't especially attractive.

It was the kind of unattractive where you couldn't pick out anything wrong with him, but looking at him long enough was a little spine-chilling.

The half-puppet who was about to serve Wei Chengxiang all but knelt when he saw the newcomer. He turned and ran, not daring to serve the tampered-with food.

The newcomer smiled at Wei Chengxiang. His features seemed to have parted ways—only his mouth moved when he smiled. His eyes were very direct, and his voice was neither masculine nor feminine. “Nice to meet you, miss. Please pass along my regards to His Highness the Snake King and the ‘Grand Duke Tai Sui’ behind you.”

Wei Chengxiang raised her eyebrows—it had been a long time since anyone had exposed her identity.

“Fine,” said Xi Ping, “pass along my regards to the Mr. ‘Heartless’ behind this puppet.”

Wei Chengxiang was startled and furtively asked him, “This is a dummy? He’s Chu’s most mysterious worm master, Bu Zhichou?”

“Settle down,” said Xi Ping. “When he comes to Wild Fox Country’s Great Market to buy stuff, he still has to pay protection money to the Snake King’s Immortal Palace.”

Wei Chengxiang: “...”

She could guess that Great Wan’s government forces had infiltrated the Snake King’s Immortal Palace, and furthermore that they had a profound connection to this Senior Tai Sui. So she nodded coolly to the puppet and said a few polite phrases as instructed.

The puppet then said, “I know what you want to ask. It’s true, we have all come for the ‘living ghosts’ left by the Silver Moon.”

The corner of Wei Chengxiang’s eye twitched.

The puppet said, “The turbid energy of the Silver Moon is heavy. The place it has swept will become a Moon Shadow. Within the next half year at least, spiritual energy won’t be able to flow in from the surroundings. I’m afraid all the little ones three years old and under will turn into little dolls.”

Wei Chengxiang blurted out, “Dongheng’s Sanyue...”

...isn’t going to do anything about it?

“Don’t talk nonsense,” Xi Ping interrupted her in her spirit. “Many little brats die during famine years. When the harvest is bad, people will eat their children, or bury them alive when there’s an epidemic. There’s nothing new about it. What does this amount to? Tell Bu Zhichou that when he comes to the Immortal Palace’s night feasts, no matters what business he does, half the cost will be deducted. Ask him what to do.”

Hearing this, the puppet smiled, two frightening lumps of flesh appearing on his face. As if he had been prepared in advance, he took a roll of sweet-smelling silk. “I’ve always said that evil cultivators aren’t necessarily any more hard-hearted than parents—here, a spirit-gathering array.”

Wei Chengxiang was just about to reach out to take it, but the puppet held her back. “But let me warn you, your excellency, this isn’t worth your while.”

Wei Chengxiang gave him a fake smile, snatched the silk, and opened it up. She saw an array meticulously drawn on the silk. As if he had been worried she wouldn't understand, he had very considerately pasted on a map of Tao County.

She only took a glance, and her heart sank: the array needed an astronomical number of white spirits.

“The spirit-gathering array needs time to gather spiritual energy. The array must be completed by the Mid-Autumn Festival at latest.” Softly, the puppet sarcastically said, “Alas, it's already the end of the seventh month. I'm afraid there won't be time to transport spiritual stones from the Sanyue Immortal Mountains—at any rate, I gave you the idea. You can't take back the conditions you laid out.”

“You...” When Wei Chengxiang looked up, the seat across from her was already empty. The puppet had vanished.

Just then, the dwarf half-puppet conscientiously brought her food in a big bowl like a serving basin, accompanied by a dish of beef shank, half a jin of ham, a number of side dishes, and an extra pot of top quality Shaoxing wine whose fragrance assailed the nostrils.

But Wei Chengxiang had lost her appetite. Both of them were silent for a while.

At this time, she heard a cultivator quietly saying nearby, "...I hear there's a branch of Great Wan's Zhaos in Yu Family Bend. The Yu family patriarch personally received them, and someone even came from Sanyue's inner sect."

"So much ceremony?"

"They're one of Xuanyin's four big families. They carry a hidden realm wherever they go. Heavens, only the Zhaos themselves can enter it, and once they're inside, no one can find them. The Zhao family showed themselves in Yu Family Bend because they want to make friends. Who doesn't want to eat such a big piece of fatty meat? Thousands of years of the accumulated resources of an orthodox clan—how many good things must they have?"

Wei Chengxiang took a deep breath, forced herself to rally, and began to eat like a whirlwind, making a clean sweep. As if to distract herself, she picked up the others' topic and asked Xi Ping, "What is the Yu family? A big family of Sanyue?"

“In Chu, there are no so-called ‘big families’ apart from the Xiangs,” Xi Ping said. “They’re talking about the local thugs around here.”

Chu and Wan were neighboring countries, but while there was only a river separating them, their landscapes and geography were very different.

In Wan, apart from Jingzhou, which was connected the Xuanyin Mountain Range, and some mountainous areas in Hongyin and Shuozhou to the north, the other regions were all plains. There were nine great provinces in the country in all, with prefectures and counties under them. A canal passed from north to south, transportation was well-developed. If a wind rose in one place, in a few days it would have flowed throughout the whole country. Some powers—for example, the former water transport department—were laid along the canal system; others, meanwhile, were trans-provincial associations of officials and merchants with a complex web of connections everywhere, linking up in all directions; you could talk about it for a day and a night without feeling that you had explained it all properly.

But on this side of the Xia River, Chu’s local customs were far more isolationist.

There were many mountains and hills here. Before, when there had been no steam engines to cut through mountains and make roads, it would take several days riding a cart to get from one side of a mountain to the other.

Both transportation and communication had been difficult. Because of this, since ancient times, Chu hadn't had big provinces, only various prefectures and counties delimited by the mountains. To come and go between different counties, you often had to trek over mountain ranges. There was layer upon layer of obstacles. Local thugs had great power.

Above everything was Western Chu's Xiang family dominating Dongheng's Sanyue, divinities in heaven, emperors ordained by heaven; and every place also had its own local despot.

Yu Family Bend's local despots were the local big family, the Yu clan. They occupied this precious land and had overbearing riches and power. The clan leader was a half-immortal who had become so without authorization...of the sort that didn't cultivate, which didn't prevent him from living with greater pomp and ceremony than the ascended spirits and shed skins of the Xuanyin Mountains—in the county of Yu Family Bend, there were several memorial halls consecrated just to the worship of the clan leader. At the doors of the gold smelting furnaces were big statues of the clan leader over a zhang high; if you hadn't known better, you would have thought he had invented the Gold Imitation technique. It was said that this clan leader also had a granddaughter who had married a prince in Dongheng and given birth to a supposedly very promising son, who had entered the West Peak of Sanyue's three Principal Peaks—East, Central, and West.

Xi Ping added: “I think that Xiang Zhao whose bones may or may not have all been collected came from the West Peak.”

“I understand. Boundless prospects,” Wei Chengxiang said. Then she sighed. “Why doesn’t Tao County have a local thug with such overbearing riches and power?”

If there had been one, they might have thought of a way to plunder without having to go far.

Xi Ping thought: Tao County is remote and backward, but next door isn’t. And next door, a crowd from a rich and arrogant big family of Xuanyin has just arrived.

Right now, in the Snake King’s Immortal Palace, the “Snake King” had become Lao Tian, while Xu Rucheng had followed orders and joined with another batch of Luwu to infiltrate the hidden realm where the Zhaos were hidden.

Today, Yu Family Bend’s clan leader had entertained the Zhao clan leader. The clan leader had attended the feast with a few half-immortals from Heaven’s Design Pavilion. While they were away, Xu Rucheng had quickly placed invisible spying talismans everywhere.

The Zhaos returned earlier than he had expected.

The Zhao family's young mistress Zhao Qindan had nailed her features in place to keep her face from slipping. As soon as they returned to the Zhao family hidden realm where they were temporarily staying, before she had even found her footing, her temper erupted: "Father, what do they mean by it?"

Zhao Qindan was the daughter of the clan leader of the Yuzhou Zhao clan. The Yuzhou Zhao clan was far from the main family. Though they had relied on their distance from the capital and the lack of oversight to secretly raise quite a few half-immortals in their clan, they still hadn't dared to set their sights on Xuanyin Mountain's Grand Selection. During the Grand Selection six years ago, the clan had as usual submitted the names of a few juniors of the appropriate age at random, among them Zhao Qindan.

They had submitted the names, but no one had thought anything would come of it. How could they know that this time, General Zhi would be personally overseeing the Grand Selection? No one knew what criteria this sword god had used to pick people, but at any rate, when the selection card had been delivered to Yuzhou, the whole family had been as stunned as the Yongning Marquis Manor.

Zhao Qindan's family background, appearance, natural endowments...even her luck, all of them were remarkable. In the Latent Cultivation Temple, she had been among the first few disciples to open her spiritual eyes. She had gone right onto Heaven's Design Pavilion's roster. Upon leaving the mountains, as was only to be expected, she had joined the Yuzhou branch.

There were many members of the Zhao clan in the Yuzhou branch. The assistant commander was a senior who had come from the main family in Jinping. When a young girl like this arrived, it naturally goes without saying that she was doted on in myriad ways, everyone praising her and giving way to her. Normally whenever anything good came from the inner sect, she would have first pick. She was never permitted to touch any dirty or tiring work.

She had previously believed she was a one-in-a-million proud daughter of heaven.

Who could have thought that worldly affairs could be so inconstant? The Zhao family's old forebear had fallen, and the former "great immortal clan" had become the scorn and target of all, a rat crossing the street. She had crossed west over the Xia River along with a few seniors in Heaven's Design Pavilion, from then on becoming a rootless traveler in an alien land.

The Chu were so rude. A person whose vision was limited to a mere county town had actually said right to her parents' faces that they wanted her to marry the Yu family's imperial grandson in the inner sect, whom no one knew anything about!

“What are they? Are they worth...”

Clan Leader Zhao waved a hand, interrupting her. “No matter what the mother's family background is, he is still an imperial grandson of Great Chu, and our family is only a branch family from the border. On the subject of family status, it would count as a step up for us. Never mind that His Highness is an inner sect disciple of Sanyue's Principal Peak...”

“Ha!” Zhao Qindan gave a cold laugh. “An inner sect disciple who hasn't managed to open his spiritual eyes after eight years among the immortal mountains?”

This ridicule came from the fact that immortal sects' inner sects were all unreachably high—excepting Dongheng's Sanyue.

Xuanyin recruited one class of disciples every ten years. No matter which family the disciples came from, the Latent Cultivation Temple only let them stay for three hundred sixty days. If they couldn't open their spiritual eyes during that time, they would be sent back to where they came from; there would be no second chance. Even if you were a prince or princess, you still had to wake up before dawn.

But Sanyue had no so-called “Grand Selection.” They took disciples based on “predestination”—in other words, it depended on connections. After the disciples went there, they had to pay a tribute to their teachers. For example, the West Peak, whose “fine environment nurtured great talents,” didn’t require its established foundation disciples to pay; if they performed some trifling work, they could even collect spiritual stones to use. Disciples below an established foundation were separated into four grades according to their natural endowments. For the top grade, each person had to pay three liang of white spirits monthly. Each grade down, the “private tutoring fees” doubled; the more useless you were, the more you paid.

If you could afford it, you could hang around the immortal mountains until you died of old age.

The Yu family’s imperial grandson nephew was of the third class. He had to pay Sanyue nearly a hundred fifty liang of white spirits annually—what did that mean in practice? Calculating the money value according to market prices, next door in Tao County, the entire county’s annual tax revenue might amount to that much. They had been paying for eight years. A green teenager had gone in, and now he had grown a beard and was still a mortal; what willpower!

But Clan Leader Zhao paused and said tactfully, “After all, we’re outsiders. If we want to put down roots in Sanyue, our best choice is to make ties of marriage with the Xiang family.”

Zhao Qindan understood her father’s implication and stared at him in disbelief for a long moment. “So you’re agreeing?”

CHAPTER 96 - Unbound Knife (3)

“You want to marry me to a mortal,” Zhao Qindan said, her voice suddenly sharp. “What about the rest of the clan? All my shixiongs?”

Clan Leader Zhao unconsciously avoided her gaze and haltingly said, “No one can remain a mortal forever...”

This was true—it was only that the lifespans of cats and dogs weren’t long enough; if they could have lived fifty or sixty years while being fed white spirits and being stuffed full of elixirs daily despite the cost, they might also have entered the Way before the pills killed them.

Zhao Qindan, looking at her unfamiliar father, suddenly thought, irrelevantly: Turtles have long lives. Maybe someone has fed one elixirs. I wonder how many turtles the cultivation of Dongheng’s Sanyue’s so-called “inner sect” disciples would amount to.

“To enter Heaven’s Design Pavilion, you need to go through three rounds of examinations, but I didn’t, because I was the third person in my class at the Latent Cultivation Temple to open my spiritual eyes. The general commander of Jinping’s Heaven’s Design Pavilion personally exempted me from the examinations,” Zhao Qindan said quietly. “The inner sect’s Green Pool Peak doesn’t take people from our family, but when Duanrui-shi...

when Princess Duanrui came to teach scripture, she said that if I could find a Way of the Heart, Green Pool Peak could give me a reception order. Aren't I good enough?"

"Of course our Dandan is..."

"Then why don't you think I can protect our family on my own? You're treating me like an expensive cake being sold in exchange for an entry ticket to Sanyue!"

"Qindan," the clan leader shouted, expression becoming stern, "impudence!"

Zhao Qindan straightened her neck and glared at him.

Clan Leader Zhao had to make many decisions. He was beset on all sides. He suddenly ran out of patience to debate with his headstrong daughter.

Had their family had still been in Great Wan, still like the sun at noon, she could have done whatever she wanted, no one would have quarreled with her no matter what she ranted and raved about; everyone had coddled her, anyway. But things were different now. If they couldn't put down roots in Western Chu as soon as possible, the blessings of their forebears and the accumulated resources of a hundred generations would quickly turn them into a target!

A young person's character was lighter than paper. She had only slightly outdone a handful of her peers, received a few words of polite praise, and she'd simply forgotten what her own surname was. And she wanted to "protect her family"—easier said than done. Never mind her, would even Xuanyin's Princess Duanrui dare to say something like this? Among the whole crowd of ascended spirit masters, perhaps only Flying Jade Peak's Zhi Xiu would dare to say such a thing—all on his own, with no other mouths to feed, he could brag as much as he liked.

The Zhao family had fallen because their shed skin forebear had lost his mind and become a demon. Nothing would do any good but another shed skin elder arising. By the time this cicada had shed her skin, there was no saying whether there would be any cicadas left on earth.

"Marriages are the will of the parents. Where does your opinion come into it? Your spiritual imprint and horoscope card have already been sent to Dongheng via the Yu family. I have already consulted on this matter with the clan's Exalted. For now, don't go out and run around. Tomorrow I'll have your mother come to make arrangements, have someone come to teach you Chu writing and the Xiang family's history and rules."

Zhao Qindan's expression turned from fury to resentment. With emphasis, she said, "If worse comes to worst, I'll return this body to the two of you."

Clan Leader Zhao took no notice of her petty threat. With a cold laugh, he turned and left.

The girl was so spoiled she thought she knew everything. She had grown a little rotten.

A vein pulsed in Zhao Qindan's head. She raised her sword, ready to charge outside, but two shixionsg who had been in Heaven's Design Pavilion before came toward her and blocked her way.

She called them "shixiong" according to Xuanyin's rules, but in fact in the family's generational rankings, they were older than her father, and one of them had even established his foundation while crossing the river westward. There was a major boundary between them; he could stop her with a mere raise of the hand.

"Dandan, don't get hung up on this." The established foundation cultivator had a hundred years of cultivation behind him; his mind and tone were both much calmer than a mortal's. As he remorselessly placed a prohibition in front of the gate to Zhao Qindan's rooms, he counseled her pleasantly: "This will amount to you joining Sanyue's inner sect. You can continue cultivating in the inner sect after this. Won't it be better than in Heaven's Design Pavilion? Since there's a shortcut, why should we go far afield when what we seek is close at hand? Don't you agree?"

His manner was gentle, giving Zhao Qindan the false impression that she could talk it over with him, so Young Mistress Zhao pleaded bitterly: "Shixiong, why do we have to climb up this miserable offshoot of the Xiang family? Can't we just guard our family's hidden realm? Please, talk to my father. I'll work hard to cultivate, day and night..."

The established foundation waved a hand. Smiling just as usual, he said, "What are you saying? How could our Dandan bear such hardship?"

Zhao Qindan froze.

When she had just joined Heaven's Design Pavilion, she had run up against Great Wan's unrest. Evil cultivators and common people hoodwinked by evil cultivators were everywhere. Her shixionsgs were using up bag after bag of spiritual stones and medicine to treat wounds; Heaven's Design Pavilion was short on people.

Everyone else was in dire straits, but she was protected by her shixionsgs.

Back then, they had used just this tone to say “That place is filthy, don’t let Dandan go” and “Disorderly citizens are a thorny problem, don’t bring her along for such dirty work...”

It turned out that pampering never came out of nowhere. When she had been a cherished delicate flower, the people responsible for her had been keeping accounts. Now the time had come for her to repay them.

With a snap of his fingers, the established foundation sent a mind clearing talisman and a sleep talisman flying into the center of Zhao Qindan’s brow, knocking her down without compromise. He collected her spiritual stones and sword. He waved a hand very gently, and a wind rolled Zhao Qindan up and took her properly back to her room. He attentively swept her room with his consciousness; the incense burner and the cooler automatically lit and opened; even the noise of the chiming clock became softer.

Then he added another prohibition outside, to make sure the person inside wouldn’t be able to escape even if she had wings. He made a “quiet” gesture toward the page next to him, who had come to give something to the young mistress.

“Don’t give her any more spiritual stones. She won’t have any use for them for the moment.” As if afraid of disturbing someone’s pleasant dreams, the established foundation kept his voice very low. “Give the fruit to a maid and have it kept on ice. This damn place is too hot.”

The stupid-looking page—Xu Rucheng—caught up and quickly agreed. He ran off, keeping himself to himself. Inwardly he was sighing incessantly, feeling that this sequence matched the plots of the operas he had seen when he was a child. After all this fuss, not only were the young mistresses in the operas not free, the young mistresses in Heaven’s Design Pavilion weren’t free, either. The words “young mistress” didn’t mean anything good.

Just then, Tai Sui’s voice sounded in his ear without warning: “The Zhaos have pretty good judgment.”

Xu Rucheng’s face was expressionless: the uninvited guest had come again.

Great Wan had issued them mysterious wooden chips, the size of a copper coin. Nothing could be used to transport them; someone had come in person specifically to bring them across the river. If you spilled your blood on them, you could use your spirit to contact an unfathomable “senior” whenever you wanted. Also, when it was inconvenient for you to use spiritual energy, you could go through this senior to contact other colleagues who had the wooden chips—of course, they could only be used abroad.

The wooden chips were limited. In all, they were only given to a few people in charge. When Xu Rucheng had first gotten hold of one, he had felt extremely honored. He had gone out of his way to bathe and change, recite his memorized self-introduction several times, before finally spilling his blood. Then he'd heard a familiar voice that made his head hurt: "If you'd dawdled any longer, I was about to fall asleep. Well, Xu Xiangxiang,⁶⁵ isn't hearing from me a nice surprise?"

It had not been a nice surprise; Xu Rucheng had been dumbfounded, feeling as if the top of his skull had been cleaved by a lightning bolt on the spot: how could the senior he'd looked forward to meeting for ages be the rotten tree spirit who'd tricked him into a heart demon oath? And his lord and Mr. Bai had also been deluded by him!

He stood there watching as his colleagues were bewitched by this evil god, privately saying how reliable this senior code-named "Tai Sui" was, something about "While reticent, he has an answer for every question, so unfathomable"... Get the fuck out with that "reticent and unfathomable"!

This thoroughly wicked evil god had given him eight hundred nicknames and came over to make sport of him whenever he had free time, deliberately choosing all kinds of awkward moments to appear. Several times, he had spoken while Xu Rucheng was halfway through emptying his bladder, nearly startling him into pissing on his shoes. Xu Rucheng had hammered out the ability to keep calm no matter what he heard.

Xu Rucheng took a deep breath and adjusted his mental state. He asked, “What judgment?”

“They’ve taken a shine to the Yu family,” Xi Ping said. “I don’t mind telling you, I’ve also taken a shine to that family.”

Xu Rucheng thought, What, you also want to marry the third-rate imperial grandson?

Xi Ping said with a sigh, “One third of the whole country’s Moon Plated Gold, and medicinal herbs on top of that—how much money do you think that family must have?”

Gold smelters that refined Moon Plated Gold used spiritual stones, which the public treasury would allocate; there was a lot of shady business involved there. And if you sold medicinal herbs to the immortal mountains, it went without saying that there could be false reports, jacked up prices, and shoddy goods palmed off as quality goods. On medicinal materials that went to the black market outside the immortal mountains, you could make even more of a killing.

And the money was only one aspect. If they could keep a hold over Moon Plated Gold and medicinal herbs, their connections in Dongheng's Sanyue must far exceed the average person's imagination.

Zhao Qindan's father was right. Had the Yu family not had a sense of inferiority over their lack of family history and been obsessed with finding a "pure bloodline" with which to adorn themselves, the Zhao family really would have been social-climbing upstarts in this "backwater."

Xu Rucheng couldn't follow his wildly bouncing crooked thoughts. He only said, "No matter how much money they have, it's still a disgrace. This is a mighty walker in the mortal world of Heaven's Design Pavilion... Listen, senior, when she wakes up, will she really try to commit suicide?"

"I doubt it," Xi Ping carelessly said. "Didn't you hear her say she still wants to 'focus on cultivation and protect her family'?"

However ruthless her words, as long as she hadn't reached the point of breaking off all ties, anger was just the proper response to not being pampered, only a tantrum.

Could a tantrum draw blood?

Xi Ping went off in another direction: “But the Zhao family selling the young lady like this actually is very ugly.”

Xu Rucheng felt that while this Tai Sui basically had no moral character to speak of, he could still sometimes say something just. “I heard she was exempted from the examinations to join Heaven’s Design Pavilion. Ah, with one class every ten years in the Latent Cultivation Temple, you could count on one hand how many exemptions for joining Heaven’s Design Pavilion there have been. What a pity. I see that her mortal parents are just in the prime of life, so she must be quite young herself. The Zhao clan’s sins can’t be blamed on her, but the little girl will have to bear the bitter consequences in their place.”

“That’s right. What would you call this?” Xi Ping pompously agreed with him, his tone softening irresistibly. “Hero, I have an idea that can save the damsel from her despondency. Do you want to give it a try?”

Xu Rucheng: “...”

He had a bad feeling about this.

When Zhao Qindan woke up, it was already completely dark.

Chu's autumn was warm. Approaching the eighth month, the crying cicadas were still screaming clamorously. But the heat couldn't intrude at all into her little courtyard. Here it was warm in winter and cool in summer, extremely comfortable, like a golden cage.

She was a bird in a golden cage, a flower in a pot. They had even taken her sword and spiritual stones.

Without spiritual stones, a half-immortal could only draw spiritual energy from the surroundings when drawing talismans. How effective it would be was another matter; this was the Zhao family's hidden realm, so if she moved the spiritual energy here, the hidden realm would immediately notify everyone.

She couldn't advance a step.

Just then, there was a creak. Her personal maid quietly came in and put the fruit tray that had been kept on ice beside her hand—for some reason, this “maid” was slouching and keeping her head down today, and walking stiffly. She put the fruit tray down with a knock, unusually clumsy.

Fortunately, the young mistress was preoccupied and didn't notice.

Expressionless, Zhao Qindan said, “They told you to come water and feed me?”

The “maid,” usually extremely clever, was startled by her sudden speech. She hemmed and hawed and didn’t respond.

Zhao Qindan wasn’t in the mood to bicker with her. She gave a cold laugh. “Leave.”

The “maid” didn’t move.

Zhao Qindan turned her head impatiently. “I told you to leave...”

Then the “maid” suddenly took a step forward and pulled a bag of spiritual stones from her sleeve. “Young mistress, run away!”

Zhao Qindan was stunned.

The “maid” said, “I stored up the spiritual stones in secret. There’s enough for you to use. Young mistress, I know of your ambitions, why should you condescend to take what is offered for their sakes? Hurry, run!”

Her voice was forced high and thin, and she spoke so quickly that it went off key. Zhao Qindan simply didn’t understand her. “Slow...slow down, Xiuyu.

What's wrong with your throat?"

At the same time, Xi Ping was quietly saying into the ear of Xu Rucheng, who was pretending to be the maid: "If you speak in a falsetto again, I'll curse you so you get stuck like that."

Xu Rucheng: "..."

Life was truly hard.

Zhao Qindan opened the bag of spiritual stones and saw that it contained everything from white spirits to green ore, suitable for all occasions. It was quite thorough.

In spite of herself, the young mistress felt sorrowful: in the Latent Cultivation Temple, even the ninth princess had had to do her own hair. She'd gotten used to it, and since coming back home hadn't especially needed a personal maid and got annoyed when there were too many people around. Adding in that she was a proud and arrogant half-immortal of Heaven's Design Pavilion, she had nothing to say to these young maids who had never left the grand compounds. She had always been an undemanding but unapproachable master.

She hadn't thought that a young girl she hadn't ever so much as looked directly in the face would be willing to run such a big risk for her sake.

Zhao Qindan was silent for a moment, then put the bag of spiritual stones away in her clothes. She looked up at the little courtyard she was trapped in and said with a bitter smile, "You're a good girl, thank you. But even if you stole me a whole roomful of spiritual stones, I still wouldn't be able to break the prohibition put on the gate by my established foundation shixiong, never mind that you can't get in or out of the hidden realm without alerting others."

"I've heard that if you mess around with the immortals' inscriptions, they might blow up. There are quite a few inscriptions on the inside and outside of our courtyard, young mistress, look." The little maid—Xu Rucheng—opened his hand, following the lousy idea Xi Ping had given him. In his palm was a third-class inscription carved out from the wall. "When there's a fire in the courtyard, you can run away in the confusion. When we servants go in and out, we have special tokens. Take this, you can use it to get out of the hidden realm."

Zhao Qindan was so startled she jumped. "Put it down, inscriptions aren't toys! You're going to get yourself killed!"

“Heh-heh,” Xu Rucheng said like a stupid girl, “I had no problem carving it out. I’ve been lucky ever since I was little.”

Zhao Qindan said seriously, “I’ve only learned a little bit about inscriptions. If used wrongly, you can hurt yourself and others—back in the Latent Cultivation Temple, one of my classmates was a shixiong who was such a genius he was going to be the first in our class to open his spiritual eyes, but he had a setback precisely because of fooling around with inscriptions. If there hadn’t just happened to be some seniors from the inner sect there, he would have flattened half the Latent Cultivation Temple’s valley with his inscription—where did you carve out that character from?”

Xi Ping was briefly stupefied by this unexpected blame flying his way. He thought, That’s bullshit, it was only an ordinary fireproofing inscription. Su Zhun isn’t human—he stuck me with the blame for what Liang Chen did!

Having heard this, Xu Rucheng said feelingly to Xi Ping, “Tsk, how can there be so many brats who didn’t get beaten enough out there?”

Xi Ping: “...”

Idiot Xu, you’re done for.

“So much nonsense,” the suddenly fickle evil god said coldly into Xu Rucheng’s ear. “Move!”

So Xu Rucheng pretended to panic, shifting the inscription from hand to hand as if he were holding a hot potato. “Then...then what should I do... young mistress, I...”

In a moment of “desperation,” he flung away the inscription, covered his ears, and squatted in place.

After hearing that this thing could blow up half a valley, his first reaction wasn’t to gently put it down but to raise his hand and hurl it away. Zhao Qindan absolutely hadn’t expected that there could be such an abnormal idiot in the world. She was caught off guard. “Don’t!”

But it was already too late.

Though neither Xu Rucheng nor Xi Ping knew much about inscriptions, behind the reincarnation wood was His Highness Prince Zhuang. This personage even dared to disassemble the shed skin elders’ demon seal, let alone the third-class inscriptions in the Zhao family’s little courtyard.

Under his instructions, Xi Ping had ordered Xu Rucheng to swap the positions of the inscriptions in the courtyard. Hurling the inscription like this was like the burning of the successive camps.⁶⁶ A fiery dragon arose in Zhao Qindan's courtyard, but it didn't even sound the wind chimes hanging inside. Roaring, it charged toward the established foundation's prohibition at the gate.

Xu Rucheng said, "Hey, look, young mistress, it exploded outward. I knew my luck was good!"

Zhao Qindan: "..."

Xu Rucheng quickly gave her a guard's clothes and a token with entrance and exit inscriptions carved on it, which he had prepared in advance.

"Hurry, stop dawdling!"

At this point, no matter how slow Zhao Qindan was to catch on, she still had to know there was something wrong with this maid. But there were already voices outside. Her spiritual sense told her that her shixionsgs were already here.

In a moment of peril, she didn't have time to overthink it. She followed through with her original intentions.

Xu Rucheng felt that he had done a good deed. Amid the confusion, he secretly escorted Young Mistress Zhao as she snuck out. He asked Xi Ping,

“Senior, what now?”

“Change your disguise,” Xi Ping told him evenly.

Xu Rucheng said, “Into who?”

“The bride-to-be.”

CHAPTER 97 - Unbound Knife (4)

The what to-be?

For a moment, Xu Rucheng thought there was something wrong with his ears. “Is that also my lord’s command?”

His lord definitely couldn’t have ordered something so preposterous.

“It isn’t, actually,” Xi Ping said with conviction. “Before the fifteenth of the eighth month, I need to get a hundred thousand liang of white spirits.”

Xu Rucheng: “...”

Today was already the last day of the seventh month. There wasn’t even time for a last-moment change in the fillings of the mooncakes to be given as Mid-Autumn Festival gifts, and this evil god had casually pointed to the moon itself and said he wanted to eat that one!

Forgive his limited experience, but when the southern mines had conveyed shipments of spiritual stones to Great Wan with a navy escorted by half a dozen water dragons, would the blue jades, green stamps, and even green ore slag of one convoy put together have been worth a hundred thousand white spirits?

“You’ll have to be a little circumspect. We’ll need to think of a way to sneak into Sanyue’s inner sect,” this evil god who didn’t have to do anything himself pronounced. “You can keep using this identity, marry in and become part of the West Peak. It’ll be very convenient.”

“Then why don’t you...” Xu Rucheng was so mad he was steaming from the ears and nearly let his mouth get away from him. He struggled to calm himself down and changed what he was going to say. “What do you want so many spiritual stones for?”

“Well, I want to put together a little spirit-gathering array in Tao County,” the evil god said. “Tao County’s reincarnation wood trees are my foundation. At first, thanks to Qiu Sha, I could have had free run of Tao County, but that old fool shone a light on them, and they all withered. I’ve heard that the Silver Moon leaves behind a Moon Shadow where it passes. For at least the next half year, spiritual energy won’t flow freely. Won’t my reincarnation wood trees have rotted down to the roots by then? I need to gather some spiritual energy to protect them. The array needs spiritual stones.”

Xu Rucheng’s head was pounding. “Do you think I’m stupid? Before, you told me to cut down all the reincarnation wood trees in Tao County. Now that Sanyue's shed skin came all this way to save you the trouble, you say you're afraid of the trees rotting and want spiritual stones?"

Before, Xi Ping had just been offhandedly tricking him. He had momentarily forgotten what nonsense he had said before. He briefly jammed. "Times change—and I wasn't finished. To dispel the Moon Shadow over Tao County, the spirit-gathering array must be complete before the Mid-Autumn Festival. It would take too long to get spiritual stones from Dongheng's Sanyue, so we can only rely on you now."

With one ear, Xu Rucheng listened to the evil god shooting off plans. With the other, he listened to the uproar of voices outside the courtyard. He opened the little maid's round eyes into copper bells. "Rely on... What the fuck does this have to do with me? You're always lying. Why should I help you do something like this?"

"Heh." Xi Ping calmly spat out three words: "Heart demon oath."

Xu Rucheng: "..."

Fuck eight generations of your ancestors!

"Young mistress!"

“Dandan!”

“Qindan-shimei!”

In a blink, Xu Rucheng drew back his neck and hid behind a swing set. Before his floating hems could fall, he heard a low cry: “Break!”

The established foundation cultivator used spiritual energy to put out the flames on the third-class inscriptions by force. Fortunately, the majority of the inscriptions had been burnt beyond recognition. No one would notice at a glance that they had been tampered with.

The established foundation cultivator quickly severed the spiritual energy in the inscriptions, then charged into the little courtyard practically at the same time as his consciousness.

Xu Rucheng, covering his face, had no choice. With a jade stamp, he activated the immortal tool he was carrying. When he put down his sleeves, he grew three and a half cun, and his round face stretched slightly into an oval. He took on Zhao Qindan’s appearance.

Sadly, while the immortal tool could mimic a person’s spiritual image, Xu Rucheng couldn’t imitate the young mistress’s deportment. This big fellow amply demonstrated how someone could “put on imperial robes and still not look like a prince.” The tall and slender beauty ought to have looked like an immortal crane; with him inside, she somehow became a camel—the legs were still just as long, but the effect wasn’t at all convincing.

Xi Ping: “...”

Even the Zhaos who had charged inside stared blankly.

Xu Rucheng knew at once that he was making the young mistress seem like the idiot from the next village. In a flash, he demonstrated some quick wits. Before the others could work out what was wrong, he tossed a talisman toward the crowd. “Why do you care whether I’m alive or dead? I’ll return this body to you!”

As expected, a suicide attempt was satisfactory. No one had any more attention to spare for finding fault with the young mistress’s deportment. Xu Rucheng was afraid of saying something wrong and didn’t dare to improvise. He only repeated what he had overheard Zhao Qindan saying, crying and screaming and threatening suicide. He even knew to adjust the original words and their sequence in order to avoid seeming like a parrot just repeating what he had heard.

In the Zhao family’s hidden realm, the young mistress’s little courtyard was a shambles.

Xi Ping laughed. “Genius Xu, you’re beyond compare!”

Xu Rucheng secretly ground his teeth: Too wicked—may you die without progeny!

Having succeeded in putting Xu Rucheng in Zhao Qindan’s position, Xi Ping wasn’t concerned about his performance—this Luwu was ordinarily brainless, but in a crisis he was quite reliable.

But once his consciousness left the Zhao family hidden realm, he couldn’t manage much laughter.

Xi Ping had played it down in front of Xu Rucheng, not mentioning how fretful he was.

This supposed “hundred thousand liang” was the absolute bottom line that had come from him harassing Lin Chi and Xi Yue in the middle of the night, making them each take a look at the spirit-gathering array, then using the plans to calculate through the night with A-Xiang. For a great array like this that would cover a whole county, no array master would dare to say that there wouldn’t be wastage of twenty to thirty percent of the spiritual stones.

He didn't know whether Yu Family Bend had so much money, and he didn't know how much he could get.

Half a month...

It was like A-Xiang had said—it would be more practical to drive off all the people in Tao County.

In a flash, Xi Ping's consciousness had returned to Tao County.

It was said that the Sanyue Mountains had agreed to give Tao County disaster relief funds and food. There would be no trouble getting through the winter. Therefore, while they were scraping the earth to make doubly sure, the people, well-behaved, kept their heads up and began to look ahead expectantly.

This wretched place didn't look any different from the year before.

Say what you would, the people couldn't leave. Transportation in Western Chu wasn't as developed as in Great Wan. It was already a long journey to go from the town you lived in to the county seat. All the local thugs and despots monopolized the factories and farms, and everyone else had to eke out food from between their clenched fingers. Therefore, people everywhere were isolationist.

Even if a prestigious and respected person came and made the matter of the Moon Shadow known to the public, at most they would be even more despairing; they wouldn't want to leave. Because in previous years of catastrophe, as soon as people left their homes and became refugees, far less than half of them would survive in the end. If they stayed behind in the Moon Shadow—in the words of the many worm masters, the greater part of adults without major health problems would do well enough, only losing a decade or two off their lifespans.

Xi Ping weighed it up—if it were him, he also wouldn't have left.

After the Silver Moon had passed over the reincarnation wood, he felt very uncomfortable in the wood. There seemed to be remnants of the Silver Moon's light still inside it, pricking his consciousness like thin needles, warning him that the Way of Heaven was watching him, this established foundation ant who had an exaggerated sense of his own abilities.

“Let it look.” The pricking sent Xi Ping into something of a rage. Facing the remaining might of the Silver Moon, his natural unruliness was aroused and changed to stubbornness. He thought, “I'm staying here, and that's that.”

A group of small children were carelessly running around and playing boisterously nearby. One of them opened his mouth wide and sneezed with abandon, snot spurting half a chi long. This mighty hero indifferently tossed the snot toward the reincarnation wood tree. With a howl, he threw himself toward his companions.

Xi Ping: "..."

The "evil god" who had no fear of the Silver Moon's remaining might flew away in terror.

Passing by another tree beside the road, he saw another crowd of kids, twittering and chirping as they surrounded a young girl. As soon as Xi Ping saw the kids, he remembered the snot. He meant to keep a respectful distance, taking an inadvertent glance as he passed by, but he saw that the young girl who was the center of the action, using flower dye, was drawing small animals on the others' arms.

Xi Ping paused—she was drawing over the full moon scabs, the frightening scabs turning into the animals' round bellies.

"I've got one, too, I've got one, too!" A child next to her raised a hand, displaying a scab like a snake scale on the back of the hand. "Draw me a little flower!"

"I want a cat."

“Hee-hee, a cat’s nothing, mine’s biggest, I want a big tiger.”

“I wanted a tiger first, you can’t have one! Mine’s bigger than yours, let’s see whose is biggest if you don’t believe me!”

The ignorant children clamored and shoved, treating the full moon scabs like medals.

Xi Ping’s spiritual sense was suddenly touched. He sent out his gaze and saw an old man with a veiled face standing nearby. This was a worm master.

He was staring covetously at this crowd of little “walking ghosts.”

Xi Ping sent over a thought, telling the Luwu garrisoned at the Snake King’s Immortal Palace to come drive away these vultures that had smelled rotting meat.

At the Snake King’s Immortal Palace, the resources had previously been quite substantial, but after Qiu Sha’s antics, at least half its spiritual stones had been drained dry. Even if they put together all they had, at best it would come to one or two thousand liang of white spirits, like trying to put out a cartload of blazing firewood with a cup of water.

San-ge's accounts all had to be aboveboard, and anyway, it was one thing to ask for a bit of pocket money—a large quantity of spiritual stones crossing the border was impracticable.

Time was too tight and the number too big; he couldn't place all his bets on Xu Rucheng, either.

Where else could he get money quickly?

As Xi Ping's consciousness roved through the scenes of devastation in Wild Fox Country, taking Great Wan's laws as his basis, he considered each outstanding criminal charge one by one, calculating where money would come in fastest.

Suddenly, he remembered how when Tao County had been enveloped by the Law Breaker Bracelet, the spiritual energy leaking from the ascended spirits had nearly turned the barren land into green ore fields.

Yes—when cultivators “pilfered heaven's order,” they stole spiritual energy from their surroundings and stored it in their essences. When these people died, the spiritual energy in their essences wouldn't just vanish.

Cultivators' corpses could also be used as spiritual stones.

As soon as Xi Ping had this thought, there was no stopping it from growing: at least before the reincarnation wood thoroughly rotted, Wild Fox Country was still his domain. No one knew that his eyes were spread throughout the trees on the walls and by the roads. As long as he could keep things under control, all the cultivators who set foot in Wild Fox Country could be his prey...

An established foundation...an ascended spirit...how many white spirits were they equal to?

Just as his thoughts were sliding in a more and more dangerous direction, there was a buzz in Xi Ping's ears, as if his consciousness had been smacked by a very thin piece of metal; the echoes quivered incessantly.

Xi Ping came back to himself at once. There was a familiar aura about the chill that had touched his consciousness...Zhaoting!

“Shifu?”

There was no answer.

Like a headless fly, Xi Ping's consciousness searched all around, but before him were only boundless hills. He couldn't see the horizon.

He didn't know why, but for some reason he suddenly felt a bit lonely. He chose a reincarnation wood tree that was growing in the river and hadn't had any brats wipe snot on it. Xi Ping curled up his consciousness and calmed his mind. For the first time in five years, he began to meditate like the disciple of an orthodox sect.

As his undulating and irritable state of mind settled, Xi Ping "saw" the demon seal's fetters on his consciousness. Going against the shackle-like demon seal, he established a faint connection to his body in the Impassable Sea.

Then he heard the murmur of the sword, knocking against his consciousness from the distant East Sea. Involuntarily, Xi Ping went searching after this weak voice. "Shi...hey!"

Once again, sword energy gently hit him. This time, he found that Zhaoting seemed to be angry.

Next, clear sword aura came to his consciousness, and Xi Ping received it in bewilderment: what was shifu doing? Teaching him swordsmanship? He didn't even have hands!

But apart from the few words on Wen Fei's fan, he hadn't had any communication from shifu in too long. He hurried to pay rapt attention.

When he had been on Flying Jade Peak, Zhi Xiu hadn't taught him swordsmanship—his young disciple had just begun cultivating; the disparity was too great, it would have been a waste to teach him, like playing the qin to a cow. But now, Xi Ping's body was at the pinnacle of the established foundation stage, and his consciousness had been honed during his wanderings on both banks of the Xia River and was perhaps even stronger than that of an average ascended spirit. The situation had changed completely. To his surprise, he found that he could “understand” shizun's sword aura now.

At first, the sword was mild and fair. Then it became more and more biting cold, more and more unrestrained. The sword was a weapon that existed for the sake of drawing blood. Without restrictions, its ferocity was overpowering. Xi Ping was terrified. If he hadn't believed from the bottom of his heart that shifu wouldn't hurt him, he practically would have turned and ran.

Then the sword's fury touched something. It clearly reflected all the thoughts Xi Ping had just had about hunting cultivators, one after another, and pushed those thoughts before his eyes all at once. It became faster and faster, blurrier and blurrier, until finally, with a bang, there was nothing before his eyes but bloody light.

Xi Ping was startled. The sword energy dispersed. There was only a faint chill touching the center of his brow, like the fine snow on Flying Jade Peak.

His consciousness abruptly woke from meditation. In that moment, he understood why heaven and earth could not abide him—he truly had no Way of the Heart.

Even the worm masters who made tools out of humans had Ways of the Heart suspended above their heads, not letting them touch ordinary people apart from “living ghosts.”

But a person without a Way of the Heart was unchecked by anything, just like the storm over the Impassable Sea that answered to no one.

He could run wild through heaven and earth, act based solely on his own likes and dislikes. What would he become?

Xi Ping realized with a start that as they had called him an evil cultivator, he had become more and more like the true evil god Tai Sui.

The mess in Tao County had been left behind by Qiu Sha, and he still thought that Qiu Sha was a monster who had brought calamity upon the people, but...perhaps there would come a day when people would look at him the same way they looked at Qiu Sha.

With your eyes blindfolded, you couldn't walk a straight line.

So shifu was always watching him.

Xi Ping let out a long breath. Fortunately the weather in Chu was warm, and there was no snow, or else he would have had to sweep all the rooftops in the county.

“But I still have no money, shifu. What do I do?”

This time, there was silence in his consciousness. The shard of Zhaoting didn't answer. Shizun was a pauper who spent a hundred years grudging the expense of two white spirits. He was powerless to help, no matter how much he wanted to.

Wei Chengxiang moved through Tao County as fast as the wind. Senior Tai Sui had said that he would think of how to get the spiritual stones, she had to lay the array out before the fifteenth. She had put effort into learning talismans and arrays, but this was her first time handling such a big array. She didn't dare to get the least bit distracted. She wished she could eat the plans of the spirit-gathering array and hold them in her belly.

When she had just finished a stroke at the border of Tao County and was letting out a breath, her spiritual sense was suddenly disturbed.

Wei Chengxiang was startled: she had sensed the Law Breaker Bracelet!

Wei Chengxiang's left hand was obviously a shade paler than her right hand. She was using an immortal tool Master Lin had given her. She didn't have the hidden bones of the "way of death," and she wasn't a gecko. Of course her wounds could heal, but she couldn't regrow limbs, unless she had a chance to establish a foundation.

But the Golden Hand was the Golden Hand, after all. When she put on the fake hand, it was no different from her real hand, not holding her up at all when she drew talismans or made arrays—the skin was even softer than that of her real hand. Over the last few days, Wei Chengxiang had taken the immortal tool for her own hand. Only now did she suddenly remember that she still had a severed hand that had been stolen by the wicked Law Breaker Bracelet.

It seemed that the bracelet was now shadowing and spying on her.

CHAPTER 98 - Unbound Knife (5)

Wei Chengxiang's first reaction was: How much money can we get for the Law Breaker Bracelet?

No...no, that was wrong. She tossed her head: if they really tried to sell that thing, probably all they could get for it was a beam of "moonlight."

She forced herself to be rational, but her heart still began to beat wildly: the space the Law Breaker Bracelet could cover was precisely the size of Tao County, and it could even change the laws of time; couldn't it change some other things? For example, turning rocks into gold...or spiritual stones. Even if it couldn't fabricate spiritual stones out of nothing, it should still be possible to set an axiom to remove the Silver Moon's Moon Shadow, right? Without the Moon Shadow, Tao County's spiritual energy could begin to circulate once more, and they wouldn't need the spirit-gathering array anymore!

She threw caution to the wind and probed outward with her consciousness like a snake's tongue, steadily and accurately locating the Law Breaker Bracelet's aura. At the same time, she cut her finger and quickly drew a blood covenant talisman for capturing a weapon in midair. "Return!"

But before the talisman had taken shape, a terrifying scene took place: a deathly pale hand, cut off at the wrist, suddenly reached out from thin air, bearing calluses and scars that couldn't have been more familiar to Wei Chengxiang.

The severed hand knocked the half-completed talisman to pieces and made a grab for her neck.

Wei Chengxiang's reaction was extremely fast. Before she could break out in gooseflesh, she had already slid over half a chi away, narrowly dodging the severed hand. But the hand had snatched the mustard seed hanging around her neck.

A mustard seed was a cultivator's purse and usually had its owner's prohibition on it. Without the owner's permission, even a person with stronger cultivation would need the previous owner's traces to open it. But the hand reached into her mustard seed completely unimpeded, a bracelet faintly appearing on the wrist...because this was the left hand she had lost!

The severed hand greedily groped around for spiritual stones inside the mustard seed. Though the hand was still bloodless, the skin became smooth.

Wei Chengxiang was stupefied: her own hand was stealing her spiritual stones!

The next moment, the severed hand touched something and suddenly shivered. It dropped the mustard seed on the ground, along with a reincarnation wood amulet.

While Senior Tai Sui was always babbling, his behavior was very characteristically “Wan.” Reasonably speaking, Wei Chengxiang was already a half-immortal; when it was inconvenient to keep it out, naturally she would seal the reincarnation wood. But despite this, except in a matter of life or death, he would practically never send his consciousness of his own accord. His consciousness would only come if she called him, or he would send word ahead like a letter from a far and wait for her to answer.

This actually forced Wei Chengxiang to put away the reincarnation wood when she needed to focus completely on something, because the senior couldn't see what she was doing when he sent her a message, and sometimes his voice would distract her.

To draw the array, Wei Chengxiang had temporarily sealed the reincarnation wood in her mustard seed, and now the severed hand had found it. The severed hand seemed to have been frightened by the wooden amulet. It dropped her mustard seed, and turned and ran out of Tao County.

Wei Chengxiang reached out across emptiness and yanked back her mustard seed and the reincarnation wood. She gave chase. “Stop!”

Xi Ping’s consciousness, far away in Tao County, was also disturbed by the severed hand. As soon as the amulet returned to Wei Chengxiang’s hands, he asked across space, “A-Xiang, what’s wrong?”

Wei Chengxiang’s consciousness swept through her mustard seed. “My hand stole 4.5 liang of green ore and jade stamps from me!”

Xi Ping had just finished being instructed by his shizun and hadn’t yet finished digesting all the sword aura in his mind. His head was buzzing. “... huh?”

Was she so poor she was starting to rave?

Wei Chengxiang said, “The Law Breaker Bracelet has appeared!”

Xi Ping’s voice became serious. “I’m coming.”

No sooner had he spoken than his consciousness flowed into the reincarnation wood amulet Wei Chengxiang carried.

But the moment his consciousness arrived, the Law Breaker’s aura suddenly disappeared—and in the direction it had disappeared, there was a person.

Wei Chengxiang stopped in her tracks, leapt up, and fell out of the air.

This person was wearing a hood and close-fitting clothes for easy movement. She was a female open-eyed half-immortal. There were too many instances of evil cultivators killing each other to steal each other's treasures. Out in the wild, when two unacquainted cultivators first encountered each other, it was like a meeting of two tigers. The atmosphere became tense.

For some reason, this female cultivator didn't even have a mustard seed on her. Her spiritual stones were carried openly in a pouch.

Wei Chengxiang unconsciously glanced toward the place where her spiritual stones were kept, and the female cultivator acutely raised her elbow to shield the spiritual stone pouch, her hand falling on the sword at her waist. The two of them were temporarily deadlocked, standing several zhang apart.

Xi Ping gave a cry. "Her?"

Wei Chengxiang asked, "Senior, you know her?"

“The young mistress of the Yuzhou Zhao clan, formerly of Heaven’s Design Pavilion. She just ran away from home. Perhaps she’s heard of Wild Fox Country and wants to come find some handy immortal tools to use,” Xi Ping said. “Don’t bother with her. What’s going on?”

“I think I might have to bother with her.” Keeping her eyes on the female cultivator, Wei Chengxiang explained the Law Breaker Bracelet’s sudden appearance, its stealth attack on her, and how it had stolen her spiritual stones. “I suppose that after all this time, the spiritual energy in my severed hand has all scattered. Other people’s spiritual stones are all hidden in their mustard seeds, so it had to come to me, and just now it was scared off by the reincarnation wood. But as soon as it turned around, it ran into this blockhead with her spiritual stones hanging out in the open. Senior, I suspect the Law Breaker Bracelet has snuck into her spiritual stone pouch.”

Xi Ping: “...”

Fine. She runs away from home, then loses all her money. What an ill-fated encounter.

“Excuse me...” Wei Chengxiang saw Young Mistress Zhao stooping somewhat unnaturally in her masculine dress and changed what she was going to say, pretending that she hadn’t noticed anything. “Excuse me, brother, I mean you no harm. I only saw that your spiritual stones were hanging out and couldn't resist saying something. Up ahead is Wild Fox Country, where you'll find all types. You had better be careful."

The female cultivator—the runaway Zhao Qindan—did indeed want to put her things in a mustard seed, but the problem was that all her stuff had been taken, and the spiritual stones had been given to her by the maid. To Zhao Qindan, the “man” in front of her looked like an obvious poor evil cultivator. Never mind the ragged clothes, there was also an eye-opening scar on her face. The scar pulled at the corners of her eye and mouth, spoiling the delicate and regular layout of her features, fixing her face in a “false smile”; at a glance, she didn't look like any kind of decent person.

Zhao Qindan's wariness rose another two notches. She nodded expressionlessly. Afraid that her voice would give her away, she didn't speak. She cupped her hand perfunctorily and was about to go on ahead.

Wei Chengxiang quickly called her to a halt again and put on what she thought was her warmest and most amiable smile. “I actually have some acquaintances in Wild Fox Country. If you don't object, I could...”

Before she had finished speaking, she heard Xi Ping cry out, “Careful!”

A fierce wind came her way. Wei Chengxiang quickly flew up and retreated. A talisman came chasing after her, exploding three times in a row. Heaven's Design Pavilion was Heaven's Design Pavilion, after all. Wei Chengxiang dodged in a desperate flurry, and when she looked again, the female cultivator was gone.

"I was being nice..." Wei Chengxiang was bewildered. "Senior, don't I look like a good person?"

"Why don't you look in a mirror when you have some time?" Xi Ping sighed. He focused and dispersed his consciousness throughout all the reincarnation wood trees in Tao County and quickly caught up with Zhao Qindan, who was fleeing in a panic. Xi Ping told Wei Chengxiang her location, then said, "Keep an eye on her, I'm going to see Lin Chi."

Among the ascended spirit peak masters of the Xuanyin Mountains, Zhi Xiu was the most popular. He wasn't on anyone's side, his temper was good, and he was Xuanyin's latest ascended spirit, so even established foundation disciples with a bit of seniority were older than him. Because of this, the disciples all impudently called him "little shishu." The most mysterious peak master, meanwhile, was Lin Chi. There were no direct disciples on Moon Plated Peak; all cultivators who practiced the way of the toolmaking went on record as his disciples. Only the shed skin elders could send him Heavenly Questions. The people on Moon Plated Peak and the members of the Lin family all had about the same chances of seeing Master Lin as other people—they couldn't catch a glimpse of him.

But while Flying Jade Peak was the quietest among the thirty-six peaks, Moon Plated Peak was the noisiest.

Moon Plated Peak was over two hundred li from east to west and had a hundred fifty established foundation cultivators of the toolmaking way on its roll. Each person was in charge of one or more “immortal furnaces.” Each established foundation also had between a few dozen and over a hundred half-immortals under them. Downward of halfway up the mountain, immortal furnaces of all sizes worked day and night without stopping. They were scattered all over like stars and lit up brightly at night, as resplendent as a city, even brighter than Jinping in midsummer.

Practically all the immortal tools Xuanyin’s inner and outer sects used came from here.

Upward of halfway up the mountain, it was a completely different story.

This was where the peak master lived, Moon Plated Peak’s forbidden territory.

The lush, dense forest was full of arrays. No one was allowed to fly here but the master, and there was no road up the mountain. There were only a few statues of karma beasts in the outermost ring of arrays. If disciples or visitors had some business, they stood there and talked to the stones. The karma beast statues would save their voices and images for Master Lin to look at when he had the time. At his most diligent, he would respond with a few notes in three to five months. Sometimes when he was in seclusion, there would be no answer for a year or more.

It was fortunate that the death of an ascended spirit would necessarily be earthshaking. Otherwise, Lin Chi could have rotted away without anyone knowing.

As soon as Xi Ping's consciousness stole in, he saw dark clouds massed over Moon Plated Peak. Then a bolt of lightning came right toward him.

The great "evil cultivator" sealed at the bottom of the Impassable Sea had a guilty conscience and thought that the bolt of lightning was meant for him. He nearly ran away. Only when he got a clear look did he find that the heavenly lightning had struck Master Lin's immortal furnace.

Lin Chi ducked away from the immortal furnace out of habit, avoiding the heavenly tribulation, holding a ball of black smoke in his hand. When his spiritual sense was touched, he raised his head and sighed faintly. "You're here."

For an instant, Xi Ping thought he was looking at a sunburnt Riverward.

“What is this?”

“A crude imitation.” Staring at the ball of black smoke, Lin Chi shook his head very pessimistically. “She said that the Riverward was like water or smoke, that it would silently blend with all living things, disappear among all living things... Naturally I can’t make a Riverward. I had wanted to use the Riverward’s principle to make a disguise for the Luwu, that would let their aura blend with the original. This way, their outward appearance, their spiritual image, their speech and mannerisms would all become as similar as possible to the original. Even a shed skin wouldn’t easily be able to tell there was anything wrong.”

Nice! Xi Ping’s eyes glowed. This immortal tool had Xu Rucheng’s name on it!

But before he could say anything, Lin Chi raised a hand and destroyed the just-completed immortal tool.

“Hey, what are...”

The spiritual energy dispersed in the vicinity, unseasonal flowers impatiently opening all over the ground, as if what had been scattered wasn’t an immortal tool but a cultivator of at least established foundation level.

Xi Ping's heart, liver, and lungs all twisted together. Lamenting, he said, "Why did you destroy it? You're..."

...throwing money away!

How many spiritual stones did it take to make that thing?!

Lin Chi waved a hand. A brocade box fell into his hand, with a stack of thin, half-transparent masks. He knocked on the lid of the box. In response, a straw child pushed a small cart along some rails, confirmed the number of masks in the brocade box, used spiritual stones to seal the box, then loaded it into the small cart and took it away.

While Xi Ping didn't especially understand toolmaking, he had the necessary cultivation level and experience. He could see at a glance that those things were about the same as the masks Xu Rucheng and the others had used before. There were no new ideas. It was only that, coming from the hand of an ascended spirit master, the grade of the immortal tools was a little higher. When those masks were put on, it would be hard for an ascended spirit cultivator of the same grade to discover them.

"If a person's identity, appearance, speech, and mannerisms all change, what do they have left?" Lin Chi said quietly. "The human heart is like water. Whatever the form of the container, that will be the shape of the heart. An established foundation or above, with their Way of the Heart to sustain them, might perhaps hold out for a while, but the Luwu are all half-immortals. This would harm them.”

Xi Ping froze. He didn't know how many people outside this mountain were looking up and seeing Master Lin working his immortal furnace. With Master Lin making tools for the first time in several hundred years and turning out this kind of thing, even using your foot to think you could imagine how disappointed those people would be.

People would be chewing over the word that “Lin Chi's creative powers have been exhausted” for a long time.

Hearing this, Lin Chi, shame-faced, said, “My creative powers have been exhausted? Very well, they're right. What did you want?”

Xi Ping was silent for a moment. When he spoke again, his tone had become a little more respectful in spite of himself. “Peak Master Lin, I want to ask for your advice concerning the Law Breaker Bracelet.”

Lin Chi frowned.

Xi Ping briefly explained how the bracelet had suddenly appeared, then asked, “How could an immortal tool that has acknowledged a master rebel like this?”

“While the Law Breaker and the Riverward have no grade limitation and can be used by anyone, they would certainly ‘bully’ a lower-level cultivator.” Lin Chi considered, then said, “While Little Brother Wei is the Law Breaker’s master, apart from activating the Law Breaker’s axiom, it seems he cannot otherwise control her. He had to cut his hand off in a moment of emergency before he could remove the bracelet. That must mean he couldn’t take the bracelet off.”

“...I did say she was just a bracelet rack.” Xi Ping sighed. “Master Lin, how can we get the Law Breaker Bracelet back?”

But Lin Chi hesitated for a long moment. Finally, not answering the question, he said, “It isn’t necessarily a bad thing that the Law Breaker has run away. If you want to use it to remove the Moon Shadow, I advise against it. Haven’t you thought, when the Moon Shadow is so pernicious, why would Sanyue’s Elder Xuanwu not have attempted to remedy it? Isn’t he afraid that his Way of the Heart will be damaged?”

“What do you mean?”

“The Moon Shadow isn’t poison left behind by the Silver Moon. It’s a kind of protection,” Lin Chi said. “Where the Silver Moon passes, an enormous deficit of spiritual energy will be left behind. How large the deficit is, presumably you and that Little Brother Wei can approximately figure using the spirit-gathering array. Without the Moon Shadow to cut it off, Tao County itself would immediately become an enormous sinkhole ‘pilfering heaven’s order.’ What would happen to the surrounding counties and towns in Chu?”

Xi Ping froze at once, remembering how he had heard that there would be a three-year drought after the Bell of Tribulation rang.

“If it is only Tao County, the court can allocate some rice and grain as emergency relief for a few years. There are evildoers running wild in Tao County, the local yamen is weak. It is a turbulent place to begin with. If other areas are affected, how many people would die in Western Chu? An ascended spirit evil cultivator came into the world, causing great chaos. Two evils cancel each other out, so the Silver Moon emerged in Western Chu. To keep the harm of the Silver Moon at a minimum, they must sacrifice Tao County.” At this point, Lin Chi sighed softly. “The Law Breaker has limits. She can take twenty days from Tao County, but she cannot return twenty days to Tao County. She cannot make spiritual stones out of nothing for you. Also...I don’t know whether you have noticed, but the Law Breaker... the Law Breaker can sometimes be like a flower in a mirror or the moon reflected in the water. She is somewhat inauspicious. The more you want to use her to pursue something, the more unattainable it becomes.”

When Wei Chengxiang had lent Qiu Sha the Law Breaker, repaying a debt of gratitude had been one aspect; in fact, she had also wanted to contain the great evildoer, limit her impact as much as possible, to avoid her involving the innocent. But in the end, she had nearly removed Tao County from the human world.

Enshrouded by the Law Breaker, Tao County had initially had a hope of achieving fertile soil through the nourishment of the ascended spirit corpses, but instead it had become a putrid land under the Moon Shadow.

Qiu Sha had wanted to use the Law Breaker, but in the end, by an unexpected twist, she had been defeated by the Law Breaker.

Lin Chi also paused, as if wavering about whether or not to go on.

“Actually...I also wanted to tell you before, you had better abandon the spirit-gathering array, too. The spirit-gathering array needs to disperse a hundred thousand white spirits in an instant to offset Tao County’s Moon Shadow. There is no way such a large incident can avoid the gaze of the Sanyue Spiritual Mountains. When that happens, how will you deal with it?”

Xi Ping answered readily: "I'll offset first and think later. At worst I'll get pulled up by the roots again by that old monster Xuanwu."

"Even Sanyue has abandoned it. Why do you..."

Why do you want to clean up this mess?

Xi Ping understood his implication, but he didn't answer.

Because...

Though the people of Tao County had been swept by the Silver Moon and didn't remember anything, while enveloped by the Law Breaker, those mortals without the strength to truss a chicken had burned the late-autumn red for his sake.

Tao County's reincarnation wood trees put down their roots beside people's homes, struggling alongside them in life and in death.

"Also," said Lin Chi, moving on when he received no response from him, "with the Law Breaker suddenly appearing, no matter whose pocket it ends up in, the outcome will be chaos. You must be careful."

CHAPTER 99 - Unbound Knife (6)

Lin Chi's speech was unusually soft and slow. Some things sounded mystical coming out of his mouth.

Whether because he had heard these words or because something had touched his spiritual sense, Xi Ping automatically directed his consciousness toward Tao County.

And just then, by coincidence, Wei Chengxiang and the Luwu in the Snake's King Immortal Palace almost simultaneously sent him word.

"Senior," Wei Chengxiang said in puzzlement, "does that Miss Zhao have a 'hit me' talisman stuck to her?"

Lao Tian, overseeing the Snake King's Immortal Palace, sent a message: "Senior, there's a Zhao in Tao County."

In so short a time, Zhao Qindan's identity had been exposed to the Snake King's Immortal Palace?

Xi Ping's scalp bristled. He tracked Zhao Qindan down with reincarnation wood. He saw that this "walker in the mortal world" who had never walked in the mortal world was currently in an especially dire predicament, pursued and surrounded by several evil cultivators. He quickly asked Wei Chengxiang, “What happened?”

“I don’t know.” Wei Chengxiang was following Zhao Qindan at a middle distance, secretly observing. She hadn’t acted rashly. “It’s as if she knocked her spiritual sense silly bumping into something evil. Forget about going the wrong way, she charged right into a crowd of evil cultivators, all on her own, and carrying that many spiritual stones. Of course those people would start having evil thoughts. These unorthodox evil cultivators should have been no match for a walker in the mortal world, but by some coincidence, her Zhao clan token fell off of her, and it had inscriptions for entering and exiting the Zhao family hidden realm on it. An evil cultivator just happened to catch sight of it, and the whole crowd went crazy... Everyone knows that the Zhaos have gone into foreign exile carrying strange treasures. The news is spreading like wildfire. I think all the evil cultivators in Wild Fox Country are coming to grab her now. If I hadn’t been following her the whole way and didn’t know she had no backup, I’d think that she was deliberately putting out a lure—it really did seem like she tossed that token out herself.”

Xi Ping saw Zhao Qindan give a quiet cry and toss out a talisman. Looking at a half-immortal with his current cultivation level and consciousness, he could see the flow of her spiritual energy. He saw at a glance that when she used spiritual stones to toss out the talisman, at least half the spiritual energy was lost, and the indistinct image of a human hand flashed in her spiritual stone pouch.

Xi Ping: "..."

The token really had been tossed out deliberately. The pestilential Law Breaker Bracelet had done it.

If the spiritual stones she was carrying were stolen, a cultivator was sure to notice. The only time she wouldn't be keeping count was when she was in battle, wildly tossing out talismans and expending spiritual stones. So the Law Breaker Bracelet had deliberately induced people to attack Zhao Qindan, so it could take advantage to steal her spiritual stones without her knowing it while she fought.

Xi Ping was terrified. This Law Breaker Bracelet had developed intelligence.

The problem wasn't whether Zhao Qindan was exposed or not, it was that Xu Rucheng was still impersonating her!

Currently, in the Zhao family hidden realm, Xu Rucheng, after making a scene to his heart's content, had quickly tasted the bitter consequences—he had never had any opportunity to come in contact with the daughters of big families, and he thought that a young mistress like Zhao Qindan was a “pearl in the palm of one’s hand.” Even if she was disobedient, her family would deprive her of a meal, take her spiritual stones, or seal her meridians at worst.

Who would have thought the Zhaos could be so ruthless toward a “pearl”?

The established foundation cultivator hadn’t hit him. He had simply reached out and sealed his spirit, trapping the “young mistress”’s consciousness in an illusion, not even letting him wake up!

The Zhao clan’s “family discipline” far outstripped Xu Rucheng’s imagination. As soon as he fell in, he was surrounded by blood and flames. In a daze, Xu Rucheng seemed to return to the chaos in Yuzhou five years ago, when he had received word and desperately rushed home, but he hadn’t even been in time to bury the body...

“Xu Rucheng!” With one shout, Xi Ping woke him.

Xu Rucheng gave a start and came back to himself. He swore a string of foul oaths with his hair standing on end—this method was called the “learning regret spell.” It was a type of punishment used by Heaven’s Design Pavilion that could trap a person’s consciousness in the most terrifying moment of their life. It wasn’t much lighter than a soul-searching.

If not for the fact that they couldn't give an idiot to the third-rate imperial grandson in marriage, perhaps they really would have used a soul-searching.

Fortunately he had the precautionary habit of hiding money in his shoes and socks. He had hidden the reincarnation wood chip and backup spiritual stones under the Luwu mask. Otherwise, he might have died here today in obscurity.

Xu Rucheng gasped for breath. "What in blazes? Was Zhao Qindan adopted?"

"Have the Luwu in the Zhao family hidden realm pick you up and withdraw." Xi Ping didn't chat with him. He said seriously, "Zhao Qindan is in Tao County, and the Zhao family token she's carrying has been discovered. She may already have been exposed."

He'd coaxed and wheedled Xu Rucheng into putting on the young mistress's skin to begin with. Xi Ping had thought that he would breathe a sigh of relief. But Xu Rucheng was silent for a moment inside the learning regret spell, then said, "It's all right. I gave her a servant's token. Even if word gets out, the Zhao family won't suspect me for a while—but if I escape right away, then they'll realize something's wrong."

Xi Ping was just about to say, “What’s it got to do with you? Have you fallen into a habit of rescuing damsels? A noble family’s beauty could beat up two of you.” Then he saw Xu Rucheng open his eyes and look at the old home he couldn’t return to inside the learning regret spell, and say softly, as though raving in a dream, “Back then, A-Hua was also forced like this... A-Hua never even got to be a young mistress.”

Xi Ping froze. Then he wasted no more words trying to counsel him. He turned decisively to Wei Chengxiang: “The rotten bracelet is playing dirty. Help me out, get her out of there.”

Then he passed word to the Luwu in the Snake King’s Immortal Palace: “Do what you can to block the information from spreading. Our people are in the Zhao family hidden realm, don’t let this matter leave Tao County.”

“Peak Master Lin,” said Xi Ping, running back to Lin Chi after he was finished making arrangements in Tao County, “in order to steal spiritual stones, the Law Breaker Bracelet didn’t hesitate to deliberately provoke a fight among cultivators. What is it up to?”

Hearing this, Lin Chi became grave. “Steal spiritual stones? How many spiritual stones has it stolen? Tell me in detail.”

With Zhao Qindan's family background, if the Law Breaker furtively freeloaded a few jade stamps off her, she wouldn't necessarily be aware of it, and if she did notice, she would probably think she had lost them herself; she wouldn't necessarily take it seriously. But in offering someone else's gifts as his own, Xu Rucheng had put everything there was in the pouch of spiritual stones he had given Zhao Qindan. Converting it into white spirits, there might be two or three liang. The Law Breaker seemed intent on going on until it had drained the pouch dry.

Xi Ping asked, "Would it take that much spiritual energy to keep a severed hand fresh?"

Lin Chi's pupils contracted slightly. "When an immortal tool isn't activated, it usually doesn't require spiritual stones."

Xi Ping said, "You mean it wants to collect spiritual stones to activate itself? Wait, wait...isn't A-Xiang its master? A-Xiang isn't there, so who's activating it?"

That severed hand?

"Since Little Brother Wei cut off his wrist and threw away the Law Breaker, he hasn't been able to sense the Law Breaker. The immortal tool may already have gone out of control then," Lin Chi said. "There are usually two circumstances under which an immortal tool goes out of control. Either its master dies and the consciousness on it dissipates, or a person with stronger cultivation wipes the traces of its master's consciousness away by force—there isn't a great possibility of the latter in the case of the Law Breaker and the Riverward, which can withstand a shed skin. If the Law Breaker had a new master, it wouldn't have ended up running around 'stealing' spiritual stones.”

Xi Ping said, “You mean that the bracelet itself revolted, wiped away A-Xiang's consciousness, and is activating itself... What axiom is it activating?”

“An immortal tool has no thoughts,” Lin Chi said. “It depends on whose ideas were the strongest at the moment it went out of control.”

When Wei Chengxiang had tossed the Law Breaker away, it had been the seventh day of the seventh month, the moment before the axiom was realized. On the scene had been ascended spirit cultivators he wasn't acquainted with from various nations, the bewildered Luwu, and the great monster Qiu Sha.

This was a disaster. Sanyue's shed skin had still been outside of the Law Breaker then. All the useless ascended spirits put together couldn't beat one Qiu Sha. Apart from her, whose ideas could have been the strongest?

Within the confines of the Law Breaker, the axiom was everything. Neither ascended spirits nor shed skins could avoid its rules. It was anyone's guess what kind of axiom the Law Breaker Bracelet would develop based on Qiu Sha's thoughts at the time—of course she wouldn't have been thinking anything good.

As soon as the Law Breaker was activated, there would be no need for Tao County to wait until the fifteenth day of the eighth month!

Heavens, it was one thing after another. Tao County was some place—they ought to bring in a fengshui master to fix its topography!

Xi Ping said, "Peak Master Lin, based on your understanding of immortal tools, what should we do now? Do you have a solution?"

"The Law Breaker must be caught before it can activate." Lin Chi's speech nearly sped up to within normal range. "Then a sufficiently powerful consciousness must suppress and seal the Law Breaker. Once the axiom has been put into effect, it will be too late."

As Xi Ping passed on "Catch the Law Breaker" to Wei Chengxiang and the Luwu, he counted up the people he could appeal to and said to Lin Chi, "Among the Luwu, the person with the strongest cultivation I can contact at present is an established foundation. I'm afraid that won't work. Master Lin, help me out!"

In that moment, Master Lin's usually immobile features didn't manage to hide his alarm. He blurted out, "I can't, my skills are inadequate!"

Xi Ping: "..."

Had Moon Plated Peak changed its name to "I Can't Peak"?

"Shishu," said Xi Ping, "you're the only ascended spirit who can help now. It's Western Chu territory. By the time word reaches Sanyue, the feast will be over and everyone will be going home. Are you just going to stand there and let people die?"

Lin Chi: "..."

Xi Ping said, "Qiu Sha has already gone to get a beating from the sages. You're the living Golden Hand, and you say you can't beat her? Of course you can do it!"

Since Lin Chi couldn't say "I'm going to stand here and let people die," but also definitely didn't think that he could do it, he was nearly stifled to death.

Using himself as a medium, Xi Ping simply dragged Lin Chi's consciousness into the reincarnation wood.

There was nothing for it. His resources were too scarce. He had to take whatever he could get.

Xi Ping considered calmly: if Lin Chi really couldn't be relied on, he would go and see just how strong the idea that had made the Law Breaker lose control was. If it really was Qiu Sha...

"She was an ascended spirit," he thought. "I'm a step away from an ascended spirit, but other people's consciousnesses rely on their bodies. I'm stronger than everyone else at my level. I might be able to make do."

So he said boastfully to Lin Chi, "Just do your best, shishu. If there's really nothing for it, I'll take over."

Master Lin suspected for a moment that there was something wrong with his ears. He said fearfully, "Wh-who will take over? Slow down, if I recall correctly... What is your cultivation level?"

Xi Ping modestly answered, "Established foundation, I suppose."

Lin Chi: "..."

In Tao County, Qiu Sha had single-handedly slaughtered ascended spirit masters in the double digits, and a mere established foundation who had entered the Way six years ago was saying that if there was nothing else for it, he would take over?

What was the matter with juniors these days?

Zhao Qindan was nearly taken down by a sneak attack from a machete. Her blood splashed on the plants next to her. She leapt up and dodged, waving a long sleeve, sending three dazzling talismans flying. Zhao Qindan didn't quite have enough spiritual energy to hold up, so she made a grab for the spiritual stone pouch at her waist, but instead just happened to grab a human hand.

The next moment, as if it knew it had been found out, the demonic hand vanished. The fingers even seemed to brush against the back of her hand.

This was too horrifying!

If not for the fact that Zhao Qindan's hair was too long, it would probably all have stood up on end.

In just that momentary pause, an evil cultivator rolled out of the thicket holding a short flute, playing a sharp screech.

Zhao Qindan shook, frozen in place by the sound of the flute.

No good!

The evil cultivator extended a hand toward her with a nasty grin. “The ‘key’ to the Zhao family’s hidden realm. It makes me laugh...”

Before he could finish, a die came flying toward his face. The evil cultivator, taken off guard, reached out to grab it, and just happened to see that the number on top of the die was six.

He heard a voice say with a quiet laugh, “What good luck, sir...”

Before the voice finished speaking, a bolt of lightning flew out of the die and hit the evil cultivator right on the chin. The evil cultivator’s jaw was instantly knocked backward and charred black.

The die fell and turned into flying light.

Wei Chengxiang pulled her bamboo hat down and walked out with the huge Silver Tray Lottery case on her back. “...you’ve won first prize—a lightning bolt.”

The dried up reincarnation wood trees in the area seemed to rustle in answer. Next, seven or eight dice came rolling from all directions. The evil cultivators had become acquainted with the peculiar property of her dice and quickly dodged with their eyes fixed on them.

The dice, after being dodged, knocked together, and a light powerful enough to blind half-immortals exploded.

Apart from Wei Chengxiang, who had closed her eyes, and Zhao Qindan, whose eyes she had covered with one hand, everyone else was rendered unable to see by the dazzle of the light.

Wei Chengxiang gave over all her spiritual sense to Xi Ping, letting the consciousness in the reincarnation wood lead her to precisely locate the position of each opponent. Her hand moved, and one of the lottery beads from the Silver Tray Lottery box flashed out from between her fingers. The talisman on the lottery bead flew through the navels of the crowd of evil cultivators—including one who had been hiding in the shadows all along.

When the fierce light that had delivered a crushing defeat faded, Wei Chengxiang lowered the hand covering Zhao Qindan’s eyes. She was about to speak, but before the polite smile could form on her face, a talisman came right toward her.

Had Wei Chengxiang not spent several years being hunted by the Exonerators, she would have been slapped in the face by that talisman.

In an instant, she bent backward at the waist as though she had been cut in half and flicked out a die, blocking the talisman.

The topmost face of the die was fixed on one. When it shook, the talisman turned into a puff of steam and vanished along with the die.

Wei Chengxiang put one hand on the ground and bounced up. Zhao Qindan threw her off once more, only leaving behind a chilly: “Shameless! I remember you!”

Wei Chengxiang: “...”

How was she shameless? This was a singular injustice!

Young Mistress Zhao had seen good things before. As soon as Wei Chengxiang had appeared, she had seen that this impoverished evil cultivator’s left hand was a rather high quality immortal tool. The evil cultivator had perhaps never eaten a good meal, thin as a rake, with very distinctive hands—somewhat thinner than the hands of a man of the same build, as if the bones weren't fully developed, and fingers so thin they looked a little sharp. It was exactly the same as the demonic paw that had just been filching spiritual stones from her bag!

Zhao Qindan thought: this person was too uncouth. He had three hands, and he was attempting to trick her into trusting him!

Wei Chengxiang spoke to Xi Ping and used the omnipresent reincarnation wood to locate Zhao Qindan once again.

“She's realized that that was your hand. You won't wash yourself clean even if you jump into the Yellow River,” Xi Ping told her. “Don't explain, just snatch her spiritual stone pouch and grab the Law Breaker Bracelet. The Luwu are almost there!”

Xu Rucheng had been too generous. There were too many spiritual stones in Zhao Qindan's bag. If that bracelet continued to absorb them, it would accumulate enough spiritual energy to activate itself.

Wei Chengxiang's chest ached. She felt that that damned bracelet had ruined her reputation forever.

Standing on a worn-out iron sword bought by the road, Zhao Qindan flew faster than the wind. She had a rare first-class spiritual sense. In the Latent Cultivation Temple, even King of the Underworld Luo had been pleasant to her. Now, she clearly felt a gaze following her like her shadow.

“Stop!” The uncouth three-handed thief was also chasing after her, and had obviously taken a shortcut!

Zhao Qindan’s thoughts moved quickly. Someone was secretly watching her. Who was it? Where was the gaze coming from?

The next moment, she glimpsed the omnipresent reincarnation wood trees out of the corner of her eye.

It was as if Zhao Qindan’s spiritual sense had been pricked with a thin needle. She understood: someone had tampered with these trees!

The young mistress came to a rapid decision. She took aim at a river and made a grab in midair, throwing off Wei Chengxiang once more, jumping into the rapidly flowing river—the current in this river was rapid, so there were no reincarnation wood trees nearby.

Her talisman hit the surface of the water, and she blended with the river, disappearing.

Wei Chengxiang immediately lost track of her. She raised her eyebrows. Just then, a big net floated out of the water, its four corners held by four Luwu whose movements were concealed by stealth talismans. With a splash, they fished Zhao Qindan out of the water.

“Thank you for your help, senior,” the lead Luwu said to Xi Ping. “We’ve caught her.”

“A coincidence,” said Xi Ping. “The Law Breaker is in her spiritual stone pouch.”

While being chased by the evil cultivators, Zhao Qindan had accidentally splashed her blood on reincarnation wood. Xi Ping had put pressure directly on her spirit, leading her to jump into the water.

“Don’t worry, senior, we’ve already released twenty copies of the Zhao family inscription token. The news of the fake tokens will soon cover up this matter,” the lead Luwu said as he and his colleagues quickly got Zhao Qindan under control. He seized her spiritual stone pouch and looked toward Wei Chengxiang, who had leapt down.

“Tai Sui told me to come help.” Wei Chengxiang didn’t have time to say much, only briefly greeted the Luwu, then cut open the palm of her hand and quickly drew a talisman. “Return!”

The accumulated spiritual energy in her palm forced the spiritual stone pouch to open. The spiritual stones inside rolled out.

But her severed hand and the Law Breaker Bracelet had vanished into thin air.

Far away, amid the corpses of the evil cultivators Wei Chengxiang had taken down, a ghastly pale hand appeared out of nowhere on a corpse’s brow.

Without the slightest scruple, the severed hand plastered itself on and absorbed the corpse’s spiritual energy.

The Law Breaker Bracelet stuck to its wrist lit up.

CHAPTER 100 - Unbound Knife (7)

Xi Ping said a silent “oh no” as the first to understand what was happening —after all, he’d actually entertained the crooked notion of killing people to obtain spiritual energy.

Open-eyed cultivators had no essence and couldn’t prevent themselves from being “digested.” When Xi Ping’s gaze arrived a step ahead of the others, he watched as, wherever the severed hand flitted by, the bodies of the half-immortals became desiccated corpses. Then, because the owner’s consciousness had vanished, the mustard seeds they carried with them fell one after another like ripe cantaloupes.

The Law Breaker Bracelet took everything as it came, not wasting the stones or the people; it was quite capable.

The severed hand it hung from was more than a hundred times smoother and more lustrous than when it had been attached to Wei Chengxiang, as if she hadn’t been the one to grow it in the first place!

Xi Ping could jump instantly through the trees, but he couldn’t do anything else. The Luwu and Wei Chengxiang forgot about Zhao Qindan. They turned and ran.

Tao County was currently a spiritual energy vacuum. All living things were drooping. As the Law Breaker Bracelet stirred up the scant spiritual energy it had stolen, the dry twigs of the reincarnation wood trees in the vicinity moved without a wind, suddenly sprouting buds.

Wei Chengxiang, flying her sword, was nearly a blur. Before she arrived herself, she had already thrown out a handful of dice.

A dozen dice encircled the Law Breaker Bracelet, all of them with the number six facing up, surrounding the bracelet with lightning and thunder.

But the Law Breaker Bracelet had “eaten its fill.” It had no fear of a half-immortal’s trifling abilities. When the straight lightning bolts came within half a chi of it, they curved on their own, curving into a dazzling lightning ball with the Law Breaker Bracelet as its center. The Law Breaker casually had the severed hand pick up the final ownerless mustard seed, and the displaced lightning set fire to a desiccated corpse, the flames as rampant as a provocation.

Wei Chengxiang twisted off the fake hand on her left wrist. After all, the hand the Law Breaker Bracelet had seized was one she had grown herself. It was instinctively drawn by its owner, flying toward her along with the Law Breaker.

“A-Xiang,” cried Xi Ping, “give me your spirit!”

Wei Chengxiang was a little more special than all the others using reincarnation wood—she had been tricked by Liang Chen when she was younger and had been a “believer,” offering her spirit and flesh to the master of the reincarnation wood. Strictly speaking, she could act as a human “reincarnation wood tree.”

Lin Chi, brought along by Xi Ping, was stunned when he heard this. “But the spirit is...”

A cultivator’s underpinning.

But the next moment, Wei Chengxiang opened her spirit to Xi Ping without reservation, like many years before, letting his consciousness in.

At the same time, she grabbed her own severed hand.

The moment she touched the Law Breaker Bracelet, Wei Chengxiang’s ears hummed, practically boundless thoughts surging in, submerging the open-eyed ant’s consciousness with a crash.

Wei Chengxiang only had time to send a final thought to her companions: No good, the Law Breaker Bracelet has activated!

Lin Chi and Xi Ping were both surprised: however powerful Qiu Sha had been, she was still dead. How could the remaining consciousness of a person erased by the Silver Moon nearly a month ago be so strong?

In an instant, Lin Chi had no more time to think. With the consciousness of an ascended spirit, he rammed into it.

The Golden Hand had been famous for centuries. It was one thing to be meek and forbearing; no matter how cowed Lin Chi usually was, his cultivation certainly wasn't weak—when Qiu Sha had been cutting down an ascended spirit with each thrust of her sword, she had been repeatedly hindered by his presence. Xi Ping suspected he was at least at the mid-late ascended spirit stage.

If it was said that sword cultivators were the best at offense within their grade, then the toolmaking and medicine-making ways, which tracked the changes of furnaces and ranges, had the most condensed consciousnesses within their grade. Once the fire was lit in an immortal furnace, it might take several months to complete a tool, or even a few years. If the cultivator lost focus, all their work would be undone. Therefore, toolmaking and medicine-making cultivators had unrivaled powers of focus.

In addition, if there was anyone on earth who would dare to say he understood this strange “Law Breaker,” it could only be the Golden Hand.

Within the little bracelet, there seemed to be a whole other set of mountains and seas, outside of the spiritual mountains...even outside of the universe. Inside, like a kaleidoscope, were three thousand worlds one within another.

For a moment, Xi Ping was dazed. Had Lin Chi not been guiding him, he would have been stuck inside at once.

As he was accustomed to doing, Lin Chi put aside everything around him, setting his consciousness directly against the core of the Law Breaker—the core of the Riverward was misty thin smoke, but the core of the Law Breaker was a ball of violent fire.

The “fire” swallowed the last pouch of spiritual stones in one gulp. Its flames rose sharply, the outlines of the blaze sketching a graceful female form. She opened her arms. There were stacks of thin bracelets hanging from her slim wrists. Her sharp jaw was raised in a disdainful posture.

Lin Chi’s consciousness immediately became the symbol of an inscription Xi Ping didn’t know and flagrantly smashed into the Law Breaker’s steeply rising blaze. The blaze shook fiercely, suppressed by the ultimate toolmaking master of the current era.

Xi Ping split off his attention to the surrounding reincarnation wood trees and saw that the delicate buds the dead trees had just grown had withered once more. He didn't know whether he should laugh bitterly or feel relieved.

Only then did he have leisure to spare to examine the countless little worlds around him. After only a few glances, he felt that his consciousness was being sucked in, so he quickly averted his gaze and focused, calming himself.

“Peak Master Lin,” Xi Ping said, “can this immortal...can this divine tool be destroyed? It's too dangerous.”

Lin Chi didn't answer.

Xi Ping suddenly thought something was wrong. “Lin...Lin-shishu?”

Lin Chi's voice, in an altered pitch, exploded into his ear: “Out of the way!”

No sooner had he spoken than the inscription Lin Chi had used to seal the flames split apart. The suppressed flames of the Law Breaker instantly bounced back, leaping even higher than at the start.

A cluster of golden light lit up at the center of the flames. Without needing to ask Lin Chi, Xi Ping intuitively knew that this was the Law Breaker's new “axiom,” about to be completed. He already dimly sensed the power of the irresistible rule that had pulled all of Tao County into the seventh day of the seventh month.

Cultivators established foundations and became immortal through Ways of the Heart; immortal tools lost control through ideas.

“It won’t work,” Lin Chi said hastily amid the furious tongues of flame. “Is this really Qiu Sha’s dying thought?”

“If it isn’t hers, whose else could it be? Could it possibly be mine? Do you see it obeying me?” Xi Ping answered. “Whether it’ll work or not, it still has to be done. No matter whose it is, this axiom can’t be allowed to be completed!”

Lin Chi said, “I can’t hold it!”

Xi Ping recalled all of his consciousness dispersed throughout the reincarnation wood. The moment that Lin Chi was thrown off by the Law Breaker Bracelet, relying on his “tough” consciousness that had been tempered countless times beside the Xia River, ignoring the brutal fire, he dove right in, knocking against that golden light.

Lin Chi had thought he had experienced the pinnacle of recklessness when he had dared to ring a false Bell of Tribulation on Xuanyin's Principal Peak to fool nine great peak masters, but as he saw Xi Ping's consciousness swept up among the tongues of flame, Lin Chi still couldn't resist blurting out, "Xi Shiyong!"

Xi Ping gripped the incomplete axiom in the palm of his hand. Presently his consciousness was licked all over by the tongues of flame until it no longer resembled a human; only a vague ball remained.

But his mind was still clear. He could still rave: "My consciousness was shattered by shed skin sages, this measly little bracelet..."

The restrained thought inside the Law Breaker Bracelet struggled even more furiously, wildly breaking off his words.

But Xi Ping was already a practiced hand at being "crushed to dust." He could be crushed without dispersing. He held down the golden-lit axiom, not letting go.

Even if all five spiritual mountain ranges came down on him from above today, he would still finish bragging: "...is nothing but a lamp!"

The golden-lit axiom was firmly held in place by his consciousness. It twisted and changed shape.

Lin Chi was stupefied by the strength of this junior's consciousness. He nearly suspected that the horrifying idea in the Law Breaker Bracelet really was Xi Ping's.

The incomplete axiom was twisted into fragments of light by Xi Ping's frightening consciousness. Lin Chi automatically retreated—all toolmaking masters connected to heaven and earth amid fierce fire. Sometimes they could sense things that other cultivators couldn't detect.

For a moment, Lin Chi seemed to hear the three thousand paths of the Great Way shaking, as well as the Way that was outside of all laws, as tameless as before.

The intense idea circling within the Law Breaker Bracelet stagnated.

Xi Ping gave a "ha." He had the impression that he had a body, and that he had been splashed all over with boiling oil. Laughing coldly, he grit his teeth and said, "Now, seal it!"

Lin Chi didn't dare to hesitate. Another inscription took shape and forced itself into the core of the Law Breaker being suppressed by Xi Ping. The flaming fire was once again suppressed by these two masters working in concert.

Just then, a wail sounded in Xi Ping's ear.

Xi Ping froze, suspecting that he was hallucinating because his consciousness had been injured—this voice was extremely hoarse, extremely weary, bearing almost a hopeless exhaustion. It didn't seem like the crafty demonic tool that had sent everyone running in circles, and neither was it Qiu Sha. It sounded...faintly familiar.

Before he could recognize it, Xi Ping's consciousness was knocked aside by some irresistible force.

He was like an ant walking over a crumbling dam. Before he could even take a breath, he was swept away by the flood of wailing...no better than Wei Chengxiang had fared earlier.

Lin Chi was a genuine ascended spirit, and while Xi Ping's body wasn't up to the mark, the strength of his consciousness matched up to Lin Chi's. Right now, these two ascended spirit grade consciousness had no power to resist, tossed aside by the erupting thought inside the Law Breaker Bracelet.

Xi Ping: "..."

In fact, this wasn't Qiu Sha.

Had she been this powerful, she would have picked up a knife and stabbed it into the Sanyue Mountains!

Was this a shed skin? Did a shed skin have this kind of might?

The golden light Xi Ping had just broken condensed unstoppably. It was like the first rays of the rising sun, tearing through the dawn, spilling morning light and enveloping all of Tao County.

The irresistible axiom took effect.

A desperate thought came from Lin Chi: It's all over.

Then they heard countless overlapping voices babbling. They poured into their ears, gathering into a sound as huge as a large bell or an ocean wave.

Xi Ping was a contrarian who didn't acknowledge the words "I can't" or "It's over." He had never shed tears before seeing the casket. Now, when he saw the axiom irrevocably take effect, after the temporary shock had passed, he immediately changed his line of thought: before he blacked out, he was going to do all he could to hunt down the contents of the axiom, gather as much information as possible.

If there was really nothing for it, all they could do was think of some way to poke holes to break the axiom. And he wanted to see what god or sage could have such a powerful idea—

Xi Ping's wound-riddled consciousness gathered into a blade. The "sharp knife" cut away the noise and struck right at the depths of the golden light... The Law Breaker's axiom flashed before his eyes. Xi Ping saw it clearly, but he was stunned.

The axiom written in the golden light that had scattered everywhere was:
Grand Duke Tai Sui blesses and protects us, and we do not have to be fish on the chopping block or drifters in the wind.

There was a boom. Forget about open-eyed, established foundation, ascended spirit... The consciousnesses of men and immortals were all flattened by the Law Breaker.

The thought that the Law Breaker had submitted itself to did not belong to any ascended spirit in the high heavens.

It belonged to the mortals who had trembled in the cracks amid the ascended spirit battlefield in Tao County, their lives and deaths out of their control.

On the seventh day of the seventh month, they had set fire to the ancient monster's late-autumn red, had had a dream of being heroes, which had been erased by the "moonlight." But the fight in them then hadn't been fabricated. It had been preserved forever in the Law Breaker. Once ignited, it became so strong that no one could hold it back.

The evil cultivators and the immortals couldn't do it, and not even the "god" they themselves had concocted and believed in could do it.

Zhou Ying, skimming through the reports coming in from Luwu in various countries, felt as if the center of his brow had been pricked by a thin needle. His paramount spiritual sense touched something. His fingers reached out, and Zhou Ying grasped a reincarnation wood chip. "Shiyong?"

There was no answer.

Meanwhile in Tao County, everything seemed to have gone still. All the cultivators' consciousnesses were swept away by a powerful current. For a moment, they had no perception.

Mysteriously, the invisible and intangible axiom flew through big streets and little alleys, sweeping through the hearts of men and women, young and old. The memories washed away by the Silver Moon came crashing back into place. They remembered the night of Qixi, when daybreak wouldn't come, remembered that raging conflagration. All the withered reincarnation wood trees in the county rustled, as if answering with some promise.

In the underground secret room of the Snake King's Immortal Palace, the divine image that had been used to worship Tai Sui had been shattered by Xuanwu. There was already a layer of dust accumulated on the altar.

But the candle flames lit of their own accord, and the floating smoke changed into the form of many reincarnation wood trees. The shadowy trees in the smoke and the real dead trees in the county echoed each other. Amid the smoke, a human form gradually appeared.

At the same time, beneath the fathomless Resurrection Vortex, upon Xi Ping, sealed at the bottom of the Impassable Sea along with the demon seed, a light the color of flame emerged. He gradually dissolved amid the light, undetectably disappearing from the forbidden ground laid down by the shed skins.

On the altar table in Tao County, the human figure in the faint mist of the incense smoke became solid.

The body that not even the demon of the Impassable Sea had been able to steal while carrying the Riverward thus appeared thousands of li away, ferried back to the human world by a wish.

“Shiyong, Shiyong...”

Xi Ping thought that he heard Zhi Xiu’s voice in a daze and inwardly mocked himself: How come I think of shizun as soon as I get a beating? Haven’t I been weaned?

But his consciousness instinctively chased after that voice.

“Follow me, come this way.” Zhi Xiu’s voice was hoarse and profoundly weary, but his tone wasn’t urgent—he seemed to be the kind of man who, even if he had only one breath left, would still arrange everything appropriately, then smile before he died.

Xi Ping vaguely muttered, “Instead of staying in seclusion properly, you’re always going out worrying about things.”

Zhi Xiu said, “And which disappointing fiend’s fault is that...? Listen, how much do I owe you from the last lifetime?”

Xi Ping said, "Not much. Perhaps it's two white spirits."

Zhi Xiu, laughing, scolded, "Get out!"

The laughter was too vivid. Xi Ping's head cleared with a start. "Shifu?!"

Zhi Xiu didn't answer, and Xi Ping felt that shifu's voice had led him to an extremely familiar place, a...spirit without a Way of the Heart, with only a qin upon it.

Before Xi Ping could react, he seemed to miss a step in a dream. He "fell" into that spirit.

In Tao County, the reincarnation wood trees quivering at the same frequency stopped one after another, from the outer reaches of Tao County all the way to the Snake King's Immortal Palace, at last all penetrating into the underground secret room.

All the smoke from the altar table seeped into Xi Ping's body.

With a thump, the heart that had been silent for five years beat.

In the depths of the earth of Tao County, there also seemed to be a heavy heartbeat thumping in the souls of the people, breaking through the temporary stagnation produced by the Law Breaker.

Unnoticed, the people's faces streamed with tears.

All of this had happened intangibly and untraceably. The Sanyue Immortal Mountains knew nothing about it.

CHAPTER 101 - Unbound Knife (8)

“Bai Ling.”

In response, the paperman floated in through the crack in the window. Zhou Ying didn't look up. Profound gloom flitted over his brow. He instructed, “Ask the Luwu in Western Chu what's happened in that awful Tao County this time. I'm going to the East Sea.”

The water dragon pearl he had left with Shiyong had just been touched. Who dared to infiltrate the demon seal?

Bai Ling saw his expression, which looked as if someone had tugged on his reverse scale, and didn't dare to ask what had happened. Just as he was about to obey orders and send a letter, he happened to see a letter come in.

Bai Ling instantly stopped in his tracks.

Zhou Ying said, “Has anything changed on Xuanyin Mountain? Those two old...”

Bai Ling said, “My-my lord!”

Zhou Ying looked back expressionlessly—this was his expression of utmost impatience—and saw Bai Ling slowly raise the communication device in his hand. On it was a line of familiar arrogant writing. It said: “All is well, do not worry.”

The chiming clock in the study came to the full hour just then, releasing thin steam with a click. The karma beast carved on the clock used its head to push the gold balls on the clock face into the correct time. When the clock struck, the writing on the immortal tool had yet to fade.

This person who hadn’t even been able to speak if someone else was present had broken through the demon seal’s prohibition.

Xi Ping took a deep breath and put down the Luwu communication device. “The demon seal’s prohibition on me has vanished.”

It took all his strength to control himself and not write home.

He couldn’t even look after himself right now. He truly had no surplus strength for protecting the mortals in the Yongning Marquis Manor. All he could do was stay as quiet as possible to avoid getting his family involved.

Xi Ping unconsciously stroked his hands, feeling that they were unfamiliar—these hands had long, slender fingers and came from a life of luxury. Never mind the flesh and bones, even the faint calluses that came from plucking instruments seemed to have been carved by a sculptor... There were no hangnails, no scars, no sores. There wasn't even any dirt under the nails, or any deformed joints.

Suddenly, Xi Ping realized that back when Liang Chen had “woken up” in his body, the first thing he had done had also been to stroke these hands in wonder...exactly the same way he was doing now.

What am I doing...? Xi Ping abruptly tucked his thumbs into his palms.

His consciousness had suddenly returned to his body. It was very unfamiliar—while he hadn't been there, those three shed skin elders had simply smashed his half-baked established foundation body all the way to a consummate established foundation.

As far as the open-eyed stage went, while “consummate open-eyed” and an ordinary open-eyed cultivator were both called “half-immortals,” there was already a discrepancy of a hundred years of cultivation, a colossal difference. Half-immortals basically still relied on external objects. However proficient they were in talismans and arrays, they were still limited by their cultivation level; they couldn't fight back against a higher grade cultivator. But “consummate open-eyed” meant a cultivator like Pang Jian, with a Way of the Heart completed and spiritual bones refined, only one established foundation pill and a sum of spiritual stones away from an established foundation, their strength approaching that of a true established foundation—never mind that Lin Zhaoli was an established foundation sword cultivator, if it really came to an all out fight, he still might not be able to defeat Pang Jian.

And at the established foundation stage, cultivators could personally carve inscriptions, and the world as it appeared in their eyes wasn't to be mentioned in the same breath as the open-eyed stage.

The distance between “early established foundation” and “consummate established foundation” was even further than at the open-eyed stage. There would be hundreds, or perhaps even thousands of years to walk between the two. It was simply the difference between “immortal” and “human.”

Though Xi Ping had accidentally sat on his own hair, his consciousness was unprecedentedly free.

Five years ago, he had stamped a hither seal on his newly-established spiritual foundation and nearly irretrievably destroyed himself; but now, he could probe almost at will with his consciousness, using any reincarnation wood tree on earth as a medium.

He could see all of Tao County at a glance. Seeing the Xia River and the mountains beyond Tao County, he felt trepidation—the big river was like an irrigation ditch, which he could block with one hand, and the mountains all seemed to be made of paper... No wonder shifu's single sword thrust had sent the whole East Sea boiling.

All living things were before his eyes, all become so weak. Xi Ping didn't even dare to exert any strength stepping on the white jade floor of the Snake King's Immortal Palace. He guiltily shuffled a few steps forward on tiptoe, then heard Zhi Xiu say: "...you're swinging the wrong arm."

The shard of Zhaoting was suspended in Xi Ping's spirit, on the Tai Sui Qin—the place where another person's Way of the Heart would have been suspended. Xi Ping had no Way of the Heart, only a feeble sliver of his shizun's consciousness residing in a sword shard, always watching over his unbounded soul.

"Shifu." As Xi Ping spoke, with a thought, he had already left the Snake King's Immortal Palace and arrived in the middle of Seventeen Li Town's street. It was already dark. Streetlamps were lit at the Immortal Palace's gate. Just up ahead was a cookware repairman getting ready to pack up his stall, limping over with his little pole over his shoulder, staring at him the whole way. "Someone is looking at me. Can he...see me?"

It had been too long since Xi Ping had been seen. With someone looking at him, he looked back directly, two grown men staring at each other in the middle of the street; the atmosphere was a little peculiar.

The young man in brocade robes had an extravagantly dazzling face, markedly beautiful and sharp-boned, with arrogance inherent in his features, as far as could be from “gentle and honest.” The cookware repairman was a humble craftsman, belonging to the class that walked through the streets carrying poles over their shoulders. Normally, never mind staring, if he had run into such a fine young master, he would have avoided him. But for some reason, the cookware repairman kept thinking there was something familiar about the person in front of him. Looking at this face that expressed “bad temper” with the tips of its eyebrows, not only did he not feel fear, he felt out of nowhere that he had been wronged. He accidentally bumped into a tree by the road.

But when he hit it, the reincarnation wood tree became soft and gently held him up. The cookware repairman was extremely surprised. When he looked back, the young man in brocade robes had disappeared into the misty night.

“I am also looking at you.” Zhi Xiu had to take a long rest each time he spoke, as if conserving his strength as much as possible. His words nearly made Xi Ping burst into tears.

But then he heard him say weakly, laughing, “I’ll remember all the beatings I owe you—Lin-shixiong, my inferior disciple is rude and has no sense of proportion. You have gone to a great deal of trouble looking after him.”

Xi Ping held back his tears and finally remembered that he had seized a sliver of Lin Chi’s consciousness and had yet to let him go.

He was done for. He had called the man “Lin Chi” right to his face and called him “bashful” behind his back. On their first meeting, he had tricked his blood out of him... Would Peak Master Lin have a ten-thousand-word complaint to lodge?

Lin Chi, trapped in the reincarnation wood by Xi Ping, could hear Zhi Xiu’s voice through Xi Ping’s spirit. Catching up twice as slowly as other people, he finally stammered, “Gen-general Zhi?”

“There is a shard of Zhaoting in his body. I can just about manage to use Zhaoting to have a look,” Zhi Xiu said. “I think that this place is no longer restrained by the Sanyue Spiritual Mountains... What was that power beyond the laws just now?”

“It was the Law Breaker that Xiangjun left behind.” Lin Chi had no attention to spare for enumerating complaints. He quickly asked Xi Ping,

“Wh-what happened? Where is the Law Breaker? Was she activated? What is her axiom?”

Xi Ping quickly made a round of Tao County and found no trace of the Law Breaker Bracelet. That mysterious demonic tool seemed to have blended into the earth of Tao County. Even the force of the rule that only an ascended spirit could sense had vanished without a trace.

But the Moon Shadow was still there, the huge deficit of spiritual energy was still there, and the full moon wounds were also still there.

Xi Ping hesitated. Zhi Xiu said, “Lin-shixiong stands apart from worldly strife. So long as it does not go against his Way of the Heart, he will not readily involve himself in ordinary affairs.”

Xi Ping considered it. That was true. At the beginning, when faceless Xuanwu had come, had Lin Chi not protected him, then the Law Breaker Bracelet would at best have been able to steal a corpse for the people to make offerings to. So he respectfully called out “Lin-shishu,” then briefly explained the axiom he had grabbed in the core of the Law Breaker.

Lin Chi: “...”

He had wasted eight hundred years. He had never seen such a thing.

Xi Ping seemed to want to make up for his past rudeness. Stepping on a dry reincarnation wood twig to fly up to the sky over Tao County, he said, “Please instruct me, Lin-shishu. In your view, what is the current situation in Tao County?”

“Within the area enveloped by the Law Breaker, the axiom is eternal,” Lin Chi said cautiously after thinking for a long moment. “With her there, at least as long as you are in Tao County, no one will be able to perceive what you do...unless the axiom breaks, or the axiom is realized.”

“How could the axiom break or be realized?”

“For the axiom to be realized, the inside and the outside of the Law Breaker must be united—the majority of axioms cannot be realized, so we can leave that aside for the time being,” Lin Chi said. “At present, it seems that Tao County has acknowledged you as ‘Tai Sui.’ As long as you are there, so long as you do not abandon the mortals of Tao County who believe in you, the axiom will not break.”

Xi Ping froze, not knowing what to think.

In other words, under the protection of the Law Breaker’s axiom, he could escape the demon seal and conceal it from the world; but if he failed to act and broke Tao County's axiom, the Law Breaker would naturally lose effect...and he would immediately be noticed by the Xuanyin Mountains.

What was this?

He was in a "symbiotic relationship" with Tao County now?

Five years ago, he had been brought by coincidence to Tao County by the disaster-bringing evil cultivator. Here he had become "Tai Sui," and then changed from "Tai Sui" back to "Xi Ping."

Five years later, his fate had been tied like this by a series of coincidences to a little town by the Wan-Chu border, like some secretly foreordained arrangement.

"Then..." Xi Ping asked after a long time, "what will Tao County become? I just saw that those hundred thousand white spirits are still missing."

"I don't know," Lin Chi said very honestly. "Do you still remember, last time the Law Breaker was activated, the axiom was only a simple sentence, but as for how to interpret it, for example where Qiu Sha had to be to count as 'at the Immortal Palace's night feast' and other such vague boundaries, that was all set by Little Brother Wei. Others had no way of knowing. Little Brother Wei voluntarily activated the Law Breaker Bracelet, so she would have intentionally considered some stipulations, but the trouble this time is that the people of Tao County did this unintentionally, and the idea that activated the Law Breaker Bracelet wasn't a specific person's idea."

Listening to this, Xi Ping was all at sea. "Huh? In other words, what counts as 'blessing and protecting,' what it means not to 'be fish on the chopping block,' is undefined. There are no clear restrictions for me to follow like Xuanyin's 'three improvements and three abstinences.' What...what should I do? Do what I see fit?"

Zhi Xiu said, "This so-called 'axiom' is indestructible, such that Lin-shixiong, the Golden Hand, cannot obstruct it. Yet it is also very fragile, such that Shiyong might inadvertently break it at any time?"

Lin Chi sighed. "That's correct."

Zhi Xiu's voice became slightly grave. "But if this 'axiom' breaks, the Bell of Tribulation certainly won't let him go—Lin-shixiong, can you think of anything?"

Lin Chi considered, then gravely shook his head. "With the Law Breaker's axiom present, he can perhaps use the Luwu masks to shield his identity and occasionally leave Tao County, but if the Law Breaker's axiom breaks, there is nothing I can do to hide him from the demon seal. It has been eight hundred years. That even a mediocrity like me could become famous shows that the toolmaking path is destitute. Apart from Xiangjun, no one could escape the surveillance of the spiritual mountains.”

“That’s too dangerous. The Law Breaker’s protection is like paper over a fire.” After what he had heard, Zhi Xiu couldn’t resist saying, “Shiyong...”

As Zhi Xiu spoke, he quickly considered several places—for example, the huge ice fields with no one around for thousands of li, beyond the Slumbering Dragon Sea, north of the Beijue Mountains; or perhaps the ancient hidden realms that could hide a person... The demon seal at the bottom of the Impassable Sea was such that once you went in you couldn’t leave, but this place belonged to Western Chu, after all, and Xuanyin was currently in turmoil. Supposing that Xi Ping cast Tao County aside at once, perhaps he could escape to a relatively safe place before the Xuanyin Mountains could react.

But...if he escaped, then what would happen to the people who had placed their trust in him in a moment of utter despair?

General Zhi couldn’t speak, because to say this would violate Zhaoting’s sword heart. He couldn’t instruct his disciple to do this.

But in his eyes, Xi Ping was even younger than he himself had been when he had come to the immortal mountains. He was a child. How could a teacher like him, who had been unable to protect the innocent children at the bottom of the Impassable Sea, have the face to use himself as a standard against which to measure a child?

“Shifu,” Xi Ping suddenly cut in out of nowhere after staring blankly at Tao County for a long time, perhaps not listening to what his elders were saying, “it’s all right. I know.”

“What do you know?”

“I think I know what the boundaries of this axiom are.” Xi Ping extended a hand, and the Tai Sui Qin landed on his knees. As if he had understood something, in a brisk tone, he said, “I think...I’m also within it.”

Zhi Xiu froze. Xi Ping’s last sentence had been spoken with a Chu accent.

“Thank you, Lin-shishu, I will escort you back now. I will have to trouble you again in the future.” Saying so, skillfully using the reincarnation wood, Xi Ping sent Lin Chi’s consciousness back. He extended a hand and pushed apart the mist in the sky over Tao County. There was no sign yet of the new moon. There was only a sky full of stars.

With a twang, the Tai Sui Qin began to sound over all of Tao County. Xi Ping not very skillfully played a Chu song, quiet and tranquil, as if it could calm the souls in a hundred thousand tombs.

He had said he was “also within it”; he was also mixed in among...the ants of Tao County.

Zhi Xiu listened to his song. When the melody ended, he felt a sudden mixture of emotions. “Shiyong, if I had not let you leave the mountain back then...”

“Hey, shifu, why don’t you hurry up and go back into seclusion? What are you doing getting mixed up in this instead of recuperating properly? You don’t have any money, anyway.”

Zhi Xiu: “...”

Rebellious disciple!

CHAPTER 102 - Unbound Knife (9)

Wei Chengxiang was among the first to hear the music. Her consciousness had been flattened by the Law Breaker and her spiritual energy exhausted. She awakened to music, her wounds healing rapidly, her meridians seemingly becoming considerably wider than before.

As if she understood something, she sat and began to meditate.

Under the protection of a night of qin music, Tao County slept peacefully—the people had been woken from numbness and submission by the Law Breaker, and their blood had begun to burn, but they had also directly faced the bloody ascended spirit battlefield and the Silver Moon; but the music that reached into each person's dreams left the fear behind in the deep night, taking only their souls.

All the cultivators passing through Tao County also had a chance to make progress. Even Zhaoting, suspended on Xi Ping's spirit, became tranquil.

When day was breaking, Wei Chengxiang finally opened her eyes to the first rays of the morning sun and the hawking of the peddlers. "Senior, you were rusty at the beginning."

“I’ve never played Chu songs before.” Xi Ping held down the strings. With a profound air of seniority and mastery, he sighed with feeling. “Besides, it has been many years since I last touched a qin.”

The Tai Sui Qin was his vital weapon, but sadly, since its birth, it had hardly been played. If he hadn’t been using it as a big sledgehammer to pound an immortal tool, then it had been sealed along with him at the bottom of the Impassable Sea. Only when he had said goodbye to Wei Chengxiang back then had he hastily played for her... Fortunately she couldn’t read his thoughts from his music, or else she would have heard the uncertainty and panic in his playing.

Hearing his easy tone and seeing that he was in the mood to hide out somewhere playing the qin, she knew that the matter of the Law Breaker Bracelet must have been resolved. Stretching, she relaxed. She was just about to ask about the details when she suddenly felt that something was wrong.

Xi Ping sat among the clouds, awaiting the first rays of dawn, his gaze following the dew into the mortal world. He wasn’t prepared to reveal the matter of the Law Breaker Bracelet and its axiom to too many people and had already concocted a set of lies. He was ready to start by showing off in front of the young woman. Then he saw Wei Chengxiang pat herself down twice and sit up straight like a risen corpse.

Xi Ping prepared his ethereal pose and idly enticed her to ask: “What is it?”

Wei Chengxiang said, “There’s two liang three qian of jade stamps missing from my mustard seed!”

Xi Ping: “...”

With the morning star hanging high in the sky, couldn’t they talk about a somewhat more refined subject?

Grand Duke Tai Sui’s mind, floating high among the clouds, was dragged back into this mortal world by her babbled “two liang three qian.” Clicking his tongue, he idly said, “That’s not possible. Count again. Maybe you just remembered wrong.”

He could see all of Tao County. There wasn’t a safer place anywhere. No one had come near A-Xiang. Who could have stolen spiritual stones from her mustard seed without anyone knowing?

If they were capable of that, would they be interested in that two liang three qian?

Wei Chengxiang acted as though her personal integrity had been called into question. “How could I possibly have counted my spiritual stones wrong? I only have about twenty liang of jade stamps to begin with!”

Xi Ping: “...”

Fair enough. After all, this was the woman who had picked up scales to weigh half a qian of green ore.

Just then, the cultivators who had been immersed in the music woke from meditation one by one. Xi Ping concentrated and heard the voices coming from all sides.

“Strange, where did the two blue jades I just put next to me go?”

This was a worm master.

“The number of my spiritual stones is wrong, where are you?”

“I think I’m missing a white spirit!”

Oh, a cash cow. Xi Ping’s gaze was drawn for a moment by this cry, but he heard someone else say, “One tenth of my essence has been drained!”

There were quite a few established foundation cultivators in Tao County. Xi Ping quietly noted this one down and became even more suspicious.

Spiritual stones might have been counted wrong or lost, but how could an established foundation cultivator's essence be drained out of nowhere?

Zhao Qindan, who had been knocked out by the Luwu, also woke up and inspected her spiritual stone pouch as a precaution. Her expression was grave. After a moment, even the Luwu staying behind in the Snake King's Immortal Palace sent him a message: "Senior Tai Sui, each of us has lost about a tenth of our spiritual stones. The cause is unclear. We've sent people to make an inventory of the Snake King's Immortal Palace's stores."

In Tao County, the mortals went on as usual, but each cultivator seemed to be missing one tenth of their spiritual stones; those who didn't have spiritual stones had lost a tenth of their essence.

How strange.

Wei Chengxiang asked, "Can it be the Law Breaker Bracelet getting up to tricks?"

Xi Ping frowned. As he listened to the cultivators discussing their losses, he plucked the Tai Sui Qin.

The strings moved, but there was no sound. The spiritual energy at his fingertips spread out in all directions like waves. Xi Ping looked down and closely examined the path the spiritual energy.

With so many cultivators losing spiritual stones, the quantity wouldn't be small. A large quantity of spiritual stones gathered together would automatically attract free spiritual energy.

Xi Ping wanted to see where the spiritual energy flowed, but the spiritual energy floating from the qin strings went hardly a dozen zhang before, as if being towed, it assembled and returned to the Tai Sui Qin.

Light flashed on the qin strings among the spiritual energy, as if criticizing him for wasting his essence.

Xi Ping: "..."

His qin was a miser?

Reasonably speaking, a vital weapon was the vehicle of a cultivator's Way of the Heart. When a cultivator cultivated, they refined their Way of the Heart; after decades and centuries of diligent cultivation, the vital weapon would have become a part of their body and mind.

But Xi Ping had no Way of the Heart, so even though he had by a series of coincidences ended up as a “consummate established foundation,” he actually wasn’t yet very well-acquainted with his vital qin.

Everything was peculiar when it came to him. As if striking up a conversation with a stranger, Xi Ping carefully scouted out the qin with his consciousness, wanting to see what this qin’s “nature” was. The Tai Sui Qin didn’t react, as tepid as the heart-protecting lotus he had given san-ge; perhaps he had knocked it stupid, or it had been shut up in the Impassable Sea too long.

Suddenly, a song sounded inside the Tai Sui Qin, precisely the one he had just played. Xi Ping was startled: this was wrong. There was an inharmonious aura inside the Tai Sui Qin, as if some foreign matter had gotten into it.

He chased after it with his consciousness and quickly caught a sliver of golden light within the qin—the Law Breaker Bracelet!

The Law Breaker Bracelet that Xi Ping and Lin Chi hadn’t been able to find anywhere last night had secretly hidden inside the Tai Sui Qin.

The Law Breaker Bracelet didn't seem to want to hide from him. Before he could move, it flew toward him, wrapped in golden light, bumping right into Xi Ping's consciousness.

Next, Xi Ping's field of vision suddenly widened as his consciousness was pulled into a hidden realm.

The scenery here was all blurred. As his consciousness entered, the empty scenery solidified, transforming perfectly into the form of the rear garden in the Yongning Marquis Manor.

There was...a garden inside the Law Breaker Bracelet?

Where the winding paths met, dense spiritual energy was surging out. Xi Ping followed the spiritual energy, took a look, and was dumbfounded.

In the depths of the garden, a little fishing pavilion was stacked full of spiritual stones, everything from white spirits down to impure jade stamps. In the middle was a big, half-transparent jar, half-filled with spiritual energy in the form of essences drained from persons unknown, being separated into spiritual stones!

Xi Ping: "..."

Was this some fantasy concocted as a response to his “daily preoccupations and nightly dreams”? But then why would there be whole ones and partial ones? Was it...to increase the realism?

In his perplexity, Zhi Xiu’s somewhat concerned voice sounded in his ear: “Shiyong!”

“Hey, shifu,” Xi Ping, as if in a dream, thoughtlessly answered, staring at the spiritual stones, “hurry up and come slap me.”

No sooner had he spoken than he heard Zhi Xiu give an exclamation of surprise. Next, a white figure with a blurred face but generally recognizable form appeared beside Xi Ping.

Xi Ping recognized at a glance that this was his shifu—he had sought for this figure high and low countless times among Flying Jade Peak’s wild winds and heavy snow. He could recognize him at a distance from his outline.

But...didn’t shifu have only a sliver of his consciousness attached to the shard of Zhaoting?

Before he could recover, the blurred human figure, upon appearing, without another word, rudely gave him a slap on the back of the head.

Xi Ping: “Ow!”

This place was strange. Having his consciousness beaten felt the same as having his physical body beaten.

Zhi Xiu didn't have much energy. He had originally been meditating on Flying Jade Peak, but soon he had woken with a start—he couldn't sense Xi Ping's consciousness anymore.

“Is this inside the Law Breaker Bracelet?” In a flash, Zhi Xiu had examined the garden inside the Law Breaker Bracelet.

He was a near-shed skin, and the shard of Zhaoting was suspended on Xi Ping's spirit. Reasonably speaking, apart from something of the grade of the demon seal, nothing could obstruct him. This place gave him a sense of being outside the real world. Where it connected, Zhi Xiu couldn't see clearly at a glance. The Law Breaker Bracelet seemed to be able to cut off all probing—unless Xi Ping was willing to let it in.

As he spoke, the little garden slowly changed. Snow and ice appeared on the flowers and trees, and the little pavilion in the middle containing the spiritual stones took on the appearance of the cottage on Flying Jade Peak.

Zhi Xiu paused.

Xi Ping also quickly realized something. He concentrated and cleared his thoughts. The changes in the scenery stopped. Next, the “hybrid” of Flying Jade Peak and the Marquis Manor’s garden changed once more, turning into a convincing Snake King’s Immortal Palace.

“It seems I can change the furnishings here as I like...” Xi Ping said quietly. “Strange, why doesn’t the pile of spiritual stones change no matter how the place changes?”

“These spiritual stones are probably real objects.” Zhi Xiu frowned and calculated on his fingers, recalling briefly. He said, “These must be the spiritual stones those cultivators in Tao County lost. Converting them all into white spirits, you would get about two or three hundred liang.”

Xi Ping said, “...How do you know, shifu?”

“I overheard it in your spirit. I can calculate a rough estimate.”

“You can... How did you calculate that?” Xi Ping asked in astonishment.

“Shifu, weren’t you a high general before? How come you can keep accounts better than Cui Ji’s manager?”

“Going to war is all keeping accounts.” Zhi Xiu waved a hand. “Or how do you think we pay for leading troops? On horseback with sword drawn, a thousand soldiers leaping forward to cut off the enemy general’s head?”

“Wait,” Xi Ping said, “wait, shifu, you mean that when I played the qin outside last night, this lousy bracelet was hiding inside the qin...secretly collecting a listening fee? And forcing the sale?”

Teacher and disciple stared at each other in dismay. General Zhi also seemed dubious—how could a sword cultivator like him turn out such an “accomplished” disciple? So he dryly said, “It seems that your proficiency in this field can indeed earn you a living. As a teacher, I am very gratified.”

Xi Ping became angry at once. He leapt up. “What does this lousy bracelet take me for? A performer who sings ballads for a living?”

Zhi Xiu stared. He hadn’t expected him to care about this, as if he had shame.

Then Xi Ping turned and said outward: “Playing half the night for two shichen, I made three hundred liang of white spirits. Then wouldn’t it take over six hundred shichen to make a hundred thousand liang of white spirits?! Why didn’t the lousy bracelet say so earlier? If it had said so earlier, I’d have played two months in a row, and wouldn’t I have a hundred thousand liang then? Now there's only about ten days left. There can't be any delays... Can I get more money if I sell my favors?"

He could also put on a colorful dress and dance, as long as the officials in the audience weren't afraid of having their lifespans shortened when they were done enjoying the sight.

Zhi Xiu: "..."

General Zhi raised a hand and grabbed his disciple, who had been driven mad by poverty. "All the cultivators in Tao County added together don't have a hundred thousand white spirits, and if you take their things again you'll scare them all off! Come back."

Xi Ping said urgently, "Who doesn't want to economize, wait until the livestock are fattened for the slaughter? It's the spirit-gathering array that won't wait!"

Zhi Xiu said, "Have you worked out the rules this Law Breaker Bracelet uses to collect spiritual stones? Sit down."

Xi Ping was caught by his shizun and held down among the glittering pile of spiritual stones. After calming down for a moment, he said, "It seems that the Law Breaker Bracelet only took one tenth of each person's spiritual stones—and it only took from the cultivators. Many mortals in Tao County also have spiritual stones at home, but I didn't hear any of them say they were missing any.”

Zhi Xiu thought about it. “With your near-ascended spirit cultivation level, you playing your vital qin has great benefits for Tao County's lower level cultivators.”

Xi Ping said, “Well, I wasn't playing for them... Wait, because I wasn't playing for them, the Law Breaker Bracelet collected a fee for me?”

This place's axiom had been made from the wish of Tao County's mortals. Cultivators coming from outside fell outside the scope of the axiom's protection. If they got a benefit, they had to pay the price.

Xi Ping's mind immediately became active. His eyes spun.

Zhi Xiu knocked on his forehead. “Cultivation cannot rely on external things. It's one thing to have an occasional fortuitous encounter that leads you to some enlightenment. If you really played the qin day and night for two months, you would drive them all mad. Restrain your evil designs.”

“I'm only...”

Xi Ping was just about to say something when, suddenly, someone shouted to him: “Tai Sui, help!”

The shout echoed throughout the whole Immortal Palace inside the Law Breaker Bracelet, like a big bell.

It was Xu Rucheng.

CHAPTER 103 - Unbound Knife (10)

“A Luwu... Hm?” Xi Ping gave his shifu a casual explanation, then went over through the reincarnation wood with a thought, planning to ask Xu Rucheng what was going on—he hadn't been expecting to meet with a slight obstruction. .

Xu Rucheng was currently trapped in the little courtyard, all his meridians sealed, unable to command a sliver of spiritual energy. He was surrounded by Zhao Qindan's father and some cultivators who had originally been part of Heaven's Design Pavilion.

Just now, these people had charged in. Xu Rucheng, seeing that something was wrong, had immediately sent a cry for help to Tai Sui, but before he could even determine whether he had been heard, even his consciousness had been confined by the Zhao family established foundation. This established foundation cultivator had used some secret technique; as soon as it fell on him, Xu Rucheng's spiritual sense seemed to vanish from his five senses. Never mind his colleagues, he couldn't even sense the reincarnation wood he carried!

“What are you doing?”

The eyes of the Zhao established foundation cultivator flitted over his face, as if he wanted to peel off the skin to look at something. He slowly said, “I’ve heard a rumor that says the Kaiming Department’s Zhou Ying has at his disposal a group of spies called the Luwu, who began to infiltrate other countries long ago. These people wear a type of mask that can conceal a person’s spiritual image, even fool the eyes and ears of an ascended spirit... I don’t know whether it’s true or false.”

With professional dedication, Xu Rucheng contorted the young mistress’s willow leaf eyes, as if he hadn’t understood anything, but actually he was in such a panic that his heart was about to forget how to beat.

“Shixiong, what are you talking about?”

“If you haven’t heard of them, then forget about it,” the established foundation said softly but coldly. “The hidden realm is currently the only thing we have to fall back on. We certainly cannot allow this kind of worm to creep in. In the interest of caution, each person must be investigated. Forgive me, shimei.”

No sooner had he spoken than Xu Rucheng felt his whole body grow chill. A talisman penetrated the center of his brow and a cold consciousness probed his spirit.

Xi Ping, currently in the sky above Tao County, muttered in bewilderment, “The noisy clod, how’d he end up with a lock on his skull?”

Zhi Xiu didn’t understand this coarse Chu slang, but he sensed that it was nothing good. “What?”

Xi Ping quickly cut his speech into a perfect Jinping accent and, in a display of propriety, said, “I said that this Luwu brother’s consciousness has had a prohibition placed on it... All right, I’ll go see what I can do.”

Xu Rucheng had been completely unprepared. He had no idea where he had slipped up. He was nailed in place, and the established foundation’s consciousness was following the talisman to invade his spirit, slowly over it like water, not missing a single crack.

The Luwu were all half-immortals, and the Luwu’s masks were naturally only open-eyed grade immortal tools. When it came down to it, they were only a superior diversionary tactic. Higher level cultivators would be fooled as long as they didn’t become suspicious. But if they became suspicious and insisted on investigating, how could an open-eyed grade tool prevent an established foundation from tearing it away?

What should he do? Self-destruct his spirit?

But self-destructing his spirit would amount to confessing without being tortured. He wasn't the only Luwu in the Zhao family hidden realm. It was too late for him to contact his colleagues now...

There was no more time for him to think carefully. As a few thoughts passed through Xu Rucheng's head, the established foundation cultivator's consciousness reached the place where the spiritual image mask joined!

Xu Rucheng's mind went blank for a moment. Just then, a qin seemed to play a note in his spirit. The cold consciousness made a jump as the qin sounded, skipping over the mask's join, passing over without noticing.

Xu Rucheng: "..."

What was that sound?

Then, a familiar and revolting voice sounded in his ear: "Wow, messed up, did you?"

Xu Rucheng's legs nearly went weak. He had never before found this great evil cultivator so amiable. "Senior! Senior, they've locked my consciousness, how can you contact me?"

“You’re the one who’s locked, not me.” Xi Ping charitably put on the airs he had been unable to display to A-Xiang in front of him. “A paltry little established foundation’s prohibition...hss.”

Xu Rucheng was too shaken, so much so that he didn’t hear that the “great evil cultivator”’s bragging seemed to be followed by an intake of breath as if he had been slapped.

He could say “a paltry little established foundation” just like that—then what was this “Tai Sui”?

For the last thousand years, Qiu Sha had been the only evil cultivator to become an ascended spirit, and that had been such a big event that it had startled the four great spiritual mountain ranges into a concerted effort to suppress her. In other words, if this “Tai Sui” was an ascended spirit, he couldn’t be an evil cultivator... Could he be some peak master from Xuanyin’s inner sect who had secretly infiltrated Chu?!

No wonder his lord had implicit faith in him. No wonder he couldn’t reveal his true form and his consciousness always seemed to be restricted.

Xi Ping didn’t know that this big brother had overthought so much in an instant. He said, “I took my eyes off you for one night, and you slipped up.

What kind of disgraceful behavior have you been getting up to under the young mistress's identity, splitting the seams of your dress with a fart?"

"I didn't!" Xu Rucheng said quickly. "After they put the learning regret spell on me...bah, on Zhao Qindan, they had her mother come over to reason and plead with her. How would it be if I didn't submit even after being tortured? And I was afraid that they would come up with another move to torment me, so I said all right...then they suspected that I was a fake! What is all these Zhaos' problem, anyway? I can't agree and I can't refuse."

Hearing this, Xi Ping said in bewilderment, "Did you agree too readily?"

"That can't be. I made her mother waste spit for half the night and then agreed as though I was enduring great humiliation for the cause," Xu Rucheng said. "When her mother heard, at first she acted as if a burden had been lifted from her, and then she said that my mental state had experienced major ups and downs lately, which would harm my cultivation, so she had a female medical cultivator they've brought with them come check my pulse and take care of me. As soon as she checked, something went wrong."

Xi Ping immediately asked, "What is there Zhao Qindan has that you don't have?"

Xu Rucheng said, “Quite a lot... But that medical cultivator was only a half-immortal, how could she have seen through the Luwu spiritual image mask?”

As Xu Rucheng wildly poured out his grievances to Xi Ping, in an accusatory tone, he said to the Zhao established foundation, “Are you done inspecting? Please tell me, shixiong, is there anything wrong with me?”

The Zhao established foundation frowned slightly, then said as if nothing were the matter, smiling, “Of course nothing could be wrong with Dandan. This is only for the sake of caution.”

Xu Rucheng leveled his eyebrows. “Let me go!”

But Clan Leader Zhao—Zhao Qindan’s father—waved a hand and said warmly, “Dandan, do you remember what instruction I gave you before you went to the Latent Cultivation Temple?”

Xu Rucheng: “...”

While he was speechless, he heard a female voice in his ear, whispering as if talking in her sleep: “Father said, ‘That you were able to reach this step is not because you are better than others, but because you have the support of thousands of years of the Zhao family. Our family's members would rather be crushed to dust than disgrace the family.”

Xu Rucheng thought, “What is this shit?”

He had just been in a panic and hadn't memorized what came before, so he only recited the last part: “...Not to disgrace the family.”

While teasing Xu Rucheng, Xi Ping had also found Zhao Qindan, who was in Tao County—the young mistress had inadvertently smeared her blood on reincarnation wood. Before, when Xi Ping had yet to return to his body, he had influenced her. Now, enveloped by the Law Breaker, he could do whatever he wished in Tao County. He simply “caught” Zhao Qindan's consciousness.

Zhao Qindan only heard a qin playing in her ear and instantly became dazed, as if she had been dosed with narcotics. In her confusion, she heard her father ask her a question and instinctively answered.

Then her father asked, “Then do you remember what the clan's family precepts are?”

Zhao Qindan responded indistinctly: “The highest good is like water⁶⁷... flowing from its distant source to the deeps, it collects and becomes the ocean, and when the north wind rises, it can challenge the vast sky, swallow the kun and the peng.⁶⁸ In danger it is flexible, becoming a trickle to sink through the desperate strait. When it becomes a river, the hidden worm can at last become a true dragon.”

“Good heavens,” Xi Ping thought, “she can blurt it out even in her dreams. She must have spent twenty years eating mantou with those words carved onto them.”

He suddenly thought that, if the Law Breaker Bracelet’s hidden realm could even draw in the consciousness of his shifu, who was close to a shed skin, then couldn’t it also work for other people?

What would happen if he pulled them in?

There was someone he could “try it out” on right before his eyes. With a thought, Xi Ping silently said to the Law Breaker Bracelet: I want Zhao Qindan to come in.

In response, a Zhao Qindan appeared inside the Law Breaker Bracelet, staring straight ahead of her.

The strange thing was that, when she entered, a short segment of qin music sounded inside the hidden realm. The style was a typical example of Wan music.

Xi Ping had an excellent ear for music. He thought at once that there were a few discordant notes in the music that didn't harmonize very well. Then he saw a sliver of light flash through Zhao Qindan's consciousness.

Xi Ping gave a cry and beckoned, capturing the thing on her in his hand. It was a tiny inscription!

There was an inscription on this young lady's consciousness?

Xi Ping didn't recognize it, so he quietly asked Zhi Xiu, "Shifu, what is this?"

"I heard long ago that in order to protect their direct descendants, big clans would place a special 'protective inscription' on their spirits, to keep their consciousnesses from being polluted by evil, and making them keep it a secret," Zhi Xiu said with a sigh. "I've never seen one before. I didn't think it would turn out to be true."

Xi Ping saw the light. "No wonder they saw through Xu Rucheng. They must have noticed that there was an inscription character missing from his spirit...though why would they have been inspecting his spirit?"

When the inscription on her consciousness was touched, the Zhao Qindan in the Law Breaker Bracelet gave a start and woke up.

Now that Xi Ping had connected to Xu Rucheng's consciousness, all the puddles and ponds inside the Law Breaker Bracelet were reflecting Xu Rucheng's circumstances. Zhao Qindan saw at once that there were several people standing in the pond in front of her. She first unconsciously took a few steps back, then opened her eyes wide in disbelief. "...Father?"

On the surface of the water, Clan Leader Zhao and some of her shixiongs were there, surrounding a person...it was Zhao Qindan herself.

In recent years, Great Wan had invented a kind of glass mirror that reflected people perfectly, though it was usually used in places like factories. Ordinary people wouldn't buy them for their own homes to look at themselves. Zhao Qindan had seen one once and thought it was very frightening, so she hadn't used one again.

Looking at the surface of the water now, she seemed to be reflected in a mirror of that type. Even stranger, while the "Zhao Qindan" in the water looked at first glance exactly like her, her each and every gesture, her small expressions, were subtly different.

Through the surface of the water, the gaze of the “Zhao Qindan” in the water met the real Zhao Qindan’s. The eyes of the person in the water flashed almost imperceptibly, making Zhao Qindan break out in gooseflesh —this imposter could see her!

Then the “Zhao Qindan” in the water, mouth unmoving, spoke from somewhere, the voice sounding all around her like a thunderclap: “Young mistress, you mustn’t come back, your family’s awful!”

Zhao Qindan: “...”

And he was a man with a voice like the ringing of a big bell, loud enough to give you a headache!

Xi Ping thought, Let’s not have Loudmouth Xu scare the perfectly nice young woman out of her wits again. So he waved his sleeve, sending Zhao Qindan’s consciousness away, then sent that inscription to Xu Rucheng.

Xu Rucheng was a Luwu after all. After he understood what had happened, he quickly calmed down and said to Clan Leader Zhao in an expressive voice, “I haven’t forgotten the family precepts, and I haven’t dared to forget Father’s instructions. You were the ones who abandoned me. What kind of important ‘main branch offspring’ am I? I’m only a product with a listed price!”

Clan Leader Zhao exchanged looks with the cultivators.

The established foundation cultivator said, “Do you know... Did you get rid of the protective inscription on your consciousness yourself?”

Xu Rucheng gave a “mournful” laugh. “Shixiong, I hope you understand that it isn’t that I cannot go far away, it is only that I cannot cast aside my gratitude to my aging parents for raising me.”

Xi Ping hissed as though his teeth hurt, feeling that he had gone a little overboard.

Indeed, the Zhao established foundation didn’t put aside his doubts. He asked, “You’re only a half-immortal. How could you remove the inscription?”

Xu Rucheng: “...”

Good question.

Xi Ping: “...”

He only knew how to blow up inscriptions.

Zhi Xiu sighed wearily, feeling that having picked up an unreliable encumbrance of a disciple like this, never mind going into seclusion, he wouldn't even be able to close his eyes in death. "Tell him to say he used the counterspiritual breath technique."

Xi Ping and Xu Rucheng, both ignorant, didn't understand this at all. One after the other, they repeated the words mechanically.

When the established foundation heard, his expression at last changed slightly. After a long time, as if regretting something, he said, "I remember that when Shimei first joined Heaven's Design Pavilion, her mind was very calm. At such a young age, she had the patience to read through Heaven's Design Pavilion's indecipherable ancient texts. That you can casually recite the name of such an obscure technique truly makes me blush with shame. Had our family's fortunes not fallen, your prospects would have been boundless."

Next to him, another Zhao cultivator said, "Shixiong, you have misspoken. Marrying into Western Chu's imperial family is an unspeakably high position. As soon as she is married, she will as good as enter Sanyue's inner sect. Do you not call that even greater prospects than she had back in Great Wan?"

The established foundation waved a hand and left without saying a word.

Xi Ping and Xu Rucheng breathed sighs of relief simultaneously—with the established foundation gone, even the air around them seemed to begin circulating. The other cultivators were all half-immortals. They couldn't casually touch his consciousness.

Things there had been more or less smoothed over, so as Xi Ping listened to Xu Rucheng dealing with the Zhaos, he respectfully saw off his weary shifu.

He was extremely curious about the meaning of the melody that had played when Zhao Qindan had entered the Law Breaker Bracelet—there hadn't been one when shifu had entered. So he tried using the Tai Sui Qin to repeat that melody.

When he had just finished playing, a human figure flashed before his eyes. A “Zhao Qindan” landed in front of him, just like the living person.

Xi Ping was startled and quickly extended his consciousness to look at Zhao Qindan herself. He saw her holding her forehead in confusion. She was doing just fine in Tao County. There was nothing unusual about her.

The melody...had made a copy of Zhao Qindan's consciousness inside the Law Breaker?

Xi Ping considered, then used the Tai Sui Qin to play the notes he had thought were discordant. In response, an inscription landed beside his hand. It was the one on Zhao Qindan's consciousness.

Xi Ping carefully picked up the inscription—he hadn't studied how to carve inscriptions, yet he had made one that was identical to the original.

Perhaps because the Law Breaker Bracelet had taken up residence inside a qin, it seemed to be representing all people and things that came from outside with melodies. So...if he replayed those melodies inside this hidden realm, wouldn't he be able to copy anything on earth?

The Law Breaker hadn't made a sound when shifu had entered. Could that be because shifu's cultivation was too high, so with the Tai Sui Qin's current level, it couldn't understand him?

Xi Ping was just considering catching a few people to perform some tests when he heard a Zhao cultivator say to Xu Rucheng: "Child, it's a good thing that you have moved past this. That being the case, we will no longer conceal matters from you. Your future husband's position is valuable. Though he has great prospects, as far as cultivation goes...he is a step behind you—you know that. According to Western Chu's conventions, women who marry into the imperial family must have a Dragon and Phoenix Symbolizing Good Fortune stamped upon their spiritual images. This is their custom. We have already arranged the engagement, and in a minor matter like this, of course we have to follow the local custom. Don't you think so?"

Stamp what on the spiritual image?

Xu Rucheng didn't understand.

But Xi Ping, who had been hanging around Wild Fox Country year in and year out, took on a slightly altered expression.

This so-called "Dragon and Phoenix Symbolizing Good Fortune" had two seals, a "dragon" and a "phoenix." Nominally a husband and wife each had one end stamped on them to symbolize being "eternally of one heart." In reality, there were no restrictions upon the one who carried the dragon stamp; he could have three wives and four concubines, just as he liked. But the one who carried the phoenix stamp could only be matched with one dragon stamp and would meet with backlash if she betrayed that person. Moreover, just like the "spiritual image brands" the Zhou family had stamped on Liang Chen and the others, it was a permanent stamp.

CHAPTER 104 - Unbound Knife (11)

In Great Wan, a “spiritual image stamp” was so deranged that speaking of it stunned Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s General Commander Su Zhun. But in Western Chu’s Wild Fox Country’s black market, where major players were clustered as densely as ox hair, they weren’t especially rare.

Many “common cultivators” who couldn’t make it on their own had this kind of stamp. They either submitted to some clan with power and influence, or they joined an organization of common evil cultivators. They received resources and protection, and gave their undivided loyalty, acting as these people’s dogs. The stamps had all kinds of names. Among them, the most pleasant-sounding was precisely this Dragon and Phoenix Symbolizing Good Fortune. The “phoenix” party often had greater natural endowments or stronger cultivation; if there was no stamp, she would be too much for the fake dragon to stomach. And with this kind of stamp, for each step the “phoenixes” took along the path of cultivation, they would only get half the results. Half of every sliver of spiritual energy they took into their bodies would be shared with the dragon stamp.

To be a person’s dog, you had to sell your life. But to have the honorable status of being a person’s “phoenix,” it clearly wasn’t enough to merely sell your life. You also had to sell your body.

A stamp on one's face could be removed, but there was nothing to be done about one that was stamped on one's spiritual image—back in the Latent Cultivation Temple, even Zhi Xiu wielding the Bell of Tribulation hadn't been able to remove one. In life, the person was controlled by the spiritual stamp, and after death, as with Lü Chengyi, the stamp would emerge on their flesh and follow the person to the grave. They couldn't be clean even in the earth.

Infiltrating other countries, the Luwu did in fact engage in an extremely dangerous line of work. But they still didn't make this degree of sacrifice.

As Xi Ping passed on word to the other Luwu in the Zhao family hidden realm, having them prepare a reception, he briefly explained to Xu Rucheng exactly what kind of seal a Dragon and Phoenix Seal was. “Dongheng's Xiang family is too much for us to deal with. Leave it, get out of there.”

After listening to this, Xu Rucheng was silent a while. He didn't answer at once. He only used Zhao Qindan's identity to say to Clan Leader Zhao, “Father, don't you think this is a disgrace?”

Clan Leader Zhao avoided his gaze.

No one would think this wasn't a disgrace, even if they really had just picked this girl up by the roadside.

But in this world, there were vast numbers of people who were willing to bear disgrace in order to live. So what?

In the future, when the Zhao clan regained its prominence, who wouldn't say that the clan leader had been swallowing humiliation for the sake of the big picture?

“Mr. Bai gave each of us a paperman substitute. It wouldn't be hard for me to escape by slipping out of my skin, but we would have to think of a way to get the paperman back. Papermen have no intelligence. They can only perform a few simple actions. If it has to talk too much, it'll be seen through. Mr. Bai's methods are too particular. I'm afraid that if they discover the paperman, the Luwu will be exposed.” After saying this to Xi Ping, Xu Rucheng seemed to have used up his calm. He suddenly clenched his teeth and swore ferociously, “I'm simply not fucking having this shit.”

“Xu Rucheng,” Xi Ping coldly called his full name, “a person's death is like a flame being extinguished. Young Mistress Zhao isn't A-Hua. Are you aware of that?”

Upon the death of a loved one, eternal regrets become a pit that can't be filled up. Given the chance, that pit will try to drag the living inside it.

In Wild Fox Country, what brainless idiot's heart didn't hold a few graves?

Xu Rucheng began to breathe heavily through his nose. "...yes."

Xi Ping left behind a "take care of yourself," then paid no more attention to him. He directed his gaze onto the "Zhao Qindan" who was currently walking around investigating inside the Law Breaker Bracelet.

This "Zhao Qindan" was essentially a melody he had played, but her gestures were more accurate than the shoddy male Luwu's. With a sudden thought, Xi Ping appeared before that "musical person."

First "Zhao Qindan" was startled, instinctively holding a talisman up in front of herself. Then she stared at him for a long moment and hesitantly said, "Fellow cultivator, may I ask...are you from Wan? Is your surname Xi?"

Xi Ping bent his head. "Young Mistress Zhao, you still remember me."

At first "Zhao Qindan" displayed a hint of happy surprise at meeting a fellow countryman in a foreign place. Then, probably remembering that her family were rebels in exile in a foreign country, her happiness faded. She didn't lower her hand holding the talisman. Zhao Qindan took half a step back and politely yet warily said, "I heard that Viscount Xi only spent half a year in the latent cultivation temple before entering the inner sect. I wonder what official business a distinguished disciple of Flying Jade Peak can have in Western Chu?"

This reaction was too precise. Watching the subtle play of expression on her face, Xi Ping felt that this seemed entirely like a real person. If he kept answering her, they would get into a conversation.

So he didn't respond. With a thought, he simultaneously took the "musical person" and the "musical inscription" he had copied out of the Law Breaker Bracelet.

As soon as she left the Law Breaker Bracelet, the copied "Zhao Qindan" vanished into thin air like a shadow exposed to bright light.

But the inscription with spiritual energy coursing through it was still in his hand in its original form. Xi Ping examined that inscription for a moment, then rubbed away one side of it. Spiritual energy leaked out of the damaged inscription, returning to the Tai Sui Qin—his own essence had been used to carve this inscription.

Xi Ping entered and exited the Law Breaker Bracelet several more times and found that anything with spiritual energy—living things, talismans, arrays, and inscriptions, immortal tools...as well as downgraded immortal tools—would make music when he carried them into the Law Breaker Bracelet. There were long melodies and short melodies, in completely different styles. The higher the grade of an immortal tool, the longer the melody would be, and the harder the sound would be to distinguish, but if he could only play it, he could use the Tai Sui Qin to make a copy.

Stones, factory-made cloth, and the like, the Law Breaker Bracelet didn't recognize.

Apart from that, there were also some things the Law Breaker Bracelet couldn't recognize that were probably of too high a grade and surpassed Xi Ping's own cultivation: for example, his shifu's consciousness, or the precious ancient water dragon pearl san-ge had placed on him. When Xi Ping removed the water dragon pearl and shoved it into the Law Breaker Bracelet, he in fact felt a faint touch on the spiritual sense attached to his ears, but with his current cultivation level, he still couldn't hear it clearly.

As for the copies he made, the talismans, arrays, and inscriptions could be taken out. The copy would be no different from the original object. Once it was taken from the Law Breaker Bracelet, he would lose the corresponding amount of essence.

Things like immortal tools didn't work, because apart from spiritual energy, immortal tools also used different materials. Once they left the Law Breaker Bracelet, those materials wouldn't be fabricated out of thin air.

But if he had the materials, he could probably do it. Xi Ping took a bit of Moon Plated Gold from the Snake King's Immortal Palace and copied a gear from a downgraded immortal tool. When he succeeded in removing the copy, apart from the expense in spiritual energy, a bit of the Moon Plated Gold he had placed in the Law Breaker Bracelet also vanished, precisely the quantity needed to make that gear.

For living creatures, though, it didn't work at all—he couldn't even bring out a blade of grass.

Xi Ping hulled some grass seeds and put them in the Law Breaker, wishing to see whether he could use grass seeds to “manufacture” a blade of grass. The outcome was that that when he took the copied grass out, it still disappeared, and the grass seeds inside the Law Breaker Bracelet were untouched—it seemed that the bracelet wouldn't agree to copy a thing using its own seeds.

Even more interestingly, he used a bit of spiritual energy to urge a blade of grass to grow longer and took the same blade of grass into the Law Breaker Bracelet for the second time. Though the music that played was very similar, there was still a subtle difference.

Living things were changing from moment to moment.

Xi Ping considered, then played another Zhao Qindan inside the Law Breaker Bracelet.

The new “Zhao Qindan”’s expressions and movements were identical to the one before, but they seemed to have no connection—she had no idea that a few ke earlier, another her had appeared here and walked her path of cautious investigation.

This was a “living person’s consciousness” that only existed inside the Law Breaker Bracelet.

Xi Ping hid in the shadows watching her for a moment, then came up with a vague idea. He wrote Zhou Ying a letter: “San-ge, give me a paperman.”

Then he drew a transport array inside the Law Breaker Bracelet and waited.

For a moment, the array didn’t move. Xi Ping first heard music. This time, the style of the music was demure to the point of being a little “flat,” so that you almost couldn't remember the tune, but at the end there were a few subtle shifts, the upstanding music gaining a demonic air like thin smoke.

It immediately put him in mind of Bai Ling himself.

Xi Ping's eyes lit up: as he thought, he could use a transport array inside the Law Breaker Bracelet.

Next, a little person made of paper, palm-sized, jumped out of the transport array and urbanely saluted Xi Ping. In a monotone, it said, "I have received orders from my lord to convey a message: Just you wait."

Xi Ping: "..."

Right. After reporting on his well-being, he had run off to do things. He had yet to explain what was going on to san-ge.

After delivering the threat, the paperman stopped and didn't move again.

Its body was pure white, with only a vague head and trunk. There hadn't been any features drawn on it. It was a paper embryo ready for anyone to use.

"Bai Ling-da-ge understands me."

After this whisper, Xi Ping shouted inside the Law Breaker: “Zhao Qindan!”

Zhao Qindan was startled and quickly turned her head in the direction of the sound. Xi Ping took this opportunity to blow the paperman toward her.

As soon as Bai Ling’s paperman was attached to a real person, it would become a “paper shell” identical to that person. Carrying around that paper shell, its owner could use it to block one attack from an established foundation or below. And as soon as the owner left, the paper shell would be like a cicada’s sloughed shell; it could remain in place as a substitute, do some simple, mechanical things.

The Zhao Qindan inside the Law Breaker Bracelet truly was a “living person.” As soon as the paperman touched her consciousness, it automatically accepted her as its master. The big-headed, thin-bodied little person made of white paper instantly stretched out and grew vivid, lifelike features and a body, perfectly fitting on the outside of that consciousness.

Xi Ping knocked the panicked Zhao Qindan unconscious with a talisman, then passed a message to Xu Rucheng: “If you’re really unwilling to leave now, you can help me out with an experiment. It might not work. If it doesn’t work, you’ll run away.”

Xu Rucheng had just finished acting as the “hopelessly apathetic” young mistress, and the Zhaos had left him a moment’s peace—the spiritual image stamp could only begin at noon. He was staring blankly. When he heard Xi Ping, he suddenly raised his head.

Xi Ping said, “Prepare a transport array and wait to receive something.”

Xu Rucheng thought, Where am I going to get a spiritual stone to draw an array?

Then he saw a gopher squeeze out of a hole in a tree in the little courtyard, stick out a little head, and stare at him.

Xu Rucheng immediately stood up with no change in his expression. Pretending that he was going out to divert himself in the courtyard, he walked up to the tree. The gopher opened its mouth and spat out a blue jade for him. From the gopher hole came the voice of one of his Luwu colleagues: “Careful.”

Then small flames leapt up on the gopher’s body, and it burned into paper ashes.

Xu Rucheng quickly used his foot to bury the ashes, feeling surprised and confused—a transport array was a basic array that all disciples who had just begun cultivating knew. As long as a person wasn't particularly inexperienced, it would be enough to use a jade stamp or even green ore. How could it take a blue jade?

What was Tai Sui going to send him? Some great treasure that could help him go above his grade to kill an established foundation cultivator?

Xu Rucheng turned back indoors. First he cautiously inspected all the corners in the room, determining that these people had left the young mistress some basic dignity: they hadn't put “eyes” in a girl's bedroom. Despite this, he still cautiously hid behind a screen, and, pretending to be changing clothes, took off his outer robe and hung it over the screen. He quickly put together a transport array and pressed the blue jade to it.

As soon as the array connected, a dark figure practically the same height that he currently was flew out of it and fell into his arms, nearly knocking over the screen.

Xu Rucheng was startled and quickly caught the figure. The next moment, taking a clear look at the “thing” that had come through the array, he nearly let her fall—Tai Sui had used the array to transport a living person!

But everyone knew that arrays couldn't transport living creatures, not even kittens or puppies. How had he done this?!

Xu Rucheng raised the person's face and his brains tied themselves into knots. This was Zhao Qindan!

“Senior, th-th-this...”

Xi Ping interrupted Xu the Stutterer: “Is she breathing? Cold or warm?”

Xu Rucheng sucked in a breath, and his voice went up a whole octave: “She's breathing! And, and warm!”

Xi Ping instantly sighed in relief: it had worked.

He had been most worried that as soon as she left the Law Breaker Bracelet, the copy of Zhao Qindan's consciousness would disappear, and the paperman would turn back into paper. Now it seemed that the Law Breaker Bracelet and the transport array had both tacitly acknowledged that the paperman holding Zhao Qindan's consciousness was another form of tool; it was paper, not human.

In other words, until the paperman's spiritual energy was exhausted or it was destroyed, he had produced a temporary “Zhao Qindan”!

Paper was inert, but Bai Ling was an established foundation half-demon. The Zhao family's cultivators wouldn't be able to see any flaws in his paperman. And the consciousness inside it brought out from the Law Breaker Bracelet was "alive." It could have a spiritual seal stamped on it.

"Have a heart. A whole village of braying donkeys couldn't outshout you." Xi Ping rubbed the roots of his ears and said to Xu Rucheng, "That's a paperman."

Xu Rucheng said, "Huh?"

How far had Mr. Bai's cultivation advanced since he had last seen him just days ago?

This was too realistic!

Just then, the spiritual sense attached to his ears was suddenly touched. There were steps outside the courtyard.

Xu Rucheng said a silent "no good" and was looking for a place to hide this paperman that seemed too much like a living person when he heard someone knock on the door.

In a soft voice, Zhao Qindan's mother called from outside: "Dandan, it's Mom."

This "paperman" seemed very sensitive to the voice of the original's mother. She suddenly tilted her head and opened her eyes, meeting Xu Rucheng's gaze blankly.

Meeting that gaze, Xu Rucheng's heart skipped—an outsider wouldn't have noticed it, but the Luwu were accustomed to using paperman substitutes. He had never seen a paperman with such a "living" look in its eyes.

Next, panic appeared on the "paperman"'s face. She pushed aside Xu Rucheng and was just about to cry out when the two of them simultaneously heard a qin play. The paperman's gaze became dazed. She stopped moving.

Tai Sui's voice sounded in Xu Rucheng's ear: "Hide!"

"No," Xu Rucheng said urgently, "senior, tell me the truth, that's a real person, isn't it, you..."

Xi Ping had no patience to bicker with him. He quickly played a few terrifying notes.

Having taken back the Tai Sui Qin, it wasn't like back in the East Sea, when he had only been able to control mortals. As long as the one listening to his playing was a lower level cultivator, they would be affected by it.

Xu Rucheng instantly felt that he had become a puppet on strings, involuntarily moving in response to the music. He hid behind the bed curtains. When he had just hidden, Madam Zhao walked in, leading a group of maids.

The "Zhao Qindan" who had been bewildered by Xi Ping's playing was dazed and confused. She said nothing, letting the maids change her clothes. Only when Madam Zhao wiped away tears did the rims of her eyes turn red, but she stubbornly refused to shed tears. Madam Zhao met her daughter's eyes in the mirror and was suddenly overwhelmed with grief. Covering her face, she turned her head away.

Xu Rucheng, hiding nearby, was terrified: how could a mother fail to recognize her own child? Anyway, only a real person's joys and sorrows could be infectious. However well-made a paperman was, staring at it too long would still only make you uncomfortable.

"Don't you know what the array you drew yourself is capable of? Is it an array that can transport a living person?" Xi Ping said. "If you're still concerned, I'll show you. She's in Tao County."

Saying so, he went through his spirit to show Xu Rucheng a glimpse of Zhao Qindan through the reincarnation wood trees. “She’s just about to... hm?”

The real Zhao Qindan put away a stack of completed protective talismans, pulled down her bamboo hat, and flew off on her sword in the direction of Yu Family Bend.

She had felt her consciousness being taken into a hidden realm, and inside it she had seen someone impersonating her...and he seemed to have been discovered by her family.

Zhao Qindan had never been so confused in her life. She didn’t know whether it was an illusion or the truth. So she had decided to go back and take a look.

CHAPTER 105 - Unbound Knife (12)

Xu Rucheng hadn't been good at arithmetic as a child, and he didn't know business like Wei Chengxiang. For a moment, he could hardly count up how many "Zhao Qindan"s were running around all over the world. At any rate, apart from him, they all seemed real.

He quickly said, "Senior, can you stop her?"

Xi Ping watched Zhao Qindan's figure recede, swift as the wind. His fingers brushed the Tai Sui Qin's strings. "Yes."

"Then don't let her come back! Isn't it enough of a mess over here?"

Xi Ping didn't move. He was silent a while, then asked in turn, "Why should I keep her from coming back?"

Xu Rucheng: "..."

"She'd have to go back eventually, if not now then in the future," Xi Ping said coolly. "If she comes back now, she'll be right in time for the start of the performance. Perfect, no?"

Supposedly Zhao Qindan was both clever and diligent. She had spent all her time in the Yanhai Building when she was at the Latent Cultivation Temple. She was one of the small number of disciples Luo Qingshi could look at without getting angry.

Though he wondered whether this young mistress was erudite enough to have heard of a “spiritual image stamp.”

Xi Ping turned and passed word to Wei Chengxiang, asking her to follow in secret.

Before she had finished listening, the veins on the back of Wei Chengxiang’s fist had emerged like earthworms. Gravely, she said, “Senior, set your mind at ease. I will look after her.”

Xi Ping said in bewilderment, “Why would you look after her?”

Wei Chengxiang: “...”

“It doesn’t matter to us whether she’s going to look from afar or to get herself killed. If she’s an idiot who can only mess things up, I have the means to stop her. There’s no need for you to worry about it,” Xi Ping instructed.

“The Zhao family wants to give the young lady a stamp, so they won’t stamp it stealthily behind closed doors. At least they’ll let Yu Family Bend’s local despots bear witness. I'm telling you to follow her to see if you can find an opportunity to feel out Yu Family Bend's foundation. But you must not advance rashly, whatever you do. Yu Family Bend is next door to a den of evil cultivators. To have been able to keep a firm hold on so many resources for so many years, they certainly can't have been relying on a third-rate imperial grandson. Be careful."

Xi Ping's reckoning was very accurate—from Tao County to Yu Family Bend, it took a full day to travel by horse-drawn carriage, but flying a sword, it took only the blink of an eye. When the sun was just about to climb to its zenith, Wei Chengxiang, tailing Zhao Qindan the whole way, arrived at the location of the Zhao family hidden realm, running right into the Yu family's carriages rumbling as they drove near. There were horse-drawn carriages, and there were also new steam carriages from Great Wan, all with red silk tied on and towing a string of boxes of all sizes.

The Zhaos had been waiting at the entrance to the hidden realm for a long time to welcome the local thugs. Yu Family Bend's upstarts were subdued by the Zhao clan's mystique as a family of immortals, and the Zhaos, seeing the Yu family's abundant property, were impatient to integrate into Western Chu's Sanyue.

The two sides agreed readily, outdoing each other for enthusiasm.

Zhao Qindan had an inscription that let her enter and exit the hidden realm freely. She cautiously drew some very unorthodox arrays on herself, concealing her traces, and snuck in through another of the hidden realm's entrances.

Inside was her home, after all. She knew every little bit of it like the back of her hand. She easily knocked out a guard patrolling on his own and blended in among the welcoming party. Wei Chengxiang, following her, did as she did. Wearing the Luwu mask that Senior Tai Sui had snatched from the Snake King's Immortal Palace, she attached herself to the end of a team of guards.

She heard Clan Leader Zhao, leading the guests inside, saying, "...yes, the sooner we get it settled, the better we'll feel. Dandan is ready. My daughter is untalented, of only average abilities. It took her nearly nine months after entering the Latent Cultivation Temple to enter the Way. She only has a slightly stronger than usual spiritual sense..."

Not one person in the household had discovered that she had run away. Zhao Qindan became increasingly surprised and bewildered. She thought, "Perhaps I wasn't dreaming, and there really was someone pretending to be me?"

Zhao Qindan had gone to Tao County wanting to buy some convenient weapons on the black market, not expecting that before she even reached Wild Fox Country, she would have been repeatedly hunted out of nowhere and lose about half of the spiritual stones she was carrying. She'd had neither food nor water for a whole day already and was in an extremely pitiful condition. She didn't know where she was injured, but at any rate everywhere hurt. This made the pampered young mistress wonder in spite of herself whether her rebellion hadn't been meaningless.

Now, returning to familiar surroundings, an uncontrollable thought emerged. Zhao Qindan thought: Is it really so unacceptable to marry into Western Chu's Xiang family? Sanyue's inner sect couldn't possibly be more dangerous than that cursed Wild Fox Country... Thinking about it carefully, her righteous indignation had only been unwillingness, unwillingness to become the kind of fine lady she had always secretly disdained.

But without her family background, without her father's coddling, would she really have been any different from those women? She had just left home, and the bloody winds of the outside world had nearly whipped her to death.

"I also won't conceal from you," Clan Leader Zhao continued, "while Yu Family Bend is a beautiful environment that breeds talent, indeed a good place, it is too close to the border. Recently, we received word from our fellow clan members in Southern Shu saying that their hidden realm had already been infiltrated by Southern Wan's Luwu. And just yesterday, we heard that tokens bearing our family inscriptions had appeared in Wild Fox Country... We've already sent people to look. Though the so-called 'inscription tokens' are fake, we have yet to understand the intentions of the person who spread this rumor. Ah, truly we must act with utmost caution, as though balancing on the edge of a cliff or treading on thin ice."

Zhao Qindan had never seen her father so obsequious. Her heart tightened.

The person from the Yu family seemed to be able to empathize with this feeling. He nodded repeatedly in response, but his eyes were floating all around the magnificent hidden realm. Hearing a gap in Clan Leader Zhao's outpouring of grievances, he saw an opening and went in: "How many spiritual stones does maintaining a hidden realm like this burn per day?"

Looking miserable, Clan Leader Zhao responded, "Ten whole liang of white spirits."

The people who had come from the Yu family heard this and immediately began making comments right in front of his face, one after another saying "Not costly at all," "Money-saving and impressive," and so on.

The lead Yu complimented: “Our clan, in order to make our juniors make progress, has built a ‘small spiritual mountain’ for that crowd of worthless good-for-nothings at home. It cost us two hundred thousand white spirits, yet it has less of a celestial air than this hidden realm of yours. No wonder not one of those monkeys has opened their spiritual eyes.”

For a time, Wei Chengxiang had no attention to spare to look at the young mistress’s changeable expression. She and Xi Ping drew in a breath simultaneously: two hundred thousand white spirits!

Even Clan Leader Zhao’s eyelids twitched when he heard. At first, he didn’t know what comment to make.

Just then, a person ran over and told them that “The auspicious hour is nearly here, and the young mistress is prepared.”

Zhao Qindan temporarily came back from her remorse and unease.

Hearing these words, she was a little perplexed. She thought: wasn’t the Yu family here to take a look at the Zhao family for the imperial grandson?

Whether they were taking a look at each other or exchanging betrothal gifts, what did it have to do with her? And also...what “auspicious hour” did they need?

It was currently near noon, the time of the “utmost yin” in folk customs, with the big sun shining directly overhead. How could that be auspicious?

While doubt after doubt popped up in her mind, the Zhaos and the Yus, affectionately holding each other by the arms, walked toward the ancestral offering platform within the hidden realm.

From far away, Zhao Qindan’s spiritual sense was touched. She felt that practically all the family’s masters were here. Zhao Qindan, fearing that she would give herself away, didn’t dare to approach rashly. She placed all her spiritual sense in her eyes, carefully avoided the consciousness of that established foundation shixiong, and glanced toward the ancestral offering platform.

Soon, she saw some maids walk over, supporting a splendidly-attired, veiled woman.

A person is always more sensitive to their own figure. When Zhao Qindan saw that “woman,” she was astonished.

She almost unconsciously glanced down at herself, for a moment almost absurdly suspecting that she was the fake... Wasn’t it a man passing himself off as her? Yet he could seem so much like her. What kind of divinity was he? She remembered the imposter she had seen. When he had seen her through the water, not only had he not seemed to fear being seen through, he also seemed to have a great deal to say to her. Since leaving the Zhao family, that was one of the rare gazes that hadn't looked at her with malice.

The Zhao established foundation cultivator took out a complete set of materials for prayer and divination and made a circle around the "imposter," inspecting her.

Zhao Qindan tensed. Inexplicably, she was a little concerned about the strange man who had taken her identity, afraid that he would be discovered by her eldest shixiong.

Wei Chengxiang followed her gaze and suddenly felt a bit of unease. She asked Xi Ping, "Senior, a spiritual image stamp is no joke. Is that really a paperman?"

At the same time, Xu Rucheng, who had used the Luwu mask to change his appearance, becoming a "maid" supporting the young mistress, asked Xi Ping the same question: "Senior, I really can't see how she's anything like a paperman. Please check again. Just in case... If you make me stand here watching that damned stamp fall upon a living person, I'll never get over it."

Xi Ping responded to them both with "As if I'd let a little half-immortal like you see a flaw," but inwardly he also felt a throb of anxiety out of nowhere.

He couldn't resist playing a note toward Zhao Qindan's spirit. Only when he had startled her into a jump did he relax.

That was a paperman that he had made himself. The Law Breaker Bracelet and the transport array had both confirmed it.

Neither the Zhao established foundation, nor the cultivators the Yu family had brought along, nor that set of ancient immortal tools could tell that there was anything wrong with that paperman. The immortal tools showed her horoscope, the age of her bones, her abilities, her spiritual sense, put on display one by one like the teeth of horses and oxen for the Yu family to see.

The Yus were very satisfied with the "goods." Whispering to each other, they nodded repeatedly.

Witnessing this scene, Zhao Qindan's mind buzzed. Her faint self-reproach and indecision vanished. She looked at her own shixiong in disbelief, inexpressible humiliation submerging her for a time.

Just then, there was a dull sound on the ancestral offering platform. The big clock standing at the southwest corner had yet to reach wu hour, but it was already puffing out steam in advance, ready to report the time.

Her shixiong solemnly bowed to heaven and earth and to the ancestors, his expression grave and gloomy. Then he instructed someone to blindfold his eyes and with both hands picked up a spike three chi long or more. Its shaft was carved full of inscriptions.

Zhao Qindan's pupils contracted sharply: What is he doing?

The Zhao established foundation raised the long spike and stood unmoving on the ancestral offering platform where steam curled. The atmosphere was too portentous. All those present couldn't resist holding their breaths.

The big clock reached wu hour and gave a click. Then the sound of the clock striking resounded throughout the whole hidden realm. All at once, the established foundation cultivator pierced the long spike through the center of the brow of the "Zhao Qindan" on the platform.

As soon as the long spike entered skin, all the inscriptions on the shaft lit up brightly. The pointed end merged into the center of "Zhao Qindan"'s brow as if turning into nothing, not damaging any of her flesh...not even a strand of hair.

To the mortals, "Zhao Qindan" didn't move a muscle. She only seemed to be sitting there, letting her family put a pointed hat on her head. But all the cultivators with their spiritual senses attached to their ears heard an extremely woeful woman's scream.

Wei Chengxiang was appalled, her scalp prickling. Xu Rucheng nearly threw himself forward. The Zhao family cultivators nearby involuntarily averted their gazes.

Zhao Qindan's mind went completely blank. All that remained was something she had once read long ago in the Yanhai Building: A spiritual image stamp must be applied at wu hour, pierced with the stamping implement through the spirit of the guilty slave. The slave's flesh and meridians will be undamaged. There will only remain a stamp upon the spiritual image, and the consciousness will receive a punishment as if of the hot brand.

The one who receives this punishment will never escape it.

It wasn't only the cultivators inside the Zhao family hidden realm who heard that scream; there was also Xi Ping.

Xi Ping gave a start. The Tai Sui Qin nearly tumbled from his knees.

To start with, he hadn't taken the consciousness he had duplicated in the Law Breaker Bracelet for a living person, because a living person could change, while the copy was "static." He had thought that the duplicated consciousness was something like a special portrait, but because of his superior “artistry,” it could fool the eyes of idiots.

But when he heard that scream, Xi Ping suddenly realized that no matter what “she” was, no matter whether her flesh came from a father and mother or whether it had been made of paper and music, she could still feel pain like a living person.

No wonder Wei Chengxiang and Xu Rucheng had been so uneasy. A... whatever she was, never mind that—if everyone felt that she was alive, then perhaps she really was alive!

He’d messed up. He shouldn’t have made a “living person.”

The paperman and the consciousness wrapped up in the paperman had come from the Law Breaker Bracelet. As the established foundation cultivator branded the stamp on the paperman’s spiritual image, inside the Law Breaker Bracelet, a sound like rusty iron machinery grinding against itself sounded, digging into one’s ears.

Next, the paperman’s consciousness appeared in the little pond in front of Xi Ping. A pitch-black, sharp spike drew a stroke on her face.

Without hesitation, Xi Ping sank his consciousness into the pond. The Tai Sui Qin sounded, interrupting the noise. With a thought, the Tai Sui Qin played like heavy rain, weaving a thin protective shield over the paperman's consciousness.

The stamping spike hit the shield, and it was as if Xi Ping had been hit right in the chest by a Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon. He went numb.

CHAPTER 106 - Unbound Knife (13)

The Tai Sui Qin wildly drained Xi Ping's essence—fortunately, when he had established his foundation, he had been at the bottom of the Impassable Sea, which had looted half of the southern mines. There was no deficit in his essence. Otherwise, he couldn't have been able to take having it drained like this.

Next, the water dragon pearl on him flashed brilliantly. On a ferry on the Xia River, a travel-worn “middle-aged scholar” and his white-haired and white-bearded “old retainer” simultaneously felt something.

The “old retainer” softly said, “My lord, there's something not quite right with the paperman I delivered to the Viscount.”

The “middle-aged scholar”—Zhou Ying, wearing one of Lin Chi's spiritual image masks—felt for the first time that the precious water dragon pearl might not be enough. The dragon kits of the past hadn't been able to make as much trouble as a certain person.

In the Zhao family hidden realm in Yu Family Bend, it took Zhao Qindan, hidden among the guards, two or three breaths to come back to herself. Instinctively, she formed a talisman in her hand.

Before the talisman was completed, a hand grasped and dispersed it. Wei Chengxiang's lips hardly moved. She passed word to Zhao Qindan's ears: "What are you doing?"

Zhao Qindan didn't pay any attention to who was beside her. She struggled hard.

She didn't know who that was on the platform now receiving the spiritual image brand in her place, and she didn't know what the aim of the power that had pushed that person forward was...but she knew that no one would willingly accept this kind of punishment, which couldn't be escaped in life or in death. And this ought to have been her fate.

That three-chi-long stamping spike seemed to be the legendary Nu'er Hong,⁶⁹ buried on the day of her birth, with the debt of twenty years of luxury provided by the Zhao family recorded on it. It was her debt.

"Young Mistress Zhao!" said Wei Chengxiang.

Zhao Qindan gave a start and turned her head in astonishment. She heard the unknown guard who had exposed her identity say in a hushed voice, "Since you have already escaped, why have you returned? Don't get hung up on this!"

Zhao Qindan said, “Who are you?”

That’s a long story, Wei Chengxiang thought. She wasn’t sure she’d even be able to explain clearly how many “Zhao Qindans” there were here. So she simply cooked up some nonsense: “My Tai Sui happened to hear of your business and felt contempt for the Zhao family’s conduct. He also valued your talents and ordered me to wait in the shadows to assist.”

By this point, Zhao Qindan no longer believed she had any “talents.” She didn’t know what this unknown evil cultivator wanted with her. Since he didn’t stint to push his own subordinate into a pit of suffering, then could he be any good?

Zhao Qindan laughed coldly at once and said, “You flatter me. I have nothing of my own right now, and I don’t know any Tai Sui. But though I, Zhao Qindan, am nothing, I still want a clean life. I won’t have others taking knives for me. From today onward, my relationship with the Zhao family is broken. You should all mind your own business. Don’t force me to yell and expose you to the Zhao and Yu families. Move out of the way!”

Wei Chengxiang stared.

A beam of spiritual energy from Zhao Qindan pushed her aside. And right now, the Tai Sui who had bragged that he could stop her didn’t react at all.

Wei Chengxiang quickly said, “Don’t panic, Young Mistress Zhao, that isn’t a living person, it’s a paperman!”

Zhao Qindan: “...”

Do I really look like an idiot?

Wei Chengxiang talked nonsense: “Look, the stamping spike is stuck!”

While Zhao Qindan didn’t believe this one bit, she still automatically looked toward the platform.

Wei Chengxiang took this opportunity to press a sleep talisman to her back.

The young mistress had no real world experience, and her mind was full of wrath. Without a sound, she fell to her machinations. Wei Chengxiang quickly used spiritual energy to hold up her body as it slid down. She also stuck a stealth talisman to deceive the eyes and ears onto her.

After using these two talismans, her already not very plentiful resources became even scander. Wei Chengxiang grudged the expense so much the corners of her eyes twitched faintly. She casually took a couple of spiritual stones from Zhao Qindan to make up her own loss. Only then did she look toward the horrifying ancestral offering platform.

Huh? She blinked. How come the stamping spike really had stuck?

Now, Xi Ping at last knew why a spiritual image stamp couldn't be removed after being applied. When he blocked the stamping spike by force, it boiled with rage; the ruthless sharp spike practically brought down all the fire of the most brutal burning sun of noon, nearly burning away this reckless little established foundation.

Damn it, he thought, this really is what they call "There's no hope of escape from a calamity you bring onto yourself."

While the blindfolded "Zhao Established Foundation" couldn't perceive Xi Ping's existence, he could still feel the stamping spike stagnate. And at that moment, perhaps because he had remembered that this bright and beautiful young woman had given Yuzhou's Heaven's Design Pavilion a bit of color for the last six years, or perhaps because he really had begun to feel a bit of regret for her talents, the established foundation holding the stamping spike hesitated.

This moment of softness from him gave Xi Ping the chance to catch his breath. The greater the crisis he encountered, the faster his mind worked. In a moment, everything he knew about the Dragon and Phoenix Symbolizing Good Fortune appeared in Xi Ping's mind—he knew that there was no hope in simply bearing up like this. For one thing, he couldn't hold out, and for another, that stamping spike had to place a stamp on the spiritual image. If it was obstructed out of nowhere, the established foundation cultivator would definitely think something was wrong once he'd had a chance to consider it.

In a flash, Xi Ping thought that, because each person's spiritual image was different, spiritual image stamps had to be like inscriptions, adjusted in various ways depending on the recipient. In other words, each stamp only matched one spiritual image.

When they had inspected Zhao Qindan's horoscope, spiritual sense, and so on, it had been to check her spiritual image, to avoid hiccups; they hadn't been deliberately humiliating her.

Only one...only one spiritual image...right!

At this time, the cosmos at noon wouldn't wait for anyone. As soon as the stamping spike stopped, the accumulated heat immediately "flowed" through the stamping spike to Zhao Established Foundation's hands. The established foundation's hands sizzled as they burned, producing smoke.

Zhao Established Foundation at last recovered, and his lips moved slightly. He seemed to be sighing.

“Dandan,” he said almost inaudibly, “the Zhao family owes you.”

Saying this, the spiritual energy in his hands rose sharply, and he quickly pushed the stamping spike forward.

Xi Ping’s hands moved so quickly they blurred. As he blocked the stamping spike with difficulty, he swiftly used the Tai Sui Qin to make two more identical copies of Zhao Qindan’s consciousness inside the Law Breaker Bracelet. At the same time, he set up a pair of transport arrays in the Law Breaker Bracelet and on the paperman’s spirit, directly activating it with his own essence, which was nearly drained dry.

When he divided his attention, the stamping spike instantly pierced his shield.

Xi Ping simply used his own consciousness to shield the paperman. His vision darkened.

Next, two Zhao Qindan consciousnesses squeezed into a single paperman through the array.

There was absolutely no difference between the duplicate consciousnesses. The paperman that had acknowledged Zhao Qindan as its owner didn't repel them at all. The three consciousnesses made up a triangle. Xi Ping's wounded consciousness could hardly hold out any longer. He simply withdrew it from the paperman.

He tumbled back into the Law Breaker Bracelet. His true body coughed up a mouthful of blood.

And at the same time, the stamping spike stopped in the middle of the three Zhao Qindan consciousnesses. A triangle was a very steady structure. Three identical consciousnesses pushed and pulled the spike with identical strength. This was probably the stamping spike's first time encountering such a situation. It didn't know what to do at first.

After pausing for a while, the stamping spike arrived at the same "judgment" as the paperman—there was no such thing as identical consciousnesses; these "three consciousnesses" belonged to one person... though the configuration was rather unusual.

Inside the ring of three consciousnesses, the stamping spike began to circle around. After a moment, a Dragon and Phoenix stamp took shape, like a totem, suspended among the paperman's three consciousnesses.

Then the stamping spike, starting from the tip, turned into scattered light and surged into the Dragon and Phoenix stamp.

The ceremony was complete.

On the paperman Zhao Qindan's clean and unblemished flesh, the stamp flashed like a tattoo, then sank into her snow-white oval face.

Zhao Established Foundation breathed a sigh of relief. His back was soaked in cold sweat.

He cast down his eyes and bent his head, looking at Zhao Qindan's face, so white it looked like paper. He restrained his expression by force and calmly ordered the maids to take the young mistress to rest. The established foundation turned his head, meeting the crowd of either panic-stricken or faintly expectant faces, and felt sudden loathing. He noticed that his breathing was agitated. He was showing signs of an unstable Way of the Heart. He saluted and stalked off.

Once the established foundation left, Xi Ping immediately drew in a breath and snatched up the two extra consciousnesses and the spiritual image stamp suspended among them.

The paperman fell limp in the maids' arms.

The cultivators present were still feeling the aftereffects of the scream. They didn't show it on their faces, but in their hearts they felt more or less uncomfortable. None of them said anything. Only Clan Leader Zhao, a mortal who had heard nothing, had a normal expression. That happy smile was also like a criminal brand stamped on his face.

Xi Ping's essence was exhausted. All his meridians ached fiercely. He didn't even have time to look closely at the first successfully stripped off spiritual image stamp on earth. He only tossed the thing into the Law Breaker Bracelet and reached out, groping. He didn't even have a single jade stamp on him!

There were spiritual stones hoarded in the Law Breaker Bracelet, but the hundred thousand white spirit deficit was hanging over Xi Ping's head. He couldn't bear to use them. In that momentary hesitation, the Tai Sui Qin vanished in mid air and simply shot his consciousness out. Xi Ping couldn't even fly a sword. Covered in blood, he tumbled from the clouds.

Just then, a white form flashed like lightning. Bai Ling, coming after the water dragon pearl, caught him.

Next, a human form condensed out of the thick fog in the sky over Tao County. Zhou Ying appeared from the fog. His pupils contracted slightly.

“San-ge...” Xi Ping spent ages focusing before he finally saw the newcomer clearly. He feebly clutched his sleeve. His fingers lost strength midway and slipped down.

Zhou Ying grabbed his still bloody wrist. He didn't ask any detailed questions, only expressionlessly said, “Where are you hurt? Who was it?”

Xi Ping drew a breath with difficulty. “It was pov...poverty.”

Zhou Ying: “...”

“San-ge...hss...I'm out of money again, give me some spiritual...san-ge!”

“Bai Ling,” Zhou Ying said, letting Xi Ping's paw fall and taking out a piece of silk to wipe his hands, “drop him.”

Bai Ling sighed and passed his hand over Xi Ping's brow. Xi Ping didn't struggle. He confidently passed out in his arms.

In the Zhao family hidden realm, those who had come to bring betrothal gifts and attend the ceremony for the Yu family exchanged veiled looks.

Among the Yus who had come to the Zhao home this time, the head was the eldest grandson of the clan leader, the “blood uncle” of the third-rate imperial grandson. The “blood uncle” didn’t speak rashly. First, he directed his gaze toward a young man next to him with the look of a guard.

Only then did the gathered people find that this was a white-clothed, long-faced young man, with rather delicate looks and a smile at the corners of his mouth, but a crease in the center of his brow. This white-clothed guard seemed to have a stealth talisman on him. If the “blood uncle” hadn’t looked at him, all the cultivators and mortals around wouldn’t have noticed that such a person existed.

As soon as the white-clothed guard appeared, the spiritual senses of the Zhao cultivators were simultaneously touched—this guard’s cultivation level certainly exceeded the open-eyed stage!

Even the clan leader’s eldest grandson was respectful toward him. Quietly, he asked, “What is your view?”

The white-clothed guard turned his gaze away from watching “Zhao Qindan” leave and pinched the center of his brow. The crease became deeper. Then, treasuring words like gold, he nodded to the Yus around him. “The ceremony is complete.”

Only with his statement did the Yus believe that the Phoenix stamp had been completed. The crowd of uncouth upstarts instantly let loose.

“Great, we’re all related now!”

“A joy, a great joy!”

The white-clothed guard’s throat moved slightly, as if he were swallowing something. With a smile, he looked on for a moment. Then, like mist, he vanished before everyone’s eyes.

People whose gazes were usually perceptive to the smallest detail automatically lost focus. Even the cultivators whose spiritual senses had just been touched forgot about this person’s existence and went to cluster ignorantly around the “blood uncle.”

The “blood uncle” loudly passed judgment within the Zhao family hidden realm: “This hidden realm of yours, it’s celestial enough, I’ll grant, but it’s too conservative. Normally all the technology comes from the east, so why is this place still lit with luminous pearls and shark oil? Those things are luxurious enough, but they’re not practical! Another day, I’ll send you a set of gas lamps. I guarantee the night will be as bright as the day.”

Saying so, he also boasted of his family’s Moon Plated Gold factories and the number of workers they supported, how “if Wan and Chu hadn’t had a disagreement that delayed the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon, the family would have more than a hundred thousand white spirits by now,” and so on.

The feast was arranged as smoothly as flowing water. The servants unloaded the Yu family’s gifts, carrying them away like ants with a bumper crop.

In the storehouse, a downgraded immortal tool burning paraffin and spiritual stones was automatically printing a long list of presents.

The music and drumbeats started up, the wine cups were handed around, everywhere was jubilation. Only no one remembered the young female cultivator who had been scorched by the burning sun on the altar.

“Senior, Senior Tai Sui...”

Wei Chengxiang tried calling several times in her mind and got no response. None of those men were reliable when it came to a crisis.

She hesitated, not daring to approach the Yus.

The Yus were uncouth in their speech and behavior, and most of them were mortals, but just now something had touched her spiritual sense, warning her not to get close. Wei Chengxiang didn't have a rash disposition. She decided to listen to her instincts and get Zhao Qindan out.

Forget it. The young mistress wasn't safe here. She'd take her out first, then consider what to do next.

Wei Chengxiang didn't have a perfect memory for what she read, but her memory for directions was very strong. She was excellent at observation—this was a skill that came from being hunted. Hauling a living person, she returned the way she had come without any hindrance, easily avoiding the patrolling guards.

Just as she was about to leave the Zhao family hidden realm, a soft laugh sounded in her ear.

Wei Chengxiang grabbed several dice at once. "Who's there?!"

No sooner had she spoken than her vision blurred. As if she had fallen into someone else's mustard seed, there was mist all around, and a tall, white-clothed person strolled over, smiling at her genteelly.

With Wei Chengxiang's acuteness, she still hadn't been able to notice his approach.

This was an established foundation...no, his cultivation was even higher than an average established foundation...

“Hello, young lady,” said the white-clothed man, exposing her identity at once.

Wei Chengxiang’s eyes fell on the Yu family emblem embroidered on his clothes. Her heart tightened. She was wearing a Luwu mask right now. Though it didn’t come from the set Master Lin had made himself, it had still managed to pass itself off under the eyes of a crowd of ascended spirits in Wild Fox Country. How had he seen through her?

“I am called Yu Chang. I am a watchdog for the Yu family. I acted under orders to come and observe this ceremony, in case the Zhao family couldn’t give up their direct descendant daughter and secretly played some trick,” the white-clothed man said, smiling. “I hadn’t expected to witness a miracle. It turns out there really is a person who can perpetuate a fraud and steal a spiritual image stamp on the spot.”

“Senior.” Wei Chengxiang’s spine stiffened. She futilely called for “Tai Sui” several times in her mind. “We’ve been seen through!”

It was as if Tai Sui had gone to the grave. There was no answer.

But the white-clothed man tilted his head and narrowed his eyes. “Oh, so this master is called Tai Sui?”

Wei Chengxiang: “...”

What kind of divinity was this person? How could he hear her speaking through her spirit?

“Don’t be nervous, I mean you no harm, and for now I don’t plan on telling others about this...” At this point, the white-clothed man suddenly clutched his chest and coughed up a mouthful of blood, but it was as if he had only spat out a leaf caught between his teeth. After wiping it away, his expression unchanging, he went on with what he was saying. “Spiritual image brand acting up, excuse my poor manners—I only want to meet this master and discuss a deal with him.”

CHAPTER 107 - Unbound Knife (14)

Wei Chengxiang stared at the man who called himself Yu Chang for a while, then suddenly showed her teeth in a smile.

Then she put Zhao Qindan aside and sat on the ground. Right in front of the man's face, she dismissed her preoccupations, emptied her mind, and began to meditate.

The spirit was a cultivator's underpinning. It couldn't be spied upon, unless someone had the ability to seize her body.

Even Tai Sui could only "see" through the reincarnation wood; he could only have a conversation when a person wanted to communicate.

There were so many ascended spirits and shed skins on earth, and she hadn't heard of any who could read minds. Who did this little pretty boy think he was?

With a bit of thought, Wei Chengxiang knew that either there was something wrong with this "mustard seed," or this man had some particular power that she had unwittingly been subject to.

He walked right up and didn't even say two proper sentences before getting up to dirty tricks trying to scare her. She could make this decision for Tai Sui—"discuss" my ass.

"The people of the Snake King's Immortal Palace are remarkable." This reaction of Wei Chengxiang's took Yu Chang aback somewhat. He raised his eyebrows. "No wonder they were able to take advantage of the chaos under the eyes of the four great immortal mountains and have easily infiltrated the Zhao family hidden realm now...don't you think so, Young Mistress Zhao?"

Wei Chengxiang had sealed her hearing. She couldn't hear him talk.

Next to her, the "unconscious" Zhao Qindan was exposed by his words. She had no choice but to open her eyes.

Zhao Qindan had a first-class spiritual sense. The more powerful a person's spiritual sense, the stronger their resistance to arts of the sleep and illusion kind, never mind that Wei Chengxiang had been unwilling to take serious measures—it wasn't from compassion and care toward women; mainly it was that the stronger the talisman, the more spiritual stones it took. Weilaoban was stingy. While Wei Chengxiang had been dragging her out of the hidden realm, Zhao Qindan had blearily regained consciousness. She'd held back and hadn't made a sound, wanting to scout out Wei Chengxiang's situation. But her plans couldn't keep up with the circumstances. A strange Yu family member had charged in midway.

As soon as this Yu appeared, Zhao Qindan had been the most nervous. Her mind had been tense, and she hadn't had attention to spare to closely consider the confrontation between the other two. She thought, "What does 'steal a spiritual image stamp on the spot' mean? Didn't the stamp just now work?"

"That's right." Yu Chang nodded at her. "This is unprecedented. As soon as it gets out, there may be a great upheaval in Western Chu—it's true after all that a pretty girl has better luck."

First Zhao Qindan froze. Then she opened her eyes wide: this person knew what she was thinking!

"Don't worry, I have a Way of the Heart. I wouldn't listen to anything improper." Yu Chang laughed aloud. "Don't be in a hurry to start reciting scripture."

Zhao Qindan at last knew why the "fake guard" was meditating. But meditating in front of an unknown enemy was no different from a sheep going to sleep in the mouth of a tiger. Not just anyone had the guts to imitate this move. Zhao Qindan only did her best not to think anything, using some mechanical sounds to defend against prying. But her panicked thoughts wouldn't be controlled. Thought after thought emerged: Why is this person hiding it? Who does he want to threaten? All these Yu upstarts are worthless...

"I already said I have a Way of the Heart. Never mind a Way of the Heart, even a mortal with a conscience despises this kind of behavior," this Yu Chang said. "None of us are free of compulsion...but, after all, I bear a spiritual image brand. Concealing this matter from my masters causes me considerable suffering. Young Mistress Zhao, this friend of yours won't even let me finish talking. Isn't that a little injurious to my feelings?"

Zhao Qindan's mind and mouth were united: "What's the point of telling me? I don't know her."

The smile on Yu Chang's face faded gradually. This person's emotions didn't seem very stable. His face was now gloomy, now sunny. "Young Mistress Zhao, you have only temporarily slipped away. It isn't as though there's no way to find out whether that stamp was actually stamped or not. Don't you want to be a little more polite?"

Zhao Qindan was susceptible to persuasion but not coercion. The young mistress's temper immediately flared up. With a cold laugh, she said, "As you please, Your Excellency. At worst I'll give this life back to the Zhao family. Even if they have the ability to keep me from dying, I can still self-destruct my spirit. When they're left with a mindless idiot, as long as they don't mind the humiliation, they're welcome to do whatever they like with my leftover mortal shell. What else can they do?"

Wei Chengxiang heard nothing. Not even the tips of her brows moved.

Of these two people, one had boldly slipped out of his hands, and the other was simmering with rage, using her guts to think. For a time, they actually stopped this master of unknown origin in his tracks.

Yu Chang's expression became grave, gloom appearing on his delicate face. The hands hanging at his sides moved toward the two of them. But he didn't know the capabilities of the people behind these two—especially Wei Chengxiang—so in the end he restrained himself.

After a moment's deadlock, Yu Chang waved a hand and dispersed the mustard seed, then disappeared on the spot himself, only leaving a communication token in front of the two of them. He passed word to Zhao Qindan: "Pass on to your extremely strong-willed friend that if she and the 'Tai Sui' behind her change their minds, they should come to Yu Family Bend to see me... They've been short on funds lately. Can't we work together?"

This place was already close to the border of the Zhao family hidden realm. The route Zhao Qindan chose was very out of the way. She warily held her breath and probed with her consciousness, determining that there was no one around, then finally reached out to give Wei Chengxiang a shove. “Hey, wake up.”

Wei Chengxiang fell at her shove. Before her head hit the ground, her spiritual sense pulled her out of meditation. Wei Chengxiang, like a tilting doll, hung above the ground. Then she opened her eyes and lightly bounced back.

Zhao Qindan made a gesture at her, first taking her out of the Zhao family hidden realm.

The two of them bounded dozens of li in one breath, plunging into a deserted forest one after the other. Finally Zhao Qindan stopped and turned to ask, “The Snake King’s Immortal Palace?”

Wei Chengxiang smiled winningly at her, neither confirming nor denying.

“No wonder you got your eyes on us...on the Zhao family so fast.” Zhao Qindan laughed coldly. “You were that maid who gave me the spiritual stones and urged me to run away from home, right?”

“No,” Wei Chengxiang answered, “that must have been another brother of mine.”

Zhao Qindan: “...”

How come it was a man again?! What was wrong with these people? They couldn't go on stage unless they were playing against type?

“This place of yours truly has lofty ideals,” Zhao Qindan mocked. She tossed the communication token at her. “The guy in white clothes said you people need money and said to tell you to go to Yu Family Bend to see him... Hey, that...that Tai Sui you mentioned, can he really remove stamps without anyone knowing? You didn't have a person take the stamp?”

Wei Chengxiang was accustomed to being cautious. She reached out the fake hand Lin Chi had given her to pinch the communication token, then used a talisman to wrap it up. “Tai Sui doesn't do that kind of thing.”

Zhao Qindan immediately felt a heavy worry leave her. Now she was in the mood to consider other things. She took one look at Wei Chengxiang's fake hand and immediately gave a cry. “So you were that thief?”

Wei Chengxiang helplessly and sincerely said, “Young Mistress Zhao, I believe you may have some misunderstanding concerning me. Whether you believe it or not, I truly had no interest in stealing your spiritual stones. It was an out of control immortal tool that hijacked my hand and robbed you. That is the true culprit.”

Zhao Qindan: “...”

Everything this person said was loathsome; it was oily and insincere!

But loathsome or not, since learning that she was a woman, Zhao Qindan’s wariness had still involuntarily decreased considerably, and her dislike was also within tolerable bounds. She had heard that the Luwu were all of common origin, relying on odds and ends parceled out among them to survive. It was said that if they weren’t using public funds, they wouldn’t even be willing to draw an extra talisman. No wonder she was so shabby.

So Zhao Qindan rolled her eyes, took out a small handful of blue jade, and tossed it at Wei Chengxiang. “Don’t quibble—look, if you need money, take that and use it. I know you didn’t do this to save me, it was for the sake of my identity, but I don’t like owing people. Take me to see this ‘Tai Sui.’ I’ll return the favor to you.”

This stupid girl didn’t know how to count. She hadn’t noticed that she was once again missing spiritual stones.

But since there was someone throwing out money, Wei Chengxiang wasn't about to politely refuse. She gladly accepted and said, "If he wants to see you, he'll be able to contact you. Otherwise, my word has no weight. There's something I have to do first. You look after yourself."

"Hey," Zhao Qindan quickly followed her, "what are you going to do?"

Wei Chengxiang flitted through a big thicket of reincarnation wood, ignoring her, but not taking precautions against her.

After removing the Luwu mask, she headed straight for Yu Family Bend's Longevity Peak—the little hostel where she had met the worm master Bu Zhichou before.

As soon as the two welcoming half-puppets at the door saw her, their smiles stiffened at once. It was as if they were afraid of her but also wanted to spit at her.

But this time, this person who was so poor she would weigh green ore on scales, as if she had been body-snatched, voluntarily took out a fairly good-quality jade stamp and gave it to them. "If I might trouble you."

The dwarf half-puppets stared, took the jade stamp and sniffed it. Their manner changed at once. They politely said, "Please come in. Have you come to have a meal on your way or to stay the night? To receive a visitor or to do business?”

Under Zhao Qindan’s curious gaze, Wei Chengxiang lowered her voice and said, “I also want to find out some information. What are the rules?”

She emphasized the “also” very firmly. A dwarf half-puppet paused, then smiled brilliantly, his eyes spinning for a moment. He said, “Please come this way.”

In this kind of post station where guests came and went and all kinds of people mixed together, information was abundant. If you found the right connections and spent a bit of money, you could get what you wanted—though it wasn’t so straightforward when you were the main character of the “information” that had been sold.

As soon as that white-clothed Yu Chang had heard “Tai Sui,” his first reaction hadn’t been to think of Great Wan’s Luwu, it had been to mention the “Snake King’s Immortal Palace” at once. He also knew they needed money. Evidently someone had sold the news of her meeting the worm master Bu Zhichou on Longevity Peak.

The half-puppet shuffled on his short legs, eagerly leading the two of them up to a private room in the attic. “Please wait a moment. Sir is here.”

After saying this, he said in a loud voice, “Sir, a regular is here!”

Then the wall of the attic’s inner room rotated open with a creak-creak, revealing a hidden room. A puppet dressed up as a fool from Chu opera “rolled” out. The dwarf half-puppet respectfully saluted him and withdrew.

The fool puppet gave Wei Chengxiang an adorable, rotund bow, then opened his mouth. Wei Chengxiang interrupted him with a false smile. “Mr. Heartless, there’s no need for you to put on such airs right after you’ve finished selling me out.”

The worm master Bu Zhichou’s voice came from the fool puppet’s throat: “My shop operates on Yu Family Bend territory. I rely on their favor to make a living. Sometimes I do not dare to offend the local thugs.”

“I see,” said Wei Chengxiang, raising her eyelids. “Then it seems the blame lies with Wild Fox Country being too far away.”

Steam spurted from the top of the puppet’s head. Shaking his head, he said, “Young lady, there’s no wall on earth that doesn’t let the wind through. We craftsmen, businessmen, and such are only looking for peace. How can we reject customers? Since I could do business with him, naturally I can also do business with you...”

With a radiant smile, Wei Chengxiang said, “If you trick a single coin out of my pocket, from now on, you and your puppets won’t take another step into Wild Fox Country.”

The steam coming from the top of the puppet’s head paused.

Wei Chengxiang grabbed a handful of melon seeds. “You sold my information, and now you want to make money at both ends? Do I seem like I can’t keep accounts?”

She seemed like an abacus that had cultivated a human form. The puppet shook twice with remorse and said obsequiously, “Then what would you like?”

“Give me and this young lady a meal each. We’ve gone hungry for a long time.” First Wei Chengxiang knocked on the table. Then she said, “I want to know who ‘Yu Chang’ is.”

Bu Zhichou quickly shushed her. “This is Yu Family Bend, don’t mention the taboo name of a master!”

Wei Chengxiang raised her eyebrows. “Oh? How masterful is he?”

“I’m not certain. It is said that he is only a step away from an ascended spirit,” Bu Zhichou’s fat puppet said. “He is an ancestor given offerings by Yu Family Bend.”

“Offerings?” said Wei Chengxiang.

“Yu Family Bend used to be called Precious Jade Bend. This place has mines and green ore fields, and it’s far from the capital. Everyone coveted it. It used to be split up among high officials and nobles, all of them thinking that their share wasn’t big enough, clashing nearly every day. You know these nobles. The descendants of the most outstanding all went to the Sanyue Sect, and the second-rate ones could join the Qilin Guard. They couldn’t very well get mixed up in the everyday matters of the nobodies, so each family secretly ‘gave offerings’ to many common cultivators—by ‘offerings,’ I mean that they used their resources and spiritual stones to support these rootless people, and the cultivators were stamped with a brand and became their master’s hired thugs. Betrayal meant death.”

Amid a cloud of steam, the puppet flexed the mechanical springs in his throat. Accompanied by the creaking of gears interlocking, he said, “The Yu family is of humble origin. One ancestor came to Yu Family Bend fleeing a famine, his history unknown. After coming here, he sold himself as a servant into the house of a noble family. Beginning as a coachman, he won the master's trust bit by bit and became a steward. In the end, even the responsibility of recruiting and looking after the 'offerings' fell to him.

“This person...ha, he truly was something else. If he'd only had the chance to study and become a court official, he certainly would have become that era's sycophantic courtier bringing disaster to the nation. Condescending to waste his talent in a little place like Yu Family Bend, he deceived his master until he couldn't see what was in front of his face. Later, he secretly accepted quite a few 'offerings' who ought to have been devoted to his master's family. After waiting patiently for forty years, not making a sound, he seized power in one day—at the time, the most capable 'offering' with him was this Yu...the gentleman you spoke of. It's said that he was saved with only one breath left to him by the Yu family's ancestor. Afterward, that gentleman continued as the Yu family's offering. He has already gone through a dozen generations, pushing that humble clan step by step to its present position, when Precious Jade Bend has even changed its name to Yu Family Bend. You see how powerful he is!”

Wei Chengxiang said, “What is his power?”

Bu Zhichou's puppet shook his head. “I do not know of his other power, but as you know, starting from the established foundation, a cultivator cannot go against their Way of the Heart. But having been stamped with a brand, you become a person's dog. How is it possible not to violate your own convictions? As soon as the offerings establish a foundation, they lose their minds within a century.”

Zhao Qindan had been listening to this segment with her ears pricked up; now her expression altered.

Bu Zhichou’s puppet didn’t notice. He continued: “No one knows how he has managed to withstand losing his mind. I won’t conceal from you, even the Yu family juniors are both respectful and frightened when mentioning him... Though in recent years, he has spent more and more time in seclusion, and each time he appears, it seems he looks worse than the time before. It is said that his temper has also become unstable. I’m afraid he doesn’t have long.”

Wei Chengxiang nodded: no wonder this cultivator had been so impatient to come to them when he saw that someone could tamper with a spiritual image stamp.

Bu Zhichou’s puppet remembered something else and said, “Oh, yes, I’ve heard that he has a secret art that can make people involuntarily speak what is in their minds. He excels in extracting confessions and cheating people, a profound schemer—but, after all, he has a Way of the Heart, and I hear that he is quite loyal. He doesn’t keep the means of postponing a branded offering from losing their mind to himself. Over the years, he has saved quite a few people. Many cultivators in Yu Family Bend are profoundly grateful to him...but so what? From the day the brand is applied, you are a slave for all eternity. Ah! Ladies, the food is here. Enjoy it.”

Wei Chengxiang narrowed her eyes. She seemed to be muttering something to herself.

Zhao Qindan quietly said, “Western Chu’s customs are evil.”

“Well said!” Bu Zhichou’s puppet said fawningly. “I’ve told you all that I know, free of cost. This information is Yu Family Bend’s secret history. Outsiders can’t learn of it. If someone else came to ask, it would cost them at least two liang of jade stamps.”

Wei Chengxiang nodded to him. “Understood. I will report all of this to Tai Sui.”

Bu Zhichou saluted her and swayed out, bowing and scraping.

“He was pretty helpful,” Wei Chengxiang thought and called “Tai Sui” in her mind, explaining this matter...though Tai Sui still didn’t respond.

Afternoon passed and the sun traveled west, pouring in through the window, stretching out the two young women’s shadows.

Just then, a cloud was blown past by the wind. The shadows on the ground blurred for a moment. No one noticed how, in that instant, the movements of the shadows didn't match the people themselves.

When Xi Ping woke up, he was inside the Snake King's Immortal Palace. He had been buried facedown in a casket of spiritual stones.

Xi Ping hissed, feeling his face being rubbed full of pits. Grimacing, he righted himself and reached out to touch his face, feeling a beard and skin as loose as a cloth sack.

Xi Ping stared blankly for ages, holding his chin in horror, before finally realizing something. He took off the Luwu mask that someone had put onto him. This edition of the Luwu mask must have been personally made by Lin Chi. It was only the size of a pill, translucent and soft to the touch, able to change shape readily. As soon as you added spiritual energy, it could dissolve into a person's body, turning them male or female, young or old, as they liked.

Xi Ping got up and played with it for a while, coquettishly changing into several different forms. Suddenly, he was struck by a thought: since this had been made by Master Lin himself, could it change him into something else?

When Zhou Ying opened the door, he didn't see Xi Ping, only a big grey rat attempting to walk on its hind legs. It was sleek and shiny, a perfect illustration of the legendary "huge rat."⁷⁰ It even squeaked at him.

Zhou Ying: "..."

His Third Highness stared at the rat for a moment, then closed the door just as he had opened it. He took a deep breath, calmed down for a moment, then turned his head and said to Bai Ling: "Discipline rod."

Bai Ling was stuck to the wall, keeping himself to himself, pretending he wasn't present. Hearing these words, he skillfully changed from paper to human and pulled a sturdy discipline rod from his mustard seed, presenting it with both hands. Then he stuck himself back to the wall.

Zhou Ying kicked open the door. "Scoundrel!"

Xi Ping—the big grey rat—gave him a demonstration of "scurrying like a frightened rat" on the spot.

When removing the mask, you needed to pour an appropriate quantity of spiritual energy through your fingertips and simultaneously press down on the acupoints on the lower jaw and under the eyes. A rat's paws couldn't reach them. He couldn't change back!

Lin Chi had failed him!

As Xi Ping dashed under the bed, he used his consciousness to knock on Peak Master Lin's skull. "Master Lin! Didn't you consider how you were supposed to remove the mask after you became a rat?"

Unexpectedly receiving this very original appeal, Lin Chi's hand shook, ruining an inscription he was more than halfway finished carving and nearly blowing up the immortal furnace.

A mighty prince of the first rank categorically couldn't get down on the floor to hunt for a rat. For a moment, he was caught in a dilemma. He slammed a table with the discipline rod. "Bai Ling, get a mousetrap!"

Xi Ping howled, "Master Lin!"

Only now did Lin Chi realize what he had said. "Oh...you can do that?"

Xi Ping: "..."

With a thought, the Tai Sui Qin attached itself to his whiskers. The grey rat swiftly used his front paws to pluck the whiskers a few times. After a few twangs, a Luwu mask rolled off the rat, and the big rat turned into a human under the bed.

Xi Ping cried out “ow” as the back of his head hit the underside of the bed. He tasted many years’ worth of old dust.

“San-ge...cough-cough, I was wrong! Don’t hit me, don’t hit me, I’ll show you something good!”

CHAPTER 108 - Unbound Knife (15)

When more than one person entered the Law Breaker at the same time, two melodies would sound inside at the same time. Despite this, the sounds were “separate,” one near and one far, not disturbing each other.

Moreover, only Xi Ping himself could hear this music.

Bai Ling’s song was of very similar style to his paperman, but from beginning to end, it was mixed with indiscernible interference, probably the demonic part of him.

Though in terms of cultivation, Zhou Ying was only a half-immortal, he brought in even more interference than Bai Ling. Xi Ping couldn’t hear the greater part of his song, which had no tune—a paramount spiritual sense was extremely rare; there were no words to correspond to what Zhou Ying saw and heard. It couldn’t be described, and others couldn’t use their imaginations to understand it—there was only a small clear segment in the middle. It had a tune. For some reason, this tune sounded particularly familiar to Xi Ping, so he imitated it with a whistle.

When he had only whistled a couple of phrases, his back was hit with the discipline rod.

“Shut up.” Zhou Ying was examining the space inside the Law Breaker with his head lifted. As he did so, he scolded, “It’s been over a decade, and you haven’t made a bit of progress.”

In the Law Breaker, the Snake King’s Immortal Palace that Xi Ping had created was completely convincing, but in Zhou Ying’s eyes, it was obviously an illusion: outside, all things and creatures were all covered in a thin layer of radiance, the meager spiritual energy scattered throughout the world, but that didn’t exist inside the Law Breaker...apart from the “performance fee” Xi Ping had piled up in a corner—the spiritual stones.

The area of the Snake King’s Immortal Palace was limited. Standing in a high place, you could see the boundary of the Law Breaker Bracelet. This bracelet’s boundary seemed to be connected to something. With Zhou Ying’s vision, not only could he not see it clearly, staring at it too long even made him dizzy.

After Xi Ping, speaking in torrents, had described the whole course of the Law Breaker Bracelet pulling him out from the bottom of the Impassable Sea, he waited for his san-ge’s gasps of admiration, but instead he saw Zhou Ying staring at the boundary of the Law Breaker, his brow furrowed. “San-ge?”

Why wasn’t he praising him?

Zhou Ying slowly shook his head. “Hui Xiangjun’s three great relics are the Law Breaker, the Riverward, and the Gold Imitation Technique. The Law Breaker and the Riverward both involve breaking away from the spiritual mountains. I suspect that the Gold Imitation Technique is even more of a rebellion against orthodoxy. Not the extant version of it—the true Gold Imitation Technique was likely never passed down... Oh, what’s that?”

Xi Ping looked in the direction he was looking and saw a piece of “paper” floating in midair. He smacked himself on the forehead. “Oh, right, I forgot about that.”

This was the spiritual image stamp he had snatched from the paperman. Stamped on a person, this thing was charred black, but floating untethered in the air now, it was the color of blazing fire, quite dazzling when looked at even from afar.

“This is also a new thing.” Xi Ping beckoned, summoning the spiritual image stamp by force. He was just about to grab hold of it when Zhou Ying knocked his hand aside with the discipline rod.

When Zhou Ying got a clear look at the picture on the stamp, his pupils abruptly contracted. “A spiritual image stamp?”

“You mean the brand that the southern mines used to stamp on the spiritual images of their subordinates?” Bai Ling was also startled. “Viscount, where did this come from?”

“It doesn’t matter where it comes from,” Xi Ping vaguely put him off, then raised the stamp across empty space. Showing off, he said, “This one I’ve got here is higher grade than the ones Liang Chen and the others were stamped with. It’s called a Dragon and Phoenix Symbolizing Good Fortune, and this is the ‘phoenix stamp’ of the pair, used for engagements. After you get it stamped, you belong to a person in life and death. The spiritual energy you use to scour your spiritual bones, even the essence you refine after establishing a foundation, half of everything goes to that person. Haha, pretty heinous, huh?”

Bai Ling didn’t know what he was so pleased about. He only had a premonition out of nowhere: the Viscount was perhaps about to get another beating.

The stamp was strongly repelled by Xi Ping, constantly trying to escape from his hands; evidently no one wanted to take him to wife by force.

Xi Ping shamelessly used brute strength to trap the stamp and said excitedly, “San-ge, I have an idea. If I can even steal this spiritual image stamp in its entirety, maybe I can also remove one from a spiritual image. Think about it, there are so many rogue cultivators with seals on them in Western Chu, if they knew...”

Zhou Ying interrupted him irritably: “If they knew about this, each and every one of them would want to kill you, do you believe that?”

Xi Ping froze, the hot blood that had risen to his head knocked down by his san-ge’s sentence.

Though Zhou Ying wasn’t his real older brother, he had been the nearest thing to it since they were little. Seeing him was like coming home. When a person came home, they would never be as astute as they were out in the world. Moreover, unlike his mortal parents, who needed care and protection, Zhou Ying was now a cultivator himself, and a fierce personage who had single-handedly stirred up all kinds of chaos. Things were already going pretty well if he wasn’t going out to destroy the world; there was no need for others to worry about him. In front of him, Xi Ping was always excessively relaxed, so much so that his intelligence degenerated somewhat. If he got hold of any new thing or learned any new skill, he would be impatient to put it on display. And because he was accustomed to reporting the good and not the bad, he would always inadvertently gloss over bad things.

True, Xi Ping thought, coming back to himself, I lost my head there.

If he dared to make a public announcement on the black market, saying that he could remove spiritual image brands, it would amount to putting up a brick wall in front of all the common cultivators who relied on “selling themselves” to join prestigious clans.

After all, the number of those who were forced into it like Zhao Qindan was small. The vast majority of people were willing when they took on spiritual image stamps. Even if some among them regretted it, they still absolutely wouldn't dare to show it. Otherwise, there were plenty of sycophants who would be only too eager to light up all the “traitors” to prove that they themselves were in the right acting as people's dogs.

Even if those established foundation masters whose Ways of the Heart were about to crumble wanted to remove their own brands, they still wouldn't want the institution of brands to disappear—these people had been bound up with certain big clans for centuries, most of them even changing their surname to their master's; they had long ago become a part of the family. They had a brand stamped on them, and at their command they also had several toadies stamped with brands that recognized them as master, each level pressing down on the next. If the institution of brands collapsed, wouldn't everything these people had suffered for centuries be wasted?

A technique for removing spiritual image brands was hotter to the touch than the noon sun while the brand was being stamped.

As soon as it got out, Wild Fox Country would become the target of public censure.

A chill went up Xi Ping's spine. At once, he separately sent word to both Wei Chengxiang and Xu Rucheng, asking them about the follow-up.

Xu Rucheng answered quickly, saying that everything had gone smoothly. The Zhao family was currently arranging a feast, seeming intent on playing music through the night. Xu Rucheng had witnessed the stamping ceremony up close, and it had made a significant impact on him. He babbled on, repeatedly wanting guarantees that the "young mistress" was in fact made of paper, not a real person.

But there was no word from Wei Chengxiang—she seemed to be doing something it would be inconvenient to have interrupted; she had blocked off the reincarnation wood amulet in her mustard seed.

Zhou Ying saw him calm down, and, knowing that he didn't lack for shrewdness, said nothing further. He only sized up the Law Breaker Bracelet and asked, "Are there limits to the consciousnesses you can bring in?"

“The ones I can contact...oh, anyone whose blood has touched reincarnation wood will do, whether they’ve spoken to me or not.”

It had worked with Zhao Qindan.

“Whether it makes a difference where their physical body is, I don’t know yet,” Xi Ping went on after considering. “But this place definitely isn’t impacted by national boundaries, and it’s outside the surveillance of the Sanyue Spiritual Mountains. People whose cultivation is higher than mine can also come in, but I suppose I couldn’t pull them in by force. They have to be willing.”

Shifu had come in, but shifu was different from others; after all, he had a sliver of his consciousness in the shard of Zhaoting. After deliberating for a while, Xi Ping had snatched up Lin Chi to try bringing him in.

“Oh, right,” Xi Ping said, recalling what he had done since getting the Law Breaker Bracelet, “I can bring things in, but others can’t, unless while I’m bringing their consciousness inside I ‘permit’ what they’re carrying to come in with them—excepting talismans, arrays, and inscriptions stamped on the consciousness.”

Zhou Ying waited patiently for him to finish speaking. “What else?”

“If you give me enough materials, I can duplicate immortal tools that I’ve brought in...though the grade of the immortal tool can’t surpass my cultivation level.”

He could also duplicate living people whose cultivation was lower than his—that, he didn’t dare to say; he was afraid san-ge would beat him.

Xi Ping said, “That’s about it...ow!”

He had hardly finished speaking before the discipline rod fell.

Zhou Ying was extremely perceptive, and Xi Ping had borrowed a paperman from him before, then had done the unthinkable and stolen a spiritual image inscription. Having heard that much, he had already guessed most of it. From noticing that something had happened to the water dragon pearl and learning that this joker’s physical body had for no reason at all ended up in Western Chu, he had traveled nonstop to cross the Xia River. Crossing the river and leaving the country, adding it all together, had taken less than a full day and night. To have been able in such a short time to do such impressive tinkering with the Law Breaker Bracelet, it was clear this rotten brat hadn’t delayed for a moment. Ever since appearing in the world, he hadn’t stopped looking for trouble.

Good grief, he’d been busy!

When Zhou Ying had been a mortal, he hadn't quite dared to take up arms unless he lost his temper. His heart and lungs couldn't keep up with his anger; he couldn't run through the streets brandishing a stick to drive away the dog like the Marquis. All he could do was constantly bring complaints and secretly keep accounts.

Now, with new grievances piled atop the old, he could finally even the score.

This was perhaps the only benefit cultivation had given him.

Xi Ping scrambled around, letting his san-ge beat him all the way out of the Law Breaker Bracelet, from his consciousness to his physical body.

As soon as Bai Ling came out, he skillfully hung himself on the wall and looked on indifferently, thinking: Well, what did I say?

Finally there was a bang; the discipline rod, unable to bear the torment of the toughness of a near-ascended spirit body, died a natural death.

Zhou Ying tossed the discipline rod aside. His arms ached. "Go pour me some tea."

Xi Ping flexed his neck and shoulders and glided out, feeling that this beating had been quite relaxing for the muscles and stimulating for the circulation. Afraid of angering san-ge, he still had to put on a pretense of being in a lot of pain, so he limped as he poured the tea.

Zhou Ying asked, “Apart from Xuanyin’s General Zhi and Peak Master Lin, have you seen anyone else since your true body came to Tao County?”

“Not yet... Oh, I saw a cookware repairman, though it was only in passing,” Xi Ping said. “Don’t worry, san-ge, I understand how things stand. Right now, the Law Breaker Bracelet is like a hidden realm. I’m the only one who can open it, and it’s safe. When the Luwu want to communicate something it’s inconvenient for others to know about, they’ll be able to come here to meet up.”

Zhou Ying treated this like a mouse’s squeaking, ignoring his boasting. He turned his head and ordered Bai Ling, “Make him a Luwu fake identity.”

Bai Ling—the painted immortal—changed from a painting back into a human. “It is already done.”

Saying so, he took out a file and handed it over. Xi Ping briefly flipped through it and saw that Bai Ling had made up the story of a righteous man who had been captured by evil cultivators in his youth, had been forced to enter the Way due to his unsurpassed natural talents, and later had left the darkness for the light and become a Kaiming Cultivator.

The plot was full of ups and downs, fascinating reading—a standard romance.

“Pick a name for yourself so you won’t forget to answer when people call it. You’ll be able to act in Tao County under this identity, and you’ll be able to use this as a foundation to make other disguises for yourself.” Zhou Ying paused, then said, “The Law Breaker Bracelet can indeed act as the Luwu’s hidden realm, but there’s no need to speak of it openly. The Luwu are also people who can’t see the light of day, anyway. It’s enough for it to be a mysterious place that they can take their guesses about. You must remember to change the furnishings here. You can’t easily leave Tao County now. Since you’re at the Snake King’s Immortal Palace, it’s best not to use the Snake King’s Immortal Palace, to keep anyone observant from guessing the location of the hidden realm—you can even use Guangyun Palace as your blueprint. Remember not to reveal anything connected to you. And if you let people in later, don’t let anyone see you.”

Xi Ping could be careful when he put his mind to it, though that was only when he was forced into it. Most of the time, he was somewhat blindly optimistic—“Try now, think later” was his usual bad habit, no matter how many times he took a tumble, remembering the good and not the bad.

The Law Breaker Bracelet had taken him out of the Impassable Sea, and he had lost no time developing a bunch of new ways to amuse himself. He had even played himself into a disaster once in the process. Now, his head was full of how to use the Law Breaker Bracelet to gather a hundred thousand white spirits before the fifteenth day of the eighth month; he really hadn't had time to make plans for anything else yet.

Xi Ping said, "...I see."

Zhou Ying knew that he was always winging things. He continued, "Originally, to make it more convenient for you to operate in Western Chu, some of the Luwu here received reincarnation wood to contact you with. Don't be impulsive and bring them in. It's the same thing—you can't let others realize that this hidden realm is connected to Tao County. Among the Luwu, no matter who tries to talk to you, ignore them all. Only let those carrying my token in here. Otherwise, there will be chaos.

"Also, Shiyong, remember," Zhou Ying said, becoming serious, "no matter what the situation, you can't appear under the identity of 'Tai Sui' in front of your motley friends or the mortals of Tao County. If you want to make friends with someone, change your identity. 'Tai Sui' used to be an empty figure, so let it remain empty forever."

Xi Ping blinked. Just then, he heard Zhi Xiu's voice in his ear: "Listen to your brother."

When Xi Ping had stolen the spiritual image stamp and exhausted his essence, he hadn't only disturbed the water dragon pearl; he had also disturbed Zhaoting.

Zhi Xiu wasn't a chatterbox, and he wasn't in the habit of talking about people behind their backs. But at the bottom of the Impassable Sea, he had seen everything Zhou Ying had done—to this day no one knew what Zhaoting would have done had Xi Ping been unable to stop his san-ge.

Seeing Zhou Ying appear, Zhi Xiu hadn't made a sound.

Xi Ping said, "Shifu?"

Zhi Xiu softly said, "Remember what I taught you with my sword aura in the East Sea? Shiyong, many have been universally censured without being despondent. Since time immemorial, nearly all men of virtue and integrity have achieved this. But those who have been universally praised without being persuaded are few. When everything conspires to push you to be the hero who saves the world, anyone's blood would boil... Do not be that hero, and certainly do not be a god."

Xi Ping froze, feeling that there was something hidden in his words.

But Zhou Ying seemed to sense something. Seemingly gentle, he lowered his eyelids and said with a false smile, “That’s General Zhi?”

“Pass along my respects to His Third Highness,” Zhi Xiu said very mildly.

“No matter what cause he had for establishing the Kaiming Department, at any rate he has given the wretched of the nation a place to shelter. That is a virtuous deed.”

Xi Ping: “...”

For some reason, he felt a little awkward.

Xi Ping gave a dry cough, then said, “Oh, yes, well... Shifu told me to give you his regards. He says you’ve done a great job with the Kaiming Department, san-ge, unprecedented before and unrivaled since, an unending virtuous achievement. You are already friends in spirit from afar, and if he gets the opportunity, he must invite you for a drink.”

Zhi Xiu: “...”

Am I deaf? Or dead?

Zhou Ying knew what Xi Ping was like. He laughed and didn't take any of this to heart. Posturing, he said, "This fiend is a walking calamity. I appreciate General Zhi looking after him."

Zhi Xiu said, "As I ought to."

The immortal of the snow-capped mountain and the demon of the deep sea collided across space. Then Zhou Ying stood and beckoned to Bai Ling.

"With General Zhi here, I have no further instructions to give," Zhou Ying said. "I'll have Bai Ling send you a token in a little while. This place is within Western Chu's borders. I cannot stay long... If you get over this one day, notify me in advance. I'll arrange to have someone take you beyond the Beijue Mountains. Xuanyin Mountain may not be able to follow you there. Why do you insist on looking after this nuisance in Chu?"

Having said this, he tossed down a bag of spiritual stones. As when he had come, he dissolved into mist and left.

Zhi Xiu inside Zhaoting seemed to have used up his energy. After saying these few sentences, he went to meditate as before.

Xi Ping didn't have anyone to speak to right now. All he could do in his loneliness was pick up the Luwu mask and start molding his face. He sent another message to Wei Chengxiang.

Unexpectedly, A-Xiang still hadn't taken out the reincarnation wood amulet.

Strange. A-Xiang was no young mistress who used osmanthus oil all over her hair and took half a day to bathe. What was she doing?

She must be in Yu Family Bend now. Whether she was in the Zhao family hidden realm or had infiltrated the Yu family, something might go wrong at any time. Why would she block off the reincarnation wood for so long?

With a thought, Xi Ping located Wei Chengxiang, picked a reincarnation wood tree not far from her, and made the tree move on its own—what had happened?

CHAPTER 109 - Unbound Knife (16)

All of Wei Chengxiang's attention seemed to be taken up by the ants on the mountain road. She didn't even spare the reincarnation wood a glance.

Both banks of the Xia River had entered autumn. The days were gradually growing shorter. The storm lanterns on the mountain road had lit up, casting ghostly shadows of the mountains and trees.

Enormous terraced fields of medicinal herbs were situated amid the mountains, yet there was also a clear distinction between them and the mountains. There was only one narrow path to the south, hanging treacherously between the medicinal herb fields and the nearest Sweet Cloud Peak. At its narrowest point, only two people could pass abreast. To either side was a bottomless cliff, and only crude ropes and iron chains to act as railings.

On a road like this, neither carriages nor beasts of burden could pass. They had to be taken on foot. After the herb collectors finished gathering the medical herbs, they had to carry them down from the mountains basket by basket. There were about a dozen to twenty people per group, walking side by side in two rows. The herb baskets on their backs were six to seven chi long, bearing down on them so that neither their heads nor their feet were visible. Each person held a rope, tying them together, in case they missed a step and lost their footing.

Zhao Qindan glanced over them, thinking, These people are so skinny.

Not the carefully maintained slenderness of a beauty, and not the wiry leanness of a martial artist who trained assiduously. The bony joints of the herb gatherers had thin skin like paper stretched over them. As they moved mechanically, they seemed about to break through the skin.

Like a group of hungry ghosts suffering their punishment in the underworld.

“Splendid sight, huh?” Wei Chengxiang smiled at the young mistress.

“These are the largest medicinal herb fields in the world presently.”

When a green ore field grew medicinal herbs year round, they would interact with mundane herbs, would gather in one place. Because of this, small-scale green ore fields were either surrounded by a water system or formed a small cliff. These green ore fields were too big. This was a blessed place, and also a dangerous one. After many earthquakes and landslides, they had taken on their current shape.

Zhao Qindan opened her mouth, about to say “Even if machinery can’t get through here, why don’t they use immortal tools to transport the medicinal herbs?”, but when the words came to her lips, she thought it sounded something like “Why don’t they eat meat if they don’t have rice?”, so she swallowed them.

“Immortal tools burn spiritual stones, and it’s hard to avoid wastage when an array transports things like spiritual stones or medicinal herbs,” Wei Chengxiang said calmly, as if she knew what she was thinking. “It’s not worthwhile. Comparatively speaking, human labor is cheapest.”

Zhao Qindan said, “Mortals can’t remain long in the vicinity of green ore fields. Medicinal herbs sap their vigor. In my...in Great Wan, all the green ore fields cycle between being planted and being left fallow. If they keep working like this night and day, can they live long?”

“If they’re healthy and strong enough, they should be able to live to thirty. That’s enough,” Wei Chengxiang said. “Chu’s common people aren’t waiting on Xuanyin Mountain’s Grand Selection. They won’t drag their feet on getting married until their twenties or thirties. They do it when they’re thirteen or fourteen. By the time the previous generation dies, the next generation is there to pick up.”

“What do they expect to get out of this...?”

“Money,” Wei Chengxiang said. “This awful Yu Family Bend has no land that can be planted. If you don’t work as an herb collector and go west to be a worker in the Moon Plated Gold factories, you’re still eating the Yu family’s food. Over there, an able-bodied worker’s monthly wages don’t amount to a string of copper coins. Converting to Wan currency, it’s no more than seven or eight hundred. Travel is difficult here, and grain is unbelievably expensive. A dan of millet...a dan⁷¹ of rice is close to two strings of coins. How can you get by? Working as an herb collector in the medicinal herb fields, if you’re nimble enough in your work, your monthly wage is five or six times greater. People fight over the positions.”

The young mistress who couldn’t do sums didn’t understand this at all. Never mind Chu currency, her only impression of Wan’s small coins was using them as the bases of shuttlecocks when she was little. It took her an age of calculating before she could get some idea. In spite of herself, she was disbelieving: “Just for that little bit of money? What’s wrong with saving up? You eat about half a dan of grain in one month, that’s for rice or wheat flour—and I know what millet is, don’t belittle me—if you substitute in mixed grains and millet, you’d still be able to get three or four jin per day. How many people must a family have if that’s not enough for them to eat?”

When she had been a mortal at home, once she had passed the age of growing taller, she would eat at most one or two liang of rice per meal. Even for her father, you would still only need to add half a bowl of rice. And once you got old, you had to stop eating in the afternoon to keep in good health.

Wei Chengxiang thought she was rather cute, and she wasn't in the mood to offer an explanation, so she let it go with a smile.

Just then, a cry came to them on the wind. Wei Chengxiang's eyes grew serious. She made a "quiet" hand gesture at Zhao Qindan.

In the midst of the green ore medicinal herb fields, there was a person with a speaking trumpet saying loudly: "The immortal mountains have been merciful. Since Tao County encountered a monster this year, fearing that the people's lives will be disturbed, they want to hurry up and manufacture a batch of restorative pills to give to the common people over there before Mid-Autumn. The main ingredient, the crystalline flower, is a specialty on our mountain. For the near future, the immortal mountains will pay double the price for the medicinal herbs they receive. Our employers are generous, so they'll double your wages, too. How often does a good thing like this come around? You can make money and accumulate merit, help the country and the people. I bet you're all going to laugh it up!"

In the valley, there was an echo of "laugh it up...laugh it up." An herb collector, whether tired or dazed or something, was so startled by this echo that his foot slipped, and he nearly fell down from the precipice.

Zhao Qindan gave a cry, bouncing up in alarm, almost tossing out a talisman across the distance. She only came to her senses when Wei Chengxiang reached out a hand to stop her.

Luckily there were about a dozen herb collectors tied together. If one lost his footing, he would soon be pulled back by his companions. But the basket on this person's back was knocked open, and two crystalline flowers fell to the bottom of the cliff.

The number and weight of the medicinal herbs the herb collectors carried on their backs had to be verified in the field and when they handed them over after leaving the mountain, to prevent theft. If the quantity didn't match, they had to compensate for it. But these were medicinal herbs. Dropping one little flower meant a whole year's work had been for nothing.

A half-immortal had good hearing. From far away, Zhao Qindan heard as that herb collector knelt on the ground and let out a wail like a dying cry. She broke out in gooseflesh. In that moment, she suspected that person was going to jump.

But the colleagues in his group weren't moved at all. Some were waiting with numb expressions, picking at their hands, some were annoyed that he was holding them up, grumbling and swearing at him, and some were patiently counseling him in low voices, telling that despairing herb collector that there was no use in howling. He was better off using that time to get up right now and make money.

Zhao Qindan held her breath. If that herb collector jumped off the cliff, she was ready to catch him. But that person didn't attempt suicide as she had expected. In hardly any time, he once again carefully righted the basket and tied it firmly. Limping, he went on to struggle for survival.

Zhao Qindan at last slowly let out a breath, feeling extremely disturbed. Her palms were even sweating.

But Wei Chengxiang didn't see anything unusual about this. She held down something on her chest and toward the empty air, speaking to herself, said, "Tai Sui, I've made inquiries in Yu Family Bend, and I've found that apart from distributing grain, Sanyue is also going to distribute a batch of restorative pills to Tao County. After taking them, the people will probably be able to make it through the Moon Shadow period. Do you think there is still a need for our spirit-gathering array?"

Xi Ping had been keeping an eye on the two of them through the reincarnation wood. He knew perfectly well that when Wei Chengxiang said this, she hadn't taken the reincarnation wood amulet out of her mustard seed at all...and moreover, she normally didn't speak aloud when she contacted him.

What was she doing?

Xi Ping quickly focused on her and saw that when Wei Chengxiang finished saying there was no need for the spirit-gathering array, next to her, Zhao Qindan's shadow shook unnaturally.

Wait, what was that?

Xi Ping was about to draw Zhao Qindan's consciousness into the Law Breaker, but he thought of Wei Chengxiang's peculiar behavior and held back.

The young mistress who had just been struggling to do a calculation got a dazed look in her eyes, a thought that didn't accord with her experiences appearing out of nowhere in her mind. She blurted out: "Really? They'd even exploit their own nearest and dearest to death. Would they really care about the lives of others?"

Wei Chengxiang seemed not to have expected that she could also catch on quickly sometimes. She turned her head to look at her in some astonishment.

Zhao Qindan said, “The sages of the Sanyue Mountains have Ways of the Heart, but the half-immortals under them don’t. I’ve heard plenty of things about how vile the reputation of Western Chu’s Qilin Guard is...”

Having said this, her voice paused involuntarily. A doubt flitted past. Zhao Qindan thought: I heard... What did I hear? Where did I hear it?

A voice in her mind answered her: Naturally it was in the Zhao family hidden realm, listening to the elders’ discussions.

It was as if a fog rose in Zhao Qindan’s head. She was confused for a moment, vaguely remembering that something like this really had happened. That third-rate imperial grandson was a relative of the Yu family by marriage. Before the wedding, the Zhao family would certainly want to find out all about his background.

So she went on, saying to Wei Chengxiang: “I’ll tell you another inside story. As medicinal herb sellers, the Yu family always treats people according to their position. They’ve already bought off the half-immortal herb purchasers. The herbs they sell to the immortal mountains are at top price but of second-rate quality. At least six parts of each dan is weeds. Since the immortal mountains are in such a hurry to have the materials this time, and the Yu family is even willing to double the herb gatherers’ wages, it’s clear they're going to reap even greater profits. The medicine makers—it's mostly open-eyed cultivators who make the elixirs given to mortals—they'll subcontract out, level after level, and in the end there's no saying what kind of lumps they'll end up with. And even so, those inferior pills will most likely eventually end up on the black market, to be sold to poor rogue cultivators like you."

Wei Chengxiang frowned and looked her over. "How do you know?"

"The Yu family nearly gave me a facial tattoo on my spiritual image, is there anything surprising about me knowing something about their dirty secrets?" Zhao Qindan raised her chin slightly, her eyes falling on the herb gatherers. Her haughty expression dimmed slightly. "In Heaven's Design Pavilion, there's a record. During Great Wan's era of Taiming, there was a great drought one year, leaving a thousand li of barren land, and the court sent people to provide disaster relief. The outcome was that more than half the grain meant to give relief was mixed with grit. If it hadn't been discovered by a senior from Heaven's Design Pavilion who was passing by, there's no saying how long it would have been concealed. And as for this awful Western Chu—they're already doing pretty well if they have grit to eat. How can they expect elixirs? I advise you and the one behind you not to rely on that."

Just then, Wei Chengxiang's shadow also moved. Her clear gaze became hazy.

A thought arose in her mind: Right. If Sanyue could be relied upon, Tao County wouldn't have ended up with an evil cultivator as its local tyrant. If Tai Sui really does have a means for removing spiritual image brands, then isn't that an achievement of boundless virtue? When those big families who prey on the people have lost their watchdogs, how will they continue their tyranny? And those hundred thousand white spirits will be taken care of.

In fact, she ought to facilitate this business.

As she thought this, Wei Chengxiang unconsciously felt around for the mustard seed hanging in front of her chest, wanting to take out the reincarnation wood that was sealed in there. Just as her fingertips were about to reach into the mustard seed, they were knocked numb by a prohibition.

The fingers connect to the heart. Wei Chengxiang, her expression unchanging, sucked in a breath: Wait, why would I have put a prohibition on my mustard seed?

Just then, the railcar for transporting the medicinal herbs was fully loaded by the workers. It rattled and clanked, spouting steam, and began to run along the Moon Plated Gold tracks that wound like a snake. Two huge carriage lamps swept over, making the shadows of the two young women hiding in the darkness slide quickly, as if they wanted to plunge into their bodies.

The trees nearby were shaken by the railcar and rustled a few times.

Wei Chengxiang raised her eyes, and another thought invaded her mind: I've been getting more and more paranoid over the years.

Next to her, Zhao Qindan spoke as though to herself: "Deliberately driving down the wages at the Moon Plated Gold factories, levying exorbitant road tolls, irrigating their medicinal herb fields with human vigor and blood, storing up spiritual image brands used to make slaves... I've heard that the head of the Yu family is only an open-eyed cultivator who used spiritual stones and medicinal herbs to force his spiritual eyes open and can't draw so much as half a talisman. What do they have that's so great?"

They relied only on their ancestor having been ruthless enough and lucky enough to have controlled a genius who was at that time just at his lowest point, such that hundreds of years later, a whole family of vermin could lie upon a mountain of gold tyrannizing everyone around them. And the servant who had been forced to sell himself back then had changed overnight, becoming himself a royal kinsman, a high-ranking official of a prominent family!

The lofty mansions, the tremendous wealth and rank, all depended on a single spiritual image brand.

If only...

Wei Chengxiang snapped her fingers, released the prohibition on the mustard seed, and pulled out the reincarnation wood. “Senior!”

In the most secluded little courtyard in Yu Family Bend, a pair of slightly bloodshot eyes opened. Yu Chang laughed: so that was it.

He’d been wondering how it was possible for someone to use their consciousness to communicate. It turned out that this was the communication token this mysterious “Tai Sui” used to contact his subordinates. This little girl was hardly full-grown, but she was very shrewd. She’d been forced to put on an act this whole time, and she’d been unusually hard to deal with.

But no matter how clever she was, as long as she had a desire, there would be a crack in her mind. Never mind a paltry little half-immortal, not even an established foundation could escape his Shadow Speaker technique.

Yu Chang exhaled softly. Wei Chengxiang and Zhao Qindan were unnoticeably wrapped up in a mustard seed. This time, neither of the two young women full of indignation noticed.

Wei Chengxiang involuntarily spoke aloud the words she was using to communicate through her consciousness: "...I know that stealing an incomplete spiritual image stamp isn't the same thing as removing a brand that's been there for centuries, but this Yu Chang seems to think you can do it. Senior, don't you think you should see him? Oh...all right, I know it's not convenient for you, so I'll act as intermediary. Yu gave me a communication token..."

The moonlight was momentarily blocked by the clouds. The people and the trees were submerged in darkness. Wei Chengxiang's hand holding the reincarnation wood amulet turned dark, and a "shadow" burrowed into the amulet.

"Let me see what kind of divinity this Tai Sui who has taken over Wild Fox Country is."

He chased the aura inside the reincarnation wood amulet, and at a glance saw at the end of the trail a middle-aged man who looked about the same as the Tai Sui divine image that Tao County had worshipped before. He was inside the Snake King's Immortal Palace.

An established foundation...no, higher, a near-ascended spirit.

It turned out there was such a hidden talent in little Wild Fox Country... Wonderful.

Found you. I'll be there in no time.

Greed appeared on Yu Chang's face. His bloodshot eyes became even redder. In that moment, he seemed only a step away from losing his mind.

His figure flashed, and he flew off in the direction of Tao County.

Xi Ping, who had fashioned the Luwu mask into the appearance of the Tai Sui divine image, had no idea that he had already been spotted. After finishing his conversation with Wei Chengxiang, he took the phoenix stamp out of the Law Breaker to examine it.

The phoenix stamp he had trapped kept wanting to run off toward the northeast—northeast was the direction of Yu Family Bend. There seemed to be something there attracting it.

If his guess was right, the phoenix stamp probably wanted to go find Zhao Qindan.

A spiritual image and a spiritual image stamp were a pair. This made Xi Ping remember Liang Chen.

Back then, Liang Chen had had his mind set on removing the brand on his spiritual image, and his method had been very thought-provoking: he had gone around swindling people whose spiritual image was similar to his into being his believers, making them swear blood oaths to offer up their “life while living, body after death, what they had grown to this day, their future spirit and primordial being,” so he could switch to a shell that had been offered up to be seized whenever he wanted to.

Even if his true body had become useless, wouldn't it have been enough to seize another body once? Why would he have to prepare so many backups?

Even with special powers that could let him seize multiple bodies, the experience certainly couldn't have been pleasant. Each time you occupied another person's spirit, your own risk of losing your mind would increase, and your consciousness would involuntarily be influenced by the body. With Liang Chen's impartiality between men and women, Xi Ping couldn't imagine how he would have changed after a whole round of seizing bodies. In spite of himself, he broke out in gooseflesh.

Just then, his spiritual sense was suddenly touched. He noticed that he had been saying what he was thinking aloud.

Xi Ping flung out a hand. “Who’s there!”

The mustard seed that had wrapped around him at some point tore at once. A white-clothed man landed in front of him and smiled at him. “This extraordinary individual you mention who could seize bodies repeatedly truly did want to use this method to remove his spiritual image brand—reasonably speaking, each time he seized a body, a bit of the brand would be scrubbed away by a very similar spiritual image. After ‘rinsing’ repeatedly like this a hundred thousand times, perhaps he really could have escaped that slave’s brand. Though the outcome definitely wouldn’t match up to an identical spiritual image... I have looked forward to meeting you for a long time, Grand Duke Tai Sui.”

CHAPTER 110 - Unbound Knife (17)

Xi Ping's whole body was immediately wrapped in a layer of spiritual energy. Faint light emerged from all his exposed skin. The spiritual light filled and leveled all the creases and ravines in his old face. From a distance, he looked like an old eunuch who had powdered his face.

This tender-skinned Tai Sui radiated light in all directions, completely dispersing his shadow. A beam of spiritual energy within the shadow that had no place to go was forced out, brushing past him as it flew away.

However small a mosquito was, it was still flesh. Xi Ping made a grab, seizing the spiritual energy before it could disperse.

“There's a priceless treasure on Wild Fox Country's black market called the grit worm. It's said that if you put this thing in a person's shadow, you can infect a person's consciousness and spirit without seizing their body.” Xi Ping's faded mustache turned up. With a fake smile, he said, “When their price is pushed up to the highest, they go for three liang of white spirits each. I suppose I've gotten off lightly today.”

A near-ascended spirit evil cultivator had evaded the search of Sanyue's shed skin beside Qiu Sha's corpse. He was certainly a remarkable figure.

Yu Chang had only been probing slightly. He hadn't been expecting to succeed. With his method seen through, his expression remained unchanged. He said, smiling, "The grit worm is only a crude kind of bone-sharing talisman, even lower grade than a spirit-sharing talisman. All you can do with it is use the power of the person who drew the talisman once. How well it works depends entirely on the cultivation level of the person using the talisman. Where do you get that it can 'infect a spirit'? Even I can't do that, so how could those open-eyed and established foundation cultivators who need to borrow powers? That's all claptrap made up by vile people to drive up the price. How could you believe it?"

"Perhaps carving out your own Snake King's Immortal Palace in another person's spirit is a little difficult for Your Excellency, but it's all too easy for you to imperceptibly influence a person's mind." As Xi Ping sneered, he made the protective spiritual energy around him thicker and thicker, expanding into a human-shaped gas lamp...until he had even dazzled his own eyes.

"If a half-immortal uses this three liang of white spirits grit worm, they can change a person's likes and dislikes unnoticed; an established foundation using it is even more remarkable—as long as they lead someone along properly, they can make the most absurd notion take root and blossom; and that's to say nothing of you, Your Excellency. I suppose that a miser would ruin himself for you, and even a chaste woman devoted to a dead husband's memory would fall head over heels for you?"

"Then you certainly have nothing to worry about, Tai Sui. As far as I know, your debts outweigh your fortune. As for 'falling head over heels'..." Yu Chang eyed his radiant, precious body, involuntarily blinking several times before he could look at it directly. Politely, he said, "There will certainly be no need for that."

Xi Ping: "..."

What was this little pretty boy playing at? Never mind playing a dirty trick as soon as he walked in, he also dared to ridicule him by calling him poor and ugly?!

Yu Chang kindly said, "I have come here because I sincerely wish to work with you, Tai Sui."

"No deal," Xi Ping responded coldly. "I don't know how to remove spiritual image stamps. Even if you plant a hundred thoughts in my consciousness, I still won't be able to do it. And if I could, I still wouldn't help you. I can see that you're bad news."

Saying so, he took a bowl of tea from somewhere, raised it, and lifted the lid. A beam of austere spiritual energy bearing a sword aura rushed straight at Yu Chang's chest.

Yu Chang actually didn't dare to meet it head on at first. In an instant, he had retreated out the door. A long spike appeared in his hands, held out horizontally in front of his chest. There was a clank, as if it had knocked against a sword. Yu Chang's hands went numb. In spite of himself, he was amazed: this person actually seemed to have slightly outdone him!

Fortunately, as the person behind the "Snake King," Tai Sui wasn't about to destroy his den. He had picked up the tea only to see off his guest. The spiritual energy dispersed at a touch.

Yu Chang staggered before finding his footing. He restrained his smile and said seriously, "Since Tai Sui has perceived my cultivation level, I suppose you will also be able to make allowances for the difficulty I find myself in. Had I not been forced to it, I truly would not have come as an uninvited guest."

Saying so, he wiped his hand over his face, rubbing away a bit of camouflage over his features, revealing a pair of red eyes that seemed to be suffering from conjunctivitis. As he spoke, his features were already twitching uncontrollably. His lips were constantly turning up, as if he couldn't suppress a smile, but the look in his eyes was oppressively violent, and his eyeballs seemed to have split up, unwilling to point in the same direction.

The most beautiful countenance couldn't stand up to an expression like this. This originally exquisite face looked freakish and strange. Xi Ping broke out in gooseflesh.

But Yu Chang's speech was as composed as before: "You must have perceived that I am now only a thread away from losing my mind. I must cover up the truth of this face before I dare to go out in public—my only hope is to remove the brand on my spiritual image. A person never looks very attractive when clutching at a last straw. If I have been rude, I hope very much you will be magnanimous enough to pardon it."

He seemed on the verge of collapse. Anyone with a bit of practical experience knew that a trapped beast shouldn't be captured and a cornered foe shouldn't be pursued, to avoid driving them into a dead end and causing them to hurt others as well as themselves.

Xi Ping hesitated. His tone unconsciously softened somewhat. "Go on, then."

Yu Chang saluted him in gratitude. “What you placed on the Zhao family’s altar wasn’t a living person but a fake person made of paper, am I correct in saying that?”

The paperman was Bai Ling’s, and Bai Ling’s cultivation level wasn’t as high as this lunatic’s. It made sense that he would have seen through it. Xi Ping smiled, neither confirming nor denying.

Yu Chang’s uncontrollable features gradually displayed fierce yearning, like a wild beast that hadn’t eaten flesh in a thousand years. But the wilder his expression became, the quieter and slower his voice was.

This frightening willpower truly made one tremble with fear to see.

“That paperman had a consciousness in it. I do not know how Your Excellency did it. It actually tricked the stamping spike—if not for the fact that that consciousness couldn’t be invaded by the grit worm, I nearly would have made a mistake and thought that you had used some secret art to trap Young Mistress Zhao’s own consciousness inside it,” Yu Chang said. “I would like to request Tai Sui to create a paperman like that, with me as a base.”

Xi Ping said curiously, “Can a paperman completely remove a spiritual image brand? Even if a brand can be worn away by a similar spiritual image...even if we say that the paperman has a consciousness identical to yours...can it completely wipe clean the brand on your spiritual image?"

Yu Chang was silent for a moment, then summoned the long spike he had just used to shield himself—examined closely, this long spike was identical to the “stamping spike” used to stamp a spiritual image brand, except it didn’t have as many inscriptions on it as the stamping spike.

“This is my vital weapon. Its name...its name is Engraved Heart.” The corners of Yu Chang’s eyes, which had before held an ominous glint, now began to twitch as though he were suffering immense pain. This made his speech somewhat incoherent. He shattered a spiritual stone and absorbed it through his palm, then finally managed to catch his breath. “Hss... I won’t conceal it from you, the majority of Yu Family Bend’s stamping spikes were made by me.”

Xi Ping listened intently, meanwhile holding an incomplete talisman in his hand—making stamping spikes evidently violated Yu Chang’s Way of the Heart. Every mention of it made his Way of the Heart undulate. Xi Ping was afraid that he would explode mid-sentence.

“The technique of making stamping spikes is called the ‘piercing art.’ If you want, Tai Sui, I can pass it on to you...well, as long as you aren’t worried that doing too many wicked things will harm your Way of the Heart.” As Yu

Chang spoke, his teeth chattered slightly. “You can understand each stamping spike as a special ‘bridge’, specially made to match a spiritual image. This ‘bridge’ can only lead to a specially designated spiritual image. At wu hour precisely, the inscriptions on the stamping spike connect to the sunlight, and the burning sun must cross the ‘bridge’ to be able to reach a person’s spirit and consciousness and form a brand. I only need to make another stamping spike and alter the inscriptions on it to become their reverse, then at wu hour precisely, simultaneously pierce the stamping spike through myself and the paperman—this way, I will be like the midday sun, and the paperman will become the one to be branded. It ought to be able to draw away the ‘raging fire’ on my spiritual image in its original form... I haven’t tried it, but trying it out has no downsides for you, does it?”

It took Xi Ping a great deal of effort to keep his expression serious. Inwardly, he was slapping his thigh and secretly wondering, “Can you really do that?!”

Glittering, he maintained his elderly and experienced posture and nodded, unmoved. “The thought is an interesting one, though making an identical fake consciousness sounds a little ridiculous.”

Yu Chang said gravely, “Yu Family Bend will be yours.”

His voice was low and deep. These words nearly echoed. Xi Ping abruptly raised his eyes.

Yu Chang stared fixedly at his subtle expressions and said, “I have wavered for many years between my Way of the Heart and my brand. My Way of the Heart has been gravely damaged. After removing the brand, I will go into seclusion to heal. I will not appear in the human world again for at least a hundred years. The offerings Yu Family Bend has supported, a map of the inscriptions and arrays at the main residence, the contents of the treasury... even my own identity, I can give it all to you, Tai Sui, just like you stealthily substituted in a false Zhao Qindan. Never mind a paltry hundred thousand white spirits, after this, you’ll possess endless medicinal herbs, rows of Moon Plated Gold factories, all at your disposal.”

Xi Ping’s throat moved involuntarily. A hundred thousand white spirits, and he called that “paltry.”

Yu Chang’s words were like a heart demon come knocking, every word and sentence striking the bottom of his heart. “Yu Family Bend is a close neighbor of Tao County, and the two places can perfectly complement each other. One is rich in resources, the other has easy travel, and they’ll both be yours. With your methods, perhaps you will be able to contend against the Sanyue Spiritual Mountains in the future. I want to see how far you can go.”

Medicinal herbs were the basis of elixirs, and Moon Plated Gold was a nation's lifeline. Adding Tao County enveloped in the Law Breaker Bracelet... If he wanted to overturn the spiritual mountains, he could learn methods and refine his cultivation, but resources he couldn't get no matter what.

He only needed to make a paperman, only needed to let this Yu Chang come in...

Just then, there was a stabbing pain in Xi Ping's ears, making him give a start and come back to his senses, his thoughts breaking off at once—he had copied several of the “protective” inscriptions on Zhao Qindan's consciousness in advance and had hidden one on each of his eyes and ears. Now, the inscriptions in his ears had suddenly been touched, and he found that the thick spiritual energy shell around him had at some point sprung a leak!

This Yu Chang didn't use “grit projections.” All he needed to do was to open his mouth and speak, and he could tamper with a person unnoticed.

Xi Ping reached out and plucked in midair. It was as if an invisible qin in the air made a sharp sound, bouncing back Yu Chang's voice with spiritual energy hidden inside it. At the same time, the spiritual energy at his fingertips turned into a needle, picking a ball of grey smoke out of his ear.

This ball of smoke was about to run away as soon as it saw the light, but Xi Ping squeezed it in his hand and dispersed it.

The spiritual energy flowing over Xi Ping's body suddenly became even thicker. As if Yu Chang had been prepared, he made a seal with both hands, setting off a dazzling talisman, knocking away the qin music, which was bearing down on him like the inescapable net of heaven.

Yu Chang laughed aloud. "Those who can resist threats are many, but those who can resist the lure of gains are few. Very well, fellow cultivator, what strong willpower!"

Saying so, he raised his hand and smoothed out his horrifying warped features; at once, he became serene. No sooner had he spoken than he was several zhang away, landing on the rooftop of one of the Snake King's Immortal Palace's halls. Ignoring the biting cold spiritual energy, Yu Chang glanced toward the northeast—the direction of Yu Family Bend—and quietly said, "That being the case, I can rest assured in handing Yu Family Bend over to you."

There was a drone, and the Tai Sui Qin's music came to an abrupt halt. Several notes that had turned into sharp blades dispersed one chi away from the white-clothed man. The spiritual energy blew aside his stray loose hairs.

Two aged and weary eyes appeared on the young face. He held a yellowed volume in his hand that was called The Piercing Art.

Yu Chang let go, and the volume flew up in front of Xi Ping.

“For you,” Yu Chang said. “You’re welcome to go find someone to try out the method of removing spiritual images that I told you about. If it works, it can be the last thing I do for my brothers.”

Xi Ping glanced at the book. Worried that he was playing some trick, he didn’t hastily accept it.

Yu Chang ignored him, continuing to speak: “The technique of spiritual image brands has circulated among the important people of Western Chu for thousands of years. Bad habits are the hardest to break. The fact that brands can be removed must not be allowed to get out, or else it will bring you trouble. I have a group of little brothers, all of whom had no choice when they were young but to take on brands when they reached a dead end. All of these people found their own Ways of the Heart through hard work. They ought to have gone far along the path of cultivation. But with the brand, they are instead even more at risk of losing their minds than those thieves who steal others’ Ways of the Heart. I’ll have them swear a heart demon oath to keep them from revealing the secret. If the technique for removing the brands succeeds, help them out—you won’t be helping for nothing. All these people have established foundation level cultivation. They are the ‘offerings’ that form the backbones of big families everywhere. They can all help you.”

Xi Ping frowned. With the vulgar face of Tai Sui, he looked like a big firefly in the night.

Yu Chang sighed. “Won’t you save some spiritual stones and put out your lamp for a while? You’re going to give me black wind cataracts.”⁷²

Holding a string of the Tai Sui Qin, Xi Ping said with a sneer, “What kind of story are you going to spin for me this time?”

“No story.” Yu Chang waved a hand. “You can believe me or not. If you won’t help, then let’s drop it. Anyway, I’ve passed the technique on to you, you can handle it as you like. It’s not hard to do. Even if I hadn’t given it to you, you would have been able to find out about it somewhere else. If you want to use it to commit sins, it won’t be on my head.”

Xi Ping’s fingers relaxed slightly. He felt that this old pretty boy sounded like he was delivering his last words.

“I’ve spent many years working hard to prop up my Way of the Heart, and I’ve exhausted my resources. Even if the brand can be removed, it’s already too late. I can only say that it's unfortunate I didn't meet you sooner...

Sadly I can't live to see this evil practice destroyed."

"Wait," Xi Ping couldn't resist calling him back, "why did you take on the brand in the first place?"

Yu Chang had been about to leave. Hearing this, he paused. With some effort, he recalled for a moment. "It's been centuries. It's a pretty long story."

Xi Ping didn't respond. Suspended in midair, he held the Tai Sui Qin, which he had transformed into a ball of white mist, on his knees. He plucked out a few notes, as if urging him to continue.

"Back then, Yu Family Bend was still called Precious Jade Bend, split up and ruled by a number of noble families. My family background was humble. My parents were law-abiding commoners. Because my mother had the misfortune to be somewhat attractive in her youth, when I was six years old, my family met a fatal disaster."

Hearing this introduction, Xi Ping was a little disappointed. "What, a lordling coveting a common girl?"

“That’s a ballad,” Yu Chang said with a laugh. “What kind of lordling would look twice at a village woman? It wasn’t a lordling, it was a coachman.”

Xi Ping froze.

The white-clothed man went on dully: “The coachman suffered some petty annoyance in his master’s house and got drunk. In his drunkenness, he encountered my mom bringing food to my dad. He said some filthy things to her, and my dad happened to overhear. They fought. The coachman was lame. He had never been considered by a matchmaker, and he spent all day being bossed around. After leaving, he couldn’t get over it, so he found out where my house was, and in the middle of the night he brought lamp oil and set a fire. There was a drought that year, and the direction of the wind just happened to be bad. The fire burned half the village, and the coachman himself died.”

At this point, Yu Chang said with a laugh, “Masters with Ways of the Heart never deliberately imperil the common people. The ones with bottomless greed are the half-immortals. Half-immortals also rarely make trouble for mortals, unless there’s some profit in it—just like no one but small children will chase after ants to step on them. The wealthy and the noble are all racing toward the immortal mountains. Where would they find the time to torment beasts of burden? The killers are all the dog-butcherers in the neighboring village. My family, they were the butchered dogs.

“When I was on the point of death, Steward Yu just happened to be passing by with two half-immortal offerings. He ordered those two seniors to put out the fire and rescue the victims. So I lived. I had been burned so badly there wasn’t a bit of intact skin on me. My lungs were destroyed. He saw that even so I wasn’t willing to die, so he ordered them to give me half an elixir pill. But while the pill could save my life, I would still be a cripple covered in scars from then on. I knew there was only one way for me to survive. On the point of death, I desperately held him back. He placed a spiritual image brand on me, gave me a small bag of spiritual stones, and conveyed me onto the path of cultivation.”

Xi Ping was stunned silent for a moment, becoming somewhat more respectful in spite of himself. “How old did you say you were then? When did you open your spiritual eyes?”

“Six years old. I opened my spiritual eyes a little over half a year later,” Yu Chang said. “There were too many people who wanted to join Steward Yu. Mortals who hadn’t opened their spiritual eyes were only given half a year. Due to my youth, I was given a few extra months. That was already extraordinary treatment. Our lives depended our master’s single thought. If we wanted any resources, we had to fight for them ourselves. No one dared to slack off.”

Xi Ping: “...”

Comparatively speaking, others ought to die—he ought to die, so the third-rate imperial grandson who reportedly hadn’t made a bit of progress in eight years since entering the inner sect ought to be in the lowest level of hell.

“Yu... Fellow Cultivator, yours is a singular talent, something I have rarely seen in my life,” Xi Ping couldn’t resist saying. “If not for the spiritual image brand, you would have been an ascended spirit...no, I figure you would have been a shed skin by now.”

“Without that spiritual image brand, I’d have reincarnated a couple dozen times by now.” Yu Chang laughed easily. “The brands are an evil practice, but to this day I remain grateful to Steward Yu. Had I not been pushed to an impasse, personally, I wouldn’t want to betray my master’s family... Even though their conduct in Yu Family Bend has been...”

Having said this much, he shook his head and stopped talking. His unwillingness to speak evil of people behind their backs made Xi Ping think of his shifu. Then he saw Yu Chang salute him and vanish in a flash of white.

Xi Ping momentarily felt a little lost. The Tai Sui Qin poured out a stream of notes. He reached out a hand to take that yellowed old volume.

But the moment he touched the book, there was a sudden change.

CHAPTER 111 - Unbound Knife (18)

The spiritual energy enveloping Xi Ping was wildly sucked away by that book.

He was a consummate established foundation, and he had just “eaten his fill” of spiritual stones. He had thought his essence was as plentiful as could be; he could swim from the North Sea to the South Sea in a single breath. But in the blink of an eye, better than half of it was sucked away by that lousy book.

After all these years and all the tribulations he had passed through, he still hadn't escaped his predestined fate of being sucked dry as soon as he opened a book!

Xi Ping snatched a sharp noise like tearing silk out of the Tai Sui Qin. A twang swept out, but it was knocked back. That note like the point of a sword stabbed right at him.

Above the ancient volume that had drained Tai Sui halfway, an identical Tai Sui Qin emerged out of thin air!

The note sliced off a lock of Xi Ping's hair. He dodged desperately, his pupils contracting slightly: on his guard against Yu Chang, he hadn't allowed the Tai Sui Qin to appear at all. He had kept the qin either hidden in the bones of his fingers or wrapped in a layer of mist, yet the book had been able to copy it perfectly like this. Even the name engraved on it was absolutely clear!

With a soft laugh, that bastard Yu Chang said into his ear, “Nice qin.”

Next, the copied qin hanging over the book sounded automatically, returning the attacks Xi Ping had just used against Yu Chang in perfect detail.

Xi Ping’s killing move wasn’t something he had created purely on his own. He had been imitating the sword energy Zhi Xiu had placed with him back then... It was a slipshod mockup, and, with some self-awareness, he had picked out a name for this move. It was called “Anger Shifu to Death.”

But however slipshod, it was still a sword move inherited from a sword god. It was hard to say whether it would anger shifu to death, but it wouldn’t have much problem slicing Xi Ping himself to death!

Apart from some motley unorthodox practices, this was the sum total of the moves Xi Ping knew, and that wicked book had stolen it. And he had to protect the surroundings. He couldn’t wreck the Snake King’s Immortal Palace, the bit of property it had taken him so much effort to acquire. For a moment, there was too much for him to attend to; he was truly hard pressed.

Even worse, when his spiritual energy became sparser, Xi Ping stopped being lit up!

His shadow and wrinkles, like a fire that couldn't be contained by paper, all appeared in unison as the dazzling radiance dimmed.

His shadow, infected by the grit worm, twisted and changed shape, backlashing against its originator, wrapping around Xi Ping and tying his arms behind his back.

Yu Chang imperceptibly emerged from the shadows and sent some spiritual energy out from his fingertips. All the reincarnation wood trees in sight were destroyed.

Before Xi Ping's consciousness could flee toward the reincarnation wood, he was enveloped by a mustard seed.

“I saw that young lady using reincarnation wood to contact you. In the interest of safety, it's best to act first,” Yu Chang said directly into his ear. “Tell me, what's special about reincarnation wood?”

Xi Ping's mind buzzed. He nearly spoke the truth. Fortunately, the sturdiness of his consciousness far surpassed cultivators of the same level as him. He put a stop to that thought at the last moment and said with a cold laugh, "Ha, I was just thinking, how could a crooked schemer like you have a perfectly straight club for a vital weapon?"

Flustered, he revealed a trace of his original accent.

"Wow, what a genuine Jinping accent. Sounds like it comes from the lap of luxury," Yu Chang said, laughing. "The grit projection is a minor achievement. The Engraved Heart stamping spike is only for the purpose of fooling others. Those who know of my Discard the False and Keep the True are no longer in the land of the living... If you sold that information, you'd probably be able to raise a hundred thousand white spirits."

Xi Ping was stunned by his boasting. "If Your Excellency had been willing to cultivate the way of shamelessness, you likely would have attained miraculous powers by now."

Yu Chang didn't squabble with him to get the last word in. The shadow wrapped around Xi Ping crawled up bit by bit. The talismans Xi Ping had used, the arrays he had drawn, every sliver of spiritual energy that had passed through his meridians was dug up, displayed in perfect detail for Yu Chang to see.

“You keep yourself well hidden,” Yu Chang said feelingly. “In order to conceal your lineage and history, despite clearly having near-ascended spirit cultivation, all the talismans you use are half-immortal grade. The attention to detail is impeccable.”

Xi Ping: “...”

Disgraceful! This red-eyed rabbit hadn't only schemed against him, he was also mocking him!

Following the shadow, Yu Chang's speech seeped word by word and sentence by sentence into Xi Ping's consciousness: “The technique of removing brands is a source of disaster, and duplicating living people is an even greater taboo. Aren't you afraid that if this gets out, you'll come to a bad end? You'd be better off giving it to me. I'll go down into that hell for you.”

“In exchange for such great kindness,” Xi Ping said angrily, grinding his teeth, struggling fiercely as the talismans he formed in his hand were dispersed before they could take shape, “do you want me to pledge to marry you?”

Yu Chang paused strangely. His tone involuntarily became somewhat more serious. "I know you're wearing a spiritual image mask. If you really are a woman, don't joke like that."

"Are you crazy?" said Xi Ping. "You..."

As he spoke, the shadow climbed up to his face and found the connecting point of the spiritual image mask.

Spiritual energy coated Yu Chang's fingertips. He tore off the spiritual image mask.

The stooped and wizened, vulgar-faced "Tai Sui" swore; the latter half of his sentence changed pitch. His limbs abruptly unfolded. Before this person's form was visible, a scent assailed the nostrils.

Yu Chang froze. Beneath the spiritual image mask, there really was a tall and slender woman!

As if he had taken fright, he backed up several steps, putting distance between himself and "Tai Sui," cautiously drawing back the hand he had just used to touch "Tai Sui"'s face. His eyes were drawn by that woman's features.

This woman might have had poor vision or clumsy hands. She had blindly smeared thick makeup all over her face, red here and green there, and despite all this still looked quite human; clearly her looks weren't bad. Yu Chang struggled to distinguish the outlines of the features hidden by the uneven powder. He thought she looked familiar. The next moment, he gave a start: how come this person seemed to be Zhao Qindan?

Wasn't that young mistress hiding out in Yu Family Bend?

No, this was wrong, could this really also be a...

But it was already too late. In the moment that Yu Chang's attention was distracted by that heavily made-up face, the spiritual image mask he held in his hand broke apart—there was a binding talisman behind the mask, of ascended spirit grade!

He had just successfully tricked "Tai Sui" into taking that Discard the False and Keep the True, and only a moment later, his fortunes had reversed.

With the binding talisman on him, all of Yu Chang's essence instantly stagnated. He couldn't move a sliver of it. Without a supply of spiritual energy, the Discard the False and Keep the True book fell right into Tai Sui's hand. That person reached out to smack it, and the traces vanished off that book. Yu Chang felt his vital weapon "disappear" as it lost contact with him.

At the same time, the shadow wrapped around “Tai Sui” also lost power. “Tai Sui” slipped out of it and made a grab up high. There was a low, buzzing qin note, which sliced toward Yu Chang’s hand from a few steps away.

In a flash, Yu Chang, having no way out, took out a tinderbox and lit himself on fire!

This person didn’t seem to be made of flesh and blood, but rather a ball of cotton soaked in lamp oil. The moment the small flame of the tinderbox, which wouldn’t necessarily have lit a pipe on first try, touched his body, it leapt up with a roar into a fire taller than a man.

Yu Chang was trapped by the binding talisman and couldn’t use spiritual energy, but he could use self-immolation to “cook” the spiritual energy out. This fire that used his flesh and blood for kindling instantly formed a shield. The qin notes bearing sword aura hit the shield head on and actually rebounded.

Yu Chang’s hair and skin were quickly charred by the flames. In an instant, he was beyond recognition. On the point of extinction, the color of the flames approached gold. This ruthless person roared, then actually escaped the binding talisman that was of a higher cultivation level than him. A fireball carrying spiritual energy opened a line of retreat for him. The “Tai Sui” facing him seemed to be extremely averse to fire. He scrambled hastily out of the way.

Yu Chang wasn’t set on continuing the fight. Once he got free, he peeled the raging flames burning him off his body and got on his sword to flee.

But the qin music wasn’t willing to let him go. It came from all sides, chasing him like his own shadow.

This “Tai Sui”’s music changed from the sharp and harsh mode of a sword cultivator from before; at first, the music sounded straightforward and mild, but the final notes had a befuddling sinister air to them. When the music began, the forms of countless “Tai Sui”’s crowded around from all sides, all of them papermen.

In a moment of desperation, Yu Chang tossed out the fireball he had peeled off himself. Ring after ring of papermen surrounding him touched the fire and went up in flames, flickering in midair.

In the starless, moonless night, the ashes of burning paper filling the sky looked like they belonged to a preposterous funeral.

Yu Chang, who had nearly exhausted his essence, couldn't go on. His vision went black, and he fell from the sky, falling into a river by the border of Tao County.

The river quickly extinguished the embers of his flames and swept him toward its lower reaches. Next he was stopped by a reincarnation wood tree laying across the water. When the coarse tree branches stopped the man who had nearly burned to coal, they tore his flesh open. Pus and blood stained the whole tree. Xi Ping's consciousness, hidden in the reincarnation wood tree, probed Yu Chang's spirit, which was on its last gasp.

“Caught you,” Xi Ping thought. “One hundred thousand white spirits.”

First he used a paperman to put several sleeping talismans on Yu Chang, then snatched his consciousness into the Law Breaker Bracelet. Only then did he appear in his true body to clean up the scene. Wincing, he disdainfully lifted Yu Chang's blackened body through a layer of spiritual energy and took him back to the Snake King's Immortal Palace. He sent word to Wei Chengxiang: “It's all right now.”

Wei Chengxiang breathed a sigh of relief. “Reincarnation wood is also safe? That was close. There are remarkable hidden talents among Western Chu's common people.”

The first time the reincarnation wood trees had shaken gently beside the medicinal herb fields, Wei Chengxiang had heard it and had known that Tai Sui had found her. She had relaxed and nearly given way, but fortunately she had touched the prohibition on her mustard seed.

All the things inside her mustard seed put together weren't as expensive as the mustard seed itself. Even sewing it up with needle and thread would be a waste of the thread. The only use of a prohibition was to protect the reincarnation wood amulet—she was keeping herself from using the amulet to contact Tai Sui. Though she couldn't remember why at first, as a cultivator who had moved through the lower levels of the black market for many years, Wei Chengxiang's basic principle was: if she urgently wanted to do something but was stopped by her past self, she shouldn't hesitate, shouldn't think that she was rationally weighing the advantages and disadvantages; even if there was a colossal enticement before her, she still had to turn and go back the way she had come.

She had kept to that until she heard the reincarnation wood trees giving her a second signal. Tai Sui was telling her to play along.

“You two hurry up and find a safe place to meditate. Don't do anything for now. This brat has too many tricks, I'm afraid he's left some hidden threat on you,” Xi Ping instructed. “Once I've dealt with this guy, I'll take you to a safe place to eliminate the bad luck.”

As he spoke, holding his nose, he returned to the Snake King's Immortal Palace with Yu Chang, who had been burned until he stank of reeking flesh.

The "Tai Sui" in the Snake King's Immortal Palace was also a paperman controlled by him. But when Xi Ping had made the paperman inside the Law Breaker, he had first encased it in Zhao Qindan's consciousness, changing the paperman into her form. Then he had enveloped it in a Luwu mask.

The ascended spirit grade talisman behind the Luwu mask he had gotten at the last moment from Lin Chi. Its level was strong enough to control a consummate established foundation; the talisman only needed to be activated.

In order to keep Yu Chang distracted a little longer, Xi Ping had had a sudden thought and applied thick makeup to the young mistress's face—when a person saw a face that was both strange and familiar, they could never resist trying to recognize it. He hadn't thought that while the idea was perfect, the result would be poor. He had turned a beauty into a monster.

The last time Xi Ping had applied makeup was when he had been putting it on his own face. The outcome had been exceptional, making a sensation that drew the notice of half the Lingyang River. He had been quite regretful then, thinking that his features were too strong to be suited to makeup.

Now, he had verified a few things: first, there was nothing wrong with his looks—both light makeup and heavy makeup would always be appropriate for a beautiful man. He was only bad at applying it. In the future when he had a wife, he absolutely couldn't paint her brows for her, or else at the first stroke of the brush, the lady would become a widow.

Second, however great his self-confidence, he had to admit that his sort of “near-ascended spirit,” having relied on happy coincidence to reach that stage, was as different from a consummate established foundation who had cultivated for centuries as heaven was different from earth.

Yu Chang's grit projections, which could listen in on a person through their shadow, were scary enough. If he hadn't taken enough precautions in advance, that Yu would have had him under control in a couple of sentences. No wonder he used his own vital weapon so rarely. And as soon as that vital weapon came into his hand, it could imitate his opponent's power. Working in concert with the grit projection, it could even clearly see what talismans and arrays the opponent had used recently.

And never mind that—after Yu Chang was restrained by Lin Chi's talisman, Xi Ping had resisted showing himself, because he had suspected this person would have some backup plan at the bottom of his bag for when he reached an impasse. It was indeed as he had expected, only Xi Ping hadn't thought that this "backup plan" would be so resolute.

This person was vicious and merciless, crafty and cunning. He had so many powers it was impossible to keep up. And Young Master Xi, supposedly of the same level as him, only had one power: cheating.

Fucking ridiculous.

Though Xi Ping's face was as thick as a city wall, he still couldn't help feeling inferior. He would have loved to find a place to go into seclusion and get to work right now.

Third, Xi Ping had found that if he only had the "score," he could use his qin to play others' powers.

This was a sense that Bai Ling had given him—Bai Ling had sent him a complete paperman, and when Bai Ling himself had entered the Law Breaker Bracelet, Xi Ping had found that the paperman's melody was embedded in Bai Ling's music.

Playing the paperman melody to make a copy only worked if he was inside the Law Breaker Bracelet. If he played outside, there was no response. But when he tried to play the segment that came before the paperman outside the Law Breaker, starting from a certain note, his spiritual energy began to be absorbed by the qin. Xi Ping immediately realized that the segment that came before the paperman might be the “score” for creating papermen.

He had tried it out while chasing Yu Chang. It worked pretty well.

But Xi Ping guessed that when the original owner used the power, he would achieve new knowledge each time he practiced it, and it would become greater and more flexible. He could only copy the general idea—though that was enough.

In other words, in the future, he could use the Law Breaker Bracelet to collect “scores,” so that next time he fought he wouldn’t only have the “Anger Shifu to Death” sword move in addition to some unorthodox low level talismans.

As he planned, Xi Ping dragged Yu Chang’s body into the secret room of the Snake King’s Immortal Palace, surrounded him in layer upon layer of prohibitions, then quietly disappeared and entered the Law Breaker Bracelet.

He wasn’t expecting to get a scare as soon as he came in—there was a fire inside the Law Breaker Bracelet!

Xi Ping's first reaction was to check that the spiritual stones inside the bracelet were safe. Then he noticed that the fire was a part of the "set."

In the interests of deliberate mystification, when he had tossed Yu Chang's consciousness into the Law Breaker Bracelet, he had told the Law Breaker to change the Snake King's Immortal Palace set to "the surroundings most familiar to the guest."

Now, Yu Chang's consciousness had already woken up after being thrown into the Law Breaker Bracelet. When Xi Ping heard the music he brought in, his first thought was "noisy."

Bai Ling's music was like orthodox court music that went off key at the end, and Zhao Qindan's music was in classic Wan style—but Yu Chang's music was so disorderly that it made your head hurt. Many places seemed to have interference, like a person angrily smashing the strings, intense and irregular.

Right now, the scenery inside the Law Breaker Bracelet was a stretch of low-flying flatland among mountains. People had congregated into a big village there, built roads. There were forty or fifty families.

A man like a lunatic was standing at the extremity of the flames, flailing his arms and legs as he held up a bucket of lamp oil, screaming and cursing. The mountain wind passed through the valley and caught the lamp oil. The fire surged toward the village like the tide, greedily swallowing buildings and vegetation.

The people in the village lost their heads from fright, running out with their clothes in disarray. The nimble people in the prime of life were the first to charge out of the thick smoke. They got their family members settled, then ran back into the flames to rescue others, following the cries of their neighbors.

Xi Ping looked in the direction Yu Chang was looking and saw that he was staring expressionlessly at a family outside the circle of flames.

A husband and wife, and a child. The boy looked about five or six years old, with a big head and a skinny neck, but from the outlines of his features you could already see how he would look when he grew up. The others in the village were crying and screaming. Only this boy had his head turned to stare out of the image, looking right back at Yu Chang.

Xi Ping looked on, not showing himself, thinking that not a single word of truth came out of this brat's mouth. The mother and son were clearly among the first to have escaped the sea of flames, completely unharmed. So much for “burned so badly there wasn’t a bit of intact skin on me.”

Yu really knew how to make himself seem tragic.

Little Yu Chang’s dad finished giving instructions to his wife and son and pointed into the distance, probably telling them to get further away. Then he wrapped himself in wet cloth, picked up a water bucket, and charged toward the flames.

The woman, shielding the child, seemed to reach out to grab someone, but there was no one there for her to grab.

The people putting out the fire went forward carrying all kinds of water containers, but the mountain wind became malicious. It abruptly brought the fire forward. Many people, as if made of paper, were lapped up by tongues of flame without coming close.

The arsonist had already been burned to ashes. All that remained were wave upon wave of ants, crying to heaven and fighting against earth, futilely attempting to protect their families.

Yu Chang’s eyes were scarlet from the reflection of the flames, but he only watched quietly. This scene made Xi Ping remember the fire in Jinping’s southern outskirts. As he rejoiced that A-Xiang wasn't here, he got ready to change this nightmare imagery but saw the picture change all of a sudden.

Xi Ping froze.

The fire had gone out. The quiet little mountain village had become an expanse of scorched earth. The survivors—including Yu Chang and his mother—were all roaming the ruins with numb expressions attempting to find their loved ones, like wandering ghosts.

Little Yu Chang's tall and sturdy dad was gone. His mom's face was covered in ashes. She was holding him tightly by the hand.

Not far away, an old woman was desperately digging up a patch of scorched earth with both hands. From the splinters of a collapsed cottage, she dug up a pair of small feet, probably a grandchild of hers who had been unable to get out. She stared blankly for a long moment, then let out a heartrending wail. The cry startled Yu Chang's mother into a shiver. Her dim eyes focused. She quickly instructed her child, then ran in the direction of the cry to help the old woman dig.

But when the old woman saw her, her frightening cries came to an abrupt halt. Xi Ping got a clear look at the expression on that face and realized something.

The next moment, the old woman, like an old beast on the point of death, suddenly found the strength to knock Yu Chang's mother aside as she came to help her. Pointing to her, she began to yell insults.

The mournful scolding echoed among the ruins. Gradually, the "ghosts" wandering around all stopped in their tracks, their gazes directed at the lone and helpless woman.

The look in their eyes was like the look of living ghosts. It made you tremble from fear.

"Beguiling whore..."

Whispers rose among the villagers. At the same time, Xi Ping heard the grown-up Yu Chang outside the image quietly repeat: "Beguiling whore."

"The one who set the fire was that slut's lover, I heard it all."

"That whore was having an affair, her man found out and beat the adulterer, and that's what brought this disaster on us!"

"What does your cuckolding scam have to do with the rest of us? You've destroyed the whole village!"

“How can she have the face to be alive...how can she have the face to be alive? My grandson was only four... These are his feet, look, open your eyes and look, these are his feet!”

There was a peculiar smile on the face of the Yu Chang outside the image. He moved his lips soundlessly, repeating what these people said, line by line.

“Get her! Get her!”

The woman was besieged on all sides, becoming the target for the survivors’ torrent of rage.

Her onetime fellows snatched away her child, spat on her, tore at her hair. They discussed whether to bring her up in front of a magistrate, but presumed that the magistrate wouldn’t care about a trifle like this, and no one wanted to get beaten into respecting the law, so public sentiment turned toward drowning her. But there weren’t many deep bodies of water in Yu Family Bend, and if they sank her, they were worried it might pollute the water. So, pooling their wisdom, using some unknown person’s idea, they came up with the notion of making her “pay with blood for blood.”

This was very high-sounding, so everyone picked up on it. The woman was placed on a bonfire.

The moment that the oil-splashed bonfire consumed the woman, a small form fought free of the villagers' hands and ran straight into the fire. The woman screamed and wailed, telling him to go, but within the fire, she could no longer shed tears. The boy climbed with hands and feet, his wet little cotton jacket spurting out black smoke. He jumped up and tore the ropes and shackles off the woman. The ropes were covered in lamp oil, and the shackles were so hot that he screamed. He missed his step and fell off the bonfire.

The fire had already swallowed his mother's figure.

The boy, dressed in flames, turned his head to glare at her killers. Somehow, he found the strength to rush at the crowd.

The people fled in a panic, hitting him with bamboo poles. The six-year-old Yu Chang let out a frightening scream. The centuries-old Yu Chang began to laugh quietly.

Inside the Law Breaker Bracelet, the sound of rusted machinery grinding against itself suddenly sounded, breaking up Yu Chang's own violent and intense music.

Xi Ping, who had been staring blankly, immediately realized: Oh no, he's about to lose his mind!

He unconsciously moved a few steps, almost appearing in front of Yu Chang. Then he quickly came back to himself: What does it have to do with me? Didn't I want to get rid of him? Isn't it convenient if he loses his mind?

But just then, he saw Yu Chang press down on the center of his brow and suppress all his thoughts within two breaths.

Inside the Law Breaker, the chaotic music representing Yu Chang sounded once again. Only the master of the Tai Sui Qin could hear how violently the music struggled, going on indomitably, trying to fight through the rusty grinding to survive.

The expression on Yu Chang's face was identical to the one he had worn when he had charged into the bonfire at six years old.

The rusty grinding became sharper and sharper, as if it was about to snap at any moment. The sound made Xi Ping's scalp go numb.

But two phrases of music constantly repeated, tightly biting down on the rusty grinding. Though the music was now strong, now weak, though several times it nearly broke off, it still managed to pick up right away every time.

This was a battle with only one witness, but it was still profoundly stirring.

Xi Ping raised his head and realized that this was likely Yu Chang's Way of the Heart.

He gently plucked the qin strings, repeating those two phrases of music. He felt a powerful thought surge through the qin: I will not die, I refuse. So what if fierce winds and raging fires attack me, so what if knives and hatchets cut me? If I have but one breath remaining to me, I will fight you all until the end of time—

No wonder he had held out so many under the push and pull of the brand and had even gone as far as a near-ascended spirit...

Had even gone as far as the most hopeless position he could attain in his life.

CHAPTER 112 - Unbound Knife (19)

Witnessing a struggle like this, no one could remain unmoved, even if it was a carrion-eating hyena, even if you knew perfectly well that it was bad news.

Ardently meeting death is admittedly a solemn and heroic affair, but teeth-gritting, blood-sucking will to live is also profoundly moving.

With a single thought, Xi Ping deferred to his instincts. He plucked the qin strings. The Tai Sui Qin immediately resonated throughout the inside of the Law Breaker.

He had been very idle as a teenager, always going to provide accompaniment for dancers and singers. Now he skillfully harmonized with the two phrases of Yu Chang's consciousness that were stabilizing his Way of the Heart; the place where he joined was as smooth as a river flowing into the sea.

Yu Chang couldn't hear his own melody. He only thought that this practically flimsy music poured into his ears like cool spring water.

His chaotic consciousness cleared. Something abruptly held up his nearly collapsed and exhausted energy.

Yu Chang was a person who absolutely couldn't pass up any opportunity. Following the music, he began to climb fiercely toward the human world. This was something he had done countless times over the past centuries.

In a little while, the ominous rusty grinding became weaker and weaker, more and more distant. Finally, it was firmly suppressed by the Tai Sui Qin.

Xi Ping, as if he had been prepared in advance, put the qin away and waited for Yu Chang to catch his breath. Meanwhile, he changed the furnishings inside the Law Breaker Bracelet to the little post station on Longevity Peak in Yu Family Bend—a place they were both familiar with.

Finally, in about the time it took to drink a cup of tea, Yu Chang slowly opened his eyes.

Of the two of them, one was in the open, and the other was concealed. For a time, neither took the initiative to speak. The expression on Yu Chang's face was a little complicated. Xi Ping's emotions were also a little complicated. He suspected he had been bewitched by this old fox's lies. He inspected his spirit inside and out.

After a long time, Yu Chang cleared his throat and hoarsely said, "Forget it. I won't give up my consciousness to let you copy it, and I won't come after you again. I'll think of another way to deal with this spiritual image brand... Today's events, I won't mention them to anyone else."

Xi Ping: "..."

So that's how he was playing it—to hear him talk, it would seem that he'd been acting under compulsion, not that he had been planning to kill the witness and take the technique of removing brands for himself alone.

"Oh, wow, how scary, I wonder who could possibly have blown all this hot air," Xi Ping said mockingly. "Listen, Yu-xiong, which one of us has fallen into the other's hands right now? There are only two people in this story, and you still managed to count wrong. Maybe you're getting old?"

Yu Chang was a habitual liar. Whenever he opened his mouth, this was what came out. He only came around when he was rendered speechless by this rudeness. He thought, true, they'd both revealed their true intentions; they knew each other now. So he also quickly peeled off his human skin. As he examined and assessed the surroundings, he shot back sarcastically, "Is the reason you stayed hidden before because you were scared of getting hunted as soon as you went out?"

When these two had been plotting against each other, both had been putting on a skilled act. Now, they had temporarily called a ceasefire, so without prearrangement, each revealed his “true heroic quality”: they were both assholes.

“There’s a whole gang of shed skins lining up. You can go wait at the back.” Xi Ping, idly plucking out a not especially elegant Chu tune, said, “Those two young ladies in Yu Family Bend. Did you do anything else to them?”

“The grit projections need to be used long term to have an effect. A couple of sentences can only make a person make a ‘momentary false step.’ If a half-immortal meditates and cycles their energy for a while, there won’t be any aftereffects. I never use sinister methods against women...” At this point, Yu Chang rolled his eyes. He knew by now whether “Tai Sui” was male or female—the voice that sounded in this hidden realm must be this Tai Sui’s original voice—which made sense; not just anyone could make up a beauty so she looked as if she’d been beaten black and blue. “I’m not as vulgar as Your Excellency.”

“Haha, that’s one big fart, you bastard,” said Xi Ping.

“Well, it won’t knock down your face,” said Yu Chang.

Xi Ping couldn’t leave well enough alone: “You being so merciful toward women, is that because of your mom?”

Yu Chang abruptly raised his eyes and said between his teeth: “You’re asking for it.”

“Yeah, that’s right,” Xi Ping responded. “Come and hit me, then.”

The veins on Yu Chang’s forehead pulsed. This crazy Tai Sui was actually a near-ascended spirit. No matter what, he must be some centuries old, no? Why did he act like an obnoxious little brat?

He had just struggled back from the edge of losing his mind. He really didn’t want to have another go. Therefore he took a deep breath, closed his eyes, and calmed down for a moment.

Wait. A little brat...

Yu Chang rapidly considered the whole thing and found that his greatest mistake had been to underestimate that little half-immortal in Yu Family Bend. With his cultivation level, he could see at a glance that that young girl was hardly older than twenty, a little devil who wouldn’t make up a handful, and he had placed a grit worm in her shadow. Everything she said and did, everything she thought had been under his surveillance. It was hard to avoid lowering your guard.

Now that he thought about it, that little half-immortal had deliberately wandered around Yu Family Bend, leading his grit worm to deal with her, just for the sake of revealing his methods to Tai Sui. In other words, Tai Sui could control something that, while it wasn't on her, was present everywhere she had passed, and he could use that thing to convey simple messages to her...was it the reincarnation wood?

Yu Chang suddenly remembered a legend: in ancient times, there had been great numbers of masters. When the mighty shed skins became sages, their Ways of the Heart joined with heaven and earth, while the masters whose Ways of the Heart could not abide within the three thousand paths of the Great Way had become "demonic gods." When they became shed skins, their Ways of the Heart didn't rise to heaven. They sank into the earth and created a type of "accompanying plant."

That reincarnation wood amulet... Was it possible that it wasn't a communication device, but an accompanying plant?

Maybe this "Tai Sui" had by some coincidence attained an ancient demonic god's inheritance, and his cultivation hadn't actually reached as high a level as it appeared.

Yes. When they had fought, Tai Sui had seemed to have a sword in his qin, fairly frightening, but its actual quality... The sword aura was sharp enough, but it didn't seem to have any alterations. All that changed was the pitch of the music, obscuring the truth, that he only had one trick up his sleeve.

For Yu Chang, the really fatal thing had been the talisman on that spiritual image mask. On the one hand, it had been very precisely planned. On the other hand, that talisman had been of ascended spirit grade, and with very stable spiritual threads, certainly not the product of an "early ascended spirit" who had just crossed the ascended spirit boundary. It was even more certain that it couldn't have been the product of Tai Sui, who hadn't yet reached an ascended spirit. He must have gotten it from someone else ahead of time.

Maybe this "Tai Sui" really was young, and he was only putting on a false show of strength in front of him.

Yu Chang's expression became slightly more serious. Bluffing, he said, "Our cultivation levels are similar. How could you fail to see whether I've done any tampering?"

Xi Ping thought to himself, Fine, I see how it is, as long as he's alive, his scheming mind is alive, too.

So then and there he openly said with a smile, "That's hard to say."

Yu Chang thought: He's quite cautious.

Then this "Tai Sui" continued: "Oh, right, I forgot to tell you. Your consciousness, I've already gotten a clear look and felt it up. You're already here, there's no need to be so polite with me. Didn't you want a paperman to use to remove your spiritual image brand?"

Out of nowhere, a chill went up Yu Chang's spine. Then he heard peculiar, raucous music. Not everyone was skilled in distinguishing melodies. Yu Chang only thought it was unpleasant. Before he could tell anything else about it, he saw "himself" land in front of him!

Since obtaining the "Dragon and Phoenix Symbolizing Good Fortune," Xi Ping had roughly known how the spiritual image brand sounded. So he had removed the grating portion of the music Yu Chang had brought in with him, which was the spiritual image brand, and had successfully copied a "clean" Yu Chang.

The copied "Yu Chang" landed in disbelief, found that the spiritual image brand that had constrained him for hundreds of years had disappeared out of nowhere, then met the similarly shocked eyes of the original.

He understood himself best. The next moment, the copied “Yu Chang,” without another word, turned and tried to run out of the Law Breaker. At the same time, he struck first, his talisman hitting the original. The original Yu Chang dodged, relying wholly on instinct, and wanted to go chasing after the copy then and there, but he heard Tai Sui, watching the fun, say easily, “There’s only one spiritual image brand, not enough to go around. Well, why don’t the two of you talk it over between yourselves, see who I should give it to.”

The two Yu Changs said simultaneously: “You’re wicked!”

“Pfft, who are you talking about?” said Xi Ping, making matters worse.

“How can the crow call the pig black?”

When the two Yu Changs inside the Law Breaker began their contest, it was a sight worth seeing. They traded talismans, traps, and powers back and forth, each predicting the other’s movements in perfect synchrony. After watching for a while, Xi Ping even stopped playing tunes to liven things up. He reached a hand out of the Law Breaker, grabbed handfuls of peanuts and melon seeds, and started munching. He even complained, “Eh, too salty.”

Yu Chang: “...”

Though they were both consciousnesses, the copied Yu Chang had escaped the brand, while the original had been exhausted by nearly losing his mind. The original Yu Chang finally couldn't hold out any longer. Adapting to the circumstances, he yelled, "Get out the blood covenant, I'll sign!"

A "blood covenant" was a kind of business contract common on the black market. The evil cultivators in the black market didn't trust each other at all. When they were involved in a major deal or hired someone to do something, the two contracting parties would sign a blood covenant. Anyone who breached the contract would suffer backlash—generally speaking, the one with the higher cultivation had the advantage; after all, the same backlash falling on an established foundation and a half-immortal would have different outcomes—but fortunately the two of them had about the same cultivation level.

Xi Ping spat a melon seed out of the Law Breaker. Lousy Chu, why did they even have spicy melon seeds!

He wiped his mouth. "Why couldn't you have been this agreeable to start out with? If you place a bet, you have to take the loss, brother. You fell a move short, so I'll be holding on to your wicked little book."

That old Discard the False and Keep the True volume was Yu Chang's vital weapon. Hearing this, veins pulsed at the edges of his forehead. He dodged his other self's killing blow. "All right."

"You prepare the reverse stamping spike yourself, and I'll help you remove the brand," Xi Ping went on. "You go out into the wide world and leave your identity in Yu Family Bend to me. Whoever reveals this, his Way of the Heart will break to pieces."

He didn't have a Way of the Heart, anyway.

Yu Chang roared, "My identity is being a lackey and a prisoner, anyone's welcome to it! If I had two, I'd do a buy-one-get-one-free deal!"

As he finished speaking, a reincarnation wood amulet flew toward him, with his blood on it. It blocked the copy's attack for him.

Xi Ping said, "You can use that amulet to contact me. Finally, I did just save your life. The favor of a drop of water must be repaid with a fountain. For the favor of a life saved, you must face all dangers, do you acknowledge it? I want you to..."

Xi Ping had been about to blurt out "perform my errands for a hundred years," but as the words came to his lips, he stopped himself.

Since ancient times, people had kept dogs, but they hadn't kept wolves. This Yu Chang was too rotten. Even with a spiritual image brand, he dared to betray his master. Was there anything he wouldn't do?

Anyway, it was a waste of breath talking when your views were irreconcilable. He hated this person. There was no need for them to offend each other's eyes in the long term.

“Within ten years, when I have a request, you'll do three things for me,” Xi Ping said instead. “They won't kill you, won't harm your cultivation, won't touch your Way of the Heart...”

They were both eminent evil cultivators. How could Yu Chang fail to understand what Tai Sui was thinking? Hearing these requests, he wasn't at all surprised. He grabbed the amulet and without even thinking about it bit through his middle finger, forcing out heart's blood to smear heavily on the blood covenant.

His hand was too quick. The blood covenant had already gone into effect when “Tai Sui” finished his sentence: “...and won't disgrace your ancestors.”

Yu Chang abruptly froze and couldn't dodge a hit from the copy. Fortunately, at that moment, Xi Ping sent the copy out of the Law Breaker just in time, and his blow disappeared along with him. Inside the Law Breaker, there remained only one Yu Chang...and the shells of peanuts and melon seeds littering the ground.

Xi Ping put away the blood covenant. As a creditor delighted with his heightened status, he now looked at Yu Chang as though he were a bunch of chives that could be harvested at any time. He became positively cordial. "Good. In that case, we'll see each other at noon. I'll rely on you to handle Yu Family Bend, brother."

Yu Chang was silent for a moment, calming his ragged breathing. "Permit me to ask, Tai Sui, what do you want?"

In the shadows, Xi Ping froze, abruptly shutting his mouth.

He looked at the realistic furnishings inside the Law Breaker. Because it was currently overcast in Yu Family Bend, the "Longevity Peak" inside the Law Breaker was also overcast.

The heavens were so low they seemed to press down on your head, pressing each person to a fixed height, pressing them into a fixed track.

What he wanted to know was how lofty those noble people were that they had to make all things live according to the path they had set down.

He wanted to know whose voice, whose will was represented by the Bell of Tribulation, the Silver Moon, and the other souls of the spiritual mountains he had yet to meet.

He wanted to know to whom those heavens belonged, what lay beyond the void, why the sages had never looked back after stepping out into that void

This was also what Chen Baishao, who had been buried in the Blissful Village, what the teenage A-Xiang, counting corpses in the southern outskirts...what many people whose characters were either noble or revolting all wanted to ask.

He also wanted to know why it was so hard to obtain the right to question heaven and earth.

At last, Wild Fox Country's Tai Sui snorted. "None of your business. Beat it."

Having said this, he kicked Yu Chang out of the Law Breaker and left him to take care of his own medium-well cooked body.

Then Xi Ping considered and, with a wave of his sleeve, cleaned up the trash and changed the furnishings inside the Law Breaker Bracelet to Cui Ji's little compound in Jinping.

It was said that that place was the cherished dream of all the girls in Jinping. Walking through the door, you could smell at once a refreshing fragrance. There were unique dioramas for every season. Inside was a room provided for honored guests to sit and rest. The tea and snacks were always fresh and warm. He didn't know whether Young Mistress Zhao had been there, but A-Xiang certainly hadn't. A-Xiang had lived for some years in Jinping's southern outskirts without even knowing what Cui Ji was.

Determining that the two of them had already reached a safe place, Xi Ping pulled them into the Law Breaker—actually, he was inclined to believe that Yu Chang had told the truth about not having tampered with them, but in the interests of safety, he still wanted to check.

The music A-Xiang brought in with her was about what he had expected, the tempo slightly fast, not too proper at first listen, but with a sense of steadiness that penetrated the roots of your ears. Zhao Qindan was somewhat confused, as before, but compared to the last time she had come, which had been only two days ago, her melody already had a faint change.

Xi Ping listened closely without hearing any jarring noise that shouldn't have been there. Only then did he appear inside the Law Breaker.

Using the Marquis and the Latent Cultivation Temple's Elder Su as his models, he combined the appearances of these two elderly men, and made a few changes, removing both of their excessively distinguishing traits. In a blink, he became a middle-aged man with a gentle expression, wrapped in a thin layer of mist.

Wei Chengxiang's eyes lit up. "Senior!"

After all these years, she was finally seeing his face. He was a little more sedate than she had imagined. Though it was her first time seeing him, she felt as though she had known him for a long time.

Xi Ping smiled "benevolently" at her and didn't speak, but his slightly peach-blossom-shaped eyes said everything for him.

Zhao Qindan examined the surroundings in astonishment. "Is this a hidden realm...? Is it constructed on the basis of that Cui Ji in the capital?"

Xi Ping still didn't speak. He pointed to the honored guest hall hidden beneath a pergola among the little compound's winding paths. Spiritual stones, elixirs, and even tea and snacks were already laid out there, ready for the two of them to look after their internal injuries. Then he slightly cupped his fist toward Wei Chengxiang: You've worked hard.

Then he turned and left.

“Wait.” Zhao Qindan hesitated. This person’s cultivation was far higher than hers...even higher than that decision-making eldest shixiong in her clan, even a generation higher than her by Xuanyin Mountain’s reckoning. Involuntarily, she restrained her young mistress’s haughtiness and respectfully said, “Thank you for your aid, senior. What instructions do you have for me?”

But that transcendent middle-aged man only waved a hand at her. When he spoke, countless echoes were layered on top of each other inside the little compound.

“It is fated,” he tossed out obscurely, and left the two of them with only a lean rear view, instantly reaching the edge of the hidden realm and disappearing.

Though half of that unbound long hair was grey, the back still remained erect with perfect deportment. Virtue as profound as deep water, upright as a high mountain, taciturn yet reliable.

It was what she imagined a father should look like.

The rims of Zhao Qindan's eyes turned red—but in fact she had already found that over the years, her father's back had unnoticeably bent.

The “taciturn yet reliable old father” left the Law Breaker Bracelet and breathed a sigh of relief. He'd nearly died from stifling himself.

In fact, he had been desperate to speak just now, and also, because he had just pried up Yu Family Bend's greatest local thug, he was very puffed up and impatient to show off to the young ladies.

But there was nothing to be done. He had been too reckless in his acquaintance with Wei Chengxiang, always speaking to her in his original accent. Zhao Qindan was a classmate who had gone to the Latent Cultivation Temple with him. They hadn't had any chance to talk, and people's memories for voices weren't nearly as clear as their memories for faces...but what if?

What if because of his handsomeness, he had left an unusually profound impression on Young Mistress Zhao?

As Xi Ping saw it, this was only too likely. So just now, he had only said three words, and deliberately made the Law Breaker Bracelet add an echo for him. You couldn't say he hadn't been prudent.

Alas, wasn't this always the fate of natural beauties? He just had to be careful.

After a moment of admiring himself and lamenting his lot, he poured out the excess of his desire for self-expression to Zhi Xiu, babbling complacently toward the shard of Zhaoting in his spirit for the better part of half a shichen.

It was the middle of the night. Owing to General Zhi's good temper, he didn't order the shard of Zhaoting to smash him flat...though of course he also ignored him.

As day was breaking, Yu Chang saved the master of Flying Jade Peak's ears. Yu Chang's somewhat weary voice came through the reincarnation wood: "This is Yu Family Bend's main residence."

CHAPTER 113 - Unbound Knife (20)

The Yu family's main residence took up a whole valley—not the kind of valley that adjoined sheer precipices; the slopes were low and gentle. They could be descended by means of stone steps and winding roads. At the bottom of the valley was a small mountain river.

This terrain was in fact somewhat similar to the Latent Cultivation Temple, only the Latent Cultivation Temple was a “place outside the world” meant for quiet cultivation. There were few traces of human workmanship. There weren't even any streetlamps or chiming clocks. Apart from the grand instructor Luo Qingshi, there was practically no entertainment.

The Yu family's main residence was too magnificent.

Here there was no low quality timber like reincarnation wood, which could latch on anywhere and grow wildly. Xi Ping could only look out through the reincarnation wood amulet Yu Chang carried. He saw that the valley actually had a road carved out for steam carriages to travel on... Tsk, how many years had steam carriages even been around?

In the air hung a cable chain dozens of li long. Its machinery could carry small compartments from one end of the long and narrow valley to the other, with a stop every three li, where you could get off to change and rest.

Servants would come aboard soundless as shadows to change the incense and refresh the food and drinks. The sound of the pipa floated out along the iron cables, and the fragrance of wine and cosmetics scattered everywhere, as if Jinping's Lingyang River had been hung up in the sky. The compartments were all carved full of wasteful third-class inscriptions. Even if there was an accident and a compartment fell from the sky, the people inside wouldn't be hurt.

The Latent Cultivation Temple had only small single-story houses in the depths of the forest, while in the Yu family's main residence, there was a full set of pavilions, terraces, and towers. In a few places halfway up the slopes, the courtyard houses could even measure up to an imperial palace for ostentation. Day had yet to break, but the valley was ablaze with light. The singing and dancing that had lasted through the night had yet to end. With a cultivator's hearing, one could hear music and teasing laughter on the wind.

Over several centuries of propagation, the upstart clan of Yu Family Bend had become numerous, but only the families of past clan leaders were qualified to reside in the main residence. Xi Ping glanced around. In this generation, nearly all those who had any power in the family were half-immortals—the kind that had gotten there relying on money and couldn't draw a single talisman. Those with any skills presumably wouldn't have stayed in the mortal world. They would all have been sent to the Sanyue Mountains or the Qilin Guard.

The only way these half-immortals differed from mortals was that they were impervious to poison and sickness, with long-lasting youth, able to enjoy the use of open-eyed grade immortal tools and elixirs. Therefore it was said that per capita they had married more wives than you could count on one hand, and they had so many children they didn't even recognize all of them.

As soon as Xi Ping's consciousness probed out of the reincarnation wood Yu Chang carried, he felt dense spiritual energy and asked Yu Chang, "Is there an array protecting the valley?"

"Naturally. There are protective arrays of many classes here. Adding up the big and the little ones, there are over a hundred in all. It's steadfast as a fortress," Yu Chang said. "If your Wan had had defenses like this back then, your cities wouldn't have so easily been trampled underfoot by Southern He. Alas, I went there myself at the time. Devastation as far as the eye could see. I felt that it was such a pity."

True. For a moment, Xi Ping lagged behind, thinking, Why didn't Jinping have this kind of array formation?

Then he heard Yu Chang add, “It’s just a little expensive. It burns over a thousand white spirits per year. Southern Wan is not so well off.”

Xi Ping: “...”

Too rich!

Of the current four nations, Northern Li was barren, its land plentiful and its people scarce; Western Chu was mountainous, making transportation difficult; Southern Shu only had a sliver of territory on the mainland, the rest of it made up of little islands like donkey droppings; no one could match Great Wan for its wide-reaching waterways and extensive plains. Moon Plated Gold, all kinds of new technology, eighty percent of it had been brought forward by Great Wan. Because the people of Wan found beauty in what was graceful and unobtrusive, in the other nations, no matter what their previous style and culture, the landowning classes all took Wan style as the height of refinement. To take Western Chu as an example, while the people of Chu favored salty food, the restaurants here that charged a liang or two of silver or above per person nearly all made modified Wan cuisine.

When the people of Wan were abroad, even if they didn’t say it outright, all upholding the legendary “Wan manners,” they secretly regarded everything around them with disdain.

Xi Ping had absolutely never thought that one day, Great Wan, the wealthiest of nations, would be pitied as “not so well off” by a rich provincial from some backwater—and what he was saying was the truth!

That number alone was too much even for Jinpinging to raise, never mind the other provinces. His san-ge’s Kaiming and Luwu, all of them throughout the whole country...even throughout the four nations, added together and including financial support for the injured and families of the dead, didn’t spend that much money in a year!

An array formation maintained at such an exorbitant price couldn’t be for the sake of ostentation. No wealthy people were so wasteful.

It could only be for the sake of protecting even greater wealth.

Each year, Western Chu’s gold and silver flowed outward. The price of silver was going higher and higher, and so were the prices of commodities. The least stir in the market could make people’s hearts tremble with fear. The most extravagant creepers grew in the most barren of places.

“There’s nothing to be done about it,” Yu Chang said. “Yu Family Bend currently has no gentle professions. If it isn’t the Moon Plated Gold factories, then it’s the medicinal herb fields. They have to work, whether they want to or not. When I was young, a family could still survive by farming, but over the last century that's become impossible. The mountain roads are too hard to travel, and you can't spend the spiritual stones to use downgraded immortal tools to transport Moon Plated Gold. You have to use waterpower. The hydrology of the whole county has changed. When the waste water from the factories spills, you can't plant anything."

"Even Tao County is better off," said Xi Ping.

"It's six of one, half a dozen of the other," Yu Chang answered topically.

Everywhere Yu Chang passed, draped in his loose gown, the servants, offerings, and even members of the principal Yu family stepped back and saluted.

Like some unrestrained literary celebrity, with his wide sleeves filled by the fluttering wind, he walked ahead without looking sideways.

"Wow, that's some pose," Xi Ping thought sourly.

So he said provocatively, "Bringing me here amounts to open betrayal. Isn't the brand biting you?"

"Backlash? Naturally." In a place without any people, Yu Chang quickly passed a hand over his arm, pulling back a bit of the camouflage spell on it.

On his arm, where the burns had yet to fully heal, purple veins were popping up one after another, throbbing so that his whole arm shook along with them; it was a ghastly sight.

Yu Chang, accustomed to this, let down his sleeve. “The backlash from the spiritual image brand has degrees, or else you wouldn’t be able to function on a day-to-day basis—for example, if the master is in danger, and you have to push him into a well and half-drown him to save his life, how does that figure? Normally, for a centuries-old offering like me, as long as I’m not committing murder and arson in the master’s house, the backlash from the brand won’t be fatal.”

Not fatal, but his meridians would snap, his consciousness would feel as though it were burning. A life worse than death.

But this pain that others couldn’t bear precisely suited his Way of the Heart. It was a thing he could use to temper himself. For centuries, as this spiritual image brand had torn at him, it had also pushed him to the pinnacle of the established foundation stage.

There was actually such a peculiar Way of the Heart, such a special means of cultivation. But admiration was one thing—really, this joker Yu Chang was cultivating the “way of betrayal.” He could even find loopholes in a spiritual image brand over hundreds of years, so what about a mere blood covenant?

Xi Ping thought apprehensively: He promised to do three things for me within ten years. If I'm dead, he'll be off the hook.

The corners of Yu Chang's mouth were raised in a smile that seemed to be tattooed on. He was twirling a pair of jade balls in his hand to alleviate the pain in his meridians. He was also thinking: before, in the hidden realm, he had been interrupted by this Tai Sui's incessant pestering. Now, though, he had a good opportunity to test his depths.

No matter what, the blood covenant was still a shackle. If he really was only impressive on the outside...

So Yu Chang idly said, "If you aren't in a rush, I can take you around. It's almost the fifteenth day of the eighth month. Isn't now a good time for you to act?"

As soon as Xi Ping heard this, he knew he was up to no good. But before he could come up with an excuse, Yu Chang laughed, jumped, and landed around the middle of the mountain.

“You have to look closely,” Yu Chang said, laughing. “The Yu family holds the largest green ore fields in the world and monopolizes thirty or forty percent of the Moon Plated Gold. They’ve stood for hundreds of years without falling. The protective arrays are no joke. There are many things I can’t see clearly, but Tai Sui’s knowledge of cultivation is naturally superior to mine, so I suppose you won’t have much of a problem, right?”

Xi Ping: “...”

He had shit for knowledge of cultivation!

In Chu, day was about to break, and far away in Great Wan’s Jinping, it was already well into the morning. There was even faint movement in the Yongning Marquis Manor, where there were no early risers.

Xi Yue wasn’t on duty today, so he had stayed the night at the Yongning Marquis Manor.

He was halfway to being a pupil of Flying Jade Peak himself and had inherited General Zhi’s good habits—he never wasted time. The Marquis and his lady hadn’t gotten up yet, so he wasn’t in a hurry to go pay his respects; he was meditating on his own to cultivate.

Xi Yue had just begun meditating when he suddenly heard a familiar voice in his ear: “Yue-bao’er! Help me out!”

It was him!

This voice was different from all the times before. It was more “real” than before. Xi Yue abruptly opened his eyes, having a momentary feeling that Xi Ping was standing right next to him. He automatically looked all around for him.

But the room was still. There were birds chirping in the little courtyard, but no people. The look in Xi Yue’s eyes dimmed. His hand went to his neck and came up empty. Only then did he belatedly remember that reincarnation wood amulet.

Xi Yue focused. When he picked up the reincarnation wood, his voice was already calm. “What is it?”

“Quick, quick, quick,” said Xi Ping, “memorize these arrays for me, and I’ll treat you to Western Chu’s specialty melon seeds! You definitely can’t buy them in Great Wan!”

You promise a reward the moment you open your mouth, but why don’t you come back and show yourself instead...? Xi Yue’s fingers tightened on the reincarnation wood. He paused. Treasuring words like gold, he said, “Fine, send them over.”

“I can’t send over so many! If I could send them, I could memorize them myself,” Xi Ping said. “Where are you, is it safe?”

“At home,” said Xi Yue, “safe...”

Before he could finish, his vision blurred, and his consciousness instantly crossed vast distances. Xi Yue sucked in a breath.

Next, he arrived outside of the three realms...inside the Law Breaker Bracelet.

Xi Ping split up the front and rear courtyards of the Cui Ji compound inside the Law Breaker Bracelet to keep from disturbing Wei Chengxiang and Zhao Qindan. He placed Xi Yue in the back garden.

When Xi Yue had just found his footing, he saw a huge pond in front of him. The water was like a mirror, clearly reflecting the Yu family’s main residence at this moment.

The next instant, Xi Yue’s spiritual sense gave him a warning, and he alertly stepped aside, dodging. The half-puppet fed on spiritual stones; his sense was far more acute than that of a cultivator of the same grade, and he had trained for several years alongside Pang Jian. His reactions were extremely fast. The hand reaching to pat his head came up empty.

Xi Yue stared in disbelief at that familiar hand—utterly pampered, with only a trace of calluses from qin strings; the hand whose owner would start to complain his hand hurt from chafing after only one ke of holding a brush; the hand whose owner had shamelessly dragged him into doing his schoolwork for him countless times... Xi Yue's eyes traveled up that hand, his breath trembling incessantly.

“Heavens,” the young master said, catching up and holding down the top of his head, “what has Lao Pang been feeding you? You’ve shot up like a weed. Why don’t you share some with Luo-shixiong out of respect?”

As if the one who’d vanished for five or six years without a word hadn’t been him. As if he had only stepped out to get a pot of osmanthus oil.

How could this scoundrel be so heartless?

Xi Yue glared fiercely at that completely unchanged face, suddenly forgetting that he could speak now.

The next moment, his asshole former master and current big brother pressed down his head, turning him to face in the direction of the water. “Hey, stop looking at me, I’m the same as ever, nothing new. Hurry up and help me remember the positions of all those arrays in the water. It’s an absolute emergency, we can catch up later!”

Xi Yue took a deep breath. Almost hatefully, he turned his head to glance at the dizzying array formation in the water.

With just one glance, the young walker in the mortal world recovered his professionalism and frowned. “Where are these arrays? They’re so wasteful.”

Xi Ping bragged shamelessly, “They belong to some people who owe me money. What about them?”

Xi Yue focused and looked for a while, then shook his head. “I can only understand a part of them.”

“No problem.” Xi Ping knew that he was very naturally gifted in this area. He had a practically perfect memory for arrays. “Memorize them for now, then analyze them.”

Xi Yue ignored him, focusing all of his attention on the array formation in the water.

Xi Ping made a few circles around him, then odiously snapped his fingers and, using the extravagant dancing halls of the Yu family's main residence as a model, created a soft chair that a person could recline in and a small table. He considered, then snatched a pile of Western Chu specialty snacks from the Snake King's Immortal Palace—he didn't know which Luwu was so gluttonous; these things were all over the place inside the Snake King's Immortal Palace.

“Sit down to look.” Since he needed Xi Yue's help, Xi Ping pressed him down onto the chair, then reached out and created a fan.

Afraid that Xi Yue's head would overheat from memorizing such an enormous array formation all at once, he put one hand on Xi Yue's shoulder and used the other to fan him with eager attentiveness—if you couldn't sell your wits, you had to sell your strength.

As he fanned, looking at that calm young man's face, Xi Ping “found comfort in his old age,” thinking, He's much more accomplished than when he was with me...

“Hss!”

As he was feeling gratified and unguarded, Xi Yue, staring engrossed at the arrays, suddenly attacked. Without warning, he shook Xi Ping's hand off his shoulder, caught it, and bit it viciously.

At the same time, he didn't avert his gaze from the array formation!

Xi Ping: "..."

He didn't dare to exert strength to get his hand back. While it was the consciousness that came here, it was made into a tangible body by the Law Breaker Bracelet. A consummate established foundation body was too hard for a half-immortal half-puppet. If he tensed his hand, he would knock out Xi Yue's teeth.

Even more, he didn't dare to scold—that pestilential bastard Yu Chang didn't stop for a breath. If you turned your eyes away for a moment, you would miss part of the array formation. He was afraid Xi Yue would be distracted.

There was nothing else for it. Xi Ping could only inwardly curse Pang Jian: That rotten Big Dog Pang. I gave him a perfectly nice and refined little brother, and how has he raised him?

Was Heaven's Design Pavilion's General Commander spreading rabies?!

Pang Jian, on his last patrol for the morning of the Azure Dragon Towers, sneezed in the clouds above Jinping. He rubbed his nose, feeling a little perplexed. Since the new emperor had changed the laws, the factories in Jinping's southern outskirts were no longer allowed to work night and day. The smoke and fog had both decreased considerably, so why would he be sneezing out of nowhere?

Could it be someone cursing him behind his back?

Just then, there was a flap in the wind. A secret letter came to Pang Jian's hand.

Pang Jian stopped in midair on his sword, pulled out the Barrier Dispeller Bow and stuck it behind himself. He leaned back against the bow. He saw that this was a message from the Guzhou Heaven's Design Pavilion Branch. It said: The Luxu who infiltrated the Zhao family in Southern Shu have been exposed. There are casualties, and some whose whereabouts are unknown. Before disappearing, they notified this branch. Lingyun Mountain is likely to move soon.

Pang Jian froze. Then his gaze fell on the words "Lingyun Mountain is likely to move soon"—Lingyun was Southern Shu's state sect.

This large-scale action of the Luwu's, while it was for the sake of pursuing the remnants of the Zhao family, was after all also an infiltration of other nations. With a group of well-trained foreign cultivators sneaking in, you didn't need to be a genius to know how vexed Lingyun would be... If this got out, Northern Li and Western Chu would certainly be on the alert as well.

This was trouble.

Pang Jiang quickly sent word to the Heaven's Design Pavilion branches by the borders, ordering them to immediately overhaul the border inscriptions and arrays. Whatever their identity, without official documents, all cultivators entering the country had to be registered and followed. They must take strict precautions against foreign cultivators entering Great Wan territory to engage in unlawful actions.

Great Wan had the Luwu. If the other countries got their own Taotie or Jiuwei⁷³ or something, that would be unpleasant.

Anyway, while others wouldn't know, the Zhao family before their betrayal had been extremely cunning. They would certainly have some understanding of the Luwu. Now that they had gone abroad, they would have to be on their guard against their movements. With an urgent assignment to deal with, Xuanyin would have rushed to complete the updated immortal tools supplied to the Luwu. Perhaps the haste had caused a hiccup.

Communication across the South Sea was difficult. Even Zhou Ying slipped up sometimes.

Pang Jian was just planning to write a letter to Bai Ling to ask about it when his expression suddenly chilled: Wrong!

Zhou Ying had likely expected this situation from the day he had established the Luwu—before, though each of the four great sects had had their own schemes, on the surface they still got along. If not for the emergence of Qiu Sha, it was an ironclad rule that cultivators of a righteous and orthodox sect couldn't cross another nation's border without a special summons.

Which of the great masters in Xuanyin had gotten worked up and allowed that demon to entice them into sanctioning the Luwu?

Zhou Ying wasn't afraid that the Luwu would be exposed. He wanted them to be exposed. If the Luwu were captured in another country, the other three sects would certainly react. It was a certainty that they would respond in kind. When malicious cultivators from other countries crossed the borders, Great Wan would have to advance its defense expenditures. The Luwu would have an even greater opportunity to expand.

How could Zhou Ying be a righteous man acting for the nation and the people? He was clearly driving wedges and sowing discord among the four great sects.

CHAPTER 114 - Unbound Knife (21)

“Okay,” Zhou Ying said, putting down his brush, “proceed according to established practices.”

Bai Ling, used to this, lowered his head, then made to withdraw. But when his body had half turned to paper, he was called back by Zhou Ying.

Zhou Ying said, “The Luwu lack experience and preparations, and they haven’t developed a complete set of established practices. Before, they remained hidden because no one knew about them. This is their first time dealing with domestic rebels. Though there has been an incident, those involved can be seen as pioneers. Double the compensation for the families of the bereaved. Whether this affair succeeds or fails, it will be recorded as a meritorious service. The names of the dead can be entered into the Kaiming Department Memorial Forest.”

Bai Ling was surprised. He quickly turned his head, almost suspecting that the person in front of him was an imposter wearing a spiritual image mask.

Luwu and enemies alike were like game pieces in Zhou Ying’s eyes. He didn’t care if a few of them died. He was too lazy to put on a show of humanity in front of Bai Ling. He had never glossed over anything. Because Bai Ling had been alone at the bottom of the Impassable Sea with him since childhood and was like one of his limbs, and he had nothing to conceal from his own hands and feet; and also because Bai Ling, impeded by being a half-demon, had nowhere to go in the human world. He wouldn't betray him.

Hearing this kind of news, when he was in a good mood, he would simply nod and instruct him to proceed as usual. When he was in a bad mood, he might very well say any kind of rude remark that could drive a person mad.

So this time, why...

“Find some time to go to the Yongning Marquis Manor and ask the Marquis to write a personal letter. Northern Li is the domain of the sword cultivators, a tight as a drum, not like chaotic Western Chu. If the Luwu there hit a dead end, they can take the Marquis's personal letter to the Beijue Mountains' Blind Wolf King. That old cripple is cruel and vicious. Don't stint on goods, just give him whatever he wants. That can save their lives.” Zhou Ying seemed not to have noticed his astonishment. He continued: “No need to worry about Chu, Shiyong is in Tao County, and he's pretty reliable when he isn't making mischief... I'm mostly worried about him getting himself into trouble—notify him, tell him that the situation is tense at the moment. Since he's already successfully placed someone inside the Zhao family, tell him to hold off for now. No matter what he wants to do, tell him to put it off.”

Bai Ling finally came back to himself, gave an affirmative, turned into paper, and flew away. For some reason, he was feeling a little better.

He handled everything concerned with the Luwu. He had heard many people's stories, put together many papermen for them. He could remember the names of the vast majority of them. When they died, the names would remain empty on his paper. If he could take those names out and carve them onto stone tablets, he supposed that would be a suitable arrangement.

It was rare for his lord to be thinking of them.

Zhou Ying lowered his eyes to look at the tips of his fingers. He had been about to say "The Luwu were going to be found out by the other nations sooner or later. This day was always going to come. What can that bunch of good-for-nothings do if they don't get properly hammered into shape a few times?"—that was in fact what he thought.

But when the words had come to his lips, seeing Bai Ling's somewhat gloomier than usual expression, Zhou Ying had suddenly thought that no matter what he said, Bai Ling would only answer "Yes, my lord," and everything would remain as before. It wouldn't change anything, except that the paperman would be upset.

Just the same as it wouldn't have changed anything whether he went to the Marquis Manor to see the old lady one last time or not: mortals had their allotted lifespans, and when those ran out, they died. A person's death was like a flame being extinguished; they didn't bring with them the sorrows, joys, and regrets of the world of the living.

Except that he found it hard to meditate late at night, his thoughts always hard to calm.

That being the case, when it was a matter of nothing but flapping his lips, why should he deliberately torment a person who wouldn't betray him? As if that was the only bit of power he had.

He was no longer a bird trapped half in the Impassable Sea and half in a cage in Jinping. He might as well stop living so pitifully.

When Xi Ping received Bai Ling's message, Yu Chang had just finished making a circle around the valley in Yu Family Bend.

Xi Ping, calm and unruffled, responded to Bai Ling: "Understood, you two can set your minds at ease about me."

Then he softened his voice slightly: "Bai Ling-da-ge, look after the brothers in Southern Shu. Don't worry about the Luwu in Western Chu, just leave them to me.”

Then he heard Yu Chang say composedly, smiling, “Well, Tai Sui, have you seen everything clearly? If not, shall I take you around again?”

Xi Ping turned to Xi Yue.

Xi Yue rubbed the center of his brow. “No need, I’ve memorized them.”

Good child!

If Xi Ping hadn’t been worried about getting another bite mark, he would have stepped up to slap him on the back.

He was just about to respond to Yu Chang when he heard Xi Yue continue: “There are nine core great arrays in the valley in all, connected to the other arrays throughout the valley, letting them work together and communicate amongst themselves. If the arrays in one place lose effect, the ones somewhere else can immediately make up the deficiency and organize a counterattack. He just showed a hundred and two arrays in all. That doesn’t match up with the arrangements of the core arrays. If I’ve guessed right, there must be about forty hidden arrays... As for how to disable them, I have to do research. Many of the great arrays are too complicated, not something an open-eyed cultivator will usually encounter.”

Xi Ping: "..."

The main reason he had called Xi Yue over was that he wasn't especially good at arrays, and most of the ones he knew were unorthodox ones he had learned in Wild Fox Country, and he couldn't conveniently locate an immortal tool that would record these for him. He knew Xi Yue had a perfect memory and had wanted him to come act as a brain, so he could save his mental energy to focus on working out how to deal with Yu Chang.

With Yu Chang's nasty attitude, if he discerned anything about Xi Ping, he would be able to lead him to his death in Yu Family Bend a hundred times over.

Xi Ping had just thought up what to say, but his plans couldn't keep up with the changing situation. A few sentences from little Xi Yue beat anything.

Xi Yue didn't understand his expression and once again unconsciously touched his neck. The dragon-taming chain was gone, he could no longer sense the other's emotions. He felt helpless. "Is there something wrong?"

"Nothing's wrong!" Xi Ping gave him a thumbs-up.

He turned to Yu Chang and responded in an affected tone, “That’s all? Fine, I don’t have anything to do. If you aren’t busy, let’s go around again.”

Yu Chang’s eyelids drooped. He thought, As I thought.

Xi Ping said, “I’ve counted up the arrays, and there are still forty-something missing. What, are you afraid I’ll get the upper hand if I see them?”

Yu Chang felt chilled.

Yu Family Bend’s great arrays had centuries of history behind them. They had gone through thirty and more major alterations and countless tweaks to improve them. A famous array master from the Sanyue Mountains had even been called in to advise on them. Common cultivators who fought on their own led difficult lives; those who were especially adept at inscriptions or arrays were very few—they didn’t have a chance to come upon the relevant resources.

Those hidden arrays were the Yu Family Valley’s true trump card. Yu Chang had deliberately not mentioned them. On the one hand, it was a test—on the other hand, he thought it would be for the best if Tai Sui charged in ignorantly and went to his peaceful rest in Yu Family Bend, not troubling him afterward.

If Tai Sui could tell that he was holding back, his strength would have to be reevaluated. But Yu Chang absolutely hadn't expected him to state the number right away! That showed that with a single glance, Tai Sui had eaten up the whole protective array formation of Yu Family Bend... No, this person frequently revealed only part of the truth. He might even know the approximate locations of the hidden arrays!

Yu Chang immediately became cautious: "Yes, I didn't finish just now. There are also hidden arrays that don't appear on the surface, they need to be brought out with spiritual energy. It will be suspicious if I look them over for no reason. For that part, I can draw a plan."

Xi Ping inwardly ground his teeth: Why didn't you say so before, asshole?

But he only gave a meaningful laugh, as if he didn't care at all about Yu Chang's attempt and wasn't worried about whether he would tamper with the plan. His attitude said he understood everything perfectly well.

Yu Chang's heart stuttered in spite of himself. He suddenly felt uncertain.

Wait, Yu Chang thought. Before, when this Tai Sui sent that unweaned little girl to see Bu Zhichou, Bu Zhichou even had to give them the spirit-gathering array. It was as if they understood neither the immortal sect's filth nor had any skill in arrays. Starting then, Yu Chang had somewhat looked down on this “good neighbor” who had moved in only a few years ago.

Now it seemed likely that Tai Sui had deliberately gone to see Bu Zhichou in Yu Family Bend, deliberately revealed that he wanted a hundred thousand white spirits, all in order to hook him!

Including the spiritual image brand stamping spike in the Zhao family hidden realm.

That he could swap a living person for a paperman right under the noses of the Zhaos showed that Tai Sui had infiltrated them long ago. If they had really only wanted to use the identity of the Zhao young mistress to enter Sanyue’s inner sect, couldn’t they have just substituted her after the Dragon and Phoenix Symbolizing Good Fortune had been stamped? Why would they need to run the risk of stealing the spiritual image brand right in front of his face, right in front of the faces of dozens of cultivators from the Zhao and Yu families?

They had deliberately stolen it to show him!

This thread had been buried very deep. Yu Chang involuntarily broke out in a cold sweat, feeling that all his schemes were a joke. He had even guessed that this person was an ignorant youngster. “Who are you, anyway?”

“A person who bears you no ill will.” Tai Sui seemed to be laughing. Then he said unfathomably, “Merely an old acquaintance of the immortal sects.”

Yu Chang’s pupils contracted almost imperceptibly. He thought he understood the implication behind these words—the inheritor of an ancient demonic god suppressed by the immortal mountains planning to seize power and take vengeance...another Qiu Sha!

Qiu Sha had single-handedly slaughtered a batch of ascended spirits in Tao County and caused the Silver Moon to come down to the mortal world... and when Qiu Sha had become an ascended spirit, it had also been the fifteenth day of the eighth month.

Yu Chang was silent for a moment, then adapted to the circumstances, bending accordingly. “Very well. As long as you remove my brand, apart from the blood covenant, I’ll help you legitimately take over Yu Family Bend.”

Xi Ping was a master at puffing himself up. He knew he couldn’t say too much. If he said too much, he was sure to slip up. So he gave an elusive laugh and left Yu Chang to scare himself, breaking off contact.

Next to him, Xi Yue had heard the whole thing. Before they could start catching up, he frowned. “What are you going to do?”

“Bring in the harvest.” Xi Ping waved a hand. The pool in the Law Breaker turned back into an observation pavilion. “Come here, let me have a look at you... Hey, kid, before, you and Ancestor Luo would be like brothers standing next to each other, and now you’re nearly as tall as I am. If my shifu hadn’t been injured in the East Sea and been forced to go into seclusion, it would have been good for him to bring you back to Flying Jade Peak. If our Yue-bao’er with his natural talents can’t get into the inner sect, then what idiot is worthy of it?”

Xi Yue ignored his flattery. Not letting him off, he said, “I just heard that His Highness Prince Zhuang said that the Luwu were exposed recently and the situation in Western Chu is tense, and he wants you not to act rashly.”

With exaggerated astonishment, Xi Ping said, “You remembered so many arrays at once and you still had attention left to spare? Heavens, never mind the inner sect, why hasn’t the Marquis sent you to become the Number One Scholar in the imperial exams? All our ancestral tombs would start smoking from blessings because of you!”

Xi Yue said, “Xi Shiyong!”

Xi Ping clicked his tongue and flicked Xi Yue on the forehead at a distance. “Where are your manners! Don’t go around calling your big brother’s courtesy name.”

When he had gone home last time, he had seen Xi Yue performing the salute appropriate to a family junior and known that his parents had taken this boy who had also received the name “Xi Yue” as one of the family. Now, as was only to be expected, he acknowledged it.

Xi Ping thought: “Giving him this name back then might be the best decision I’ve ever made in my life.”

With the difference in cultivation level bearing down on him, Xi Yue couldn’t dodge. He took the hit, but he only felt it as a slight cool breeze blowing by.

The headstrong and bossy young master understood propriety now. Without being taught, he had learned how to be an older brother.

“I know what’s appropriate, relax. You heard wrong just now. I wasn’t talking about anything coming up immediately,” Xi Ping said, placating him. “Don’t tell san-ge. You won’t get taller if you tell secrets—do Mom and Dad treat you well? When Cui Ji gets new products in twice a year, does Mom hang bits and bobs all over you each time and try out any new rouge color on your face first?”

Xi Yue’s eyes strung. “No, she said I have to wear the blue clothes, so I have to keep my dignity.”

“What the hell? What kind of favoritism is that?!” Xi Ping swayingly crossed one leg over the other and shook his head, saying accusingly, “Loving the new and tiring of the old. She gets a little one and suddenly she’s a stepmother...”

Xi Yue interrupted his nonsense: “Why don’t you come back to take a look? Stay a while in Jinping, show yourself. How much of your time can that use up, immortal?”

Xi Ping was speechless for a moment, not knowing where to start.

When a person has millions of words in their heart and nowhere to start, they’ll always look older, no matter how youthful their face.

“I can’t yet,” he said at last, as though nothing were the matter. “I... Well, hasn’t Xuanyin Mountain said all along that Flying Jade Peak is sealed? In fact, there’s an inside story. I still have things to do. When I’m done, I’ll come back at once. Mom and Dad are getting old, don’t make them worry.”

At this point, he paused, and added with a smile, “What am I telling you for? You’re much more reliable than I am.”

At a glance, Xi Ping was just the same as five years ago in the East Sea, without a trace of wear on his features. But as soon as Xi Yue met those familiar eyes, he felt half a lifetime’s separation.

Xi Yue lowered his voice and asked, “What do you have to do?”

“I can’t say, so don’t ask.” Xi Ping wiggled a finger at him. “If you lack for anything, ask me, and if I can’t get it, there’s still san-ge.”

Xi Yue abruptly clenched his half wooden and metal fists. For five years, he had desperately studied arrays and followed Pang Jian, changing his half-puppet body from the inside out with stroke after stroke of the knife, trying to become a little stronger, a little stronger... This way, the next time he met stormy seas in the East Sea, he wouldn’t be tossed aside with a single talisman.

But he was like Kuafu chasing the sun. When he had run until his legs were broken, he would still be further than ever from the goal he was chasing.⁷⁴

“What?” The dragon-taming chain was gone, but Xi Ping still seemed to be able to read his emotions. He said, smiling, “I’m not deliberately concealing it from you. You’re always around that old fox Pang Jian. If you fart he knows what restaurant you went to the day before. What’s the difference between telling you and notifying Heaven’s Design Pavilion? There are some things that can’t be divulged yet.”

Xi Yue said stubbornly, “Then I’ll stay with you.”

“That’s disgraceful. Don’t go on distant travels away from your parents. Can’t you pick up any of my good qualities?”

Xi Yue: “...”

Xi Ping considered. “Fair enough, apart from being handsome and elegant and especially lovable, I don’t have any other good qualities... Alas, I was born this way, there’s nothing I can do about it—all right, aren’t I asking for your help with something? Go home, I have a lot of guests here today. When you get back, copy out the arrays for me. Afterward, if you miss me, just give a shout, and I’ll bring you here to play. You can see me whenever you want.”

“You...”

Before Xi Yue could say anything, he felt emptiness beneath his feet. It was as if he had fallen from a great height.

The next moment, he woke up in his own body. He abruptly opened his eyes and looked around. He found that he had returned to the Marquis Manor in Jinping. It was broad daylight.

As Xi Ping listened to Xi Yue's curses coming through the reincarnation wood, treating it as amusement, he played the qin for a while inside the hidden realm—the Luwu had been exposed, san-ge's message had said, so Sanyue Mountain would also know. How would they react?

San-ge had only sent a message, indicating that Wild Fox Country must be comparatively safe. Because of Qiu Sha, Tao County had just been plowed by the Silver Moon. As soon as the shed skin had left, the ascended spirits had arrived. If Sanyue only had a bit of faith in their own masters, they wouldn't be too nervous about the Wan-Chu border here. At most they would send a few people to come look it over. The Luwu masks had been upgraded. As long as Xuanwu didn't come in person, others wouldn't easily be able to see through the Luwu masks.

But...it was only a few days until the fifteenth of the eighth month.

Once the spirit-gathering array was activated, Tao County's veins of the earth were certain to change. Even with the cover of the Law Breaker Bracelet keeping Sanyue from seeing clearly what was happening here, any Qilin Guard who came along would still be able to discover it.

What should he do?

Wei Chengxiang and Zhao Qindan had finished cycling their energy, so Xi Ping sent the two of them out—after all, their bodies were still in Yu Family Bend. If their consciousnesses stayed here too long, they might change.

Then he himself also left the Law Breaker Bracelet and turned into a barefoot doctor with a medicine chest on his back, appearing in the countryside in Tao County. He walked along the bleak little lanes. Perhaps it was his mistake, but Xi Ping felt that Tao County seemed to have become a little more still.

As he passed a little village, he heard a creak. He turned his head and saw a familiar-looking little boy come outside yawning and stretch sleepily. Then the kid found a big tree at the gate to his house, opened his pants, and turned on the waterworks.

The tree was a reincarnation wood tree.

Didn't this bunch of wild kids have anyone to mind them?!

Xi Ping instantly remembered that this rotten brat was the one who had wiped snot on a reincarnation wood tree. The new grievance added to the old resentment surged up in his heart.

He got his revenge at once. He used spiritual energy to gently nudge a bird in the tree. The bird, which had been laying in its nest, was immediately startled awake and dropped a big load of sky fertilizer, hitting the child's bald pate dead on.

At first, the boy didn't realize what had happened. He reached out to touch his head, brought it in front of his face, and only realized after a long while what this was. He burst into tears.

The wicked Xi Ping walked by him slowly with his medicine chest on his back. When he was near him, he deliberately pulled a face at the kid. "Oh, hey, have you got a new hat there?"

The kid howled even harder.

"Heh..." Xi Ping was amused. He was just about to continue adding oil to the fire when his gaze paused, and the corners of his mouth froze—there was a new full moon scab on the back of the child's hand. He remembered that it hadn't been there when he had wiped the snot before.

Xi Ping frowned and carefully cast a beam of spiritual energy like a strand of hair into the child's meridians and circled through them. He found that this lively-looking child's undeveloped meridians were like a pot of grass that hadn't been watered in a month, nearly dried-up. On the back of his hand, on his back, under his ear, on his foot...all over his body were no less than ten full moon scabs of all sizes, with an outer circle glistening like a snake's scales and a black center, viciously sucking out his life force. It made a person's scalp go numb to see.

"Yu-xiong," Xi Ping immediately sent word to Yu Chang. In a grave voice, he said, "I'd like to ask you about something. If the Sanyue Spiritual Mountains have already decided to allocate a batch of pills to Tao County, why have they only come to collect medicinal herbs from Yu Family Bend now?"

On this schedule, even if Xuanyin Mountain's Rosy Cloud Peak picked up and moved to Tao County, there would still be no time to refine enough pills for the whole county to take before Mid-Autumn. Had Elder Xuanwu gone senile from having to hold his breath all the time? Didn't he know that Mid-Autumn was the deadline?

Yu Chang was silent for a moment, then responded, “Well—as far as I know, all the types of herbs that pill needs are actually aquatic. Yu Family Bend’s medicinal herb fields don’t produce them.”

Xi Ping said, “What?”

Then who are you turning out in such force to sell to?

“Medicine given to mortals naturally won’t be refined by inner sect immortals themselves. The high elders only issue the order to set aside the funds and spiritual stones.” Yu Chang sighed and said, “As for whose medicinal herb field the money ultimately winds up in, that depends on the connections of the various families, not what their fields grow... I suppose there aren’t so many of these things in Great Wan. It’s a skeleton in the closet. How embarrassing.”

Xi Ping’s figure bearing the medicine chest disappeared around a corner where no one could see him. Finally, he sent Yu Chang a message: “Before noon, prepare your stamping spike and come over as fast as you can.”

That day, Xi Ping copied three Yu Changs inside the Law Breaker Bracelet. Using the same technique he had used to steal the Dragon and Phoenix Symboling Prosperity, he drew the brand from Yu Chang into midair.

It was as if Yu Chang had had a layer of skin peeled off him. His strength exhausted, he lay flat on the ground, free but wretched. He spent ages gasping for breath before he gathered the strength to laugh aloud.

He panted as he laughed, nearly going off key toward the end with an odd sobbing note. “Tai Sui, which members of the Yu family do you want to kill? Which of their things do you want to steal? For...for this, I’ll kill for you, I’ll steal for you... I can also...I can also kill the whole clan, dig up their ancestral tombs, fuck their ancestors... Over four hundred years... Over four hundred years!”

The sound of the Tai Sui Qin paused. Behind the qin, Xi Ping raised his eyes—

CHAPTER 115 - Unbound Knife (22)

This generation's Yu family clan leader was named "Zhiyuan," courtesy name "Guangbo,"⁷⁵ with open-eyed level cultivation. His appearance was fairly regular, with a small beard to demonstrate gravity. He was currently walking in a hurry, but still with a perfectly sedate bearing.

He was the sky above the heads in Yu Family Bend. He couldn't appear to panic in front of people.

The others followed behind him according to their family ranking. All their expressions were very grim.

Three days ago at noon, inside the ancestral hall in the Yu family's main residence, a decorative stone tablet on the offering mat at the door had suddenly fallen to the ground and shattered, scaring the old servant who was sweeping witless. And it seemed this had been an ill omen. Three days later, a letter came flying from the rear mountain and went directly to the Yu family clan leader.

Their family's "that gentleman" had reached the end of his days. Their "guardian beast" was going to return into the West.

Common cultivators who could cross the established foundation boundary were already as rare as phoenix feathers or unicorn horns, and a four-hundred-year-old consummate established foundation was one of a kind. As this chief offering had begun spending more and more time in seclusion, the Yus had been prepared. A century ago, they had already started looking out for offering cultivators with outstanding talents to replace him.

But that was easily said. How many people within the immortal mountains' inner sect could reach the edges of an ascended spirit? Ascending to within half a step of an ascended spirit was perhaps not completely unheard of, but it was close enough.

Therefore, the clan leader's mood was very sorrowful. He was inwardly pondering whether he ought to get someone to upgrade the array formation in the valley or bring some more branded cultivators in... Which would be more cost-effective?

This chief offering had chosen a bad time to die. His boss's imperial grandson in the inner sect took the better part of his spending money from the clan. Now that they had made an engagement with the Zhao family, sending them north would be another major expense. Others had already begun complaining, coming repeatedly in the last few days to draw funds from the clan for their projects. There was no way to dam the flow, so it looked like they would need to think of a way to expand their financial resources.

It was so hard being the head of a big family!

They reached an isolated little courtyard house in the deepest recesses of the forest. An invisible barrier blocked their way.

Quite a few of the Yu family's other offerings had come as well. They scattered and made several circles, scouting from the outside. Some were sighing, some were envying the ostentation, and some seemed to have seen their own fate. And then there were those drooling over the position of chief offering that was about to be emptied... There was more than one such person.

Clan Leader Yu passed through the crowd and said politely in a loud voice: "Ancestor, this is Zhiyuan. If you have anything to pass on, would you like to see me?"

After a moment, a black shadow spread over the empty ground at the gate and went up to Clan Leader Yu's feet like a path, inviting him to come in.

The clan leader hesitated instinctively. Each time he saw this gentleman, he always felt a little apprehensive. It was as if his family had a pet lion or tiger. While they were the ones feeding it, if you woke in the middle of the night to find that big beast crouched by your bed, slavering, you would be scared enough to burst your guts.

But the clan leader's gaze traveled around. The whole clan was watching him. He couldn't lose face, so he stepped into the shadow.

In the last hundred years, hadn't he already come here apprehensively every time? And this would be the last time.

As he thought this, he felt a little sentimental.

Pained and sentimental, Clan Leader Yu's shadow blended into the shadow on the ground, as if he had been swallowed in one gulp by that big shadow.

Then, as soon as the clan leader with his myriad concerns entered the small room, just as he had wished, he laid down his heavy burden and went to his eternal rest.

Yu Chang bent slightly and examined Clan Leader Yu's fresh corpse from above. In that moment, he seemed to be chewing over some taste. Then his eyes narrowed in satisfaction. A long, thin shadow burrowed into the clan leader's corpse and removed the assorted protective immortal tools from his body one by one. At the same time, a transport array formed in midair.

The transport array dispersed in a glare of light, and a Clan Leader Yu identical to the deceased appeared with a blank expression. After a breath, Clan Leader Yu's eyes suddenly changed, becoming lively—it was Xi Ping coming over in a paperman.

Xi Ping's first reaction after landing was to put some distance between himself and Yu Chang. Then he silently placed inscriptions on all the paperman's features and inspected his own shadow.

He glanced at Clan Leader Yu's corpse. Lowering his voice, he said, "That easy?"

For better or worse, this person was still a half-immortal. With a murder weapon like Yu Chang in the room, aimed at him, his spiritual sense must have been smeared with shit for him not to have felt it.

Xi Ping judged others by his own standards. A long string of conspiracies flashed through his mind. "Is it a trick? Does he have a substitute? Could he be playing dead? Might this..."

Before he could finish speaking, he saw the shadow wrapped around the clan leader suddenly burrow into the center of the corpse's brow. A small whirlpool appeared on Clan Leader Yu's smooth brow. The flesh warped. Then it was the bone warping with a shattering sound. Then the “whirlpool” became larger and larger as it twisted. The corpse’s features ran off, the eyes nearly burst from their sockets, the nose bent like a bow...and the mouth nearly turned up to the cheekbone on one side!

Xi Ping once again experienced the terror he had felt sitting astride the wall at the Marquis Manor watching the corpse of the young master next door give him a “charming smile.” “Stop, stop, stop...what are you doing!”

Yu Chang exhaled softly and answered him primly: “I have performed an inspection. It isn’t a substitute, and he isn’t playing dead. Why don’t you have a look for yourself?”

Xi Ping looked at his eyes, once again starting to turn red, and said gravely, “They say that once the spiritual image brand is removed, you’re no longer in danger of losing your mind, did you know that?”

Yu Chang abruptly raised his eyes and looked into the face of the clan leader, the corners of his eyes twitching involuntarily. He took a sudden deep breath and averted his gaze. After a moment, he said almost inaudibly, “You’re right.

“This kind of half-immortal practically has no spiritual sense in the end.” Yu Chang didn’t look at Xi Ping, only tossed the immortal tools from the body to him and put the corpse into his mustard seed. “As half-immortals, these people won't be harmed by drink and lust, so they have no self-restraint. Food, wine, and beauty will quickly numb a person, so they have to turn to snow wine, and when even snow wine can no longer make them happy, some people will even swallow talismans in pursuit of stimulation—spiritual sense? Ha... Are your people ready?"

Xi Yue hadn't been idle the last few days. He had repeatedly compared the arrays he himself had memorized and calculated against the plans Yu Chang had supplied, and he had eaten his way through all the ancient texts. At this time, the half-puppet's consciousness was inside the Law Breaker Bracelet. He could borrow a paperman to come over at any time...though unless there was absolutely no choice, Xi Ping wasn't planning on having him come.

A paperman breaking wasn't life-threatening, but the consciousness would certainly be injured. Little Xi Yue hadn't been shattered by shed skins. He wasn't so resistant to shocks.

"A-Xiang," Xi Ping said to Wei Chengxiang, "how are you doing?"

With the help of a group of Luwu, Wei Chengxiang had already completed the spirit-gathering array in Tao County. She inspected it one final time and responded, "All is ready—the waste won't exceed twenty percent."

In other words, they needed a hundred twenty thousand liang.

Then Wei Chengxiang added, “Young Mistress Zhao helped quite a bit. Standard product of the Latent Cultivation Temple. Her basic skills are solid.”

Xi Ping laughed. On the surface, Wei Chengxiang seemed not to get on with Zhao Qindan at all. In just a few words, she could make the young mistress explode from anger. She was always amusing herself at her expense. But she seemed to be rather worried that this “house cat” wouldn’t be able to survive in the wild. She kept talking about her, explicitly and implicitly, secretly wanting to win a place for her in Tao County.

Xi Ping pretended he hadn’t noticed and didn’t pick up the subject. He gave a few instructions, then contacted the Luwu.

“According to your instructions, my brothers and the spiritual stones have all been sent away. We’ve left substitutes behind in the Immortal Palace,” said Lao Tian, who had stayed back to watch the Immortal Palace. He paused, then anxiously said, “Tai Sui, may I ask, what is going to happen?”

“We can’t hold on to the Snake King identity,” Xi Ping said quickly. “The Snake King came from Great Wan to begin with. Now that the Luwu have been exposed in Southern Shu, his origins are too sensitive. We need a new identity.”

Lao Tian said, “But Wild Fox Country is already an evil cultivator black market. If we abandon the Snake King’s Immortal Palace, won’t other evil cultivators come to fill the vacancy?”

“No,” Xi Ping answered calmly, “I have a plan.”

Having said this, without turning a hair, he once again cut off the updates the Luwu were sending to Bai Ling.

Heaven favored the preservation of lives, but san-ge didn’t. If san-ge knew why he was plotting at a critical moment like this, he might borrow a pagoda for trapping a river monster from Master Lin and lock him up in it.

This time, he had to cut first and get beaten later.

After making his arrangements, Xi Ping exchanged a last look with Yu Chang. They nodded at each other.

The redness in Yu Chang’s eyes had yet to fade. Xi Ping thought, Can I rely on this mad dog?

So he couldn't resist saying, "Take whatever revenge you need, but for the sake of your Way of the Heart, don't kill indiscriminately. After you've crossed the great river, don't overturn your boat in a sewer."

Yu Chang put a mind clearing pill in his mouth and said dully, "There's no need for you to tell me."

Xi Ping quickly reviewed everything in his mind. For some reason, while it all looked like a sure thing, his spiritual sense seemed to have something to say. It was on edge.

But the arrow was already on the string. They had even done away with Yu Family Bend's local tyrant. They had to move forward and usurp the throne.

Xi Ping turned and walked out of Yu Chang's little compound—before Clan Leader Yu had died, Xi Ping had pulled him into the Law Breaker and made a copy of the clan leader's consciousness that he controlled. Now, the dazed controlled consciousness was inside the paperman. Xi Ping relaxed his suppression slightly, and the paperman, under the influence of the copied consciousness, automatically assumed the posture of the original before his death.

“Those who are on friendly terms with him can go over and say goodbye,” Xi Ping said with the paperman’s pained face. With an appearance of propriety, he instructed, “But the death of a great master will cause a large commotion. This place is dangerous. Please do not linger. The rear mountain is temporarily restricted. Do not allow anyone to wander in by mistake.”

Everyone heard this and took it for granted—a near-ascended spirit master might bring down half a mountain with a hiccup or a fart. So one after another they made perfunctory bows and salutes toward Yu Chang’s compound. In hardly any time, they had all scattered, afraid that if they were a step too slow they would get dragged in.

Xi Ping: “...”

He wasn’t very popular.

“Hey, listen, Yu-xiong, even dogs won’t come near you, right?”

Yu Chang’s cold laugh came through the reincarnation wood: “If your family’s pig or dog dies of pestilence, won’t you be in a rush to burn it? Are you really going keep the coffin for seven days and wear mourning instead?”

Xi Ping: “...”

He let the body and the remaining copied consciousness take him back to where the clan leader lived. Xi Ping walked into the room and dismissed the attendants, then immediately took full control of the paperman's body and started rifling through everything like a thief.

Yu Chang gave him a hint: "Inside the pillow."

"Ah...ah-choo!" As soon as Xi Ping raised the bed curtain, he was decked right in the face by fragrance. The sense of smell of an established foundation cultivator could catch a lingering scent from days ago. As soon as Xi Ping stuck his head in, he smelled at least seven or eight different kinds of rouge and powder. It was so stifling that he sneezed.

As he wiped his nose, he reached out to touch the pillow. Indeed, there was a mustard seed inside. In spite of himself, he broke out in gooseflesh.

"You've even seen what's inside another person's bed curtains... You really are rotten!"

Yu Chang laughed without answering.

Xi Ping jumped into the mustard seed and was nearly blinded by the superb collection of rare treasures. Even Cui Ji's cousin involuntarily felt hatred for the rich.

On the innermost shelves were account books. Unlike the public accounts, these account books recorded Yu Family Bend's true riches.

Xi Ping roughly flipped through a few and shut them with a bang. He took a deep breath and said to Yu Chang, "I need a hundred twenty thousand white spirits to activate the spirit-gathering array. You can do what you like with the rest, take it or destroy it, whatever, but leave at least eighty percent of the remaining spiritual stones to return to Yu Family Bend—that's one of the things for the blood covenant."

Yu Chang laughed meaningfully and saw an opportunity to make an attempt at probing. "Common cultivators have always been short on resources. Those like Tai Sui who know when to stop are rare."

Xi Ping ignored him. He coldly said, "You can prepare to 'blow up' the rear mountain."

When Yu Chang blew up the rear mountain to fake his death, the spiritual energy in the valley would be disordered for a brief span. They could use that time to tamper with the protective arrays.

Xi Ping sent word to Xi Yue: "Yu can't be relied on, we have to work as quickly as possible."

Xi Yue was just about to say something when Xi Ping's spiritual sense was suddenly touched. Someone was approaching.

He stepped out of the mustard seed and heard footsteps like a cat's coming from outside. Someone softly called, "Clan leader."

Xi Ping put on his act. "Come in."

Then a "page" came in discreetly. "Clan leader, a letter for you."

Xi Ping reached out to take it, but the "page" took the opportunity to grab his hand and quickly brush his palm, then raised a pair of eyes like a soul summoning spell and cast an amorous glance at him. A familiar scent came from this person—it was one of the scents that had just made Xi Ping sneeze!

Realistic gooseflesh rose on the paperman. Xi Ping bristled: there was a monster taking advantage of him! Wait, no...was this monster male or female? And they were so ugly. If they didn't have the money to buy a mirror, then couldn't they piss themselves one?

Xi Yue: "..."

He'd been about to say something, but he'd completely forgotten the words.

Xi Ping dropped his act at once, playing a haughty old official according to his own instincts: "Did I summon you?"

The "page" hadn't expected their flattery to go astray. They knelt sinuously and said in a delicate, soft voice, "Clan leader, Lan'er was wrong..."

Saying so, they tried to throw themselves at his shoes.

Xi Ping had been prepared and stepped back. The "page" came up empty, falling on the ground with an "ow."

Next, the tip of a shoe smelling of the mud of the rear of the mountain raised the "page"'s chin, and a cold gaze shot toward them.

Xi Ping still couldn't tell how this person had the face to attempt seduction—even he hadn't attempted that! "Get out of here!"

When he had dispatched the unlucky suitor, Xi Yue said to him, "Young mast... Ge, let me come over there, I'll cut off the arrays."

Xi Ping pretended not to have heard him, opening the letter with "single-minded devotion." This letter was actually sealed, with "To be unsealed by the clan leader in person” written on it. Only Clan Leader Yu himself could open it, or else the contents would be destroyed.

As soon as Xi Ping drew near, he perceived faint spiritual energy. He was a little bewildered: “Do cultivators write letters to each other now?”

Couldn’t they use an immortal tool to communicate? Or did Yu Family Bend have special customs?

Fortunately, Clan Leader Yu’s consciousness was preserved inside the paperman. Xi Ping opened the letter easily. As soon as he opened it, he knew why it had to be delivered as a letter—this was a rather ceremonious calling card.

Xi Ping’s spiritual sense abruptly jumped.

Written on the calling card was: I am acting upon orders from the immortal sect to patrol the Wan-Chu border in order to guard against villains fomenting rebellion. The Zhao family hidden realm has disembarked in Yu Family Bend and has had contact with your family. I fear they have been infiltrated by “Luwu,” so I shall be coming to pay a visit in one ke. Presently I am patrolling in secret, so it is not convenient to reveal my whereabouts. I hope the clan leader will cooperate. The immortal sect’s personal order is attached.

Respectfully yours, Xiang Wenqing of Sanyue's West Peak.

Xi Ping's mind buzzed. Xiang Wenqing...Xiang Wenqing...

He quickly searched for that name in the secret news he had heard in Wild Fox Country: right, this person was ranked second on the West Peak of Sanyue's three Principal Peaks; he came from a collateral branch of the Xiang family. Rumor said that this master was the one behind the Yu family. He had been the one to get the Yu family's worthless imperial grandson into the inner sect... An ascended spirit of the middle stage.

At the same time, Yu Chang also saw the calling card with his omnipresent grit worms. The two of them spoke almost in unison.

Yu Chang said, "It seems it's true that schemers have bad luck."

Xi Ping said: "You must be an unlucky star incarnate."

"Xi Yue," Xi Ping quickly sent his thought. With his current cultivation level, he could already sense the master at the gate. "There's been a problem, let's not..."

Before he could finish speaking, he heard a huge sound. The rear mountain collapsed—Yu Chang had ignited the prepared array, fabricating the explosion of a near-ascended spirit cultivator's death. In the calm valley of the Yu family's main residence, there was a great disturbance in the spiritual energy. Arrays of all sizes were in uproar, and all immortal tools of established foundation grade or below stopped working at the same time!

Yu Chang's voice came through the reincarnation wood: "With an ancestor in the middle ascended spirit stage here, if I play dead halfway, he's sure to see through me. It's better to fight a quick and decisive campaign."

Tai Sui had clearly known that Sanyue would be sending someone soon, yet had insisted on activating the spirit-gathering array before Mid-Autumn. That showed he absolutely needed those hundred twenty thousand white spirits. Yu Chang guessed that Tao County's safety was perhaps connected to his Way of the Heart. A hundred twenty thousand white spirits was no small number. He might only have this one shot. Could he stand to abandon it?

There was no time to lose, and the opportunity wouldn't come again if he passed it up!

Yu Chang thought: We'll see whether the Sanyue inner sect dog or this mysterious evil god of Wild Fox Country will take the upper hand.

If Xiang Wenqing died, he would happily applaud. If Tai Sui died, he would be even more at liberty in the future.

“Tai Sui, my assignment has been completed. I’ll hand the rest over to you.”

Xi Ping: “...”

He’d known he couldn’t rely on this bastard at the critical moment!

CHAPTER 116 - Unbound Knife (23)

After conveying the last message, Yu Chang crushed the reincarnation wood. He took out a pearl and put it in his mouth, silently “melting” into the shadows—this was the shadow transforming pearl, his last life-saving trump card.

With the shadow transforming pearl in your mouth, you could blend into the shadows of all things. He could move freely within the shadows, and he could also remain unmoving himself, letting the shadows of other things carry him along. A single beam of light could send him very far. With Yu Chang’s cultivation level, as long as no one saw him transform into a shadow, he could even avoid the notice of a shed skin.

The only shortcoming was that he couldn’t use spiritual energy, or else he would immediately give away his location.

This was something he had anonymously found a toolmaker on the black market to make by draining Yu Chang’s own essence. After it was completed, he had killed the toolmaker to keep the secret.

In the rear of the mountain of the Yu family main residence by moonlight, there were swaying shadows of trees and flowers everywhere. They concealed him perfectly.

The spiritual stones he had detonated had precisely the amount of spiritual energy that a near-ascended spirit would release upon dying. He had “lost his mind and died”; his corpse would have turned to dust. His consciousness would have been destroyed.

“I’ll ‘die’ for now out of respect.” Amid the dancing shadows of the trees, Yu Chang changed form, extending and contracting, rambling with the wind and the light. Secure in the knowledge of his own safety, he thought, “Those two can do as they please.”

Sadly, he didn’t have a handful of spicy melon seeds, or else he could have spat them in that qin demon’s face.

Xi Ping had been connected to Yu Chang’s spirit. He could now faintly sense that traitorous mad dog’s general position, but he couldn’t pull him into the Law Breaker Bracelet while he was clear-headed. Yu Chang wasn’t an open-eyed cultivator—in just the same way, a strong man could lift a baby with hardly any effort, but he couldn’t carry off a man of the same build as himself.

In a flash, Xi Ping seemed to have come to the end of the line. But as if he had been driven mad, he suddenly laughed.

The next moment, the consciousness of the ascended spirit cultivator who was already at the gate covered them, enveloping all of Yu Family Bend County within itself.

But just before the ascended spirit consciousness covered them, the paperman Xi Ping was occupying turned and was taken away by a transport array.

Yu Chang, watching him through the grit worms that covered the whole valley, froze: was he giving up just like that?

Yu Chang was forced to gasp in admiration once more. Tai Sui was so cautious, so restrained—he stood his ground in the face of temptation and suppressed his greed when faced with a mountain of gold. Suffering defeat on the verge of victory, he could break off his tail to survive without any hesitation.

No wonder he had managed to cultivate to a near-ascended spirit without giving himself away.

“A personage like this, if he doesn’t die, there’s no saying how far he’ll go in the future,” Yu Chang thought. “He’s even more frightening than that brash and showy Qiu Sha. Perhaps I ought to do a good deed. While he has yet to reach an ascended spirit, lead the Xiang family master to Tao County and give those two a chance to ‘make friends’...”

But that Tai Sui had after all saved his life, and helped him remove the brand.

There was a colossal difference between their histories and styles, but deep down there was a subtle similarity between them. It wasn't precisely “encountering a bosom friend by the high mountains and flowing waters,” more like “a fly and an ant meeting in a manure pit”... Maybe that was also why Tai Sui had given him a helping hand.

As he thought this, Yu Chang secretly sighed: if not for the fact that the Great Way to heaven was long and full of obstacles, and this person knew too much about him, he thought they might have gotten on pretty well.

But just as Yu Chang was for once finding his conscience, deciding “Forget it, I'll do the right thing and leave a chance for us to meet in the future,” his spiritual sense suddenly manifested with a shudder, quashing Yu Chang's rare good intentions.

Roaming through the shadows, Yu Chang suddenly raised his head: Wait, this was wrong. Why was he sensing...his own aura?!

Xi Ping thought that in destroying the reincarnation wood amulet the two of them had used to communicate, Yu Chang's intention had been to stifle him to death. Right now, he had nowhere to express his bellyful of self-satisfaction and mockery—a person who had been in the Law Breaker Bracelet, no matter how careful he was not to get brought in a second time, already had his traces preserved forever inside the Law Breaker.

“Tao County and Yu Family Bend put together make up about a hundred li of land. In a day or two, even a mortal could stroll over, never mind a cultivator. Why would it take a transport array? Hilarious.”

Yu Chang was haughty and self-important, extremely crafty. Xi Ping had to use him, but he didn't dare to trust him...and he was planning to use him to do something rather dishonest.

So back when everyone had been making their preparations, Xi Ping had copied two “Yu Chang” consciousnesses, then brought the two of them into the world through papermen—the copies were of the “Yu Chang” who had entered the Law Breaker Bracelet at the beginning. They hadn't signed a blood covenant with Xi Ping, didn't know their complete plans, and didn't know that the original Yu Chang's brand had already been removed... This was the “Yu Chang” who had known upon seeing the original that the original was planning to use him as a substitute for the brand, so he struck first in self-defense.

The copied Yu Changs were miraculous. When Xi Ping wasn't paying attention to them, they shared the original's evil designs. But as creations of the Tai Sui Qin, the two of them were also like two walking reincarnation wood trees whose spirits could be controlled by Xi Ping at any time—and they didn't know it themselves.

Privately, Xi Ping decided to call the two of them “Yu Chang the First and Yu Chang the Second.”

If Yu Chang didn't make trouble, the two papermen would be Xi Ping's avatars. If Yu Chang got up to tricks right before they entered battle, these two were there to restrain him.

The two dear friends “First” and “Second” had been born half a shichen apart and hadn't seen each other. They didn't know of each other's existence, and each thought he had been copied in order to serve as a “vessel” for the original's brand and had reached an agreement with Tai Sui, who “seemed to be working with the original, but was actually opposed to him”; they were scheming toward the same goal: first work with Tai Sui to kill the original, then, after replacing the true Yu Chang, try to turn around and kill Tai Sui.

Right now, Yu Chang the First had already reached Yu Family Valley a step ahead on his sword.

Xi Ping's pretext to "First" had been, "In order to investigate Southern Wan's spies, Sanyue is sending a master to patrol the Wan-Chu border. Their first stop will be Yu Family Bend, where the Zhao family came ashore. The original Yu Chang is planning to fake his death and escape from Yu Family Bend, hide for a while after removing the brand, then when Sanyue has left return to Yu Family Bend to get revenge."

"A guest from Sanyue" had originally been Xi Ping's made-up reason, used to fool "Brother First," but it turned out that at this critical moment, Yu Chang really had summoned a great personage from the Sanyue inner sect, completely living up to expectations as a traitor on the battlefield.

It was true that schemers all had bad luck—there was nothing wrong with that statement. Yu Chang-xiong knew that very well.

Sadly, knowing was one thing—his knowledge didn't match his actions. He kept on crawling through the pit he himself had dug.

When the original Yu Chang detonated the rear mountain and seeped into the shadow transforming pearl, Yu Chang the First, who had stealthily infiltrated Yu Family Valley, already had a “perfect understanding” of the situation.

No one understands a person better than himself. Even with his eyes closed, this Brother First could deduce the path the original had taken to escape via the shadow transforming pearl.

Now, “First” heard Tai Sui’s “weak and hoarse” voice in his ear: “I’ve captured the Yu family clan leader... Cough-cough, I...I can’t leave Tao County too long, I can only help you this far.”

Yu Chang the First said, “Understood, thank you.”

But what he thought was: So his actions are limited. No wonder. He must have realized the original would betray him and simply wanted to replace him with me, turn Yu Family Bend’s dog into his dog... “I” really am asking a tiger for its skin. This person must have tampered with me. I’ll take my time working it out, and when I understand it, I’ll get rid of him.

Tai Sui cut contact with him amid a bout of almost breathless coughing.

Xi Ping, already back in the Law Breaker, held his throat, dropping soy bean skins dripping hot oil onto Xi Yue. He was even tearing up. “Are you trying to kill me with spice, little scoundrel?!”

Yu Chang the First sent out a grit worm from his fingertip, deliberately leaving a trace in the clan leader's room. Then he went straight toward the rear mountain.

The original Yu Chang at the rear mountain had a bad feeling right away. He turned tail and ran. But there was no wind now. None of the shadows were moving, and he couldn't use spiritual energy. Who could he outrun?

Indeed, soon after, his vision swirled, and a "him" landed in front of him. Upon meeting, without another word, a beam of spiritual energy like a knife sliced toward his shadow!

Yu Chang knew that Tai Sui could use papermen to duplicate consciousnesses, and these papermen who were identical to real people and could use transport arrays to travel. But a transport array needed two ends. He had been on his guard against this move of Tai Sui's. Though he had run off himself, he hadn't forgotten to use grit worms to keep an eye out.

But there was no transport array. In other words, the paperman had come to Yu Family Valley flying his sword—he had been prepared in advance!

He had only just now come up with a last-moment plan on seeing the unexpected appearance of a Sanyue master and knowing that Tai Sui's game was up, but that guy was always scheming; he'd never had good intentions in the first place.

This Tai Sui must be fucking cultivating the way of wickedness, no? And his conscience had just been uneasy on that fucker's account!

The world was large and full of all kinds of marvels. Even in death Yu Chang couldn't have imagined that he would one day experience the grievance of "a good person being let down."

Even worse, he had no way of explaining himself to this "self" that wanted to drive him to death, no way to communicate and incite defection—Xiang Wenqing's consciousness was already looking this way. If he spoke, he would be exposed!

After hearing what had passed at the rear mountain, Xiang Wenqing's first reaction would certainly be to go see the Yu family clan leader. Seeing that the clan leader had mysteriously disappeared and that there was a trace of Yu Chang's aura in the room, he would immediately know that Yu Family Bend's chief offering was up to no good.

"Yu Chang the First" laughed. "I only have a paperman's body, while you..."

The original Yu Chang swore inwardly: “Only a paperman’s body” my ass! When that paperman is destroyed, let’s see whether you’ll still exist!

The ascended spirit master was approaching. “Yu Chang the First”’s killing move sliced toward the original Yu Chang in the shadow. “Let’s see whether you’ll come out!”

If he didn’t come out, he’d be beaten to death by himself. If he came out, he’d be captured by a Sanyue inner sect ascended spirit...

Yu Chang’s vision simply went dark.

But it seemed that heaven didn’t want him to die. Just then, the wind rose, and a cloud suddenly floated across the sky, covering the light of the moon and stars!

The shadow of the cloud instantly covered everything. Yu Chang hastily ducked into the cloud’s shadow, spreading himself out dozens of times larger, narrowly avoiding getting hit anywhere critical as he took “his own” hit.

In that momentary delay, Xiang Wenqing arrived and aimed a blow at the paperman “Yu Chang the First.”

Laughing, Yu Chang the First said, “Calamities last a thousand years. You have a bit of dumb luck after all!”

While Xiang Wenqing and Yu Chang the First fought, the original Yu Chang used the quickly moving cloud shadow to flit through the rear mountain. Then he spat out the shadow transforming pearl and made his escape!

The difference in cultivation level between “near-ascended spirit” and “middle ascended spirit stage” was no small thing, and what was more, Xiang Wenqing had always had a close connection to the Yu family. He had a perfect grasp of the so-called “chief offering”’s depths.

There was practically no suspense in this battle. In less than half an incense stick, the dust had settled. Seeing that Yu Chang actually dared to fight back, the master from Sanyue’s inner sect didn’t listen to his explanations at all. In a flash, he got Yu Chang the First under control and simply performed a soul-searching.

Xi Ping was astonished that Yu Chang the First had collapsed at the first blow like a mortal. At the same time, he quickly pulled out Yu Chang the First’s consciousness.

The consciousness dispersed immediately. The paperman body showed its seams.

Xiang Wenqing frowned at once. He raised his head and sent out his consciousness, instantly locating the original Yu Chang, fleeing toward the southwest.

The secret report Sanyue's inner sect had received said that creating papermen was the power of the Luwu's half-demon surnamed Bai. Yu Chang was colluding with the Luwu!

Without so much as thinking about it, Xiang Wenqing flew off in pursuit.

The original Yu Chang grit his teeth, viciously swallowing a mouthful of blood. He felt that all his innards were churning.

“Tai—Sui,” he said from between his teeth, “if you're heartless, don't blame me for being faithless. This being the case, I'll lead this inner sect master to Tao County to call upon Your Excellency!”

And just as the two of them left Yu Family Bend, the second paperman Xi Ping had prepared—“Yu Chang the Second”—arrived.

“First” had been to guard against Yu pulling any tricks at the last moment. “Second,” on the other hand, had been created in case of malice on Yu Chang’s part while showing him the arrays.

Xi Yue was a genius...in embryo.

He had been alive only twenty-some years, and over a decade of that had been spent as a befuddled little wretch. All told, his study of arrays had lasted no more than six years. That four-century-old tortoise Yu Chang would only need to give the arrays a give of his attention while devoted to the “way of betrayal”; he was much more experienced than Xi Yue.

If their “planted agent” made up his mind to trick them, Xi Yue wouldn’t be able to win against him.

So what Xi Ping had said to “Yu Chang the Second” was: “Your original is preparing to disturb the spiritual energy in the valley by faking his death and use that opportunity to sneak into the array hub, cut off the valley’s arrays, and appropriate the Yu family’s treasury.”

Yu Chang the Second reached Yu Family Valley slightly later than his “big brother” Brother First. He saw the might released by Xiang Wenqing from afar and didn’t dare to act rashly, rapidly passing judgment on this situation: the original must have gotten halfway through his plan, then run right into a master from Sanyue's inner sect coming to visit Yu Family Valley... What kind of incessantly plotting unlucky star incarnate was he? The more he schemed, the more his luck betrayed him?

After a moment, Yu Chang the Second sensed that great personage leaving the Yu Family Valley, going toward the southwest.

Brother Second seemed to also understand "himself" very well. He smiled: The original is bringing the trouble to Tao County? Wonderful, let Sanyue's inner sect's great personage kill that bizarre Tai Sui, I'll wait here to give him a nice surprise when he gets back.

Then, like a shadow, he slipped into the chaotic Yu Family Valley, familiarly heading straight for the center of the arrays.

Xi Ping quickly said to Xi Yue, "Didn't you say that Yu Family Valley's arrays are complex and profound? Watch what the old fox does closely. You can't pass up this opportunity. Heaven's Design Pavilion and Xuanyin's ancient texts won't teach you this."

Xi Yue said, "...What did you bring me here for?"

He had thought he was here to help, but instead his soul had flown to Western Chu in the middle of the night, and he found that he had actually been kidnapped to attend class!

Xi Yue said, “So why did you have me research Yu Family Valley’s array formation beforehand, rack my brains to come up with a way to break them?”

“That’s obvious.” Xi Ping adopted the manner of a family elder and logically said, “How can learning in a quick passing glance have the same outcome as coming prepared with questions after careful study?”

Xi Yue: “...”

If he hadn’t seen the cartoon faces drawn on the classics in the study at the Marquis Manor, he would have fallen for this.

Xi Yue said, “But that Yu Chang has already reached Tao County with the cultivator from Sanyue’s inner sect after him. That Xiang family member’s cultivation level is about the same as the peak master’s, how can you still...”

“About the same as whose? Don’t insult the peak master behind his back. Concentrate, kid. You’re so full of worries. If you don’t do what I say, I’ll smack your hand.” Xi Ping held down the back of his head, turning him to face the dizzying array formation—when he was little, san-ge had pushed him toward books with this motion many times. He finally had a chance to try it out on someone else. Heh, this head was very round. It felt great!

“I’ve emptied out the Snake King’s Immortal Palace. It’s waiting for him. If he hadn’t come, I’d have had to make a ‘Yu the Third’⁷⁶ to lure him there.”

Xi Yue: “...”

Before, he’d witnessed this liar single-handedly trick Lin Zhaoli out of his wits and lead Lü Chengyi and Zhao Zhenwei to their deaths. He never would have thought that, in the years he hadn’t seen him, this person would not only have learned a pile of talismans and arrays with “saving money” as their first principle, but also gone up a level in digging holes and burying people in them!

Xi Ping laughed. “This story teaches us that in the future, when you’re with Heaven’s Design Pavilion and run into an evil cultivator like me, even if their cultivation isn’t as good as yours, you can’t think that you’ll be able to handle them. You have to go back and get Lao Pang. Heaven’s Design Pavilion doesn’t encourage one-on-one fights.”

Xi Yue acutely picked something out of his words. He abruptly knocked his hand aside. “What nonsense are you talking! What do you mean, an evil cultivator like you!”

As though nothing were the matter, Xi Ping said, “Hey, I was just making an analogy, shh, look—”

Xi Yue struggled a few times without success. His attention was quickly drawn by Yu Chang the Second’s dizzying movements.

Xi Ping tilted his head and looked at him. He tapped the table, and a little teapot next to him automatically flew up and poured Xi Yue a cup of a Chu specialty.

Then, waving a fan, he laughed soundlessly: Your ge is a “great evil cultivator” who had to be sealed by Xuanyin Mountain’s three high elders working together, the same treatment that the demon host received. Awesome, huh?

Tao County was just like him. It only wanted to live in peace, only wanted to take back what belonged to it, but it could only work in secret, hiding itself.

It really was a disgrace.

In Yu Family Valley, with the whistling of the spiritual wind raised by the “death” of a near-ascended spirit echoing, no one noticed when the core arrays stopped.

Totally unimpeded, Yu Chang the Second passed through three layers of prohibitions and entered Yu Family Valley's storehouse.

Xi Ping had spent all these years trapped in a little border town. He had no basis for imagining what the Xiang family was like. But he suspected that the imperial treasury in Jinping's Guangyun Palace couldn't match up to this. Inside were immortal tools of every grade, over a thousand downgraded immortal tools, spiritual stones heaped up in one "spiritual store" after another. Xi Ping recognized the inscriptions for preventing the leakage of spiritual energy on the spiritual stores. The spiritual energy content of a spiritual store was about equivalent to three thousand liang of white spirits.

There were so many spiritual stores that they couldn't be counted at once.

The inscriptions lit Yu Chang the Second's face snow-white. He laughed and extended a hand to create a grit worm, ready to set up an ambush for the original Yu Chang here...

Before it could take shape, the grit worm disappeared.

Yu Chang the Second stood where he was blankly, like a wooden puppet. His consciousness dispersed. The paperman was occupied by Xi Ping.

“One, two...” Xi Ping counted carefully, pointing at one fully loaded spiritual store after another. Wherever he pointed, the spiritual stones within were all taken into the Law Breaker. “Forty.”

He stopped in his tracks.

That was enough for the spirit gathering array.

CHAPTER 117 - Unbound Knife (24)

“Xi Yue,” Xi Ping said in the treasury of the Yu family’s main residence, “after joining Heaven’s Design Pavilion, you may not have another honest reason for going abroad. You can’t have come all this way for nothing. Come on, put on a paperman, bring the spiritual stones for the spirit gathering array.”

Saying so, Xi Ping picked up a dozen open-eyed grade mustard seeds inside the Yu family treasury and tossed them into the Law Breaker. “Hurry up, it’ll be too late once the Xiang family member gets to Tao County.”

Xi Yue had a bellyful of questions: the person coming from the Xiang family was a middle stage ascended spirit. A middle stage ascended spirit’s consciousness could cover half the East Sea. Couldn’t it cover Tao County? Was there a lid over Tao County?

Even if there was a lid over Tao County, could the hundred or so li from Yu Family Bend to Tao County stop an ascended spirit’s flight? He’d be there in no time. The traces of a spirit-gathering array on the scale of a hundred thousand white spirits couldn’t be dispersed. Even a blind person would know what had happened here. How was this any different from activating the array right in front of Xiang Wenqing’s face?

What do you actually want?

But the trouble was that Xi Yue's mouth didn't move fast enough. Before he could organize his words, Wei Chengxiang and a bunch of Luwu were swept all together into the Law Breaker. Everyone busily took a mustard seed to collect spiritual stones, moving as fast as thieves. Xi Yue was surrounded and left the Law Breaker carrying spiritual stones against his will. He had no time to speak.

Then he heard Xi Ping's order: "The Great Market has passed. This is the off season for Wild Fox Country, but there are still some cultivators there. Take care to conceal yourselves."

The spirit-gathering array had forty-nine places in all that needed spiritual stones placed on them. In the night, the half-immortals flitted over the barren earth like shadows, coming face to face with listless and sickly beasts of burden. The sparse inns had just closed up for the night. Lanterns had been lit in the tofu shops, their unsteady light now and then stabbing the abandoned little Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon station—this had originally been meant to connect to Great Wan; it had been built halfway, then abandoned. The workers then had been full of delight, thinking that Tao County would develop afterward, not expecting that events wouldn't run smoothly and that the attempt would fall through. To this day, they had been paid less than thirty percent of their wages.

Segment after segment of rusted track lay discarded along the potholed roads. They had become children's playgrounds. The children had drawn houses and plants next to them, more lively than even the Snake King's Immortal Palace. During the day, they played hopscotch among the railroad tracks. At night, they left this happy abode to be watched over by the reincarnation wood trees growing aslant.

And the waters of the Xia River flowed quietly.

Xi Ping began to croon a Western Chu ditty that wouldn't have stood up in an elegant hall. "The Xia's waters are long, so long your heart breaks. The river winds know not the wastes of Chu's hills..."

He copied out in full the array Yu Chang had used to blow up the rear of the mountain and fake his death, only even larger, embracing the whole of the Yu family treasury within it.

"...the wastes of Chu's hills. Mountains high as the clouds cast shadows so heavy, the light doesn't shine in till noon..."

The lines of his array were decisive and sharp. The spiritual threads seemed to have been carved with a knife.

After going through the whole array without interruption, Xi Ping stopped. “Immortals in the sky rest on springtime joys, the emperor in Dongheng sits upon his throne. Gentlemen of the past, listen well, Chu's mountains are a good place, a good place...”

“Tai Sui, the spiritual stones have been put in place in the west half.”

“Tai Sui, there are extra spiritual stones, enough to make up for wastage.”

“Tai Sui...”

The reliable Luwu reported one after another.

Xi Ping lowered his eyes, sensing the location of each Luwu. In his mind, he could draw the spirit-gathering array that he knew by heart.

“Senior, the spirit-gathering array is complete,” Wei Chengxiang said at last.

“Should I place the spiritual stones?”

Xi Ping didn't answer, so Wei Chengxiang didn't rush him. She steadily used her one real hand to squeeze the mustard seed, ignoring all the anxious or distressed gazes aimed at her.

Zhao Qindan couldn't resist saying, “Place them, what are you waiting for?”

Wei Chengxiang raised a finger of her false hand. Zhao Qindan suddenly found that this slippery-tongued liar had unusually calm eyes, like a pair of still lakes that had reflected many eternal partings.

“A-Xiang,” Xi Ping suddenly said to Wei Chengxiang, “Pang Wenchang is actually a pretty good person. At the beginning, if you’d gone to Jinghua Village according to his arrangements, by now you’d probably have gotten married and settled down very happily... Back then, you were young and impulsive, insisting on taking this fork in the road. I couldn’t convince you otherwise. You’ve been a vagrant for many years. You must have run out of youthful impulse by now. Are you afraid? Do you ever regret it?”

Wei Chengxiang unflappably answered, “I’ve done many wrong things in the last twenty-something years, senior. There are some I’ve paid the price for, and some... I’m slow-witted by nature, and perhaps I haven’t yet discovered what wrong I did. I would venture to say that the only thing I didn’t do wrong was going south with the Exonerators to the Land of Turmoil and pushing open the door to cultivation by stepping on White Amaranth’s head.”

Xi Ping said, “Your face has been weathered by the elements, and you have no permanent place to live. You haven’t gotten rid of your eye-opening scar, and you've even lost one hand. Is that very dignified? As soon as the young mistress laid eyes on you, she thought you were a bad guy.”

Wei Chengxiang raised her head and looked at the reincarnation wood trees by the road, as if meeting the eyes of that mysterious Tai Sui, wherever he was. “On my knees in the mud, I'm willing to crawl. Sitting in a fragrant carriage, I would only be carried along. I wouldn't feel at ease. In an ant's whole life, being able to inch forward against the wind is good enough. It beats drifting downstream three thousand li. Don't you think so?”

“That's right.” Xi Ping suddenly laughed. “That's what I like to hear.”

His gaze instantly pierced the heavy mountains—Yu Chang had clearly guessed his connection to reincarnation wood. He had been avoiding Xi Ping's line of sight the whole time. But what he didn't know was that Tao County was enveloped by the Law Breaker Bracelet.

The moment a consciousness that had passed through the Law Breaker entered Tao County, the Tai Sui Qin moved faintly.

A vein twitched at the back of Yu Chang's head. Out of nowhere, he felt petrified.

Xi Ping said, “Place them.”

Without a moment's hesitation, Wei Chengxiang poured spiritual energy toward her fingertips and opened the mustard seed in her hand. The last bag of spiritual stones fell onto the center of the array.

As soon as Yu Chang charged into the limits of Tao County, the spirit-gathering array took shape as if keeping step with him. If you didn't know better, you would have thought he was the crux of the array.

Yu Chang was stupefied—ignoring for the moment how Tai Sui had gotten ahold of a hundred thousand and more white spirits without his help, he had actually dared to activate the spirit-gathering array right under the nose of the master from Sanyue's inner sect!

Did he want to die? Hadn't he learned anything from Qiu Sha?

When Sanyue's inner sect brought the Silver Moon down from the mountain again, they would shine it at him, too, dry him to jerky while draining Tao County dry again. What was he playing at?!

At the same time, all those who had laid down the array stuck pre-prepared "stealth shuttles" onto themselves and disappeared into the night, scattering in all directions—the stealth shuttles were an immortal tool from Xuanyin's Moon Plated Peak, their effect about the same as stealth talismans, able to hide people. But a stealth talisman could only fool mortals and was only slightly useful against low-level cultivators, better than nothing. This stealth shuttle could completely avoid a half-immortal, and even those established foundations whose spiritual senses weren't particularly notable.

The spirit-gathering array that ran through all of Tao County flashed with an almost imperceptible faint light. Next, the spiritual energy of a hundred thousand white spirits was drained dry in an instant. The spiritual stones turned to powder.

All of Tao County let out a sigh. It was as if the veins of the earth were being crushed bit by bit. The veins of the earth, which had been dry for a month...no, dry for decades, even over a century, were flooded by the spiritual energy from the spirit-gathering array, rumbling as they were broken and remade.

Near the Snake King's Immortal Palace, the withered trees that had died under the Silver Moon once again softened, even sprouting inconspicuous buds!

Xi Yue, driven away by the Luwu, suddenly sensed something. As they withdrew, they passed by a house. He automatically sent out his consciousness and saw a few small children crowded onto a single mat, sleeping soundly. Their hands and feet were laid together. One child felt an itch and drew back a hand, scratching unconsciously.

Xi Yue's pupils contracted slightly. He saw on the back of that child's hand a scab like snake scales, fading at a speed visible to the naked eye, gradually healing.

At the same time, all the cultivators in Tao County were disturbed by the spirit-gathering array, coming out to look one after another.

“Is it an earthquake?”

“No, I think it's the veins of the earth...”

“Where did this spiritual energy come from, how can it be so dense?”

“This is bad!”

The one who had said “This is bad” was a worm master. As soon as Xi Yue, hidden in the dark, glimpsed this person, he instinctively bent his back. Only now did he find that there were many worm masters hiding in Tao County!

In an instant, Xi Yue's eyes opened wide. He understood the sequence of cause and effect—no wonder that person had ignored His Highness Prince Zhuang's warning, insisted on igniting the spirit-gathering array at this sensitive moment; no wonder he'd wanted to bring Xi Yue's consciousness to Western Chu in the middle of the night...no wonder he'd wanted to make him personally set down a portion of the spiritual stones, personally change some people's fates.

Xi Yue said, "Ge!"

Xi Ping didn't answer, only laughed vaguely.

He didn't use spiritual stones to set off his array like Yu Chang had done. Instead, he took out the old Discard the False and Keep the True volume that he had taken from Yu Chang. Then, not touching his own qin, he used the old volume to copy a beam of sword energy from the Tai Sui Qin.

Twang—

Boom!

Xi Ping's Anger Shifu to Death Sword could at most only match up to forty or fifty percent of what his shifu had done before, but that was enough.

A beam of sword energy swept by like a flash of lightning, piercing right through the protective inscriptions on the spiritual stores inside the treasury. Finally, it fell right at the center of the array.

Oppressive spiritual energy instantly filled up the array and activated it with its fury, blowing up all of the nearly one hundred spiritual stores remaining here.

Never mind Xi Ping's paperman body, even his true body wouldn't necessarily have been able to survive here—his paperman was instantly destroyed. It was as if his consciousness had been trampled by a hundred thousand gold-armored zhengs. It was quickly pulled back by the Law Breaker.

At the same time, Yu Family Valley became like a temporary spiritual mountain.

The spiritual energy that had been tightly sealed by inscriptions for centuries came whistling out of the storehouse, totally smashing many of the arrays, inscriptions, and immortal tools in Yu Family Valley as easily as crushing dry twigs, then flowing out in all directions like a windstorm.

The spiritual energy rose into the sky, carrying steam, coalescing into mists like auspicious clouds, covering the clear sky for thousands of li. In hardly any time, rain began to fall. In Yu Family Bend, the stagnant water in the gullies began to flow as if by miracle, soaking the dry riverbeds, all the streams augmenting each other. Mountains on the verge of a landslide were stabilized by tree roots on the cliffs became robust. Half-dead millet and sunflowers in front and back yards straightened their spines. Faint color came into the nearly dried out faces of the young herb gatherers.

This sky-shaking spiritual energy explosion instantly spread out in all directions. Xiang Wenqing, whose pursuit had taken him to the border of Tao County, and Yu Chang, who had just arrived in Tao County, both heard it!

Xiang Wenqing took one glance and perceived the remaining sword energy that had flown out of the Discard the False and Keep the True book.

“Yu—Chang!”

Yu Chang’s mind buzzed: wrong, there was something wrong! Tai Sui had deliberately led him to Tao County!

In just this bit of time, Xi Ping had already returned to Tao County. The attack his consciousness had sustained was within the limits of endurance. Like a big cat skilled in bearing pain, he calmly invited “Yu Chang the Third” out using qin music.

This “Fish Cake” was even more unfortunate than his two big brothers. As soon as he came into the world, his spirit was controlled by Xi Ping. Like a puppet on strings, he once again brandished his vital weapon, the Discard the False and Keep the True book, copied the Tai Sui Qin, and struck the Snake King’s Immortal Palace with a beam of sword energy.

Blowing up the Snake King’s Immortal Palace didn’t need so many spiritual stones. When the qin music fell, the sumptuous...yet earthy palace was destroyed. The destructive power of a near-ascended spirit was astonishing. Inside the Immortal Palace, the “Snake King” and the Snake King’s “half-immortal lackeys”—in other words, the group of papermen prepared in advance—didn’t have time to make a sound before they were crushed to dust by the blow.

All that remained was the lingering music of the qin!

Yu Chang thought, I’ll fuck your ancestors!

Go ahead and frame me, but can’t you let me change my attack?!

Good grief, this is an insult!

Xiang Wenqing had yet to set foot within the scope of the Law Breaker Bracelet and therefore couldn't feel the spirit-gathering array under the Law Breaker's protection, but he wasn't deaf. With an ascended spirit's hearing, how could he not hear as loud a sound as the one made by the Snake King's Immortal Palace being blown sky high?

Without a second thought, Xiang Wenqing went chasing after the sound. As soon as he entered Tao County, he sensed that something was wrong.

Xiang Wenqing was half a step behind. By now, the spirit-gathering array had already channeled the spiritual energy in the large quantity of spiritual stones throughout the veins of the earth, leaving only the plentiful echoes of the spiritual energy. Xiang Wenqing, coming a moment late, had no way to determine where the origin and crux of the array had been. And Tao County was a harbor for evildoers. There were many evil cultivators of all kinds. The Luwu who had set down the spiritual stones had silently dispersed. He didn't know who had done this. Everything tacitly pointed to it being Yu Chang's doing.

So this ascended spirit master headed straight for the ruins of the Snake King's Immortal Palace—the aura of the Discard the False and Keep the True book also appeared there.

Yu Chang, overlooked by Xiang Wenqing, hid inside a shadow, all the hairs on the back of his neck standing up.

He knew that it was Tai Sui who had blown up the Snake King's Immortal Palace. At such a close distance, an ascended spirit's consciousness would have made it there already. Even if Tai Sui had a shadow transforming pearl, he wouldn't be able to escape Xiang Wenqing's search.

A cultivator at the peak of the open-eyed stage might be able to surmount a single established foundation pill and go beyond their grade to kill an early established foundation, but from established foundation to ascended spirit, you had to pass through a heavenly tribulation. Facing a middle stage ascended spirit, an established foundation cultivator who had just found their way to the threshold of an ascended spirit wouldn't be able to fight back. Even if he used a paperman substitute, Xiang Wenqing would still be able to crush his consciousness.

Now, Yu Chang couldn't see any way for Tai Sui to get out alive, but he knew that colluding with the Luwu, detonating Yu Family Bend's treasury, and the spirit-gathering array in Tao County had all been set under his name. Whether or not Tai Sui could come out on top, Yu Chang definitely couldn't come out on top!

What kind of suicidal way to frame a person was this!

Xi Ping didn't even think of dodging.

He stayed where he was. At the same time, every waking or sleeping commoner in Tao County heard a voice in their ear: Do you want this place to become a human world?

A true human world, without immortals or demons, without cultivators, without immortal tools whether downgraded or not, without the lackluster favor of the immortals, cut off from the immortal mountains, cut off from the nation, henceforth standing alone.

The Law Breaker Bracelet was a parasite inside the Tai Sui Qin. It had only given the master of the qin the rights to “open the door” and “decorate,” permitting him to manage the space inside the Law Breaker Bracelet.

But Xi Ping wasn't the master of the Law Breaker Bracelet. He couldn't change any of the rules within Tao County as enveloped by the Law Breaker. If he was hunted and killed in Tao County, the Law Breaker also wouldn't care about his life... At most, when the “house collapsed,” it would move out.

If he wanted the Law Breaker hanging high above Tao County to be on his side, Xi Ping needed the “masters of the Law Breaker” who had created the Law Breaker's axiom to give him a rule.

The spirit-gathering array was only the beginning. Casually sticking Yu Chang with the blame was only a side dish. Whether this opera would go wrong in the end, whether Tao County could escape its predetermined fate, would depend on the true masters of the Law Breaker...and what road they chose.

There were still a few days before Mid-Autumn. Xi Ping had originally left enough breathing room. But that bastard Yu Chang was truly unlucky. Xi Ping had run headfirst into a master from Sanyue, forcing him to run a risk and offer up the fate of "Tai Sui" as well.

Anyway, he was a ghost from the Impassable Sea that Tao County had summoned back. So what if he placed another bet?

And Xiang Wenqing was already before his eyes. Wearing Yu Chang's skin and holding Yu Chang's vital weapon, Xi Ping struck first, tossing out all the established foundation attack talismans he could remember all at once. Xiang Wenqing didn't even blink. Not one of those talismans could come within three zhang of him!

It was as if Xi Ping were cultivating the "way of shit-stirring." Apart from occasionally bullying those whose cultivation was lower than his, he had never directly fought anyone. He was given to feeling good about himself, Zhi Xiu couldn't stand to discipline him too sternly, and he had been spending so much time hanging out with Lin Chi. Over time, he had developed the mistaken impression that an ascended spirit was nothing remarkable.

This was the first time in his life that Xi Ping was facing a true ascended spirit master alone.

He had thought that since Yu Chang could keep up in a fight with Xiang Wenqing for half an incense stick and even make his getaway under his nose, he could at least hold out for a little while.

Only when they began to fight did he find that it wasn't that the ascended spirit was weak, it was that Yu Chang's four centuries hadn't been lived for nothing. His true strength was far greater than Xi Ping's shoddy skills!

If his teacher was too soft-hearted to beat it out of him, an outsider would come along to teach this ignorant junior how to behave.

Faced with an enraged middle stage ascended spirit, never mind holding out, Xi Ping even thought he couldn't catch his breath. His essence stagnated as though it had frozen. Xiang Wenqing tossed out a talisman he didn't recognize at all. As soon as that talisman took shape, all the wind around him seemed to turn into knives. He could hardly maintain the paperman body!

In an instant, Xi Ping drew in a breath, pulled open the Discard the False and Keep the True book, and took out a copied Tai Sui Qin. He threw out three beams of sword energy from different angles, each beam stronger than the next. In a moment of life and death, the “Anger Shifu to Death Sword” nearly had something of his shizun’s true sword aura in it.

At the last stroke, the qin strings snapped, cutting his hand open. The three strokes had nearly emptied out his essence.

But the sword energy he had thought astonishing still couldn’t reach Xiang Wenqing!

Xiang Wenqing’s flowing wide sleeves bulged. He had no need to draw talismans to precisely control the direction of spiritual energy. The sword aura carried by spiritual energy fell into his hand and obediently coiled up in his palm, turning right into a gentle breeze.

Xi Ping’s brow went cold. He turned and ran. But it was already too late. The next moment, he heard the sound of tearing silk. The paperman body broke. The spiritual energy around him had become a big swamp with his consciousness stuck inside it. He could neither withdraw into the Law Breaker nor jump into the reincarnation wood.

If this had been his true body, the water dragon pearl might have been able to take a hit for him, and the shard of Zhaoting at the center of his brow might have been able to help him out, but it had to be “Yu Chang” standing here right now, and if he died, he still had to die as Yu Chang, or else all his arrangements before would be in vain.

Xiang Wenqing said with a cold smile, “Don’t use a paperman substitute in front of someone with higher cultivation than you. The consciousness dies faster than the body. Didn’t your Luwu friends teach you?”

Xi Ping even began to feel like he was “melting”...

Just then, a figure whose face was covered by a Luwu mask suddenly appeared holding a talisman gun, shooting at Xiang Wenqing like a mantis trying to stop a chariot.

Xi Yue!

Xi Ping’s scalp bristled.

How could a little half-immortal dare to trespass into a battle with an ascended spirit? Are you crazy? Do you want to die?!

Without so much as looking, Xiang Wenqing aimed a blow. Xi Ping's eyes nearly burst from their sockets. He struggled fiercely. But he couldn't escape the talismans around him, which were like the net of heaven.

But before the blow could fall on Xi Yue, strings suddenly played in Xi Ping's ears. It was the real Tai Sui Qin!

He froze. The Law Breaker was moving.

The Law Breaker's masters, woken and interrogated in the middle of the night, had at last come to a difficult decision, like the teenage girl in Jinping's southern outskirts who had firmly put her traveling bag on her back and gone south—countless ants inched forward against the wind.

“We want to escape the control of the spiritual mountains, escape the patriarchal clan system, escape the sect, escape the rules and regulations that have been fixed in this world for thousands of years...henceforth to stand alone.”

They said: “Tai Sui, we want a human world.”

Within the scope of the Law Breaker, a new rule silently took shape in Tao County: there were only humans here, no immortals or demons, no cultivators, no use of spiritual energy.

The blow coming straight toward Xi Yue turned into wind...true wind.

The wind sent the person made of paper up like a kite. The paperman's magic disappeared, and the consciousnesses that didn't belong here each went back where they had come from. Xi Ping returned to his true body, and Xi Yue was deported, thrown back to Jinping.

The spiritual energy in Xiang Wenqing's hands vanished. This middle stage ascended spirit fell to the ground and stumbled, shocked and horrified—he couldn't control a sliver of spiritual energy.

He had become mortal.

CHAPTER 118 - Unbound Knife (Final)

Xiang Wenqing had opened his spiritual eyes at around twenty. He had spent nearly seven centuries cultivating. For a cultivator over seven centuries old, twenty years old was equivalent to when an ordinary person had just been born and hadn't yet opened their eyes. He had long ago forgotten what it felt like to "be mortal." When he fell from the sky into the earth, he was knocked silly.

He felt as if lead had been poured into his limbs, trapping him firmly on the ground. His arms and legs were powerless, each movement slowed down countless times because of their sluggishness. The spiritual sense that had covered all his senses was completely gone, leaving him "deaf" and "blind," only able to hear sounds within a few zhang of him. In the night, he couldn't even clearly see the birds' nests on the trees beyond ten chi away. His free consciousness was also trapped inside his skin... He clearly sensed the dense spiritual energy passing by him, but that spiritual energy had absolutely no connection to him!

The legitimate immortal sects had always looked down on common cultivators, calling them "evil cultivators." These people spent all their time dodging and hiding, struggling amongst themselves, racking their brains to win some scant resources. Did that deserve the name of "cultivation"? After a life and death struggle to establish a foundation, all they could do was count the days until they lost their minds or became the meritorious service of some half-immortal from an outer sect.

But first there had been Qiu Sha slaughtering dozens of ascended spirits, and now Yu Chang had escaped his spiritual image brand and used an unheard-of evil art to strip an ascended spirit of his powers!

Where were all these people coming from? What had gone wrong with the world? Was there a major tribulation on the way, the hosts of evil about to run wild?

Tao County's Seventeen Li Town—Wild Fox Country—was the easiest place to live in all of Tao County. People came and went here. If you set up a stall, you would be able to feed your family. It was much easier than getting up before dawn to do manual labor. But there was no such thing as a free lunch. If the money was easy to earn, you had to bear the risk. The residents of Wild Fox Country were most frightened of being woken in the middle of the night by the sounds of cultivators fighting. There wouldn't even be time to pray that you wouldn't get involved. No one had ever dared to stick their heads out and watch the fun.

But tonight, mysteriously, the people seemed to have gained some mystical courage. When the loud noises from the direction of the Snake King's Immortal Palace ceased, as if they had agreed in advance, the people pushed open the corners of their windows one after another, quietly discussing with their neighbors.

Someone said, "I just dreamed...that Tai Sui appeared to me."

As soon as these words were spoken, the people were silent for a moment, then there was a splash, one stone raising a thousand waves.

"And here I thought I'd dozed off!"

"I didn't dare to say it just now, I was afraid people would think I'd lost my marbles."

"I heard it. I hadn't finished mending the autumn clothes, I wasn't sleeping."

"Tai Sui said..."

In a place with abundant spiritual energy, all living things thrived. Even mortals who hadn't opened their spiritual eyes could sense that Tao County's night was unusually clear, as if something had changed.

If everyone had had the same dream, then...could it be real?

After a moment, a group of strong people in the prime of life spontaneously stood up and decided to go have a look. They each took a convenient defensive tool, ganged together, and went toward the Snake King's Immortal Palace, where the sounds had come from.

They were stupefied.

The Snake King's Immortal Palace, as luxurious as an emperor's palace, had been flattened. Not one of the immortals who were always going in and out was there. With such a big patch of land suddenly emptied, all the locals felt that the place had become unfamiliar.

A sharp-eyed youth called out: "Look, there's someone there!"

Everyone looked in the direction he was pointing and saw that among the ruins was a man in green clothes, with a green jade crown, with wide green sleeves. He was self-important and oppressively noble.

With style like this, could he be a Qilin Guardsman? A person next to the youth pressed his hand down in a hurry. "Great heavens, you can't go around pointing at the Qilin Guard."

With the fearlessness of youth, the young man said curiously, "Oh? Are there cripples in the Qilin Guard?"

Only then did everyone discover that the noble was limping as he walked. He wasn't precisely a cripple. He seemed to have sprained his ankle.

The Qilin Guard...could also sprain their ankles?

So in front of the ruins of the Snake King's Immortal Palace, Xiang Wenqing stared helplessly at a big crowd of the ignorant masses hefting hammers, chisels, axes, and saws.

He was a mighty administrator of Sanyue's Principal Peak, a member of Dongheng's imperial family. Even inner sect disciples didn't dare to stare him directly in the face when they met him. This was Xiang Wenqing's first time in his life being observed by a big crowd. Their stares made him bristle all over!

For a time, he had only one thought: Leave! I have to leave this place as soon as possible!

This awesomely powerful master was like an injured lone wolf who had strayed from the pack and accidentally wandered into a herd of bison, filled with dread by the dark and densely-packed herbivores. Enduring the pain in his ankle, Xiang Wenqing backed away from the crowd, heading north without daring to linger for a moment.

The villagers didn't know his history, and looking at his expression of wary haughtiness, they didn't dare to strike up a conversation. Soon, all the people in Seventeen Li Town, seeing that the others were all right, also came out one after another to take in the new sight.

The people stared at Xiang Wenqing like spectators watching a monkey. He had never known that two legs could be so inconvenient and that Tao County's roads, fallen into disrepair, could be so bumpy, so overgrown!

The other cultivators in Tao County were the same. Some tried using immortal tools, some formed hand seals for talismans over and over to no avail... Each and every one acted like they had lost a part of their body.

The calmest ones, meanwhile, were among the Luwu.

The Luwu had been Kaiming Cultivators to start with. They had been trained in haste as cultivators. Being mortal was what they were used to. On losing their powers, the vast majority only felt that it was slightly unfamiliar. They didn't feel like they had become "disabled"; moreover, these people worked as spies, and apart from the immortal tools supplied by Moon Plated Peak, they knew all the tricks of mortal spies, and they had prepared multiple identities when infiltrating Western Chu. Since Xu Rucheng and some others had been transferred to the Zhao family hidden realm, the “Snake King” had been played in turn by a group of people, while the others had created various identities of cultivators and mortals in Tao County in case of urgent need.

Some of the Luwu had only come to Western Chu as reinforcements after the Zhao family’s treason, so they had experienced the ten days that Great Wan’s spiritual energy had been prohibited. The second time was easier. They quickly calmed down.

None of the communication devices worked, but they could actually still use the reincarnation wood amulets. It was evident that this Senior “Tai Sui” had unfathomable depths indeed.

Tai Sui said, “If you have a mortal identity, go back to it. If you don’t, hide with a colleague... Cough-cough, don’t, don’t let anyone see you.”

The Luwu gave affirmatives and smoothly dispersed into Tao County’s nooks and crannies, becoming a wandering troupe of performers and wandering officiants who specialized in overseeing weddings and funerals—like Xu Rucheng had been at the start—as well as barefoot doctors, passing peddlers...

Only Zhao Qindan was still bewildered and helpless. Wei Chengxiang tugged at her. “Come with me.”

“Where?” Zhao Qindan, unwilling to give up, was still forming hand seals. There was no reaction, so she was about to pick up a spiritual stone. “I can’t use...”

Wei Chengxiang held her hand down, took off her own bamboo hat, and put it on Zhao Qindan’s head, pulling down the brim to cover her face. She said almost inaudibly, “Put away your spiritual stones. From now on, don’t reveal to anyone that you’re a cultivator.”

Zhao Qindan said, “Huh?”

Wei Chengxiang didn’t explain further. She pulled her familiarly through the lanes.

If her guess was right, this must be the Law Breaker.

Wei Chengxiang’s mind worked quickly. As the Law Breaker’s previous master, she was the only person who generally understood Tai Sui’s arrangements right now: the Law Breaker had vanished after Qiu Sha’s death, so Sanyue was certain to have sent people to make a close search for it, only leaving helplessly when they came up empty.

And a month later, Yu Family Bend's chief offering suddenly escaped the spiritual image brand that had trapped him for four centuries, publicly betrayed his masters, blew up the Yu family's spiritual stone storehouse, and used the Yu family's spiritual stones to offset the Moon's Shadow in Tao County.

Then this "great hero" used this unknowable object unbound by any laws to escape the pursuit of Sanyue's Xiang Wenqing in Tao County. He had withdrawn after winning merit, his whereabouts unknown.

No wonder Tai Sui had told her to set off the spirit-gathering array as soon as Yu Chang had set foot in Tao County, as if keeping in step with him, making it look as if he had activated the spirit-gathering array himself.

No wonder Tai Sui had repeatedly ordered them to cover their tracks.

It turned out that everyone was either "scenery" or a "stand-in." Tai Sui had come on stage and assigned the role of "savior" to the chief offering from Yu Family Bend.

Two years ago, on the fifteenth day of the eighth month, Qiu Sha, the first ascended spirit evil cultivator in history, had come into the world, sending the immortal sects into turmoil.

Two years later, on the eve of the Mid-Autumn Festival, this legendary chief offering had taken her relic, offset the Moon's Shadow right in front of a master from Sanyue's inner sect, openly slapped Dongheng's Sanyue in the face, then escaped unscathed. It was wonderful.

After this, would the Mid-Autumn Festival become an evil cultivator holiday in Western Chu?

Zhao Qindan tilted her head doubtfully. "Did you just laugh?"

It had been a pretty malicious laugh, too.

Wei Chengxiang said seriously, "No, you heard wrong."

Tai Sui was truly amazing.

As for the minor walk-on actors like them, the best thing to do was to tuck their tails between their legs and blend in among the mortals... Fortunately, she was only a seller of Silver Tray Lottery tickets.

Zhao Qindan was led through the complicated little lanes, quickly losing her sense of direction. After walking for half a shichen, they came up to a rundown house with a little courtyard. The neighbor's dog stood up alertly, stared at the unfamiliar Zhao Qindan for a while, then seemed to recognize Wei Chengxiang, carelessly waved its tail, and lay back down.

Zhao Qindan was just looking around in astonishment when a woven gate behind her was suddenly pulled open a crack. An old lady stuck her head out halfway.

Normally, a half-immortal could hear a pin drop a hundred meters away, but under Tao County's new rules, Zhao Qindan was currently also "half-deaf" and hadn't noticed someone approaching. She was startled by the creak of the gate and gave a quiet cry.

The old lady was very surprised. Hearing noises, she had thought there was a thief. She hadn't expected to bump into the "young fellow" next door carting home a young lady in the middle of the night!

What were public morals coming to these days!

The old lady covered her face, feeling that she was about to get styes in her eyes. She drew back her head. "Goodness gracious!"

Zhao Qindan: "..."

No, wait! Auntie, it's not what you think!

Just as Zhao Qindan was getting ready to cry out “This is a woman dressed as man,” Wei Chengxiang opened the gate of the rundown courtyard, shoved the Silver Tray Lottery machinery blocking the door away with her foot, and beckoned to Zhao Qindan.

Zhao Qindan covered her nose. “What is this awful place?”

“Oh,” said Wei Chengxiang, bending down to pick up her scattered carving knives and half-completed carvings and toss them into a rattan basket, “it’s my home—there are some odds and ends, you can make do with it for a few days. When I’ve earned enough money to rent a shop, it’ll be all right.”

Saying so, she picked up a pile of bottles and pots and looked at the young mistress’s pretty face, revealed now that the camouflaging spell had lost effect. “Come here, I’ll give you a mask that saves on spiritual energy.”

Tonight’s sole main character Yu Chang had been hidden in the shadow of a tree. When the shadow transforming pearl unexpectedly lost effect, he appeared out of nowhere on a tree branch. Without spiritual energy to hold him up, the rough twigs couldn’t stand up to the weight of a grown man... especially since this one had been left holding several hundred bags.

Before he could react, there was a snap. Yu Chang tumbled down along with the tree branch and nearly broke his tailbone on impact.

In a house nearby, a dog heard the noise and got up. The big yellow watchdog was so skinny its ribs had nearly broken through its belly, yet it was still pretty determined to do its job. Teeth bared, it scolded the petty thief Yu Chang for disturbing the residents.

Yu Chang broke out in a cold sweat from pain. “Beast.”

But when he glared, the “beast” wasn’t in the least bit awed by this venerable fellow’s “immortal air.” Instead, it was provoked and launched itself forward with a howl.

Yu Chang said, “You’re asking for it.”

The look in his eyes became darker. He waved his sleeve to send this mad dog off...but failed.

After a moment, the “chief offering acting behind the scenes in Yu Family Bend,” the “peak common cultivator who could stand up in battle against a master from Sanyue’s inner sect,” the “peerless genius who had opened his spiritual eyes at seven years old,” the “newly-minted savior”...whatever you called him, tonight, with no one around to care, he still suffered a crushing defeat at the paws of a country mutt.

The dog even bit one of his shoes off. Barefoot, he was chased through the night.

And the “Tai Sui” who had gotten him into this unbelievable predicament was doing no better. Xi Ping had held out and passed a message to the Luwu, then nearly fainted. His injured consciousness had been sent back to his physical body. He felt like he was dying.

In this place where the use of spiritual energy was prohibited, the protective water dragon pearl had also lost effect. Only Zhaoting felt that there was something wrong with him. It buzzed in his spirit.

Zhi Xiu was far away in the Xuanyin Mountains and couldn't reach him, and anyway, a sword cultivator didn't know how to heal. To keep shifu from pointless worry, Xi Ping forced his slackening mind to perk up. He whispered, “It's all right... Shifu, it's not so bad... Xiang Wenqing fell out of the sky and still has to walk back on his own, I...didn't get the worst of it...”

He had used a paperman to impersonate Yu Chang at the Snake King's Immortal Palace. His true body meanwhile had been hidden in a little inn not far from the abandoned Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon station.

A few days ago, when Xi Ping had come up with this plan, he had put the Luwu identity Bai Ling had given him to use—a Kaiming Cultivator who had turned away from the dark to seek the light. His real name in Great Wan was “Cui Yugan.”

The false identity this Cui Yugan had used to enter Wild Fox Country was an unsuccessful musician who had been kicked out of a music hall because he had become a customer’s rival in love. He was getting on in years, empty-handed, making a living performing and writing letters... A romantic.

After enduring for half a shichen, soaking his cotton clothes in cold sweat, Xi Ping stood up and pulled out a handkerchief, coughing up the bad blood caught in his chest. His mind, nearly delirious, finally cleared up.

He breathed out, considered, and didn’t throw out the blood-soaked handkerchief—tomorrow he could use it as a prop to demonstrate a romantic’s “lovesickness.”

Then he wiped his hands, and a qin appeared in them.

Because the Law Breaker Bracelet was residing inside it, the Tai Sui Qin at present was probably the only vital weapon in all of Tao County that could be pulled out, but there was no way to use it. Right now, it was only an ordinary qin.

Xi Ping also couldn't send his consciousness out, aside from two places: inside the Law Breaker Bracelet—he was still the steward of the space inside the Law Breaker and could come and go freely.

There was also the reincarnation wood.

He had guessed before that, as an accompanying plant, reincarnation wood was more like a part of him than it was a “power.” When Xuanyin Mountain's elders had severed Great Wan's spiritual veins, it hadn't stopped the reincarnation wood from passing messages, so the Law Breaker's new rules ought to have been the same—indeed, he didn't even need to test it to know. Xi Yue, thrown back to Jinping by the Law Breaker, hadn't stopped talking.

He was a little mute when he didn't open his mouth. Once he started talking, he never stopped.

“Hey, hey, all right, all right,” Xi Ping said softly, saving his strength. “I'm alive, everything's fine.”

Xi Yue said, “I’m going to report to His Highness Prince Zhuang immediately!”

Xi Ping was indifferent—the water dragon pearl had lost effect and the Luwu had fallen out of contact. Was there any need to tell san-ge? He had probably already gone to polish the discipline rod.

Xi Ping groaned weakly. “Have a heart, leave me in peace. I have a bad headache.”

These words were most effective. Xi Yue didn’t dare to speak again.

After Xi Ping with his “bad headache” finished acting frail and tricked Xi Yue into going away, he wasn’t idle.

The next moment, he used the reincarnation wood to transmit the Law Breaker’s new rule to the ears of every person in Tao County...and to create a rough image: a Yu Chang modestly screening his face.

San-ge didn’t want him to reveal his identity, and shifu didn’t want him to be the hope of the people. Doing the best he could, he would give the credit to Yu Chang-xiong.

May the sages bless and protect Yu Chang-xiong, allow him to escape alive and become an ascended spirit soon.

If the sages in heaven had been able to hear him, they certainly would have sent down a tribulation to strike him dead.

Yu Chang, being cursed...no, blessed by him, sneezed, nearly sneezing out his lungs. There was a crowd of dogs behind him—the big yellow one had called over its friends.

Suddenly, his body became lighter, and his stagnating essence once again began to flow through him. It was as if his head had floated up out of deep water to the surface. He could hear and see again!

Yu Chang was surprised. He floated up and abruptly turned his head: there seemed to be an invisible boundary here, separating two worlds!

What kind of power was this?

He remembered the news that had come from Southern Wan before, that two shed skin elders had severed the spiritual veins, and all the spiritual energy in Southern Wan had stagnated for ten days. Tao County right now was a little like that. But to “sever the spiritual veins,” you had to strike directly at the immortal mountains. It would definitely cut off everywhere within the scope of the spiritual mountains. How had this Tai Sui cut off Tao County alone?

For how long had he cut it off? Also ten days? Or longer?

Yu Chang's expression changed several times: he found that the huns Tai Sui had copied, while they had all wanted to kill him, all seemed to have coincidentally saved him.

The copy at the rear mountain had blocked Xiang Wenqing for him for a moment, giving him the chance to escape to Tao County. The one in the Snake King's Immortal Palace, meanwhile, had simply lured Xiang Wenqing away as he was hunting him.

Now, spiritual energy couldn't be used in all of Tao County. Tai Sui had reckoned correctly that when he found that the spirit-gathering array had been activated, he wouldn't head inward. He would definitely be by the border of Tao County, able to run out quickly. Xiang Wenqing, meanwhile, had been lured to the Snake King's Immortal Palace in Seventeen Li Town. Without spiritual energy, he would have to walk. He would be trapped inside at least all night!

Tai Sui had landed him with the blame and had deliberately left him a night to run. But while he knew this perfectly well, he couldn't not run!

A peak established foundation who hadn't lost his mind in four centuries and was now no longer controlled by a spiritual image brand—even if he hadn't done all this, could Sanyue let him live?

Yu Chang thought, That's eight lifetimes of bad luck for you!

He swore and hesitated no longer. Amidst a great wind, he put the shadow transforming pearl in his mouth and flew away.

CHAPTER 119 - Eternal Flame (1)

Morning in Seventeen Li Town opened with the strains of a huqin⁷⁷ floating out from the attic of the All Comers Inn.

The All Comers Inn had once been called the Treasure Trove Inn. Some years ago, hearing that a Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon station would be built, the name had been changed to “All Comers,” planning to happily welcome “guests coming from all over.” The upshot was that the station hadn’t been completed, and the guests coming from all over had gotten lost somewhere along the way. This poor, rundown inn naturally wasn’t worthy of picking up the celestial aura of the cultivators, so only passing minor merchants gathered there to stay a while.

Wild Fox Country’s Great Market had passed. It was the off-season now. The All Comers Inn’s business was extremely sparse. Fortunately, a wandering musician had recently come in, and he had more stories than a theatrical troupe.

Since that gentleman had come, the rooster in the All Comers Inn’s backyard had stopped crowing.

Every day at the first crack of dawn, there would be a punctual creak from upstairs. That musician Mr. Cui didn’t sleep in. He punctually began another day's yearning.

The strings were a little damp, the sound of the instrument mournful. If he wasn't sighing about the pains of unrequited love, he was plucking away about the loneliness of an unrecognized genius. Sometimes he was pouring out his heart, sometimes propping himself up by playing the wronged woman. Such a small matter, but he could make so much of it.

The landlady got up every morning to the sound of his instrument to sweep and wash the courtyard, chop firewood and fetch water, direct her two waiters and one cook in their work.

The landlady's surname was Tao—Tao County's three big surnames were "Tao," "Wang," and "Xu"; seventy percent of people belonged to those three families. Elders called her "er-sao," and juniors called her "er-nainai."⁷⁸ She was a widow whose husband had died eleven years ago. She was courageous and had raised two children relying on this "dangerous business" in Wild Fox Country. The children had grown up and each gotten married, and the hair at both her temples was grey. Feeling that she had some heroic will that she hadn't yet used up, she had continued to operate the little inn.

Western Chu was nowhere near as prosperous as Great Wan, and it also seemed not to care as much about "etiquette and enlightenment" as they did across the river, especially in a borderland like this, where a man alone couldn't support a whole family—the work that paid a lot of money would kill you, and the work that didn't kill you wouldn't bring in enough to go around. Therefore, it was normal for wives to go out in public and work; it didn't provoke gossip the way it did in Southern Wan.

When Tao-er-nainai got to work, it was truly a pleasing sight. Her plump arms and legs seemed to move in a dance with a particular tempo. There was nothing sloppy about it. Though her hair had gone grey, when she brandished an axe, there was no piece of firewood she couldn't chop in three strokes. In her own little courtyard, she shouted out directions with perfect ease, like an old general who was still going strong.

Once she began to bustle, even the sound of Mr. Cui's maundering sped up involuntarily to her tempo, the sickly groaning turning into a horse racing song.

Er-nainai tossed her cleaning rag over her shoulder and wiped away sweat. She yelled upstairs: "Mr. Cui, do you want to eat?"

Mr. Cui was still bouncing his leg to the lingering tune of the horse racing song. Hearing this call, he pulled over the huqin and played her a few strains in answer.

Sadly, er-nainai couldn't read his meaning from his music. "Talk sense!"

So Mr. Cui stuck out a shame-faced head. "I'll eat whatever there is. Don't add spice."

On hearing this, er-nainai raised her eyebrows, which were a length shorter than average, feeling that Mr. Cui was truly indecent.

Though this Mr. Cui was getting on in years a little, he still looked tall and strapping, with a healthy figure. But this person shamelessly insisted that he had tuberculosis and couldn't work. But apart from one day when he had coughed up blood, er-nainai hadn't heard him cough at all... The blood he had coughed up had dyed an entire handkerchief red. It didn't look real, especially since he was always getting it out and trembling a few times, the affected nature only too clear. One day er-nainai had accidentally washed it for him, and he hadn't managed to cough up another one.

In view of this, er-nainai had concluded that the bloody handkerchief had been a fake. Probably he had smeared chicken blood or dog blood on it.

At first, er-nainai had thought this idle Mr. Cui was a young master from a wealthy family that had come down in the world. Later she had found that this actually wasn't the case.

The day before yesterday, a thunderstorm had damaged a room on the west side of the inn, and it had been Mr. Cui who had helped her repair it. After the repairs were done, this miser had demanded the exorbitant price of ten days' room and board for it. Once he got to work, he was in fact pretty good. At first, picking up an axe or saw or something of the kind, he was a little awkward, but once he tried it out a few times, he worked nimbly. Strange to say, his hands were soft and tender, without any calluses, but he was skilled in performing these tasks, as if he had practiced them many times in his dreams.

He could also write and do sums. He could write down any word you said. Er-nainai thought that in the whole town, you could count up the people who could reach this level on one hand. So she was very perplexed: couldn't he do something, get married and have a career? At his age, other people were getting ready to start looking out for spouses for their children, but this Mr. Cui was still wandering all over the place, spending all day clutching a lousy huqin that cost half a string of coins and daydreaming. If his head didn't hurt, then his ass did.

Mr. Cui had also brazenly gone to try playing for Chu's theatrical troupes, but they wouldn't have him, saying that this man's face looked like he was going to a funeral, and his playing sounded like a wolf howling at night. He didn't seem very auspicious. If they took him out, they were afraid of getting beaten. Only when wealthy families were holding funeral processions were the officiants willing to bring him in as accompaniment. The atmosphere was ideal. Therefore, as soon as he ran out of money, he started looking out for people holding “Riding the Crane”⁷⁹ ceremonies.

“Er-er-er-...” A voice that seemed to have gotten stuck came from the rear kitchen.

The All Comers Inn’s cook was a stutterer. His brain had been damaged by a fever when he was little. His family couldn’t support him and had simply tossed him out. Er-nainai had picked him up one stormy night and called him Dayu, heavy rain, bringing him up as halfway to her own son. When he was thirteen or fourteen, she’d had him learn the old cook’s trade from him. The year before last, the old cook had caught a chill, so the young cook had taken on the job. Though he was dim-witted, he did his work well.

Er-nainai said, “What?”

The cook’s forehead was covered in sweat. Finally, he forced out: “The-the-the big b-boiler, it’s...”

The big boiler in the rear kitchen had been found on the black market. It was a genuine product of Southern Wan that had failed to pass inspection in the factory. It was the most expensive thing in the whole inn. It was incredibly convenient for heating water and food, but it was always breaking.

Er-nainai didn't understand anything about these steam-powered things, so she called, "Mr. Cui, can you fix the boiler?"

Mr. Cui, creaking and groaning, was mourning the passing of the autumn moon and the spring flowers. He found the time to mutter, "I haven't eaten."

"You won't get anything to eat if the boiler's broken. If you can fix it, I'll deduct five days' room and board."

"Well!" Without another word, Mr. Cui flourished his long legs. He strode downstairs in two steps, headed "heartbroken" and "languishing" toward the idiot cook, and went to repair the boiler.

"Er-nainai!" one of the waiters called. "Guests coming!"

Tao-er-nainai froze, raised her head, and looked at the sky where dawn was just breaking. This early? she thought.

When she welcomed the leading guests, er-nainai understood perfectly well what was happening. She saw that while these two guests had done their best to dress unassumingly, their bearing was unconvincing—their backs were too straight; when they looked into the distance, they squinted; and sometimes they deliberately turned their heads to listen to sounds, as if their ears weren't working very well, either.

These two were immortals.

She put on the smiling face of a successful businessperson and stepped forward to curtsy. She explained that the inn's boiler was broken, so if the honored guests wished to drink tea, they would have to sit and wait for a bit.

In the past, she wouldn't have dared to imagine that she could speak to immortals with such dignity.

In running a business, she'd come into contact with people from all walks of life. She didn't get nervous in front of people. It was only immortals—especially the lords from the Qilin Guard, all with that “celestial air” about them, able to make it so you couldn't raise your head, never mind speak clearly.

But after that day the blurry Tai Sui had appeared to them and said “From now on, there will be no more immortals or demons in Tao County,” there had been a miracle! Like a dream, it had actually come true! All cultivators coming from outside became like mortals, even less agile than the mortals who were used to their clumsy limbs. There were no more magic battles of gods and ghosts in the streets. Even the moon during the Mid-Autumn Festival had been clearer than usual. Those returning home all said that Tao County was completely different from outside. Staying the night made you feel relaxed and alert.

Since then, the immortals coming to inspect Tao County openly and in secret hadn't stopped. The All Comers Inn had received several batches. These days, Tao-er-nainai could easily distinguish who was an "Exalted." She rather welcomed these people now, first because the immortals were liberal and didn't keep track of the money they spent, and second, now that these great personages who had previously been like the sun, not to be looked at directly, had lost their "celestial air," Tao-er-nainai had turned eloquent. Every time she finished responding all upright and proper to an immortal, she would be inwardly pleased with herself for ages.

Just then, there was the sound of a horse-drawn carriage outside. The two honored guests inside the inn stood up nervously when they heard.

Tao-er-nainai's heartbeat sped up: an important person.

She heard the sound of the door curtain, and a "pure white" man came in from outside.

This person's hair was white, and his clothing was white, and his skin and flesh didn't have the tiniest bit of color, either. He was also wearing a snow-white mask on his face.

The two cultivators inside the inn hastened forward to salute him, both calling him "grand-shishu."

The "white person" waved a hand and walked through the door. Loftily but without abandoning his poise, he nodded toward the dumbfounded Tao-er-nainai. The gaze that came from under the mask was like frost, coldly sweeping through the rundown little inn.

The two cultivators who had come before stood in attendance on either side. One of them spoke, asking Tao-er-nainai, "Are you the owner?"

"Indeed I am."

The cultivator flashed a token at her, then asked, "Have you seen any strangers here recently?"

Tao-er-nainai couldn't read whatever was written on the token. She only thought that this attitude seemed like the Qilin Guard. She answered obediently, "No, Exalted..."

Before she could finish, there was a bang from the rear kitchen. Everyone's gazes were immediately drawn by the noise. The big boiler once again began to puff steam.

Then a person walked in from out back wiping his hands.

Tao-er-nainai's heart stuttered: right, Mr. Cui had actually only come a few days ago.

But oddly enough, perhaps because of his friendly local accent or perhaps because he didn't act like an outsider, Tao-er-nainai hadn't noticed that he counted as a "stranger." Now that she recalled it, she felt oddly alarmed.

The next moment, Mr. Cui met the gaze under that snow-white mask head on. He didn't dodge. Instead, he opened his eyes wide in curiosity and gave a "wow." Next, this man who was full of indolence from head to foot suddenly became "clever," belatedly restraining his careless air. He bowed. "Hello, Exalted."

Having said this, he stepped aside and found a place to sit. He quietly said, "Er-nainai, the boiler's working, it just needed a bit of pipe swapped out."

Tao-er-nainai calmed herself down and said unflappably toward the white mask: "Exalted, there is currently no Great Market. The only people staying in my inn are some traveling peddlers who come and go, all of them regular guests... What will you be having?"

For some reason, White Mask was staring directly at Mr. Cui. Mr. Cui just happened to be taking a peek at White Mask. Caught in the act, he no longer dared to look, hastily retreating into a corner to keep himself to himself.

The standing cultivator said, "This gentleman doesn't seem like a traveling peddler who lives rough."

As though nothing were the matter, Tao-er-nainai said, "Oh, him. He's an old bachelor from the countryside, a layabout with no family and no job. He usually stays at my inn doing odd jobs to cover his room and board."

Hearing this, Mr. Cui seemed to want to protest, but he also looked like he didn't want to offend the landlady. He stood up and whispered, "Exalted, this humble one is a musician, I..."

The rest of his sentence was stopped by Tao-er-nainai's glare.

White Mask looked him over thoroughly for another moment, then finally averted his gaze. The cultivators only ordered a pot of hot tea, but they didn't touch a drop of it once it was brought. They put down money and left.

As soon as these people left, the people from all walks of life in the All Comers Inn at last relaxed and began a quiet discussion.

A coal trader staying at the inn poked Mr. Cui and asked, grinning, "A musician for 'joyous occasions'?"

"Bullshit, I was only helping out a friend." Mr. Cui turned around upon hearing this and began talking big in lively fashion, all "once played the qin beside Jinping's Lingyang River," and "even the smoke that the steamships in Jinping puff out smells of osmanthus."

Tao-er-nainai could hardly listen to any more of this. She tossed him a handkerchief. "Drop it, why don't you. Wipe the ash off your face."

Mr. Cui said, "Er-nainai, I got up early, give me an extra egg."

Er-nainai put her hands on her hips. "I think you're the egg."

Mr. Cui didn't get mad, only looked at her and smiled. This tubercular man's features were homely, his face had a sickly pallor, his smile brought out all his wrinkles, and there was a messy little beard covering half his face.

But his eyes were so passionate that it was as if he had stolen them from someone else. When he made unreasonable requests, he never winked, only looked at a person with eager directness, a layer of light floating over his eyes. Somehow, he got his way every time.

Sometimes Tao-er-nainai thought that maybe this son of a bitch really had spent time around courtesans. She said, "Listen, don't you want to find a wife and settle down? Do you have to marry a goddess?"

"No, not necessarily," Mr. Cui said unblushingly, "it just has to be someone a little prettier than me."

Tao-er-nainai: "..."

If only he had a bit of shame, just a drop, what a good man he'd be.

Behind the All Comers Inn, the masked white-haired man in the carriage listened to these completely meaningless domestic trivialities and knocked on the carriage door. The carriage began to roll toward the depths of Seventeen Li Town. Tao County was too thoroughly "broken"; even he had lost his spiritual sense. Probably only a full moon sage would be able to spot where the strangeness was coming from.

Mr. Cui—Xi Ping—picked up his chopsticks and gently tapped on the dining table made of reincarnation wood, passing a message to the Luwu: “Sanyue’s Xuanwu has come in person.”

While Xiang Wenqing had been trapped in Tao County, Yu Chang had taken the opportunity to escape abroad that very night.

As expected, this first-rate common cultivator had a few tricks up his sleeves when it came to concealing his whereabouts. He hadn’t taken a single spiritual stone out of Western Chu. By the time Sanyue Mountain had received the news, it was already too late. They had quickly contacted the other three nations, and to this day, they had yet to find a trace of him.

Yu Chang had disappeared with the Law Breaker, Yu Family Bend’s clan leader had passed away, their treasury had been blown up, and the county had turned into a mess, but they couldn’t complain of it—why would a common clan have so many spiritual stones? And where had the spiritual stones come from? That was hard to explain. There had always been countless pairs of eyes fixed on the precious land of Yu Family Bend. Now that Yu Chang had struck at their roots, the jackals and wolves all around were itching to act.

Dongheng’s Sanyue wasn’t interested in dealing with their trifles. What the immortal mountains were worried about was Tao County.

There was no doubt that the current situation in Tao County had been caused by the Law Breaker, but the Law Breaker's whereabouts were unknown. All the common people in the county were clueless, going about their lives as usual. The immortal mountains certainly couldn't disregard the lives of the common people and flatten this place—they were incapable of doing so anyway. Up to the present, at least five or six groups from the Qilin Guard and Sanyue's inner sect had come. A shed skin had even come in person. And without exception, they had all become mortals as soon as they entered.

Just look at Elder Xuanwu's mask, which had turned into one with small holes.

Xuanwu's carriage drove onto Seventeen Li Town's "main road." The road had fallen into disrepair and was uneven. Whether the person sitting in the carriage was a shed skin or a god, they would be jolted like a sieve being shaken.

Suddenly, the disciple driving the carriage clumsily pulled on the reins.

He seemed to exchange a few words with someone. Then he handed something in through the carriage door. "Grand-shishu, have a look at this."

After the Snake King's Immortal Palace had been blown up, the locals had once again started using "misty willow" to carve Tai Sui amulets. This time, the face on the amulets had changed.

Xuanwu accepted it and saw that the wooden amulet was crudely made, but something of the features and their expression was still faintly discernible—this was Yu Chang.

What was "Tai Sui"?

That was hard to say. In Southern Wan, which strictly prohibited common cultivators and carried out heavy punishments against so-called "evil cultivators," the "evil cultivators" had to band together to survive, create an "idol" to serve as their symbol. Common people would try anything in a crisis; they would incorporate these bizarre "deities" into folk legend.

But in Western Chu, where the black market was halfway out in the open, the circumstances were a little more complex: some wildly ambitious big families who had prominence in one area, in order to make themselves look more impressive, would embellish a history for their own ancestors. The ignorant masses didn't know better and would put their faith in these people. Tao County had no big families. The previous local despot had been an evil cultivator very skilled in currying favor with authority. Rumor said that he had been the one to bring this so-called “Tai Sui,” which was a wooden carving of unknown origin.

Last time, when the Silver Moon had come down to the mortal world to expel evil, Qiu Sha had died, but the Silver Moon had still been angry. Though later he had turned up a length of eternal spring brocade on that Golden Hand, Xuanwu’s instincts had told him something was wrong with the divine image worshipped in the Snake King’s Immortal Palace... If he recalled correctly, misty willow had also once been a type of accompanying plant.

But misty willow was everywhere around the Xia River. The poor all used it to carve their memorial tablets. And that hadn’t been the only divine image carved of misty willow. But for no discernible reason, Xuanwu kept thinking that there was something not right with Tao County’s “Tai Sui.”

He clutched the wooden amulet, his completely bloodless fingers tapping softly on it: he thought that the ancient demonic god that corresponded to misty willow—called “reincarnation wood” by the people of Wan—had ultimately fallen in Southern Wan.

Yu Chang had obtained a hundred thousand white spirits from Yu Family Bend and ignited a spirit-gathering array in Tao County to offset the Moon's Shadow... The divine image carved into the reincarnation wood had taken on Yu Chang's form...

And Xiang Wenqing had said that Yu Chang seemed to be colluding with Southern Wan's Luwu.

Every aspect of this seemed to point to Xuanyin Mountain being behind it.

In that last century, two of Xuanyin's shed skins had gotten in trouble, and Zhao Yin's Way of the Heart had even broken, killing him on the spot.

What were they up to?

Had their veins of the earth also been burned up by the gold smelting furnaces? Were they planning to follow in He's ill-fated footsteps?

Xuanwu's expression became slightly grimmer. "Let's return."

Openly sending spies to infiltrate other countries and run wild—the Wan had gone too far.

"Notify the Qilin Guard, tell them to establish a branch here at once. Build it right outside the scope of the spiritual energy prohibition. Within the scope of the prohibition, transfer a detachment of border troops to be garrisoned there. Have them start strictly checking anyone entering or exiting starting in the next few days, and registering all inhabitants. Place of birth, relatives, and so on must all be clearly stated, without concealment. Close Tao County's ferry crossing. Do not permit any foreign person to come ashore," Xuanwu said. "Also, have all the misty willow within Tao County cleared away, and order the common people not to worship evil gods."

CHAPTER 120 - Eternal Flame (2)

“At the beginning Sanyue must have wanted to seal off information, but there was no way for them to do it. They are unable to control the venom-spawning domestic black market. As soon as the business in Tao County happened, all the evil cultivators in Wild Fox Country ran off and made it known everywhere. My supposition is that Shu and Li must both have received the information no later than Sanyue.”

Zhou Ying nodded. “What about Yu Chang?”

“There is no word about him. He has already escaped the territory under the jurisdiction of the spiritual mountains. He isn’t within the boundaries of any nation, and he hasn’t contacted anyone,” Bai Ling said. “Right now, everyone is looking for him, including Western Chu’s evil cultivators—because the word is that he has a means for removing spiritual image brands. Since that got out, all the important people in Chu who rely on ‘offerings’ have been on tenterhooks, all thinking up other ways to control the offerings. The offerings are naturally dissatisfied, and on their end, they also all have their own designs.

“Right outside the line of Tao County’s prohibition on using spiritual energy is a new detachment of the Qilin Guard. The branch hasn’t even been built yet, but the Qilin Guardsmen came over the very day they received their orders. They are currently operating out of a mustard seed. But at present it seems they aren't much use. As soon as they step over the prohibition line, the Qilin Guardsmen are worse off than mortals. Therefore, it's said that Sanyue has also transferred a hundred thousand men from the North Xia Waterborne Troops, who are preparing to enter and garrison in Tao County. The ports to enter Tao County along the border have all been closed."

Zhou Ying raised his eyebrows. "They normally don't maintain an army, but now they want to use military force."

Under the protection of the spiritual mountains, the standing armies of all nations didn't need to maintain battle-readiness, be prepared at any time to defend against the invasion of a foreign enemy. Apart from assignments like honor guard, bodyguard, convoy escort, and such, the troops normally only took care of bandits and rebels. It could be said that a mortal general would have practically no opportunity in his lifetime to be promoted through meritorious service—this was precisely why Zhi Xiu's single battle had been celebrated far and wide for two hundred years...and why the salary of a high general of cavalry who had been celebrated for two hundred years was hardly more than the "sycophantic" Marquis of Yongning's.

But because of division among noble families, Great Wan had had constant internal strife for over a thousand years, and their army ultimately wasn't purely ornamental.

Chu was different.

The Xiang clan stood alone, and social stratification in Chu was clear-cut. However tyrannical the local despots were in their own domains, they still wouldn't dare to vainly challenge the imperial family. The Xiang family normally turned a blind eye to those below them. If they really wanted to crush anyone, they would only need to lift a finger. Therefore, they had no conflicts.

Safety and order throughout the country relied on the cultivators supported by the local despots, making an army even more useless. It was almost entirely dominated by individuals on the fringes of Dongheng's political circles—originally, Tao County's border ports had also nominally been under the control of the Xia River Waterborne Troops, but what had the outcome been? Just a bunch of soldiers standing there while the border welcomed all comers. Having them or not having them was all the same.

Zhou Ying asked, "Which force of the North Xia Waterborne Troops has been requisitioned?"

Bai Ling said, "The Marquis of Qulong, Zheng Bin's."

“Princess Qiyang’s husband, from a poor and humble background, illicitly opened his spiritual eyes after assuming his position, full of ambition,” Zhou Ying slowly said. In this respect, this spymaster was quite dedicated to his work. He was as familiar with this “marginal personage” from a neighboring country as with his own family treasures. “I’ve heard that they’re a very interesting couple. Princess Qiyang has no interest in cultivation and only wants to be a half-immortal so she can indulge in pleasure, but Zheng Bin has been refining his spiritual bones and seeking a Way of the Heart. I hear that his spiritual bones are complete, but the princess won’t permit him to establish a foundation and get above her, and now he’s been squeezed out to a border territory where spiritual energy can’t be used. I would guess that this person’s greatest wish is for his wife to die.”

“I will arrange it,” Bai Ling said, understanding his intention. Then he added, “Xu Rucheng has sent word that Yu Family Bend is in great disorder, and the Zhao family is currently despondent. But they cannot annul the engagement. A spiritual image stamp cannot be removed. On this score, all they can do is hold their noses and acknowledge it. Presently they must be planning to head north to Dongheng as soon as possible, use their discarded piece ‘Zhao Qindan’ as a stepping-stone to help them get into Sanyue’s inner sect, then keep thinking. The Yu family’s clan leader has died, they’ve lost their chief offering, and the array formation as well as the possessions accumulated in their main residence over centuries were destroyed practically in a single moment. They're very uneasy. That imperial grandson in the palace is currently their only remaining hope. They also want to complete the marriage as soon as possible, use the Zhao family to ascend to the heavens. The two sides are in accord. They will be setting out soon."

Zhou Ying made a noise of agreement. "Sanyue's inner sect is different from provincial places like Yu Family Bend and Tao County. There's a reason the Xiang family hasn't dissipated their whole fortune yet despite being such a mess. The journey north to Dongheng must be undertaken with caution. The enemy must not be underestimated."

Bai Ling said, "Yes, my lord. The Zhao family fears the Luwu. They have been paranoid and performed several different kinds of searches. Had 'Zhao Qindan' not been there to save the day, two brothers would have been exposed. In the interest of prudence, I told the Luwu inside the Zhao family hidden realm not to use immortal tools to communicate for now and to temporarily only pass word through reincarnation wood."

With the use of spiritual energy prohibited in Tao County, communication had naturally broken off entirely as well. The communication network of all the Luwu in Tao County relied on the support of reincarnation wood amulets...and "Tai Sui." The supplies sent over from Great Wan also currently had to go through the Law Breaker.

Xi Ping had become a “hub” for information and provisions.

“The rest is trivial, I have already handled it myself.” At this point, Bai Ling stole a glance at Zhou Ying’s expression and added, “Oh, the Viscount asked me to pass on his respects to Your Highness.”

Zhou Ying’s expression chilled. “Don’t mention that fiend to me!”

Bai Ling obeyed without any objection. “Indeed.”

Zhou Ying had his own reincarnation wood. If he didn’t want to pay attention to Xi Ping, he would seal it in his mustard seed, and Xi Ping couldn’t contact him.

Zhou Ying forced down his anger and gave a few more instructions as though nothing were the matter. When he was finished, he accepted the tea Bai Ling was offering.

He always drank tea according to Jinping’s customs. For mid-autumn, that meant a local oolong tea meant to ease dryness and moisten the lungs. It was called “Jinping Yu Gan.” Zhou Ying drank a mouthful and, because of this wretched name, thought of that wretched person. He slammed the teacup down on the table with a bang.

“Toying with Sanyue and Yu Family Bend, intercepting the Luwu’s messages without authorization, flashing the Law Breaker in front of the whole world—what exceptional skills he has!”

Bai Ling used his consciousness to sneak a peek at his expression and thought, He held out for two ke this time.

Since his lord had just told him not to mention the Viscount, Bai Ling held his tongue and didn’t respond. He passed a handkerchief so Zhou Ying could wipe the tea on his hands.

Zhou Ying pushed it away. “Didn’t he think that Sanyue also has shed skins who have held out from the time of the Great War of Gods and Demons? Could they possibly not know about the Southern Sage killing Yuan Hui in the East Sea? If Sanyue contacts Xuanyin about this and Xuanyin turns around and inspects the Impassable Sea, what is he going to do? There are disasters of all kinds on Western Chu’s border every year, there are always mortals dying by the batch at the least disturbance, what does it have to do with him? Would it kill him to mind his own business?”

Bai Ling: “…”

“If you have something to say, say it,” Zhou Ying said. “What are you holding back for?”

Bai Ling said, “Well, I asked the Viscount inside the hidden realm. The Viscount said it wouldn’t happen. Yu Chang was ‘colluding’ with the Luwu, and now he’s preparing to steal the Unbound Furnace to give to the Golden Hand, so Xuanyin is going to fall out with Sanyue right away. There are no lovebirds on earth that can’t be torn apart, never mind immortal sects with opposing interests.”

Hearing this nonsense, Zhou Ying put a hand to his chest, wanting to cough out of habit. But his half-immortal’s lungs weren’t ready, so his coughing fit caught awkwardly in his chest. He couldn’t quite catch his breath.

Bai Ling gravely kept himself to himself, inwardly enjoying his plight: It serves you right.

This very proper half-demon was always thinking that his lord’s blood was too cold, afraid he would freeze, so he took the opportunity to fan the flames: “The Viscount also instructed me to convey to you, my lord, that you shouldn’t make yourself sick from anger. He is inside the Law Breaker’s hidden realm every night, and if you wish to beat or scold him, you can come any time.”

Zhou Ying: "..."

Xi Ping sneezed very elegantly—his nostrils were stuck down, so he couldn't wipe his nose with force, and his fake beard was too thick—it would get in his mouth if he wasn't careful. He thought that after coming to the Law Breaker just this evening, Bai Ling must have conveyed his message; san-ge was cursing him.

Anyway, he was secure in the knowledge of his own safety: san-ge wouldn't come. Shifu was inside the Law Breaker at night.

As soon as it got dark, Xi Ping put out his light and feigned sleep, his consciousness slipping into the Law Breaker Bracelet.

Inside of the Law Breaker, there was currently a big stretch of wilderness. As soon as Xi Ping landed, he noticed something and abruptly leapt up, narrowly avoiding the inscriptions covering the ground.

Then he heard Zhi Xiu's voice coming from a vague figure on the horizon: "This belongs to an evil cultivator from the third year of the Wen Emperor, a middle established foundation, a rare inscription master who killed nine members of Heaven's Design Pavilion before escaping to Northern Li. Heaven's Design Pavilion joined hands with Kunlun's outer sect to blockade him on the Cangye Plain. They were at a deadlock for over half a month and lost a dozen outer sect half-immortals along with two established foundations who had joined them. In the end it was an ascended spirit sword cultivator from the Kunlun Sect breaking through by sheer strength that allowed them to take him down. Because this battle was unusually bitter, it was set down in the historical record by both sects. All the methods that evil cultivator used then, I've copied here. You try having a go. If you can't handle it, call for help."

Xi Ping's face fell. "...shifu, I'm not falling for that one again."

The first time Zhi Xiu had gently told him "If you can't handle it, call for help," Xi Ping had actually bought it. When he had been beaten to a pulp by the illusory evil cultivator inside the Law Breaker, he had innocently called for help.

But his lousy shifu had only hung by the horizon with his hands folded, appreciating his terror-stricken "heroic bearing" while slowly responding, "But I am merely a sliver of consciousness within a shattered sword. Why are you calling to me?"

Xi Ping had felt his faith in the whole world collapse. "Didn't you tell me to call for help if I couldn't handle it?"

"I didn't say it would do any good," Zhi Xiu said.

This was the teaching method of his shifu, who couldn't even explain Detailed Account of Meridians clearly. Even Mama Luo would have to kowtow if he saw it.

But despite his shouts, he was still doing this of his own free will.

During his brief encounter with Xiang Wenqing, Xi Ping had thoroughly understood his own abilities. For the first time in his life, without the need for anyone to urge him, he had decided to put in the work.

He wasn't a sword cultivator, and it wasn't practicable to start learning sword moves and formations now. Neither Flying Jade Peak nor the Latent Cultivation Temple could make him quietly study talismans and memorize arrays. So Zhi Xiu had simply stuffed the last thousand or so years of classic texts into the Law Breaker and let him fumble around for himself while getting thrashed.

After all, the Law Breaker wouldn't harm its own "steward," but the same wasn't necessarily true of the outside world.

Like a sponge, Xi Ping worked madly to soak up a century's worth of missed classes. Every night, he only left when his consciousness was exhausted—that was why the first morning strains of the huqin were so realistically tragic.

Tonight, he couldn't struggle free of this historical evil cultivator who was like a fierce ghost. He put his foot right into the trap that had killed Kunlun's established foundations and was thrown out by the Law Breaker. Zhi Xiu waved a hand and put away the scene, then quietly sat alone inside the Law Breaker.

In fact, Zhi Xiu's current condition couldn't sustain his consciousness in wandering outside for too long, but he would still remain until his strength was exhausted.

Because only inside of the Law Breaker, which was outside of the control of the spiritual mountains, was there a moment's peace.

Zhaoting had shattered, and he was facing the deliberation of the Way of Heaven, caught on the threshold of the shed skin barrier, always grappling with a nameless power.

The Way of Heaven was like a knife or an axe, always "pruning" something from him. Zhi Xiu couldn't clearly say what it was, but he was unwilling to yield.

The familiar pain surged throughout his body. It was a sign that this thread of his consciousness was about to disperse.

The Way of Heaven seemed increasingly impatient with his disobedience.

General Zhi smiled carelessly. Before dispersing, he grabbed a handful of Western Chu specialty snacks from the Law Breaker...and couldn't keep smiling.

“Bah, damn the salt seller.”

Before returning to his own body, Xi Ping first wandered through all the reincarnation wood in the county, treating it as relaxation. Vaguely, he heard familiar voices speaking and automatically followed them.

Neither Wei Chengxiang nor Zhao Qindan were in the habit of sleeping. At most they would meditate for a while before dawn.

Now, there was an oil lamp lit in the little house. Zhao Qindan was teaching Wei Chengxiang Chu writing.

Zhao Qindan was from Yuzhou. Yuzhou bordered on Chu, so many people were proficient in Chu script. She was equally skilled in Chu and Wan script.

As she taught, Zhao Qindan let her mind wander.

The tip of Wei Chengxiang's brush paused. She looked up at her.

Apropos of nothing, Zhao Qindan asked, "Where do you come from? You're from Wan, too?"

"The sky my quilt, the earth my mat, the four seas my home." Wei Chengxiang smiled craftily and licked the tip of her brush—when she was younger, she had still spoken with a bit of a Ling County accent. After traveling for many years, you could no longer hear a trace of it. "What's wrong? The registration today gave you a scare, didn't it?"

This evening, bailiffs had come pounding on doors, going house by house and family by family to register the inhabitants. When they got hold of you, there was an interrogation, as if they would have loved to find out everything about eight generations of your ancestors. They also made neighbors vouch for each other. Anyone with the slightest issue would be taken away and strictly investigated.

Zhao Qindan had never told a lie in her life. She had nearly begun to stutter when questioned. Luckily Wei Chengxiang had received word from Tai Sui and rushed over to save her.

She had stood by, scared witless, watching Wei Chengxiang lie in front of a crowd of bailiffs. She had been unbearably worried, thinking that someone would come to expose them at any moment.

But instead Wei Chengxiang had blathered for a full half an incense stick, and no one had come out to say a word. The old granny next door who had been so disapproving of them that first night had even cringingly said, “This young lady has been here for years.”

Zhao Qindan said, “Why would she help me?”

“Being caught by the bailiffs doesn’t go well for anyone, and it costs the neighbors nothing to help patch up a lie. Even if they don’t dare to speak, they still won’t deliberately harm a person in a situation like this.” Wei Chengxiang flexed her neck and said, “Anyway, I’ve helped that old lady carry quite a bit of water. Sowing the seeds of goodness won’t bring in a bad harvest, I guess.”

“Oh?” Zhao Qindan said. “When I went to thank her with some pastries, she pulled me over and said that you were no good and told me to get over you while I was still young.”

Wei Chengxiang: “...”

What was wrong with that old woman? Why did she have to get into everyone's business at her age?!

“Even if I hadn't been able to cover it up, there are still the Luwu.” Wei Chengxiang gave a dry cough and changed the subject. “Making false identities is their specialty. Even though they've become mortal, fooling a bailiff is still no big deal. The Luwu are using your identity, so for the sake of their own people, they'll protect you.”

Zhao Qindan didn't respond. She inadvertently glimpsed a little bronze mirror that Wei Chengxiang used as a prize and caught sight of herself in the mirror.

Her current alias was “Xu Dan.” Wei Chengxiang's skills were superlative. She had only changed each of her features slightly, not affecting her ability to make expressions and not making any exaggerated scars as cover, but she looked completely different—not to be spoken of in the same breath as certain klutzes who just slopped glue on their nose.

At a glance, Zhao Qindan didn't even recognize herself.

That common face gave her a huge sense of loss and loneliness. After a couple more looks, she almost felt frightened.

On the one hand, she and the Zhao family had mutually abandoned each other. She was in an unfamiliar place with strange people and no home to go back to, with no one beside her but an “evil cultivator” of unknown background. On the other hand, her surname was still Zhao. Though the Luwu were temporarily willing to protect her for the sake of their colleague, she still couldn’t blend into their circle.

In a few short months, she had fallen from the clouds to the human world, then become a lost stranger in foreign land.

She was coming from nowhere and going to nowhere. Her former lofty aspirations had turned to froth. In the whole wide world, there was no place for her.

In her inward turmoil, a dog’s resonant barking came from the distance, followed by shouting and the buzzing of heavy machinery.

Wei Chengxiang and Zhao Qindan exchanged a look, then stood up simultaneously—there was one bad thing about the spiritual energy prohibition, which was that all cultivators had a sense that their hearing was impaired. Without a spiritual sense attached to their ears, sometimes they could only hear a thing when it came up to the door.

Wei Chengxiang put a hand into her sleeve. “Senior, look outside for me...”

Before she could finish speaking, Xi Ping’s voice sounded in her ear: “The army is here.”

Wei Chengxiang frowned. Now, the voices were already very close—the shuffling sound of footsteps was coming from the street behind them, mixed with the clapping of horses’ hooves and the clink of swords against armor.

“They’ve come into town in the middle of the night? What are they doing?” Wei Chengxiang pressed her ear to the wall and added, “Wait, it isn’t only men, horses, and carriages. What have they brought?”

From the reincarnation wood, Xi Ping saw the steam-spouting “long-armed” cart in the midst of the formation and slowly said, “I guess it’s machinery to cut me...to cut the trees down.”

No sooner had he spoken than a strange whirring came from the street nearby. The army had begun clearing away the reincarnation wood trees lining the street.

CHAPTER 121 - Eternal Flame (3)

Previously, Tao County's yamen had posted notices forbidding people from further distributing images of evil cultivators. Everyone had ignored them—Tao County's yamen never did anything. The only time it wasn't just there for decoration was when it was time to collect the exorbitant taxes. Each year during Wild Fox Country's Great Market, the bailiffs played dead, not daring to approach Seventeen Li Town.

No one had expected the troops to arrive in the middle of the night and start chopping down trees as soon as they got there.

The flywheels of the roaring mechanical beast spun, slicing into the big trees by the road, which had grown there for unknown decades or centuries. It was followed by a little cart with shovels attached to it that opened its grinning toothy mouth to dig up the tree roots whole.

These trees that had just struggled out from under the Moon's Shadow and sprouted a bit of greenery fell into the street with loud crashes, their branches rustling wildly, scaring all the birds into flight. In the predawn light, they looked like a metaphor.

The vegetal smell of tree sap splashed everywhere. The thundering machinery threw everyone in the area into turmoil. Like wild fowl woken by an earthquake, the people peered out from cracks in doors and enclosing walls. Many more voices sounded in Xi Ping's ears—the anxious people were beginning to take out Tai Sui amulets and pray.

Xi Ping ignored it. There were neither gods nor ghosts, neither immortals nor demons in Tao County now, and Yu Chang, suspected of being “Tai Sui,” had run away with the Law Breaker. He would work no more miracles. He was only a layabout playing the huqin and singing ditties that no one wanted to hear. Protecting homes and expelling evil wasn't his responsibility. He also didn't care about the garrisoned troops cutting down trees. While reincarnation wood was a part of him, it was like hair or fingernails. It didn't hurt to be bald. It was only that his field of vision would be slightly limited afterward. But grown up as he was, it wasn't like he didn't have legs. It wasn't a big problem—what was more, the Luwu were now scattered all over Tao County, throughout every walk of life, and each of them had a reincarnation wood amulet they had spilled blood on. At need, they could all be his “eyes” as well.

Xi Ping was only a little at a loss for how to react.

When he had been trapped in the divine image, he had fooled that idiot Xu Rucheng with a “heart demon oath” and made Da Chengzi cut down trees for him. Idiot Xu had feigned compliance but hadn't actually done it, preserving the reincarnation wood trees in Tao County to this day. He hadn't thought they would finally be destroyed at the hands of Western Chu's soldiers.

Amid the immense rumblings, Xi Ping gradually withdrew his consciousness, returning to his true body.

Tao County had been dragged free of the spiritual mountains' influence by the Law Breaker. The Qilin Guard didn't dare to enter at will, and the army composed of mortals had become the biggest threat. Now it would be a contest between the Luwu and the North Xia Waterborne Troops for control of Tao County. The Luwu didn't have a hundred thousand people, but their communications were unhindered, while the Sanyue Sect was working blind when it came to a place where the use of spiritual energy was prohibited. They would have no idea what was happening inside, and the North Xia Waterborne Troops didn't necessarily have the same goals as the sect—he figured san-ge would already have a solution in mind.

At present, there was something more pressing weighing on Xi Ping's mind: his shifu.

Every night, Zhi Xiu recreated all kinds of dazzling ancient battles inside the Law Breaker, making his little disciple flee in a panic. In fact, it was only Xi Ping cooperating with his education. Xi Ping had total control within the Law Breaker. He knew of every leaf growing on every plant...so how could he fail to notice that shifu's consciousness was becoming weaker and weaker when he entered the Law Breaker?

Through the reincarnation wood amulet carried by Lin Chi, he had secretly returned to the Xuanyin Mountains to have a look and seen a layer of ominous fog over the sealed Flying Jade Peak. Peak Master Lin had said that since General Zhi's beam of sword energy had rung the Bell of Tribulation, the sky over Flying Jade Peak hadn't been clear... The Dignitary of Fate High Elder had even kept silent on the subject of the Luwu's increasingly rampant recent activities abroad—the Kaiming and the Luwu had originally been put forward by the Dignitary of Rites Elder Zhao Yin; Zhang Jue had always disapproved. There was no way to remove the Kaiming Department, but Zhang Jue had suppressed the Luwu for several years. Had Qiu Sha, an ascended spirit evil cultivator, not emerged, leading the Dignitary of Rule to change from neutrality to favoring Zhao Yin, Zhou Ying really wouldn't have been able to plant the evil seed of the Luwu—formerly, when the Luwu had asked for money or immortal tools, the request was certain to be rejected when it reached the Dignitary of Fate. The Luwu's funds were transferred from the Kaiming Department, and because of this, the Luwu had been unable to stand alone apart from the Kaiming Department. Clearly the Unbound Furnace was a matter of urgency.

Xi Ping used the Law Breaker to deliver a batch of newly arrived immortal tools to Xu Rucheng, who was on the way north, and gave some instructions. When he returned, it was already dawn.

Today, Tao-er-nainai got up before he could pick up his huqin to express his grief. As soon as Xi Ping pushed open the window and looked down, he felt that the atmosphere was wrong. Very tactfully, he didn't touch his wretched huqin. He quietly went downstairs.

He ran right into the cook Tao Dayu. The stuttering cook was wiping snot with one hand and tears with the other. Seeing Xi Ping, he automatically turned his face away and wiped his eyes against the crook of his elbow.

“What’s the matter?” asked Xi Ping.

As soon as he asked, he heard Tao-er-nainai’s resonant voice ringing out in the little courtyard: “Let them chop! They can chop ‘em all down! If they’re up for it, let them chop off all the heads in the whole county, too! May lightning strike their ancestral tombs...”

What followed was a string of foul language. The guests were all regulars. Seeing her stance, prepared to shout halfway across the county, they quickly went to dissuade her or stop her.

“Quiet, settle down. They have swords and guns, my good madam, what do you have?”

“I’ve got a fucking axe, and I’ll use it to hack through eight generations of their family coffins!” Tao-er-nainai rolled her eyes, then gruffly said to Tao Dayu, “What’re you crying about? No one’s taking over Tao County, er-nainai says so!”

Xi Ping put an arm around Tao Dayu’s shoulders. “You hear that? Even heaven must abide by the empress er-nainai’s decree—I suppose you’re afraid if they cut down the misty willow, that crowd of cultivators will come back?”

The old charcoal dealer smoking a tobacco pipe next to him put in a word: “He was nearly snatched up to be one of those substitute spiritual image dolls, but luckily the child was neither clever nor a quick study. They couldn’t sell him. Now his calves start twitching whenever he sees that crowd of immortals. Poor thing.”

Xi Ping froze. He was about to ask “Then what’s he still doing in Wild Fox Country?” when he heard Tao-er-nainai start blaring orders. The young cook was once again sent scrambling to work. Xi Ping looked on for a moment and suddenly swallowed his words: it was because of er-nainai that the young cook, petrified, with his “calves twitching,” insisted on staying in this place where the forces of evil ran wild. A drenched puppy would also bend its back and be inseparable from the only person it had in the world.

But matters quickly exceeded Xi Ping's expectations.

Not long after the garrisoned troops came, they had cut down most of the roadside reincarnation wood trees in Tao County. The people were enraged without daring to speak. Fear and restlessness spread through seemingly-tranquil Tao County, with only "Tai Sui" to know. When the autumn winds were howling, the late-night chatter echoing incessantly through the Law Breaker could no longer be ignored. It interfered with his training.

Zhi Xiu waved a hand and dispelled the simulated ancient battlefield in the Law Breaker. Teacher and disciple did nothing, only spent the whole night listening.

There were people repeatedly praying to Tai Sui, asking him not to let Tao County go back to the way it was before. There were people who wished for Tai Sui to work another miracle and send a big bolt of lightning to strike these ground pounders dead. There was a person who was courageous in the deep and silent night, raining curses on the Sanyue Mountains, "heretically" wishing evil on all cultivators... Fortunately, his voice couldn't get out of the Law Breaker.

Xi Ping was stupefied. He had spent over five years in Wild Fox Country and floated through the lives of all kinds of people. Everyone who could lure in his consciousness naturally had their own tragedy, but they had all had numb, nervous expressions of meek resignation. He had never heard this much anger.

It was as if, now that spiritual energy was prohibited in Tao County and had been expelled from the immortals, the demons had also been expelled. The people, quietly observing those cultivators and finding that they were also flesh and blood, seemed to have finally noticed that many natural disasters were in fact man-made.

“The internal strife in Great Wan some years ago began with an assassination in Suling. Who was killed and who killed them didn’t matter. As soon as you remove the word ‘don’t’ from ‘don’t dare to be angry,’ the whole dam will burst.” Zhi Xiu sighed quietly. “There is a storm coming.”

No sooner had he spoken this final sentence than, all of a sudden, as if he had sensed something, the sliver of his consciousness in the Law Breaker abruptly disappeared, returning to the Xuanyin Mountains. There was a thunderclap in the grim sky over Flying Jade Peak. On neighboring Rosy Cloud Peak, a disciple watching over a medicine furnace shook, ruining a whole furnace full of elixirs.

Xi Ping's instincts told him this was bad. He thought that something was about to go wrong.

As he was distracted by anxiety, the next day—the third day of the ninth month—the Zhao family, carrying their portable hidden realm on their backs, reached Western Chu's capital Dongheng.

Xi Ping had been to Dongheng with his maternal grandfather's people when he was little. Now, retreading old haunts with Xu Rucheng, he practically didn't recognize it.

In Tao County, the most advanced thing the common people got to see in their daily lives was a steam boiler. The vast majority of people still drew drinking water from wells. Forget about steam carriages and Cloud Soaring Flood Dragons—even horses would sprain their ankles on the uneven, pitted dirt roads.

But Dongheng was like a fantasyland.

The city of Dongheng was situated on one side of Dongheng's Sanyue Mountain Range, built against the mountains. At a glance, it was impossible to count how many layers it had.

Horses and oxen could only travel along special paths. There were tracks laid everywhere, with small steam-powered carriages like miniature Cloud Soaring Flood Dragons shuttling back and forth over them. Beside them, cultivators flew on their swords in broad daylight without restraint. Looking up from below, your gaze could only reach the middle of the mountain. Everything above that was wreathed in mist from the steam. Only multicolored lights shone down, making night indistinguishable from day.

The imperial palace gazed down upon Dongheng City from above, brightly lit at night, like an immense magic beast concealed amid the landscape.

Princess Qing—the mother of the imperial grandson who came from Yu Family Bend—sent people to meet them outside the city and lead the Zhaos in. Right now, there was a snow-white veil over the face of Xu Rucheng, who was impersonating Zhao Qindan. Two rows of maids, each rivaling the next for beauty, waited deferentially to help the young mistress out of the carriage.

Without the Luwu mask to help him keep up appearances, Xu Rucheng would have been astonished into exposing himself by this ostentation. He dismounted the carriage in a daze. When he set foot on the earth of Dongheng, invisible spiritual energy spread out from underfoot.

Xu Rucheng gave a start: Dongheng's streets were covered with arrays!

“Calm down,” Xi Ping reminded him, “your shoes have the Golden Hand’s shielding seal on them.”

Xu Rucheng swallowed a mouthful of saliva. “Tai Sui, what kind of arrays are these?”

“Surveillance.” Xi Ping glanced at the imperial palace from a distance. “If you set foot on the streets of Dongheng, the Sanyue Sect will be able to track you. If they so wish, they can find out what you’re doing and where you are at any time. Be careful. Dongheng’s Sanyue are the world’s masters in talismans, arrays, and inscriptions. You can’t relax just because you have Moon Plated Peak backing you up.”

Even Xu Rucheng’s organs were trembling. “Hell, the whole city? How many spiritual stones does that burn? It’s...”

Before he could finish delivering the enlightening views of a pauper, he heard a whizz. Prince Qing Manor had set off fireworks to welcome the guests.

These weren’t ordinary fireworks. They were set off with spiritual stones. When they scattered in midair, spiritual energy surged into the spectators’ lungs. Meanwhile, the moment the fireworks exploded, Wei Chengxiang and the Luwu in Tao County simultaneously contacted Xi Ping through the reincarnation wood: “Tai Sui, there’s a problem!”

Xi Ping split off half his consciousness to return from Dongheng to Tao County. Before the reflection of the fireworks had vanished from his eyes, he saw a corpse fallen in the muddy earth mixed with autumn rain.

The seeds of this disaster had been planted when the garrisoned troops had first entered Tao County.

At first it had been a relatively well-off family pleading with the troops not to chop down the reincarnation wood trees growing on the hill of their ancestral graves. They said that the old trees had been there for ages, to guard the graves and preserve the fengshui. They requested that the soldiers “make an exception,” accepting a financial loss in order to forestall disaster. Unexpectedly, it inadvertently showed the jackals and wolves a means of earning money.

After most of the reincarnation wood trees along Tao County’s roads were removed, they started getting their eyes on the trees on people’s roofs and within their courtyard walls—and not just the reincarnation wood trees.

It didn’t take long before a semi-public price list began to circulate among the people—how much money it would take to avoid having the army ruffians break down your door, how much money to make them leave the roots after cutting down the tree, not harm the household goods... The prices weren't fixed; they didn't fall, they only rose.

Still later, the garrisoned troops publicly requested all residents to hand in their implements made of misty willow to the authorities. If you couldn't fix it up through connections, you just had to sit and wait to have your home searched and your possessions confiscated, and you would end up charged with the crime of "privately worshipping an evil god."

Today, just past noon, a group of hungover ruffians from the army had barged into a residence that had refused to "request that an exception be made." First they dug up a fruit tree that had been growing in the yard by the roots, then made a search for "objects of worship" made from misty willow. Among the "objects of worship" they turned up were tables, chairs, wardrobes...even a memorial tablet!

Seeing the memorial tablet about to be thrown onto the bonfire as well, the son of the head of the household had been unable to take any more. He had flared up and pulled out a hammer, without warning bashing the soldier about to burn the memorial tablet over the head, sending his brains splattering everywhere.

Everyone had sobered up at once. After a moment's stunned staring, with mixed anger and astonishment, the troops had wanted to take down the "murderer" at once. The people's resentment, which had accumulated over several days, exploded at a touch.

First the neighbors around them began to speak. From patient argument to unguarded swearing, and then once again to all the men and women, young and old, who lived in the street running outside, less than an incense stick of time passed in all.

The people closely surrounded the gang of army ruffians. When Xi Ping arrived, the two sides had already come to blows.

In the harsh autumn wind, Dongheng's Prince Qing Manor had used spiritual energy to force a whole garden of unseasonal flowers to grow, laying down a floral carpet bursting with exotic scents to welcome the honored guests.

Tao County was bleeding for the sake of a few pieces of rotten wood.

This had taken place not far from where Wei Chengxiang and Zhao Qindan were living.

Zhao Qindan pulled a sword out of the Silver Tray Lottery machinery, weighed it in her hand and found that it was still handy enough, then turned to go.

Wei Chengxiang pulled her back. “What are you doing?”

The young mistress had always been proud and arrogant, as well as a little unsociable. It wasn't that she hadn't been raised properly and was rude to people. Mainly it manifested in her unwillingness to owe anyone a favor. If a neighbor brought over a few wild bird eggs they had picked up, she would want to get something to give them in return that very day. With Wei Chengxiang perfunctorily half-listening, she could ask about it eight times within one shichen—as if those wild bird eggs were chafing her.

During the registration of residents, the neighbors she had practically no contact with had protected her. This was like a thorn pricking her flesh. Now that she had seized an opportunity, she wanted to go out immediately to return the favor.

“Don't be hasty,” Wei Chengxiang said seriously. “Do you think it's not bad enough yet? Wait.”

Zhao Qindan said, “It was those scoundrels causing trouble in the first place. In my opinion, they ought to have been beaten to death long before...”

“Do you think the law won’t punish the majority?” Wei Chengxiang interrupted her. “It will.”

Zhao Qindan froze. She thought that for a moment, an unspeakable gloom had passed over that person’s face.

Before she could say anything, their dilapidated house began to tremble faintly. Next, there came the sounds of shouting mixed with footsteps, followed by the firing of a hand cannon—

CHAPTER 122 - Eternal Flame (4)

The sound of the firearm discharging traveled so far through the narrow alley that even the half-immortals who kept feeling like their hearing was impaired tensed all over.

Zhao Qindan wasted no time saying anything else. She raised her sword and charged out.

An autumn rain was about to fall. The chilly damp assaulted the senses, wrapped around the smells of blood and gun smoke. Zhao Qindan's hand, hidden in her sleeve, instinctively formed a hand seal to draw a talisman—nothing happened.

She was stunned. She stopped in her tracks.

Yes—she was no longer a half-immortal of Heaven's Design Pavilion who could overturn hundreds upon thousands of people with one talisman.

There was another gunshot. The screams and angry cursing were more ear-piercing than the roar of the firearm. Zhao Qindan gave a start. The Qilin Guard didn't dare to enter where spiritual energy was prohibited, but now she, a former walker in the mortal world of Heaven's Design Pavilion, was finding out how it felt to “walk in the mortal world.”

But the next moment, her heart began to beat wildly. A rage of inexpressible origin engulfed her: for her traitorous family heading north to Dongheng, for that inglorious marriage transaction, for her baseless self-respect, stamped into the mud...and for this moment, for her true timidity and helplessness when she had nothing to fall back on.

The shots had come from the soldiers who had just been patrolling nearby and had immediately rushed over on hearing the disturbance. The patrol team's centurion had taken one look at an unruly citizen swinging a big hammer at his colleague's head and, in a moment of desperation, raised his hand cannon and shot.

But these Xia River loafers had never fought a battle, and their training had been sloppy and inferior. He had clearly been aiming at the shoulder of the person holding the hammer, but instead he hit an old man standing next to him in the neck. Even his head flew off when the cartridge connected. How could anyone have survived that? First, everyone was dumbfounded. Then the man holding the hammer forlornly cried out "Dad!", his eyes opening as wide as an ox's, his veins standing out. Shouting, he threw himself at the killer.

This time the centurion's aim was true. His shot opened a bloody flower on that man's forehead.

In the blink of an eye, two bodies were lying in front of the crowd, like a bucket of ice poured over the inflamed public sentiments. The angry crowd went quiet. No one dared to step forward again. They stood facing the soldier in the government's pay across a narrow alley.

The army ruffians who had gotten drunk and made trouble ran back to their team in terror. There was another who couldn't run back. Having "offered his life in sacrifice," he was lying at the feet of the common people.

The centurion's eyes fell on the corpse of that army ruffian. He thought that Tao County was beyond rescue. They had spent so much time with evil cultivators that the people were all abnormal. So he slammed his helmet heavily against the wall and swore a foul oath. "Resist that crowd of unruly citizens. Arrest them!"

The soldiers in the patrol team all rushed forward.

But while these people were armed with hand cannons, they still automatically avoided the strong men carrying knives and axes. Like dogs fighting over food, they charged toward the weak and elderly who couldn't run away. Though the weak and elderly were numerous, there still weren't enough of them to be fought over like this. Soon there weren't enough to go around. Two soldiers simultaneously grabbed an old woman leaning on a cane and wouldn't give way to each other. Even the old woman herself felt embarrassed along with the two of them.

Just then, the cool flash of a sword came out of nowhere, falling along with a lightning bolt from Tao County's sky. The sword cleverly passed through cracks in these two army ruffians' armor. In an instant, before the thunder came, the sword had cut off one man's arm and sliced open the other man's hand.

Even without the ability to draw talismans, a half-immortal still had muscles and bones that had been tempered countless times by spiritual energy. With one hand, Zhao Qindan supported the old woman, who was sliding down. She stamped on the hand cannons that had fallen. "Impudence!"

Wei Chengxiang had lost hold of her. When she came out in pursuit, this reprimand of Zhao Qindan's, with the particular flavor of the elite, had already been spoken.

Oh no.

It was as if the young mistress was afraid people wouldn't know there was something wrong with her background!

Wei Chengxiang had also never expected that when she had climbed so high along the path of cultivation, fate would kick her back to where she had started from—and tracing this business back to its roots, she had played a part in it!

“Senior,” Wei Chengxiang said quickly, squeezing the reincarnation wood, “the soldiers garrisoned in Tao County are distributed across twenty-five locations. The nearest army station to here has about three thousand people. At a quick march, they can come over within one ke. Not one of our neighbors will be spared today. If it was only an ordinary clash, they could spend money, call in connections, but now that people have died, it won’t be so easy to wrap it up. Hurry and get word to the young mistress, tell her to mind her mouth. If she gets dragged in, it’ll mean even more trouble!”

Before Xi Ping could respond, Wei Chengxiang added, “Also, in the last few days, I’ve found out that the army has brought ‘flying book’ machines that don’t use spiritual stones.⁸⁰ I’m not sure who those things can contact, maybe it’s the Qilin Guard outside of Tao County, maybe it’s their superior—at present, they’ve temporarily set up their general’s tent in Wild Fox Country, at the former location of the Snake King’s Immortal Palace, but it was a mortal that came, my guess is that it isn’t anyone important. There’s someone else behind them. No matter what, we can’t let the ‘flying book’ machine send word out. Sanyue is on the look-out for a reason to punish Tao County right now.”

Xi Ping said, “Understood. Have patience.”

No sooner had he spoken than Zhao Qindan, holding a sword with one hand and raising a hand cannon with the other, pointed at the centurion and said, “What fine men you all are! You accomplish nothing in pursuit of your careers or to protect your homes and your nation. All you’re capable of is extorting money from the common people. Slaughtering the old and weak, the women and children—where is martial law amidst this cruel oppression? Where are the laws of Western Chu?”

“Senior, make her shut up!” Wei Chengxiang’s mind buzzed. She didn’t know whether it was Zhao Qindan’s mouth that was too fast, or whether Tai Sui was getting on in years and starting to get tangled up in his beard, unable to pass word fast enough.

And Zhao Qindan wasn’t finished yet. Quickly as pouring out beans, she went on: “The elders here have never had the wish to rebel. They have always known their place. All they wish is to live safely. They do not even dare to make the extravagant demands of keeping warm and eating their fill. May I be so bold as to ask, soldiers, whose orders do you follow to insist on arousing the resentment of the people, forcing them to revolt? The court’s? Or the Sanyue Sect’s? Or is it your own malicious intentions that have made you turn traitor?”

Wei Chengxiang: "...”

She wanted to step forward right then, but Xi Ping unhurriedly said, “There are no cultivators nearby to hear her interrogate Sanyue’s shed skins’ Ways of the Heart, no need to worry—and she’s right.”

Wei Chengxiang blurted out, “Does being right mean she can just come out and say it?”

This question seemed to shut Xi Ping up. After a moment, he said with a laugh, “True, only children and young mistresses dare to say it so boldly. Let her say it, or else eventually, no one will even be able to see the lice on a bald man’s head. Can you use a hand cannon?”

Wei Chengxiang said, “Wh...”

The next moment, her consciousness was pulled into the Law Breaker. Two Moon Plated Gold hand cannons, obviously more compact and well-made than those Western Chu’s army was equipped with, were thrown toward her along with a bag of ammunition.

Tai Sui said, “I will leave this place to you.”

Then he sent her out of the Law Breaker.

That brief moment had been enough for Wei Chengxiang to glimpse that the inside of the Law Breaker was piled full of weaponry. Her thoughts moved quickly: “Does Tai Sui want to take Tao County? Was he prepared in advance?”

But there was no time to think carefully now. The centurion of Tao County’s garrisoned troops, as expected, was infuriated by this country girl with her mouth full of “big talk.” Pointing to Zhao Qindan, he said, “Fine, I see that you’re a spy from Southern Wan. These unruly civilians have not only been worshiping an evil cultivator in secret, they’ve also been sheltering foreign spies. Get them all! Those who have the audacity to rebel will be punished under the laws on treason. Shoot...”

Before the words “shoot to kill” could leave his mouth, a sniper’s shot hit him right in the back of the head. The centurion, maintaining his posture with his hand raised, stiffened where he was, with a hole clear through his head, looking helplessly at the frightened people.

The soldiers behind him didn’t understand what was happening. They were still hefting their hand cannons, waiting for the officer’s order. They didn’t expect the officer to twitch a couple times, then fall to his knees with a thump and hit the ground facedown, as if he were kowtowing to the frightened commoners in front of him. Finally, thick blood gurgled out.

The soldier nearest to the centurion was so frightened his face turned ashen. Picking up his hand cannon, he was about to fire, but before he could move, a sniper's shot, like a reaper, gathered him in.

Wei Chengxiang passed through the dim alley like a ghoul.

Others pursuing the Way relied on intensive study of techniques and spells, questioning their Way of the Heart, using spiritual energy to scour their meridians and cleanse their marrow. She had entered the Way through revenge. Most of the time, when she wasn't killing people, she was fleeing. Immortal tools, downgraded immortal tools, even mortal firearms—she was familiar with anything that could kill.

She was no longer the child who had cried at the mouth of Rat Alley because she had nowhere to go.

The small patrol team of soldiers targeted by the “reaper” panicked, holding their heads and scurrying like rats looking for a place to hide while vainly attempting to fight back.

Wei Chengxiang took down a man with each shot, but she was only one person, after all. When the good-for-nothings in the patrol team got scared, hand cannon fire began to fly. Zhao Qindan was busy protecting the crowd of neighbors and couldn't help her.

Soon, someone seized an opportunity to blow a sharp whistle.

“Senior Tai Sui,” Wei Chengxiang said, panting as she pressed on the reincarnation wood, “how long do you need me to hold out?”

Xi Ping said, “One ke.”

Xi Ping hadn't expected the conflict in Tao County to intensify this fast, but he was indeed not entirely unprepared.

The corruption of Western Chu's armed forces surpassed his imagination. Comparatively speaking, Great Wan's officials, who spent all their time engaged in internal strife, could simply be described as squeaky clean—fallen into the hands of this bunch of North Xia Waterborne Troops, Tao County was worse off than under the control of the Sanyue Sect. At least the immortals had Ways of the Heart. Soon Tao County would become a pit of vipers, and it would be hard to say whose dowry he had been preparing with all his running around.

Therefore, while the people's resentment, which only he could hear, had been growing louder and louder, Xi Ping had sent a warning to Zhou Ying.

A few days later, Bai Ling had sent a big batch of Great Wan weaponry, and the Luwu had prepared to face the garrisoned troops at any time.

Right away, the disruption devices for the "flying books" buried throughout the streets and lanes were simultaneously turned on.

The general's tent at the former location of the Snake King's Immortal Palace received no early warning. The first thing they heard was a mourning song in a mixture of Wan and Chu languages—a team of carriages in a funeral procession was passing through, playing music and singing.

This bunch of country bumpkins was really fucking ridiculous. The bodyguard standing watch in front of the "general's tent," seeing the situation, immediately went forward to scold them.

He saw a tall middle-aged man playing a huqin who seemed to have received orders from the officiant. He put the huqin aside and quickly walked over.

The musician was all smiles, nodding and bowing, simultaneously reaching into his sleeve to feel around for something, as if he was looking for money to give to avoid trouble. “Coffins circle the town. That’s been our local custom for many years. We have no intention of giving offense.”

The bodyguard’s expression softened. “But you can’t go through this way. Do you know what this place is?”

“That’s right, don’t blame the ignorant.” The huqin player drew near as he spoke, quickly pulling something out of his sleeve. Hiding it with his hand, he passed it to the bodyguard. “Sir, you had better...”

The bodyguard was just about to reach out a hand to accept the object when he suddenly met the musician’s eyes.

The corners of the musician’s eyes were wrinkled into a thousand folds, but there was no smile in them.

Wait, no, this was...

The next moment, the musician cleverly flipped his hand over, revealing what was in his palm. A palm-sized pure black hand cannon shot right through the bodyguard’s underbelly and bored up through his chest, but it only made a quiet pop.

The bodyguard went to see the kings of the underworld without making a sound. The musician calmly caught him and almost inaudibly finished his sentence: "...be on your way already."

Then he propped up the corpse of the bodyguard, and staggered with him up to the general's tent, as if they were two fast friends with their arms around each other's shoulders. He kept saying, "Sir, sir, we have to hurry up to meet the auspicious time, sir..."

The other guards in front of the general's tent, seeing the situation, approached uncomprehendingly. The funeral procession dressed in mourning clothes suddenly rose up. The totally unprepared general's tent's defenses seemed to be made of paper. Under cover of night, the Luwu, exceedingly familiar with the terrain, drove in at lightning speed.

All the "flying book" machines in the county only crackled.

Meanwhile, Zhao Qindan, protecting the group of neighbors, dove into a back alley. She had to prop up the old and lead the young, and she had to convince the elderly, who couldn't bear to give up their family possessions and kept trying to go back, to leave. When would the young mistress have done such a thing before? She was in a terrible fix.

They had just gone through the winding little alleys and hadn't yet had time to breathe a sigh of relief when the ground began to tremble. The garrisoned troops drawn by that earlier whistle that had been like an arrow piercing the clouds had rushed right over on horseback, even faster than they had anticipated!

Wei Chengxiang changed her gun's cartridge, her heart sinking. The front half of the lead rider's horse was visible now. As if they had received word, it was wearing special bulletproof light armor.

The horse was as swift as a gale. It blocked the path of Zhao Qindan and the others. Before he was even nearby, the horse's rider pulled out a rifle five or six chi long and shot toward the crowd.

There was a whizz, and a big all-encompassing net flashing with purple lightning fell.

A sparrow was just flying by and bumped right into the net. With a crackle, it became a roasted bird stuck to the net!

Zhao Qindan had meant to stab with her sword. The sword was already half-raised. She was held back by a few people who had caught on quickly. The cavalryman's protective armor easily deflected Wei Chengxiang's firepower. The rifle didn't move a hair.

Wei Chengxiang had no other choice. She had to show herself. She leapt down from the canopy of an ancient tree that had yet to meet with calamity. Using her own weight, she stamped on the cavalryman.

The horse stumbled under her weighty fall. Neighing, it raised its front hooves. The rifle fell from the cavalryman's hands, but the other cavalymen were following close behind. In a moment, countless hand cannons were pointed at Wei Chengxiang, clicking as they loaded.

At such a close distance, even with spiritual energy to protect her, a half-immortal wouldn't necessarily have been able to escape unharmed from hand cannon fire. In a place where spiritual energy was prohibited, wouldn't she be shot up into a sieve?

Zhao Qindan, held back by many hands, opened her eyes wide and struggled desperately. "Let go of..."

At this moment of imminent peril, there came another sharp whistle.

A mounted soldier with the look of one of the general's personal guards rushed over hoisting the flag of command. His voice reached them before he did: "Orders from the general. Do not disturb the civilians. Anyone who dares to discharge a weapon within the county will be punished under martial law!”

The cavalrymen with their fingers already holding down the triggers raised the muzzles of their guns just in time. Cold sweat rolled down Wei Chengxiang’s concave back to her waist.

The cavalryman who had just been kicked off his horse climbed miserably to his feet. Seeing the flag of command and the token in the hands of the newcomer, he had to swallow down all his discontent. “Reporting to the captain, our brothers have captured some armed Southern Wan spies.”

The mounted soldier delivering the order raised his chin haughtily. “Take them away. Have the general take care of them.”

In the general’s tent, the musician in mourning dress—Xi Ping—was just examining an unconscious fat man in front of him with amazement.

The North Xia Waterborne’s Troops’ Marquis of Qulong, Zheng Bin, was a half-immortal. Naturally he wouldn’t come to an awful place like this, where the use of spiritual energy was prohibited. The so-called “general” making trouble in Tao County now was only a sixth-rank officer under the Marquis of Qulong. He looked as though he weighed over three hundred jin. When he had been knocked unconscious, he'd fallen on Xi Ping's foot, and it was still aching faintly now.

Due to his partiality toward his san-ge and his personal good opinion of Princess Duanrui, he occasionally thought that while the Zhou family was bad, Xuanyin Mountain's treachery had come first, and the lunatics born alongside those with innate spiritual bones had also been forced into existence by Xuanyin Mountain.

But now he had suddenly realized that if Xuanyin Mountain hadn't been keeping the Zhou family down for over a thousand years, Great Wan would be another Western Chu.

The right and wrong of it was hard to judge.

Just then, from outside the tent came the voice of a guard: "General, two female spies from Southern Wan have been captured!"

Xi Ping's eyes turned. Beside him, a Luwu who had been a mimic by profession immediately imitated the officer's voice and said: "Understood. Lock them up for now. I will personally question them shortly."

"Yes, sir!"

This wouldn't work in the long run. There weren't necessarily a hundred thousand garrisoned troops in the country, but there were several tens of thousands, and the Luwu only had a few people. If they were exposed, no amount of skill would help.

So Xi Ping contacted Bai Ling through the reincarnation wood: "Bai Ling-da-ge, how long do we need to hold out?"

"It won't be very long," Bai Ling answered quickly. "Zheng Bin isn't a seamless egg. Also, my lord has instructed you to hide yourself. Only pass information, do not get involved."

Xi Ping: "..."

Bai Ling immediately sensed something from his momentary silence. "Viscount, where are you?"

Xi Ping silently removed the foot he had planted on the mountain of flesh that was the officer. "*Hss...*well...I may be a little close to the former location of the Snake King's Immortal Palace..."

Bai Ling said, "...You'd better enjoy your last meal."

On the fifth day of the ninth month, the Zhaos paid their respects to some important personages from Sanyue's West Peak, including Xiang Wenqing, at Dongheng's Sage's Palace, meant for worship of the sages. When they entered, a number of unobtrusive footmen were unexpectedly lit up by the inscriptions on the walls.

It turned out that the murals on all four walls of the Sage's Palace had inscriptions hidden in them. All the spiritual energy in the Sage's Palace circulated in a special way. When it passed through a human body, it would cast different shadows on the wall, projecting that person's spiritual image.

Once a cultivator's spiritual eyes had opened and their meridians had connected to heaven and earth, spiritual energy would pass through their bodies differently than it passed through those of mortals. The spiritual image masks couldn't disguise that. These footmen who ought to have been mortals were hit by the spiritual energy—it turned out that they were all half-immortals, including body servants of the clan leader. The Luwu's infiltration had reached so far!

Xiang Wenqing attacked at once, but these half-immortal Luwu had some strange immortal tools. They actually disappeared from under the eyes of a middle stage ascended spirit. In their wild rush, these Luwu “just happened” to run right into Princess Qiyang's carriage team returning from an autumn outing.

The panicked desperate criminals collided indiscriminately with the team. Amid the rapidly changing events, the Marquis of Qulong, on assignment on the distant Xia River, undertaking the important task of governing Tao County, heard the sad news of his loved one's death a thousand li away.

Meanwhile, in the Sanyue Immortal Mountains, a figure sitting upright in the middle of a lotus pond sensed something, swayed slightly, and opened his eyes.

CHAPTER 123 - Eternal Flame (5)

Ripple after ripple rose in the calm lotus pond. The lotuses were white, and the big round lotus leaves were also white. The flowers had neither pistil nor stamen, and there were no lotus seeds to be found. There was also no silt underwater. It was extremely clear. Dark red lotus roots and long stalks coiled in the crystalline water, all the more startling in comparison to the snow-white leaves, like internal organs laid bare to the light of day.

When the man in the lotus pond opened his eyes, all the lotuses in the pond curled up into buds.

This man who was the “shame of flowers”⁸¹ had a very shocking countenance—not only did he have no hair, he didn’t even have eyebrows. His willow leaf eyes, placed slightly low, seemed to sit in the middle of his face. A red-lipped mouth had been drawn in cinnabar on his forehead, so it was impossible to tell at a glance whether his head was right-side up or upside-down.

The ripples in the lotus pond rolled out to the edge of the pond and suddenly stopped at a pair of snow-white feet. When white-haired Elder Xuanwu appeared out of nowhere, the ripples immediately dispersed. The ripples on the pond stood unnaturally still all of a sudden.

Apropos of nothing, Xuanwu asked the person in the pond, “What did you see?”

The “shame of flowers” in the pond said, “One wedding and one funeral. The imperial grandson is taking a wife, and the emperor’s son-in-law is bereaved of his. Festive occasions both red and white.”

As he spoke, the “shame of flowers” turned and looked at Elder Xuanwu with his head whose top and bottom were almost indistinguishable. He asked, “Elder Xuanwu, can you guess whether my head is right-side up today?”

Xuanwu ignored him. The features drawn on his mask normally changed every moment, but facing the person in the pond, he maintained an oddly neutral expression, making him suddenly seem not so strange.

“Take a look at the future state of affairs in Tao County for me.”

“I’m not looking. Some place on the border where even birds don’t shit, what’s there worth looking at?” The bald head of the shame of flowers in the pond pushed apart the lotuses, and he swam toward Elder Xuanwu at the edge of the pond like a water ghoul. “Elder—shizun, can you guess whether my head is right-side up today?”

It was only when he moved that you noticed what was wrong: this person had no legs.

His lower body grew into the dark red lotus roots. It was hard to say whether he was a freak who had grown out of the lotuses, or whether there were flowers growing all over a freak's body.

“It is of utmost importance,” Xuanwu said, pulling a long face... a long mask. “Zhuoming, don't joke.”

This deranged “freak” was actually the master of Sanyue's East Peak, High Elder Xuanwu's only direct disciple. His name was Zhuoming. He had no surname.

The smaller mountains of Sanyue stood like trees in a forest, packed with the sons of powerful officials who spent money like water. But while these people could be said to belong to the “inner sect,” they had no say within the inner sect.

In Sanyue's inner sect, only the three Principal Peaks, East, Central, and West, had the authority to speak.

Among them, the West Peak had the most people and was the busiest. It was overseen by a shed skin elder, who had originally had sixteen ascended spirits under his command... Presently only eleven remained. Four had died at the hands of the great monster Qiu Sha, and another had been seriously wounded in the battle in Tao County. His boundary had fallen, and his cultivation had been destroyed. Each of these eleven ascended spirits had a crowd of disciples, a mixture of established foundations, half-immortals, and even mortals. Only their bloodline was pure—on the West Peak, everyone was surnamed Xiang.

The Central Peak, meanwhile, was the location of Sanyue's sect leader. It was said that the sect leader was the person in the current age closest to a full moon position. He was always in seclusion pursuing the moon. The routine responsibilities of the Central Peak were shared by his four ascended spirit disciples. The Central Peak's bloodline may not have been pure, but its threshold for entry was high. It accepted only established foundations with exceptional natural endowments. To enter the Central Peak, you had to pass layer upon layer of assessments. The more impressive the endowments, the more relaxed the requirements for birth became—it was said that when the legendary Hui Xiangjun had been at Sanyue, she had been part of the Central Peak.

The East Peak was the most special: the Silver Moon was there.

The sect leader didn't attend to business, and the West Peak's elder was responsible for the descendants of the Xiang clan and was unavoidably biased, so the East Peak's Xuanwu had become the true wielder of power in the Sanyue Sect.

Unlike the West Peak, which saw as much traffic as a marketplace, the East Peak, where the Silver Moon was kept, was a forbidden area within the inner sect. Apart from the sect leader, no one could enter or exit at will. And in thousands of years, Zhuoming was the only disciple Elder Xuanwu had taken.

No one knew where he had picked up Zhuoming. Rumor had it that he was a bastard of the Xiang clan, but his birth mother was unknown. Before opening his spiritual eyes, he hadn't been a "barren land," but his limbs had been paralyzed. He had come to the spiritual mountains lying down. In the three hundred years since he had entered the East Peak, no one had seen him again. Many of the old people had practically forgotten that such a person existed, and established foundations with shorter records hadn't even heard of him.

"How is it of utmost importance? Is Tao County a strategically important place that some military commander needs to win?" Zhuoming shot a dark look out of the water. "The population is small, their specialty product is evil cultivators, and before, when a map in Dongheng left the place off, it took most of a century before anyone noticed. It didn't bother you then."

“Inept government is neglect on the part of the court in Dongheng. Immortal sects do not attend to ordinary affairs,” Xuanwu said gravely. “At present, Tao County is under the control of the Law Breaker, whose whereabouts are unknown. It has become an ‘unbound’ place. The spiritual mountains cannot see into it. Over time, it is sure to come to harbor all manner of evil. Wasn’t the disaster of Southern Wan’s Impassable Sea a lesson?”

“There are many places the spiritual mountains cannot see into. Aren’t there two right here on the East Peak? Oh...I know, shizun thinks we’re dirty. I keep telling you to toss some silt cleaning fish into the lotus pond.” Zhuoming began to laugh. His laughter was like the aftermath of a stroke. Once the “haha”s started, there was no end to them. He wouldn’t stop. At last it was impossible to tell whether he was crying, laughing, or crowing.

Xuanwu, used to this, tossed a pill into the spirit on his forehead. A breath of clear air instantly spread throughout the whole lotus pond. Zhuoming’s bizarre laughter came to an abrupt halt.

He closed his eyes, and the lotuses opened, a string of heartless white lotuses like river lanterns to mourn the dead.

After a moment, Zhuoming said in a flat voice: “There’s a murmur behind the Law Breaker’s axiom, as if tens of thousands of people are speaking at the same time. It's too noisy. I can't discern what the axiom is."

The features on Xuanwu's mask twisted. "That Yu Chang is still only a near-ascended spirit. Can he really hide from your observation?"

Zhuoming's eyes moved beneath his eyelids. He didn't answer.

Xuanwu continued, "Where is Yu Chang? Can you see his destiny clearly?"

"If shizun cannot find him, naturally he has already gone north over the Slumbering Dragon Sea. Why ask me?" Zhuoming said. "His destiny is entangled with the fog brought by the Law Breaker. It is hard to say where he will end up."

"Is there a means of resolving Tao County's present predicament?"

"There are only two ways to remove the Law Breaker. Either the axiom breaks, or the axiom is realized—when everywhere on earth is like Tao County, without spiritual mountains, without cultivators. When both immortals and demons have perished—then perhaps the axiom in the Law Breaker will be realized," Zhuoming said coldly. "Shizun, don't worry."

"What are you saying?!" said Xuanwu.

The corners of both of Zhuoming's mouths, above and below, turned up. "Heaven and earth can hardly last forever, so is it worth speaking of the immortal mountains? Southern Wan's Bell of Tribulation has tolled several times, the Silver Moon has shone upon the Xia River, the Late-Autumn Red from eight centuries ago dyed the mid-autumn moon blood red, and the Law Breaker and the Riverward, those demonic tools, have both reappeared. How far are we from the fire in the Unbound Furnace rekindling? Shizun, do you know the kind of festering sore that, once it erupts, will spread over the whole body? A terminal illness with no cure. Tao County is that open sore."

Without a word, Xuanwu turned and was about to disappear where he stood.

"Shizun," Zhuoming suddenly called him back. "I'm very bored. If there's any kind of wedding or funeral in the inner sect, could I go over representing the East Peak to get in on the fun?"

Xuanwu stopped in his tracks. Having heard him mention weddings twice, he involuntarily took it to heart. His consciousness swept through the three Principal Peaks and saw that there really was a wedding coming up—a mortal disciple of the West Peak was about to marry the young mistress of the main bloodline of Southern Wan's Zhao family.

Eight hundred weddings between a mortal and a half-immortal couldn't interest High Elder Xuanwu, but the bride's background gave him pause... Southern Wan's Zhao family, coming from Yu Family Bend, and this Young Mistress Zhao had previously met Yu Chang.

Xuanwu asked, "Is there a problem with the daughter of the Zhao clan?"

"A big problem. She's..." Zhuoming heaved a loud, slow sigh. "She's a jinx on her husband."

Xuanwu: "..."

Zhuoming seemed to want to laugh again, but his face seemed to have been fixed in place by that pill from earlier. His features, unmoving, trembled incessantly. He couldn't laugh.

Xuanwu took no more notice of his ravings. He left with a wave of his sleeve, putting him out of sight and out of mind.

Zhuoming shook all over, sounds of chortling coming from his throat. All the ripples in the pond once again began to tremble.

He only calmed down after a long moment. Speaking to himself, he said, "Shizun, shizun, can you guess whether my head is right-side up today?"

Xuanwu was gone. No one answered.

“Well, you’ve guessed wrong again,” Zhuoming said. The mouth drawn on his forehead slowly opened and stuck out a tongue, spitting out the pill Xuanwu had shot into his “spirit” whole. Then his head rotated slowly on his neck, turning over. The two mouths switched places. He reached out a hand and pulled off his nose, turned it over, and put it back.

“The bride is unlucky, the bride will be a jinx later, the bride is all made of paper. The bride is missing something, the bride has something extra... Hee-hee, the bride is here for the Unbound Furnace.” Saying so, he abruptly opened his eyes. His gaze shot swiftly through the sky like a blade of frost, as if it wanted to pierce the horizon.

“Don’t you agree, the ungovernable way’s Misty Willow...Reincarnation Wood?”

Xu Rucheng, impersonating Zhao Qindan, suddenly gave a start, for no reason waking from meditation, his heart beating like thunder.

At the same time, Xi Ping, repeatedly practicing talismans in the Law Breaker, felt his spiritual sense touched, as if a pail of ice water had been thrown right into his face. Out of nowhere, a chill went through his whole body.

Xi Ping was alone inside the Law Breaker. On the night of the second day of the ninth month, after shifu had said “There is a storm coming,” his consciousness had disappeared, and he hadn’t returned. Xi Ping didn’t know whether this was a good thing or a bad thing. He was only afraid that Zhi Xiu was at a critical moment in his seclusion and didn’t dare to rashly speak to disturb him. All he could do was worry and ask Lin Chi to keep a constant eye on what was happening at Flying Jade Peak for him. He would have loved to shove Xu Rucheng right into Sanyue for the wedding ceremony.

Xi Ping dismissed his preoccupations and focused on meditation, but that strange sensation went as quickly as it had come. He couldn’t seize on its source. He tried to divine it for a while, awkwardly imitating the text Zhi Xiu had left for him by rote, but he couldn’t divine anything... The “craftsmanship” of the Dignitary of Fate’s lineage seemed to be done for, each generation worse than the one before.

“Senior,” Xu Rucheng called to him through the reincarnation wood, “suddenly I don’t feel so well.”

Xi Ping focused. “This journey may involve twists and turns. It’s a warning for you to be careful. Although, if a master really did notice there was something wrong with you, with your half-immortal’s cultivation, you wouldn’t feel anything before you died.”

“That’s true.” Xu Rucheng was silent for a moment. “Senior, these last few days, a bunch of the Zhao family’s old women have been coming over in groups every day to torment me, openly and implicitly giving instructions about all kinds of...tricks, you know, for after marriage. They must want to get me in before the New Year.”

Xi Ping’s mind moved.

The imperial grandson’s wedding ought to have involved a good deal of unnecessary pomp, but the Zhao family had been infiltrated by spies, leading to the assassination of Her Highness Princess Qiyang, and the assassins had disappeared right out from under the noses of Sanyue’s ascended spirit masters.

This unforeseen event had shaken Dongheng’s court and its people, and it had led to two outcomes:

First, Princess Qiyang was the aunt of Zhao Qindan’s fiancé. The Zhao family couldn’t avoid blame in connection with her death. That Prince Qing Manor hadn't fallen out with them could be counted as acting for the sake of the bigger picture. But the Dragon and Phoenix Symbolizing Prosperity stamp had already been completed. The marriage was set whether anyone liked it or not. On the bride's side especially, the Zhao family had no opportunity for regrets. So it suddenly became uncertain whether the young mistress's status would be as formal wife or not... At present, the two sides were still bargaining. It would depend on whether the Zhao family was willing to bear the exorbitant price Prince Qing Manor was asking for the sake of this daughter—no matter what, a grand wedding was no longer possible. Though this matter was sickening, it was a good thing for Xi Ping. There was no more need to wait for an "auspicious date," greatly cutting down on the time it would take.

Second, on hearing the news, the Marquis of Qulong had flown his sword through the night to return to Dongheng. So racked with grief he wished he were dead, he proclaimed that his spiritual bones were complete and his Way of the Heart fixed, and he "could not live under the same sky as those who had killed his wife." He would hunt down his enemies to the ends of the earth to carry out vengeance.

A few days later, the Marquis of Qulong spilled his blood on a specially made token—the token had been privately designed by Lin Chi, using a special type of spiritual beast skin, with every pore in the skin inlaid with miniature inscriptions or small arrays. When the blood poured into them, it activated a specially positioned array, and through the array conducted the blood to a reincarnation wood tree far in Tao County. If a cultivator didn't spill blood on it and tried to tear the token apart by force, the array would be destroyed. Then the Marquis of Qulong's consciousness entered the Law Breaker's hidden realm, where he had a friendly meeting with Zhou Ying, the power behind the Luwu.

The two of them had a night's worth of private discussion. The next day, the Marquis of Qulong went in person to Tao County with a team of bodyguards, and, swiftly and decisively, carried out a series of punishments against the garrisoned troops.

The Marquis invited the Qilin Guard, who didn't dare to enter Tao County without a reason, to come observe the ceremony as he stripped or changed the ranks of a crowd of officers under his command and loftily promulgated twenty-three articles of military rules prohibiting the harassment of civilians and, as an example, beheaded a batch of army ruffians on the lookout for an opportunity to make trouble, leaving a few of his close confidants to take over Tao County. He also announced that Tao County's disaster relief provisions for the autumn and winter would be conveyed by the garrisoned troops themselves, guaranteeing that not one grain would be missing, asking the village elders and townspeople to set their minds at ease. The trees had been cut down for the sake of repairing the roads. In the future, better trees would be planted, and there would be no more instances of soldiers trespassing into private residences.

The deaf and blind Qilin Guardsmen observed the “happy and harmonious relations between soldiers and civilians” in bewilderment. On leaving, according to protocol, they sent full detailed reports to the spiritual mountains, feeling that no sooner had the Marquis of Qulong attained his freedom than he had been unable to hold back from a major undertaking.

Like this, with the Qilin Guard bearing witness, in a place unobserved by the spiritual mountains, Tao County “openly and honestly” changed its name to Zhou.

Give him a crack, and Zhou Ying would use it to pry the spiritual mountains open, never mind Tao County, where all cultivators “couldn’t see their hands in front of their faces.” Xi Ping felt that san-ge was like a mouse fallen into a jar of rice, preening and showing off, scolding him for no reason... Of course, he didn’t dare to say that in front of san-ge.

But for this winter, Tao County was all taken care of. This tribulation had passed.

This patch of earth that had been repeatedly trampled by evildoers and treated as an abandoned child by the immortal mountains finally got a season to recuperate. The hundred thousand white spirits that had silently dispersed through the veins of the earth nurtured the fish in the water and the grass on the banks. The results were instantly visible. The migratory birds flying down from Northern Li set up housekeeping there. After Zhao Qindan was “arrested” and released by the garrisoned troops, as was only to be expected, she was accepted by the people around her. Utterly confused, she became “one of ours” in Tao County. Someone inadvertently saw her teaching Wei Chengxiang Chu writing, and, with two strings of cured meat as tuition fees, requested that she teach their children to read and write. After this, word got around quickly, and Zhao Qindan soon had more work than she could handle. She had no more time to feel at a loss about what to do.

At this point, the good and evil initiated by Qiu Sha had temporarily come to a close. Wei Chengxiang had cleared the accounts of her conscience and was prepared to return to the Land of Turmoil—the young mistress no longer needed her to look after her, and she had people in the Land of Turmoil. Moreover, however superbly made her artificial hand was, in Tao County, where spiritual energy couldn’t be used, it could still only act as an ornament. It was truly inconvenient.

Xi Ping considered: In order to assassinate the princess, many of the Luwu who went with Xu Rucheng exposed their identities, and with the Xiang family giving them the cold shoulder like this, it’s unlikely they’ll allow “Zhao Qindan” to bring her family into the Sanyue Mountains. While there are all kinds of people mixed up in Sanyue, some, after all, have real skill. The masters won’t be interested in giving a little half-immortal like Xu Rucheng a second look, so perhaps it won’t be difficult for him to infiltrate, but looking for clues about the Unbound Furnace will be as difficult as ascending to the heavens... Can my true body really not leave Tao County?

Xi Ping always acted on a thought as soon as he had it. He remembered the good and not the bad. With a thought, his consciousness had gone to Xuanyin’s Moon Plated Peak.

CHAPTER 124 - Eternal Flame (6)

“There is someone waiting to receive you in the inner sect, codename ‘Young Master Cousin.’ He will contact you directly. We will think of other ways to enter. You must be careful. Do not act rashly.”

Wearing Zhao Qindan’s skin, Xu Rucheng unconsciously rubbed his earring—one of his earrings was made of gold, and the other was a gold-plated piece of reincarnation wood. He could receive word from his colleagues at any time.

Right now, apart from the Luwu that Zhou Ying had deliberately exposed when assassinating the princess, the others, along with the Zhao family, had taken up residence in a place twenty li from the outskirts of Dongheng City. In his capacity as “fiancée,” a small cart drove Xu Rucheng directly into the Sanyue Mountains.

For the young mistress of an important family, this was undoubtedly the greatest of insults. Fortunately, Xu Rucheng had no self-respect. He was only a little panicked.

A paperman couldn’t be used to enter Sanyue’s inner sect. Whether they were made by Bai Ling or copied by Xi Ping, the papermen were all of established foundation grade. That was fine for running wild in the border territory of Yu Family Bend, but if they'd tried using that to enter Sanyue's inner sect, the papermen could have been used as burial goods in a funeral procession right away.

Had Xuanyin's elders and its thirty-six peak masters been to Dongheng's Sanyue's inner sect? Xu Rucheng couldn't say for sure. At any rate, below the ascended spirit level, he was the groundbreaking first.

Because of this, buried here, he could also be entered into the history books.

The improved reincarnation wood divine tool was convenient and easy to bring along. He could confer with his colleagues any time if something went wrong. While dealing with the Zhaos, even Zhao Qindan herself had acted as external support.

Xu Rucheng touched the reincarnation wood in his earring with his consciousness and asked, "What is the new colleague's background?"

"Young Master Cousin"? Whose cousin?

Even though the Luwu didn't like using their full names abroad, they still only went by abbreviated versions of their names, like "Lao Tian" or "Da Cheng." Why was this person taking such a novel approach?

“Don’t ask,” his colleague told him, “it’s an established foundation senior.”

Xu Rucheng suddenly understood: oh, no wonder.

And here he had been puzzled. Using as convenient an identity as a young mistress of the Zhao family, with Young Mistress Zhao herself to provide assistance, it had been so hard for him to sneak in. How could someone else get into the inner sect a step ahead of him to “receive” him? Indeed, sneaking into Sanyue’s inner sect wasn’t like operating in the mortal world. You had to rely on a master.

In fact, even Heaven’s Design Pavilion spoke of Xuanyin’s inner sect as unreachably high, but here they had “Tai Sui” and “Young Master Cousin,” one established foundation after another stepping up to be used. Where was His Highness Prince Zhuang getting them all? He was truly unfathomable.

Hearing that he had outside help, Xu Rucheng felt a little more secure. He pushed the carriage window open a crack.

The spiritual energy in the Sanyue Sect was too dense. Before this, the place with the most abundant spiritual energy that he had been to was the Kaiming Department’s training hall, built with spiritual stones for bricks, the spiritual energy even more abundant than in the Zhao family’s hidden realm. But it wasn’t worth mentioning in the same breath as this place.

If you said that the Kaiming Department's training hall was a cup of sweetened water whose sweetness you could barely taste, then the Sanyue Sect was honey so thick you could pick out the sugar granules.

Xu Rucheng inhaled and exhaled lightly and felt that his lungs and bones were crammed full of spiritual energy. He had never escaped the poverty of the "Kaiming" position. All this way, he'd taken every opportunity to use the spiritual stones in the Zhao family hidden realm to cultivate "on public funds." Anyone who didn't take advantage was a loser.

But now that he had truly reached the spiritual mountains, he suddenly couldn't calm down enough to meditate.

The dense spiritual energy made him feel excessively free and easy, then out of nowhere afraid... Xu Rucheng felt that he was about to be swallowed by the spiritual mountains. These spiritual mountains seemed to be "alive," coldly suspended above his head like the Silver Moon, bringing down heaven's punishment upon any ants who were unwilling to blindly go with the flow: Hui Xiangjun had been utterly discredited; Southern He's nation and people had been destroyed for misusing the Gold Imitation Technique; Wan and Chu seemed to have taken these as lessons and used the Gold Imitation Technique with great restraint, yet five years ago there had still been the minor upheaval caused by the fire in the southern outskirts...and then there was barren and desolate Yu Family Bend.

The workers who were nearly starving to death couldn't see the light of day when they raised their heads, so they said "Moon Plated Gold eats people."

A thought appeared out of nowhere. Xu Rucheng suddenly thought: It seems that everything in the world is decided by the spiritual mountains.

The spiritual mountains differentiated mortal and immortal, demarcated national boundaries. The great divine tools that could wash away all the world's "demons" had been birthed by the spiritual mountains. The full moon divinities and the shed skin sages had been approved by the spiritual mountains. Even whether a place was barren or fertile was determined by the outstretched veins of the earth of the spiritual mountains.

Just then, the carriage stopped.

Xu Rucheng gave a start and unconsciously squeezed the earring hiding reincarnation wood, then heard the old Xiang family maidservant who had led him into the Sanyue Mountains say in a strictly businesslike way, "Knowing you had been forced to leave your home, young mistress, His Highness made ready some clever servants specifically for your use, all well-trained. Please choose some you find suitable to bring along, young mistress.”

As she said this, someone pulled open the carriage door for him. Xu Rucheng raised his head and saw eight young women, each with a different type of beauty, standing in a row. They bowed to him in unison.

Where would a laborer whose ancestors hadn't washed the mud off themselves in eight generations have seen such a spectacle? Xu Rucheng was petrified and averted his gaze. But as soon as he lowered his head, he glimpsed the nail polish on his own nails and at last remembered: Right, I'm like them.

The old maidservant sent by the Xiang family pulled a long face, her features almost dangling to her insteps. As if reciting a funeral oration, she said, “Everything is plain in the immortal mountains. Please excuse us, young mistress. According to regulations, the imperial grandson ought to be accompanied by six servants, and a formal wife can command five servants. His Highness lives simply and frugally. He is still one person short of the six person quota.”

So?

Xu Rucheng, all at sea, waited for her to continue, but the old maidservant didn't go on. She stood there like a stump, keeping herself to herself.

Just then, among the eight candidates, the woman furthest to the left quickly raised her eyes and cast a glance at him.

This woman had a pair of bewitching peach blossom eyes that shone. With one look, she nearly made Xu Rucheng's face heat up. He was just about to avoid her gaze when he heard an unfamiliar man's voice through the reincarnation wood: "Don't just stand there. She's telling you to show some sense and not surpass your 'husband.'"

Xu Rucheng choked on a mouthful of steam. "You... Sir, are you the 'Young Master Cousin' senior?"

"Indeed," the person answered briefly. "There is a regular order to the mortal servants that the Xiang family sends into the immortal mountains. If you find the right connections, you can sneak in. It's on your account that this was possible. Otherwise, the next selection of servants would be ten years from now."

Xu Rucheng: "..."

Not only had he found an established foundation master, this was also an established foundation master who could stoop or stand as necessary! His Highness Prince Zhuang's powers were truly vast!

Though to return to an earlier subject, it was no wonder Sanyue had a bunch of good-for-nothings who couldn't open their spiritual eyes in eight years. Occupying the immortal mountains, these Xiangs lived mundane lives, treating the immortal mountains like their own home. What kind of lousy way could they cultivate?

Xu Rucheng asked, "Senior, who should I pick?"

"Whoever you like. Don't pick me, at any rate," the "Young Master Cousin" said. "Just pick four whose looks you think are a little worse."

Xu Rucheng was confused. He thought, If I don't choose you, how will I bring you in?

But the Xiang family's old maidservant, perhaps unhappy that he was holding things up, urged him cuttingly: "These are all servants born in Prince Qing Manor, with clean backgrounds, all bearing our family's seal. Those spies and sneak thieves certainly can't sneak in among them. Would you like them to state their horoscopes, young mistress, so you can see whether there is a clash between you?"

The spy and sneak thief Xu Rucheng thought, We're going to clash so hard it kills you.

He had no time for discussion and could only act according to the senior's directions. With difficulty, he chose four among the eight great beauties who weren't quite as dazzling and didn't choose the senior.

The Xiang family's old maidservant lowered her eyelids. She seemed to give a laugh. She waved a hand to send the beauties away.

The rest of the way, they didn't travel on the ground. The carriage took off suddenly and flew through range upon range of hills shrouded in mist. For a time, the fierce wind blew so strong that Xu Rucheng couldn't open his eyes. After about half an incense stick of time, he saw in the distance the three Principal Peaks standing abreast. It wasn't yet dark, yet a mammoth silver moon hung above the East Peak.

Xu Rucheng's pupils contracted slightly. He recognized this as the murder weapon that had turned Qiu Sha to dust with its beams.

There seemed to be a shadow on the Silver Moon...like a smiling face staring at him.

The West Peak, seen from a distance, was only an ordinary mountain, but when you reached it, it was utterly shocking: from the foot of the mountain to its crest, countless hidden realms of all sizes were layered, expanding the space on the mountain more than ten million times. Passing among them, Xu Rucheng could practically “hear” the crunching of countless spiritual stones turning to dust.

Within ten meters, you could pass by seven or eight hidden realms. They showed only one side to passersby, like one richly colored painting after another, hanging high and low in space. If you wished to enter one of those hidden realms, you had to have the matching special inscriptions. You definitely couldn't lose your way and wander by mistake into another's territory.

Xu Rucheng was dizzy from the sight. This gathering of hidden realms on the West Peak didn't seem like a place for quiet cultivation. It looked like one shrunken Dongheng City after another, each with its own form of grotesquery.

The imperial grandson's manor was at the foot of the West Peak. Yu Family Bend had already been incredibly rich and powerful in Xu Rucheng's eyes, but the imperial grandson whose position depended on Yu Family Bend could only measure up to a rather small and very unremarkable hidden realm.

The master was mortal, so there were downgraded immortal tools everywhere in this hidden realm: there were small carriages floating in midair, so mortals, too, could experience “flying a sword”; there was an enormous bellows and an ice maker, so the master could “summon the wind and rain” whenever he liked; there were lanterns inlaid everywhere that could identify the master’s voice and change color according to his orders... Because they were all “downgraded,” they burned spiritual stones but also spat out a large volume of steam. The whole manor was shrouded in mist.

However sloppy the proceedings, they hadn’t gotten married yet, after all. In an obvious attempt at a cover up, Xu Rucheng was set up in a detached courtyard, separated from the other places in the hidden realm by a river. The riverbed was carved full of arrays and could also only be crossed using an inscription key. With Xu Rucheng’s cultivation level, he couldn’t understand the arrays. He only felt like a bird that had been locked in a cage.

When he went into the cage...into the courtyard to look, all his things had already been stored. Four maids had arrived a step ahead of him and were awaiting his arrival at the entrance.

Xu Rucheng took one glance and was filled with gloom—these weren’t the people he had chosen. The ones standing at the entrance right now were the other four candidates. No wonder that senior had told him not to choose him. So why put on the show of making him choose? To make fun of him?

He fixed his eyes on the Xiang family's old maidservant. "What do you mean by this?"

The old maidservant had the inscription key in one hand. She seemed already to be floating on the water. She put on a perfunctory act of surprise: "What? Young mistress, are you unsatisfied with these four in any way? Didn't you choose yourself which ones you didn't want and which ones to keep?"

As she spoke, the old maidservant's figure was already becoming blurry above the water. She left behind only these words with a false smile in them: "And here I was just admiring the young mistress for her excellent insight, greatly superior to that of others from your honored home."

Xu Rucheng was about to defend himself, but the old maidservant and the carriage driver were both gone. A layer of thin fog steamed up from the arrays in the river, trapping him in the little courtyard like a curtain. All around was silence. There were only the sounds of gears turning and the sighs of steam from the various downgraded immortal tools—Xu Rucheng discovered that while he was here, he couldn't even send his consciousness out.

What a disgrace! This was house arrest!

“Young mistress, please...”

One of the four maids stepped forward to support him. When her soft and slender hand touched him, Xu Rucheng instinctively shook it off. “Don’t touch me!”

This maid was a genuine mortal. The girl couldn’t stand being thrown off like this. With a cry, she stumbled, and the rims of her eyes immediately reddened, but she didn’t dare to say anything. She only lowered her head and got down on her knees, retreating.

Xu Rucheng’s colossal anger caught in his throat. He moved his lips helplessly and nearly ran after her to apologize. Then he heard the established foundation senior impersonating a maid say, “We maids are all lowly people. We are aware that the sight of us displeases the young mistress. But we have already taken brands onto our spiritual images, and neither our lives nor our deaths are free. Otherwise, if we were capable of taking our own lives, we would not be here to offend the young mistress’s eyes.”

At this point, there was even the tremor of a sob being held back.

Xu Rucheng was dumbfounded, not knowing how this senior had forced out this tearful voice to speak these lines. In spite of himself, he suspected he had the wrong person.

Then he once again heard the man's calm voice through the reincarnation wood: "You are being watched from the shadows. Be careful, don't just stare at me like an idiot."

Xu Rucheng was all in disarray. "What...what is your name?"

Then this mysterious established foundation who seemed to be a reincarnated drama queen walked forward with realistic mincing steps and tentatively lent him an arm. "Entering the inner sect with a new master, we must wait for our master to grant us names. The young mistress is weary from the carriage ride. You ought to settle down first. Do not worry yourself on our accounts."

Xu Rucheng didn't dare to pick a name at random. Apprehensively, he asked through the reincarnation wood, "Senior, what should I call you?"

There was a momentary silence. "You can call me...Jiangli."

The "Young Master Cousin" who had stunned Xu Rucheng was the Luwu's real cousin—Xi Ping, using a fake voice to fool Xu Rucheng.

With Xu Rucheng's half-immortal cultivation, he couldn't just draw an array in Sanyue's inner sect to let him come over in a paperman. Anyway, Xiang Wenqing had already personally taught him that it was best for a cultivator's body and mind to remain one. The papermen at best could bully lower level cultivators. On meeting a master, his consciousness couldn't run away. If he didn't die, he would still be seriously injured, go back to being a tree spirit who didn't know his own name like he'd been for the last five years.

So Xi Ping had to think of a way to use his true body.

In order to temporarily leave Tao County, he needed to resolve a few problems: first, the Law Breaker couldn't leave. Xi Ping had tried it. The Tai Sui Qin couldn't cross the line of the spiritual energy prohibition. This meant that even if he could leave, he couldn't take his vital weapon with him. Though fortunately that kind "master of the way of taking the blame" Yu Chang had left him the Discard the False and Keep the True book, so he could bring a copied qin to protect himself.

Next, though reasonably speaking a great master's consciousness couldn't cross national borders, if a person who ought to have been sealed at the bottom of the Impassable Sea openly went out for a stroll, would Xuanyin Mountain notice something...? That was hard to say, and Xi Ping didn't dare to run the risk. He wasn't worried about going on the run like Yu Chang, but he couldn't be exposed in Tao County. That would implicate san-ge.

So, in the interests of safety, he had gone to Lin Chi to order an item made—that immortal tool that very much resembled a sunburned Riverward that Lin Chi had made and then destroyed.

This thing's spiritual sense was taken from the Riverward. It could make a person blend like water into another person's life. Physical appearance, spiritual image, habits of speech and movement—all of it could be fixed as closely as possible to fit another person's. Lin Chi had crudely named it the Replica and persisted in thinking that it would do harm. He absolutely refused to yield and was pestered incessantly for three days by Xi Ping.

“Fine, then,” Xi Ping said when Master Lin was ready to collapse, aiming at what he believed would be Lin Chi's weak spot, “if that's the case, there's nothing else I can do. I'll have to leave Hui Xiangjun's Unbound Furnace buried in the Sanyue Mountains. Sanyue couldn't get hold of her, but they're doing well enough holding her vital weapon. Maybe they can even perform a posthumous marriage with that Xiang-what's-his-name, the dead sword cultivator.”

For once, Lin Chi looked stern. “How do you expect me to explain myself to General Zhi?”

“Well, there won’t be any need for that,” said Xi Ping. “If we can’t repair Zhaoting, you won’t have to explain anything to him anymore, Lin-shishu. You can just burn some paper for him during the holidays.”

Lin Chi: “...”

General Zhi hadn’t accepted a disciple in centuries, all for the sake of taking in this thing. Could this be the “individualistic” heroic spirit? Master Lin wasn’t a hero, and he really couldn’t beat this guy. Left with no alternative, he violated one of his basic principles: he took his grievance to the Kaiming Department’s Prince Zhuang.

Sadly, His Highness Prince Zhuang’s trump card for dealing with this fiend in human form had lost effect—before, Xi Ping had been scared of making him sick from anger; no matter how much trouble he got into, he had always left room to maneuver. Now he was no longer afraid of that. It wasn’t so easy to make a half-immortal sick.

Zhou Ying ruined two discipline rods and crushed the piece of reincarnation wood he had brought from the Impassable Sea. But he couldn't keep that brat from showing up right in front of him using papermen with that traitor Bai Ling's help.

So a month later, Xi Ping got his wish and obtained the Replica.

He left a sliver of his consciousness in the century-old reincarnation wood tree in the yard of the All Comers Inn and sealed the Tai Sui Qin along with it—this way, though he was thousands of li away, he could still open the hidden realm inside the Law Breaker any time. He wouldn't hold up the Luwu's communications or arms smuggling.

Then he said a word to Tai-er-nainai and freely went on a long journey.

First, within Tao County, Xi Ping infiltrated the garrisoned troops convoying disaster relief provisions north. With a small trick, he replaced a soldier. The moment he stepped out of the prohibition on spiritual energy, he used the Replica to turn into that soldier.

As soon as he put on the Replica, Xi Ping understood why Lin Chi had been unwilling to make this thing again. The young soldier's life history, his joys and sorrows, were all laid out in front of him, as though he was transparent: his father had died when he was an infant, the scar on his forehead came from being hit on the head with a stone by his gambling drunk of an older brother. Under the gaze of his frail, powerless mother, he ran away from home to join the army, filled with ambitions of standing out. But there was nothing in the army to make him stand out. What awaited him was endless humiliation and bullying from his colleagues... Even the lopsided toe on his right foot that had been rubbed raw by his army boots was so real.

The moment he “became” the young soldier, the silently erupting rage nearly lit Xi Ping on fire. He bit the tip of his tongue and narrowly managed to stabilize his spirit. He was scared into a cold sweat.

No wonder this thing could avoid the eyes of a shed skin—he had simply inherited another person’s everything.

This thing could drive a person crazy.

Fortunately, when he had been a tree spirit and unable to control his consciousness, he had been pulled into the bodies of countless people and bled amid the fates of others. He was a practiced hand.

And when he was sleeping at night, he could pull his consciousness back into the reincarnation wood to rest.

He changed identities the whole way, the lives of these mortals like boats, ferrying him from Tao County to Dongheng. Taking the opportunity of Prince Qing Manor placing people beside Zhao Qindan, he had removed the spiritual image brand of one of the servant candidates—that girl had a lover; forced by the brand to be a nominal “maid” but in reality a “bed warmer,” she had simply been wishing she were dead, so that counted as him having saved a life—and so, he had infiltrated the Sanyue Sect with alarm but no danger.

Reasonably speaking, it was seamless... Master Lin was worthy of being called the Golden Hand. Though he modestly called it a Replica, Xi Ping thought this thing would be useful even within Great Wan, never mind in Western Chu.

But as Xi Ping, following the girl’s instincts, nimbly swept and washed the courtyard, his spine was frozen.

From the first sentence he had said to Xu Rucheng, that viper-like gaze had been stuck to him, like an ulcer on the bone.

On Sanyue’s East Peak, in the lotus pond, the heartless white lotuses sticking out of the water all turned to face west like sunflowers, making their blood red stalks tangle and squirm like one greedy, starving tongue after another.

CHAPTER 125 - Eternal Flame (7)

“I saw a misty willow...”

Out of nowhere, a mouth opened on a dark red lotus root and grew lips and teeth. When the two lips touched, the voice spread through the water with a dull rumble. The seemingly stagnant pond water vibrated gently with it.

“The people of Wan call it ‘reincarnation wood.’ The people of Wan choose meaningful names.” On another root, a “mouth” also opened and picked up the conversation.

On the lotus roots of varying lengths, many mouths opened, smiling or frowning, each one speaking, holding an underwater conference.

But while they were all speaking at once, they all produced the same voice.

“I like misty willow. There’s no misty willow in the Sanyue Mountains yet.”

“Let’s keep him...keep him, hee-hee.”

“He’s too tender, only an established foundation. His bones are less than a century old. No bite.”

“Not necessarily...”

“True, he managed to crawl out of the Impassable Sea.”

The mouths on the lotus roots held an enthusiastic discussion, their flowers shaking when they laughed. They made bubbles in the water. Weird light floated on the surface of the bubbles, and there were people reflected in them. There were cultivators locked in life and death struggles, there were tremendous natural disasters, there were men and women intimately bedding down on human skeletons, and there was a crowd of people whose flesh and blood were being consumed by a divine image, yet who nonetheless remained kneeling...

Next, a Zhuoming climbed out from the bottom of the lotus pond, like a person made out of a lotus root. His nose and eyes had run off somewhere, leaving only two mouths and a set of ears—one ear faced upward, one faced downward. As if drunk, he groped blindly along the bottom of the pond, now and then clumsily getting tangled in the lotus stalks.

In the deepest recess of the lotus pond was a black hole, about one chi square. The lotus roots densely covering the bottom of the pond seemed to automatically avoid that place. In his blind groping, Zhuoming accidentally stuck his hand into the hole.

His whole body shook, and he immediately pulled back his hand. There were slight marks of scalding on his fingertips.

At the bottom of this ice cold pond was a flame the size of a bean, using it was hard to say what as kindling, just quietly burning.

“How hateful. It burns,” Zhuoming muttered, looking at his scalded fingers after picking up his eyes in an out-of-the-way corner.

The lotus roots growing on him echoed each other one after another: “Why hasn’t she gone out yet?”

“Hasn’t gone out yet...”

“Hateful...so hateful...”

Because of that cold gaze following him like his shadow, Xi Ping, after his change of identity, had no attention to spare to entertain himself at Xu Rucheng’s expense.

As a “servant” waiting to be chosen, Xi Ping had actually entered the Sanyue Mountains a day ahead of Xu Rucheng and had been safe and sound for a day and a night. That gaze seemed to have been brought by Xu Rucheng.

But Xu Rucheng himself was befuddled. Not only did he not have the least sense of being watched, he was always attempting to talk to Xi Ping about his first experience of coming to the spiritual mountains... This might have been because Xu Rucheng's cultivation was too low, or it might have been because that guy's spiritual sense was also "third-rate"; he was naturally slow-witted.

What Xi Ping couldn't work out no matter how hard he thought about it was how this person had used Xu Rucheng to get their eyes on him.

He was certain that apart from talking to him through the reincarnation wood, all Xu Rucheng had done was give him a few extra looks. With his current flowerlike countenance, it would be stranger if someone didn't give him a second look. And no one could overhear things through the reincarnation wood—unless this person was more powerful than the three Xuanyin high elders put together. In that case, there would be no need for Xi Ping to keep struggling; he ought to hurry up and say goodbye to his family and friends and pick out a good coffin.

This infiltration of the Sanyue Sect could be called Xi Ping's most dependable action in all these years. He was backed entirely by dependable people: the Golden Hand supplied him with tools and could also give him clues concerning the Unbound Furnace; a group of Luwu could contact each other at any time, and he could overhear their discussions; for anything to do with the Zhao family, he could ask Zhao Qindan any time; most importantly, before he'd come here, Bai Ling had given him brief introductions to all the major figures in Sanyue's inner sect... What other time had Xi Ping not been working blind, relying on guesswork, trickery, and good luck to get important information?

But somehow, this time, he had the worst feeling about it.

Xi Ping spent three days earnestly engaged in needlework in the imperial grandson's outbuilding—thanks to Master Lin's Replica, which could simply take over his hands. These three days were absolutely calm. The Zhao family and Prince Qing Manor probably hadn't come to an agreement in their negotiations yet. The imperial grandson's people hadn't come looking for trouble again.

The Sanyue Mountains were covered in so many hidden realms it was as if they were free. Never mind a "mortal servant," even an inner sect disciple couldn't walk around freely. First, unless you were proficient in talismans, arrays, and inscriptions, even if you were a reincarnated map, you still wouldn't be able to find your way around; second, as soon as you moved, you would be like a stone falling into water, raising "ripples" in the spiritual energy, the disturbance spreading outward, touching an unknown number of visible or concealed inscriptions and arrays. It seemed impossible not to leave traces.

Unless he could shuttle through reincarnation wood like in Tao County... but there were no reincarnation wood trees in the Sanyue Mountains. And it seemed that reincarnation wood wasn't safe, either.

Xi Ping found that each time Xu Rucheng contacted him through the reincarnation wood, the chill on his back became more apparent, as if the person watching him was getting excited. When they spoke normally, this didn't happen.

At first Xi Ping suspected someone had tampered with Xu Rucheng's consciousness and ran the risk of stealthily taking his consciousness back to the Law Breaker Bracelet. The music only showed that Xu Rucheng's mental state had changed considerably of late; there was no extraneous interference.

Since there wasn't a problem at either end, then the problem could only be with the reincarnation wood. The person watching him really was more powerful than Xuanyin's three high elders put together.

But for several days, this person only watched, doing nothing.

What did that say?

Xi Ping's mind began to work involuntarily—before coming here, he had heard from Bai Ling that Sanyue had serious internal strife. This seemed to be the truth.

The richness of Sanyue's spiritual energy was such that, never mind the country Kaiming Cultivator Xu Rucheng, even Xi Ping, who had spent time at Flying Jade Peak, had been a little dizzy from it when he'd first arrived. This must be due to topography. Great Wan's terrain was more level than Western Chu's, so the immortal mountains' spiritual energy dispersed unimpeded through the veins of the earth into the mortal world, unlike Western Chu, which was filled with towering mountains, making it hard for people within the same country to interact.

These frightening resources were completely dominated by the Xiang family. It was impossible for those masters whose surname wasn't Xiang not to have some ideas.

When Qiu Sha had killed Xiang Zhao, the West Peak's ascended spirit masters had turned out nearly in full force, but the Central Peak had been as silent as though they were all dead there.

The upshot was that the West Peak had taken heavy losses, and the lost masters seemed to have “None of the Xiang clan’s unworthy descendants have talent or virtue worthy of their positions” stamped on their heads; it was shameful and frightening, making the West Peak even more wary of those from the Central Peak who came from other families.

The after-effects left behind by Qiu Sha in the mortal world had been forcibly leveled with a hundred thousand white spirits, but those in the immortal mountains had yet to disperse. The animosity between the Central and West Peaks had deepened.

Right now, on the Central Peak, the sect leader was in seclusion, and three of the four great ascended spirits belonged to other families; the West Peak was a gathering place for the Xiang family’s good-for-nothings; and the true power in Sanyue was held by the East Peak’s Xuanwu...

Xi Ping had asked Bai Ling why, when everyone else was surnamed Xiang, Xuanwu was surnamed Xuan. Bai Ling, as if he couldn’t understand a joke, had seriously told him that this “Xuan” character wasn’t one of Western Chu’s surnames. “Xuanwu” was an alias; his real name was unknown. According to the gossip of the demons back in the Impassable Sea, he was actually the sect leader’s brother, with the same mother but different fathers.

Snow-white Elder Xuanwu's background was actually lush green⁸²—Xi Ping thought there was a metaphor here for the change of seasons; it was very profound.

What he didn't know was this very profound Elder Xuanwu's position—when the Bell of Tribulation had gone to the East Sea, the three Xuanyin elders who had overseen it had each spent years recuperating, but Sanyue's Elder Xuanwu had released the Silver Moon alone yet had had to return to the hard work of wielding power; he didn't even have a stand-in. It was evident that the delicacy of the state of affairs in Sanyue had reached the verge of crisis; the old fellow didn't dare to loosen his grip.

So who was the person watching him scheme on the West Peak but not saying a word?

Young Master Xi came up with a daring plan.

Zhuoming lay face down on the surface of the water like a water ghou. The surface of the water reflected the outbuilding at the foot of the West Peak. It was the still of night now. That Misty Willow's turn to clean the courtyard had come. Unblinking, Zhuoming watched that Misty Willow perfunctorily wave a broom a few times, then start wildly scribbling on the ground.

“Oh?” Zhuoming excitedly stuck out his head. “Who is he sending a message to?”

A lotus next to him also drew near. A mouth opened on its petal. “He’s being so thorough about pretending to be mortal, using such a mundane method to send messages... What bad luck, I’ve forgotten most of my Wan grammar.”

“No.” Zhuoming gently pinched the lotus petal. “He’s using Chu writing.”

The broom wrote in flourishing cursive on the ground: Spying on a young woman, shameless! You’ll get styes in your eyes.

Zhuoming’s head stopped mid-turn. He opened his eyes wide in amazement.

That Misty Willow brandished the broom like a sword: Enough sneaking around, come out and see me if you can.

After Xi Ping finished writing this all at once, he calmly took a deep breath and set the broom aside. The feeling of prickles running down his back was still there. But after waiting a long moment, there was no other activity.

Xi Ping put away the broom. He couldn't work out what the person watching him was thinking. He thought to himself: If there's really nothing else for it, I'll have to abandon the maid identity, then sneak in again during the "grand wedding" with the Zhaos or Prince Qing Manor's people... It seemed that as long as he didn't use reincarnation wood to send messages, it wouldn't be so easy for this person to see through the Replica to find him.

Only that would take more time.

Xi Ping concentrated on the shard of Zhaoting on his spirit. Its light was so dim it was hardly visible.

He couldn't panic.

He closed his eyes and stood still for a moment, plucking out a tune in his spirit to calm himself down. Zhaoting seemed to sense his anxiety. Though Zhi Xiu didn't have the energy to split off his attention to come over, he still made an effort to make the sword shard let out a slight buzz, telling him that shifu was still well.

Just as he finished the song and was planning to send his consciousness back to the reincarnation wood to rest for a while, Xi Ping felt a sudden sting at the center of his brow. He pulled one hand into his sleeve and abruptly opened his eyes to look in the direction the touch to his spiritual sense had come from.

What he saw was a decorative bowl lotus in his room. Perhaps its colors had run in the water. When it had been brought, the flower had been yellow, but now both the flower and the leaves had faded to snow-white, reminiscent of Xuanwu's hair.

Then the unfolded lotus nodded its head, and the stamen in its center, like an ill-fitting hat, fell down. When the space where the stamen had been was empty, a bean-sized...human head emerged.

Xi Ping: "..."

The "barren head" that had grown out of the flower had a mouth on its forehead and another on its chin. One ear faced up, the other down. The nose seemed to have been put on wrong; it was a little crooked. The eyes and both mouths were smiling. They said: "Beauty, can you guess whether my head is right-side up or upside-down?"

"Right-side up," Xi Ping blurted out without blinking. "If it isn't right-side up, please quietly straighten it out. I can give you a chance to pretend I don't know."

The two eyes turned in a circle.

Xi Ping openly walked over and, right in front of the monster, looked at the reflection of his spiritual image mask in the bowl lotus's water. "If you don't look directly at a countenance of this grade, you must be an idiot. I'm busy, I don't have time to pay attention to idiots—those with accompanying plants also have no need to speak."

As soon as he'd seen the human head in the lotus bowl, Xi Ping had suddenly seen the light: yes, Xuanyin's three elders certainly couldn't sense his connection to reincarnation wood, but there was one person who had previously exposed his hiding place—Qiu Sha.

There seemed to be some fellow feeling between accompanying plants, especially on the side with the stronger cultivation.

The gaze that had passed through countless inscriptions and arrays of Sanyue came from the flowers in a lotus pond.

In the depths of the Sanyue Mountains was one of the successors to an ancient demonic god that the immortal sects couldn't destroy fast enough... and with at least an ascended spirit cultivation level.

Goodness, this wasn't even "harboring evil" anymore, it was comparable to the Zhou family raising demons in the Impassable Sea.

The head in the white lotus laughed aloud. "I like you. Go to the lotus pond in the rear courtyard."

Having said this, the head disappeared. The flower in the lotus bowl shriveled rapidly. In the blink of an eye, only a bare stalk remained.

Xi Ping followed without hesitation. At the same time, he sent a message to Bai Ling through the reincarnation wood: "Bai Ling-da-ge, ask san-ge for me, has he heard of an ancient demonic god whose accompanying plant was a white lotus?"

After a momentary odd silence, Bai Ling said, "I am away on official business, not beside my lord. My lord has a new piece of reincarnation wood. You can ask him yourself."

Xi Ping was immediately distracted. His heart tightened. "Why didn't you use a paperman? Why did you have to go yourself? What happened?"

"Recently, you used a little paperman to sneak into my lord's boot and built a bird's nest inside it with straw," Bai Ling said, attacking Xi Ping's conscience in his usual calm and serious tone. "To be sure, Viscount, your ideas are marvelous and awe-inspiring. But my lord has forbidden me to use papermen for two months.”

CHAPTER 126 - Eternal Flame (8)

When Xi Ping came clamoring to him, Zhou Ying was being taken to task by Pang Jian.

“In one month, Guzhou, Yuzhou, and Hongyin have caught over a dozen foreign spies, and then there are ones who have slipped through the net...”

Called up in the middle of the night, Zhou Ying had a cloak loosely draped over his shoulders. Remaining calm under pressure, he adjusted his cuffs and said, “General Commander Pang has had plenty of dealings with desperate criminals. Have you forgotten how to perform soul-searchings?”

“Is there any need for me to search? Western Chu’s Qilin Guard, Southern Shu’s Dragon Subduing Knights, Northern Li’s Night Revenants—Your Highness Prince Zhuang, tell me, how will this end?”

Zhou Ying said, “If Mr. Pang can criticize me, he can also send messages to the headquarters of the three nations’ walkers in the mortal world.”

Pang Jian said, “Your Luwu started it!”

“That’s right.” Zhou Ying smiled. “But what proof do they have?”

Pang Jian: "..."

The circumstances of each nation's walkers in the mortal world were different. For example, Heaven's Design Pavilion had always felt ashamed of being mentioned in the same breath as those layouts in the Qilin Guard. But on one point they were all about the same—as members of the immortal mountains' outer sects, the walkers in the mortal world for the most part came from the upper class. Each one was very noble, and they all cherished themselves greatly. In order to avoid having their souls searched, there were people who were willing to voluntarily confess, and even those willing to buy their lives at a high price.

The Luwu were different. When the Luwu died abroad, they had to leave behind honor and compensation for their families. Their lives were as insubstantial as their possessions, and as insubstantial as the merits and demerits that needed to be taken out and weighed. Often they could be as ruthless as evil cultivators, self-destructing their spirits before their souls could be searched. To this day, none of the other nations had managed to get anything on Zhou Ying.

Pang Jian said angrily, "Aren't you afraid they'll also grab a bunch of common evil cultivators? The door to your Kaiming Department is open wider than the East Sea. Aren't you afraid other countries will send spies to infiltrate it?"

“The threshold for the Luwu is sufficiently high, and that’s enough. The Kaiming Cultivators do nothing but attend to some village duties. There’s nothing serious. Some people open their spiritual eyes without opening their minds. That’s not something I can teach them. Won’t it be for the better if foreign spies can give them some training?” Zhou Ying said carelessly. “Anyway, who would trust common evil cultivators? These people can’t come out into the light of day anywhere. If they really come into the Kaiming Department with spiritual image brands, there’s no saying whose people they’ll be in the end—unless they follow the example of the Kaiming and the Luwu’s system, and wouldn’t that be even more interesting?”

Frowning, Pang Jian said, “So the rumors are true? Western Chu’s Luwu really are in contact with that Yu Chang? You have a method for removing spiritual image brands?”

Zhou Ying smiled without answering.

Pang Jian hesitated a moment. “That’s just as well... In fact, there were voices in Heaven’s Design Pavilion before that thought the Luwu were dangerous and wanted you to put spiritual image brands on them.”

“I’m afraid that wouldn’t do. The ‘method for removing spiritual image brands’ would be angry with me.” At this point, Zhou Ying heard something. All of a sudden, his gaze slanted down almost imperceptibly. Then, as though nothing were the matter, he picked up his tea, hinting that Pang Jian could piss off. “When we truly reach the point where every nation is imitating the Kaiming and the Luwu’s system, perhaps you walkers in the mortal world will be able to legitimately establish foundations... That day isn’t far off, Mr. Pang. When you come to see me then, at least bring an osmanthus duck. Don’t come empty-handed again.”

Pang Jian thought, I’ll bring a hundred to stuff into your mouth. I hope you choke on them, you cryptic demon.

He had come seething with rage and left in a sulk. At the door, he suddenly paused, remembering Zhou Ying’s expression when he’d said “The ‘method for removing spiritual image brands’ would be angry with me.”

“Wait.” Pang Jian narrowed his eyes. “That’s not something the paperman can do. Who was he talking about?”

He stopped in his tracks and turned toward the Azure Dragon Heart Tower. Xi Yue happened to be on duty tonight. The general commander patrolled routinely, so Xi Yue took no notice, acting as usual, silently cupping his hand toward Pang Jian, who was inside the wall surrounded by frolicking karma beasts.

Pang Jian nodded and passed through a different wall: Xi Yue wasn't meditating, and he wasn't studying arrays. He was doing some "light reading"—a book of Chu grammar.

The hound with the most sensitive nose in all of Jinping had sniffed something out.

Just now, Zhou Ying, on one hand dealing with Pang Jian and on the other hand not in the mood to pay attention to a certain person, hadn't responded to the voice in the reincarnation wood. Luckily, Xi Ping could automatically translate san-ge's silence into an attentive silence. Whether he got a response or not, it wouldn't keep him from thinking aloud.

Indeed, before he could finish, Zhou Ying couldn't keep not answering.

"Are you talking about...the Heartless Lotus?"

Xi Ping said, "Not exactly, it had a heart—I mean that at first that bowl lotus was normal, with a stamen, but then the stamen was pushed away by a bizarre bald head. The bald head told me to go to the rear courtyard, but the lotus pond in the rear courtyard also has ordinary lotuses growing in it..."

At this point, he suddenly stopped in his tracks. “Oh, all right, they’re not ordinary anymore.”

With a peak established foundation’s eyesight, Xi Ping could see the lotus pond in the rear courtyard clearly from a hundred zhang away in the night.

The originally bright pink lotuses first faded until they were half transparent, revealing the channels like blood vessels inside of them. Then, ghastly white seeped into the flowers and leaves. The colors of the flower and leaves seemed to have been forced into the stalks and roots, mixing together into a strange rusty red.

White flowers and white leaves, without pistil or stamen, and roots like fresh blood underwater.

As soon as he heard this description, Zhou Ying stood up and quickly said, “Wait, you’re saying the Heartless Lotus is in the Sanyue Mountains?”

“I can’t say for sure,” Xi Ping said carefully. “He can turn ordinary lotuses into his own white ones, I don’t know where his real body is... Damn it, why can’t I do that?”

“There’s a limited range to the Heartless Lotus’s ability to assimilate other lotuses. Even the shed skin master had a range no greater than the size of a small city. He's not only in the Sanyue Mountains, he must be hidden among the three Principal Peaks... The Zhou family aren't the only ones who have been raising demons." Zhou Ying sighed softly. "This was strangest among the ancient demonic gods. It's said that while the ungovernable way has no Way of the Heart, the Heartless Lotus has many Ways of the Heart."

Hearing this description, Xi Ping for some reason broke out in gooseflesh. "Why would he want to collect those things?!"

"There is a rumor that the master of the heartless lotuses at first had two souls in one body. There are those who say he swallowed his own twin when he was born. Those two people conversed within a single body from childhood. When their spiritual eyes opened, it produced two consciousnesses. The two people had completely different dispositions, and their natural endowments were outstanding. Almost simultaneously, they cultivated two completely opposing Ways of the Heart."

The average person's Way of the Heart was an absolute secret. Apart from a teacher passing on a Way of the Heart to a disciple, no one could be permitted to know its precise contents, to avoid others injuring it—not everyone had the boldness of Pang Jian, who would magnanimously allow people to question his Way of the Heart...and, after all, Pang Jian had yet to establish a foundation. Even if his Way of the Heart was injured, the degree of danger would be limited.

But sharing a single spirit was problematic. No one could hide from “themselves.” With two Ways of the Heart rubbing together and colliding day in and day out, a clash that left only one survivor would be getting off easy. It was possible for it to end with both sides suffering.

As Xi Ping cautiously observed the lotus pond from a distance, he asked, “Did they find a way to peacefully coexist?”

“No,” Zhou Ying said, “both of them knew that this spirit could contain one Way of the Heart at most. Not long after establishing a foundation, each got the idea of getting rid of the other at the same time. The outcome was that both of them were seriously injured, but neither died—a third consciousness appeared in their spirit.”

Xi Ping was appalled. “Wait, san-ge, you’re giving me the wrong idea here. Are you sure the two of them wanted to get rid of each other, and not...well, you know? It just sounds weird. A fierce struggle, and then a little one appears?”

Zhou Ying was used to this. He could automatically translate absurd statements into proper speech. No matter what flavor of bullshit Xi Shiyong was spouting, he would be unaffected. “The trouble was, the third consciousness didn’t just appear out of nowhere. It was the consciousness of a dead person. Things were different back then. There were very few worthless wretches like Zhao Yin. Practically all masters found their own Ways of the Heart. Many cultivators also knew that if they fought, they would shake the earth and harm the innocent, so the ‘debate method’ was a frequent method of battle—one of the current four great taboos of the cultivation sects. It involves taking your Way of the Heart and touching it to another person’s. Though it involves no clash of weapons, it’s still a matter of life and death. This third consciousness was an enemy who had lost in a debate to the Heartless Lotus and died at their hands.”

Xi Ping: “...”

He didn’t particularly understand this, but he was very shaken—in other words, there were three people living on one spirit, and each pair hated each other!

“The Heartless Lotus’s spirit was very busy. There was constant fighting. At each fierce clash, there was a chance that a new consciousness would emerge, and practically every new consciousness was an enemy—a person couldn’t fight by the debate method with friends and relatives, so the Ways of the Heart they thoroughly understood would usually belong to people who had died by their hands. This actually formed a delicate equilibrium:

during the struggles, the weaker Ways of the Heart would be annihilated. They...they had plenty left if one shattered, anyway. On the other hand, some consciousnesses were unusually sturdy. To prevent those from crowding out all the others, the consciousnesses with mutual enmity between them would form temporary alliances and act together. This way, the cultivation levels of the Ways of the Heart that could coexist in the long term basically all advanced side by side. After constant revisions and updates, they passed through the ascended spirit stage and finally crossed the shed skin boundary, giving birth to a special type of accompanying plant—the heartless lotus.”

No wonder he could assimilate other varieties of lotus.

Xi Ping suddenly thought that this accompanying plant seemed to be a kind of metaphor.

“In other words, the person I’m about to meet, even though he’ll have the same bald head, may in fact become ‘a different person’ at any time?”

“No.” Zhou Ying was for once silent for a moment. “The ancient masters whose Ways of the Heart couldn’t merge with heaven and earth all died out when the spiritual mountains formed. The person you met must have inherited the Heartless Lotus’s Way of the Heart. He doesn’t necessarily have so many consciousnesses.”

Xi Ping said, “If he only has one consciousness, which one would he have inherited?”

“I don’t know, but to be able to inherit the Heartless Lotus’s Way of the Heart...” Suddenly, Zhou Ying softly said, “If possible, I’d like to meet him, too.”

Xi Ping was stunned. Those who were “interesting” in Zhou Ying’s eyes were usually extremely dangerous people; normally, at times like these, he would remember that he was an older brother and, like when he was younger and playing with fire or poisons, would temporarily suppress his own interest and shoo Xi Ping away.

He thought this was san-ge’s first time saying he wanted to see someone.

“If my guess is correct, this person may have a paramount spiritual sense,” Zhou Ying said slowly. “There is little recorded history concerning paramount spiritual senses. After all, the vast majority of people like that go mad and die before they’re old enough to cultivate. When one occasionally manages it, it’s still very hard to use language to describe... My guess is that this ancient demonic god had a paramount spiritual sense. Of the ancient inscriptions circulating in the world today, nearly forty percent were inherited from the Heartless Lotus.”

Inscriptions were connected to the universe and all living things, not something that could be created afresh. When today's inscription experts made innovative inscriptions, they all used ancient inscriptions as a base and made a few slight alterations.

So where had the ancient inscriptions come from?

It was likely that it was those people with paramount spiritual senses, who could see the world's other face, "translating" all that they saw and sensed.

A possessor of a paramount spiritual sense...trapped in the Sanyue Mountains, in a place where the light of day did not shine.

This description was so familiar it made you tremble.

"No," Xi Ping said seriously. "If you used a paperman to come over, your consciousness would be injured if the paperman was damaged. That baldy has stronger cultivation than mine, most likely ascended spirit, and I don't know whether he's friend or foe. If he suddenly attacked, I wouldn't be able to protect you."

"Don't use your 'Tai Sui' voice on me," Zhou Ying scoffed. "I understand my limits. You look after yourself."

Now that Xi Ping had some idea of the situation, his figure flashed, and he landed beside the lotus pond that had already become entirely “heartless.”

As soon as he approached, it was as if the pond began to boil, sending up countless bubbles. There was a different person in each bubble. The surrounding spiritual energy suddenly stagnated. This person had created a small space like a mustard seed around the lotus pond.

Xi Ping felt that he seemed to have caught a glimpse of Qiu Sha in a bubble. Before he could look closely, the bubble burst.

A lotus flower swam to shore like a snake and slowly raised its head, revealing the bald head with the disarranged features. “I just saw your leaves moving. Who were you talking to for so long? Were you saying bad things about me?”

“Not yet, honored sir. I’ll have time to curse you behind your back once I know whether you’re friend or foe,” Xi Ping said calmly. “Just now I was appealing to higher authority to ask about your history.”

Two mouths opened on Zhuoming’s face. One was chuckling, which didn’t keep the other one from talking—watching it, Xi Ping felt a little envious in spite of himself.

“You’re interesting. I like you. I’m called Zhuoming. I’m High Elder Xuanwu’s direct disciple. What do you want to know? I’ll tell you.”

“Well, I always said that opera singer was no good.” Xi Ping sighed and stared into those eyes that looked the same turned either way.

Zhuoming was laughing. His pupils reflected Xi Ping’s spiritual image mask.

For a moment, Xi Ping saw something familiar in those eyes—san-ge had often been like this when he was younger, his eyes sometimes focused on a strange place, making it seem as if his gaze was wandering... Later his subtlety had grown, and he had learned to pretend.

Xi Ping suddenly asked, “Do you have a paramount spiritual sense?”

Zhuoming’s laughter came to a sudden halt. His slightly wandering gaze suddenly became sharp, as if it was about to turn into a knife and pierce the spirit of the person in front of him. “You’re in contact with Zhou Ying.”

This freak had heard of his san-ge?

“I know him...I know him...” Zhuoming became excited, his eyes spinning uncontrollably. “The last sacrifice of Great Wan’s Zhou family... Like me...”

He's like me..."

For some reason, Xi Ping felt that his thoughts on hearing this were hard to express. "Um...maybe not that much like you."

There was a splash in the water. The lotus nearly flew up, stretching out to the height of a person and suddenly coming up in front of Xi Ping. The frightening eyes were firmly fixed on him. "What is Zhou Ying like? Does he have hair?"

Xi Ping said, "...quite a lot of it."

Before he could finish, the lotus began to yell almost frantically. "He doesn't pluck out his hair? He doesn't pluck it out?"

Good heavens! Had this baldy plucked out his own hair one strand at a time?

Fortunately, this mustard seed contained sound, or else that shout might have woken the whole outbuilding...or the whole of the imperial grandson's manor.

Xi Ping leaned back. "He wouldn't do that!"

Before Xi Ping finished speaking, a hand reached out from somewhere in the lotus and grabbed Xi Ping by the collar—Xi Ping found that not only did he have no hair on his head, he also didn't have a single nail on his hand!

“What does he eat? Does he eat mud? Does he cut off his own flesh and eat it?”

Xi Ping grabbed the talisman he'd drawn beforehand. He used it to send the lotus's hand flying. “Behave yourself! Great Wan's imperial family isn't so poor that they need to sink to that level!”

The lotus stared at him in disbelief, as if he wanted to find evidence that Xi Ping was lying on his face. “Does he actually spend every day fighting over power with those people? How can he be so ordinary?”

Xi Ping: “...”

There was a word he hadn't heard clearly. After all, he was a foreigner...
What had that bald flower said his san-ge was?

“How can that be...how can that be...?” As soon as the flower became distraught, several mouths opened on it.

“How can he be so ordinary?”

“Is he insane...?”

“He’s abnormal, he must be insane!”

For a time, Xi Ping had nothing to say.

Through the reincarnation wood, Zhou Ying asked, “What is the Heartless Lotus saying?”

Xi Ping said, “He says since you’re not bald, don’t mutilate yourself, and don’t eat dirt, you must be insane.”

Zhou Ying: “...”

Just then, the veins stood up on the lotus’s hands. A damp-scented wind came toward Xi Ping.

Zhuoming was screaming as though having a breakdown, his voice making Xi Ping want to throw up.

He felt all the spiritual energy in his body stop. A breath caught in his chest. The next moment, those ghastly pale arms, as slender as a young girl’s, dragged him into the lotus pond, and he had absolutely no room to resist.

Xi Ping held his breath. As he'd thought, this baldy was an ascended spirit!

He spread his hand. A few qin strings appeared between his fingers. In a snap, Xi Ping sent out a beam of sword energy that hit the lotus, but it only left a white mark on its dark red stalk.

This was the difference between a near-ascended spirit and a true, undiluted ascended spirit!

CHAPTER 127 - Eternal Flame (9)

Xi Ping remembered one time a group of kids had been flying a kite beside the Lingyang River. Before the kite could rise, a blind dog had come out of nowhere and blundered into the kite string. The naughty children went after it, chasing and shouting. The dog became even more panicked and got tangled up in the kite string. It lost its footing and fell into the Lingyang River. The water birds all flew up, and the dog still couldn't get loose, turning the little swallow kite into a white streak on the waves with its thrashing.

Xi Ping felt that right now, he was like that weak and helpless kite.

The bottom of the little lotus pond in the backyard that was only a few chi deep seemed to have been connected to the East Sea. He couldn't find solid ground to step on.

Xi Ping's features were lashed by flying spray. He seemed about to reach the earth's core. The countless images in the water, like mirages, faintly brushed past him, disappearing before he could catch a clear sight of them. Wave after wave of that lunatic's shouts crashed into his spirit. All his meridians seemed to have been stretched taut, tightly binding his flesh and bones. At the limit of his endurance, Xi Ping let out a mouthful of air in the water. He was about to explode.

“Shiyong.” Through the water dragon pearl, Zhou Ying sensed at once that something wasn’t right with him. “The water dragon pearl recognizes you as its master. Use your essence to smash it and take the opportunity to escape. If you’re exposed, so be it. We’ll think of another way. Don’t tangle with him.”

Xi Ping could already taste blood in his mouth. He thought, Won’t Xu Rucheng be trapped here, then?

“Wait, just wait...” With difficulty, Xi Ping split off his attention to send a message. “I think he’s testing me. He watched me in secret for so long and ran the risk of getting in contact with me among Sanyue’s Principal Peaks. He wouldn’t have done all that just to get rid of a spy—I don’t believe Sanyue is so extravagant that they would have an ascended spirit patrolling the mountains.”

“Don’t make any vain attempts to collaborate with the Heartless Lotus. He may harbor malice toward Sanyue, but he certainly won’t want to win a joint victory for the both of you. This kind of person would slice himself to bits for the sake of a little peace, if only he had a knife in his hand. Don’t play with fire... I do not permit it!”

“Peace”?

Xi Ping paused, seizing on this peculiar wording of Zhou Ying's.

A rare person of his own kind, in peculiarly similar circumstances—Xi Ping suddenly thought that, while san-ge wasn't bald and didn't mutilate himself, while he could be rated as the most "Wan" man in all of Jinping, from a certain point of view, he still understood this lotus spirit.

Xi Ping thrust out the Tai Sui Qin. The notes he was using as a sword changed, the sharp and monotonous sword aura instantly sliding into a melody, blending seamlessly. The melody was improvised, high and rapid, ingeniously backing up the hollering Zhuoming, the tempo so closely matching it was as if he was playing accompaniment for him.

The music pursued Zhuoming's incessant shrieks. They couldn't escape no matter how they changed in pitch. The atmosphere turned peculiar. It didn't sound like Zhuoming was going mad, but rather like a singer from a niche operatic style was training his voice in this remote location, with some of the beauty of the bizarre—nine out of every ten sentences Mr. Yu Gan spoke were blowing hot air, but occasionally there was still a glimmer of honesty; he really could turn a braying donkey into a famous singer!

Zhuoming had likely never before attained this height of artistry. Halfway through shouting, he couldn't go on. He turned his head and glared at Xi

Ping with a look that said “Are you crazy?”

Xi Ping regretfully pressed down the strings and opened his mouth to let out an air bubble, forcing away the water covering his nose and mouth. “Why have you stopped? You have a pretty resonant voice. Sing some more.”

Zhuoming: “...”

His figure gradually lengthened, the upper half of his body at least growing to the stature of a normal man. His disorderly features also gradually returned to their original positions, the two mouths combining into one, revealing a rather tidy and indifferent face.

“Misty Willow...”

Xi Ping raised a hand to interrupt him. “Stop that, my name isn’t ‘Misty Willow.’”

This name always made him think of the opera actor in the Snake King’s Immortal Palace.

“You may address me as ‘Tai Sui.’”

The sturdiness of Xi Ping's consciousness far exceeded that of the average ascended spirit. When he concentrated especially hard, he could practically escape the influence of the Replica...but the shortcoming to this was that he'd forgotten he was still wearing the spiritual image mask of a pretty maid, making this display incongruous and a little funny.

But Zhuoming didn't laugh. After listening gravely, he nodded earnestly. "That's a good name. My name was chosen for me by Xuanwu. It's bad. I should also change my name."

Mr. Yu Gan, the specialist in elopements, casually plucked his qin. Hearing these words, he gave a zealous suggestion: "You can call yourself Lovesickness."

Zhuoming stretched out his neck in confusion, drawing close to Xi Ping. "Why would I call myself Lovesickness?"

Xi Ping plucked a qin string with a twang. "For example, say you wanted to kill High Elder Xuanwu. At most, others would say that an unfilial disciple had gone berserk and killed his own teacher. Is there anything interesting about that story? It'd put me to sleep, anyway. But if you call yourself Lovesickness, when people tell the story, it'll turn into 'Elder Xuanwu died through the machinations of lovesickness,' and I guarantee that your name and his will live on in the annals of history for ten thousand years. Even when the spiritual mountains are gone, the two of you won't be forgotten.”

The more Zhuoming heard, the brighter his eyes became, his head drawing closer to Xi Ping bit by bit, nearly pressing against him. “Who told you I wanted to kill Xuanwu?”

Xi Ping returned his gaze unflinchingly. “It was just an example. It wasn't real. If it mirrors reality, that's pure coincidence.”

A sharp laugh came from Zhuoming's throat. His neck contracted back to a normal length. He waved his sleeve, and the water around them became clear.

Xi Ping looked in the direction of his gaze and saw that after the muddy waters calmed, the top of his head was less than a chi away from the surface of the water. With a cultivator's vision, he could see the surroundings distinctly.

They were in the midst of an enormous pool. Beside it was a competition platform extended with a mustard seed. On the mountain slopes, countless palaces and magnificent buildings were inlaid like jewels in the ground, with a lofty celestial palace atop white clouds, permeated with an immortal aura, faintly discernible. It was much more presentable than the disorderly and extravagant West Peak.

Xi Ping immediately had a guess. He couldn't resist floating up a little, wanting to see more clearly. "Is this the Central Peak?"

"I advise you not to move around." Zhuoming had stopped shouting. His voice was actually somewhat deep amid the clarity. "The Central Peak is an important place. Not even a fly could get in."

Xi Ping attached all his spiritual sense to his eyes and only then discovered that the inscriptions and arrays here were omnipresent. The spiritual threads of arrays even floated through the air—only when the wind raised slight waves was it possible to see a hint of them in reflections in the water.

"Aren't they afraid of breathing arrays into their lungs?"

"It won't happen. Every person on the Central Peak is on the roll of names. Once the immortal mountains have recorded these people, the arrays will automatically avoid them—though the East, Central, and West Peaks don't have dealings with each other. If you stuck your head out, you'd breathe the arrays into your lungs and blow up like a gas bladder," Zhuoming said indifferently. "Only I can come and go freely among the three Principal Peaks, be an ear pressed to the wall on behalf of my shizun who's about to die of 'lovesickness.'”

As expected.

Xi Ping thought: He acknowledges what I said about him wanting to kill Xuanwu.

Just then, Zhuoming said, “I know you're here for the Unbound Furnace.”

Xi Ping's heart jumped. Then he saw Zhuoming tilt his head back to look at the palace atop the clouds. “Two hundred years ago, Southern He was destroyed, and Sanyue obtained Hui Xiangjun's vital weapon, the Unbound Furnace. Since it was brought back, no one has seen it. The sect leader himself has kept it in his care. Then the sect leader went into seclusion... It's been nearly two hundred years now.”

Xi Ping suspected this baldy had a concussion from being hit on the head by spray. “Isn't there some ambiguity in what you've just said? Why does it sound like your honored sect's sect leader is using Hui Xiangjun's relic in his seclusion? A peak shed skin using the weapon of an ascended spirit to reach a full moon position?”

How was that any different from an imperial exam candidate using a basic thousand-character primer as study material before the examination?

Zhuoming nodded calmly. “Your Chu is good.”

“Is your honored sect’s sect leader about to lose his mind?” Xi Ping couldn’t resist asking. “Isn’t there anyone to dissuade him from doing something so preposterous?”

“This matter is between heaven and earth, and Xuanwu and me. And now there’s you, too,” Zhuoming said. “Since you’ve seen the Law Breaker and the Riverward, you ought to know that the Eternal Spring Brocade cannot be limited by the grades set out by the spiritual mountains. She is an unbound person, outside the rules.”

Xi Ping caught up half a beat late: “eternal spring brocade” was Hui Xiangjun’s accompanying plant, which this baldy who liked giving people nicknames was using to indicate Hui Xiangjun.

“But you’ve got one thing right—it’s true that the sect leader may be about to lose it. He’s gone the wrong way.” Zhuoming’s voice softened strangely. “With my cultivation level, I can’t understand where he’s gone wrong, but my spiritual sense can clearly see the spiritual energy about to overflow in the immortal palace above the clouds. A great master is about to fall. If not for that, Xuanwu wouldn't have insisted on holding out under the impact of the Silver Moon instead of going into seclusion...and now, you've shown up. Isn't that a coincidence?"

Xi Ping gave a start.

When he had mistakenly wound up in the Impassable Sea and encountered Yuan Hui's hidden bones, he'd had a faint sense of some mystical force arranging things.

And Qiu Sha had said that once a cultivator who hadn't been acknowledged by the spiritual mountains wished to step over the ascended spirit boundary, the Way of Heaven would certainly not allow it and would soon send down disasters one after another to wipe away the ant who dared to disobey the will of heaven.

Many things appeared to be mere coincidence, but considered closely, it seemed they were all being pushed by an invisible hand.

Hui Xiangjun had died eight centuries ago, and the Unbound Furnace had passed from Lancang to Sanyue without anyone wanting to use it—the way of toolmaking was unskilled in fighting and never went looking for trouble; besides that, not just anyone could use the vital tool of an unusual talent like Hui Xiangjun.

Could it be that him coming to Sanyue to steal the Unbound Furnace...had also been arranged by something?

“Heaven and earth are locked in constant struggle,” Zhuoming said, voice pregnant with meaning. “The ancient demonic gods fell and left their accompanying plants behind to search for successors, in defiance of the Way of Heaven. You inherited the ungovernable way, so you are a member of my generation. Never in your life will you be able to assimilate into the spiritual mountains’ orthodoxy. You will either hide inside the wood dragging out an ignoble existence, waiting for the Way of Heaven to find you and wipe you out, or else you will take all of Heaven’s gods and sages as your enemies, destroy the three thousand paths of the Way of Heaven, change the laws of the universe—there is no third road.”

Hearing this, Xi Ping for no reason at all felt very unwell. He thought, So what if there isn’t, I’m not going anywhere.

“It seems that I’m only a little piece in this game,” Xi Ping said unflappably. “A mere established foundation who may or may not be able to do anything while shed skins are dying and seizing power. With no one to take me, I couldn’t even leave the little courtyard on the West Peak. I’m truly unworthy of being counted in the same generation as Brother Lovesickness.”

When Zhuoming settled down, he was very proper, without any sign of his previous lunacy. “It’s a long story.”

“No problem,” said Xi Ping, “I can stay in the water for a year and a half without dying.”

“During the Great War of Gods and Demons, Sanyue’s full moon sage the Black Emperor had a lifelong enemy. That ancient demonic god had dozens of names that no one but him remembered, so he was known by the same name as his accompanying plant—the Heartless Lotus. This person was deranged, like a goblet full of poison, constantly grappling with himself, but when he encountered a powerful foe, a part of him could escape each time. No matter what, he wouldn’t die altogether.

“He lingered on, getting weaker and weaker, until the spiritual mountains were established and Western Chu’s Black Emperor reached the full moon position. The other demonic gods on earth had all been blown away—he became the one and only ancient demonic god to live to see the spiritual mountains. At last, he was surrounded by the Black Emperor and some masters under his command. With the might of a full moon sage bearing down on him, the Heartless Lotus had nowhere to hide. He was cut down and fell at the feet of the Sanyue Mountains. To prevent any ‘lotus seeds’ from slipping the net once again, the Black Emperor sealed the Heartless Lotus’s lotus pods inside the Silver Moon.

“For thousands of years after that, the Black Emperor’s descendants—Dongheng’s Xiang family—controlled Sanyue, but they became more and more disappointing by the generation. The sect leader reached the pinnacle of the shed skin stage, always doing whatever he could to make a breakthrough. He was too busy to manage trifling affairs, but there was no one he could use for the purpose, so he had to settle for second best and use Xuanwu, who was ‘half a Xiang family member.’ But he couldn’t trust Xuanwu, so he placed the Silver Moon above the East Peak. On the surface, he was putting Sanyue’s authority into Xuanwu’s hands, but in reality it was another way to monitor him. If the high elder put one toe out of line, the mountains’ great weapon wouldn’t spare him.

“For hundreds of years, the high elder assiduously guarded the Xiang family’s mountains on the sect leader’s behalf, until by coincidence, he obtained a possessor of a paramount spiritual sense with an embarrassing background and brought him back to the spiritual mountains as his disciple. He tended to him with all his heart and soul, nursed him for a hundred years, letting this paralytic open his spiritual eyes and complete his spiritual bones, until he could walk, sit, and lie down no different from an ordinary person and was only awaiting his shizun’s test before he could inherit his Way of the Heart. Then he received a great present from his shizun... Using his own shed skin cultivation, the high elder stood guard as he sent his disciple into the Silver Moon to obtain the Way of the Heart of the ancient demonic god, the Heartless Lotus. But his own hair turned white overnight. He only recently left seclusion after nursing his injuries for a century. This teacher's favor can be called as weighty as Sanyue's three Principal Peaks, as deep as the South Sea."

At first, listening to these ancient secrets, Xi Ping had been relating them to Zhou Ying through the reincarnation wood. But in the end, he was dumbfounded, with no attention left to spare to repeat Zhuoming's words.

"So the lotus seeds inside the Silver Moon grew mold...er...sprouted?" Xi Ping remembered Qiu Sha, turned to dust by the moonlight in Tao County, and in spite of himself felt deep veneration for Zhuoming for appearing reasonably intact before him. "How did you survive that?"

"All thanks to my shed skin shizun," Zhuoming said softly. "Shizun used half of his essence to sustain me. If he ever takes it back, I'll be snuffed out by the Silver Moon. But at the same time, I have become the new Heartless Lotus, with my life tied to the Silver Moon. Among the Sanyue Mountains, I am like half of the great divine tool. Through me, he controls the Silver Moon, which the sect leader hung around his neck like a noose. The Silver Moon, me, and shizun—none of us can leave the others. Isn't that a superb story?"

"Amazing!" Xi Ping praised.

“I don’t believe that the sect leader wouldn’t have made preparations for the aftermath of his death. When the time comes, the two of them will have a test of strength,” Zhuoming said. “Rumor has it that the Unbound Furnace can hold a shed skin’s essence. The unbound object that produced the Law Breaker and the Riverward can block a great divine tool. I can help you take the Unbound Furnace, but I want to have first use of it. I want to escape the Silver Moon.”

Xi Ping considered and said, “The Unbound Furnace is actually under your honored sect leader’s ass. We wouldn’t have thought of that in a million years, or else we wouldn’t have wasted time coming—apart from agreeing, I see no other choice.”

“You can also abandon the Unbound Furnace and get away now,” Zhuoming said, smiling. “I suppose you’re still capable of that.”

CHAPTER 128 - Eternal Flame (10)

“What?!”

From Lin Chi to Bai Ling—right down to Xu Rucheng and the rest of the Luwu—practically everyone taking part in this affair was shocked upon hearing that the Unbound Furnace was in the hands of Sanyue’s sect leader.

Lin Chi’s first reaction was very honest: “Sanyue’s sect leader doesn’t cultivate the way of toolmaking.”

Xu Rucheng temporarily forgot that he was a cultivator: “Is it because it’s too cold being in seclusion on top of a mountain, and he wanted to bring the furnace with him to make fire?”

Bai Ling asked a penetrating question: “Viscount, why is it that whenever you’re involved in something, no matter how unremarkable it seems at first, in the end it always ferments into something world-shattering?”

Xi Ping: “...”

When Hui Xiangjun died, her cultivation wouldn’t have exceeded the middle ascended spirit stage. Ordinarily speaking, even members of outer sects like Zhao Yu, who sought Ways of the Heart in relics of predecessors, would think that middle ascended spirit stage cultivation was a little low—especially when one couldn't consult the person they inherited from. Sanyue had taken the Unbound Furnace over two centuries ago, and no one had heard of anyone using it to create anything. Everyone had assumed the Unbound Furnace was gathering dust in some storehouse in Sanyue.

“Stealing a dusty antique from the Sanyue Mountains” and “blowing up the peak shed skin sect leader’s immortal palace” were two completely different things!

“Tell the Luwu to preserve their disguises and take no action—you withdraw,” Zhou Ying said decisively after listening in on the proceedings. “If what the Heartless Lotus says is true and Sanyue’s sect leader and Xuanwu are about to have a battle, that isn’t something for an outer sect to handle. I will send a Heavenly Question to Duanrui at once and have Xuanyin Mountain do as they see fit.”

Xi Ping didn't answer.

Gritting his teeth, Zhou Ying said, “Xi Shiyong, you won't rest until you've angered me to death, is that it?”

“Hey, hey, I'll withdraw, I'll withdraw,” Xi Ping casually fobbed him off, then changed the subject. “San-ge, I have a question. How did Hui Xiangjun actually die?”

This was something he couldn't understand no matter how he thought about it. At first, Xi Ping had thought of Hui Xiangjun as a commoner female version of Lin Chi, gentle and easily bullied, persecuted wherever she went. But each time he encountered one of her relics, every time he got near to rumors about her, another layer of mysterious fog appeared over this toolmaking master. Now it seemed that even Lin Chi hadn't altogether understood her.

Also, why had Zhuoming said she was an “unbound person”?

“At first I thought the reason she couldn't escape was because of the clash between the Law Breaker and the Riverward, but that Zhuoming said that with the Unbound Furnace, you would have no fear of the Silver Moon. If that baldy isn't just messing with me, then what did Hui Xiangjun have to be afraid of back then? As I see it, isn't she the one ‘closest to the full moon positions’? Her works are so magical, and her vital weapon is so magical. How powerful must she herself have been?”

“Hui Xiangjun practiced the way of toolmaking. People belonging to the medicine making and toolmaking ways, unless their tempers are peculiar, don't have much opportunity to engage in battle with others. Hui Xiangjun may very well never have fought with anyone...at any rate, neither the records nor the rumors mention that she did. Until she left for Southern He, no one even knew she had an accompanying plant—otherwise, my guess is that Sanyue’s sect leader wouldn’t have allowed the Unbound Furnace to remain in Lancang for so long.” Zhou Ying paused, then continued, “Rumor has it that when the five great sects hunted her down, Hui Xiangjun didn’t resist at all. She used the Riverward to send away Qiu Sha, who was her personal maid at the time. The whereabouts of the Law Breaker were unknown. And the Unbound Furnace was beside her.”

Xi Ping said, “Beside her?”

“Yes, Lancang Mountain specifically recorded it. She hadn’t put away the Unbound Furnace, so those hunting her thought she was brandishing her vital weapon in order to resist. But for some reason, she didn’t use it.” As he spoke, Zhou Ying personally wrote a Heavenly Question and waved a hand to send it to the Xuanyin Mountains. “In my view, she was waiting to be captured.”

Xi Ping frowned—the Riverward had been able to take Qiu Sha away then and let her hide for eight centuries, then reappear in the world as an ascended spirit. So why hadn’t Hui Xiangjun gone with her?

Even if there was some inside story that hadn’t been passed down to later generations, if she had wanted to sacrifice herself, she could very well have killed herself. Once the spirit was blown up, the consciousness would be destroyed. It was so fast you wouldn't feel the pain, much more convenient than a mortal slitting their throat or hanging themselves. Why would she have waited to be interrogated and sentenced—didn't it hurt to have her spiritual bones removed?

It was as if...she could no longer feel pain, and the body she had left for the spiritual mountains was only an old robe she hadn't bothered to put away.

Xi Ping returned to the maid's room and meditated, as usual withdrawing his consciousness to Tao County, patrolling through the reincarnation wood trees that hadn't been dug up.

The garrisoned troops had already obtained the relief provisions. The poorest of the old and sickly now had some prospects. With spiritual energy to nourish all things, the towns with farmland had plowed the earth and seen hope, and had begun to discuss planting something together. The bleak business of the minor merchants had improved out of nowhere, because the cultivators had discovered one benefit of Tao County: this damn place treated everyone the same.

Whether an ascended spirit or a shed skin, once they entered, they would have to ride a horse or equip a carriage. Immortal tools, whether orthodox or evil, couldn't be used. No one had better think of taking advantage of their higher cultivation to bully others. As long as you bribed the garrisoned troops, business would be even safer than it had been at Wild Fox Country's Great Market.

Zhou Ying had seen through these cultivators' ideas from the start. Before they had caught up, he had straightened out all the restaurants and inns within Tao County. He had bought into each one and left someone permanently stationed there, eyes and ears placed to wait to receive the guests coming from all over. At the same time, he had reopened the ferry crossings on the Xia River after reorganizing them. He had used the steamships that had belonged to the waterborne troops to hire a bunch of cultivators to oversee the transport of medicinal herbs and materials from the spiritual beasts of Southern Shu's Three Islands, publicly selling common materials used for downgraded immortal tools. As expected, Western Chu's court believed that the garrisoned troops were in their own hands and paid little attention to them, only secretly sending a note to the garrisoned troops to take three Qilin Guardsmen into the fleet. And so the first Common Cultivator Water Transport Escort Group, made up of nine Luwu and three Qilin Guardsmen, was formed. When Xi Ping passed by the docks, he saw the dock workers unloading cargo in the middle of the night. On the ship, two Luwu were playing cards with the Qilin Guardsmen, one pretending to be foolish about money, one helping the Qilin Guardsmen cheat, mutually sighing about how difficult it was for a common cultivator to make a living.

Zhao Qindan wasn't resting yet—fortunately, while she couldn't use spiritual energy, a half-immortal who had opened her spiritual eyes still didn't need much sleep. It was enough to meditate for one ke at dawn.

Those who came to study with her during the day were young children who didn't need to work. The adults worked hard all day and only had time after dark. But evening after all was an unsuitable time; all those who came were women. She didn't charge them money. Many people came with items that needed mending to borrow the lamplight. Listening to the disguised “Xu Dan,” “Sir Xu,” explain things from all over the world, or learning a few characters, wouldn't hold up the work.

Xi Ping didn't approach them, only listened from afar to Zhao Qindan composedly teaching astronomy. Today, Tao County's sky was as clear as if it had been rinsed clean, the starry sea resplendent. The young mistress was in fact well-learned; she understood astronomy and geography, as well as the history of the cultivation sects, and she could deftly explain the profound in simple terms.

Suddenly, he heard a young woman say, “Young Sir, you say that the sages have Ways of the Heart devoted to the world, and when they pierce the void and walk through it, that means they go up to heaven to become gods, is that right?”

Zhao Qindan froze. “I suppose that must be right.”

“So which are higher, the gods in heaven, or the gods on earth?”

Zhao Qindan knew that she was talking about “Tai Sui.” Tai Sui was made-up nonsense to start with, and the one who could answer the prayers of the county’s people was in fact a “master from a cultivation sect,” with cultivation unfathomable to her eyes. But however unfathomable, he must at most be an ascended spirit or a shed skin. Zhao Qindan knew that her neighbors were biased, so she didn’t respond.

Next to her, an old woman picked up: “Of course it’s the ones in heaven who are higher. Those in heaven are officers of the court, while those in the human world are their envoys.”

So the young woman said, “So why can a god on earth turn cultivators into humans, but the gods in heaven can’t?”

Publicly discussing gods had an unavoidable hint of heresy. Everyone became quiet.

Then the young woman’s clear and melodious voice alone sounded from afar: “Everyone says that spiritual energy nourishes all things, but most of the spiritual energy is in the immortal mountains. Who do the immortal mountains nourish? There's only a bit of spiritual energy in the human world, and it's divided up among all those demons with their factories and medicinal herb fields, making it impossible for the people to make a living. So hasn't spiritual energy become the root of trouble?"

Everyone quickly tried to stop her. The older people scolded her one after another, telling her "Do not speak recklessly, careful not to let the Exalted hear."

The fierce young woman said, "I'm not scared. What can they do if they hear? I'm not leaving the county, anyway. The Exalted are all deaf as posts here. No one can strike another person dead with a bolt of lightning. They have to talk things out."

No sooner had she spoken than someone else quietly said, "A couple of days ago, I saw some soldiers capture a person and escort him out. I heard that was an Exalted."

"My man is a waiter at an inn. The Exalted also have to eat, drink, and defecate. Those white-clothed Exalted also sweat, and they also stink if they don't change their clothes for a few days. Some of them smell rancid, but they don't notice it themselves."

One after another, the people marveled at this. No longer caring what was or wasn't taboo, they lowered their voices to discuss all kinds of gossip.

Zhao Qindan listened in now and then, turning her face toward the sky. Suddenly, she remembered that Luwu who had undertaken her fate and gone to Sanyue Mountain saying in casual conversation, Everything is decided by the spiritual mountains.

Xi Ping also looked toward the starry sky. It was no god in heaven sustaining the paradise of Tao County, and no immortal. It was the Law Breaker.

The Law Breaker itself was a special hidden realm immortal tool. It clearly laid down the laws inside the hidden realm; why was it called the “Law Breaker”?

Suddenly, a faint guess appeared in his mind.

Ripples spread through the lotus pond in front of Zhuoming. A heartless lotus flower petal floated in front of him. Brash writing flashed over it: Deal.

Zhuoming stared expressionlessly at the writing, until the writing and the lotus petal along with it had burned to ashes.

“Haha,” a voice came from somewhere in the lotus pond.

Next, insuppressible giggles and laughter came from all sides.

Until Zhuoming himself stuck up a finger and brought it to his mouth: “Shh —”

“The little Misty Willow said that he and the master of the Luwu are collaborators,” a lotus whispered, drawing in front of Zhuoming. “Liar.”

“Liar...” There was an echo from the water. Another mouth opened on a lotus root and said, “To use an accompanying plant to communicate requires blood as a medium. If he can reach him at any time, it shows that Zhou Ying always carries a piece of wood he’s spilled his blood on. Doesn’t that mean his actions can be observed at any time? Zhou Ying must have a profound connection to that Misty Willow.”

“Zhou Ying may be a little abnormal, but how could the possessor of a paramount spiritual sense lay his heart bare to anyone...?”

Another mouth opened on a lotus leaf and joined in the discussion. “How could that be? What’s so special about him?”

“I want him, too.”

“Want him...want him...”

“Let’s keep him and bury him in the lotus pond.”

Zhuoming, sitting upright in the water, listened to the discussion among the flowers and leaves and slowly closed his eyes, the corners of his mouth gradually turning upward. His thin lips turned up all the way to the roots of his ears, tearing when they split too wide. Blood fell into the lotus pond. The lotus flowers and leaves instantly threw themselves at it like dogs fighting over food. Before the blood could disperse, it was all lapped clean by the many mouths.

On receiving word, Princess Duanrui’s response was lightning fast. She announced that Xuanyin’s inner sect would send someone to oversee this matter. The Luwu were to aid them in crossing the border.

Xu Rucheng had just received a message from a colleague telling him that the senior from the inner sect had already crossed the river when Bai Ling ordered all the Luwu to stand by where they were and look for an opportunity to withdraw. The Luwu were secret agents. They shouldn’t reveal themselves even to their own people from Xuanyin’s inner sect.

But before he could breathe a sigh of relief—

It was the sixteenth day of the tenth month, with the full moon rising into the sky as usual. When it had just passed the treetops, an enormous seismograph inside Dongheng's imperial city shook. The full-moon-shaped machine spat out a Moon Plated Gold bead from one end that travelled along its track and bumped against the gears with a click.

The huge indicator on the seismograph pointed to the northwest. An alarm resonated throughout the imperial city.

There was an earthquake to the northwest!

Dongheng City felt considerable tremors. All the inscriptions around the houses of the wealthy were disturbed.

The residents of Dongheng ordinarily went to bed late. Now it was early evening in the city, when the lanterns had just been lit. No one was asleep. The common people living at the bottom of the valley had no inscriptions to protect them. None of them dared to stay under roofs. One after another, they poured out onto the street. Among the shouting of guards, someone cried out fearfully, "Look at the moon!"

At the same time, Xuanwu appeared out of nowhere on the summit of the East Peak. At the summit, the Silver Moon, like the moon in the sky, was plated with a layer of bronze. It seemed a little fretful, droning as it shook.

The motley moonlight seemed to be attracted by something to the northwest.

The features on Xuanwu's mask settled into a look of anger. "The moon has been stained with blood, and the great mountain array is unstable. An evil cultivator has become an ascended spirit. Two years ago, it was Qiu Sha. Who is it this time?"

From the Silver Moon came Zhuoming's calm voice: "There is a tidal wave in the Slumbering Dragon Sea to the northwest, a sign of catastrophe."

Xuanwu abruptly raised his head. "Is it Yu Chang?"

Just then, a fluttering sound suddenly came from the direction of the Central Peak. A messenger peacock dragging its long tail on the ground threw itself in front of him. It spoke in a human voice: "High Elder, the great mountain array is leaking spiritual energy everywhere. May we request that the Silver Moon stabilize the situation?"

Hardly had it finished speaking than another peacock flew over. "High Elder, Southern Shu sends word. They wish to know why yet another evil cultivator has become an ascended spirit in our country."

"High Elder, Northern Li has sent a letter inquiring..."

“The Xuanyin Mountains say that the sect leader has been in seclusion for two hundred years, and of late evil has frequently emerged here. They are concerned that the spiritual mountains are unstable and ask whether we require assistance.”

“A pack of nonsense!” said Xuanwu.

The brows on his mask pinched together, then were forced apart. The features drawn on the mask changed unnaturally as this happened.

Xuanwu lowered his voice and flatly said, “Qiu Sha absorbed the spiritual stones of the Land of Turmoil and only came to Chu to become an ascended spirit due to her resentment toward the Sanyue Mountains. Yu Chang is indeed from Chu, but the Slumbering Dragon Sea is not within our country. The sect leader is well. Sanyue’s spiritual veins are clear. We have no need to trouble our fellow cultivators to fret on our behalf. We request the cooperation of all the spiritual mountains in arresting the evil cultivator Yu Chang...”

No sooner had he spoken than the surroundings suddenly dimmed. The messenger peacocks raised their heads in astonishment. The Silver Moon had darkened. A wild gale rose, blowing so hard that the stars and moon vanished.

The immortal mountains once again began to quake—aftershocks from the Slumbering Dragon Sea?

No! Wait!

Xuanwu abruptly turned his head and saw dense clouds amass over Sanyue's Principal Peak and combine with the ominous bloody moon, seeming to form an enormous vortex whose edges were illuminated red by the moonlight.

A series of lightning bolts fell, striking directly at the immortal palace where the sect leader was in seclusion, one bolt after another.

The inscriptions on the Principal Peak lit up like a rising tide. This was adding frost to snow for the great mountain array that had been damaged by the earthquake. With a boom, a fireball fell out of the sky. Smoke began to rise from the sect leader's immortal palace!

The features on Xuanwu's mask stiffened: was the sect leader losing his mind at a time like this?

CHAPTER 129 - Eternal Flame (11)

All the spiritual energy in the Sanyue Mountains began to run wild. The hidden realms on the West Peak that relied on spiritual energy collapsed into chaos. Halfway up the mountain, cultivators flew up one after another on their swords. Looking up, the sky was full of people, like a plague of locusts.

The third-rate imperial grandson was raised on a stretcher and carried outside on servants' shoulders—in Xu Rucheng's view, given the imperial grandson's physique, this was completely unnecessary; it would have been enough to roll him up and stick him under your arm—with two delicate maidservants next to him, their lips blue and their faces deathly white, one fanning and the other stuffing elixirs into the mouth of the fainting imperial grandson.

Though right now, Xu Rucheng had no time to rejoice at becoming a “woman widowed by her betrothed.”

Spiritual energy was like water. A timely rain could nourish all living things, but it wasn't a good time when the floodwaters burst a dyke and rose over your head. The overflowing spiritual energy of the Sanyue Mountains had simply become a disaster, congesting the insufficiently wide meridians of the half-immortals. Xu Rucheng felt that he had become a sponge cake soaked in water, stifled by the spiritual energy blocking the seven apertures of his head until he could hardly breathe.

Just then, a small ceramic bottle flew toward him. That “taciturn” Young Master Cousin senior landed beside him.

“What is...”

“An eye-sealing pill, to seal your spiritual eyes for a time,” the Young Master Cousin said. “Don’t be in a hurry to take it, wait until you really can’t stand it. Having your spiritual bones rinsed once here amounts to twenty years in the mortal world. You won’t find another opportunity like this.”

“Thank you, senior.” Xu Rucheng gasped for breath and indeed couldn’t bear to take the elixir. “Is Xuanyin Mountain also like this? Right now, I...I think that it’s a joke that the market price of spiritual stones is a hundred liang of gold.”

“Xuanyin? It doesn’t match up to this.” Wearing the spiritual image skin of a beautiful girl, Xi Ping clasped his hands behind his back. The flood-like, brutal spiritual energy ruffled the hem of his skirt. “There is only one Sanyue on earth. So do you know why Sanyue’s sect leader is the person in this world closest to a full moon position?”

Xu Rucheng said, “Senior, what should we do now? The person from the inner sect hasn’t come yet. What are my lord’s and Mr. Bai’s orders?”

“Why wait for orders? This is a one-time chance that can’t be passed up.”

Xi Ping quickly instructed, “There are arrays and hidden realms all over Sanyue. A bird that flew in and flapped its wings wrong would be remembered for ten thousand years. Right now, the great mountain array is unstable, and everyone is running around. Why not seize the opportunity to sneak in? Where else will you find such a good opportunity to fish in troubled waters? Prepare to meet the other Luwu, use the chaos to record all the checkpoints... I’ll leave this beauty’s identity to you, as well.”

“Huh?” said Xu Rucheng. “Record...”

Xi Ping said, “To resell at a higher price to the other three sects in the future, stupid baby!”

Xu Rucheng: “...”

Wait, why was this odious tone so familiar? Had that staid and silent senior from before secretly been swapped out for another person?!

Xi Ping gave a laugh. With a flicker, he vanished into the surging tide of spiritual energy.

Apart from Tao County, the activity at Sanyue had disturbed all of Western Chu. All the borders were in turmoil. The waters of the Xia River rose all at once, crashing against the border inscriptions of Great Wan's Yuzhou. The local Heaven's Design Pavilion and Kaiming Department immediately became tense.

Zhou Ying reached into his mustard seed and took out his reincarnation wood. "I told you to withdraw from Sanyue. Have you withdrawn?"

"Yes," Xi Ping responded lightly and cheerfully and repeated the assignment he had just arranged for Xu Rucheng. "And I left my identity to the Luwu. That's all right, isn't it, san-ge?"

Scoundrel! Lying through his teeth! If he really had withdrawn, he never would have let the Luwu go in!

Zhou Ying's veins all stood out. "Where are you?"

Xi Ping raised a hand, and the spiritual energy wrapped him up, sticking to him like a film. He leapt up and jumped into the lotus pond in the rear courtyard.

From the silt in the lotus pond, a long, slender, dark red lotus stalk reached out and wrapped around his wrist, abruptly pulling him down. A large mass of dark red lotus stalks sprouted from the bottom of the pond like an explosion, coiling seamlessly around Xi Ping. It was as if he had been swallowed by the dense lotus stalks!

Meanwhile, Elder Xuanwu hadn't gone to attend to the splitting great mountain array. He had come directly to Sanyue's Central Peak.

The frantic spiritual energy shattered Xuanwu's hair crown. He passed through a bolt of lightning, all his snow-white long hair seeming to become one with it, but the white paper mask on his face didn't move a hair, as if it was embedded into his face.

The enormous Silver Moon had swallowed his shadow, slowly following him to the Central Peak.

With a huge sound, half of the summit of the Central Peak collapsed. The carvings made of white spirits over a zhang tall fell rumbling onto the towers below, their gilded pinnacles tumbling down along with the dust. The Silver Moon's chilly white light shone on the Principal Peak's statue of the Black Emperor. On the lean and solemn face of Sanyue's founder, the light and shadow suddenly deepened, inexplicably producing a mocking smile.

“Disciple Xuanwu, come to inquire after the wellbeing of my shixiong the sect leader.”

As soon as Xuanwu spoke, he broke by force through the constant thundering. His calm voice echoed throughout the Sanyue Mountains. When the clamor subsided, the restless spiritual energy had actually been suppressed by him.

He inquired three times in a row, and the turbulent spiritual mountains calmed. Following his voice, the congested spiritual energy flowed toward all the damaged arrays. The arrays began to repair themselves.

Xi Ping, having silently slipped into the lotus pond on the Principal Peak, went cold—Xuanwu’s cultivation was no less than Xuanyin’s Dignitary of Fate or Dignitary of Rule and so forth...but hadn’t Zhuoming said that he had used half of his essence to tie his disciple to the Silver Moon?

Before, the impression Xuanwu had always given off was of excessive ambition and crude methods, without the immortal air of a master with a complete Way of the Heart who had seen through all worldly things—within half a year, he had taken two trips to the human world; it simply made him sound cheap. It was hardly possible to imagine such a thing happening to the Dignitary of Fate or Dignitary of Rule, such that Xi Ping had always thought he wasn’t even Zhao Yin’s equal.

But these three successive inquiries into the sect leader's wellbeing had poured a bucket of cold water over him.

How could this white-haired opera singer be so powerful?

“Because a Way of the Heart is far more complex than you imagine. What do you think a Way of the Heart is? Benevolence, righteousness, courtesy, wisdom, and faith? The virtuous cause of the nation?” Zhou Ying's voice sounded in his ear. “Starting from the day the Sanyue Spiritual Mountains formed, they have been different from Xuanyin. The spiritual mountains determine the lay of the land, then determine the nation and its structure. They influence the inclinations of the whole sect's Ways of the Heart. You've never studied properly, not since you were little. All you can do is get up to your little tricks. Get the hell out of there already!”

That was true, Xi Ping suddenly realized. Wan strove for “reticence” and “equilibrium,” with “discipline and self-restraint” as its ideal. Therefore, the Dignitary of Rule was cautious in speech, the Dignitary of Rites was careful in action, and the Dignitary of Fate could certainly never pry lightly. There were limits imposed on the imperial family, the thirty-six peak masters held each other back, and the sect's regulations and taboos filled up a whole wall of writing, so hard to memorize that it made disciples want to hang themselves.

Typical Chu cultivators, meanwhile, were like Yu Chang, striving against heaven for their destinies, unreconciled unto death. The Sanyue Mountains stood alone and scornful—winner take all. Under the towering trees, the insects and grasses were permitted to mingle. It was survival of the fittest, using force to bring peace and stability.

Xi Ping had been born in Jinping. Despite being spoiled into a disgraceful rich brat by his family, he was still Wan down to his bones. Naturally he had a great deal of dislike for Chu's manners—but when you came to think of it, why couldn't a shed skin be ambitious? Did initiative violate heaven's commandments?

Why couldn't a shed skin go to the human world? Was engaging in worldly affairs really so much more contemptible than rejecting the mortal world?

Xuanwu's methods were crude; he calculated only the overall losses and gains—that was only because the stabilizing force of the Xiang clan could suppress all turmoil.

“San-ge, do you know what the most useful lesson the people of Chu have taught me is?” Xi Ping waved a hand to wipe away the beauty's face. In an instant, he turned into an unremarkable low-level disciple of the Central Peak. Before Sanyue's array formation had been fully repaired, he slipped in like smoke. “Cultivation isn’t sailing against the current, it’s climbing up a cliff against a waterfall, staking your all on a single throw. If there’s a shred of a chance, go after it with all your might, never mind how unattractive your posture.”

Zhou Ying: “...”

A feral dog picking up bad behavior from feral pigs.

“Xi Shiyong,” Zhou Ying said gravely, “aren’t you afraid that I’ll write a letter to the Marquis Manor, let your mother and father know what kind of crazy antics you’ve been getting up to out there?”

Xi Ping, surrounded by dangers that might erupt at any moment, felt a little like laughing. What kind of hot air was he blowing? He hadn’t even dared to visit the Marquis Manor for several years. Xi Ping had no weak spots in front of san-ge; all the weak spots were in His Highness’s chest.

But to avoid infuriating Zhou Ying, he still put on a completely insincere act of dread: “Oh, don’t, san-ge! I’ll do what you say, I’ll do anything you say, just let me...”

Before he could finish babbling, there was a huge sound. Xuanwu was about to force his way through the inscriptions of the immortal palace on the summit. At the same time, a beam of spiritual energy, oppressively savage, burst from the immortal palace. The two sides collided. Sanyue's Central Principal Peak actually shook!

Next, an enormous human figure seemed to emerge from underground and extended for dozens of li, enshrouding the better part of the Sanyue Mountain Range. With an indescribable oppressive force coming right at him, for a moment, Xi Ping choked. Despite being a near-ascended spirit, he seemed to turn into a tiny ant.

From the depths of that enormous figure, a person walked out.

With a cultivator's eyesight, it was possible to see clearly from the foot of a mountain to its summit. But when this person walked out, everyone, including Xi Ping, automatically averted their gazes.

As if looking at him would make their eyeballs explode.

But Xi Ping only averted his gaze for an instant. The next moment, he kicked aside his instinct and stubbornly looked.

Sanyue's sect leader, Xiang Rong, was said to be the Black Emperor's direct disciple, and the man presently closest to a full moon position. He was of similar stature to Xuanwu, with grizzled temples, though his face looked no older than that of a person in his twenties or thirties. It was a narrow face, bony, an appearance typical of the people of Chu. His irises seemed nearly to have merged with the whites of his eyes.

Xuanwu had fallen entirely under the might of that enormous figure. The features on his white paper mask no longer moved. He turned his false face toward the newcomer and calmly inquired for a fourth time: “Disciple Xuanwu, come to inquire after the wellbeing of my shixiong the sect leader.”

Xi Ping had a bad feeling and immediately passed word to the Luwu: “Get on your swords, don’t stay on the ground.”

“I am well.” The next moment, Xiang Rong spoke, but his voice didn’t come from his throat; it was the whole of the Sanyue Mountain Range speaking. “Thank you for your concern. I have failed to satisfy your expectations. I did not perish during my seclusion.”

With each word he spoke, the trembling of the cliffs and the ground increased, until it was resonating through the meridians and internal organs of the people on the ground.

When Xiang Rong finished speaking, quite a few of the Central Peak disciples with slightly lower cultivation had already fainted from injuries sustained in the shaking—and the minimum threshold for entering the Central Peak was an established foundation!

Xuanwu seemed to lower his head to glance down. The Silver Moon slowly approached, the moonlight shining on the enormous figure. There seemed to be a piece missing from the huge person's chest.

“What can the sect leader mean by this?” Xuanwu spoke, suppressing the trembling of the mountain, saying in a voice loud enough for all of Dongheng to hear, “Two hundred years ago, my shixiong the sect leader went into seclusion. I have looked after Sanyue in accordance with the sect leader's orders, working hard night and day, with no thought for my own cultivation, hoping for the sect leader's success in his aspirations to a full moon position, that he might soon...”

“Utter hypocrisy!”

Without warning, Xiang Rong attacked. A huge inscription appeared in the sky.

At the same time, an identical inscription appeared on Xuanwu. Like a sack of flour being drained, he rapidly shriveled and bent out of shape, even his flesh and bones changing into the form of the inscription, held in the palm of Xiang Rong's hand.

The next moment, Xiang Rong let go, but there was nothing but smoke in his hand.

Xuanwu appeared out of nowhere a zhang away from the immortal palace. “Sect Leader shixiong, have you lost your mind?”

Hearing this, everyone in Sanyue burst into commotion.

Just then, the West Peak’s Elder Xiang Ning was cleaning up the West Peak in a hurry. His voice came from afar: “The sect leader must have reached a critical stage of his seclusion. Being impacted by the blood moon and the alterations in the Silver Moon, his energy temporarily went astray!

Xuanwu-shixiong, the sect leader has the greatest trust in you. On entering seclusion, he even entrusted the Silver Moon and Sanyue to you. What are you doing?”

The mouth drawn on Xuanwu’s paper mask turned down. He swore inwardly: That good-for-nothing from the West Peak became a shed skin thanks to his family background—he’s no good for handling business or cultivation, but he’s an expert when it comes to bad-mouthing.

Now that these words had been spoken, he would bear the blame for the lunatic sect leader.

If the sect leader killed him, it would be “He was bewildered by the blood moon, his energy temporarily went astray”; by the time Xuanwu came back on the seventh day after his death, the sect leader could just express “regret for his past deeds.” But if he tried to do anything to the sect leader, it would substantiate Xiang Ning’s nonsense: the sect leader hadn’t lost his mind at all; it had been Xuanwu who had injured him. If he didn’t die today, then his reputation would be utterly destroyed.

No wonder Xiang Rong had chosen this critical moment to lose his mind... if he had chosen it?

Somewhat hard pressed, Xuanwu dodged Xiang Rong’s attack, then abruptly turned his head to look at the Silver Moon.

A blurry, smiling face flashed over the Silver Moon.

Wait. It had been Zhuoming who had told him that the sect leader was declining by the day, that he was about to lose his mind; it was also Zhuoming’s interpretation that the blood moon was pointing to an earthquake to the northwest in the Slumbering Dragon Sea, and that Yu Chang had reached an ascended spirit—but in fact, as a “moon on earth,” the Silver Moon could influence the moon in the sky up to a point.

That traitorous beast—he really thought he was ready to spread his wings!

“Sect Leader shixiong, you and I have been brothers since the spiritual mountains formed. We have never been at odds. How is it that after only two hundred years apart, you have developed a misunderstanding about me?” Xuanwu’s figure “dissolved,” transforming into dozens, hundreds of avatars. The avatars kept duplicating constantly, filling the sky with snow-white figures flying here and there, as if a fog had risen over Sanyue’s Central Peak. “I cannot escape blame for this. After I have aided you in expelling your heart demon, I request to seal the East Peak and go into seclusion for five centuries.”

Xiang Rong ignored him. He gave a low shout, and all the arrays in the mountains moved according to his will. An astral wind rose, tattering the “Xuanwu fog,” heading straight for Xuanwu’s true body!

The next moment, Xuanwu’s true body and all the avatars vanished into thin air, and Xiang Rong came face to face with the Silver Moon—in the blink of an eye, that excellent Elder Xuanwu had just woven an illusion that could take in a peak shed skin.

Sanyue’s sect leader’s fierce attack hit the divine tool of the mountains.

In an instant, all of Sanyue was lit as bright as day. Some towers located nearby around the middle of the mountain turned into melting candles, softly deforming, “trickling” down the slopes.

And the moon in the sky had disappeared behind thick clouds.

The array formation Xuanwu had just repaired slightly collapsed altogether. The Central Peak disciples fled for their lives. Even the West Peak’s elder was holed up amid the array protecting the West Peak, not daring to move a muscle.

There was only a shadow like a dandelion passing lightly through the darkness where the Silver Moon’s light couldn’t reach.

Some days ago, Zhuoming had said to Xi Ping, “Even if the sect leader is about to die, Xuanwu is still no match for him. When the time comes, that shizun of mine’s first reaction will be to lead over the Silver Moon and use it to deal with the sect leader—my life is tied to the Silver Moon’s, and I have half of Xuanwu’s essence protecting me. Not even the sect leader will be able to differentiate. He’ll take that half of his essence for Xuanwu, and I’ll become shizun’s stand-in. And the Silver Moon is a divine tool of the mountains. Even if it kills the sect leader on the spot, it can be put down to the will of the spiritual mountains, nothing to do with Xuanwu. The sect leader facing the divine tool of the mountains will certainly be earth-shaking. All the talismans, arrays, and inscriptions of the Central Peak will collapse. Will you dare to sneak into the sect leader's immortal palace of seclusion in the midst of a battle of shed skins?"

If mortals dared to set fire to monstrous vines in the midst of a battle of ascended spirits, if a half-immortal dared to cut off her own hand to interfere with a divine tool, what was there that he, a peak established foundation and a practiced hand at being crushed to dust, wouldn't dare to do?

Xi Ping said, "Enough nonsense. Show me the map."

Zhuoming immediately drew all the hidden realms and passageways throughout the Central Peak in a three-dimensional map that he pressed into Xi Ping's consciousness. "Remember, when Xuanwu is hiding in the shadows, in order to avoid being discovered by him, you must not use spiritual energy. You can't fly a sword. Half a step from an ascended spirit, with your physique, it will only take you a moment to climb to the summit. Half of my shizun's essence will hold out that long. The oppressiveness of a shed skin battle is nothing you can imagine. Lower level cultivators can be driven mad. There will be many bewildering inscriptions and arrays along the way. When the time comes, seal your senses and keep your consciousness withdrawn. Don't listen to anything, don't look at anything—let your consciousness take you along the map."

Xi Ping didn't fly a sword, but he also didn't seal his senses as Zhuoming had said.

Not only did he not seal them, he was even looking all around and listening to everything, on one hand transmitting all the exquisite arrays he could lay eyes on to Xi Yue, on the other hand facing the huge force of the clash between the shed skin and divine tool of the mountains, almost greedily noting every detail of the battle that he could see, deciphering as much of it as he could.

Even Xu Rucheng couldn't stand to take the eye-sealing pill—how could he stand to close his eyes?

At the same time, Xi Ping had something else on his mind. As he dashed toward the summit, he was constantly pressing small pellets of green ore and low-grade jade stamp fragments into cracks in the mountain.

He was so busy that his spirit ached fiercely, tears of blood leaking uncontrollably from the corners of his eyes. Zhaoting, standing guard over his spirit, was droning constantly.

But Xi Ping was like a wicked cat that would get onto the roof if you took your eyes off it for a moment, spoiled and conceited, remembering only the good and not the bad, without the least sense of shame or fear.

Following in Zhou Ying's footsteps, Zhi Xiu quickly found that cautioning him, scolding him, and threatening him were all completely useless.

The light of the shard of Zhaoting blazed, enclosing Xi Ping's whole body, but Xi Ping pushed it back—this was Xi Ping's first time resisting with his consciousness. Far away in Xuanyin, Zhi Xiu was astonished. His young disciple was always laughing and joking carelessly, yet his consciousness, after being shattered and rebuilt, was unexpectedly so strong.

CHAPTER 130 - Eternal Flame (12)

“Shifu, you can’t even talk. You can only make Zhaoting buzz. You’ve nearly turned into a mosquito. Why don’t you take care of yourself? Stop trying to protect me with a shard of your sword.”

In all his years, this was Zhi Xiu’s first time becoming a mosquito. It took him two whole breaths to react. Zhaoting’s quivering became different from usual—Xi Ping guessed that perhaps this was an off-key cry of “rebellious disciple.”

“When I get the Unbound Furnace and have Master Lin repair Zhaoting, you can beat me.” A fierce beam from the Silver Moon swept toward him. Xi Ping reacted extremely quickly, hiding behind a white spirit statue. “Don’t worry, I’ll be sure to run.”

Zhi Xiu: “...”

Just you try to run when the time comes!

Zhaoting was held back by Xi Ping’s consciousness, but Zhi Xiu didn’t withdraw his line of sight. The vast majority of the time, he was unable to have contact with the outside world. He was tightly bound by the vast will that wanted to swallow him, unable to move. Sometimes whatever Xi Ping was doing wasn't distracting him, it was helping him recognize over and over who "the sword cultivator Zhi Xiu" was—he had a tie to the human world; because there were young eyes watching him, he had to constantly inspect himself, force out his greatest courage, strive to show his junior where the boundaries lay.

After he was through angering shifu, Xi Ping simply withdrew his spiritual sense from his vision and attached it to the rest of his senses. His hearing, naturally several times more sensitive than normal, at once became acute to the extreme. He heard the faint creaking of the huge spiritual stone statue behind him. Its spiritual energy seemed to be constantly being drained, but not in the direction of the battlefield. Instead, it was pointing toward the immortal palace where the sect leader had been in seclusion.

Xi Ping took a deep breath, forced down his desire to probe outward with his consciousness, put an eye-sealing pill in his mouth, then used the Replica spiritual image mask to take on the appearance of the young soldier that had taken him out of Tao County at the very beginning.

He became a convincing imitation of a mortal.

A mortal's spiritual eyes hadn't opened. Like plants and other still life, their bodies could only absorb a negligible drop of spiritual energy over time. The spiritual energy surging toward the immortal palace brushed past him, having nothing to do with him. Xi Ping had practically become one with the rubble and splintered wood among the ruins, but on the other hand he could now more clearly “see” the direction of the surging spiritual energy.

As Zhuoming had expected, Xuanwu had indeed pushed his disciple forward to act as his scapegoat. So now, where would the vanished Xuanwu have gone?

It seemed that it could only be the immortal palace where the sect leader had been in seclusion.

If Zhuoming knew of the Unbound Furnace’s unusual property, then Xuanwu couldn’t be ignorant of it.

Following the general direction of the surging spiritual energy, Xi Ping climbed up to the collapsed part of the immortal palace. As expected, he caught a trace of a plant scent.

This was a very particular floral fragrance...supposing you could even call it a “fragrance.” It was harsh and deep, mixed with complex moisture and vegetal reek. It was the fragrance of the heartless lotus, which Zhuoming had made him memorize a few days ago.

“The heartless lotus has a very faint smell, easily masked by the smell of water. The average person wouldn’t notice it. You probably can’t smell it either, right?” At the time, the Zhuoming in the lotus pond had been telling him in a very normal tone of voice how to take precautions against Xuanwu. At this point, he suddenly held his fingers together like a knife and cut a piece of flesh off his arm. Had Xi Ping not dodged quickly, the blood would have spurting all over his face.

A “fragrance” dozens of times stronger than that of the lotuses in the pond surged up. Zhuoming, having an attack with no warning, issued a fervent invitation: “Here, this is the smell, do you want to have a taste?”

After being tactically turned down by Xi Ping, who looked as if he had a toothache, Zhuoming rather regretfully ate the piece of flesh raw, and even carefully licked the blood clean.

“Apart from some medicine cultivators and specific beast-taming cultivators, other cultivators—especially ascended spirit masters and above—think that smell is a secondary sense. This is because even with a paramount spiritual sense, the sense of smell is only effective when you can distinguish odors. Without special training, when those who are accustomed to sight and sound smell an unfamiliar scent, it will be very hard for them to judge it. And also it is because while the eyes and ears are connected to the mind, the mouth and nose are connected to the desires. Smell will sometimes disturb a person's intellect. Most importantly, cultivators are like mortals—if they live somewhere that reeks, over time, they won't be able to notice the stink anymore. The sense of smell will go numb. They practically can't smell their own bodies—for example, my shizun, who's spent hundreds of years soaking in the scent of the lotuses on the East Peak. But you can smell it. Remember this smell. You can use it to avoid him...or follow him.”

In other words, Xuanwu had indeed gone in this direction.

Xi Ping wiped the blood off his face and followed the sad and bitter scent of the lotuses.

There were many incomprehensible things about Xuanwu—it was very easy to comprehend why Xuanyin Mountain's Dignitary of Fate or Dignitary of Rule would want to respectively cover his eyes or seal his mouth, but why would the holder of true authority in Sanyue wear a shroud over his face? Could it be possible that a high elder in the Sanyue Mountains also had a disfiguring eye-opening wound? Would a man several thousand years old care about his looks?

Then there was the abnormal relationship between teacher and disciple.

Never mind a teacher and disciple, a person would be upset for a long time if even a potted plant they had painstakingly tended to withered and died.

Xuanwu had taken no other disciple. For three hundred years, there had only been this one living creature to keep him company on the forbidden East Peak, day in and day out, to the point that the high elder's sense of smell had lost the ability to perceive the scent of the heartless lotus. Could he offer him up for the slaughter just like that?

What kind of Way of the Heart did a ruthless person like Xuanwu have?

Suddenly, the scent of the heartless lotus became a little heavier. Xi Ping paused.

Xuanwu was hiding in the darkness. While he probably also didn't dare to set his consciousness free, Xi Ping didn't know how acute the hearing of a shed skin would be.

While he was hesitating slightly, a deafening boom of thunder exploded over the summit. A bolt of lightning practically brushed against the back of Xi Ping's head as it fell. He didn't have time to withdraw his spiritual sense from his ears and was nearly deafened. Blood immediately poured from his ear canals.

Well done, Zhuoming!

Xi Ping's first reaction wasn't to protect his ears, but to fly under cover of the enormous noise.

Zhuoming must have guessed his plight. The Silver Moon was fighting the sect leader with increasing ferocity, constantly heading in the direction of the immortal palace. The immortal palace was on the point of collapse. Roof beams, pillars, and huge stones fell one after another. The inscriptions all over the ground were in disarray. Xi Ping simply concentrated all his spiritual sense in his nose and took the opportunity to infiltrate all the way to the inner palace—the place where Xiang Rong would have meditated during his seclusion.

Then he saw that the depths of the inner palace were shrouded in a faint gauzelike mist.

This mist was so thin it seemed like it wouldn't obstruct your line of sight. He saw a very deep pool just up ahead. The railings on both sides of the white marble steps were carved with the phases of the moon. The pool had to be some dozens of zhang deep. As for what was at the bottom of the pool, you could only see it if you came close.

Xi Ping concentrated. He could faintly hear minute sounds of crackling coming from the bottom of the pool, like a furnace burning firewood.

Could it be...the Unbound Furnace?

Ridiculous. Could the Unbound Furnace's fuel possibly be charcoal?

Could Xu Rucheng really have been right? Had the sect leader brought along a furnace to warm himself by its fire?

Xi Ping's steps paused slightly. For some reason, he was very frightened of that thin mist. His spiritual sense was frantically holding him back. But the scent of the heartless lotus was at its strongest here, as if Xuanwu had also hesitated here for a while.

Just then, there was a sudden huge sound outside the immortal palace, and another big part of the outer palace collapsed. Someone had struck a fierce blow. Its aftershock swept right into the inner palace. Xi Ping, taken unawares, lost his footing and was pushed into the thin mist by that aftershock.

The fragrance of the heartless lotus instantly disappeared, and the earth-shaking sounds of battle abruptly quieted. Xi Ping's mind swayed. In that instant, he felt that the thin mist was like an irresistible, overpowering consciousness, swallowing everything around it.

It was as if lead had been poured into Xi Ping's limbs. His tensed mind seemed to miss a step. Out of nowhere, a feeling of bone-weary exhaustion crowded into his chest. Xi Ping froze blankly where he was, a clear thought floating up in his mind: Cultivators refining their Ways of the Heart, working hard to cultivate, what is it all for?

As soon as this thought appeared, there was no stopping it. The thin mist seemed to pour into his consciousness through the seven apertures of his face.

Fighting was for the sake of spiritual stones and resources. Obtaining spiritual stones and resources was for the sake of higher cultivation, in order to increase your chances of success in a fight.

Those who died along the road of cultivation, though they lived some centuries longer than mortals, spent nearly all those centuries trapped in the spiritual mountains, cultivating day after day, their work becoming futile when they finally died; and for those who walked on, there would come a day when all their companions had turned to dust, and they would be left to walk alone. What was it for? To prove that your Way of the Heart was more correct than everyone else's? Everyone was dead—who were you going to prove it to?

The lives of ants were ephemeral, with no one to care. What was a life for?

Mortals rushed around and worked hard, each of their destinies like a leaf floating on the ocean, trembling with fear as it drifted with the tide. What was a life for?

The spiritual mountains saw him as a monster, not to be abided by the world. So what was a life of struggle for?

No... Xi Ping pinched his palm hard. There was something strange about this mist.

He tried his hardest to retreat, but when he turned his head, he discovered that he couldn't find the way he had come anymore!

The voice in his mind that he couldn't banish wouldn't let him go. It pounded incessantly on his spirit, which had no Way of the Heart: What is your life for? You want to get the Unbound Furnace to reforge the Zhaoting Sword and save your shifu—and what is your shifu's life for?

Encounters between people were fleeting. Teachers, friends, even relatives, even soulmates—in the end, they would all leave. What was the point?

What was the point...?

“San-ge, say something to me!” Xi Ping automatically sought for another’s voice. “Shifu...”

He found that his voice couldn’t get out.

Even Zhaoting, always hanging on his spirit looking after him, didn’t respond.

Xi Ping suddenly realized that the voices constantly pulling him down like a marsh were his own thoughts.

These insuppressible thoughts were constantly draining his essence and his strength. Xi Ping practically felt that even drawing breath was wearying. He put a mind calming pill into his mouth.

The pill dissolved as soon as it entered his mouth. His eyes and ears, injured by the shaking, cleared at once, but the voices circling in his mind didn’t weaken one bit.

The uncontrollable thoughts said self-mockingly, What’s the point of taking a mind-clearing pill? Mind-clearing pills dispel illusions. Is life itself a hallucination you deceive yourself with?

Raising his foot like raising a thousand jin weight, Xi Ping struggled to take a step forward.

“I’m like a donkey,” he thought. “The poor farmers’ skinny donkeys in Yuzhou that pull millstones to grind soybeans also don’t know what they’re doing, but they work as hard as they can, when in fact they’re just turning circles in place. Since all efforts are futile, what am I doing looking for hardships to bring onto myself? Why don’t I just lie down and let it all come to an end?”

Xi Ping’s knees suddenly weakened. He nearly knelt.

“I should go ahead and kneel. The full moon sages are no longer in the human world. Isn’t not being in the human world the same as dying? Why am I still fighting?”

Xi Ping was carrying no burden, yet even so all his veins stood out. With difficulty, he steadied himself, stamped a foot on the ground, and actually crushed the white marble tile on the floor of the immortal palace. The flying shards of tile had inscriptions on them, which scraped the exposed back of his hand. The sharp pain made the deadly voices in his mind lighten.

Xi Ping instinctively grabbed a shard of tile with an inscription on it and fiercely cut into his own palm.

Like a drain, the cut skin and flesh seemed to be able to release the deadly voices. The pain immediately gave him a sense of himself, and his sense organs also regained their sharpness. He even smelled the vanished fragrance of the heartless lotus. Xi Ping gave a start and wrapped the wound with his sleeve, suddenly understanding why Zhuoming plucked his own hair and ate his own flesh.

But the sharp pain faded quickly. The body of a near-ascended spirit cultivator needed only the blink of an eye to heal a little wound like this. Xi Ping's senses were once again benumbed, and the irresistible thoughts surged back.

Xi Ping held the sharpest string on the Tai Sui Qin in his palm, the back of his hand tensing abruptly; but he didn't press down.

The next moment, he suddenly raised his head and looked at the path ahead. He opened his hand and released the string. He took a step forward.

He wasn't Zhuoming.

Within two steps, the thoughts drowning him made him forget why he was walking forward. The questioning voices became louder and louder, his limbs heavier and heavier.

But as his legs moved, in his mind, almost emptied by the mist, a thread of life force kept struggling from beginning to end.

Xi Ping simply concentrated his remaining strength in his legs.

“Where are you going?”

“Forward.”

“Where are you going forward to? What is the point?”

“I’m not going anywhere. My legs are long!”

After about ten zhang, Xi Ping seemed to have been walking for a lifetime.

At last, all of a sudden, amid the noise, the faintly discernible fragrance of the lotus once again touched his sense of smell. Xi Ping blinked away the sweat on his eyelashes and found that without noticing it he had come to the edge of the deep pool.

At a glance, he saw at the bottom of the pool a big, blazing cauldron, and beside the cauldron, a person—Xuanwu.

The moment he saw Xuanwu, the mist congesting his mind seemed to vanish all at once. The burden abruptly lifted from Xi Ping. He immediately remembered who he was and what he had come for.

No good, what was he doing? Wasn't getting this close to a shed skin asking for death?

Xi Ping broke out in cold sweat that soaked his back. He grabbed hold of the Tai Sui Qin and prepared to take a beating.

But Xuanwu, standing beside the fire, still had his head down, muttering something to himself. At such a close distance, he actually hadn't noticed that there was someone on the platform.

After a moment of anxiety, Xi Ping saw that Xuanwu seemed to have gone deaf and blind, and his all-encompassing guts returned to his belly. He crouched down and carefully approached the edge of the pool, peering down. He saw the mist that had just nearly killed him flowing steadily out of the big cauldron. Xuanwu was endlessly reciting something to himself.

“What is my life for? What is life for...?”

As he spoke, Xuanwu suddenly raised his head and gave a laugh. He pulled the white paper mask off his face.

Xi Ping craned his neck, clinging to the tiles of the platform, pretending to be a broken tile himself.

Then he saw Elder Xuanwu's true face.

It turned out to be...a typical Chu face, neither handsome nor ugly, without any scars.

It was only that, apart from the snow-white skin and colorless brows, he and Sect Leader Xiang Rong seemed to have been made in the same mold!

Xi Ping held his breath. Suddenly, doubt appeared in his mind: was that the Unbound Furnace?

Why wouldn't the sect leader have taken the furnace with him instead of leaving it here, waiting to be stolen?

CHAPTER 131 - Eternal Flame (13)

The fire in the furnace constantly belching out smoke reminded Xi Ping of the smokestacks of the factories in Jinping's southern outskirts. The smoke seemed to contain a powerful will that swept across everything in its vicinity. Even the shed skin Elder Xuanwu had been trapped in it. It truly was a powerful magic tool.

But evidently, it wasn't as powerful as he had imagined.

However good an opinion Xi Ping might have of himself, he still didn't believe that he was really mightier than a shed skin. If even he could easily...well, it was overstating things to call it "easily"—but at any rate, if he, a person who hadn't even crossed the boundary to an ascended spirit, could succeed in struggling free of the trap, then how long could the furnace restrain Xuanwu?

He kept feeling that any moment now, Xuanwu would burst out and clear his head. There was so little distance between him and the shed skin that it basically amounted to standing on the man's eyeballs and doing a jig.

But he'd come all the way here and laid eyes on the thing, so he absolutely couldn't withdraw. What should he do? Was there anything that could block the sight and hearing of a shed skin...?

Xi Ping suddenly had an odd thought: since the Luwu masks could turn you into a mouse, then couldn't this Replica, which was of higher grade than the Luwu masks, turn him into something else?

As soon as he had the thought, his body immediately stiffened and gradually disappeared. He really had become an irregularly-shaped big tile, blending among the tumbling ruins of stone and brick.

Master Lin was worthy of being known as this era's legendary Golden Hand—he could even make something out of this good-for-nothing!

When he was finished, Xi Ping, gasping in admiration, quietly conveyed the appearance of the big cauldron to Lin Chi. “Master Lin, have a look for me, is this the legendary Unbound Furnace?”

At the summit of Moon Plated Peak, since giving Xi Ping the Replica, Lin Chi had been laden with anxiety, worried that the dangerous immortal tool he had made would ruin General Zhi's disciple. Hearing these words, he had no more care for anything else. He tossed aside the unknown spiritual beast materials he was holding and gripped the reincarnation wood. “Bring my consciousness over, hurry!”

There was no reincarnation wood in Sanyue, but there was some on Xi Ping. A small twig the length of a finger joint emerged from the pile of rubble as Master Lin, who hadn't left Moon Plated Peak for centuries, traveled to Western Chu for the third time within a single year.

As soon as his consciousness arrived in the reincarnation wood, Lin Chi's mind buzzed. It was as if he was being choked.

Before he could clearly work out what was happening, he heard a couple of notes from a qin in his ear, promptly dispelling the smoke that had curled around him.

“What was that just now...?” Lin Chi came back to himself and was just about to speak, not expecting that as soon as he looked out, the first thing he would see would be the shed skin at the bottom of the pool.

Master Lin's heart stopped for a moment. “Xi Shiyong, you're going to get yourself killed... Where are you?”

Xi Ping had no mouth with which to speak. He could only communicate with his consciousness. He responded, “Do you see that pile of broken stones next to you? I'm there. This damn place is as colorless as Xuanwu's head. All the stones without inscriptions are blank, but I have carvings on me. Just find the tile with the twin lotuses carved on it!”⁸³

Lin Chi: "..."

Once again, the Master of Moon Plated Peak was struck dumb by his own creation.

Xi Ping said, "It's all right, Master Lin. After my last experience, I'll be able to take the spiritual image mask off despite not having hands—stop studying me, look at that smoking furnace. Why do your toolmaking furnaces make so much smoke? Do you all have problems with your lungs?"

Lin Chi felt that there wasn't much wrong with his lungs, but his heart was very tired.

He finally managed to get down the breath that had been caught in his throat. It was as if his head had crashed into a wall. When he turned toward the blazing cauldron, he spoke only after a long moment: "That...really is the Unbound Furnace, but it isn't the way I saw it when she had it. You shouldn't be able to see flames from the outside of the Unbound Furnace... Who lit that fire? What are they making?"

"It must have been their sect leader. It was burning when I got here," Xi Ping said. "I don't know what he's making. It sounds to me like he's burning firewood."

“Don’t joke,” Lin Chi said feebly. “All toolmaking furnaces have fireproofing inscriptions in them.”

Xi Ping was astonished: “Fireproofing? Your whole profession uses furnaces you can’t light a fire in?”

When toolmaking cultivators were working on a large project, it could easily take them several months or even some years. They couldn’t even use their toolmaking furnaces to boil some water or cook some rice?

“What the fire in the toolmaking furnace burns is the toolmaker’s essence. When the Way of the Heart of a toolmaker is complete, they obtain an extra sense that other cultivators don’t have, called the ‘seventh sense’—the ‘seven’ is homophonous with ‘tool.’⁸⁴ The seventh sense is connected to the fire in the toolmaking furnace, communicating with the materials inside. Only when the person outside the furnace has a spiritual connection to the item in the furnace can they keep the fire stable. When even a toolmaker with a seventh sense encounters a material they can’t communicate with, the furnace fire will go astray. Sanyue’s Sect Leader Xiang doesn’t cultivate the toolmaking way, how could he have ignited the Unbound Furnace?”

Before, all Xi Ping had known about toolmaking was that if you got the money and the resources, then gave a cry of “Master Lin,” the materials would automatically turn into immortal tools. He'd had no idea there were so many underlying contrivances.

“In other words, if you want to ignite a toolmaking furnace, you need to be able to communicate with the things inside the furnace.” Xi Ping seized the central point, then quickly inferred by analogy. “That doesn't necessarily take having a special sense. If it were me, I'd toss in a couple of chips of reincarnation wood. Reasonably speaking, wouldn't I also be able to ignite the furnace then? I know, Sanyue's sect leader doesn't have anything as evil and unorthodox as an accompanying plant—but what about if he was cooking himself in the cauldron?”

Lin Chi said, “Don't joke!”

Just then, Xuanwu, who had been driven to bizarre ravings by the mist, gave an angry shout. The fire in the Unbound Furnace was suppressed. The flames instantly shrank, going from golden red to cold purple blue. He also dispersed the smoke with one strike.

“What is my life for?” Xuanwu said, practically squeezing the words out from between his teeth. “Don't you know?”

The fire in the Unbound Furnace seemed to want to launch a counteroffensive. As if locked in a struggle with something, the color of the flames kept changing from cold to warm.

“The mighty master of Dongheng, striving for the full moon boundary, yet relying on the tool of a junior! Ha! Xiang Rong, have you once in your life walked on your own two legs? As I see it, you were only born with legs so you could sit more elegantly!”

As Xuanwu’s voice fell, it extinguished the fire in the Unbound Furnace. The spiritual energy in the immortal palace converged, and a long string of inscriptions rushed from his palm to press right against the Unbound Furnace.

Amid the spiritual energy that had nearly converged into an astral wind, Lin Chi opened his eyes with difficulty and gasped: Xuanwu wanted to wipe out the Way of the Heart in the Unbound Furnace!

Xi Ping had also realized this. While he had never collected predecessors’ Ways of the Heart, he had seen others trading in them in Wild Fox Country’s black market.

From every vital weapon left behind when its owner died, the original owner’s Way of the Heart could be collected, though the Ways of the Heart of cultivators who had only reached an established foundation had no value; the buyers were usually only interested in the vital weapons themselves.

Some people didn't want the remaining Way of the Heart to disturb them, so they would request that the traces remaining on the weapon be wiped away—by first embedding a set of inscriptions into the weapon to act as a medium, then pouring in a large quantity of spiritual energy to disperse the original traces. Then the new owner's consciousness would be branded onto it.

The inscriptions from Xuanwu's hand were cast into the Unbound Furnace like silver beads falling into a tray. The smoke he had just dispersed attempted to congeal and was once again knocked apart by Xuanwu. In the blink of an eye, the inscriptions were attached to the walls of the furnace, and a nearly pure gold flame flashed. Through the reincarnation wood, Lin Chi sensed the aura belonging to Hui Xiangjun. His eyes nearly burst from their sockets.

Xi Ping, however, was faintly surprised. He thought, After two hundred years, why hasn't Xiang Rong wiped away Hui Xiangjun's Way of the Heart?

But no matter what, all he and Lin Chi could do now was watch.

Essence belonging to a shed skin slid into the Unbound Furnace through the inscriptions. Spiritual energy that could level the whole of Western Chu poured into the Unbound Furnace. Not a thread of it leaked out, but Xi Ping and Lin Chi were both wedged in place by a sense of suffocation.

The capacity of the Unbound Furnace must have been immense. It greedily absorbed Xuanwu's essence, until the body of the furnace began to shake faintly. Xuanwu's eyes, identical to the sect leader's, abruptly opened, their pupils taking on the shape of the Unbound Furnace. He had stabbed his consciousness into it.

Then there was an abrupt reversal. Xuanwu screamed and fell backward, as if someone had shot him through the head with a hand cannon.

Thunder like the tolling of an enormous bell came from the Unbound Furnace. Spiritual energy that could nearly have contended with that of all of Sanyue burst out, surging straight upward.

In the immortal palace, the ceiling of the main hall, covered in first-class inscriptions and connected to the great mountain array, was pulverized like tofu by that spiritual energy. The sky appeared within the hall. Entirely unobstructed, that spiritual energy surged straight toward the horizon, even breaking apart the flashing and thundering dense clouds in the sky above the Central Peak!

The Silver Moon dimmed and faded. All the roofs seemed to be trembling.

“...blazes...” Right now, Xu Rucheng, dumbfounded, was lying in an irrigation ditch at the foot of the Central Peak.

After obeying orders to meet up with a group of Luwu colleagues and infiltrate Sanyue’s West Peak, he had run headfirst into cultivators fleeing from the Central Peak. Each one of them was scared witless. No one noticed him. Xu Rucheng, a “country Kaiming” who had been cultivating for less than a decade, got into his head an impulse to rise above the tumult and look at the sky.

So he gathered up all his courage and went against the tide toward the Central Peak.

The arrays surrounding the Central Peak had been smashed to pulp, letting this little half-immortal easily slip in, just in time to witness this scene.

For a time, Xu Rucheng was speechless. While his body hid in the ditch, his mind was nearly crushed by the vast explosion. Unconsciously, he used his consciousness to convey everything he saw through the communication device he had received from Xuanyin’s inner sect.

Xuanyin Mountain, Luwu everywhere, Zhou Ying, and Bai Ling simultaneously received the intermittent images.

In the Sea of Stars, the Dignitary of Fate High Elder Zhang Jue's sleeves, beard, and hair were all stirred by the violently unstable stars. He suddenly opened his eyes. "A new full moon divinity has been created!"

At the summit of Sanyue's Central Peak, the immortal palace had turned entirely to ruins. The reincarnation wood twig Lin Chi was occupying flew up like dust.

In that instant, Xi Ping only had time to push Lin Chi's consciousness out and send him back to the Xuanyin Mountains. The water dragon pearl on him flashed brilliantly, then turned to ashes.

But precisely because the water dragon pearl had protected him, the slab with the twin lotus carving that was Xi Ping didn't immediately turn to powder but only broke in half.

Never mind how that felt—the Replica enveloping him hadn't broken, so reasonably speaking he was still a whole person and could still feel his whole body, but the upper half and lower half had each gone in its own direction, one part remaining on the platform, one part flying over a zhang away and getting caught in a crack in the stone. Xi Ping's head and feet had never been so far apart.

“Shiyong!”

“Ge!”

“Senior...”

Bzz—

His ears were instantly filled with the worried voices of friends and family all over, but he had no time to attend to them. After the earth-shaking burst from the Unbound Furnace, a might he had never before seen seeped out bit by bit from the furnace, its force overpowering all the shed skins Xi Ping had ever met in his life.

Xi Ping seemed to hear a sigh from the Sanyue Mountain Range. For a moment, he had the impression that the spiritual mountains had a soul—that they had “come to life”!

Xuanwu was bleeding from the seven apertures of his face, having been thrown a hundred zhang away and embedded in the mountain by the spiritual energy suddenly surging out from the Unbound Furnace.

Then the dense clouds above the Unbound Furnace gradually formed the shape of a person, as big as the statue of the Black Emperor on the cliff. Xi

Ping took only one glance, and his stone-shaped head cracked. His vision went dark, and he nearly fainted.

But in just that one glance, he had seen clearly that the giant in the furnace smoke also had Xiang Rong's face.

Xi Ping had a splitting headache. The Sanyue sect leader fighting inseparably with the Silver Moon outside looked like this, Xuanwu looked like this, and the giant that had come out of the furnace now also looked like this—was this face the sect's public property?

Just then, Xi Ping realized that the mountain-rending noise the Silver Moon and Xiang Rong had been making had stopped.

“Senior.” Xu Rucheng gathered up his wits with difficulty and squeezed the reincarnation wood chip in his palm. It was unclear whether he was making a report or speaking to himself. “I, I've ended up at the Central Peak somehow, I think I saw...the Silver Moon ‘go out.’”

“Hff...Tai, Tai Sui-xiong...are you still alive?” Almost at the same time, Zhuoming spoke, nearly on his last gasp—prior to this, the two successors of ancient demonic gods had exchanged items. Zhuoming had given Xi Ping a length of lotus stalk, and Xi Ping had given him a length of tree branch in exchange, so they could convey information when needed.

“Just now, fighting with the Silver Moon, it wasn’t Xiang Rong’s true body.”
Laughter gradually mixed in among Zhuoming’s almost fragmentary breaths. “Ha...hahaha...the sect leader knew all along...the sect leader knew all along that Xuanwu was using me to spy on the Central Peak... ‘Getting weaker by the day’ was a joke he was playing on Xuanwu... hahaha...”

Xi Ping said, “...What?”

The giant that had come out of the Unbound Furnace spoke. His voice echoed throughout the Sanyue Mountain Range.

“On the road to a full moon, I needed this tribulation, shidi,” he said to Xuanwu, who had turned into a relief sculpture. “I used an avatar to test you, and as expected you couldn’t hold back.”

The cracks on Xi Ping’s stone body deepened.

If what had overpowered Xuanwu and had been on an even footing with the Silver Moon was only an illusory avatar, then the cultivation level of Xiang Rong’s true body must be...

Xu Rucheng heard “Tai Sui”’s voice from the reincarnation wood—this time, he didn’t even bother disguising his voice. “Leave the Central Peak, hurry!”

“Xi Shiyong!” Lin Chi, having been thrown back to the summit of Moon Plated Peak, scrambled to catch the piece of reincarnation wood that he had let slip. “What just happened? How are you? Answer me!”

“Master Lin,” Xi Ping whispered, bearing up under the fierce pain, “guess what? I got it right just now. Xiang Rong really was cooking himself in the big cauldron... The ‘material’ the Unbound Furnace was burning was his true body.”

The rusty red of the blood moon in the sky faded bit by bit, revealing clean, chilly white light. The white light was constantly strengthening; soon it was impossible to look at directly, brighter than the sun, so dazzling no one could open their eyes—

Throughout the four nations on the continent, all the roosters responsible for crowing in the dawn were struck dumb as wooden chickens. In the middle of the night, the sky was as bright as noon.

“You...didn’t lose your mind,” Xuanwu, embedded in the cliff face, spat out. “A full moon...”

“My natural endowments aren’t high. Only because the Sanyue Mountains are foremost in the world, the environment surpassingly favored by nature, was I by good fortune able to come before all my fellow cultivators present.” Xiang Rong’s voice was mild and dignified. There wasn’t a trace of having lost his mind. “But blessings can bring disaster. Neither my talent nor my virtue were enough to merit the position, my heart and mind unable to keep up with my cultivation, my time limited. So I took a risk and entered seclusion with the Unbound Furnace, using this unbound article to glimpse the boundaries of the spiritual mountains, hoping that I could find a gleam of hope for survival. After two hundred years, the chance began to take shape, but the essence I had cultivated for thousands of years had nearly all been cooked away in the furnace. If I used the flow of spiritual energy in the spiritual mountains, I would have had to consume the vigor of the mountains, bringing disaster upon the nation and the people. Would that not have violated my Way of the Heart? I thought at first this was the will of heaven—that I was unworthy of becoming the first person in thousands of years to reach a full moon position. I had meant to create an avatar to go out and make arrangements for after my death. But the will of heaven is unpredictable. It turned out that my shidi was willing to use his essence to take me part of the way.

“You and I...” The first master of this age to have attained a full moon position sighed softly. “...share a common origin.”

What did he mean by a “common origin”?

Xi Ping had nearly cracked into eight pieces. Under the enormous pressure, he was barely managing to keep his consciousness clear. His thoughts raced: Does he mean that they have the same mother? Blood relations are usually said to be “born from the same roots.” I’ve rarely heard anyone call it a “common origin.”

But Xuanwu, on hearing these words, seemed to go mad. The mountain where he was “embedded” creaked as it trembled. He gave a low cry and pulled his head up from the cliff face.

“A common origin,” Xuanwu said quietly. “That’s right, sect leader shixiong. You still remember.”

“My mother the empress was lost in the chaos of battle and unluckily fell into the hands of a demonic god...and had you.” Xiang Rong drew back the voice that echoed throughout the mountains and spoke in a soft voice that could only be heard at the summit of the Central Peak. “Then the imperial family wanted to dispose of you, and it was I who did all I could to prevent them. I thought at the time that no matter what your background, you were after all still my brother.”

“That’s right. A life debt, brother,” Xuanwu said almost inaudibly. “Haven’t I repaid it?”

Xi Ping placed all of his remaining spiritual sense in his ears and heard Xuanwu say, “Before shizun chose his direct disciples, you were attacked by a peer. Your meridians were damaged, and you were on the point of becoming a cripple. But you were the eldest son of the Xiang clan of Dongheng, with your rare innate spiritual bones—such gifts and promise. The hopes of the whole clan were vested in you. How could they allow this to happen? Then a genius among the clan thought up the Spirit Splitting Technique. It required a person whose spiritual image matched yours to undertake the spiritual energy that your meridians would be unable to handle when your spiritual eyes opened...”

The more Xi Ping heard, the more familiar it sounded. Then he suddenly realized—wasn’t this precisely like the spiritual image dolls that had been popular in Wild Fox Country’s black market?

“But where could one go to find a substitute whose spiritual image would match you, with your innate spiritual bones?” Xuanwu laughed. “Did the mercy you had shown in your youth not find recompense then?”

CHAPTER 132 - Eternal Flame (14)

But this scandal that could shock a cultivation sect didn't shake Xiang Rong's face. He didn't lose his head one bit, only said in a nostalgic tone, "Yes, I also thought that inappropriate. Before the spiritual mountains formed, my Xiang family produced talented individuals in great numbers, many stars shining bright. Even if I couldn't become shizun's disciple, I might still have found some other opportunity to move forward in cultivation. I had no need to resort to a method for instant success like that. But, shidi, if I recall correctly, it was you who insisted on it. Back then, I refused over and over, sent many messengers to speak to you. It was you who simply went around me and asked the clan elders to let you 'save' me..."

Xuanwu interrupted him. With a cold laugh, he said, "Yes, when a sage encounters a business like this, how could he fail to decline politely at first?"

"Declining politely is a Wan tradition. We in Chu aren't so fastidious," Xiang Rong picked up, his expression unchanging. "I agreed in the end because I found that you had been stealing the clan's spiritual stones to pour into your spiritual eyes."

Xuanwu's laughter came to an abrupt halt.

The eavesdropping Xi Ping also suddenly understood. “Oh, I see.”

The first time he had heard about Xuanwu’s background, he had thought it was strange. How could the Xiang family not only have raised a product of adultery like this but also have placed him under the Black Emperor’s tutelage, letting him become one of the great masters of the present age?

What kind of broadmindedness did that take? The mind would have to be more vast than the South Sea.

It turned out that Xuanwu had taken this opportunity to enter the Way.

The reason that spiritual image dolls were all doomed to die was that the evil cultivators who sold them cared only for profit; they wouldn’t waste a single grain of green ore nourishing those children who had never eaten a square meal in their lives. Once the owner they were bound to opened their spiritual eyes, a great quantity of spiritual energy would surge into those small bodies whose flesh and bones had yet to finish growing, like a tidal wave crashing against the shore crushing a little gully in its path—the gully was sure to collapse.

But the “spiritual image doll” Xuanwu was different. For one thing, he had been born before the Great War of Gods and Demons, when spiritual energy was everywhere, and to hear Xiang Rong talk, he had also pilfered the Xiang family's resources to pour into his spiritual eyes. When he went to take part in the Spirit Splitting Technique, while naturally it would have been dangerous, and more dangerous with a possessor of innate spiritual bones than with an ordinary person, it wouldn't have been a matter of almost certain death. Moreover, if he survived, he would be a half-immortal and could afterward legitimately step into the cultivation sect.

“What's your position in Western Chu? Are the family affairs of a shed skin and a full moon sage for you to settle?” Having listened to his “rational and comprehensive” analysis, Zhou Ying simply wanted to dig Xi Ping's brain out and give it a rub with the insecticide powder that had recently come out in Great Wan—this unreliable wretch had told Xu Rucheng to leave the Central Peak, but he himself had not only kept listening, he was listening with relish!

Even Bai Ling was perplexed. He couldn't understand what attraction elopements, adultery, and fights over family property could have. How could people since time immemorial have been so wildly interested in these petty affairs?

“I'm just listening as long as I'm here. My Chu is too good, what else am I supposed to do...? Hss, I'm stuck. It's all right, san-ge, it's not a big problem, I'll think of something!”

In fact, Xi Ping wasn't devoting his whole heart and soul to eavesdropping. Right now, his main concern was dealing with his own awkward predicament: when the Replica was put on, it could turn you into a convincing imitation of the original. In other words, right now, he was a broken tile. A tile couldn't get up and walk on its own. He would have had to take off the Replica. But he was currently split in two, the part connected only by the Replica. Even with Xi Ping's guts, he still didn't quite dare to imagine what would happen if he removed the spiritual image mask under these circumstances.

In view of the fact that he was currently a stone, Xi Ping couldn't even really determine where he had broken—if it was below the ass, that was all right; he had those special hidden bones and could regrow his legs if they were broken. Even if he had to be paralyzed for a year or so, he could take that. But if he had broken at the torso, then that was a big problem. Wouldn't he get his guts wrapped around his neck and be sent scrambling to pick up his own liver, spleen, and kidneys in front of Sanyue's two big shots?

Xi Ping had already consulted with Lin Chi on this subject, scaring Master Lin ashen pale with his questions. Xi Ping felt that there was no hope of anything from him, so he had to strive to save himself.

The lucky thing was, the reincarnation wood branch Lin Chi's consciousness had occupied earlier had only broken; it hadn't been crushed to bits. While the two big shots sent the spiritual energy on the Central Peak's summit surging wildly in the wind, Xi Ping took the opportunity to carefully send a bit of his consciousness into that piece of reincarnation wood, moving the twig over next to the stuck lower half of his stone body and using that short twig to gently tap on the stone.

Among the little eddies of spiritual energy swirling around it, the reincarnation wood cautiously pried the stuck stone out bit by bit. Like a carpenter doing delicate work, Xi Ping would do a bit of tinkering, then stop and observe the surroundings, ensuring that he hadn't disturbed anyone who oughtn't to be disturbed.

Despite the mess he was in, he was used to traveling through the reincarnation wood and was an expert at multitasking. He didn't miss a word of the two Sanyue masters' confrontation.

Xiang Rong tranquilly continued: "After I tacitly accepted this, I was always unhappy about it. I knew that you had high aspirations, so I went and asked shizun to take you from the clan to cultivate along with me. Even after shizun ascended to heaven, I accorded you the position of disciple of record without permission. My Way of the Heart watches over me, Xuanwu. Have I ever wronged you?"

The stuck half of Xi Ping's stone body finally loosened. He breathed a sigh of relief and quickly made the tree branch change its angle and keep prying—there was a slope next to him; he was planning to work through the reincarnation wood and use spiritual energy to push that half of his body down the slope to meet up with the other half, bring the two together, use reincarnation wood and spiritual energy to plaster up the wound, make it out alive, then recover after getting away.

At the same time, amid all his other business, he mentally made an irrelevant judgment about these two brothers: there really was no fault to find with what Xiang Rong had done.

Except that...

Xi Ping thought: The better part of White Hair's essence was drained by the Unbound Furnace, taking the sect leader over the full moon boundary. That looks like an "odd coincidence," "reaping what you sow."

Then he heard Xuanwu say with a cold laugh, "When you took me from the clan, wasn't it because after the Spirit Splitting Technique, the spiritual eyes that came of the same origin meant that not only was my spiritual image similar to yours, my outward appearance also came to resemble yours more and more? In the early years, the Xiang clan was rife with power struggles. You were afraid someone would use me to humiliate you, and you were afraid that I, your ‘shadow,’ would slip from your control...”

Xiang Rong was utterly unmoved, only calmly repeated, “Have I ever wronged you?”

“Ha!” In a moment, all the indignation from Xuanwu’s youth that he’d had no way to vent surged up. Like the eternally unchanging youthful countenances of cultivators, this feeling was as fresh thousands of years later as it had been at first.

Living up to his name, Xiang Rong⁸⁵ was the glory of his generation of the Xiang family. His parents were both unusually talented cultivators. Even before opening his spiritual eyes, he had demonstrated transcendent comprehension, and he had a set of innate spiritual bones to rival those of the East Sea’s clan of demon subduers.

He was the favored son of heaven. The only blemish on him was that “brother” with his inglorious birth.

But when his mother killed herself and the prince wanted to preserve her remaining flesh and blood, who could criticize him? Who wouldn’t say that His Highness was benevolent?

As for the “blemish” himself, it was already all that could humanly be asked of the Xiang family to leave him alive. It was only natural to bring him back to live with the slaves and work like a beast of burden.

Thousands of years ago, the area around Dongheng had still had the old custom of keeping slaves. Slaves weren't human—their master could kill and sell them off as they liked; their children and grandchildren could never be free of that low background. They had no way to resist; the fury nested in their hearts, fomenting into poison, all of it venting onto the half-grown child who was called “young master” but in reality was trapped in the same morass as them.

He had tasted of every kind of torment and humiliation imaginable.

He was the offspring of a demon; persecuting a demon was naturally just. What did it matter whether it was cruel?

To begin with, like his half-brother, he'd had the innate spiritual bones that appeared in one in a hundred million people. Even as an ordinary commoner—even if he had truly been born a slave—there would still have been a master who would have seen him. But as the Xiang family's “hidden young master,” no one would go near that kind of bad luck.

Amid his lightless days, he didn't even have any hope.

Had that benevolent brother of his been willing to extend a single foot toward him, he would have been willing to lick Xiang Rong's foot.

But he spent fourteen years in the Xiang family, during which Xiang Rong saw with his own eyes as he washed stone steps in the freezing rain, barefoot, bearing festering sores; even happened upon a servant rushing him, yet he shut his eyes to it all, as if refusing to acknowledge him.

And each time the prince walked by without a sideways glance, all the cruelties inflicted on him would become even more excessive—it was like some tacit agreement.

“You have never wronged me.” As if he had gone mad, Xuanwu laughed loudly. “It was I who wronged you, shixiong...da-ge—a shadow like me actually dared to delude myself with the hope for affection from my own flesh and blood. It was I who overestimated my own worth...”

The stones trembled. The veins of the earth seemed about to boil over.

With Xi Ping's cleverness, he could in fact roughly guess what the circumstances had been after hearing this much. As far as sentiment went, he was willing to feel sympathy for Elder Xuanwu. But he truly couldn't endorse what Xuanwu had been getting up to.

When the earth shook like this, it sent the lower half of his stone body, which had nearly been prized free, flying away—he failed just within reach of success!

Dizzy and disoriented, Xi Ping was swallowed up by a big pile of rubble and fell from the platform. This time there was no more water dragon pearl to protect him. Half of his stone body broke into an unknown number of pieces.

Xi Ping lay facing upward, mentally paying his respects to eighteen generations of Xuanwu's ancestors.

Zhou Ying immediately turned to Bai Ling. "Who has Xuanyin's inner sect sent to Western Chu? Then there are the Luwu on the West Peak. I need them to go..."

"A half-immortal would be going to their death here," Xi Ping interrupted him from the reincarnation wood. "I won't pass that message for you."

In a tone that didn't waver, Zhou Ying said, "The Luwu have their own communications. If you're afraid of getting your little friends killed, then please could I trouble you to learn to think before you act in the future?"

“San-ge!”

“My lord...” said Bai Ling.

When Zhou Ying was truly angry, his tone became softer and softer. “The lead Luwu is named Xu Rucheng, right? A good name, record it. The full names of the other Luwu, what family members they have, what unfulfilled desires and unresolved regrets they have, record it for the Viscount. Don’t leave anything out.”

“I...” Xi Ping got halfway through saying this when an enormous rumble came from the ground, sending his bits and pieces rolling all over. Suddenly, he caught a glimpse of golden light out of the corner of his eye. The “biggest piece of Xi Ping” had coincidentally rolled near the Unbound Furnace!

Just then, Xuanwu gave a long cry, and a curved blade like a crescent moon appeared in his hand. He hacked at Xiang Rong.

But Xiang Rong seemed to have turned into an illusion. The curved blade slipped effortlessly through the illusion and landed on the enormous shadow, only splitting the illusion in half.

That blow nearly overturned the Central Peak’s summit. Only the area around the Unbound Furnace remained intact. But as the mountain toppled, it began to slip toward one side.

Xi Ping once again slid away from the Unbound Furnace.

And Xuanwu's second blow had already connected.

This time, the tip of his blade provoked the light of the Silver Moon. The Silver Moon's moonlight gathered itself into a bundle and cascaded down like magma, merging with Xuanwu's crescent moon blade.

Xi Ping heard a stifled cry of pain from Zhuoming.

“What...”

“He wants...” Zhuoming's voice was intermittent. “...to take back the half of his essence he left with me...”

Before he could finish saying this, Xi Ping was already another four or five chi further away from the Unbound Furnace.

“Do you know that they forced Mother to her death...” The blood from the seven apertures of Xuanwu's face had yet to dry, becoming the only color on that face like white paper. “...sect leader shixiong?”

The giant-like Xiang Rong in the sky raised a hand. A curved blade that looked extremely similar to the one in Xuanwu's hand appeared out of nowhere and met Xuanwu's blade. Where the two curved blades joined, sparks spurted out with a crackle. Under the moonlight that was like the light of day, it was as if a series of bolts out of the blue had been set in midair.

“She only wanted to live as an ordinary person to raise me in an out of the way place. She didn't want to come near your struggle between immortals and demons. And there was no need for you to confer so many self-flattering titles on her after her death... You did everything you could to protect my life. Sect Leader Shixiong...da-ge, I was a fisherman's child poling for fish and picking water chestnuts by the river. What crime had I committed that called for you to condescend to spare my miserable life?!”

Furious spiritual energy exploded with a crash from the crossed blades. Xi Ping's half of a stone body rolled, but it once again changed direction. This time, he was again sliding toward the Unbound Furnace.

“I have a way to escape. Luwu, stay hidden on the West Peak, don't come meddling!” For the latter sentence, he simply went around Zhou Ying and used the reincarnation wood to knock on the consciousnesses of all the Luwu. When he had just finished speaking, he had already rolled his closest to the Unbound Furnace, less than a chi away!

Xi Ping concentrated his gaze and decisively tore off the Replica he was wearing.

At such a short distance, even if he coiled his guts up into a bun, he would still be able to fly over!

The Replica obediently turned back into black smoke, and Xi Ping's half of a body was exposed beneath the light of the stars, moons, and blades. Only now did he find that he had broken in a very high place—his guts had no part in it; right now, he only had his head and most of his left upper body.

The left upper body had an arm connected to it. That was plenty.

Xi Ping didn't dare to look closely at his body. The moment he freed himself of the Replica, he immediately felt himself on the point of death.

Fortunately, even if a person was cut in half, they still wouldn't die instantly. With his remaining left hand, Xi Ping pushed off firmly against the ground and rose into the air, falling into the Unbound Furnace.

Only then did his blood spurt out, covering half the furnace!

Xi Ping abruptly lost awareness of his own body. He seemed to have returned to his time as a “tree spirit,” half his consciousness in the furnace, half outside the furnace, the two halves linked together. As if he had struck two pieces of flint together, the Unbound Furnace that had fallen still after Xiang Rong had left it was lit!

The flames seemed to be burning his blood. They were pure gold in color. Xi Ping couldn't feel the burning. The segment of his body that had sunk into the furnace was wrapped up in golden flames.

Xiang Rong sensed something, his consciousness and his gaze simultaneously shooting toward the ruins of the immortal palace, but the Silver Moon controlled by Xuanwu gave him no chance to divide his attention. The moonlight that had turned Qiu Sha to dust disobeyed the will of heaven, surrounding the freshly-minted full moon sage.

Inside the Unbound Furnace, time and space were warped. The flames seemed to contain a whole world. Xi Ping's consciousness outside the furnace knew very well that only the space of a breath had passed, but the part of him inside the furnace had experienced hundreds of generations in the blink of an eye!

CHAPTER 133 - Eternal Flame (15)

Inside the furnace, Xi Ping was swept up into countless cycles of birth and death, losing all sense of time.

Outside the furnace, Xi Ping could see the long river inside the Unbound Furnace at a glance, flowing from the wild ancient era before the spiritual mountains had formed all the way to the present day. In that long river into which all eternity was compressed, there were noble people and low people, good people and bad people...as well as flowers, birds, fish, and insects, all with his own face.

On the two banks of the river, desolation and prosperity mingled; growth and decay, winter cold and summer heat coexisted.

Sages wrapped in their swaddling clothes wailed, masters learning to walk stumbled, demons tirelessly pursued cultivation with self-restraint, unhappy couples were still in their period of tenderness and affection, solemn pledges of love wearing away along with the mountains and seas.

A boy forced by the servants to wash stone steps amid freezing rain instantly grew a head of white hair and reached out to point to the sky; cold moonlight swept through the ditches he was unwilling to give another close look to.

Brothers born from the same stem joined hands to withstand the trials of heaven and earth, then fell out over that same heaven and earth, becoming locked in a mortal struggle.

Xi Ping's consciousness inside the furnace was stretched out to the length of millions of years, from the ancient past to the present. Before he could recover, he was thrown staggering up onto the bank.

A fresh and tender fruit fell. He grabbed it, but its sweet fragrance only lingered at the tip of his nose for a moment before it instantly came to full ripeness and decayed, the thick fragrance turning rotten, the fruit becoming putrid liquid in his hand.

Finally, sweetness and foulness both disappeared. He was left empty-handed, holding a handful of nothingness.

And the golden light drawing him into the furnace was still racing wildly toward the infinite future.

The Xi Ping inside the Unbound Furnace relied on his point of view outside the furnace to remain clear-headed and rational.

The Xi Ping outside the Unbound Furnace was so full of the thousands of sensations within the furnace that all his senses went numb.

Only an instant of real time had passed. None of the sounds from the outside world had had time to reach his ears. So in that moment, he had lost all companions—teachers, kin, enemies, and friends were all out of reach.

There was only himself, watching himself.

Xi Ping watched that guiding golden light and didn't rashly chase after it. He stayed where he was and calmed himself down, slowly let out a breath, and thought, So this is the magic of a toolmaking furnace. If I'd gone to Moon Plated Peak, I may have ended up in the toolmaking path along with Master Lin. Ah, isn't this much more interesting than my shifu spending all day chipping away at ice with a sword?

Just then, he heard a soft laugh in his ear, startling the rebellious disciple who had just mentally criticized his shizun into a jump.

This was a slightly hoarse female voice. Xi Ping looked in the direction it had come from and saw that the golden light that had flown far away had at some point returned before him. The golden light was so resplendent it was dazzling, as hard to look at directly as the scorching sun. Xi Ping narrowed his eyes and saw a vague human form amid the light—a woman of middle height, with an unusually slender frame, a handful of bracelets stacked on both wrists... He had a very profound impression of this figure. When the Riverward had been in Qiu Sha's hands, it had formed into this figure, though unfortunately it had been dispersed by the Law Breaker before it could fully take shape.

Was this an image Hui Xiangjun had left behind?

Xi Ping's mind was shaken. He cupped his hands toward this person.
“Senior.”

In fact, only a living person or a living consciousness could hold a conversation. Ways of the Heart left behind in weapons were inert matter and vestiges—even if some vestiges contained realistic images, they were still like old paintings that you could see but not touch.

It was a little silly to be saluting a “painting,” but she was truly too lifelike; Xi Ping decided that no one could fault him for excessive politeness.

The woman inside the golden light beckoned to him, her bracelets briskly clinking against each other. “Come.”

Xi Ping had never seen what a proper Way of the Heart looked like—Yuan Hui's false one didn't count. He was a little curious, curious about Hui Xiangjun's Way of the Heart, and also curious about why after two hundred years Xiang Rong had yet to wipe away the Way of the Heart of the Unbound Furnace's original master, so he followed immediately.

Eight hundred years ago, Chu's bold and innocent folk customs probably hadn't been as hypocritically fussy as Great Wan's. The hand stacked full of bracelets pulled him over without any sense of taboo and pulled his head down. Then the woman in the golden light stood on tiptoe and pressed her forehead to Xi Ping's.

Xi Ping automatically closed his eyes. When he opened them, he saw that everything around him seemed to have turned into an exploded painter's palette.

Plants and beasts were all laid out in their basic essences. Observing the world from this strange angle, there was for a time too much for his eyes to take in. Then he learned that in the fragrance of fully ripe fruit was a scent that shared a common origin with flowers, that the spiritual energy around a vital weapon presented an identical shape to its owner's consciousness at the moment it separated from their body...

Xi Ping immediately understood that this was the world through the eyes of a master of the toolmaking way.

All creatures and all things had hidden connections. These sounds, colors, and spirits either combined in her hands or formed a delicate equilibrium because they repelled each other. Time...as well as she herself, everything was only another kind of material. She used her hands to mold a bizarre and jumbled world.

Xi Ping understood it intuitively, deciphering the first level of the eternal spring brocade's toolmaking way: all forms were illusory, all appearances were inconstant, all things were subject to dissolution and reconstruction; toolmakers were the creators of the universe.

This was linked to the Law Breaker's hidden realm suspended over Tao County. It wasn't hard to understand. Xi Ping thought it was very interesting, but he didn't think it was surprising, so he asked, "Is there more?"

In the golden light, two long, narrow eyes opened and met his gaze, their corners curving slightly. The next moment, that bizarre and jumbled world vanished.

Inside the Unbound Furnace, a multicolored human figure dashed by, surrounded by a fragrant breeze.

Xi Ping was startled by this big bright bird coming out of nowhere. He quickly turned to let the figure pass and took a close look. The skirt that had been torn because it was hard to walk in was very familiar, and he recognized that this individual was himself, having shocked the whole Lingyang River with his flight at the House of Overflowing Splendor.

Xi Ping suddenly found that his mortal self's running footsteps were very heavy. Though he was young and lively, his each and every movement looked subtly uncoordinated to his present self. The sparse spiritual energy brushed shoulders with him and went by as though it had nothing to do with him. First he smelled rouge and powder, then the "human odor" under the cosmetics—a trace of sweat, not yet unpleasant, but which would undoubtedly begin to stink in a day or two if left unwashed.

Next, the "big bright bird" stepped onto a sword, the eye-searing gauze dress removed, the cosmetics vanished. Xi Ping saw himself fly up on a sword and become a half-immortal. Spiritual energy passed through his spiritual eyes and meridians and was once again set free. There was a faint layer of spiritual light over him, constantly peeling off the dust and stains that settled on him.

Then Xi Ping saw his sword-flying self change once again, a qin that shared an origin with him appearing in his hands. His hair suddenly grew longer, and his aura suddenly deepened, connecting like a whirlpool to the surrounding spiritual energy; he turned his head carelessly to look back—this was his current appearance.

Xi Ping was stunned. He found that his sense of “physicality” was disappearing bit by bit.

The body of a mortal was like the fruit he had held in his hand when he had landed in the Unbound Furnace, flesh and blood that could age and rot. There were always parts of that body being worn away and renewed. It would stink if unwashed, the skin would have blemishes, the tips of the hair and fingers would dry up. That terror of the possibility of deteriorating at any moment was precisely that “physicality,” exceptionally vital because it was at death’s door.

In comparison, a timeless and unblemished established foundation immortal was like a cold white spirit statue. Even with several parts broken off his body, his flesh and blood spilled all over the Unbound Furnace, he still no longer had that physicality.

Just then, golden light flashed before Xi Ping’s eyes. The surging spiritual energy slowed hundreds upon thousands of times in his eyes and was magnified hundreds upon thousands of times. After breaking apart and reconstructing sound and color, the Unbound Furnace was taking aim at “spiritual energy.”

After slowing and magnifying, Xi Ping saw that so-called “spiritual energy” consisted of countless tiny points of light held in the wind.

Mortals, plants, and beasts also contained those points of light. Just a few fragmentary bits were enough to allow them to grow and multiply without end. And that little bit was all they wanted. No matter how dense the points of light around them, they couldn’t seep into their bodies.

But a half-immortal could voluntarily draw in and expel spiritual energy. The “points of light” traveled through their meridians. The vast majority of them were once again released into the surroundings, but a small amount of the spiritual energy light points would stay behind within their flesh and bones, lighting up the dim mortal bones bit by bit—this was the most important aspect of an open-eyed half-immortal’s cultivation: cleansing and refining their spiritual bones.

And at the established foundation level and above, a cultivator’s whole body was soaked in the light points of spiritual energy, with their own internal cycle of it. As they insatiably absorbed new spiritual energy to merge with their essence, their essence became richer and richer, but the cultivator’s boundaries became blurred, gradually trending in the direction of merging with the spiritual energy outside of them.

Xi Ping had just felt faint discomfort when he saw a hand glowing with golden light reach over and gently touch his eyelids.

The light points of spiritual energy once again slowed and magnified. Xi Ping was startled: he found that these points of light were formed of minute inscriptions clumping together.

Though he had never deliberately studied, he still had some experience. After all, the Sanyue Immortal Mountains were known as the foremost home of inscriptions in the world. On his way, he had seen many inscriptions of all grades, but he hadn't seen a single one of these miniature inscriptions!

The next moment, the golden light flashed again. The person in front of Xi Ping disappeared, and the immortal mountains rose sharply from the earth.

Sanyue, Xuanyin...the bodies of the mountains were transparent, flooded with those tiny inscriptions. A part of them were stuffed into the spiritual stone mines within the mountains, and a part permeated the veins of the earth, spreading outward to the whole country.

Xi Ping abruptly raised his head and said to the woman who couldn't answer, "Senior, do you mean that the higher your cultivation gets, the more you'll be assimilated by the spiritual mountains?"

The woman didn't respond, smiling silently.

Xi Ping waited a moment, saw that she didn't react, then knew that he had probably misunderstood.

“No?” A little frustrated, he pinched the center of his brow, frowning as he scrutinized the spiritual energy flowing past him. “I'm a hopeless amateur when it comes to inscriptions. I wish san-ge were here...”

As he whispered, he idly scooped with his hand. He scooped up a handful of the tiny inscriptions in the spiritual energy light points. Then Xi Ping gave a sudden cry—he found that those miniature inscriptions were repelling him. First they tried to slip out of his hand. Then they were absorbed by force by the powerful essence of an established foundation cultivator, unwillingly merging into his palm.

Only then did Xi Ping find that there were all different kinds of inscriptions among the tiny ones in the spiritual energy light points, but they were all out of place next to the spiritual energy inside him. After being absorbed by him, the external spiritual energy inscriptions were first assimilated as they struggled, and only then were channeled into his meridians.

Xi Ping's thoughts moved quickly: Yes, his way wasn't among the three thousand paths of the Great Way. Even using spiritual energy didn't seem so legitimate; there was an extra step involved.

This time, when Xi Ping looked up at the images of the spiritual mountains, he saw Sanyue and Xuanyin flooded with the three thousand paths of the Great Way, all taking different roads to reach the same end. At the roots of the mountains there was also an enormous spiritual seal, composed of countless identical tiny inscriptions. Through the veins of the earth, they permeated out toward the whole country, obeying the terrain of the mountains and rivers, outlining the borders of the spiritual mountains.

Xi Ping turned to the woman next to him: "Whose way lies at the roots of the spiritual mountains? Is it that of the full moon sages?"

Almost imperceptibly, the woman nodded.

So that was it. This was just what Zhuoming had said—"Heaven and earth are locked in constant struggle."

The way of the spiritual mountains was the way of the sages. In the Great War of Gods and Demons, all cultivators had been struggling for power. Afterward, with their Way of the Heart as a basis, the winners gathered countless spiritual stones in one place and constructed the spiritual mountains, got a hold over the territory through the veins of the earth, grasping all of creation in the palms of their hands.

What the ancient sages and demonic gods had been struggling over was authority!

There hadn't been a full moon sage on earth for thousands of years, because the spiritual mountains were already in control. The present shed skins could only spend their remaining years drawing ever closer to the ways of the sages. But no matter how they were pruned, even if their Way of the Heart had been inherited from the sage to begin with, the course of their lives being different, after hundreds and thousands of years, there would always be slight deviations, so they could never completely merge with the spiritual mountains.

“So the reason Xiang Rong cooked himself in the Unbound Furnace was so that he could reconstruct his Way of the Heart to match the Black Emperor's!”

No wonder he hadn't wiped away the traces of Hui Xiangjun's Way of the Heart after all these years.

Xi Ping said, “Senior, will a melon picked out of season still serve?”

The traces in the golden light couldn't answer him. Perhaps it was Xi Ping's mistake, but the woman's figure seemed to become a little clearer. He saw her face... Her features looked very similar to Qiu Sha's, just a little more delicate. Perhaps Qiu Sha had been imitating her looks.

“Then...what is your true Way of the Heart?”

Dissolving everything, reconstructing everything?

If she hadn't come to a premature end, would she ultimately have been able to refine all the great spiritual mountains, unifying all of creation, renaming it “eternal spring brocade” in its entirety?

For some reason, perhaps because his heart wasn't one with the spiritual mountains and he was purely seeking knowledge, Xi Ping kept thinking there was something wrong.

He had a powerful intuition that this Unbound Furnace...was missing something.

“Senio...”

Before Xi Ping could finish, a hurricane unexpectedly arose in the Unbound Furnace, sweeping away the woman in the golden light.

At the same time, it was as if he was shredded to pieces. It turned out that after a moment, Xiang Rong had already discovered the change in the Unbound Furnace. With a single thought, this new full moon sage could mobilize any spiritual energy within Western Chu's borders.

Xi Ping's body outside the furnace...and even that reincarnation wood branch that was less than a thumb's length were turned to powder simultaneously. The fire inside the furnace abruptly went out!

The scenes inside the Unbound Furnace disappeared with a rumble. The boundlessly extended time collapsed backward, unifying with the outside world.

Xi Ping didn't even have time to react. His body and form scattered entirely.

When he had been shattered by Zhao Yin at the bottom of the Impassable Sea, his consciousness had been dreaming inside the star stone. There had been no pain. A thread of his consciousness had ended up in Yuzhou, and when he woke up, he didn't remember anything. This time, the part of him that was hidden inside the Unbound Furnace knew exactly what had happened. He well and truly "died" this time.

When pain reaches a certain point, it can overwhelm a person's mind. In an instant, all of Xi Ping's thoughts flew away. His mind was a complete blank.

But a dark red lotus stalk stretched outward from the small segment of his body inside the furnace, crawling up the nape of his neck like a tattoo.

CHAPTER 134 - Eternal Flame (16)

When the furnace fire went out, it meant that the Unbound Furnace's protection over Xi Ping was also gone. Never mind one of those two masters dealing him a blow, even a breeze could have crushed him to bits.

But when the lotus stalk crawled out, a weak flame once again kindled in the depths of the Unbound Furnace's big cauldron.

It wasn't as flashy as when Xi Ping had jumped in. The flames of the furnace fire that Zhuoming had lit were very subdued, only a thin layer spread over the bottom of the furnace, which was as deep as a person was tall. They didn't even disturb the inscriptions on top of the Unbound Furnace.

Twining around Xi Ping's injuries, the lotus stalk hid inside the thin fire as if curling up underwater in a pond. It touched Xi Ping's blood and paused for a moment. Then the blood disappeared at the sharp tip of the lotus stalk, as if it had been absorbed by this long stalk that was like a parasitic vine.

Then the lotus stalk seemed to succeed in controlling its instincts. It gave up on burrowing into the wound and quickly crawled over to the center of Xi Ping's brow.

“Hey—”

In chaos, Xi Ping heard a voice, but he truly had no strength to respond.

“...wake up...”

Who?

“Are you waking up...”

“Wake...”

“Tai Sui!”

The name “Tai Sui” provoked a soft sound from the Tai Sui Qin. The music flitted through Xi Ping’s hopelessly shattered consciousness, struggling to pull him together, leading him to follow the sound to its origin. In the midst of this to-and-fro struggle, Xi Ping abruptly trembled—the blood red lotus stalk had relentlessly pierced the center of his brow, even making a hole in his skull. Then the lotus stalk pressed an unknown talisman directly onto Xi Ping’s spirit.

He was like a person who had already stopped breathing shocked back upright by a bolt of lightning. His consciousness abruptly curled up.

“Has he come back to life?” he heard Zhuoming whisper to himself. “Tsk, I don’t think that was enough. Again.”

Xi Ping thought, Da-ge, don’t...

But before he could respond, Zhuoming’s lotus stalk, which had come out of nowhere, gave him another blow, as nimble as when he was cutting off his own flesh.

Xi Ping blurted out a Jinping curse.

Zhuoming only heard him vaguely groan something and said, “I don’t understand. I’ve forgotten all the Wan I learned when I was little. Translate it for me.”

Xi Ping said, “...May your ancestral tombs burn.”

“Did your wits boil away?” Zhuoming retorted. “I don’t even have ancestors, never mind tombs.”

Xi Ping: “...”

“You’re very reckless. If I hadn’t left a portion of my consciousness with you beforehand, those two would have cooked you soon enough.” The insane bald flower was having one of his intermittent normal periods. He sighed. “Right in front of the only true full moon god in the world, you lit a towering fire in the Unbound Furnace, as if you were worried no one would notice. Listen, are you crazy? Fortunately, your life is not yet meant to come to an end. I, Lovesickness, was here to awaken you...”

“Stop it, I was wrong, I, I-I’m crazy.” Xi Ping felt that if he got a reputation for being “awakened by lovesickness,” he really would be better off dying here. He quickly took a breath and weakly forced a change of subject. “You didn’t say before that the sect leader might reach a full moon position!”

“Are you joking?” Zhuoming retorted sternly. “High Elder Xuanwu didn’t even realize it, so how could I have? Am I an eclipse...”

The speed of Zhuoming’s speech didn’t change at all, but the final word “eclipse” seemed to tear his throat. His voice came to an abrupt halt before he could finish. The lotus stalk twined around Xi Ping’s wounds loosened.

Xi Ping quickly used his single remaining left arm to pull the lotus stalk back. “Hey, Lovesickness, what’s going on? Why did you go off key?”

But Zhuoming didn’t speak again.

On the summit, without hesitation, Xuanwu drained away all of the essence his disciple's survival depended on. The blood-colored Silver Moon lit up strangely, backing his curved blade.

And in the lotus pond on the East Peak, the lotuses congesting the pond all burst into bloom in unison. Inside every white lotus that lacked a stamen, Zhuoming's face appeared, turned upward.

Next, the lotus flowers, lotus leaves, and Zhuoming's faces all seemed to be burned by the moonlight. Wounds like full moon scabs were constantly expanding. Zhuoming was entirely unmoved. In the blink of an eye, most of the skin on his faces had been corroded, revealing blackening bones beneath. Still wearing a strange smile, he said to himself, "Shizun..."

He had been born an invalid, his mother a mistress kept by an unworthy son from a collateral branch of the Xiang clan. His bones were soft, able to bend into any shape, but he couldn't stand upright or walk.

His mother was a plaything meticulously trained from childhood. The only expression she knew was "smiling." She would smile when beaten, keep the corners of her lips unmoving when humiliated; she had worn a dimpled smile right up to her death. After she died, for the sake of reputation, his father's official wife had brought him home.

His paramount spiritual sense had sniffed out the heavy scent of death on one of the retainers. From kindness, he had smiled regretfully at this person.

That person died that same night, so a rumor somehow got started that he was a monster. Whoever he smiled at would die. The nobles couldn't keep far enough away from him. The servants couldn't avoid him and also didn't dare to offend him, so they developed all kinds of "methods" for dealing with him.

"Don't talk to him, don't meet his eyes. No matter what he does, act like you can't see."

Every time someone caused offense and was assigned to look after him, they would receive the well-meaning instructions of their seniors.

After that, indeed, no one else died, so everyone became even more convinced that these methods were effective. Therefore, he became a person who "didn't exist." He lay there every day, neither tears, nor laughter, nor anger, nor cursing getting the least reaction. Gradually, he learned without being taught how to use people's fear; he "cursed" a menial worker into falling seriously ill. At last, he could command them.

He was like his mother, having only one expression. She had only known how to charm, and he only knew how to frighten.

Until the Immortal Xuanwu descended from the skies to the mortal world.

While the whole household didn't dare to raise their heads, seeking to assert his presence as usual, he raised his soft, deformed legs to rest on his shoulders, and spat out a "heresy," like a big spider: "Exalted, can you guess whether my head is right-side up or upside-down?"

Immortal Xuanwu looked out from behind his also very peculiar mask, gazed at him for a moment, then calmly responded, "Right-side up. Why don't you put those down?"

That gaze taught Zhuoming how to wail.

Afterward, he went up the immortal mountains, learned the whole gamut of human emotions, learned to express his own sensations like an ordinary person—this wasn't easy; after all, no one knew how the world looked to his eyes; the words and sentences he could construct were limited. So he studied all the formalized languages in the world, for the sake of gathering some appropriate words from among them, to tell shizun what he saw, what he comprehended.

He opened his spiritual eyes and was able to run and jump, but he didn't care to go out to travel and see something of the world. Because he had to cultivate all kinds of powers night and day, desperately refine his spiritual bones, to win a drop of praise from his taciturn shifu—he had become addicted to that.

Except that...it turned out that what shifu had been praising wasn't him, and his expectations hadn't been directed toward him, either. It was because the poisonous lotus seed in the Silver Moon would soon have a new sacrifice.

“Shizun.” Beneath the fatal moonlight, Zhuoming's tongue couldn't move nimbly; his voice became slurred. “Can you guess whether my head is right-side up or upside-down?”

Xuanwu had no time to attend to him. These words floated out lightly, like when he was young, getting no reply.

The Silver Moon had nearly seized the brilliance of the white moon in the sky. The divine tool that had been corroded for thousands of years by the demonic god's seed seemed to have betrayed the spiritual mountains, coating Xuanwu's curved blade as it slashed at Xiang Rong.

“Your head?” Just then, the Misty Willow’s voice sounded in Zhuoming’s ears. “What’s wrong with your head now? Look at the state of things, can we stop fiddling with your head already?”

“It’s nothing. I’m just dying.” Zhuoming came back to himself. Looking at the pond full of lotuses being turned to ashes along with his true body by the “moonlight,” he smiled slightly. With something of the madness of looking death calmly in the face, he said softly, “Shizun has taken his essence from me. My true body has already rotted in the silver moonlight. All that’s left is a remaining bit of consciousness. Without a bit of consciousness left outside, you can’t light the furnace. There’s nothing for it, you’d better prepare yourself. I’ll count down. Ten...”

Xi Ping: “...”

Don’t be so sudden about it.

But before he could start thinking up countermeasures, the fire in the Unbound Furnace was once again extinguished. The astral wind from Xuanwu’s blade mercilessly swept toward him!

Xi Ping howled, “Weren’t you counting down from ten?!”

“One. I said it was a countdown, not that it was a countdown of ten digits.”
The lotus spirit who didn’t know how to count gave a rueful sigh, as if giving it up. “Everyone below a shed skin is an ant. In a cultivation sect, might is indeed everything. You and I, the two of us, ha...”

The astral wind crashed against the edge of the Unbound Furnace. The Unbound Furnace was sent flying.

On the bottom of the furnace, Xi Ping, covered in blood and gore and tangled all over with lotus stalks, flew up. Inescapable murderous intent condensed over their heads.

“Who are you calling...part of ‘the two of us’?!”

In a flash, at the foot of the Central Peak surrounded by chaos, in the cracks in the stones, on the cliffs, even in the rivers and streams—countless hidden green ore pellets simultaneously split open. Each green ore pellet contained a reincarnation wood seed. Xi Ping had hidden these on his way up the mountain.

The seeds were activated by the almost untraceable bit of spiritual energy in the green ore slag, putting down roots and sprouting in every nook and cranny!

Xi Ping's consciousness instantly filled the whole of the Central Peak. When the gust from the blade had nearly reached his hair, the fire in the Unbound Furnace once again began to burn.

Once again, a hidden realm cut off from the outside world formed inside the furnace. The Unbound Furnace rolled away and landed with a bang.

Xi Ping took a big breath and fell onto the bottom of the furnace. "I don't believe it."

The end of his sentence was covered up by a loud sound. The curved blade, wrapped in the light of the Silver Moon, came down on Xiang Rong.

Xiang Rong didn't try to dodge. His gigantic form brought its palms together, catching the curved Silver Moon blade between them.

Two identical countenances faced each other in the moonlight. Next, the full moon sage's consciousness pressed down with a will like the spiritual mountains, trying to wash away the "blemish" on the Silver Moon.

The moonlight at the tip of Xuanwu's blade dimmed. The bloody light of the Silver Moon became weaker and weaker—

The Sanyue Mountains resonated with the sect leader's angry shout, like the tolling of a large bell: "Silver Moon, return to position!"

The Silver Moon under Xuanwu's control trembled. As if waking from a dream, it abruptly broke away from Xuanwu's blade.

The curved blade—Xuanwu's vital weapon—broke.

Xuanwu's flesh seemed unable to contain the surging spiritual energy within him. Starting at his hands holding the blade, his flesh began to crack. He flew away like a snow-white kite whose string had snapped.

But the features that were already obscured by blood wore a strange smile.

Inside the Unbound Furnace, Zhuoming's dying consciousness looked out from the limp lotus stalk at the Misty Willow...with his remaining head and half a shoulder.

Outside the furnace, the sky was falling and the earth was cracking, but Xi Ping turned a deaf ear onto it. Not very skillfully, he controlled the fire of the Unbound Furnace, making the fire burn on his wounds.

Time inside the Unbound Furnace once again disconnected from the outside world. Constellations revolved and stars moved within the furnace.

The distant golden light circled above him, wildly surging spiritual energy steadily pouring in, merging his body. New bones grew bit by bit from his wounds.

He held Zhuoming's lotus stalk in his hand. Zhuoming could feel that this young Misty Willow was as tense as iron all over, but he didn't make a sound.

Suddenly, he felt the Misty Willow's "leaves" moving. He seemed to be having another chat with someone.

Zhuoming identified the direction the Misty Willow's "leaves" were swaying in. "...Zhou Ying?"

"I'm..." Xi Ping's sweat evaporated in the fire of the Unbound Furnace as soon as it fell. "I'm asking him to help me calculate, how many sp... spiritual...spiritual stones I need to become an ascended spirit. This time... I...can make a big profit...cultivating with public funds."

The next moment, there was a rumble. A bolt out of the blue fell on the Unbound Furnace—but no one cared, because lightning was striking everywhere on the crest of the Central Peak.

After thoroughly stripping itself of the Heartless Lotus and returning to position on the summit of the Central Peak, the Silver Moon was blazing brightly. The Unbound Furnace was struck by the “moonlight” with a bang.

But the flames lit inside the furnace by Xi Ping held out without extinguishing. In this brief moment, he had grown a right arm. The circulation of spiritual energy linked up in his upper body.

Next came his thorax, abdomen...

Outside the Unbound Furnace, the light of the Silver Moon had mercilessly turned on Xiang Rong!

Xuanwu’s off-key laughter echoed among the mountains. “Sect Leader shixiong, did you think that the Silver Moon was hostile toward you because of the Heartless Lotus? One set of spiritual mountains can only have one true full moon god. In your futile attempt to wipe away the traces of His Majesty the Black Emperor and become the master of Sanyue, what did you think the Silver Moon would take you for?”

The rest of his words were drowned in the sound of thunder as dense as rain.

But Zhuoming still heard him clearly—he could always hear the voices others couldn't hear.

“Starting from the day a set of spiritual mountains forms, they carry a curse. Xuanyin will sink into ceaseless internal strife, while in Sanyue, this single-plank bridge leading to heaven, there will ultimately be a falling out between teacher and disciple, between brother and brother. The spiritual mountains left behind by the Black Emperor want to eliminate Xiang Rong, Xiang Rong plots to make Xuanwu expose his ambitions, while Xuanwu has spent three hundred years looking after me and has finally found a use for me... They really are boring, aren't they?” The successor of the Heartless Lotus used his remaining consciousness to keep an unwavering watch on Xi Ping, almost greedily listening to the creaks of his new and old joints grinding against each other. He softly said, “Allow me to give you a hint. While the fire in the Unbound Furnace can indeed block the moonlight, jade must be cut and polished before it can have worth. Without a heavenly tribulation, an established foundation cannot ascend his spirit. That is a fixed rule.”

To go from an established foundation to an ascended spirit, you had to make all kinds of preparations. Even disciples in the spiritual mountains with elders watching over them had to make ready to face near-certain death. Was there really a person who could simultaneously endure reconstructing his bones and flesh and a heavenly tribulation?

Zhuoming's voice became a little more serious. "For the sake of safety, you had better not be in such a hurry to become an ascended spirit now. Let's..."

Before he could finish, the lotus stalk was abruptly pulled up by Xi Ping and tossed into the fire on one side of the furnace.

Then the furnace fire protecting them opened a crack, and a bolt of lightning struck perfectly through that crack, directly hitting Xi Ping.

He had by now grown an upper body. His legs were still bone. The new flesh was instantly charred. The fragile leg bones broke with a snap and burned to charcoal and ashes.

It seemed he had spent his whole life snatching chestnuts out of the fire. He didn't know how to write the word "safety."

An ascended spirit would at least have a chance of survival. If he remained safe and held on to his life now, when these two were finished fighting, where could he run to?

Moreover, he had to bring the Unbound Furnace back with him today, or else what would remain of all these gods?!

The furnace fire had opened a crack to allow the heavenly lightning to pass through, yet it burned all the more lavishly.

A thin qin string appeared at Xi Ping's fingertips and skillfully sliced away at the charred, rotting flesh. Spiritual energy flowed into the Unbound Furnace like a river. New bones and flesh were growing rapidly from his wounds, but the second bolt of heavenly lightning was coming!

Zhuoming laughed quietly. "The ungovernable way."

At the same time, the sound of the Silver Moon wrestling with the new full moon sage even overwhelmed the sound of thunder. An angry shout came from Sanyue's veins of the earth: "I said, Silver Moon, return to position—"

The Silver Moon in full bloom was suppressed.

The flashing lightning lit Xiang Rong's face snow-white. Drained of color, he looked even more like Xuanwu.

The spiritual mountains were thousands of years old. Amid the cries of distress of generation upon generation of the people, the mountains had rotted and become decrepit. Western Chu, this patch of earth where winner took all, seemed about to become the possession of a newly born divinity.

CHAPTER 135 - Eternal Flame (17)

To keep the ascended spirit heavenly tribulation from cooking Zhuoming's remaining consciousness, Xi Ping entrusted the heartless lotus's stalk to a small cluster of flames far away at the bottom of the Unbound Furnace.

So right now, the safest place in all the Sanyue Mountains was occupied by a slender lotus stalk.

Zhuoming curled up like a snake. As he changed his point of view to look on as the spiritual mountains passed to their new owner, he smelled cooked flesh up close.

“Doesn't smell good at all,” he judged regretfully. “Maybe there's not enough oil.”

Xi Ping: “...”

How annoying. His jaws were locked; he couldn't open his mouth to curse.

There were no more people left on the Central Peak now. The Silver Moon was struggling to the death in Xiang Rong's hands.

In the imperial city in the capital of Dongheng, eighty-one coiled dragon columns trembled. No one in the whole country dared to go to sleep. Winter had already started, but the temperature was like at midday during the hottest days of summer. A hot wind swept along the Xia River, charged over the snow-wrapped mountain range at the very north of Western Chu, and collided with a cold wave from Northern Li and vapor from Southern Wan. All along the borders, winds rose and clouds scuttled. The sky seemed to be falling. It was raining everywhere. The Xia River, after a summer of calm, seemed ready to rise!

“My goodness, the winter thunder is rumbling. A new full moon sage has appeared in Sanyue. What will happen now? Truly, I feel bad on behalf of the other shed skins,” the lotus stalk chattered on with some glee at the misfortunes of others. “Before, Sanyue, the venom-breeding sect of the divine mountains, hoarded all the resources in the country. Will it be looking to combine the five great spiritual mountains into one now? When only one range of spiritual mountains remains, those at their summits will truly be able to touch the heavens. Do you think those shed skins will want to dispose of this new full moon sage as though he were a great demon, or will they try to become the next full moon sage as soon as possible, by hook or by crook? If it’s the latter, that will be quite a sight to see. After all, the other spiritual mountains don’t have Sanyue’s bottomless greed. They haven’t saved up a whole nation’s spiritual energy in their own backyards to use as they like. The fur will really fly, won’t it?”

Xi Ping didn't respond, because just then, the second bolt of heavenly lightning fell, even stronger than the first, baking him into a piece of coal.

“How fortunate that I can't breathe right now, or I'd blow you away.”
Zhuoming tsked. The lotus stalk carefully avoided the sparks splashing everywhere and said, sighing, “As I see it, the appearance of a full moon sage is a hundred times worse than the great demon in the Impassable Sea coming back to life. Demons give immortals a chance to affirm their righteousness, while sages drag people down to the level of demons—hey, do you think the Silver Moon will win, or Xiang Rong?”

Before the third bolt of heavenly lightning could fall, Xi Ping quickly shook the ashes off himself. He was a quick study, becoming more and more practiced at regenerating after being crushed. The fire in the Unbound Furnace strengthened steadily. The speed at which his flesh and bones regenerated was constantly reaching new heights.

When the first bolt of heavenly lightning had fallen, Xi Ping had been struck so hard he had been even worse off than when he'd first jumped into the Unbound Furnace, unable to keep a human form; when the second bolt of lightning fell, while his flesh was burned black, his bones had held out; such that before the third bolt of heavenly lightning could fully ferment, he had already reconstructed himself into a human shape and could even move— with difficulty, he pulled out a pill and swallowed it.

Zhuoming had never seen this kind of pill. Curiously, he asked, “That isn’t a protective pill...and it isn’t a lightning repelling pill, so what did you just take?”

Xi Ping’s newly grown throat made a noise like rusty iron grinding against itself: “...mind calming.”

The mind calming pill was an open-eyed grade elixir that could be used by mortals. Its function was to clear and invigorate the mind, little better than strong tea.

Zhuoming, who had been the direct disciple of a high elder since beginning to cultivate, had naturally never seen it, so he asked, “Does it taste good? What does it do?”

“Calms...hff, the mind...and...steadies the...emotions...ugh...you’re annoying me to death!” Before Xi Ping could finish, the third bolt of heavenly lightning fell.

Zhuoming was stunned. This bolt of lightning was stronger than the previous two put together, making a sound that vibrated through the Unbound Furnace for a long time, like a mountain collapsing.

Xi Ping, who had just been talking to him, was pounded into a pile of fragments.

The heartless lotus's stalk backed away. "Hey, listen, isn't there something wrong with this heavenly tribulation of yours?"

Zhuoming had made off with the heartless lotus inside the Silver Moon and had entered what practically amounted to a monster's way, yet when he had become an ascended spirit, there still hadn't been such a major event. If not for the special hidden bones belonging to the ungovernable way, those three bolts of lightning would have finished off the Misty Willow here and now.

The heavenly tribulation didn't seem intent on "testing" him; it seemed to want to strike him dead.

Sparks kept burning on the fragments of flesh and bone scattered throughout the furnace, connecting to the fire of the Unbound Furnace. The fragments "circulated" among the flames as though they were floating in water. In the blink of an eye, they had once again gathered into a human form.

“I think you must have too much bad karma to be suited for passing through a heavenly tribulation.” Zhuoming spoke a little faster. “Stop, you...”

Rumble—

Before he could finish, the fourth bolt of heavenly lightning spilled onto Xi Ping without leaving him even the time to take a breath to speak, and the fifth bolt of heavenly lightning was following hard on its heels, already overhead.

Hidden bones didn't mean you couldn't die, or else Yuan Hui wouldn't have passed away in the East Sea. The ungovernable way wouldn't give any better treatment to an ordinary young man a thousand years later.

Especially since Xi Ping's hidden bones were attached to his consciousness. A consciousness wasn't inextinguishable.

The fourth bolt of heavenly lightning stamped out the fire in the Unbound Furnace—this meant that Xi Ping's awareness had wavered; his consciousness was in danger.

The first two bolts of heavenly lightning had given him the impression that he could pass through the tribulation. The third and fourth bolts had strengthened precipitously, simply crushing his awareness, not giving him a chance to hide in the fire of the Unbound Furnace. The fifth bolt meant to kill him... It wasn't that it "seemed" that way; the heavenly lightning was deliberately coming for his life!

As soon as the furnace fire went out, the light of the Silver Moon quickly shone in. The lotus stalk was forced to cling to the side of the Unbound Furnace. Zhuoming was so dazzled by the lightning that he could no longer see what state Xi Ping was in. The deadliest bolt of lightning fell.

In that moment, even a paramount spiritual sense couldn't see how he could survive. This mere ascended spirit tribulation was actually more shocking than the spiritual mountains changing hands.

A thought crossed Zhuoming's mind: What a pity...

But just then, by coincidence, the Silver Moon, having been subdued by Xiang Rong, started a fresh round of resisting to the death. The Sanyue Mountain Range...even the better part of Western Chu's territory began to shake and tremble.

Mountain ridges split apart, lofty towers folded like paper. Without its furnace fire, the Unbound Furnace had lost its foundation. It was lifted and sent flying by the roiling mountain wind, just missing the heavenly lightning.

The lotus stalk was tossed up along with the Unbound Furnace. Next, a charred hand reached out and grabbed the end of the lotus stalk. The fire in the Unbound Furnace once again kindled.

Zhuoming was dumbfounded. He finally caught his breath. “Misty Willow, I think you ought to acknowledge Xiang Rong as your benefactor!”

The fingers covered in coal dust were unbelievably nimble. Upon hearing these words, they tied the heartless lotus’s stalk into an enchanting knot at a speed too fast for even an ascended spirit to perceive.

Zhuoming didn’t bother bickering with him. “The Unbound Furnace’s fire can block heavenly lightning. Now, while your consciousness is still holding out, break off the ascension...what? Did you just say something?”

“I said...sit down...and...hold on tight!”

Hardly had these words been spoken than the fire in the Unbound Furnace once again went out altogether. The whole cauldron of the Unbound Furnace rolled down with the collapsing cliff. The moment was perfectly chosen. It perfectly sidestepped the sixth bolt of heavenly lightning.

After dodging two bolts of lightning in a row, Xi Ping's rapidly-repairing hidden bones had already come together. He actually stood up in one piece.

“You can do that?” Zhuoming came back to himself. In the gap between the lightning flash and the moonlight, he began to laugh. “My mistake. With the filial piety Xiang Rong has shown, he’s the one who ought to acknowledge you as his benefactor!”

The disintegrating spiritual stones of the spiritual mountains were caught up by the Unbound Furnace like moths drawn to a flame and turned to dust before they could even touch Xi Ping.

Following his previously established pattern, Xi Ping once again extinguished the fire in the Unbound Furnace, allowing the furnace to tumble into the valley.

When the seventh bolt of heavenly lightning fell, he could already get out the Tai Sui Qin. This time, a soundless image of a sword flew straight out and struck the cliff. The spiritual energy became a hurricane, pushing the Unbound Furnace hundreds of zhang away.

Xi Ping’s newly grown hair floated up in response to the heavenly lightning near at hand.

And at the same time, Xiang Rong made a two-handed seal and cried out for the third time, “Return to position!”

That vital curved blade of his that so resembled Xuanwu’s suddenly appeared as though cutting through empty space, slashing at the Silver Moon, smashing this most honorable divine tool that no one had dared to face directly in thousands of years against the Central Peak.

The Central Peak snapped.

The Slumbering Dragon Sea and the South Sea roared as they crashed against the land. The Xia River instantly burst its banks. At the borders of Li, Wan, and Shu, the walkers in the mortal world had evacuated, and ascended spirits were holding the line. The shed skins, who had descended en masse to the mortal world, stabilized the wavering border inscriptions. The waters of the rivers and seas were frozen in midair.

As the sky fell and the earth cracked, the Unbound Furnace was buried by the broken mountain. The enraged heavens threw down an eighth bolt of lightning, which smashed all the spiritual stones within dozens of zhang!

This buffer had been plenty. Xi Ping didn’t light the furnace fire. The Tai Sui Qin entered close combat with the heavenly lightning. Xi Ping’s hand bones and spine shattered along with the heavenly lightning but were once again restored after a breath. His tongue and throat at last healed up entirely in the struggle. “Come at me!”

The fire in the Unbound Furnace was kindled once more. Zhuoming opened his eyes amid the dazzling lightning. Xi Ping had actually jumped out; all that remained in the furnace was a piece of reincarnation wood with his consciousness attached to maintain the flames.

A bronze-colored bloody shadow flitted over the white moon in the sky, but it was only for an instant. Then it was masked by the light that had surpassed the blazing sun. And the other “moon” on earth had just now been pushed against the broken Central Peak by the new master of the spiritual mountains.

A hand as lustrous as a white spirit steadied the incessantly vibrating Unbound Furnace.

Zhuoming heard Xi Ping’s voice come from the reincarnation wood through his consciousness: “I don’t give a rat’s ass whether the old geezer or the big lamp wins. I only hope they’ll fight even harder... If they don’t knock a few cracks in the sky, won’t we all be crushed to death?”

As he spoke, the ninth bolt of heavenly lightning illuminated his face and caved in a corner of the spiritual mountains. Everything seemed to pause.

The spiritual mountains let out a sigh like a dying breath. Xiang Rong at last had the Silver Moon at his feet. The moonlight of that great divine tool was being steadily drawn away by Xiang Rong. The enormous statue of the Black Emperor on the cliff had already been destroyed. Xiang Rong hefted his blade one-handed and raised his head, divinity covering his expressionless face.

The consciousness of the full moon sage who had vanquished the spiritual mountains fell on Xi Ping at the same time as the final bolt of heavenly lightning.

The heavenly lightning struck Xi Ping's body, rebuilt after being destroyed, but it didn't strike as fast as he could reconstruct. No sooner were his meridians rent apart by the lightning than they reconnected, suddenly widening.

His already concentrated consciousness was transformed. His field of vision widened. In an instant, he felt the whole world become perfectly clear.

The movement of the Silver Moon, the movement of the spiritual mountains, the spiritual energy surging through the mountains, all of it was incredibly distinct.

In his eyes, the spiritual mountains, and even the whole of Dongheng, had become smaller—all of Western Chu had become smaller. His consciousness covered half of Western Chu in one sweep, touching distant Tao County.

The people of Tao County were gathered outside, gesticulating as they observed the sky, which had lit up in the middle of the night. Suddenly, they heard qin music coming from somewhere... It was genuine Chu music, loud and uncivilized, pushing and shoving.

Having avoided the Way of Heaven's deadly blow, the most bizarre ascended spirit in the world had emerged in the supremely lofty Sanyue Mountains.

He had torn open a corner of unfathomable fate. Xi Ping met Xiang Rong's eyes. From afar, he made a vulgar hand gesture toward Xiang Rong, of the kind that only a country farmer would understand.

The fatal moonlight fell, but Xi Ping and the Unbound Furnace had already moved. There was only a reincarnation wood sapling left behind. The tree was crooked and bent, maintaining its previous occupant's vulgar posture as it was dissolved by the moonlight.

Before, Xi Ping had only been able to move his consciousness through reincarnation wood. After becoming an ascended spirit, he had learned without being taught how to simply swap places with his accompanying plant—he himself “grew” out of a little creek on the Central Peak.

Only then did the thunder, half a step behind the lightning, finally arrive, its ear-splitting torrent of abuse echoing through the mountains.

The next moment, Xi Ping once again disappeared from the water. Only a reincarnation wood tree remained. The little sapling was turned to ashes by the moonlight as soon as it appeared in the water, dissolving when the wind blew. Xi Ping, meanwhile, appeared on a cliff.

The moonlight clung to him like his shadow.

Before he could play the same trick again, there was a stab of pain in Xi Ping’s spirit. All the reincarnation wood he had left throughout the Sanyue Mountains disappeared. Xiang Rong knew who he was!

Xi Ping said, “Baldy, if you keep playing dead, you’re going to die for real!”

Xi Ping knew now that Zhuoming was all right—an ascended spirit’s true body could switch places with their accompanying plant; when Zhuoming had been “killed” by the Silver Moon, the lotus stalk with his consciousness in it had already been hidden in the Unbound Furnace’s fire.

In other words, that bit of lotus stalk had already quietly become Zhuoming’s true body.

Zhuoming said: “Water!”

Without so much as thinking about it, Xi Ping, holding the Unbound Furnace under his arm, jumped into the lake next to him. The lotus stalk inside the Unbound Furnace swam out and changed into human form. He instantly turned all the plants in the water into heartless lotuses, wildly growing a big tangle of dark red stalks and leaves, narrowly blocking the light of the Silver Moon for a moment.

Zhuoming took this opportunity to press his hand to the bottom of the lake. A series of inscriptions that had been concealed at some point exploded with a rumble. Before the moonlight could pierce through all the stalks and leaves, he swept Xi Ping into the veins of the spiritual mountains.

Xi Ping’s vision blurred. Countless inscriptions flashed before his eyes. He seemed to touch the heart of the Sanyue Mountains.

The next moment, the two of them emerged from the lotus pond on the East Peak.

The lotus pond was full of the “corpses” of heartless lotuses. Though they were plants, they still gave off an acrid smell of blood.

Zhuoming, unmoved, waved a hand. The withered plants came back to life. At the same time, the full moon god’s spiritual energy struck the East Peak’s prohibition.

Once the Silver Moon had given him its allegiance, Xiang Rong had the whole of the spiritual mountains in his hands, apart from the East Peak—the prohibition on the East Peak had been built by Xuanwu over three centuries. It was enough to hold Xiang Rong up for a moment.

Xi Ping said, “Did you bury inscriptions throughout the whole water system of the Sanyue Mountains ahead of time? Do you have any other secret passages?”

Zhuoming pushed him underwater, out of the way of an astral wind that could have beheaded him. “No, that’s it!”

Xi Ping blew an air bubble that exploded in Zhuoming’s face. “So what do we do?”

Unwilling to be bested, Zhuoming also sprayed out an air bubble to return the explosion in kind. “Rely on Xuanwu. The East Peak is Xuanwu’s domain!”

“Does Xuanwu still have a backup plan left at this stage? What is it?”

“How would I know? Do you think he wears me over his heart?” Zhuoming howled. “The water’s so hot I’ve nearly been cooked. Stop spraying! Aren’t you from Wan? Why don’t you have any manners?”

The two ascended spirits sprayed back and forth in the tiny lotus pond, the air bubbles boiling the pond water.

“Who’s got time for manners? We’re about to cash in! If you don’t know anything, how could you dare to...”

Boom—

CHAPTER 136 - Eternal Flame (18)

After Zhuoming pulled him down to hide at the bottom of the lotus pond, Xi Ping didn't know what was going on outside, but he felt that the East Peak was also on the verge of collapse.

He felt that this whole business was very chancy. First of all, Xuanwu must have had no idea that the sect leader might reach a full moon position, or else White Hair wouldn't have offered himself up as fuel; second, no one had ever fought with a living full moon sage before, and if Xuanwu himself, wielding the Silver Moon, could still be flattened by Xiang Rong, then could a "backup plan" left behind by a shed skin who might already be dead be any use?

If it could be, then why hadn't Xuanwu used it already?

Just then, the lotus pond tilted. At the same time, the two of them heard an ominous snap from the depths of the mountain ridge. Next, the whole mountain began to topple to one side.

Xi Ping had the same feeling as when he had knocked down the precipice while learning to fly a sword on Flying Jade Peak's north slope. But this time, shifu wasn't here to catch him.

Xi Ping had used his consciousness to cover up the shard of Zhaoting in his spirit back when he had been broken into several chunks—the high general had spent his life bound by responsibility, with a heart as heavy as the spiritual mountains; if he had been permitted to see the chaotic scene within the Unbound Furnace then, he might have lost his mind on the spot. Unfortunately, Xi Ping’s consciousness had nearly shattered in the meantime. He had fainted briefly. So he really had no other choice now; he was deliberately putting on a show of arrogance for Zhaoting, pretending that he had everything under control. If not for that, when Xiang Rong’s consciousness had swept toward him, he would have run off in terror rather than provoke a full moon god as if he had nothing better to do.

He wanted to fly up, but he soon found that it was a waste of his strength—it was clear that all the spiritual energy in the Sanyue Spiritual Mountains now belonged to the Xiang family; he couldn’t control it.

This was the force of a full moon divinity against mere ascended spirits; he simply had the two of them stifled, turning them into mortals!

The water in the pond was in total chaos. Xi Ping threw off the reeking lotus roots wrapped around him. “Does Sanyue have another exit?”

“Yes,” said Zhuoming, “but where are you going to go?”

Xi Ping: "..."

Good question.

"Apart from Xuanwu's prohibition on the East Peak, which can hold out for a little while longer, never mind the Sanyue Mountains, there's no corner of Western Chu you could get to ahead of Xiang Rong," Zhuoming responded calmly. "Comparatively speaking, this is the safest place you can be. Can't you stop flopping around and quietly stay in the water for a while?"

Hardly had he finished speaking than "the safest place" also experienced a landslide. The boulders beside the pond, bound by ancient trees, dropped off the high cliff. Falling rocks made plops throughout the pond.

A monstrous plant like the heartless lotus couldn't survive in the mortal world to begin with. The aquatic plants Zhuoming could assimilate were limited to a space the size of the Sanyue Mountains. Xi Ping's reincarnation wood, on the other hand, was all over the world. In his current ascended spirit condition, he could even instantly retreat to Tao County. But he didn't dare. Any place an ascended spirit's consciousness could reach, a full moon sage's would only be faster than him, with greater range. He didn't dare to test whether the Law Breaker would be able to withstand a full moon sage. And even if the Law Breaker really could do it, as soon as Xiang Rong caught him trying to escape to Tao County, a hundred thousand soldiers of Western Chu's army would turn around and stamp it out.

Shifu, san-ge, the Luwu, the young mistress, er-nainai, the cook, and the minor merchants who made idle chat with him every day... Countless people swarmed into his mind.

Was there anything that could still impede Xiang Rong?

Boom—another loud rumble; the lotus pond began to fall in the other direction.

As they rocked left and right, Xi Ping could already clearly feel the mountain ridge snapping. If there was another shake, they would be splashed down the cliff!

“A little devil less than a hundred years old.” A little exasperated, Zhuoming batted aside the fragmentary bubbles Xi Ping had stirred up with his flopping. He sighed. His features were normal now, his expression very calm, as if he wasn't in a tight spot, about to be crushed by the spiritual mountains, but only waking up after an afternoon of meditation, filled with enlightenment.

His eyes emptily reflected Xi Ping. He suddenly tilted his head and asked, “How many people are there in your head?”

Xi Ping automatically leaned back, getting a little further away from him.

“Oh, don’t be nervous, I’m not that ‘shadow’ who ran off from Yu Family Bend. I can’t make people say what they’re thinking aloud.” Zhuoming gesticulated at his temples, as if he didn’t know how to express himself. “I can just vaguely see...”

Xi Ping knew that his san-ge could even use some method to determine others’ Ways of the Heart. He waved a hand to interrupt Zhuoming.

“That’s not important! We’re going to die, let’s think about how to...”

“Stop thinking. Do all you can, then resign yourself to fate—you’ve already done all that any two people could do. Why not wait and see?” Not letting him off, Zhuoming changed the subject back: “How many people do you know?”

“Wait for who? That shizun of yours is fit to be carried out in a coffin. You want to wait for Xuanyin’s people?” As if they were arm wrestling, Xi Ping once again wrenched the subject back. “Xuanyin only has two shed skins left now. Those two old men are getting on in age. They might not be able to defeat Xiang Rong. Anyway, with my country’s wretched attitude, if the two of them come, there's no saying whether they'll deal with Xiang Rong first or get rid of the two of us first..."

"Wow, you're so annoying." Zhuoming interrupted him once more and asked yet again, "Do you know many people?"

Xi Ping was just about to say something when he suddenly met Zhuoming's earnest eyes. Instantly, he realized that this lotus spirit had spent three hundred years in Sanyue, and it seemed that the only person around him had been Xuanwu.

"Since you can travel through Sanyue at will, why don't you go find someone to talk to when you're bored?"

Zhuoming's mouth opened to an arc that human mouths couldn't easily attain. He softly said, "I'd scare them to death."

The mountain ridge shook fiercely once again. Xi Ping was flung out and tossed toward the stones beside the lotus pond.

The lotus leaves immediately gathered together to cushion him softly.

Xi Ping said, "Can't you just not scare them?"

At the same time, he added the baldy in front of him to the pile of people troubling his mind. He thought, After all his dealings with Xuanwu, his background can't be called either orthodox or evil. What will happen to him?

As soon as this thought appeared in his mind, Zhuoming immediately "saw" something. His willow leaf eyes opened to a horrifying size, and his neck twisted.

But before he could say anything, the East Peak couldn't hold out any longer. The thunderclouds pierced the prohibition and burned the mountaintop black. Then a bolt of lightning took aim at the lotus pond!

The heartless lotuses wildly grew over a zhang in length at once, holding the two of them underwater. The flowers and leaves didn't unfold entirely. The lotus roots that had gathered into a cluster were cut apart by the astral wind.

Xi Ping was thrown several chi away and couldn't catch his breath at first. He futilely attempted to put a substitute paperman over himself.

But faced with ultimate power, all flourishes were jokes. Seven or eight layers of paperman broke at once. Several huge lotus leaves flew over to shield him, and they were no sturdier than the papermen. The lotus leaves taller than a person fell one after another, only sealing Xi Ping inside them, blocking his line of sight.

As he was busying himself, the summit of the East Peak, on the point of collapse, suddenly quieted. The chilling wind around him abruptly stopped.

Xi Ping said, "What..."

The next moment, sudden harsh light pierced the layers of lotus leaves covering him and stabbed into his eyes. For a moment, Xi Ping lost the use of all his senses. His mind was a blank, with only one thought remaining: the Silver Moon!

After managing to make it through to an ascended spirit, was he really going to be wiped out and turned to dust by that malicious moonlight like Qiu Sha?

Why?

Why did a weapon that could be tamed by a human represent the will of heaven? Why did it determine who was a sage and who was a demon? Why had it destroyed a year's provisions that a whole county had worked hard to produce? Why had it burned full moon scabs onto innocent little children whose lives had had to be bought back for a hundred thousand white spirits?

Was it just because it could bully those who were weaker but feared those who were stronger?

Xi Ping unconsciously curled up, futilely using his hands to shield the center of his brow—the shard of Zhaoting was still in his spirit...

Wait—hands? How come he still had hands?

With difficulty, Xi Ping opened his eyes and found to his astonishment that his limbs were all intact and hadn't been dissolved by the Silver Moon.

Now that the incomprehensible harsh light had passed, everything around him was pitch-black. With a thought, the spiritual energy in the area immediately came to crowd fawningly around him, removing the lotus leaves pressing on him. That feeling of being bound, as if he were suffocating, had also vanished. The sky was as clear as if it had been rinsed clean. After burning all night, the moon seemed to have exhausted itself. It was hidden behind the clouds. And dawn had yet to break. The Sanyue Mountains were as peaceful as if nothing had happened.

Xi Ping briefly exchanged a blank look with Zhuoming, who had fallen dozens of zhang away.

Like a snake, Zhuoming's neck stretched out to the height of a room, sending out his head with its paramount spiritual sense to scan the surroundings for a long moment. "Xiang Rong's aura seems to have disappeared."

"Huh?" said Xi Ping.

"Look for yourself."

Xi Ping tentatively extended his consciousness and glanced around. He saw that the empty Sanyue Spiritual Mountains were full of ruins. All the good-for-nothing Xiang family "masters" were hiding outside of the spiritual mountains. Tonight, if the common people in Dongheng City looked up, they might be able to see more immortals than streetlamps.

And Xiang Rong...that huge gas lamp of full moon divinity, was gone without a trace.

Just then, he heard yet another crack from the mountain ridge. Xi Ping immediately floated into the air on a fallen lotus leaf.

Then he found to his astonishment that the stones that had snapped off earlier were rapidly returning to position, the cracks closing up—in hardly any time, the summit had once again firmly come together.

Next it was the West Peak, the most heavily damaged Central Peak... The tumbled boulders were being drawn by some invisible force to resume to their original positions; the collapsed palaces and towers were methodically restored; among the spiritual mountains, the great mountain array that had burst altogether automatically “sewed itself up,” and the ruined inscriptions and arrays all returned... Finally, the Silver Moon slowly ascended above the Central Peak.

The great divine tool of the mountains was whole and unharmed, as if it had never been wedged into the middle of the mountain. Now that it had stripped off the heartless lotus, it even seemed “cleaner” than before.

The wounded spiritual mountains seemed to have obtained plentiful nourishment. They were healing themselves in an orderly fashion.

What was nourishing the spiritual mountains?

Xi Ping remembered what he had seen inside the Unbound Furnace, and a possibility suddenly occurred to him. He turned to look at Zhuoming. The senior inside the furnace had shaken her head at him then, so he'd thought he had guessed wrong—

Zhuoming sighed softly. "As expected. Once the full moon sage has vanquished the spiritual mountains, the next step is to be absorbed by the spiritual mountains."

"Wait," said Xi Ping, "I remember that the full moon sages before didn't disappear as soon as they crossed the boundary. Especially your sect's founder, the Black Emperor. After the spiritual mountains formed, didn't he go have a bout of wrestling with the Heartless Lotus?"

The corners of Zhuoming's mouth once again extended a little further toward the roots of his ears. A voice came from behind Xi Ping. "My guess is that's because the sages didn't barbecue their Ways of the Heart."

Xi Ping turned and dodged a lotus flower that had suddenly grown a mouth and started talking. The lotus brushed against him as it returned to the pond. Its petals were ice cold and slippery, as if there was some sticky liquid on them.

"The full moon sage came first, then came the spiritual mountains," a lotus leaf said softly. "The spiritual mountains were born because of the full moon sage. So after the sage has ascended, if along comes another new full moon sage with a Way of the Heart perfectly copied from the first one's, will the spiritual mountains take him for their new master? Or will they take him for a part of themselves?

“Heeheehee,” a lotus flower laughed so hard that water sprayed all around it. “I made a bet with the lotus leaves, and I won.”

“You already knew...” said Xi Ping.

“I didn't know. The flowers and the leaves made a bet. I was just waiting to see. You, me, the Late-Autumn Red...people like us always have to bet if we want to win, don't we?” Zhuoming took a deep breath. “Ah, how grateful I am to the sect leader for giving himself up to the spiritual mountains. Sanyue's spiritual energy is even denser than before.”

“I'm so happy!” said the mouth on the leaf.

“So happy...” Countless quiet voices sounded in the lotus pond, the clamor making layer upon layer of echoes. The echoing made Xi Ping break out in gooseflesh.

He watched as the Sanyue Spiritual Mountains were repaired as good as new in hardly any time. The towering shadows of the mountains still fell, impenetrably black, on Dongheng City. This was still the most well-favored place on earth.

Even though Sanyue was chaotic and preposterous, geniuses still came from all over to gather here. In a hundred years, in a thousand, perhaps another person would overcome their rivals and become the person in the immortal palace on the Central Peak who was closest to a full moon position... The cycle would have come full circle.

“You have what you wanted, and I also have what I wanted.” Zhuoming had his back to Xi Ping. He waved a hand at him. “We can call this collaboration a success. Oh, right, I still have a question.”

Xi Ping hadn't caught up yet. “Sure, what is it?”

Zhuoming said, “I sensed that you were thinking about me just now. What were you thinking?”

Xi Ping froze. “Oh, with your shifu being carried out horizontally and Sanyue in the state it's in, I was wondering what you were going to do in the future.”

Zhuoming, with his back to him, didn't move a muscle.

“But with your cultivation level, without Xuanwu controlling you, you can hold yourself upright no matter where you go.” Xi Ping also landed back in the lotus pond and pulled the Unbound Furnace out from the water to put it into his mustard seed. As if he meant nothing by it, he asked in passing, “You mentioned Qiu Sha just now. What, did you know her?”

On Zhuoming’s face, turned away from him, the features gradually disappeared, until only one mouth remained. His eyes had quietly moved onto a lotus leaf and were scouting outward from layer upon layer of leaves, peering at Xi Ping’s back. His ears had moved separately onto lotus stalks underwater. With the densely packed flowers and leaves to screen them, they slowly drew near to Xi Ping’s ankle, listening to the beating pulse in his leg.

Vivid and warm...

“I did,” his mouth said. “As soon as the Late-Autumn Red entered the country, the Silver Moon sensed her. She was a parasitic vine, living by absorbing the essence of others. She was very weak right after becoming an ascended spirit and urgently needed to ‘eat her fill,’ get some useful powers.”

Xi Ping paused, slowly straightening up in the water.

“I also ‘fed’ Xiang Zhao to her.” Zhuoming, with his neck stretched out to practically half the height of an Azure Dragon Tower, slowly turned around, “looking” down from on high at Xi Ping—though there was only a mouth left on his face. “She gave me something just as good in return. Do you want to see it?”

A chill crept up Xi Ping’s back, but after going through the ascended spirit tribulation and being pursued by a full moon sage, his spiritual sense was unavoidably a little blunted. Its warning came too late now. There was a sharp pain in his chest. His newborn ascended spirit body split open from the inside as bloody lotus stalks bored through it.

The lotus stalks spread over his whole body, firmly trapping him within themselves like a spiderweb, then mercilessly pierced the center of his brow.

Xi Ping’s consciousness immediately tried to flee, but the next moment, it was as if he had hit an invisible net. His consciousness ached like it had when Xiang Rong had smashed his body outside of the Unbound Furnace; it felt as though he had been struck by lightning.

A flower said, “I know where your hidden bones are attached.”

A lotus leaf, giggling, said, “Caught you.”

All at once, the lotus stalks wrapped around Xi Ping dragged him down underwater. Hands as icy cold as a dead person's reached out to cup his face. "When the Luwu came to this country, Sanyue sent people to investigate the Luwu's background. I saw the portrait of Zhou Ying that they obtained. Why do the lower halves of your faces look so much alike?"

Xi Ping couldn't speak, but he involuntarily recalled scenes of himself going to Prince Zhuang Manor as a child to tease the cats and dogs and make himself obnoxious.

"Oh, I see, it comes naturally," a lotus flower grimly said in a low voice. "He has so many things by nature, has you by nature. How hateful."

Soul...searching...

"It's not soul-searching, and it isn't those low-grade grit projections," a mouth on a lotus root said.

Xi Ping had already been pulled down to the bottom of the lotus pond. From the corner of his eye, he saw a cluster of cold flames.

A flame burning in the water?

“Yes, that’s it.” Zhuoming gave a profound sigh. “This is what I got from the Late-Autumn Red. The heart of the Unbound Furnace.”

CHAPTER 137 - Eternal Flame (19)

The Unbound Furnace...also has a heart?

“It does.” Zhuoming’s voice was a little dull in the water. “Only the Late-Autumn Red knew...but that madwoman was a hothead who only knew how to fight and kill. She didn’t understand a thing about toolmaking. She couldn’t give me a clear account of where this furnace heart came from.”

As he spoke, the lotus stalks raised Xi Ping’s hand.

Pressing his hand down, Zhuoming reached into his mustard seed and took out the Unbound Furnace, which he had just put away.

“I’ll show you.” Like a child showing off his toys, Zhuoming excitedly swam several circles around Xi Ping. Below the waist, he was wrapped in layer after layer of long stalks. “The fire of this furnace heart can’t be put out with water or sand. If you crush it under ice blocks, it can keep burning inside the ice... While it’s useful, the way it just keeps on doing exactly what it wants is very loathsome to me. All four great spiritual mountains had the wool pulled over their eyes. On the day that Lancang got the Unbound Furnace, it was incomplete.”

A lotus stalk bored into the flames. The calm flames didn't so much as tremble before they had "melted" the lotus stalk.

Next, the furnace heart's fire changed color. Before Xi Ping could get a clear look at what was inside the flame, he was pulled by Zhuoming into the big cauldron of the Unbound Furnace. The golden light inside the Unbound Furnace burned brightly—but this time, what was inside the golden light wasn't an image of a woman, but a view over the thousand peaks of the Sanyue Mountain Range, and then, visible at a glance from this ultimate height, the Slumbering Dragon Sea, which touched the sky; the better part of Western Chu's territory was right before your eyes.

Xi Ping: "..."

What the hell? A complete view of all the scenic spots in Western Chu, welcoming visitors from all around?

Presently, this newborn ascended spirit at last belatedly realized that the territory within the furnace just happened to be about the range that an ascended spirit's consciousness could cover—this was Zhuoming's point of view!

In other words, this baldy could use the furnace heart's fire to merge his consciousness into the Unbound Furnace without anyone knowing. It was as if Xiang Rong had been “seeking enlightenment” in Zhuoming’s spirit.

That wretched old man had spent every day strenuously seeking, “bowing and scraping” to the cauldron, coming up empty for two hundred years; then, just when he was on the verge of falling apart, he had suddenly “had a flash of inspiration” and found the exit on this path leading to a full moon position...and the upshot was, the “inspiration” was a load of crap made up by his monstrous nominal shizhi!

Spying from the mountaintop next door, Xuanwu had thought that the sect leader was pretty much cooked, and he could at last resurface with the Silver Moon in his grasp.

Inside the pot, Xiang Rong had thought that he was doing great and had deliberately put on a show of nearly expiring for Xuanwu’s benefit, luring him into exposing his ambition, tricking him out of half of his essence, preparing to remove future troubles forever...

After all the work those two great personages had done, grappling with heaven for their destinies and with others for power, it turned out that it had all been a puppet show put on by the East Peak’s bald orphan.

And Xi Ping’s part in this had been to act as the pollinating bee that had brought the Heartless Lotus into the Unbound Furnace!

Zhuoming was completely rotten!

Zhuoming laughed and batted away the Unbound Furnace. “Eight hundred years ago, Xiang Rong turned a blind eye on Xiang Zhao and those other good-for-nothings and let Hui Xiangjun slip away. That ‘potted heart demon’ at Lancang had an even more mystical intellect. He spent centuries holding on to the Unbound Furnace and didn’t even manage to boil eggs, then ended up dying confused and bewildered at the hands of a mortal. Finally, this sect leader of ours got shoved up to the pinnacle of the shed skin stage by the Sanyue Mountains. Once he reached that boundary, he realized that he had lost something. After all that hard work, he had brought back the Unbound Furnace without its furnace heart. He spent every day strenuously immersed in it... Oh, the spiritual mountains, with all their incessant ostentation—have they gone blind? They’ve ended up with a crowd of idiots filling the highest positions. Haha!”

The lotus stalks that had burrowed into all of Xi Ping’s meridians pushed and pulled, shaking him constantly like a puppet on strings in time to Zhuoming’s laughter. He paid it no mind. While Zhuoming expressed his cynicism, Xi Ping’s injured consciousness took the opportunity to quickly retreat to his spirit—he still had Zhaoting.

He really didn’t want to alarm shifu, but...

But as soon as he extended his consciousness toward Zhaoting, he was once again attacked by a pain like being ripped apart. Xi Ping's vision darkened.

If a consciousness had physical form, his would probably have been rolling around on the floor by now.

“Oh, I guess you can't find your shifu. What a pity.” A snow-white lotus leaf unfurled above Xi Ping's head, and Zhuoming's features emerged on it. “I dare not provoke the Master of Xuanyin's Flying Jade Peak, who cleaved the East Sea with his sword. Luckily you've already cut him off yourself. However worried General Zhi is, I suppose he still couldn't bear to hack at his own disciple's consciousness with Zhaoting?”

Xi Ping had just given his shifu a performance of being completely in control of the situation. Naturally he wasn't going to let Zhi Xiu see him scuttling around the mountain pursued by a full moon sage. But he had used his own consciousness to block Zhaoting's line of sight. Why wouldn't shifu know that he had been trapped?

But before he could think carefully about it, Xi Ping felt the invisible cage holding his consciousness draw tighter and tighter. All his fine hairs stood on end.

That baldy was jealous of his long hair and was trying to snatch his body!

“Nonsense, I don’t do that kind of thing!” Zhuoming resolutely denied, pulling a long face. “Who wants your smelly skin sack? There’s nothing fun about plucking hair, I got tired of it ages ago. I...”

The sharp pain of his consciousness tearing ran through Xi Ping for the second time that day!

Finally, Xi Ping could take no more. He screamed aloud.

Zhuoming’s eyes curved. “I just want to move you to a nice place...”

Snatching a body meant an external consciousness forcing its way into someone’s spirit to seize their skin sack; the Heartless Lotus, however, could simply steal a person’s consciousness.

While the consciousness could be sent out, its “roots” remained with the true body. Even when it was probing somewhere else, temporarily separating itself from the true body, the inextricable connection was always there. It was like a person’s gaze, which could be sent far away. What Zhuoming was doing amounted to simply gouging out his eyes.

When his body had been destroyed by the heavenly tribulation, the pain had only lasted a moment; there had been a limit. The pain of his consciousness being torn, however, was a hundred times harder to endure.

The moment he was wrested from his spirit, Xi Ping “saw” a small lotus seal appear over each of his features. He understood—

He hadn’t been taken in while inside the Unbound Furnace. The Unbound Furnace was only a sanctuary that had protected him from the impact of the battle of the great masters. His flesh and bones could regrow themselves because of the hidden bones; that had little to do with the Unbound Furnace. Zhuoming had had no chance to tamper with that. Anyway, in order to light the furnace fire, he had activated the reincarnation wood seedlings he had left on the Central Peak. The better part of his consciousness had been dispersed outside. It would have been hard for Zhuoming to trap him.

But just now, he had been trapped by Xiang Rong within the Sanyue Mountains, and all the reincarnation wood in the vicinity had been wiped out. He hadn’t dared to send a sliver of consciousness outward, and he hadn’t dared to let shifu see. The moment Xiang Rong had merged with the Sanyue Mountains, Xi Ping had thought he was about to be swept by the Silver Moon. His mind had been shaken, his senses failing. Zhuoming had taken advantage of that moment to plant the lotus seal over his senses without him noticing. That damn baldy of a Heartless Lotus could simply become a parasite within his consciousness. No wonder Zhaoting hadn't noticed!

This was just retribution. He had used Xiang Rong to dodge the heavenly tribulation, and now someone else had used Xiang Rong to deal with him.

But his understanding came too late.

The next moment, Xi Ping's consciousness left his body altogether. His body folded up lifelessly, the spiritual light around it vanishing.

Zhuoming took a deep breath. Joy appeared on his face. Then he unfolded his hands. There was a new white lotus flower bud cupped in them. He cautiously peeled apart the still furled petals slightly and glanced inside. At the empty heart of the flower, a tiny Xi Ping was lying unconscious.

The leaves and flowers in the water drew near one after another, growing eyes to peer inside.

“Shh—” Zhuoming batted aside a lotus root that was hesitantly reaching out. Very gently, he replaced the flower petals. “Don't disturb him. Be calm.”

“Be calm...”

“Quiet...”

The flowers and leaves passed the word on among themselves.

“Zhou Ying is going to hate me. What should I do?” Though Zhuoming was saying “What should I do?”, he still couldn’t hold back a quiet laugh. “Hahaha, what should I do? He’s mine now.”

The lotus stalks continued to drag Xi Ping’s body downward, then abandoned him without regret, burying his body at the bottom of the pond. Blood stained half the lotus pond red.

Just then, Zhuoming sensed something. He floated out of the lotus pond, craned his neck, and concentrated on something in the distance. Then his features began to twist chaotically. He whispered “Annoying,” hid the new lotus bud inside his clothes, and retreated into the water.

The stone sides of the lotus pond began to quiver. The uppermost layer turned down, revealing layer upon layer of inscriptions hidden beneath it, then slid into the water. Then the whole lotus pond rolled up like a painted scroll and shrank into the earth, burrowing into the East Peak.

Its original location became deserted.

After about an incense stick of time had passed, the West Peak's Elder Xiang Ning finally descended on the East Peak along with the Central Peak's four great ascended spirits, the West Peak's Xiang Wenqing, and other such people.

The whole crowd, grim-faced, released their consciousnesses and patrolled the surroundings.

“Shifu,” Xiang Wenqing spoke first, “the East Peak's prohibition has been nearly destroyed. There's no sign of anyone here.”

Another West Peak ascended spirit said, “I remember that Elder Xuanwu... that Xuanwu had a direct disciple who never showed himself. Where has he gone? Is he also dead?”

The chief disciple of the sect leader from the Central Peak scanned Xiang Ning's expression and tentatively asked, “May I be permitted to ask, elder, what abnormality is there about the Silver Moon?”

Xiang Ning ignored him.

He didn't respond until Xiang Wenqing put in a word from beside him:
"Shifu, what should we do now?"

Then Xiang Ning finally said, "The spiritual mountains have already repaired themselves. The only change is in the Elders' Hall on the Central Principal Peak. The sect leader's life tablet is intact, but the writing on it has all disappeared. Xuanwu's life tablet is still there, but it has cracked and dimmed, indicating that his boundary has dropped. He has fled to escape punishment. His whereabouts are unknown."

Xiang Wenqing said, "If the sect leader were injured or... His life tablet ought to have cracked or turned to dust. How could the stone remain intact while the writing disappeared?"

Xiang Ning raised his head and looked toward the valley. At present, the moisture in the valley was a great deal more plentiful than usual, and the spiritual energy was nearly overflowing. Xiang Ning already had his guesses, he just didn't mention them. He said, "That's right. If his life tablet hasn't broken, then he is well. As for the writing—the venerable sect leader has become a full moon sage, the only full moon sage among the four great spiritual mountains. Can common reason contemplate his state? Our founder the Black Emperor also left no life tablet in the Elders' Hall."

None of the ascended spirits were stupid. They all had their own thoughts. As soon as they heard the elder's excuse, they knew this boded ill for the sect leader's condition. But there were threats at all the borders, and Sanyue, protecting such precious territory, had lost two of its great masters at once and was left with only the West Peak's Xiang Ning, who wasn't very stable at his boundary. The West Peak's elder himself felt uncertain. Apart from pretending to feel secure in his backing, what else could he do?

“Issue a notice saying that Xuanwu has lost his mind and become a demon. After being injured in battle with the sect leader, his boundary dropped. He has betrayed the spiritual mountains. In order to consolidate his level, the sect leader has gone into seclusion and will not be seeing visitors from the outside in the near future. We hope that our fellow cultivators coming to make inquiries will understand.” Xiang Ning paused. Gently grinding his teeth, he said, “There is plenty of time ahead. When the sect leader leaves seclusion, he will certainly—return their visits.”

All the ascended spirits went to obey orders. Xiang Ning turned back to glance at the grim and desolate East Peak. His lips were tightly pursed. After a moment, he said “fiend” with a quiet sigh and soared off into the clouds.

On the deserted summit of the East Peak, a cluster of grass slowly turned dark red and moved on its own, beginning to shiver. A juvenile auspicious creature, a spiritual sparrow, must have thought that there were worms in the grass and dove in, hopping around all over in search.

Suddenly, like snakes emerging from their holes, blades of grass whose color had changed wrapped around the spiritual sparrow. Without even having a chance to cry out, the little sparrow was rapidly torn in half by the malicious grass. Blood and feathers were blown far away by the wind.

“Xuanwu didn’t die...” said a whisper in the grass. “Xuanwu actually didn’t die.”

In the lotus pond that had sunk into the mountain, Zhuoming grabbed a lotus stalk extending from his waist and fiercely bit into it. The lotus stalk began to bleed. The flowers and leaves around him began to holler in chorus.

Zhuoming’s features contorted, whether in pain or in anger. He wildly ravaged the flowers, stalks, and leaves in the lotus pond, until he inadvertently came to the white lotus bud holding Xi Ping. The lunatic froze. The hand squeezing the flower bud shook for a moment as though convulsing. Then he screamed, tossed the flower bud aside, and violently smashed his own head against the edge of the lotus pond.

Boom—boom—boom—

Xi Ping awoke to the sound of dull thudding. The acrid reek of blood nearly made him throw up.

As soon as he opened his eyes, he found that he was inside a “palace,” surrounded by dazzling whiteness. When he took a look, he found that the “palace” had no roof beams, and the “ground” and “walls” were covered with indistinct channels.

These seemed to be...flower petals!

He was inside an enormous lotus flower.

Xi Ping at first wanted to sit up, but as soon as he moved, he felt as if he had been wrenched apart. He fell back down.

After Zhuoming had uprooted him from his body, he felt that every last joint was in the wrong place.

Mentally paying his respects to eighteen generations of Zhuoming’s ancestors, Xi Ping crawled a few chi forward, gritting his teeth.

A consciousness unprotected by a body was extremely fragile. It would break at once if something pressed on it. At the same time, it was also extremely “pliable”—if he could only imagine his own appearance, he could make his consciousness appear human.

Enduring intense pain, he got back his hands, feet, limbs, and neck in the process of crawling. As he moved, his twisted and deformed joints returned to their original positions bit by bit. When he had crawled seven or eight zhang away, Xi Ping had finally “put himself back together” in full.

He had truly exhausted all his energy. He lay where he was to rest. Before he could catch his breath, the flower bud palace suddenly experienced an “earthquake.”

Before, when Zhuoming had an attack of madness, he could be forced into calm by a pill from Xuanwu. But this time there was no one to attend to him. His fit went on and on. He had already smashed his bald head into a bloody pulp. He had no hair left to pull out, so his fingers embedded themselves in his scalp, as if trying to plow something out of the flesh and blood. Flesh and blood flew everywhere, but he had yet to vent his spleen. He grabbed a lotus next to him, opened his mouth, and bit it.

The stalk of the lotus flower snapped at this. He tore the flower petals to pieces, and they sank in the pond. A stream of bloody foam began to spread outward.

Inside the lotus flower, Xi Ping heard horrifying shrieks coming from all directions. With a splash, blood seeped into the cracks of the “flower bud palace,” pushing a bunch of bubbles roiling through the blood toward him. Each bubble was the same size as him.

Xi Ping, having just put himself back together, was caught off guard. A bubble came crashing right into his arms and broke when it hit. From out of it fell a person with wide open eyes, bleeding from the face, and nearly kissed him!

“Fuck!” said Xi Ping.

He was so startled that all his limbs became nimble. He scrambled to his feet and scuttled back several chi at once. Recovering from his shock, he looked over. The figure of the devil that had tried to take advantage of him flickered, then disappeared in the blood.

Each of the bubbles amid the blood burst, and each one contained a person dripping with blood. There were those with missing limbs whose deaths had been unusually brutal, who disappeared as soon as they saw the light, and there were those who seemed not to have fully died when they left the bloody bubble, and only disappeared after struggling for a while.

Xi Ping stepped in blood and felt unbearable disgust, but he was only a consciousness right now. He had no powers. He couldn't fly. He could only turn tail and run deeper into the "flower bud temple."

Suddenly, he caught a glimpse of dark red out of the corner of his eye. Xi Ping turned his head and saw that at the depths of the "ground" inside the "palace" was a blood-colored "tunnel" connecting it to the underground.

That...ought to be where the stalk grew.

The place where the flower bud was connected to the stalk had just enough space to let him pass through. It was pitch-black below, the bottom invisible. He didn't know what was there.

Xi Ping hesitated for a moment and approached. But it turned out that there was sticky fluid around the stalk. It was so slippery that he couldn't get any purchase on it. He missed his footing and toppled backward, slipping down right past the join between the flower and the stalk.

These tied-together lotus stalks were very long. He fell for ages. Xi Ping rolled this way and that through the narrow lotus stalks while outside Zhuoming was wailing and shouting in his fit. Suddenly, he heard a strong heartbeat from one side. Xi Ping immediately kicked in the opposite direction, tossing himself into one side of a fork, rolling toward the source of that heartbeat.

With a bang, Xi Ping bumped into something and nearly got his spine snapped. He flew straight out and fell into gloom.

Everything here was smooth and slippery, with many openings big and small. Xi Ping struggled to his feet and realized that this might be a segment of lotus root.

Each opening contained a “person.” There were men and women. From their attire, the majority of them were from Sanyue’s inner sect.

These people were doing all kinds of things. Some were attacking thin air; some were tracing hand seals, as though drawing talismans; some were deranged, seeking sensuous pleasures, making all kinds of lewd motions... Each was doing their own thing. When Xi Ping made so much noise falling in, no one gave him a glance.

Xi Ping passed through the crowd. He saw that these people had vacant looks in their eyes. Each and every one was like the folk legend about stone tape ghosts, the dead who couldn’t accept their own deaths recorded in stone and played back, repeating the same motions over and over.

“Hey.”

Xi Ping tried holding back a man who was just wielding a sword empty-handed, but the man didn't react. He maintained his original posture, stabbing forward. As soon as Xi Ping let go, he completed his sword move according to pattern.

Xi Ping thought that this scene was exceedingly strange. “Are they real or fake...?”

“Real,” a somewhat familiar voice responded.

Xi Ping abruptly turned around and saw an unusually tall figure leaning against a nearby opening in the lotus root, with pitch-black hair as long as an ordinary person was tall hanging behind her. This figure that stood out above all the others still seemed to be exquisite and tasteful—

Xi Ping quickly backed up half a step. “...Qiu Sha.”

Qiu Sha, whom he had seen crushed to dust by the Silver Moon with his own eyes.

CHAPTER 138 - Eternal Flame (20)

Qiu Sha looked him over from top to bottom. Her manner was fairly polite. “You’re a good-looking young fellow. You look like you’re from Wan. Which of Xuanyin’s mountains are you from? Have you seen me before?”

Xi Ping: “...”

In Tao County, he had arranged for her scheme to fail at the last moment. He had been prepared to take a beating, but it turned out that he had worried for nothing. She didn’t recognize him.

That was fair. Thinking back, Qiu Sha hadn’t seen his true appearance. The reason she had easily been able to discover his existence back in Tao County was that they were both inheritors of accompanying plants, and at the time, her cultivation level had been higher than his.

Now they were both in this half-dead condition, and they had both been ascended spirits “while living.” If she hadn’t happened to see the reincarnation wood earlier, it in fact wouldn’t be so easy for her to recognize him.

“I have heard a great deal about you. There is no one among the four great spiritual mountains who hasn’t heard your name.” Xi Ping gave an embarrassed laugh, then added, “I am a disciple of Xuanyin’s Flying Jade Peak. You may not have heard of it, fellow cultivator.”

If he had gone right to mentioning his shifu, due to Southern He’s Lancang, Qiu Sha probably would have known of him. But as far as she was concerned, Flying Jade Peak was too “young.” It had only obtained a master after Zhi Xiu had become an ascended spirit, and furthermore, because of its master’s laziness, the mountain had never been formally opened.

“Just as long as it’s not Moon Plated Peak. It’s all this mountain and that mountain over there at Xuanyin, I can’t tell them apart.” As expected, Qiu Sha had absolutely no understanding of Southern Wan, where late-autumn red didn’t grow. Among all the Xuanyin Mountains, the only person she knew of was Lin Chi. She waved a hand. “Why has someone from Xuanyin come all this way, and how did you end up in that bald donkey’s hands?”

Xi Ping said, “Well, Sanyue’s sect leader became a full moon sage and fought with the East Peak’s High Elder Xuanwu...”

“What?” Qiu Sha suddenly straightened from her indolent slouch. “You’re saying Xiang Rong is a full moon sage?”

Xi Ping had a thought: Qiu Sha didn’t know, which mean that her not recognizing him wasn’t because she’d just happened not to see the reincarnation wood; it was because she had no connection to the outside world at all.

In other words, all those mouths everywhere didn't belong to the consciousnesses of Qiu Sha and the others the Heartless Lotus had swallowed...they were the result of that baldy babbling on his own.

Truly insane...

But that was just as well. This way, he would have room to maneuver.

Not turning a hair, Xi Ping picked up: "Right. The sky lit up in the middle of the night, and Western Chu's borders began to shake. Each nation's shed skins are already holding the line along the borders, and my colleagues and I were the first group to infiltrate the Sanyue Mountains on orders from the sect."

Then, keeping an eye on Qiu Sha's reaction, using nine parts truth and one part falsehood, he described the whole series of events concerning Xiang Rong's battle with Xuanwu and Xiang Rong merging with the spiritual mountains, omitting all of his own improbable actions in the Unbound Furnace. He only said that he had been hoodwinked by Zhuoming, that he had collaborated with that bald lunatic in order to infiltrate the Sanyue Mountains and taken the Heartless Lotus into the Unbound Furnace, the upshot being that after managing to escape with his life, the bald donkey had attacked him from behind, and so on and so on—using Lin Zhaoli as a model, he turned himself into a naive idiot from the remote depths of the inner sect.

Qiu Sha didn't speak for a long moment after hearing this. Finally, she gave a quiet laugh and said, "That deranged little whelp really knows what he's doing. To think that the furnace heart can be used like that."

Seeing Xi Ping glare at her, Qiu Sha slowly coiled up her hair, of which there was too much to get your hand around. "Do you suppose that just anyone who snuck into the Unbound Furnace would be able to trick Xiang Rong? Those old bastards have longer lives than tortoises. They spend all their free time facing the wall and examining themselves. If a thought that flashes across their spirit has a trace of wrongness about it, they'll notice it at once. That kind of work is painstaking, full of risk at every step. The Heartless Lotus truly is a monster with a thousand hearts and a thousand faces... It seems that I was right to give him the furnace fire."

"Well, regardless," Xi Ping said, "I think we ought to think of a way to get out. We can't stay..."

He shut his mouth, because Qiu Sha was giving him a strange look of wonder and ridicule.

“Listen, young fellow, what way are you cultivating? The way of the decorative vase? Have all your brains gone into looking pretty?” Qiu Sha said. “You’re already dead, haven’t you realized it yet? ‘Think of a way to get out’—and go where? To your ancestral tombs?”

“What do you mean?” said Xi Ping. “Hey, where are you going, wait!”

After listening to his miserable experiences and foolishness, Qiu Sha had determined that this little pretty boy wasn’t very bright. She had suddenly felt extremely bored and lost interest in talking to him.

She crouched down and squeezed into the opening in the lotus root.

Xi Ping quickly followed.

Inside the lotus root’s long opening, there were even more “stone tapes,” some of them with half their bodies already merged with the lotus root, leaving only a segment dangling out, like freakish sculptures.

Aside from Xi Ping, with his hidden bones attached to his consciousness, when an ordinary cultivator’s body was destroyed, their consciousness would also be destroyed. Only when the consciousness had been concentrated to the ascended spirit level could it live outside of the body—that was precisely why this level was called “ascended spirit.”

But even an ascended spirit consciousness couldn’t survive long unless it could snatch a body. Any random nobody who came along to do battle could send them off by drawing a bit of spiritual energy and making waves. And even if they snatched a body, they could still only “cling to life.” After getting a new body, with their original body’s spirit destroyed, they would never again be able to cultivate, and their lifespan would be a little shorter than even an ordinary mortal’s.

While this “rash and thoughtless” young ascended spirit seemed quite dim-witted, there was still a difference between a good-looking fool and an ordinary idiot; after all, one could act as a decorative vase, while the other could only serve as a spittoon.

Though Qiu Sha held him in some contempt, watching him shamelessly tail after her, she actually didn’t get angry.

Perhaps because she was already “dead,” she was a little milder than she had been “in life.” She actually said more: “The consciousnesses that the Heartless Lotus collects are completely severed from their original bodies. Even if you return to your body, your cultivation will still be lost. It would amount to possessing yourself—and anyway, you can’t get back. This portion of your consciousness has already been subsumed by the Heartless Lotus. Rather than saying that you are yourself, it would be more accurate to say that the current 'you' is only a split off portion of consciousness in that baldy's mind... If he wants, he can know what you're saying or doing at any time. I advise you to be a little more careful about what you say."

Xi Ping: "..."

Making an inference by analogy, he quickly realized that while the "Qiu Sha" in front of him could be called the remaining consciousness of the already dead Qiu Sha, she could also be called a consciousness split off by Zhuoming!

On the surface, it currently appeared that he was talking to Qiu Sha. But in reality, it could be seen as a conversation between two Zhuomings.

"Don't be scared," Qiu Sha soothed him, insultingly. "That baldy would rather watch you organize a bunch of stone tapes to stage a rebellion against him than control your consciousness. A consciousness is an extremely fragile thing. If he so much as touches it, your consciousness will be completely destroyed. What would be interesting about that? Here, look around, all of these are consciousness he's keeping around."

Just in time, Xi Ping bumped into a hand dangling down from overhead. When he looked up, there was a consciousness like a hanged ghost staring fixedly at him, half its face merged with the lotus root wall.

“Of the consciousnesses that come into the Heartless Lotus, mortals can live ten or twenty years, half-immortals thirty or forty. I’ve heard that an established foundation with an especially firm consciousness once lived for a hundred years. As for ascended spirits...there’s only you and me here, so I don’t know. While ‘living,’ some of them raised cries of lamentation or swore all day, and others had delusions of trying to escape like you. Still others gave up and abandoned themselves to despair. No matter what they did, that baldy hasn’t interfered. Only when these consciousnesses die altogether will they be slowly digested by the lotus root.”

Xi Ping felt the part of his scalp that the hand had touched go numb. “So what’s so interesting about this?”

“I don’t know what’s so interesting about it. My guess is that he can’t stop.” Qiu Sha spread her arms. Her arms and legs were truly too long; each and every one of her movements had an unusual kind of grace. “You must have heard of the ancient demonic god called the Heartless Lotus. He was crazy, his head as cracked as a pomegranate, and he had a paramount spiritual sense who would get lines mixed up while reading. Supposedly this baldy was stuffed into the Heartless Lotus by his deadbeat shizun so he could either inherit it or die. Though he managed to make do and survive, it was still rather forced—he doesn't actually have such great natural gifts. He was born with only one consciousness. After inheriting the Heartless Lotus, he was cut apart into many pieces. So my guess is that maybe he's desperately collecting consciousnesses to try to fill in these lotus hearts."

As she spoke, Qiu Sha had already familiarly walked into the depths of the lotus root. She muttered, "Only when there are other people in the lotus hearts to act as contrast can he find himself, even if the people he grabs spend all day saying they'll fuck his ancestors... Forget it, if you don't understand lunatics, then you don't understand. You seem harmless and naive. You don't even seem to understand ordinary people very well—ah, you were right, he really has got the Unbound Furnace!"

Xi Ping followed the direction of her gaze and saw that in the depths of the lotus root was a very big empty space. The heartbeat he had heard before seemed to be coming from here. The blood red "wall" throbbed rapidly, and there was even a mural on it. The mural was of a flame the height of a person, with the vague figure of a person inside it.

The figure belonged to a Chu woman of average height. She was only tall enough to reach Qiu Sha's chest, so Qiu Sha bent down and drew close to the mural, unblinking, as if she wanted to dig that figure out of the wall.

“She has a form now, doesn’t she?” It was unclear whether Qiu Sha was talking to Xi Ping or to herself. “She didn’t before... Look at her, you can even vaguely see her features!”

Xi Ping said, “Who? What is this?”

“It’s the projection of her Way of the Heart.” As if afraid of startling the person in the mural, Qiu Sha kept her voice very low. “After the Heartless Lotus swallows a consciousness, he’ll digest the Way of the Heart very slowly. This way, the projection of the Way of the Heart will remain on the lotus root. That useless baldy can’t even eat shit while it’s warm. He’s too slow. It’s been over two years since he got the furnace heart from me, and he still hasn’t fully grasped the furnace fire. Now that he has the Unbound Furnace itself, I see that he’s finally understood a bit.”

Xi Ping’s eyes flashed slightly in the darkness. Putting on Lin Zhaoli’s constantly clueless expression, he asked a string of questions: “What? This is Senior Hui Xiangjun’s Way of the Heart? Shouldn’t her Way of the Heart be in her vital weapon, the Unbound Furnace? And what do you mean by ‘hasn’t fully grasped the furnace fire’? He even sent a full moon sage to his death, how can he not have fully grasped it? So in order to fully grasp it, would you...”

“You’re so noisy. Shut up.” Annoyed by his clamor, Qiu Sha shushed him.

She sat down cross-legged in front of the mural to watch that image on the mural with its indistinct features, waiting for the image to become reality, like a farmer waiting for the right weather conditions.

Xi Ping, as if he couldn't pick up social cues, once again opened his mouth to make himself annoying: "If her Way of the Heart has always been in your hands, why didn't you find her a suitable successor in the toolmaking way?"

Without so much as looking around, Qiu Sha softly said, "Scram."

There was a sinister glamor about her, oppressive, like a monstrous knife that had just been dug up from a fierce ghost's coffin. A figure that was too tall could easily give the impression of being "clumsy" or "big"; when others mentioned her, they always remembered how she "cut people down like melons" or acted "deranged and arrogant" but forgot how she had nearly killed off half the ascended spirit masters in the cultivation world.

A-Xiang accidentally getting the Law Breaker had already been enough to make Qiu Sha want to kill her. Since she knew how important the furnace fire was, how could she have handed it over so easily to Zhuoming for the sake of killing Xiang Zhao?

Unless...

Xi Ping's gaze fell on her back: she had expected that it would come to this.

She had known that if she kicked up such a big fuss, whether she succeeded or failed, Sanyue's great divine tool would be certain to descend to the mortal world. She had known that she was certain to die, yet she had still staked everything on one throw. The lotus root heart of the Heartless Lotus was the grave she had prepared for herself.

This was no hothead who only knew how to fight and kill. This was an eight-century-old fiend.

“Senior,” Xi Ping said after a moment's silence, imitating her soft voice, “since ancient times, no evil cultivator has become an ascended spirit. With you standing out like that among all the rest, you were sure to meet with resistance. Why didn't you take it slow and steady from the start?”

Qiu Sha was silent for a while. She asked, “Did you just become an ascended spirit?”

Xi Ping agreed vaguely.

“Mortals hold opening your spiritual eyes to be the threshold for cultivation and believe that establishing a foundation completely separates mortal from immortal. So do you know what an ‘ascended spirit’ is?”

Xi Ping really didn’t know. No sooner had he endured the ascended spirit heavenly tribulation than he had been hunted by a full moon sage. He hadn’t been crushed to death by the mountain, but instead he had been eaten by the lotus root. He hadn’t even had a chance to say a few words to his shifu. Where would he have found the time to stop and appreciate his cultivation level?

As soon as he thought this, he immediately felt very dejected. So he lowered his head and abandoned himself to self-pity.

But Qiu Sha thought that lowering his head meant he was at last feeling ashamed. She sneered. “How did you even end up as an ascended spirit?”

Xi Ping told the truth: “A shed skin elder pushed me through.”

Qiu Sha clicked her tongue on hearing this, only taking this to mean that he was of high birth.

But with her age and experiences, she wasn’t especially inclined to feel righteous indignation about injustices—these were the facts, resentment was only worthless self-pity.

While she sat upright facing the wall, the monstrous air about her faded considerably. Her figure wrapped in its plain robe was like a high mountain of jade. “Though an established foundation also has a Way of the Heart and an essence, only when you have passed the ascended spirit boundary can you be qualified to listen to heaven and earth, touch the Way of Heaven—rather than allowing your elders to feed them to you or reading the contradictory truisms in those useless ancient texts that have been copied this way and that.”

So that was what “putting inquiries to heaven and earth” meant!

When Xi Ping had just been starting out cultivation, he had boldly said to shifu “Everyone is always putting inquiries to heaven and earth, heaven and earth must be sick of it”...but it turned out that there were only a few people on earth who were qualified to ask.

“Let me ask you, who was it that said evil cultivators have been unable to become ascended spirits since ancient times?”

Xi Ping recalled what Beacon Luo at the Latent Cultivation Temple had taught. “It’s because common cultivators often lack resources...”

“Don’t talk nonsense,” Qiu Sha impatiently interrupted him. “Do you know how many cultivators there have been in the world these past thousands of years? If you had thrown a needle into the East Sea when the spiritual mountains formed and had each of those people scoop up a basin of water at random, they would have scooped up that needle by now. Is it so hard to become an ascended spirit? You haven't seen any for yourself, so you're that certain that there aren't any? Do you think that those people are all as dim-witted as you?"

Xi Ping: "..."

Fair enough. He was a mighty ascended spirit, yet he was still parroting the established foundation Luo from the Latent Cultivation Temple. He had utterly humiliated Flying Jade Peak. He instantly didn't dare to speak again.

"That cats and dogs live for a few decades, that mortals live for a hundred years, that spring flowers have an end, that evil cultivators are not acknowledged by the spiritual mountains and can only reach an established foundation," Qiu Sha said, lifting her chin slightly, "these are all the sayings of heaven, the sayings of the spiritual mountains—like the 'axioms' of the Law Breaker."

Xi Ping's eyes opened wide. In an instant, he was filled with enlightenment: the axioms of the Law Breaker were absolute, unless an axiom was broken!

If the spiritual mountains were an enormous Law Breaker, if these heavenly rules were like the Law Breaker's axioms...then that meant that if someone could only evade that rule and succeed in becoming an ascended spirit, the "heavenly rule" would be broken and lose effect!

"I was sure to die when I became an ascended spirit, but just you wait. After my death, ascended spirit evil cultivators will spring up like bamboo shoots after a spring rain. The blood moon will hang in the sky all the time. The Way of Heaven will collapse, and it will have started with me... That was her original intention in making the Law Breaker and the Riverward," Qiu Sha said softly but sonorously. "Late-autumn red is the guardian of eternal spring brocade. My Way of the Heart would follow wherever she desired—like fuck I'm going to take it slow and steady! Do you think I'm like you assholes in the spiritual mountains, only in it for personal gain, doing nothing but climbing toward the carrot the Way of Heaven has put in front of you?"

Xi Ping's scalp instantly prickled.

He had suddenly realized that Zhuoming was wrong. Late-autumn red was eternal spring brocade's accompanying plant; how could Qiu Sha fail to understand Hui Xiangjun's relic?

She understood only too well.

From the day she had come out into the world from the hidden realm, she had known what road she was going to walk, known how she would die... It was just like a cicada growing for years underground then crying out as soon as it broke through the earth, singing its loudest no matter how destitute its circumstances.

Zhuoming had said that “heaven” and “earth” were locked in constant struggle. “Heaven” was the disciples of the full moon sages, and “earth” was the demonic gods that had lost by a narrow margin. Hui Xiangjun had inherited the eternal spring brocade’s Way of the Heart, so it seemed that she ought to belong to the “earth,” but...was that the truth?

Why was it that while the Unbound Furnace clearly had a furnace flame, Lin Chi had never seen it?

Why wasn’t Hui Xiangjun’s Way of the Heart in her vital weapon?

Xi Ping asked, “What kind of person was she?”

Hearing this, Qiu Sha raised her head, facing the vague figure in the mural across a distance of eight centuries.

They had asked why she had died and where her relics were, asked what way she had cultivated, asked what wonders her Unbound Furnace possessed, asked why her furnace flame could burn within ice and water... and at last someone had asked what kind of person she was.

“She was...a very patient person.” Unconsciously, Qiu Sha’s voice became a little indistinct. She narrowed her eyes, as if her gaze were piercing through the lengthy ages.

Qiu Sha didn’t know her own background, but she probably hadn’t come from a wealthy family. A wealthy family wouldn’t have abandoned a newborn child on a deserted mountain.

A few eternal spring brocade trees were growing on that mountain, so the late-autumn red was everywhere. There hadn’t been a “late-autumn red” among the ancient demonic gods to begin with; this was a half-puppet that the frail toolmaking cultivator had made themselves.

This parasitic vine grew alongside the eternal spring brocade, and it grew in too great profusion. The finicky main tree couldn’t supply the nutrients that such a large expanse of late-autumn red required, so it would eat decaying flesh, hunt down defenseless insects, birds, and animal cubs...and abandoned infants.

Late-autumn red was the accompanying plant of a half-puppet. When it came into contact with living things that had spiritual eyes, it would extend into the spiritual eyes and turn the human or spiritual beast into a puppet growing from its vines.

As far back as Qiu Sha remembered, she had been fighting over living space with other people just as uncivilized as her, and even spiritual beasts, struggling to maintain her own awareness.

Until one time, the eternal spring brocade on the mountain suddenly blossomed. The accompanying plant had a new master.

All the vines cheered. Only Qiu Sha was afraid. Her mind was connected to the late-autumn red vines. She instinctively knew that late-autumn red, this parasitic vine, belonged to the eternal spring brocade, and the new owner was certain to clean up this tangled skein of late-autumn red like pulling up weeds, get rid of all the disorderly minds in it, and either take over it herself...or have a half-puppet in her keeping take over it.

Xi Ping softly asked, "Did she choose you?"

"Late-autumn red was everywhere in Western Chu then, not just on that mountain. I don't know how many consciousnesses there were inside it. The vast majority of them were incomplete. How could she choose?" Qiu Sha shook her head. “It was a trash heap hiding all kinds of evil, even more of a mess than this lotus root heart. The most reasonable method would have been to wipe out all those vines that had been stuffing themselves for hundreds or thousands of years at once.”

Did the remnants of consciousnesses inside the vines feel and reason? Did those fragments count as people? Or were they only an annoying blight on the trees?

Xi Ping imagined it and thought it was very hard to say. If it had been him, he probably wouldn't have wiped them all out, but it would have been so much trouble that he probably would have just left it alone.

“So she...”

Qiu Sha said, “She spent a hundred twenty years lecturing to the late-autumn red vines.”

Xi Ping said, “What?”

“She irrigated the vines with spiritual energy and lectured. Who could have understood? We didn't even know human speech then,” Qiu Sha said. “For the first eight years, she was just talking to herself. Every time she opened her mouth, there would only be frightened and angry noises in the late-autumn red, no reaction, but she didn't care, only kept lecturing... Have you ever met a person like that?"

Doing precisely what she wanted, day after day, caring nothing for feedback, caring nothing for the outcome.

"I hadn't. I'd never met a person like that," Qiu Sha said almost inaudibly. "Educating a bunch of wild vines, as if she only wanted to try and see whether if she had enough patience, a miracle would be sure to happen."

For the consciousness struggling within the parasitic vine, this was a vague thread of hope. She spent eight years struggling to get a grasp on the Chu language, connected to spiritual energy following Hui Xiangjun's lead, constantly trained her consciousness. When it came to the twentieth year, she gave the eternal spring brocade her first stammering response.

Qiu Sha remembered that Hui Xiangjun had paused slightly then, cocked her ear to listen for a moment, then smiled.

A clear thought had suddenly emerged. She had thought: I want to look like that, too.

She was the first flower to open on the late-autumn red. When she drew spiritual energy into herself, she cleared away all the noise in the vines and became the master of the late-autumn red. She fell to the ground and cultivated a human body, making her face look like Hui Xiangjun's.

And then she had walked a riotous road that could dye the moon at the center of the heavens blood red.

“Zhuoming got the furnace flame, but he could never get hold of Senior Hui Xiangjun's Way of the Heart,” Xi Ping said after sitting with her for a long moment. “I understand now.”

Qiu Sha froze. Her long, thin eyebrows lifted. “What do you understand?”

“What do you understand?” came Zhuoming's demonic voice from the depths of the lotus root.

Just then, Xi Ping finally realized that the violent heartbeat had at some point leveled out.

On the lotus root wall, a human face emerged beside the mural of Hui Xiangjun and stared fixedly at Xi Ping.

Zhuoming gave him a very strange look. “You woke up so quickly. You didn't have to sleep for several months. And you found your way here... I've never seen a newborn ascended spirit with such a resilient consciousness.”

Xi Ping calmly smiled at Zhuoming. “I did want to have a lie-in, but there was nothing for it. After all, I’m in a rush.”

The corners of Zhuoming’s eyes twitched.

Qiu Sha suddenly realized something. “Who the hell are you?”

Xi Ping didn’t answer. He cupped his hands toward her. “I came specifically to see you. When we parted in Tao County, there were many things we hadn’t had time to discuss. Thank you for your guidance today, senior.”

No sooner had he spoken than he—or rather, his consciousness—shattered without warning, leaving behind only a cluster of person-shaped heartless lotus stalks. As his consciousness collapsed, these also turned to mist and seeped into the lotus root.

CHAPTER 139 - Eternal Flame (21)

A consciousness caught by the Heartless Lotus was like a handful of water, and the lotus stalks carrying consciousness were like vessels for “drawing water.” Though the vessel wouldn’t usually affect the taste of the water, the direction the water flowed in and its shape would be almost entirely determined by the vessel.

To begin with, the “bowl of water” that was Xi Ping had been sealed up nicely in a “bottle,” and right in front of Zhuoming’s face, he had turned into vapor in the blink of an eye. The constantly babbling heartless lotuses all froze. For a moment, the heart beating in the depths of the lotus root stopped. Zhuoming thought that he was dead.

No, that was wrong.

Zhuoming quickly caught on. It was exceedingly painful to destroy your own consciousness. It couldn’t be that straightforward—this seemed more like the Misty Willow pulling back a portion of his consciousness that he had sent out.

In the depths of the East Peak, the Heartless Lotus was like a giant enraged beast. His tendrils reared up and began to roar.

Impossible!

They both had accompanying plants. Of course Zhuoming knew that he would have left a portion of his consciousness behind in an accompanying plant somewhere else before coming to Dongheng. But that was before he had become an ascended spirit—the Misty Willow’s hidden bones were attached to his consciousness; with bolts of heavenly lightning coming right at him and him bearing up under the double pressures of the ascended spirit tribulation and the reconstruction of the hidden bones, he wouldn’t have had attention to spare for such a distant place.

No matter where he had left his consciousness, when his hidden bones had been reconstructed, he must have called it back to the vicinity of the Unbound Furnace. After that, he had been hiding desperately under the eyes of the full moon sage. Where would he have found an opportunity to flee?

Moreover, the Heartless Lotus was one hundred percent certain that he had picked that person’s consciousness out of his body in its entirety! This was impossible!

Zhuoming twisted. Dozens of lotus stalks, like vipers coming out of their caves, dove all at once into the bottom of the pond.

Then there was a flash of snow-bright sword light as those ferocious lotus stalks were chopped off by a slash. Xi Ping “broke through the soil.”

When he had seen the so-called “Hui Xiangjun” in the Unbound Furnace, Xi Ping had felt that something was very wrong.

First of all, Hui Xiangjun was the Eternal Spring Brocade. Her Way of the Heart had been inherited from an ancient demonic god. Even though an individual’s understanding would cause the Way of the Heart to deviate somewhat from its initial condition...and the deviation seemed quite large in the case of Hui Xiangjun, it had still been her starting point, after all. She had entered the Way because of this. The Way of the Heart branded onto her vital weapon would have to have signs of this origin. But the so-called “Way of the Heart” in the Unbound Furnace had been like a “Law Breaker Manual,” without any traces of the eternal spring brocade. That was too unusual.

The second thing that had aroused Xi Ping’s suspicion had been the manner of recounting all things being “made of inscriptions.” For him, this segment had been only too familiar. If it hadn’t been a pretty young woman standing in the golden light in front of him at the time, he practically would have thought it was san-ge speaking to him.

But if you thought about this carefully, you would know it was wrong. It wasn't that there was no possibility that Hui Xiangjun had had a paramount spiritual sense, but the possibility was miniscule.

When an exception had been made for her to enter Sanyue's inner sect, she had been only an established foundation, only qualified to be a disciple on the Central Peak. A disciple's natural endowments would be carefully investigated when they entered the sect. Sanyue would have a record of any particular talents. Paramount spiritual senses were extremely uncommon, and it was even more rare for a person who had one to be able to maintain their basic common intellect and enter the Way. They were practically incompatible with the medicine and toolmaking ways, which had such high requirements for "steadiness." If Hui Xiangjun, possessing a paramount spiritual sense, had succeeded in entering the way of toolmaking, that would have been a miracle. Sanyue couldn't have attached so little value to her.

Everything he had experienced in the Unbound Furnace had given him a strange feeling, and with Xi Ping's negligible cultivation at the time, caught half a step from an ascended spirit, it wasn't very likely that either Xiang Rong or Xuanwu would have let him feel a sense of strangeness—if he really had faced the two of them, there probably wouldn't even have been time for a thought to flash through his mind before he was utterly destroyed.

So...it could only have been Zhuoming who had tampered with the Unbound Furnace.

Zhuoming, who at the time had seemed prepared to resign himself to his fate.

In the Unbound Furnace, Xi Ping had briefly explained his ideas to his san-ge, from the ancient demonic god of the heartless lotus, to Zhuoming being able to change other plants within the Sanyue Mountains into heartless lotuses, and further to Xi Ping having seen Qiu Sha's face in a bubble in the water... Putting all of it together, the two of them had arrived separately at the same guess, that the Heartless Lotus's power was likely reverse body snatching: kill the body, imprison the consciousness.

That was a big problem. They both had accompanying plants, and to Zhuoming's eyes, everything Xi Ping did with reincarnation wood was crystal clear. That baldy had a paramount spiritual sense, and his cultivation was higher than Xi Ping's. If he said anything to san-ge, the Heartless Lotus's omnipresent eyes would catch it. No one knew how the "reverse body snatching" worked or how to protect against it.

But one thing Xi Ping was certain of. If Zhuoming had malicious intent, with his amateur level, making a fake consciousness or something like that certainly wouldn't take him in.

“If I were the Heartless Lotus, the whole of the Sanyue Mountain Range, even Dongheng City, might not have any blind spots for me. No matter where you hid your seed, I would be able to tell at a glance—apart from inside yourself,” Zhou Ying had said to him then. “The shard of Zhaoting dares to light up to oppose shed skins. No one would want to alert your shifu. But I know that, in order to protect him, you would confine his line of sight to within your spirit. I would also use that to avoid him. In your spirit, beside the shard of Zhaoting, is the only place I wouldn’t touch.”

Therefore, Xi Ping had wrapped up his last reincarnation wood seed in a mind clearing pill and swallowed it.

This lowest grade of elixirs had gone straight to his spirit and calmed his perturbed emotions amid the flashing lightning and booming thunder. At the same time, it had also hidden a silent seed beneath Zhaoting’s light.

During the time Xi Ping had spent talking to Qiu Sha, the seed had naturally sprouted. To the accompaniment of Zhaoting’s urgent and angry trembling, the sliver of his consciousness hidden in the seed had reappeared within his spirit as the seed had sprouted. “Shifu, this time I might be able to trick my way into another new power...ow!”

Zhaoting had hit him.

Next, the seed was completely annihilated by Zhaoting's light, and Xi Ping's consciousness struggled entirely free from inside the seed and was completely restored within his body. In the blink of an eye, he had removed the remaining heartless lotus traces from his senses.

Xi Ping violently pushed Zhuoming away with sword energy, swept out with his hand, then put the Unbound Furnace away in his mustard seed and made a grab for the furnace flame in the water.

He had been worried before that Zhuoming had completely controlled the Unbound Furnace. Now it seemed that he still had a chance!

But he couldn't grab the furnace flame. It stayed where it was, not moving a hair. Instead, it burned his hand.

Xi Ping didn't turn a hair—never mind a scalding, even getting cooked crispy on the outside and tender on the inside would be like a gentle breeze compared to Zhuoming tearing out his consciousness. Next, he saw a human figure flash inside the flame; without any hesitation, he sent his consciousness into it.

Zhuoming was going crazy. As the successor of a demonic god himself, he knew that without a full moon sage to intimidate him, the moment Xi Ping's consciousness had been restored, he would certainly have poured it into countless reincarnation wood trees, like a drop of water falling in the ocean. He wouldn't be able to catch him again.

“Die!”

His rage was like the volcanoes on the various islands of Southern Shu. As soon as it erupted, his already inadequate reason simply couldn't put a stop to it.

When Zhuoming had been young, an unknown little bird had flown into his home by mistake. Its plumage had been as splendid as though it had dressed itself in a whole spring and summer. He had been wild with joy, had meticulously mended a little cage. He had loved the little bird so much he hadn't known what to do with himself.

Unfortunately, his heart had always been worthless. That little bird had first beaten itself bloody against the cage, then refused to eat. Very soon it had died.

Ever since, Zhuoming had hated all winged things.

Everything he trusted, liked, admired, wished to keep...all of it would desert him, without exception. No matter what innovative freakishness he came up with, no one would give him a second look.

It seemed that he was destined to have nothing, his only companions those rancid, stinking lotus roots.

The consciousness Zhuoming had left inside the furnace fire attacked like an avalanche. Though the lotus roots couldn't withstand a single blow from the sword energy, he was also a force to be reckoned with when it came to consciousnesses. The beams of consciousness Xi Ping had sent into the water were throttled as soon as they met him. The blazing flame in the water pulled in his whole arm. The constant injury to his consciousness was making his temples ache fiercely.

But there was no time to waste on the lunatic. If they kept flailing like this, they might summon back Xiang Ning.

Xi Ping quickly abandoned his contest of consciousnesses against Zhuoming. He pulled out the Tai Sui Qin one-handed and played a few incisive notes that went in pursuit of Zhuoming's main body.

A paralyzed ascended spirit like Zhuoming, who spent every day ripping himself apart, wouldn't have very strong fighting skills. Before, he had only kept Xi Ping down by relying on his higher cultivation level. Now they were both ascended spirits; Xi Ping could have given him a big bump on the head just by taking a swing at him with the Tai Sui Qin. The notes coming in at different angles sliced off half the heartless lotuses, sending Zhuoming dodging desperately all over the place, forcing his true body all the way to the vicinity of the furnace flame. Xi Ping unexpectedly pulled the Unbound Furnace out of his mustard seed and tossed the two of them along with the flame into the Unbound Furnace's big cauldron.

As soon as the furnace flame entered the furnace, the originally bean-sized flame flared up with a roar, the fire expanding the cramped space inside the furnace until it was boundless, with space to hold mountains and swallow seas. Then it flung Zhuoming's consciousness away as well, and it vanished in the universe within the furnace.

Xi Ping shook his arm, tossing away the scorched, truncated limb. Bone quickly grew from his torn sleeve, then agile meridians along with flesh and blood wrapped up the bones at dazzling speed. In the blink of an eye, it was as good as new.

The heartless lotuses below Zhuoming's waist had turned into ordinary human legs. The two of them glanced at each other across a distance of dozens of zhang. Zhuoming abruptly flew off in a certain direction.

Xi Ping turned his head and saw that in the distance was a mountain covered in late-autumn red, toweringly high, with a cluster of a particular kind of ancient tree growing at its summit.

Unlike the reincarnation wood, which usually lay chaotically all over the place, these trees were as tall and straight as if they had been drawn with a ruler. They were over ten zhang tall. It was clear at a glance that this was hardwood. Layer upon layer of broad leaves blotted out the sky. Exquisite white flowers that had yet to entirely fall mixed with the clouds. It was unclear at first look what was flower and what was cloud.

Growing on the summit, it was as if the mountain had grown another mountain.

Clear music sounded in the distance. A blue luan flitted through the trees, its long tail, like the hems of a dress, leaving a rainbow in midair.

Living alongside late-autumn red, growing high among the clouds, auspicious animals appearing around it...could this be the legendary eternal spring brocade?

Xi Ping hadn't realized it at first, because he really hadn't expected eternal spring brocade to look like this. Lin Chi and Qiu Sha had both said eternal spring brocade was "fragile." Both had lowered their voices when speaking of it, as if eternal spring brocade were a dandelion that they might blow away if they used too much breath speaking. After that, who could have expected that this big tree would be about as “fragile” as the Azure Dragon Towers?

Was there something wrong with those two?

Zhuoming had already flown toward that summit a step ahead of him.

It was already too late to chase after him. The little lotus seal once again flashed before Xi Ping’s eyes; he was again trapped by the heartless lotuses.

Damn it! Just looking at that monstrous baldy could get you on the hook!

Zhuoming knew that his consciousness was already dispersed and he wouldn’t be able to catch him. He only trapped him in place for a moment. When Xi Ping had cleared away the heartless lotus’s seal and escaped, the heartless lotus’s roots had already stabbed into the trunks of the eternal spring brocade like leeches.

Zhuoming had acquired the furnace flame from Qiu Sha for the purpose of plotting against Xiang Rong; he wasn’t very interested in Hui Xiangjun, who had been dead for eight centuries—those with a paramount spiritual sense often had a kind of arrogance and world-weariness, as if they had seen through everything, and didn’t bother to listen to others’ teachings—so while he had acquired the Unbound Furnace, he had only casually put it away at the bottom of the lotus pond and hadn't been in a hurry to look at it.

But if the Misty Willow wanted to steal it, that was a different matter.

In an instant, the vast information passed on from the ancient demonic god nearly drowned him. Eternal spring brocade was the way of toolmaking. Unlike the way of the sword, which staked everything on one throw, the way of toolmaking was extremely complex, able to attempt fathoming all of nature, one twig and one leaf at a time.

Like the surface of the ocean absorbing water, Zhuoming greedily gobbled up this Way of the Heart in big gulps. There was more than his sense organs could bear; they had torn from the strain. His face was covered in blood, his mouth split open to the roots of his ears—if he couldn't capture the Misty Willow, then he would completely digest the Unbound Furnace, the thing he wanted most, make him sit there watching how the thing he had faced the might of a full moon sage desperately trying to get disappeared!

Just then, Xi Ping finally caught up. Before he got there, the qin music swept over.

Zhuoming dodged. Laughing, he said, “Why do you only know this one move?”

“Does it matter?” Xi Ping let off three strokes in a row without pause, sealing off his line of retreat. “It just needs to be able to cut you down!”

Zhuoming simply didn't dodge. Like a ghost, he seeped straight into the trunk of the eternal spring brocade. The Tai Sui Qin's sword energy rushed straight toward the tree!

Xi Ping jumped. With a flicker, he arrived in front of the eternal spring brocade's trunk, hastily blocking the sword energy flying toward it. He was tossed dozens of zhang away by the sword energy he himself had played. His back collided with another eternal spring brocade tree.

A large quantity of lotus stalks exploded from the eternal spring brocade, twining around his limbs like thick cords, breaking the fingers he used to play the qin. The next moment, an established foundation fire talisman knocked the lotus stalks away.

But the talisman couldn't injure the lotus stalks.

Though Xi Ping was at an ascended spirit cultivation level, his talismans were still of a lower level—these were the results of his cramming from before. Otherwise, basically all the talismans he could readily use were of half-immortal grade, which might have made Zhuoming's lotus roots die of laughter.

Xi Ping quickly turned his head and saw more and more eternal spring brocade polluted by lotus stalks. This represented Zhuoming quickly encroaching on the Way of the Heart within the eternal spring brocade.

Once the Heartless Lotus had complete control over the Unbound Furnace, the Unbound Furnace would be useless. Even if Lin Chi swallowed up Rosy Cloud Peak and became a shed skin or a full moon sage overnight, he still wouldn't be able to control the Unbound Furnace...so wouldn't everything that had come before have been for nothing?

Xi Ping was afraid of harming the eternal spring brocade and held himself back, not daring to use shifu's attacks in the forest. In desperation, he was simply ready to try anything; without hesitation, he used all the methods he had crammed recently.

But all the powers he had crammed then were established foundation grade, and he hadn't even had any time to gain a thorough understanding of them. His arrangements were a complete mess.

Zhuoming dodged and blocked skillfully. The more panicked Xi Ping became, the more excited that damn baldy was, stopping and starting inside the eternal spring brocade forest as if playing to an audience.

“Where did you learn that move? Doesn’t Xuanyin Mountain teach basic talisman skills?”

“Nicely done, but it’s useless, hee-hee!”

“Why don’t you appeal to higher authority at the last moment, learn another couple of sword moves from your shifu? General Zhi, who snatched the name of Sword of the South away from Xiang Zhao as soon as he became an ascended spirit, only taught his disciple a single move, tsk-tsk, and he’s nearly all used up. Zhaoting’s technique will become a lost art... Ah, you’re worked up.”

Xi Ping had nearly drained his own essence dry in one breath. His vision darkened briefly. But he still couldn’t clear the heartless lotus from the eternal spring brocade.

The next moment, there was a buzzing in his ears—the heartless lotus’s lotus seal had at some point once again seeped into his ears. Xi Ping was once again trapped in place.

His figure stiffened. A lotus stalk pierced through his chest.

Boom—

Yet another eternal spring brocade tree was wrapped up entirely in lotus stalks. Leaves fell in droves, leaving only solid and hard-pressed bare branches.

Zhuoming curled up inside the eternal spring brocade forest, exposing only his head. With malicious enjoyment, he watched Xi Ping's staring face.

“You'll never get the Unbound Furnace now.”

As if he thought this wasn't enough, the heartless lotus stalk piercing Xi Ping's chest turned into an ashen pale hand that rummaged around breaking ribs for a moment, then seized Xi Ping's heart.

“I can't catch you,” said a mouth that had opened on the back of that hand, softly and with emphasis, “can't kill you, can't have you.

“But I can make you wish you were dead! Hahaha...”

The laughter produced countless echoes. Zhuoming's sinister expression once again twisted his features, sending them running all over his face. He crushed Xi Ping's heart—

“Huh?”

Wait, this didn't feel right.

Zhuoming froze. The echoes of his laughter were still resonating through the valley. Underneath them was an indistinct sound of tearing paper.

The features of the “Xi Ping” whom he had turned into a human skewer faded. His body drooped limply, fluttering in the wind like a kite... It was a paperman that had been tangling with Zhuoming all this time.

The real one had vanished long ago.

A ke earlier, Xi Ping had sent out a paperman and simultaneously contacted Lin Chi to learn an ascended spirit talisman at the last moment. Using that talisman as soon as he learned it, he had burrowed into the mountain.

The inside of the mountain was even more magnificent than the outside. The tangled and complex parasitic roots of the late-autumn red were like a maze. Xi Ping carefully avoided touching the savage vines. He explored inward, following the parasitic roots...and then he saw the most stunning trees he had ever beheld.

The exposed trunks of the eternal brocade were ten zhang tall, but the root system underground was as long as the mountain was tall, reaching from the clouds all the way to the earth.

Xi Ping tentatively reached out to touch it. He felt that this tree root was more solid than all the valuable timber he had ever seen. The feel of it even put him in mind of Moon Plated Gold, which had the greatest hardness.

He raised his head, attached his spiritual sense to his ears, and looked into the heart of the mountain—there was a flame the height of a person there.

Xi Ping walked over. The surrounding earth and stone automatically moved aside, making a small space for him and the fire. “I knew I would be able to meet you here.”

No sooner had he spoken than a human figure appeared in the flame.

This was a young woman, attired in the garishly bright and colorful ancient Chu fashion, but her eyes contained a kind of serene benevolence. She observed Xi Ping, the uninvited guest, with a smile, so vivid that she seemed to still be alive... Compared to her, the “Hui Xiangjun” Zhuoming had copied inside the Unbound Furnace was a crude and simple charcoal sketch.

The Hui Xiangjun in the flames also couldn't answer—she wasn't a living person, either. The flames turned to nothingness when Xi Ping tried to approach. She was like an eternally untouchable flower in a mirror, the moon reflected in water.

Xi Ping considered. He sat down at approximately the distance of a tea table away from the flame and placed the Tai Sui Qin across his knees. “My guess is that the Way of the Heart in the eternal spring brocade at the summit is the eternal spring brocade's Way of the Heart. It isn't you.”

The woman in the flames tilted her head slightly as if responding to him:
But I am the eternal spring brocade.

“What's wrapped up inside the fire in the furnace actually isn't the Way of the Heart you inherited from the ancient demonic god, right?” Xi Ping said softly. “Master Lin said there was no flame in the Unbound Furnace. The Unbound Furnace in fact didn't have a flame. If my guess is correct, this ‘fire’ is the last work you created before your death.

“Its raw material was you yourself.”

CHAPTER 140 - Eternal Flame (22)

The moment Xi Ping exposed the origin of the flame in front of him, a very mystical thing happened.

The inextinguishable flame dissipated without warning, and Hui Xiangjun stood before him as though she were a living person.

She was too close. Even her eyelashes and the fine freckles on her face were complete to the smallest detail. When she bent down, her long braid fell on Xi Ping, who was sitting there...then passed through him.

Out of nowhere, Xi Ping felt a twinge of regret: still only a shadow.

“Shh.” She raised a finger. “Don’t ask questions. I can’t answer you, I’m already dead. Just listen to me.”

Xi Ping looked at her in bewilderment—the legendary Hui Xiangjun had spoken...and he couldn’t understand her!

Over the last century or two, because of the gradual development of transportation, there had been frequent trade between the nations of Wan and Chu, and their languages had mingled considerably as well. They had borrowed both grammar and lexicon from each other. For a person from Wan, the Chu language had become a foreign language it was relatively easy to learn the basics of...a completely different story from Ancient Chu!

Moreover, Hui Xiangjun spoke very fast. How fast? For example, if she and Lin Chi split the difference, the two of them would both be normal.

Out of a whole long speech, Xi Ping only understood the beginning and the end.

No wonder Qiu Sha hadn't understood what she was saying for eight years.

“I don't know which country you come from or how many years have passed,” Hui Xiangjun said, smiling. “If you can find me, it must mean you've already seen the Law Breaker and the Riverward, right? I left the Riverward to Xiao Qiu, but I couldn't give her the Law Breaker. Once I'm gone, Xiao Qiu will have no restraint. If she and the Law Breaker get together, it'll mean big trouble. I want to have the Law Breaker find a firm and steady master. Is that you?”

Xi Ping's ears were ringing. He could only just pick out a few words like “firm and steady,” which sounded like they didn't have much to do with him.

“Lin-shishu, help!” Xi Ping had no more extra reincarnation wood on him, but fortunately he was already an ascended spirit. It was much easier for him to swap places with reincarnation wood. He put his fingers together and cut off a strand of his own hair. When it landed in his palm, it became a reincarnation wood twig.

At this moment, flying Heavenly Questions filled the sky over the Xuanyin Mountains. There seemed to have been a major disturbance in Western Chu’s Sanyue. The Luwu didn’t dare to approach; news had yet to be verified. Xi Ping had only said a few words before running off every time, and he hadn’t said anything clear. Lin Chi simply couldn’t keep up with General Zhi’s mad dog of a disciple. All he could do was use his consciousness to flip through all the talisman texts on Moon Plated Peak, stuffing everything he saw into his head indiscriminately, afraid that Xi Ping would suddenly appear and ask him for something else.

Pity the toolmaking genius of the age. When his consciousness arrived in the reincarnation wood, he was still nervously reciting to himself offensive talismans he would never use in his life.

“What is it now?! I have a few talismans here, but I’ve never used them and I don’t know what the results will be, you must...” When Lin Chi got halfway through saying this, Xi Ping raised the “tree branch translator” in front of the image. The Golden Hand was dumbfounded. For a time, he lost his powers of speech. He mumbled, “You... She...”

The voice and expressions of the person before his eyes were the same as before, like an unfading dream.

Lin Chi held his breath involuntarily, scared of waking up—waking, he couldn’t even hold on to a piece of wood.

But Hui Xiangjun wouldn’t recognize her old friend again. Her eyes, looking out from eight hundred years before, couldn’t see anyone, and they certainly couldn’t see a hastily broken off twig. She continued speaking: “I hope that you won’t use the Law Breaker to do anything cruel and ruthless. Even the spiritual mountains will receive backlash from mortals, never mind me and her. My power is very limited. It can’t withstand the enmity of millions of people united. It might go out if that happens... Ah, but I suppose I’m just scaring myself over nothing. The Law Breaker contains unbound stars. She understands destiny and the trends of affairs. She will choose the most suitable master and the best moment to appear—I don’t know how many of my old friends are still living. I’d like them to have a look at the future in my stead.”

“What...what is she? How can she be here?” Lin Chi asked Xi Ping in alarm, his mind a blank. “What does she mean?”

“Shishu,” Xi Ping said, sighing. Whenever he used this form of address when not being supervised by General Zhi, it would be followed by something unreasonable eighty percent of the time. “If I understood her, why would I be asking you?”

Only then did Lin Chi realize that a young person wouldn’t be able to understand Ancient Chu very well and gave him an incoherent translation of her general meaning. Even talking himself breathless, he still couldn’t keep up with the speed of Hui Xiangjun’s speech. He could only pick out a few key words from every sentence. Fortunately, Xi Ping had spent many years in Chu. If he listened very attentively, he wasn’t completely incapable of understanding. Following Lin Chi’s prompting and making guesses, he could get the gist.

Perhaps Hui Xiangjun’s mind was too quick. Not only was her speech so fast it exhausted Lin Chi, she also got off topic very easily. After getting halfway into explaining the Law Breaker, she changed the subject and went off to ask after her friends from the past—Xi Ping hadn’t heard of the majority of the people she mentioned. Likely they were from the Lancang Mountains; presumably their bones were already cold.

During this interval, Xi Ping let her keep playing automatically and quickly refined the story of his theft of the Unbound Furnace to dump on Lin Chi all at once.

After hearing it, Master Lin Chi didn't make a sound. He was choked.

“Though Xiang Rong got tricked into his grave by Zhuoming, he did in fact succeed in reaching a full moon position, so in other words, the principles I saw in the Unbound Furnace at the beginning were true—if it had been pure nonsense, Sanyue's sect leader wouldn't have fallen for it,” Xi Ping said at a speed comparable to Hui Xiangjun's. “Adding in what Qiu Sha told me, that ‘the spiritual mountains are a big Law Breaker,’ I have a guess. All spiritual energy has a master. The spiritual energy released by every spiritual stone that comes within a country's borders automatically receives the spiritual mountains' brand.

“Within the scope of the spiritual mountains' authority, anyone cycling spiritual energy to cultivate, or even anyone breathing in order to live, has to use spiritual energy branded by the spiritual mountains. You end up beholden to whoever feeds you—no matter who it is, they'll all be controlled by the spiritual mountains' ‘rules’... Do you remember during the Zhao family treason, when all the spiritual energy within Great Wan was prohibited? With just one order, apart from the shed skin elders who represent them, the spiritual mountains made it so no one else could use spiritual energy.

“But my san-ge had the Riverward then, and he could still use it, which means that the Law Breaker and the Riverward don’t use ‘spiritual energy that has a master’—especially the Law Breaker. Within the scope of the Law Breaker, not only can it remove the mark of the spiritual mountains from spiritual energy, it can also put its own axioms in place, becoming a small spiritual mountain itself. So the question is, where does the ‘masterless spiritual energy’ the Law Breaker and Riverward use come from?”

Lin Chi finally caught his breath and mumbled, “Before the spiritual mountains formed, all spiritual energy was masterless... Yes, a long time ago, she told me so, but I didn’t understand it then. I thought she was only speaking metaphorically to mock the spiritual mountains for controlling the human world... What she said was always so bold and unrestrained...”

“If the principles of the Law Breaker and the Riverward are so simple, why has no one else been able to make them? Why did she only leave behind these two things? Why is there a limit on the Riverward’s number of uses, and a limit on the Law Breaker’s range?” Xi Ping said. “Also, before her death, she used the Riverward to send Qiu Sha away and told Qiu Sha to hide under the Lancang Mountains for eight centuries so she could accumulate enough cultivation to become an ascended spirit, then break the law that ‘evil cultivators can’t be ascended spirits’ as soon as she emerged. But she herself offered no resistance. I haven’t been able to understand that no matter how I thought about it. Until I saw that furnace flame that could burn within water or ice—I think that she couldn't use the Law Breaker and the Riverward.”

Lin Chi said, “...What?”

“When she mentioned the Law Breaker just now, she said ‘my power is limited.’ My guess is that she herself is sustaining the Law Breaker and the Riverward.” Xi Ping softened and slowed his voice slightly. “She had an accompanying plant. She used the Unbound Furnace to refine herself into the furnace flame. The furnace flame is the source of the Law Breaker and the Riverward’s power.”

In the human world controlled by the spiritual mountains, she had lit herself into a flame that would never go out, prying up a rift in the impenetrable spiritual mountains. That was why the Law Breaker and the Riverward could be truly activated, why Qiu Sha could become an ascended spirit, why Tao County could become a place where spiritual energy was prohibited.

That was why a hole could open in the fine meshes of the net of heaven.

She was...the wedge stuck in the crack, the person who had opened up an opportunity to live, the person who could never be saved.

“I heard that when she was captured, she offered absolutely no resistance. Even an ant clings to its lowly life, let alone an ascended spirit elder at Lancang. You heard her read off a whole laundry list of friends. Clearly she was well-liked in Lancang back then. If it really came to blows, those people might very well have been willing to let her slip away. But my guess is that she had already become the furnace flame by then and prompted the Riverward to take Qiu Sha away. All that remained was a drop of her consciousness inside a shell to make arrangements for after her death. She wouldn’t have had any more powers.”

Lin Chi’s consciousness was shaken. Even the twig he was residing in began to quiver slightly.

Just then, this woman who was reputed to be capable of talking to herself for a hundred twenty years said, “Oh, right, there’s also that kid Lin Zisheng.”

There was no need for a translation now. Xi Ping understood, too.

Hui Xiangjun paused, then began to laugh. “That kid is pretty full of ideas, but the Lin family has kept him too pure. He’s timid and shy. He certainly won’t go out of his way to make trouble. If nothing has gone wrong, I suppose he’s still living? How is he now? Did Xuanyin Mountain let him out in the end?”

Xi Ping felt that even Lin Chi's consciousness was trembling and was afraid his Way of the Heart would go amiss. "Lin-shishu?"

"No...no, that's not..." Lin Chi said almost incoherently. "The Gold Imitation Technique was a disaster of my own making. If not for me...if not for me..."

Hui Xiangjun's voice perfectly interrupted his babbling: "If you get the chance to see him, tell him for me—don't be afraid."

Lin Chi abruptly shut his mouth.

Through the reincarnation wood, he met Hui Xiangjun's narrow eyes. The form of her features was the same as Qiu Sha's, but there wasn't such a stark contrast between black and white. With a change of color, the difference in temperament was colossal.

Hui Xiangjun's eyes were rather light, like two limpid pieces of colored glass. Her brows were pale, and so were her lips. There was a moderate amount of flesh on her bones; her outlines didn't seem as fierce as the tall and sturdy Late-Autumn Red. It made her seem far gentler. She was a good-looking but not dazzling young woman.

This was his elder, his dear friend, his guide, a wild fantasy forever out of reach.

The fifth year after Lin Chi had entered the way of toolmaking, he had received no less than a thousand rebukes from his shizun to “act within the rules, do not indulge in fantasy.” Each day was painful. He suspected that he had chosen the wrong Way of the Heart. Just then, all the great sects were sending specialists from the toolmaking way to visit the great nation of spiritual beasts, Southern Shu, to inspect spiritual beast materials. Xuanyin sent him and another shixiong so they could see something of the world along the way.

Someone must have been having bad luck that year. A rare accident took place at the spiritual beast market: due to improper safety measures, some giant clam monsters escaped and just happened to destroy the array of the great roc animal spirit. The great roc went out of control, stirring up a revolt in the spiritual beast market. A disaster swept through the South Sea; the whole island was in utter confusion. The cultivators were all temporarily trapped there.

It was then that they just happened to meet Hui Xiangjun.

At the time, Hui Xiangjun was already an ascended spirit in Lancang. She had become the way of toolmaking’s hero of the moment. As a senior, she was helping to maintain order and protect the established foundations and half-immortals.

His shixiong was extremely excited. When the situation calmed slightly, he dragged Lin Chi over so they could pay their respects.

It cost Lin Chi a great effort to do this. This was an ascended spirit senior, a guest elder at Lancang. All his life, his greatest fear had been this kind of authoritative senior. At home, he feared his father, and once he entered the spiritual mountains, he feared his shizun. On seeing his family's Dignitary of Rule ancestor, he would turn mute on the spot—and since the Dignitary of Rule also couldn't readily open his mouth seal, each time the two of them met, their greetings and exchanged good wishes were all silent, like two shadow puppets that had forgotten to bring their accompaniment.

And what was more, Elder Hui was a woman. Lin Chi had a timid disposition, and his upbringing had been strict. The tendons of his legs would twist themselves into knots if he spoke to any woman apart from his own mother.

She clearly filled the requirements of both types of people Lin Chi feared most, yet she was also completely different.

There was nothing in her manner of a senior or a master. Her behavior and bearing seemed to belong to a teenager who would never grow up. It wasn't crude, thoughtless childishness—it was as if she always had inexhaustible patience and curiosity.

The unchanging clear breezes and bright moon, the Southern Shu fruits that all tasted about the same, the useless common objects of others...all of them could give her pause. No matter how stupid the nonsense a junior asking instruction of her said, she could always find a point of interest in it, then use plain layman's language to "ask for instruction" concerning the junior's thoughts; often, within a few words, she could "ask" them back onto the right track, and make them feel as if she hadn't taught them the answer, they had worked it out for themselves.

For some reason, she liked Lin Chi on sight. During the days they were trapped on the island, she was always coming over to tease him.

In the space of only a few days, without realizing it, Lin Chi had said everything he hadn't dared to say in front of his shifu to her. The ideas his shizun had denounced as "sheer nonsense" were all proper and reasonable to her. The way of toolmaking, which had made him so sick at heart, drew him in like a kaleidoscope.

For the first time, Lin Chi gathered up his courage and exchanged communication devices with another person. After that, every time he had an insight, he would write a letter to the Lancang Mountains right away, and at latest he would receive a response the next day. Sometimes it would hit the nail on the head and pierce through his perplexities, and sometimes it would come back with many even more bizarre ideas that were far off topic.

Though cultivators were unaging, time would still leave its invisible traces. Those seniors who had spent hundreds of years jolting around between heaven and earth, even if they had baby faces, still made you bow when you saw them. Only Hui Xiangjun, who had roamed over the earth and turned her back on her home, still behaved the same as ever, untouched by the elements. Lin Chi often forgot that she was an ascended spirit senior. Without realizing it, he began to address her by her given name, then realized with a start that he had already been rudely calling her that for a long time... Unavoidably, in the Xuanyin Mountains, where spring breezes were forbidden, there was still soil where beautiful notions could sprout.

Lin Chi was in an utter panic, not daring to utter a single word to betray his feelings. Because they were in the immortal mountains, a marriage alliance would be legitimate, but pining was disgraceful. Marriage was open and aboveboard under the justice of heaven and men, while sentiment was unsightly baseness and depravity.

There were no marriage alliances between different immortal mountains, and even if there had been, there would have been no chance for a minor disciple like him.

So he madly buried himself in cultivation, boiling up all his brains asking Hui Xiangjun all kinds of tricky and abstruse questions, deliberately measuring the distance between a genius and a mere craftsman from her light and casual responses, over and over, using this to flog his own wishful thinking. Unexpectedly, it made him stand out among the toolmakers of his generation.

In Xuanyin's inner sect, established foundation disciples were often sent out to run errands. His shizun knew that he was scared of people and wanted to train him whenever a chance came up. Wherever Great Wan had immortal tools that required servicing, he would order him to go. Anywhere that required the inner sect to service immortal tools or arrays, there had to be a major natural disaster that walkers in the mortal world couldn't handle. Within a few short decades, Lin Chi witnessed all the misery of the mortal world. This gave the pampered young master the greatest shock. Because of this, he conceived an idea: it would be a good thing if everyone in the world could use spiritual energy like the people of the cultivation sects.

Amid the towering floods of the Xia River, he casually jotted this thought down, as usual sending it to Hui Xiangjun squashed in among some other disjointed notions. But for once she waited a long time before responding with a letter he didn't really understand at the time.

“All my life it has perplexed me, why heaven should be heaven, and if the roof were to collapse under the weight of the plants pressing down on it, which way it would fall. With this idea from my young friend, it is as though I have been filled with sudden wisdom. I send this item as a gift. Be sure to use it well.”

In the package that accompanied the letter was an item that brought about disaster.

CHAPTER 141 - Eternal Flame (23)

This was a solid ball made up of soft metal, almost the same color as steel, softer than pure gold. The rich play of spiritual energy surging over its surface was practically visible to the naked eye. This gave the originally silver-white ball a faint coating of golden light.

Lin Chi found to his astonishment that it could conduct spiritual energy like a cultivator's meridians.

The Moon Plated Gold of later generations could also conduct spiritual energy. The “downgraded immortal tools” the nobility played with were all constructed based on this particular property. But the spiritual energy Moon Plated Gold could sustain was extremely limited. When it burned a spiritual stone, nearly all the spiritual energy was wasted for nothing. The amount that could be put to use through Moon Plated Gold was in reality less than one ten thousandth; if there were any more, it would fuse. It couldn't even activate the absolute most basic half-immortal talisman.

Downgraded immortal tools were both expensive and impractical. They were little used and little made. Because different arrays on gold smelting furnaces could smelt Moon Plated Gold that was either soft as gauze or a hundred times harder than steel, it had many uses. It had later been taken to mortal factories to make all kinds of machinery.

This was also an inviolable rule—established foundations had no right to “listen to heaven,” half-immortals had no right to “conduct inscriptions,” and mortals, even if they burned up a whole mountain of spiritual stones, could at most set off some relatively large fireworks; they couldn’t budge the threshold of the spiritual mountains.

But the spirit-conducting gold Hui Xiangjun had sent him could preserve fifty to sixty percent of the spiritual energy in a spiritual stone it activated.

This meant that, reasonably speaking, it would only take having a quantity of spiritual stones equivalent to twice the essence of an ordinary ascended spirit cultivator for a mortal who hadn’t cultivated a day in their life to use the appropriate immortal tools to do whatever an ascended spirit could do.

If it had been Xi Ping in his place, always wandering on the border between righteous and evil, his first reaction would certainly have been to marvel at the heresy of this thing: this lark-like young woman couldn’t be judged by appearances any more than his san-ge—she was also the type that might bring the sky tumbling down any moment.

But the innocent and shy young master who found himself in that position had grown up reading holy texts and listening to the teachings of the immortal mountains. He was whole-heartedly devoted to following in the Southern Sage's footsteps, cultivating with his mind full of "bringing peace to all living beings"—as if he himself didn't belong to "all living beings."

Lin Chi had been wild with joy.

While he once again had the feeling of gazing up at a tall mountain, with the keenness of a toolmaker, countless uses for this thing leapt to mind: no longer would farmers need to wait with their faces in the dirt and their backs to the sky for heaven to bestow its favor, no longer would craftsmen need to travel far and wide carrying boulders of hundreds of jin on their backs; henceforth, all natural and manmade disasters could be dealt with; it wouldn't take even a full day to fly from Jinping to Yuzhou... Wasn't this a great achievement that would change the whole world?

Lin Chi, loving this little metal ball too much to part with it, began to study and analyze it. Only once he began did he discover the disparity—he couldn't find the trick for it no matter what.

Expending tremendous efforts, he repeatedly carved metal-refining arrays, but his copies were all failures, vastly unlike the original. Though they were successful in activating spiritual stones, the spiritual energy they could use was minuscule, as if there were an invisible upper limit, and no matter how he tried, he couldn't overstep that boundary.

He knew that he was missing a very important step, but Hui Xiangjun's letter hadn't explained anything, and after sending this thing to him, she had gone into seclusion, planning to create some great work; she had set up a "do not disturb for one hundred years" array.

Lin Chi spent nearly a full sixty-year-cycle working hard on his own. Fortunately, the Lin family had great resources and could support such a waste of spiritual stones. In the end, he didn't manage to copy the "spirit-conducting gold," but his efforts to the neglect of all else couldn't have been called wasted, either. He had cultivated from an early established foundation to a peak established foundation, raising his level at a speed unprecedented within the Xuanyin Mountains, far surpassing his peers, putting his name down with the Dignitary of Rule ancestor. Even his always stern shifu ceased to meddle with him.

When the Dignitary of Rule High Elder had already announced that Moon Plated Peak would be assigned to him, letting him take his position as one of the thirty-six peak masters as soon as he became an ascended spirit, a great fog suddenly rose in the Sea of Stars. Soon after, hundreds of meteorites fell in the East Sea. Strange phenomena appeared in the skies. Nearly half the moon became bloody. All signs pointed to the south.

The four other nations had no idea what was happening. They sent a flurry of messages to ask Southern He for an explanation, but the Lancang Mountains only said that they had no comment to make. For a time, rumors flew everywhere. Some said a highly placed person in Lancang was carrying on evil arts—turning living people into puppets, using blood sacrifices to create spiritual energy...and much more along those lines.

After hearing about this, Lin Chi was very worried and wrote Hui Xiangjun yet another letter, not expecting that he would receive a response only a few days later. She had left seclusion ahead of schedule, and she said she had made two interesting little toys, one called the “Law Breaker,” the other called the “Riverward,” both inspired by him. She asked him to be sure to come Lancang to have a look when he had a chance...but in the end, he never did embark on that journey south.

That year, the strange phenomena were only the beginning. It dimly seemed that something had enraged the Way of Heaven.

There were frequent natural disasters in the five nations. Within Great Wan, there was first a great earthquake in Ning’an, the likes of which hadn’t been seen for several centuries, which nearly broke Jinping’s Dragon Vein. Then it was the whole country, large-scale droughts in the north and flooding in the south. A fatal pestilence rose over the sea; the epidemic spread wildly. The spiritual mountains were everywhere putting out fires, having more business than they could attend to. Lin Chi, an established foundation disciple who was so valuable in the eyes of his elders, certainly couldn't escape.

Not long after he received Hui Xiangjun's letter, he was sent along with others from the sect to Guzhou, which was adjacent to the South Sea, to clear away the pestilence. The pestilence was even denser than they had imagined. Before they could come to a decision as to how to act, there was a tidal wave in the South Sea.

A wall of water like a mountain stood straight up from the sea and charged toward the shore, instantly flattening three of Guzhou's cities. None of the crowd of walkers in the mortal world and inner sect established foundations had time to react.

If it had only been a tidal wave, when everyone recovered, they would perhaps have been able to deal with it. The trouble was that the seawater crashing against the shore carried a heavy pestilence, which was about to pour inland through the waterways. Even worse, under the water were hidden a bunch of monsters that had come out of nowhere; with a premeditated plan to take advantage of the chaos, they took the opportunity to charge onto the shore and wreck the border inscriptions and arrays.

Faced with the huge beasts and the tidal wave, the South Sea Navy may as well have been made of paper. There was nothing to be hoped for from them. The cultivators also had never seen this kind of spectacle before. As soon as they solved one problem, another came up; for a time, there was more than they could handle.

Lin Chi was swept away from his fellow sect members and surrounded by seven or eight monsters breathing pestilence. In these dire circumstances, he suddenly heard people shouting for help about ten li away from him. He split off his consciousness to look and saw that there was a Widows and Children Village there—Guzhou could be said to have the most rigid and conservative folk customs of all of Great Wan; women very rarely remarried after being bereaved of their husbands, and to avoid being caught up in malicious gossip, they would move to high ground and form communities with other widows to look after each other.

The floodwaters had submerged everything around them. The former high ground had become an island in imminent danger. There were at least ten households in this village, half of them with small children or solitary old women. Some monsters were watching the tender-skinned children, already throwing themselves toward the crowd with their bloody maws open.

Lin Chi saw that the situation was bad, but never mind saving them, as soon as he split off his attention, he himself was clawed by a monster. There was also no time to ask his fellow sect members to come help. In a moment of desperation, Lin Chi waved his long sleeve and tossed an immortal tool toward that little village.

This was a little boat he had made in his idle moments during the last decades while studying the spirit-conducting gold without results, using the “true gold” that Hui Xiangjun had sent him. As long as it had spiritual stones to burn, no matter what the cultivation level of the user...or even if they had no cultivation, they could still activate the established foundation grade array on the boat.

That boat saved the lives of thirty-six people, young and old, in that village, using ten liang of blue jade; there were no casualties in the whole village. Lin Chi’s situation, on the other hand, was desperate. His essence had nearly been hollowed out by the monsters. Fortunately, masters from Chu, Shu, He, and Wan, the four nations surrounding the South Sea, arrived one after another and took over the situation before he fell off his sword.

Lin Chi thought that help had come at last and fainted confidently.

By the time he woke up, that life-saving “boat of great merit” had already fallen into the hands of these four great sects.

There was no praise and no honors. Lin Chi had never expected to open his eyes to find himself on trial.

They questioned him: where had this heretical evil object come from?

The Sanyue Mountains' Elder Xiang Ning sent spit flying as he spoke: a bunch of women from a mountain village, who couldn't even write enough words to fill a basket, had actually activated an established foundation grade array without understanding anything about it—and fortunately Lin Chi himself couldn't make anything above the established foundation level—if the array on that evil object had been of ascended spirit grade, or even shed skin grade, then couldn't any random nobody shake the mountains and rock the seas? It was appalling!

Someone from Southern Shu's Lingyun said that it was no wonder it had been one disaster after another lately, strange phenomena appearing continuously; it was because this evil object that could throw ethics and virtue into turmoil had emerged.

Xuanyin Mountain stood their ground to defend him, but their words were empty and lacking in confidence; they clearly also knew that their own junior had caused great trouble.

Lin Chi was an awkward speaker and couldn't explain himself clearly at all. He couldn't offer up Hui Xiangjun, and he was stunned by the enormous injustice; he simply held his tongue and said nothing. Sanyue and Lingyun insisted overbearingly on performing a soul-searching on him. Xuanyin's Lin clan absolutely wouldn't permit it, and the people from Lancang must have sensed something; they stood vaguely on Xuanyin's side. The four great sects argued themselves into a mess, finally alerting Li far to the north.

The high priest of Northern Li's Kunlun set the final tone: spiritual energy entering the mortal world was inauspicious; this thing must be destroyed. If the one who had done this work did not proffer his methods and arts, it must be that he had an errant heart and ought to be punished with a soul-searching and removal of spiritual bones.

That was when Hui Xiangjun descended from the sky.

Whatever she had been doing, her energy was greatly injured; there was practically an elderly lack of agility in her every movement. Light as air, she reached out to pat Lin Chi on the shoulder and placed a silencing talisman on his throat—making him stand there and watch as she carried off the blame and left him with the title of “The Golden Hand.”

When she died, the spirit-conducting gold of that boat shattered. The so-called Moon Plated Gold that had come down to later generations was only the failed experiment Lin Chi had made in imitation of the true gold...so he persisted in calling the art of refining this metal the “Gold Imitation Technique.”

Over eight centuries, he had won fame through deception and borne unpardonable guilt. He had shut himself up on the summit of Moon Plated Peak, waiting for the Law Breaker and the Riverward to come into the world once more, waiting for Qiu Sha to come after him to take revenge.

Since becoming an ascended spirit, he hadn't taken a single step further along the way of toolmaking.

Later, his fellows in the toolmaking way had ingeniously designed many instantaneous communication devices, so you could practically have a conversation in realtime across vast distances, much more convenient than before.

But the letter he was waiting for would never again come flying toward him. There was no one to supply him with riddles to solve...and no one to understand what he said.

He only did his duty at the Xuanyin Mountains, counting the days and waiting until his essence was exhausted, brazenly holding on to the position of one of the thirty-six peak masters without doing a bit of work, accustomed to being silent and dull. If he hadn't accidentally gotten stuck with the walking disaster of a disciple from next door, he would probably have forgotten the feeling of sorrow and joy by now.

But that “Don’t be afraid” in the Unbound Furnace smashed the years of accumulated frost that covered him.

Lin Chi’s consciousness was curled up in the reincarnation wood twig. Back at the summit of Moon Plated Peak, there were tears streaming down his true body’s face, containing eight centuries of accumulated salt.

The image couldn’t hold a conversation with others. Hui Xiangjun’s gaze was only fixed mechanically on the empty space in front of her. It couldn’t follow people around.

In that moment, while Xi Ping didn’t know anything about what had happened, he very tactfully didn’t ask any questions, only brought that twig before the image’s eyes, not letting Lin Chi miss her gaze.

So Hui Xiangjun “looked” into the depths of Lin Chi’s consciousness and, just as if she were speaking directly to him, said, “Don’t be afraid, Zisheng, and don’t listen when those idiots tell you to blame yourself. It wasn’t your fault. I knew that the opportune moment hadn’t come then. It wasn’t yet time for the spirit-conducting gold to appear in the world. But if that had not happened, the opportune moment would never have come. If I had wanted to hide it, I wouldn’t have sent it to you.

“Whatever people fear will become their desire. When they punished me then, each of them already had ulterior motives in mind. In the future, they won’t be able to hold back. They’ll have taken out all those little things you made, right? The copied spirit-conducting gold is limited by the rules of the spiritual mountains, it can only use a drop of spiritual energy. But even a tiny step is still going forward. This will cause turbulence in the world. If the movement doesn’t come in a hundred years, it will come in a thousand years. When you see the Law Breaker and the Riverward again, that will be when true spirit-conducting gold comes into the world.

“Jiejie won’t be there then. You take care of it.”

After saying this, Hui Xiangjun sighed. “The spiritual mountains...” She shook her head and faced forward. The furnace flame that had disappeared before abruptly began to burn brightly around her.

With a wave of her wide sleeves, she sat down in midair in the Ancient Chu fashion, upright as a bell. In that moment, she was no longer smiling. All her mildness and amiability vanished without a trace. Her gaze was like a knife, stabbing at Xi Ping.

“Youngster, though you hold the Law Breaker, if you wish to take the furnace flame, you must first answer my questions.”

Xi Ping said, "...huh?"

Lin Chi recovered and with an effort managed to restrain himself in front of his junior. Hoarsely, he said, "This is called the Heart Examination, a very ancient toolmaking ritual—when the original owner of an immortal tool doesn't want to let just anyone use their item, they will leave some questions on the tool, so only a successor whose answers accord with the original owner's intentions will be qualified to use it."

"Wait, wait...I need to speak Ancient Chu, too? I don't know how!"

Xi Ping was very panicked. Not only did he not know the language, he also didn't know a single thing about the way of toolmaking. He had only just learned how the furnace fire was lit. What if this toolmaking master asked him what you would get if you cooked Xiang Rong and Xuanwu together in a pot?!

Lin Chi cautioned him: "Language has its own spirit, regardless of what language it is. Starting now, you must speak cautiously. Once the Heart Examination starts, every word that comes out of your mouth will be viewed as your answer."

As if to corroborate what he said, though Hui Xiangjun was still speaking in difficult-to-parse Ancient Chu, Xi Ping could suddenly go around the language itself to understand her meaning directly. She asked, “Do you know where my Way of the Heart comes from?”

Xi Ping frowned. Just then, he had felt the paperman he had put together before coming here break.

Zhuoming had caught up!

“I know, senior,” Xi Ping blurted out before Lin Chi could stop him, “your Way of the Heart was inherited from the ancient demonic god of the eternal spring brocade. You cultivate the mysterious and dry as dust way of toolmaking.”

“Be careful...” said Lin Chi in alarm.

Sadly, the questioner and the questioned seemed to be competing to see whose tongue was more nimble. Before Lin Chi could get a couple of words out, the two of them had already come to the next round of question and answer.

Hui Xiangjun asked, “And what is an ancient demonic god?”

Xi Ping didn’t take any time to think. “One of the masters who lost out to the five sages during the battle for the full moon positions. They died, but their ways weren't extinguished. Their accompanying plants remained in the human world, waiting for an opportunity to seize power.”

Hui Xiangjun said, “Where is the Way of the Heart I inherited from the eternal spring brocade now?”

Xi Ping said, “In the Unbound Furnace.”

The Heart Examination seemed to find his answer too broad and suspected him of trying to muddle through. Once again came the cold question: “Where is it?”

Xi Ping met her eyes directly for a moment. “In the hidden realm inside the Unbound Furnace, inside the trunks of the eternal spring brocade...by now it may already have been swallowed by a stupid naked egg.”

Lin Chi went numb all over. “Xi Shiyong, what are you babbling...”

Hui Xiangjun said, “It isn't in the furnace flame?”

Xi Ping said, “No.”

Lin Chi: “...”

Sword god, if you can hear me from Zhaoting, can't you control your disciple?!

Zhuoming's consciousness had already reached them, just in time to hear Xi Ping calling him a "stupid naked egg." He gave a furious roar. The heartless lotus's stalks instantly pierced through the mountain. Silt fell with a rustle, hitting the furnace flame.

Xi Ping didn't so much as turn around. He pressed a talisman to the ground, temporarily stabilizing this small space.

A trace of an indecipherable smile appeared on Hui Xiangjun's face. "If you can't even get my Way of the Heart, how are you going to get my vital weapon?"

Xi Ping said, "Is a Way of the Heart really that important?"

The lotus stalks that had penetrated into the mountain smashed Xi Ping's talisman head on. Xi Ping played a note and tore apart the lotus stalks.

Lin Chi finally had a chance to put in a word: "She's the one questioning you, don't ask questions back!"

“Cultivators spend their lives cultivating a Way of the Heart and can only inherit a senior’s vital weapon by obtaining their Way of the Heart—that’s also a rule of the spiritual mountains...”

This ignorant answer of his sent Lin Chi into a breakdown. “Good heavens, no it isn’t! It was like that before the spiritual mountains formed! The ways of the ancient demonic gods are also...”

The wildly flying notes of the Tai Sui Qin locked with the lotus stalks of the heartless lotus. There was a rumble, and countless intertwined eternal spring brocade and late-autumn red root systems disintegrated. The mountain was collapsing from this fight between the two great ascended spirits.

“Fine, so it’s a rule of heaven and earth,” Xi Ping said, changing his wording without turning a hair. “So what? Even if right this moment, all the shed skins die off and the spiritual mountains collapse, the plants spread and the demonic gods ascend, all that will happen is that some new spiritual mountains will rise in the mortal world. Mortals, cultivators...everyone will keep on chasing spiritual stones, keep on killing each other for the sake of spiritual stones...”

Zhuoming, with his features all in disarray, had thrown himself at Xi Ping, the lotus stalks surrounding them from all sides, penetrating the furnace flame just the same as when they had swallowed up the eternal spring brocade.

Xi Ping said, “We don’t give a rat’s ass about the struggles of heaven and earth and Ways of the Heart.”

No sooner had he spoken than the Hui Xiangjun in the furnace flame disappeared. The lotus stalks stabbing through the furnace flame instantly turned to ashes. Zhuoming gave a cry of pain. The flame shrank until it was the size of a bean, then sank into the reincarnation wood twig in Xi Ping’s hand. As soon as that happened, the illusory hidden realm inside the Unbound Furnace collapsed—

CHAPTER 142 - Eternal Flame (Final)

Zhuoming clearly sensed the Unbound Furnace escaping his control altogether; the furnace flame began to backlash against him.

Xi Ping's voice drilled into the thousand holes of his lotus root hearts.

“Heard you gobbled up the eternal spring brocade? Heh, there was so much of it. All of Western Chu's sheep piled up together couldn't eat as much as you! I'm impressed!”

“Did you taste it? Can you hold that much? How curious, why do you think this furnace won't listen to you anymore? Maybe you've eaten too much and can't digest it?”

Had Zhuoming had a single remaining strand of hair, it would have stood straight up from anger.

Xi Ping took the opportunity to send a note slicing toward Zhuoming—tragically enough, it was only now that he was getting the chance to properly experience the difference between “near-ascended spirit” and a true ascended spirit. His meridians and essence were hundreds upon thousands of times wider than before. With no full moon sages or shed skins next to him to hold him down, he had the feeling that he could flatten Sanyue's East Peak with one move...

Of course, one move was all he knew.

“Finally I get to roll up my sleeves and thrash that damn baldy to my heart's content,” Xi Ping said to Lin Chi in the reincarnation wood. “Lin-shishu, give me that talisman you mentioned before!”

Lin Chi: “...”

His emotions had been rising and falling wildly just now. He hadn't yet had time to recover. The talismans he had learned by rote before coming here had by now returned to Moon Plated Peak.

Xi Ping came up empty and had no choice but to use one and the same sword move for the however-many-thousandth time. “Can't you do anything, master? I'm in a really embarrassing situation here!”

Lin Chi acknowledged that he couldn't do anything when it came to fighting. After all, he was only a blacksmith. At the same time, he thought that there was really no need for Xi Shiyong to be embarrassed; it was Sword God Zhi who ought to be embarrassed.

However unskilled Zhuoming was at hand-to-hand combat, he was still a veteran ascended spirit. He had practically learned this sword move by now and easily found an opening to dodge it, escaping the Unbound Furnace.

Xi Ping chased him, sweeping the Unbound Furnace up in his mustard seed while he was at it. He simply brandished the Tai Sui Qin like a sledgehammer, slamming it down on Zhuoming's "tail"—the pond full of lotus roots and stalks.

Had the Tai Sui Qin had its own mind, it would certainly have rebelled against its master on the spot. The body of the qin hummed and its strings quivered wildly. The spiritual energy it raised was like pummeling fists, striking Zhuoming and the heartless lotus without any method. The technique was faintly reminiscent of what Xi Ping had used back when he had put a sack over Big Dog Wang and beat him up.

Zhuoming had never experienced this kind of "magic power" before. His reaction was a beat slow. He got a black eye.

Zhaoting...Zhaoting couldn't make a sound, anyway. It was pretending that it was no longer in this world.

Zhuoming gave a low shout, and a handful of lotus seals sealed Xi Ping's features, trapping his consciousness.

Xi Ping's consciousness wasn't entirely in his body now; he wasn't afraid of being caught. He was just getting ready to escape and backhand Zhuoming's face into a pancake when he found that Zhuoming was luring his consciousness toward the West Peak.

No good! He gave a start: the Luwu!

Xi Ping didn't have time to notify the Luwu to evacuate through the reincarnation wood. The heartless lotuses had already assimilated a patch of grass and swallowed up Xu Rucheng, who was hiding there; they were just about to strip off his consciousness!

It was too inconvenient that there was no reincarnation wood on Sanyue's mountains. Xi Ping couldn't reach.

So he came to a rapid decision. He knocked a crack in the summit of the East Peak and stroked the Discard the False and Keep the True book. A beam of spiritual energy with Yu Chang's aura hit the Silver Moon over the Central Peak.

Yu Chang was an authentic evil cultivator. The smell of evil cultivator around him could enrage quite a number of great divine tools.

The Silver Moon's light swept out at once. Before that, Xi Ping had quickly switched places with a reincarnation wood tree a thousand li away, leaving Zhuoming behind—he couldn't move easily in Sanyue, and Zhuoming couldn't move easily outside of Sanyue. Who didn't have a weak spot?

The activity on the East Peak quickly drew the notice of all of Sanyue. A shed skin consciousness immediately arrived. “Who's there?!”

Zhuoming had no more attention to spare for matching his strength against some half-immortal ants. The moment the moonlight fell, all the heartless lotuses in the pond turned to ashes.

Next, all the flowers in all the lotus ponds in the Sanyue Mountain Range turned into heartless lotuses. It was only for a flash; before they could blossom, they were cleared away by the moonlight.

Sanyue was full of low level disciples who hadn't worked out what was going on. The Silver Moon couldn't kill them along with the heartless lotuses. The “moonlight” scattered into several concentrated beams, selectively sweeping only over the lotus ponds.

The moment the lotus ponds were lit up by the “moonlight,” a peculiar inscription formed just where the Silver Moon fell. The Sanyue Mountains gave a fierce shake. For a moment, the Silver Moon's light was reflected back.

The "moonlight" quickly suppressed the inscription, but in that interval, Zhuoming and the heartless lotuses had vanished.

All of this had transpired in a matter of moments. All the Luwu were stunned. Xu Rucheng hadn't even realized until now that he had taken a stroll at the border between life and death. He heard Tai Sui's voice in his ear: "Everyone, put on your Luwu masks. There was a possessor of a paramount spiritual sense in Sanyue. I've lured him away for you. The rest are all good-for-nothings, you should be able to get along fine from now on. Do good work."

After saying this, Xi Ping turned around and sent Lin Chi's consciousness back to Xuanyin and simply used the Replica to give himself Xu Rucheng's appearance. He took out an authentic Luwu token and weighed it in his hand. Whistling a tune, he retired in the direction of the rising sun after winning merit, ready to return to Tao County and think of a way to send the Unbound Furnace back to the Xuanyin Mountains.

Just then, the token suddenly warmed.

Xi Ping froze. Then his spiritual sense was suddenly touched. He heard Bai Ling's voice in his ear: "The representative from Xuanyin's inner sect just touched the Luwu's communication network. They must be coming your way. Be careful."

Out of nowhere, Xi Ping had the feeling that the newcomer was an ascended spirit.

This must be a delicate perception belonging only to those who had reached an ascended spirit. A high level cultivator would certainly be restraining their aura while in another country. A low level cultivator wouldn't have noticed them now. Never mind the spiritual sense, they might even have mistaken the person for a mortal while standing face to face. Xi Ping's spiritual sense was touched, but he didn't feel a very great sense of danger. He swiftly checked his Replica mask and calmed down—though this was a little unexpected, it wasn't a big problem. An ascended spirit of the same grade wouldn't be able to see through Master Lin's immortal tool.

Xi Ping continued to walk as though nothing were the matter. Then a cool and refreshing morning breeze blew his way, dispersing the morning mist. A human figure appeared out of nowhere at the end of the faint mist.

Xi Ping: "..."

Damn it, the newcomer was Princess Duanrui!

Wait, this wouldn't have given him a sense of danger? Was his spiritual sense broken?!

Wasn't Princess Duanrui the acting Dignitary of Rites? Wasn't she busy? Why would she come to Western Chu in person to take over the Luwu's assignment? Didn't she think it was beneath her?

Countless thoughts instantly flashed through Xi Ping's mind. His hands even went numb—perhaps it was because Liang Chen had used the princess to scare him the first time he had seen her, but compared to the shed skin elders, Xi Ping was inexplicably more scared of her.

He had to put every bit of his wits into play to maintain his expression: he couldn't lose countenance. Bai Ling evidently also hadn't expected who the newcomer would be; he had only said "Xuanyin's inner sect" just now, and the Luwu, who were of common backgrounds, wouldn't be able to recognize a great personage like this. The way of clarity and unfeeling eschewed frivolities, was without desires and without adornments. Her attire was plain and colorless, and she had restrained her aura. If he had been Xu Rucheng, he would be likely to think this was only an inner sect established foundation.

Xi Ping didn't deliberately relax his tensed shoulders. Maintaining this not excessive nervousness, he bowed convincingly to this "unfamiliar inner sect disciple." "Shijie."

Duanrui didn't quibble over the form of address. "The Luwu tokens are nearly all in the vicinity of the Sanyue Mountains. Only you have snuck away."

Xi Ping reconsidered: it would be just as well if she took the Unbound Furnace back; that would be open and aboveboard, and guaranteed to be safe...and if it wasn't safe, that was all right, too. The furnace flame was in his hands, anyway. Anyone who used the Unbound Furnace would be as good as doing it right under his nose. He could spread his consciousness into it any time.

"Yes, because I encountered a slight unexpected circumstance." Then he explained what had happened in Sanyue, mixing truth and falsehood. "Then for some reason, there was a loud sound from the East Peak, and the Silver Moon started chasing after the lotuses to shine on them... I just happened to be near the East Peak and saw to my surprise that something had been left behind in the lotus pond after it was swept by the Silver Moon, so I just snatched it up."

Saying so, he quietly put the Unbound Furnace into a little half-immortal mustard seed and offered it to Duanrui along with the mustard seed. “It’s this. Please have a look, shijie.”

Duanrui sometimes seemed like a stone statue that had grown legs. Hearing that Xiang Rong had become a full moon sage and then passed away, her brows didn’t move at all, as if only one of Sanyue’s dogs had died. And the Unbound Furnace didn’t cause her a sliver of surprise, either. When she accepted it and swept it with her consciousness, like a machine calling a roll, she appraised it indifferently: “The vital weapon of Lancang’s Elder Hui Xiangjun, the Unbound Furnace.”

Xi Ping made joy flash over Xu Rucheng’s face, then suppressed it, “steadying” himself by force. “My lord’s assignment for us in coming to Sanyue was to investigate the whereabouts of the Unbound Furnace. I didn’t expect the Southern Sage to be looking out for us like this. By coincidence, we’ve actually gotten it. Please take it back to the inner sect, shijie!”

Duanrui agreed. Suddenly, she raised her head and looked at him. She asked, “How long since you began cultivating?”

Xu Rucheng had entered the Way during Great Wan’s internal strife, about a year later than Xi Ping himself. So Xi Ping answered ambiguously, “Five or six years.”

The corners of Duanrui’s lips moved slightly, as if she were smiling.

Then Xi Ping heard her say, “An ascended spirit after five or six years is unheard of. It seems that the world truly is changing.”

Xi Ping’s mind buzzed. A breath caught in his lungs.

She had seen through him?! How could she have seen through him?

Hadn’t Lin Chi said that the Replica could even fool the eyes of shed skins? Could the Golden Hand be relied on?

Instantly, Xi Ping had an instinct to escape back to Tao County through the reincarnation wood, then forced himself to stop in his tracks—the Replica spiritual image mask had been made by Lin Chi, and the Luwu had been built up by his san-ge single-handedly; now that he had been discovered by Duanrui, neither of them could escape responsibility.

But Princess Duanrui had saved his miserable life. Except as a last resort, Xi Ping would never want to try his qin against her...and anyway, what was he bluffing about? The princess could bring him to his knees with two lashes of her whip.

For a time, Xi Ping was caught between a rock and a hard place.

“It seems that that ancient demonic god’s way has fallen entirely into your hands,” Princess Duanrui said calmly. She seemed to have no intention of getting out her whip—though of course that was hard to say, since she didn’t seem particularly excited when she was cutting people down, either. “He was sunk in the Impassable Sea for so many years. Nearly every generation of Zhous who went into the Impassable Sea set their minds on him, but for over eight centuries, those bones didn’t move even once, so they thought that there was no more Way of the Heart in that skeleton.”

Xi Ping thought, In fact, there wasn’t a Way of the Heart in that skeleton. They were looking for the wrong thing.

“Your Highness,” Xi Ping said, “I became an established foundation at the bottom of the Impassable Sea and was sealed by the three high elders. After escaping illegally, I went on to become an ascended spirit in Sanyue, all without receiving permission from any spiritual mountains. I’m even more of an evil cultivator than that Qiu Sha, who disturbed the four great spiritual mountains. Aren’t you going to ‘expel evil’?”

Through the spiritual image mask, Duanrui looked into his eyes. But Xi Ping was no longer the disciple in the Latent Cultivation Temple who had trembled with fear while letting her examine him. Unflinching, he looked back at her and said, “No matter who is caught in the middle, relations between Xuanyin and me will not improve.”

“That is correct. Dignitary of Fate and the Dignitary of Rule may not be wholly without regrets now.” As if she hadn’t heard the provocation in his words, Princess Duanrui continued as evenly as before, “They misunderstood cause and effect. They thought at the time that the tolling of the Bell of Tribulation and the strange phenomena were all the result of the ancient demonic god appearing in the world. They did not think that the waves of tribulation had already risen, and the demonic god’s way was reborn to answer that tribulation—had you left the mountains some years later, perhaps they would not have punished you.”

Xi Ping gave a somewhat sarcastic laugh.

“Time and fate are not things you can understand merely by sitting in the Sea of Stars. When such things ought to come, neither you nor Xuanyin Mountain can defy them,” Duanrui said dully. “Even though you have obtained the Unbound Furnace to repair Zhaoting, your shifu will still not leave seclusion at once. Since ancient times, shed skins have had to join their hearts with heaven and earth. If he remains unwilling, there will be even more push and pull. If I were you, I would not hide in Tao County.”

The corners of Xi Ping's eyes twitched slightly. How had she guessed even his connection with Tao County?

“The rule that evil cultivators cannot become ascended spirits has been broken. The world will become more and more chaotic in the future. Evil cultivators everywhere will be like bamboo shoots after spring rain, all breaking through to become forces to be reckoned with. But none of them will be your friend,” Princess Duanrui said. “Your foundation is too shallow. Tao County is a tiny flame. Whether it burns or goes out in the end will depend on how great a wind you can raise. It is impossible for you to rest content, warming yourself by that candle flame. You ought to understand this.”

Xi Ping was silent for a long time.

Duanrui waved a hand at him and put away the mustard seed holding the Unbound Furnace. Her figure flashed, and she was already dozens of zhang away, her white clothes merging with the mist.

“Duanrui-shishu, wait!” Xi Ping suddenly called her to a halt. “Zhou Kun buried a heart demon seed in the Impassable Sea, and then it was brought back to Xuanyin by the Bell of Tribulation. The Dignitary of Rites Zhao Yin must have lost his mind on account of that. You must be care...”

“Unless humans go extinct, the demon host will live forever,” Duanrui’s voice came from afar. “One ought not to treat one’s shadow as an enemy. If one’s Way of the Heart is clouded with dust, then perhaps that is dust one has stirred up oneself. Thank you.”

No sooner had she spoken than she disappeared into emptiness.

In order to pin down the Zhou clan, the Xuanyin Mountains had pushed the Zhou family’s genius who took after her ancestor into the way of clarity and unfeeling, cutting away her selfish motives. The way of clarity and unfeeling viewed all things equally. If there was no difference between oneself and others, then what difference would there be between immortals and demons?

She was a near-shed skin, her Way of the Heart nearly perfected. It didn’t belong to the Zhou family, and naturally it didn’t belong to Xuanyin either.

Over eight centuries ago, Hui Xiangjun had opened up the skin of the spiritual mountains and buried an inextinguishable seed of flame. A wind from beyond the bounds of the laws had blown, and the Zhou clan had snuck into the deep sea.

Now, there was an answer to all these portents.

The bright sky tore the mist away bit by bit. Then the morning light seemed also to shine through Xi Ping's body. He disappeared where he stood, scattering into countless lowborn reincarnation wood trees.

BOOK 4 - Overturning the Mountains

CHAPTER 143 - The Storm Begins (1)

Southern Wan, the fourteenth year of Jiahe.

As before, it was late spring. As before, it was the year of the Grand Selection.

Xuanyin Mountain's Grand Selection had originally been held once every ten years, in order to coordinate with those sent from the inner sect to service Jinping's Dragon Vein. Starting in the ninth year of Jiahe, it had changed to once every five years. Some said that Heaven's Design Pavilion was short on manpower after the fall of the Zhao family; some said that the Kaiming Cultivators were expanding too quickly, and the inner sect had a mind to restrain Prince Zhuang; still others said what other reason could there be for the increased enrollment of Xuanyin's Grand Selection—the world was not at peace.

Indeed, the world was no longer what it had been.

When the new emperor had assumed the throne, a rebellion had arisen within Great Wan. How long since that had been suppressed? And in the sixth year of Jiahe, a shed skin elder had passed away, and the Zhao clan had betrayed the nation, dragging nearly half of Heaven's Design Pavilion down with it and leading to spiritual energy being prohibited throughout the country for ten days.

And none of the neighbors along the borders were without their worries.

The most absurd of all was the near neighbor Western Chu. At present, Western Chu had two major local specialties: pickled foods and evil cultivators.

First they had lit up a blood moon twice within half a year, more frequently than other places set off fireworks. Before anyone had time to be astonished about this, the East Peak's High Elder Xuanwu and his heretical disciple had openly betrayed the Way—a shed skin betraying the Way sounded about the same as “an emperor in revolt”!

The whereabouts of these two exceptional individuals were still unknown, and the “fabricated” full moon sect leader hadn't made a peep. The only shed skin remaining to the Sanyue Mountains was Xiang Ning, left all on his own to keep down a crowd of great ascended spirits who all had their own designs; he couldn't do it. Those surnamed Xiang and those not surnamed Xiang openly split into two camps. As the reflection of the immortal mountains in the mortal world, Dongheng City saw its political circles in a bewildering state of change. The days of the Xiang family unilaterally laying down the law had gone forever. Faced with the enormous lure of the spiritual mountains, the forces of evil ran wild throughout the country without any sense of propriety.

Since Western Chu had become the forerunner for ascended spirit evil cultivators, it had been like a contagion. Great evil cultivators hidden in Southern Shu and Northern Li cropped up one after another. In Northern Li, the many sword cultivators of Kunlun had always engaged in suppression through force; taking swift and resolute action, they promulgated nine edicts to strictly control evil cultivators inside and outside their borders. This had reached the point of overcorrection—“expelling evil” had become a means for people to frame each other.

The situation in Southern Shu was even more complex. In Shu and on its three islands, there were eighteen tribes in all, generally separated into two clans. The people of these two clans could be distinguished by their appearances. Apart from using Zhaoye’s official language in common, each also had their own language; slight conflicts between them were longstanding. Since an ascended spirit evil cultivator had emerged, the clash between orthodox and evil had been added to the rifts between the clans; they spent all their time in confused civil strife.

The Land of Turmoil, which no one had looked after before, went without saying. This was an exceptional place for sheltering wrongdoing. In less than a decade, three great evil cultivators had become ascended spirits in rapid succession, and they had actually found the hidden realm Qiu Sha had left behind. They had teamed up to infiltrate the Lancang Mountain Range and conspired in vain to seize the southern mines. Had the four great immortal mountains not realized what was happening and joined hands to suppress them, these individuals might have founded their own country.

Compared to this, the common people of Wan were quite fortunate. Southern Wan had firmly expelled its evil cultivators when the Kaiming Department had been established and adhered rigidly to strict precautions within its borders. Therefore, Xuanyin Mountain was the only place that could hold its head up now—on the surface, at least, only Great Wan hadn't splashed dog's blood on the moon.

But with the circumstances as they were, no one could think only of themselves.

The border inscriptions had been upgraded several times but still couldn't prevent malevolent incursions. There was nothing else Xuanyin Mountain could do; they sent established foundation disciples from the inner sect to oversee each of Heaven's Design Pavilion's branches. At the same time, they promulgated an epoch-making edict: permission for walkers in the mortal world who fit the criteria to establish foundations.

In this way, Heaven's Design Pavilion's General Commander Pang Jian at long last legitimately established a foundation.

Still wearing the sapphire robe with a silver belt, his bandit-like unruliness considerably restrained, he was as usual escorting a new class of disciples to the Latent Cultivation Temple.

Almost sixty percent of the disciples no longer belonged to noble families. They all came from families of ordinary government officials. Having gone through layer upon layer of selection, their natural endowments were considerably better than before, but they didn't especially understand the rules—Pang Jian extended a hand, and a roll of coarse paper flew out from one disciple's luggage. The vague words "So-and-so Bulletin" were printed on it. He meant to deliver a brief rebuke but saw that the disciple smuggling the newspaper was already scared ashen-faced, so he swallowed his words... Fair enough. It wasn't everyone who was as audacious as that little brat Xi Shiyong.

Pang Jian nodded to the cultivator who had come to receive them, then turned and sank into the ground.

That newspaper was also called a "toilet bulletin," because it had been printed on toilet paper to begin with.

This was a long story.

Several years ago, Western Chu's Xiang clan had obviously lost power, and the hyenas had begun to drool and grind their teeth in the direction of the Sanyue Mountains. Someone had come along to fish in these troubled waters, printing some complete nonsense on toilet paper, giving people something to amuse themselves with when they went to the latrine. These were called "Embellished Toilet Papers"; they treated the masters of Sanyue's inner sect like opera characters, having them play out whole scenarios. They frequently featured appalling headlines like "Xuanwu Contracts Lovesickness, Peeps on the Sect Leader in His Bath"; the contents were extremely vulgar.

These were shameful secrets about immortals. All at once, no one wanted to read out of date stories about eloping courtesans or cuckolded princes anymore. Everyone knew perfectly well that it was all nonsense, yet they still listened to it with keen pleasure. For a time, whenever a public letter writer went to the latrine, he would be followed by a crowd of illiterates with a craving. The winding stream⁸⁶ parties of the learned were admittedly refined, but the common people passing paper around while squatting in the latrine had an appeal all its own.

The Embellished Toilet Papers continued in Chu despite being banned, because while each fresh "ban" made a lot of noise, there was a lot of wind and not much rain; the bans weren't properly implemented—these things only toyed with the Xiang family, and there were too many people waiting to watch the Xiang clan's drama.

After that, other ill-intentioned people had started printing them as well, making the waters even muddier.

Embellished Toilet Papers had turned into toilet bulletins and become an industry in Western Chu—in Southern Wan, no matter how fiercely the great families fought, they would still present a dignified face to the outside world; it was only in an absurd place like Chu where a malignant tumor like this could develop.

Sanyue had suffered at the hands of the Xiang clan for a long time. At the highest level, it was the monopolization of the immortal mountains, and at the lowest it was corruption in the imperial examinations; mid- and low-level cultivators readily fell in with humble students in wishing to force the Xiang clan to cede their position, allowing people to be promoted on merit. But once the matter grew too large, they could no longer control it.

At first, several groups continued the vulgar style of Embellished Toilet Papers, attacking and defaming each other, fabricating disgusting gossip. Bit by bit, as circulation spread like a plague and more and more people entered the fray, the contents began to vary. Some people publicly called into question why the Sanyue Spiritual Mountains should belong entirely to the Xiang family, some people revealed the fact that local thugs everywhere were keeping cultivators and imprinting them with spiritual image brands, and unexpectedly there were even a couple of articles explaining the history of the cultivation sects and the basics of cultivation in plain and easily understood terms, and these contained practically no errors; while they were quickly destroyed, once these things came out, there would immediately be scholars making copies and disseminating them, and word of mouth couldn't be stopped.

This all seemed like Sanyue reaping what it had sown in its internal strife. But who had started the Embellished Toilet Papers? Apart from those wicked Luwu, Pang Jian couldn't think who else it could be.

Zhou Ying wasn't in this for the fun of it. Each and every one of his dirty tricks for adding fuel to the fire was intended to deal a fatal blow. In a few short years, the Sanyue Immortal Mountains, which had held themselves above the masses for thousands of years, had been pulled down into the common dust by the flying spit of the people, altogether losing face.

By the time Sanyue realized what was happening, it was too late. The toilet bulletins were in vogue throughout the country; they had become a distinctive type of print culture, and they were starting to spread abroad. Northern Li responded the fastest. In the early years, they had declared that those privately printing toilet bulletins would be found guilty of “conspiring against the state”; if they were caught, their whole families would be executed.

Great Wan had also prohibited them, but after going through internal upheaval and having the Kaiming Cultivators gain power, they certainly wouldn't dare to imitate the north in enacting such severe penalties against the common people. Anyway, the Grand Canal, the Xia River, and the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragons that covered the whole country had too great a reach; there was no way to control them all—hadn't that ignorant junior even brought the thing into the Latent Cultivation Temple?

Pang Jian was very weary. When he glanced at the headline, which said “Torrential Rain Breaches Dike, Lin Clan's Water-repellent Inscriptions Banish Floodwaters, Instantly Destroy 10,000 Mu of Fertile Land,” he became even more weary.

The rotten waste paper of the toilet bulletin turned to ashes in his hand. Pang Jian turned and went to Elder Su's Chengjing Hall.

The Latent Cultivation Temple's Su Zhun was a former general commander of Heaven's Design Pavilion, Pang Jian's guide. Nowadays, while Pang Jian's cultivation was higher than his, he still called him “shixiong” very deferentially.

“Heaven’s Design Pavilion has given you quite a bit of trouble these last couple of years, shixiong,” Pang Jian said to Su Zhun, taking a seat and declining tea. “Before, the Latent Cultivation Temple would have one year of activity and nine years of rest, but now it doesn’t stop.”

The Xuanyin Mountains kept a very strict watch on established foundations temporarily residing in the mortal world. They had to keep independent accounts of their allotted spiritual stones; to recover from wounds or to go into short-term seclusion to seek enlightenment, they had to go to the Latent Cultivation Temple; and they had to go through a fixed annual inspection every year—to examine whether their Way of the Heart was intact, whether they had touched any spiritual energy they shouldn’t have touched, and so on.

The calm valley deep in the mountains had instantly turned into the inner sect’s distribution center, people coming and going throughout all four seasons every year without cease. If the temple’s guardian treasure Luo Qingshi wasn’t spending all day being enraged by new idiots, he was watching the idiots he had taught before being brought back to the oven to be cooked again. In no time, his temper had risen another length; it would soon be standing shoulder to shoulder with the Qiankun Tower.

But Su Zhun laughed. “A little activity is nice. When a person gets old, doesn’t he want to have some people around?”

His hair had turned whiter, his elderliness increasingly obvious. As a half-immortal, the end of his lifespan was almost here.

Pang Jian couldn’t resist asking, “Shixiong, why won’t you establish a foundation?”

Su Zhun shook his head and said, laughing, “I’m old! Even if I established a foundation now, I wouldn’t get very far. I’d only be wasting spiritual stones. Anyway, in my life, I’ve had my merits and demerits, and I’ve been obedient and rebellious. I have nothing to cling to and no unfinished business. It’s been a worthwhile journey. I don’t have an immortal’s Way of the Heart.”

Pang Jian wanted to speak but stopped himself.

Su Zhun said, smiling, “What? Human affairs change like the tide. Can’t you see which way the wind is blowing, which way the water is flowing?”

“That’s not it, it’s just...such a mess that it makes me weary.” Pang Jian pinched the center of his brow. “I thought before that if you had the good fortune to become a cultivator and live a century or two longer than others for no reason, and gained some privileges, you ought to restrain yourself and keep watch over your heart. Rules are rules, and walkers in the mortal world could only be half-immortals. All these years, I haven't dared to take a step out of line. No matter what I encountered, I held out and didn't touch that established foundation pill... But now it's all right. Once the outer sects were allowed to have established foundations, there was no more boundary between us and the immortal mountains. Whenever a half-immortal with slightly higher natural endowments completes their spiritual bones, people will immediately provide them with a Way of the Heart and resources from the shadows to rope them in. Unless they already have their own Way of the Heart, refusing would make it seem like they didn't know what was good for them—look, shixiong, now that the wind has turned in this direction, hasn't my holding fast before become a joke?"

Su Zhun listened to this patiently, then, pinching his beard, said unhurriedly, "That depends on what you've been holding to."

Pang Jian froze briefly. He thought this over for a long moment, then said seriously, "Yes, thank you for your instruction, shixiong. I..."

Just then, a ring on Pang Jian's hand heated slightly—this was Heaven's Design Pavilion's newly-equipped communication device, faster than the previous edition, with an inscription chip inside it that could be replaced periodically. They were all supplied by Moon Plated Peak; they sent letters faster and with greater secrecy.

Pang Jian reached out to touch it. He quickly glanced at the letter. His expression was a little surprised.

Su Zhun said, “Where is the problem now? Go on and deal with it, then.”

“It isn’t anything major,” Pang Jian said after a moment’s silence. “Dowager Imperial Consort Xi has died.”

Su Zhun didn’t realize who “Dowager Imperial Consort Xi” was. “Who?”

“The Kaiming Department’s Prince Zhuang’s birth mother,” Pang Jian said. “Zhou Ying has natural spiritual bones. He was born without the need to spend a century refining his bones. As long as he opened his spiritual eyes and acquired a Way of the Heart, he could establish a foundation any time. Since establishing a foundation became open to the outer sects, I hear that all of Xuanyin Mountain has had their eyes on him. Up to now, he’s always put it off, saying his mother was still living, his bonds to the mortal world yet unbroken. Now he has no more excuse.”

Su Zhun said curiously, “Put off establishing a foundation?”

“That demonic star doesn’t want to be constrained by a Way of the Heart. Before, if the Luwu went out of bounds, there would be people in the immortal mountains to oppose them, but in recent years the storm of evil cultivators has become increasingly intense. The borders are unsafe. There's nothing to be done. So the inner sect has been wanting to bring him into some peak and pin him down with a Way of the Heart." Pang Jian sighed. "Once the mourning period has passed, if he is still unwilling to accept a Way of the Heart and establish a foundation, I'm afraid he won't be able to justify it... I suppose that's just as well."

In Prince Zhuang Manor in Jinping, there was an endless stream of visitors coming to offer their condolences. "Prince Zhuang" received them cautiously and without imagination, not putting a step out of place—none of the mortals or outer sect cultivators present could tell that this was only an unfeeling paperman.

A cool breeze blew through the manor draped in mourning, making its way right into the rear courtyard.

The rear courtyard was extremely peaceful. White paper lanterns hung from the ends of the simple pavilion. Only in the south study was there a light burning.

A pot of snow wine was steaming on a small stove. The sweet, cloying scent floated throughout the room.

This was his first time tasting this thing. It was said that drinking a single cup could make all your worries vanish. Xi Ziyi had spent the better part of her life steeping in snow wine. Even when she died there had been a tranquil smile on her face.

He very much wanted to know what kind of paradise there was to be found in snow wine.

But while it had a heavy aroma, it was dull to the taste. After drinking two cups, he hadn't tasted anything. Some images like floating lights flashed before his eyes, but he didn't bother to look closely—these things were even more false than worldly affairs; they couldn't fool him.

The only benefit was that when he drank it, his senses became a little hazy. Perhaps if he had another cup, he would know the clarity of the deaf and blind.

Bai Ling was plastered in a corner. He wanted to counsel him to stop, but he didn't dare. As Zhou Ying raised the third cup, he glimpsed a miniature reincarnation wood tree at the corner of the desk move on its own. The half-demon relaxed.

“Busybodies,” said Zhou Ying without looking up, “both of you.”

A bone hand reached out of the miniature tree. Looking closely, there were many cracks in the joints, and they were all misplaced. But in just a flash, the skeletal hand repaired itself and was quickly covered by muscle and flesh. By the time it reached Zhou Ying, it was already good as new. It deftly took away his white jade wine cup.

Zhou Ying was dazed. For an instant, the miniature landscape became the real person...still faintly looking the way he had at seventeen or eighteen when he had been picking fights with a fat cat, each clawing the other in provocation.

After his momentary blankness, he saw the white jade wine cup disappear briefly; when it was handed back, more than half of the snow wine still remained in it.

Bubbles were floating on the surface of the snow wine that could make a person live in a dream; they formed a line of writing: "No taste, add a scoop of sugar."

All the illusions in front of Zhou Ying's eyes instantly vanished. He came back to himself, rubbed his temples, and extinguished the furnace warming the snow wine with a snap of his fingers. "Scram, go put in your order somewhere else."

The hand put the white jade cup down. The fingers tapped lightly on the rim of the cup. In time to the tapping, the snow wine in the cup turned into a roly-poly puppy that began to gambol around on the desk, obnoxiously leaving a trail of sopping wet footprints.

Pulling a long face, Zhou Ying said, "Aren't you in seclusion in the Land of Turmoil? What have you come out for now? Other ascended spirits often go into seclusion for a century. What's going on with you? You're always stepping out for fresh air. Have you got carbuncles or something?"

"San-ge, I've heard something," the puppy made of snow wine said in a human voice, wagging its tail. "Can you guess what it is?"

CHAPTER 144 - The Storm Begins (2)

When the three Xuanyin elders had sealed Xi Ping in the Impassable Sea, it had amounted to forcibly suppressing information about “the ungovernable way” and “the Zhou family raising demons,” but there was no such thing as a wall that didn’t let the air through. The tolling of the Bell of Tribulation in the East Sea couldn’t hide anything from the other immortal mountains. If someone with their mind set on it took a look at the chaos within Great Wan, they would get some idea.

While Qiu Sha was dead, Xuanwu and his disciple, as well as Yu Chang, who had escaped Tao County bearing the blame for all manner of things, were still living. For those who ought to know, reincarnation wood was no longer a secret.

The fact that Xuanyin Mountain had never said anything about it came down to rather complicated reasons.

One important reason was that an ascended spirit of the ungovernable way was fully fledged and wouldn’t be so easy to get rid of anymore. Never mind that they couldn’t catch him to begin with, even if they did catch him, they might end up having to request the aid of the great divine tool of the mountains. Xi Ping’s crimes didn’t merit that. Anyway, Xuanyin couldn’t afford to lose him.

For another reason, on the surface, Xi Ping was still to this day a formal disciple of Flying Jade Peak.

Among the reasons it had needed the Unbound Furnace to repair Zhaoting was first that Zhaoting had broken under very special circumstances, and of the extant members of the way of toolmaking, none had such high cultivation; also, it was missing a piece. It was incredibly dangerous for a divine tool of this grade to get chipped or cracked, never mind simply getting a hole in it. And in the end, while General Zhi clearly knew that he would die if his vital sword couldn't be repaired, and that Xi Ping's true body had already escaped the Impassable Sea, so that shard could be taken back any time, the shard of Zhaoting still wouldn't come out... Fortunately, the Golden Hand was dependable. In the end, he had succeeded in repairing Zhaoting, reforging it a sliver thinner than before.

At this point, Zhi Xiu's attitude was very unequivocal.

He would perhaps be the youngest shed skin in history, a future pillar of Xuanyin.

There had by now been a serious reshuffling within Xuanyin. Zhao Yin was dead, and the positions of both the Dignitary of Fate and the new Dignitary of Rites were very ambivalent... And on top of that, while Xi Ping himself said that he couldn't let the matter between him and Xuanyin rest, he wasn't an orphan—his parents, as well as his maternal family, with many members and a large business, were all in Jinping, and even if another century passed and his ties to the mortal world more or less severed, there was still Zhou Ying, and there was still Zhi Xiu. If he truly did want to rise in revolt, the shard of Zhaoting in his spirit wouldn't necessarily shield him.

At any rate, owing to all of the above reasons, Xuanyin Mountain had simply left the matter unmentioned, pretending to the outside world that no such thing existed. They only secretly placed many eyes in the vicinity of the Yongning Marquis Manor.

“I won't guess. Wait a moment.” Zhou Ying shot a talisman at the dog's head. The droplets of snow wine immediately froze solid. He flicked the frozen dog so it rolled a couple of times on the table, no longer spilling all over the place. “I thought you'd gone to the Land of Turmoil to catch up with that friend of yours. What damn place are you using for your seclusion, anyway? How can you still have an ear out for everything?”

“A-Xiang? Why would I want to catch up with her? She's so poor she rattles, and she's got a family to feed. She doesn't even know where her own next meal is coming from... Well, that's not important.”

Zhou Ying was looking at him expressionlessly.

Xi Ping: "..."

Well, he'd better make a clean breast of it.

Back in Western Chu, Xi Ping had first thoroughly smeared Xuanwu, Xiang Rong, and Zhuoming; they had all died or fled, anyway, so even if any of them saw it, they wouldn't be able to come take it up with him for the moment. Then he had examined himself and thought that this was rather improper; after all, an ascended spirit getting his revenge by spreading rumors could be called a singular unprecedented act since the beginning of time.

If he went on like this, when shifu came out of seclusion in a hundred years, the first thing he would do would be to kick him out of his peak.

So he had foisted the Embellished Toilet Papers, that miracle it sullied the ears to hear of, onto san-ge, while he himself, following A-Xiang's clues, had run off to the Land of Turmoil with the Unbound Furnace's furnace flame to search for the hidden realm Qiu Sha had neglected. Qiu Sha had left behind quite a few of Lancang's ancient texts. "Tai Sui," the "self-made genius" who had learned from a bunch of evil cultivators in Wild Fox Country, at last had an opportunity to cram some orthodox cultivation.

But, after all, Qiu Sha had split this hidden realm open. There were people other than Xi Ping who coveted it—it wasn't long before those three ascended spirits of the Land of Turmoil who had nearly founded a nation had also found their way to it following some clues.

Zhou Ying said, “And here I was wondering how, with the four great immortal mountains besieging them, those three evil cultivators could still run away. It turns out that you had a hand in it.”

“It was nothing,” Xi Ping said modestly, “no trouble at all.”

Zhou Ying: “...”

This scoundrel could turn any sarcastic remark into praise for himself.

“I didn't do it for their sakes. Since A-Xiang killed the Exonerators' White Amaranth, over the years, the division of power in the Land of Turmoil has basically stabilized. If those three got carried away with their success and all died at once, the other evil cultivators would be racking their brains to fill their positions, and the Turmoilers would have an even harder time of it. Don't worry, I didn't reveal myself, and I didn't leave any traces,” Xi Ping said. “But once that hidden realm was completely exposed, there was certainly no way to stay there, so there was nothing else I could do. I had to follow those three home.”

Zhou Ying unconsciously tilted his head. He suspected that he was so drunk on snow wine that his ears were ringing. “You had to what?”

The dog Xi Ping—who, because he was frozen, had his head half-turned awkwardly, as if he had a stiff neck—said from this uncomfortable posture, “I went to their den to scrounge spiritual stones. My true body was hidden in a reincarnation wood seed. I found a corner in one of their hidden realms and put down roots. These great ascended spirit evil cultivators are so rich. They’ve saved up so many spiritual stones. Shouldn’t they pay back the favor of saving their lives with their bodies...no, I mean, with a fountain of favor?”

As if his hands were stiff, Zhou Ying slowly massaged his palm in order to keep himself from slamming that dog flat. In a reasonably calm tone, he asked, “When did this happen?”

Xi Ping said with immense self-satisfaction, “The seed I buried has grown as tall as a person.”

Zhou Ying said, “Are the three ascended spirit masters of the Land of Turmoil so ill-informed that they haven’t heard that the ungovernable way has a master now?”

“Of course they’ve heard. They’ve pulled up all the reincarnation wood trees within a twenty li radius,” Xi Ping said. “I didn’t say I was a reincarnation wood tree. They think I’m a crooked scatter-leaf poplar.”

The scatter-leaf poplar was a common type of tree. The texture of its wood was about the same as reincarnation wood, similarly soft and making for poor timber. This tree was easy to grow, and it had an auspicious name, making people associate it with “branches spreading and leaves scattering far and wide”;⁸⁷ when there was a newlywed couple in the house, people usually liked to plant a few of these trees in the yard—unlike reincarnation wood, which only made people think of dying and reincarnating, and was used specially for memorial tablets.

The only problem was that the reason the scatter-leaf poplar was called the scatter-leaf poplar was that this tree’s leaves separated into petals like a flower. It was very distinctive. The reincarnation wood’s coarse rotten leaves were nothing like that.

“It’s no big deal,” Xi Ping said. “My true body is inside the tree. When it grows new leaves, I just cut them into little flowers myself. Anyway, we soft trees all have more or less the same kind of trunk. They aren’t carpenters. They can’t tell the difference.”

Zhou Ying: “...”

Here was an ascended spirit who'd said he was going to "go into seclusion," but he hadn't sealed himself into a mountain or set up an array. Instead, he was spending all his time in someone else's courtyard, eavesdropping and cutting his own leaves...even cutting them one by one.

He was cultivating shit!

The two cups of snow wine Zhou Ying had just drunk evaporated right out of his eyes and ears. He was no longer dizzy or deaf. He slammed his palm down on the dog, smashing it to steam.

The thick aroma of the snow wine instantly became so strong it was stifling. Bai Ling had been ready for this. He stuck himself outside the window, matching the nearby white paper lantern as though they were a pair of memorial couplets.

Xi Ping's voice came from the reincarnation wood: "Tsk, otherwise I'd have to meditate and do daily lessons. What's the difference between cutting leaves and meditating? They both refine the mind and temper the will. You're being such a stickler, san-ge. Ah, it's clear you don't normally apply yourself, either."

Bai Ling was afraid his lord would once again uproot the miniature tree in a fit of rage. Xuanyin Mountain didn't permit reincarnation wood to grow in Jinping. When the time came, he would once again have to go to some coffin shop in the middle of nowhere. He quickly interjected from outside the window: "So what important news did you hear in the Land of Turmoil, Viscount?"

"Right, san-ge keeps interrupting me," Xi Ping said. "The powerful evil cultivators are preparing to form an international alliance."

Zhou Ying froze.

"Before, those three dear friends thought no one was paying attention to the Land of Turmoil, so they got excited and provoked the immortal mountains and nearly went to their graves. Now they know what they're up against. And lately there's been reliable information that after the business last time, the four great spiritual mountains seem to be getting ready to join hands to clean up the Land of Turmoil..."

"Slow down," Zhou Ying interrupted him. "Even I haven't received word of that yet. It's clearly an inner sect secret. How did it reach your ears over there?"

At this point, he thought of something. His brows moved slightly. “Did it come out of the inner sect of Southern Shu’s Lingyun?”

Xi Ping wasn’t in the least taken aback. The strange thing would have been if san-ge couldn’t guess.

Apart from Southern He, which had been destroyed, the prevailing attitudes of the four nations toward evil cultivators were all very clear; it was only their methods that were different: Kunlun’s “severe penalty” was suppression; evil cultivators would be executed at once. Xuanyin’s “severe penalty” was considerably more refined; they would first convict the evil cultivators of all kinds of crimes of “extreme wickedness.” Because Sanyue was lax in its administration, they had coexisted with evil cultivators in the long term...but that was still only a problem of domestic affairs; in all sincerity, they didn’t view evil cultivators as human.

It was only Southern Shu whose circumstances were a little complicated.

Shu had two clans. One was called the Xiuyi, the other the Miah.

The Xiuyi were experts in controlling large beasts—such as the gold-armored zheng. Shu’s imperial Li clan belonged to the Xiuyi. The Xiuyi worshipped the Lingyun Sect’s founder, Tianbo-zhenren. Their stature was similar to those of people from Chu and Wan, and their appearance was somewhat similar to neighboring Chu. Only they themselves could tell the difference.

The Miah, meanwhile, were more skilled in the way of medicines and poisons, and the way of toolmaking...and they often kept small and unremarkable little beasts that nonetheless had particular uses. It was said that some Miah cultivators could also communicate with plants. The majority of them were short and slight. When occasionally some of them were tall, their frames would all be very slender, as if they hadn't finished growing, with high cheekbones and big eyes. There were different tribes within the Miah, with such complicated bloodlines that outsiders couldn't get the hang of them at all. They could only tell that there were some differences in their hair and eye colors. The Miah also paid tribute to Ancestor Tianbo, but they only regarded Tianbo-zhenren as the founder of their nation. Different tribes each had their own faiths. Flowers, plants, mountains, and rivers could all be gods that they worshipped.

On the main peninsula, the population of Xiuyi was slightly larger, but the three islands in the South Sea were inhabited almost entirely by Miah. The Xiuyi thought of themselves as the mainstream of Shu; they believed the Miah to be uncivilized savages and discriminated against them. The Miah thought that they were the true roots of Southern Shu, and the Xiuyi were a foreign mixed breed; they were hostile toward the Xiuyi.

In Southern Shu, the situation wasn't that each side claimed to have reason on their side, putting them in the right; they had only one rule for handling affairs: my clan is in the right.

But this time they really weren't in the right—the ascended spirit evil cultivator who had come out of the South Sea was Miah. He was very mysterious. He called himself Wangge Luobao.

The principles of heaven collided with the principles of the clan: should they aid the spiritual mountains in expelling evil and defending righteousness, or should they shield their clansman from the multitude of Xiuyi, defend the reputation of the Miah? The Miah of the Lingyun Immortal Mountains were mixed in their views. It was normal for there to be “leaks.”

“Wangge Luobao is leading the way. In his own words, he's ‘uniting the warriors of the mortal world who have stood up with the weight of the mountains on their backs.’ He's sent all the great evil cultivators he could find an invitation. I have one, too—they buried it at the roots of a reincarnation wood tree in the north of Shu,” Xi Ping said. “At the beginning of the fifth month, in the South Sea hidden realm. I figure many people will go.”

Unlike the other evil cultivators, who eked out a living under the oppression of the immortal mountains, this Wangge Luobao of Southern Shu likely had the support of Lingyun's Miah. This person's resources and ambitions were inestimable. While they were all ascended spirits, people like the country bumpkin ascended spirits in Demon Country couldn't be mentioned in the same breath.

Zhou Ying said, "What are you planning?"

"I want to see what the South Sea hidden realm looks like and whether I can get myself something like it," Xi Ping said. "All these great evil cultivators have hidden realms, but I don't. Neither the Impassable Sea nor Sanyue are my territory. Every day I'm scrounging food all over the place. I've nearly lost face for all evil cultivators..."

"Be reasonable."

"Master Lin has nearly created true spirit-conducting gold," Xi Ping said seriously. "He's gone over the few remaining steps hundreds upon thousands of times. He doesn't dare to act rashly in case he attracts strange phenomena. I need a safe place. While of course Tao County is good, after all, there are many people watching there—san-ge, you can also go if you want to do anything unsuitable to be done in public. That way you won't have to have eight hundred people watching you if you so much as use a handful of spiritual stones."

At first, Zhou Ying froze. Then, lowering his eyes, he said, “If you can handle your own little affairs, that’s good enough. Don’t mind me. Bai Ling, the Marquis is getting on in years, there’s no need for him to take the trouble to entertain those idlers. Ask him to come to the guest room for some rest...and move this pot of grass over there.”

Xi Yue had tried planting reincarnation wood at the Marquis Manor. The next day, he had received a hint from Pang Jian, and in a few days, he had indeed found that the seeds wouldn’t sprout. The Marquis Manor’s gardener couldn’t make heads or tails of it. How could these trees that grew anywhere at all not be able to acclimatize themselves to Jinping? He was perplexed about it for a long time. From then on, Xi Yue had known that they couldn’t plant reincarnation wood in the Yongning Marquis Manor, and he didn’t dare to casually take the amulet out of his mustard seed.

Only at Prince Zhuang Manor, with a possessor of a paramount spiritual sense present, would these gazes not dare to pry overmuch. Therefore, over these last several years, the naturally cold and aloof Zhou Ying, as if he’d had a change of personality, had taken to visiting his relatives. He would call at his uncle’s house during all the holidays, and he would often invite the Marquis to come pay a short visit.

He would only visit. The “tree” in the flower pot and the amulet in Zhou Ying’s sleeve didn’t dare to speak at will... After all, mortals were transparent before immortals.

Following orders, Bai Ling took the potted reincarnation wood to the guest room. When he returned, he saw his lord gazing emptily at the remaining snow wine in the cup, so he said softly, “I didn’t speak out of turn and let the Viscount know that the inner sect wishes you to establish a foundation, my lord.”

“It’s fine,” said Zhou Ying. “He refuses to stay in seclusion and goes around collecting information. He must have guessed it himself.”

He had even taken the initiative to think of a line of retreat for him.

With an apparent trace of impatience, Zhou Ying waved a hand and pointed at the disorder on the desk. “Clean this up for me.”

The Yongning Marquis Manor didn’t mingle with major military or political affairs, no one had ever gone short of clothing or food, and elixirs were available in whatever quantity you needed. The Marquis was still quite hale and hearty. He ate well and slept soundly. Only his left knee often ached on rainy days.

While he was napping, Xi Ping carefully passed a narrow sliver of spiritual energy, like silk thread, through the bones of the Marquis’s knee, dispelling the cold and strengthening the bone. He thought of his mother.

He could see the Marquis occasionally, but he rarely got to see Madam Cui. A wife living in the depths of a compound couldn't always be going out and showing her face in public, and it wouldn't even be appropriate for Xi Ping to have san-ge give her a package of rouge...anyway, she didn't use rouge anymore.

With this silent accompaniment, the Marquis of Yongning woke from his afternoon nap. He felt as if his whole body had been renewed. All his bones and muscles felt younger.

As if he hadn't fully woken up, he quietly sat on the little bed for a while, watching the receding sunlight out the window and thinking about something, until the page boy keeping watch outside the door knocked and asked if the Marquis required service.

Finally the Marquis responded, straightened his clothing, washed up and drank tea, then went to see Prince Zhuang.

Before leaving, as if carelessly, he lightly stroked the miniature tree on the little table. Where his wide sleeve passed, a small pouch embroidered with a brocade carp was left behind in the flower pot.

Looking at the fine stitches and well-chosen colors, it was clear at a glance that this was Madam Cui's handiwork. Inside the pouch was a wellness talisman.

CHAPTER 145 - The Storm Begins (3)

Just a little more, and Xi Ping would have turned the miniature tree into his true body and gone chasing after.

However...

The little brocade bag holding the wellness talisman disappeared in the flowerpot, and the Marquis's gaunt figure, hands behind his back, disappeared at the end of the guest room's corridor. The warm light gave his white hair and mourning clothes a soft edge.

When he encountered the pages and guards of Prince Zhuang Manor paying their respects to him, he nodded politely to them. His step wasn't especially robust, but at any rate it was light.

He didn't look back a single time. Perhaps he was afraid that his gaze would be like a hook and might catch on someone's boots.

However, the fact that Xuanyin Mountain was willing to turn a blind eye, not announce his existence to the public, not send anyone to hunt him down, didn't mean that he could openly appear in Great Wan. They wouldn't touch his mortal relatives; they only hoped that Xi Ping could have some tact, keep his mouth shut and not go looking for trouble.

Xi Ping abruptly withdrew his consciousness, leaving Prince Zhuang Manor, instantly crossing a vast distance, leaving behind the nine provinces of Great Wan, brimming with all that was familiar to him.

He arrived directly on the opposite bank of the Xia River.

The water level of the Xia River had risen slightly. Both banks had already entered the off-season for fishing. There was still an endless stream of pleasure boats on the river, sending muddy waves flying; it stank a little.

Tao County had undergone a dramatic change.

A hundred thousand white spirits had restored the fertile soil along the riverbank to what it ought to have been. Farming and fishing had recovered overnight and quickly developed. No longer would evil cultivators come to pilfer heaven's order.

Behind the Xia River Waterborne Troops garrisoned in Tao County were the Luwu. What had once been a crowd of disgraceful army ruffians had in Zhou Ying's hands changed beyond recognition: military discipline was in good order, each and every soldier properly turned out. No one dared to publicly feign compliance while disobeying in private—the Chu army didn't know of the "Luwu"; they only knew that the eyes of their superiors were everywhere, like mosquitoes. If anyone loafed on the job or violated discipline while on duty, when they opened their eyes the next morning, they were sure to find a slip of paper with a military penalty on their pillow. They would have to take that slip of paper to the barracks to announce their own guilt and take their punishment. No one wanted to find out what the outcome of destroying the slip of paper or putting off receiving punishment would be. Many people had married in Tao County and already had families, and the army encouraged bringing over wives and children. Over the years, through imperceptible influence, what had once been the North Xia Waterborne Troops had become Tao County's garrisoned troops; three years ago, they had formally changed their name.

Spiritual energy being prohibited meant that no one had to be on guard against another's hidden powers any longer. Public safety in Tao County had improved. The whole county had become a large-scale "Wild Fox Country," attracting large numbers of cultivators who couldn't face the light of day. Outside, these immortals all ate large quantities of spiritual stones. Upon entering, they couldn't even walk, sit, or lie down with ease; naturally they needed people to wait on them. These people didn't care at all about the money that went toward clothing and food expenses. They spent money like water. The traders had all come to life; a large number of traveling traders had even been drawn in from outside.

The dramatic changes were naturally not unconnected to the outside world
—

In order to balance the books for his spirit-conducting gold, Lin Chi would, at Xi Ping's periodic reminders, hand over some items in order to fool people. This included the improved Gold Imitation Technique he had developed in recent years.

The spiritual stone wastage of gold-smelting furnaces had instantly decreased by forty percent. The output of Moon Plated Gold had soared, while its quality had only improved.

The Golden Hand had “come back to life” after his lengthy self-imposed isolation and kindled the furnace fires on Moon Plated Peak; it seemed he had also kindled the nation's “ingenuity.” The enthusiasm of the skilled craftsmen of the mortal world reached an all-time high. They soon used the new edition of Moon Plated Gold to improve mining equipment. Previously unknown iron and coal...and all kinds of natural resources came into the world all together, which in turn propelled the mortal world's iron smelting technology.

Lin Chi had carelessly tossed the thing out and forgotten about it, but this single stone unexpectedly raised thousands of waves. The year after the new edition of Moon Plated Gold came out, mundane iron appeared in the mortal world that could perfectly substitute Moon Plated Gold in making machinery.

This meant that the mortal world's industry no longer needed to rely on spiritual stones. It now had its own development cycle.

As long as it would save spiritual stones, the immortal mountains and the courts of each nation would gladly support any effort. The forest of factories in Jinping's southern outskirts "infected" even the most conservative Northern Li's Yanning.

As for whether the rivers stank or not, whether fog would clog people's nostrils...well, that was someone else's problem. A dust dispelling talisman was only a basic open-eyed talisman.

Unnoticed by either mortals or immortals, the great age of steam had quietly commenced. Large-scale construction was in progress everywhere.

A big iron bridge spanned the Xia River, towering as the city walls of an imperial capital, with government troops standing guard at both ends to inspect passports.

The Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon tracks on the bridge, constructed entirely of mundane iron, reflected dazzling light. Every day there were two direct trips to Tao County.

Tao-er-nainai's wish had come true.

Zhou Ying had originally refused to allow the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon to come to Tao County, because Tao County was Xi Ping's protection. It was a place where spiritual energy was prohibited. There were eight million pairs of eyes fixed on it. The situation was already chaotic enough; if transportation developed further, wouldn't the people there become even more jumbled up? He advocated in favor of governing Tao County like a sealed drum, storing up over a hundred years of resources, creating a self-sufficient manufacturing system, then excavating the underground and filling it with munitions, turning anyone who came their way into a firecracker.

Xi Ping spent half a year wearing him down, pestering him endlessly. Every time, no matter what they were discussing, he would in the end come around to the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon.

Zhou Ying was annoyed to death. For a time, he didn't want to speak to him. Xi Ping then deliberately came in the middle of the night to play ditties for his san-ge and read out freshly-printed editions of the Embellished Toilet Papers. So Zhou Ying turned up an ancient illusion array and placed it in all kinds of places where it couldn't be guarded against, trapping Xi Ping's consciousness in a little black room, then sending a pile of Kaiming Cultivators who were just cramming grammar to read at him.

This battle of wits and valor between the two brothers went on for several rounds, neither getting the upper hand over the other. When they were both physically and emotionally exhausted, Xi Ping at last brought about a ceasefire by saying, “San-ge, when the tidal waves rise to the sky, the roc doesn’t dare to move, and even vast mansions are in danger of toppling. Only those who are the waves themselves do not fear the waves. You are the waves yourself. Do you really want me to be a sandcastle?” Both sides yielded somewhat: the Kaiming and the Luwu secretly promoted the Wan-Chu railroad, while at the same time, Zhou Ying did indeed excavate the earth beneath the garrison and fill it with munitions.

In this way, Tao County became one of the most important hubs of the central plains area.

What had once been a backwater so destitute that it had needed alms from Sanyue and nearly lost a whole generation became a major center on the central plains all at once. The population rose sharply, and land prices soared. Tao-er-nainai was even able to entrust her little inn to her adopted son and live comfortably in her old age relying on her rents.

Xi Ping passed through the rows of reincarnation wood trees on both sides of Tao County's main street, brushing past jingling trams.

The trotting steps of newsboys in the street mixed with the sounds of voices and vehicles. The clamor was nearly at a boil, yet it all seemed to have nothing to do with him.

He squeezed into an alley and walked out of a reincarnation wood sapling planted in the yard of "Cui Yugan"—some years ago, the old bachelor Cui Yugan had finally happened upon some dumb luck and put together a small fortune, managing to settle down in advance of Tao County's soaring housing costs. The neighbors all knew that he wasn't a bad person, just weird. He was always rambling around elsewhere. He would come crawling back to stay for a while when he encountered some difficulty.

The Tai Sui Qin would startle the whole county if it played, so Xi Ping didn't touch it. He only took the dust-covered huqin down from the wall and produced a long sigh from it.

The huqin had gone out of tune from damp. He didn't tune it. Hoarse creaks came from it like an emotional knot that wouldn't unravel. The racket was inexpressibly lonely.

In a flash, over a decade had passed. The Marquis had grown old, his grandmother was dead, and the aunt he had last seen as a child was also dead. Underneath her gorgeous burial garb, she had been as faded and white-haired as an ordinary old woman. He couldn't remember how she had looked before. All that remained was the dry description "like a goddess," formless and empty.

Had he not become a cultivator, presumably he would also have married and had children, been changed entirely by the wear and tear of time.

Being broken and crushed all the way, he had struggled up to the high clouds and seemed to have left the common lot of humanity—birth, old age, sickness, and death—far behind him. But while the dark clouds of oblivion and death had scattered, they were still omnipresent.

For long-lived cultivators, wasn't change the same as omnipresent "death"?

Xi Ping's hand trembled, and one of the strings snapped. Without spiritual energy to protect him, it left a red mark on his hand. Then from the door came Tao-er-nainai's still resonant voice: "Hey, Lao Cui, have you come back after yet another heartbreak?"

Xi Ping forced himself to calm down. He let out a sigh. Truly one couldn't trust in folk legends. All this business of "a snapped string means a soulmate to listen"...it was nonsense.

He had yet to put on Cui Yugan's makeup, so, putting on a frosty look, Xi Ping called outside, "You'd better not stick your head in! I'm not dressed, I won't be responsible if you get your eyes stung!"

Tao-er-nainai spat. "Shameless thing."

Xi Ping laughed in spite of himself, the gloom in his mind lessening slightly. He was just about to go get his disguise kit when he heard Tao-er-nainai say from the door, "Your huqin playing doesn't sound like you got dumped by a woman today. What have you been up to?"

Xi Ping paused, then answered, "Went home for a funeral."

"Whose?"

"My aunt's."

Tao-er-nainai gave a cry. She first delivered some condolences accompanied by despairing sighs, then asked, "How old was your late aunt when she passed?"

When she heard the answer, she said, “That’s about the same age as me. You can’t say she died young. At our age, it’s all the same if we die tomorrow.”

The old lady had a loose tongue. Her words once again made Xi Ping feel heavy-hearted. “That’s nonsense, do you have to mention...”

“If I don’t mention it, does it mean I won’t die, blockhead?” Tao-er-nainai clicked her tongue. “If you don’t die in the future, can you say you’re living today? You’d become a dumb rock like that crowd of undying immortals.”

Xi Ping froze abruptly, remembering that he had received similar enlightenment in the Unbound Furnace, but he had hurried past it before having the time to comprehend it. But now that it had been casually spoken by an old mortal lady who could only read account books, it pricked his heart.

Another neighbor to the east heard and couldn’t resist saying, “Er-nainai, that mouth of yours is amazing... How can you be passing judgment on the immortals again?”

“Ha,” Tao-er-nainai laughed heartily, “I’m already buried up to the neck in the earth. What have I got to be afraid of? There aren’t any immortals in Tao County anyway!”

The neighbor said, “Just get a load of that heresy. You’ve been going out to listen to that crowd of idle blockheads in the teashops ‘debating’ again, eh? Let me tell you, they’re all shiftless students who couldn’t manage to get any scholarly honors or rank in the examinations, and they won’t go out and get a job to make some money. They’ve filled up all the children’s heads with nonsense.”

Xi Ping came back to himself and couldn’t help laughing. He wiped the dust off the huqin, then, calmly fiddling with his face, he listened to Tao-er-nainai talking to the neighbor to the east.

There had been all kinds of work in Tao County in recent years—roads being repaired, houses being reroofed, ditches being dug and canals being laid...everywhere was in need of accounting and overall planning. There was too much work for the garrison’s people to do, so a crowd of cultured gentlemen had been hired to come do odd jobs, attracting a number of down and out impoverished scholars who had been unsuccessful in their careers.

When there was work, the scholars acted as foremen. When there wasn’t work, they sat around idly in the tea shops and wine shops disdained by cultivators. At first, they would only get together to chat about music, chess, calligraphy, and painting, but once someone had gotten drunk and, slamming the table, had come out with “We’re all born human, aren’t we? I’d bet all those immortals pissed their pants when they were little.” Instantly, the crummy wine shop had fallen silent...but after a long moment, nothing had happened.

The soldiers patrolling in the streets walked by, turning a deaf ear to it. The shopkeeper balancing the books didn’t even look up. No bolt of lightning fell, and no Qilin Guardsman reached out across empty space to slap the speaker in the face.

The scholars were uneasy for several days, then found that not only did the immortals of Tao County have no powers, they also seemed to be a little deaf. So their nerve grew little by little until they dared to say anything, such that later people would deliberately come to Tao County for its debate culture, turning it into an institution. If a “well-known commentator” were coming, the shopkeeper would even announce the time and place in advance, sticking it up beside the menu for public notice. When the event occurred, toilet bulletin printers from all over would sneak in, waiting for shocking statements to relate.

Tao-er-nainai, who was richly experienced, commented: “It’s just talk. Some people talk quite well, and some people’s words are nothing but impudence. If you listen enough, you’ll know who to cheer for. As I see it, none of them are as good as Sir Xu.”

Xi Ping plastered down his eyelids; his eyes became triangles half their original size. Hearing these words, he paused: Zhao Qindan?

Tao-er-nainai's praise of Zhao Qindan went on at length. She said that she knew astronomy and geography, that she was practically a goddess of literature incarnate. "...she can quote chapter and verse from the classics, and she'll tell you clearly which edition and which page she's referring to, so the ignorant will know where to look. She never speaks without consideration, and when she speaks, she shuts all those pedants right up. Just look now, do those dolts who call her a clucking hen dare to heckle her?"

The neighbor to the east said helplessly, "No one's calling her a clucking hen, they're saying she's a 'hen crowing at daybreak'..."⁸⁸

Xi Ping stuck on his messy fake beard, snapped his fingers and disappeared, then floated out through the reincarnation wood.

The soft sound of a qin came to the ears of the meditating Zhao Qindan, so she opened her eyes and said, "Have you returned to Tao County, senior? I was just going to speak to you."

She was one of the few who maintained the "three improvements and three abstinences" of Xuanyin Mountain's life of quiet cultivation. During these eight years, the former young mistress had left her country and her instructors and broken with her clan, and was living no differently from mortals, but she hadn't abandoned asceticism, study, meditation, or daily lessons. It wasn't that she still wanted to cultivate; it was just that these were the only roots that remained to her after she had bid farewell to the past, and she feared that if she lost them, she would be entirely incapable of finding herself.

But little by little, Zhao Qindan had found Tao County overturning her previous understanding: that open-eyed cultivators couldn't hold spiritual energy within themselves but had to "refine their spiritual bones," which couldn't be done by lying down and idling—they had to constantly fly, draw talismans, make arrays, and follow other such patterns, leading spiritual energy to scour their limbs and bones. Even if they were in good physical condition, they still had to be diligent...and most importantly, only with enough spiritual stones to spend on drawing talismans and making arrays could a half-immortal rinse their spiritual bones before their lifespan ran out.

But Tao County was different. There was no way to draw talismans here. She spent all day mingling with mortals, doing the work of teaching, and the spiritual energy would pass as naturally as breathing through the spiritual eyes she had originally thought useless. At dawn, she would meditate and examine herself. Every time she made progress, her body would naturally become a little more graceful—Tao County was actually automatically refining her bones, even faster than if she had been burning spiritual stones outside.

Sadly, there were few cultivators willing to settle down in Tao County and live like “crippled” mortals. Those who came from outside only wished to escape from this place where they could only use their two legs to walk as soon as their deal was done, and the Luwu weren’t about to go around blabbing about it all over the place. In eight years, apart from their own people coming to cultivate for fixed periods, very few people had discovered this.

Receiving her response, Xi Ping sent his consciousness into the reincarnation wood tree in her yard. Seeing her, he gave a cry. “Your spiritual bones are complete. So fast?”

Zhao Qindan saluted toward the tree. “I think I have a Way of the Heart.”

“Did you get it from arguing in tea shops?”

“Pretty much,” Zhao Qindan said, smiling, then said, “Senior, I want to find a place where I won’t impact heaven’s order to establish a foundation. Can you instruct me? Approximately how many spiritual stones does it take to establish a foundation?”

Xi Ping thought, After all, she's the daughter of a noble family. If she wants something, she always thinks of saving up the money for it herself. She won't consider crooked thoughts at all.

"No need," said Tao County's most mysterious protector. "I'm just on my way somewhere. You can come with me."

CHAPTER 146 - The Storm Begins (4)

Southern Shu—

Shu was divided into two parts. The main peninsula bordered on Western Chu; it was the tail-end of the western part of the continent. The national capital Zhaoye and the Lingyun Spiritual Mountain Range were both on the main island.

Crossing the Goddess Strait to the south, you arrived at the famous Three Islands of Southern Shu.

These three precious islands were named for Shu's three auspicious beasts. The two islands to the west neighbored each other, one north and one south. The northern island was named Scarlet Ibis, and the southern island was named Sable Sheep. The eastern island was long and narrow; therefore, it had been given the name Waking Dragon.

On Sable Sheep Island, there was sweltering heat year-round, but in the north of Scarlet Ibis Island there were projecting mountains with snow often floating on their towering peaks. The wind swept among the three islands. When it hit the depths of the range of hills along Waking Dragon Island's east side, it let out a lengthy whistle, harmonizing with hundreds upon thousands of spiritual beasts. The weather was very changeable here. It was known as “a different sky every three li.” From Kunlun to Lancang, throughout the whole continent, practically all species of plants could be found on Southern Shu’s Three Islands.

It was said that long ago, even eternal spring brocade had grown here.

Of the spiritual beast materials used by the ways of medicine and toolmaking, approximately sixty percent came from Southern Shu’s Three Islands. The Miah were divided into nine tribes. Under the protection of beast-taming cultivators and arrays, they constantly lived alongside all types of spiritual beasts.

Toward evening, on a beach on the west coast of Waking Dragon Island, the sea waves gently struck the reef, letting off light like fragmentary gold. There was a splash. The sea birds flew up in surprise, several flying fish leapt joyfully, and then, a “big python” thick enough for several people to wrap their arms around unexpectedly emerged from the sea and “flew” over a zhang high.

This big python had skin like satin, with a rich play of light flowing over its whole body. When it leapt into midair, the python’s body became insubstantial. The sunset glow passed through it. First it became partially transparent, and then, like a beautiful dream, it dispersed into spray and merged into the seawater along with the vapor, leaving only a rainbow behind in midair.

This kind of miraculous sight could probably have scared a passel of mainlanders out of their wits, but the Miah children playing on the reef banded together in delight, chattering excitedly as they lined up holding hands and piously made wishes in the direction the big python had disappeared—that python-shaped spiritual beast was the waking dragon itself, a very docile type of sea-dwelling spiritual beast. It never spontaneously attacked people. When it left the water, it could turn into a rainbow. When it dispersed into spray, the sparkles could travel over a hundred zhang away.

The east island had been named for the waking dragon. The locals believed that the waking dragon was the beloved pet of the sea god, and seeing a waking dragon turn into a rainbow could give you ten days of good luck; any wish could come true.

The waking dragon that had become a rainbow appeared in the distance. Its long, muffled cry reverberated from the seabed. In the sunset glow, a human form hung indistinctly above the sea, affectionately patting the big python's head.

On the shore was a small and skinny Miah boy wearing a visor palm-leaf fan on his head. He looked like a bean seedling that had just sprouted. The bean seedling's eyes widened as he looked toward that person. Excitedly, he struggled free of his companions' hands. "Look, it's the sea god!"

All the children stood up on tiptoe.

"Where?"

"Where is he?"

"Right there, next to the waking dragon!"

But his little companions seemed to be blind. No matter how he pointed, they couldn't find the person. The little bean seedling was so worked up he flailed his arms and jumped.

"There's no one there," said a slightly older child. "He's just a babbling parrot. He's always making up lies to get attention. Liars have bad luck. It's no wonder your family's always unlucky."

"He really is there..."

"Lying parrot! Liars have rotten luck!"

Children follow an older child's example. A crowd of kids noisily surrounded the bean seedling. The gaudy bean seedling ran away crying.

The bean seedling was extremely aggrieved. "I'm not a liar, he's right there..."

Just then, he heard a soft laugh in his ear. A slightly low masculine voice said, "Shh—"

The bean seedling looked through his tears and saw the sea god in the distance, like a shadow, lift a finger toward him.

"Don't cry, you were telling the truth. If others don't believe you, it's because they're incredibly ignorant. Why should you cry over others being slow-witted?"

The sea god was speaking!

The bean seedling's dark green eyes became round.

"I only appear to special people." The sea god's voice resounding in his ears was like the gentlest breeze of dusk. "I only took one gift with me when I went out today, to give to the best child. What wish did you make to the waking dragon just now?"

The bean seedling stammered, "Sea god, can you save my dad?"

The sea god tilted his head. "Oh?"

"My dad went out to gather herbs, and his foot got bitten by a crawling ghost. His foot turned black, and the apothecary uncle said they'll have to cut off his leg..."

The sea god gave a cry. "That must hurt."

There was a faint trill in his voice. These words made the child cry.

The skinny Miah bean seedling stood alone on the reef by the sea. As he sobbed, he brokenly explained his family's melancholy circumstances. His father had a high fever and was always crying out in pain... He was too little; under the influence of mingled surprise and fear, his words were incoherent, but the sea god wasn't the least bit impatient. He listened to him vent for the space of a whole incense stick.

Only when the setting sun had sunk into the surface of the sea did the little boy finally cry himself to exhaustion. With eyes like peaches, he looked with difficulty at the human form that had nearly blended into the setting sun.

The sea god said, “Turn around. Count five steps backward with your cute little feet and have a look at what’s under that triangular rock.”

The boy turned his head in surprise. Indeed, five steps away, he saw a triangular rock. When he walked over and looked, he saw that there was a small bottle hidden under it. The tight seal couldn’t seal off the fragrance within.

The sea god had bestowed a magical elixir!

The boy was ecstatic. He cautiously picked the little bottle up with both hands and wanted to thank the sea god, but when he looked back, the waking dragon and the man had both vanished.

Like the waking dragon’s spray scattering into the air, as if they had been a dream.

On the calm sea bed of the South Sea, the enormous waking dragon passed through coral and shoals of fish. On its back stood a graceful young man.

His thick, dark grey hair was spread out in the water like seaweed. He had a typical Miah countenance, but his figure was very tall and sturdy, with broad shoulders and a narrow waist, more like the Xiuyi.

His eyes were two different colors, one grey and one yellow, but they didn't seem strange at all. The corners of his eyes and the tips of his brows were both slightly down-turned, as if adding a trace of sorrow to his gentleness, but there was a natural slight smile about the corners of his lips. When he looked at someone, he seemed to be the reflection of the affectionate husband of a young girl's dreams.

Suddenly, the waking dragon shivered. Its huge head split open. A dark red lotus stalk slowly reached out of the top of its head, then grew a flower.

The unusual white lotus took no notice of the water pressure. In the depths of the sea, it burst into full bloom. Where the stamen ought to have been, a face grew, all covered in mouths!

One mouth said, "Tsk, you sham!"

Another mouth said, "Disgusting!"

Yet another mouth said, "It's obvious you didn't expect that there'd be a kid with a first-class spiritual sense in this backwater and accidentally got yourself seen. Only appear to special people? Shameless."

At last there were no more mouths. A provisional slit opened in the lotus flower and spoke in Southern Shu's official language, strangely accented: "You would even lie to a child. Lao Wang, you're very wicked."

"My surname isn't Wang. My family name is 'Wangge,'" the "sea god," completely unmoved, responded amiably.

It turned out that this odd-eyed young man was Southern Shu's preeminent evil cultivator, Wangge Luobao, who spent every day openly roaming through Southern Shu's Three Islands!

Wangge Luobao spoke the Shu language with an unusual cadence, as though he were singing. It was pleasing to the ear. "While admittedly a first-class spiritual sense is a rare gift, what connection can a child of villagers and fishermen ever have to the cultivation world? It's purely imaginary. Isn't the best thing to make the child happy? He'll love this patch of sea for the rest of his life..."

The four mouths on the lotus flower all spoke at the same time: "Ew—"

Wangge Luobao glanced at the lotus flower with his melancholy odd-colored eyes. "If you don't want to be happy yourself, not even other people's hearts breaking can make you smile."

The lotus flower said with a cold laugh, “Where is your heart broken? Get it out and let me sew it up, why don’t you? I really can’t stand the sappy way you Shu talk.”

Wangge Luobao seemed to lack the emotion of “anger.” Hearing this, he remained unmoved. Instead, he very understandingly said, “Zhuoming, everyone in the world has mistreated you, but you’ve escaped them now, clearly. Yet you continue to mistreat yourself...as if changing to another mode of living would be betraying the past, forgiving your enemies. Why do you suffer like that?”

The lotus flower—Zhuoming, who had once escaped from the Sanyue Mountains—coldly said, “Save that crap for dealing with those evil cultivators, all right? See if they’ll bite.”

Wangge Luobao changed the subject. He said, “I’ve leaked all the information that needed to be leaked. I don’t have any control over whether they come or not.”

“Xuanwu will definitely come,” Zhuoming said. “He’s been wanted as a criminal by the four great spiritual mountains all these years, dodging and hiding. He urgently needs a stable place to heal and restore his boundary. You’re an evil cultivator. It won’t hurt his Way of the Heart to destroy evil. The Misty Willow will also definitely come. His speed of passing through boundaries is unprecedented, but that means he has no solid foundation. He hasn't had time to steadily save up resources. The number of spiritual stones an ascended spirit has to burn isn't something a mere established foundation can imagine. All the Kaiming Departments of Great Wan's nine provinces put together might not be able to support him. He must be desperately hard-up now, desperately looking for resources... What reason could he have not to come?"

As Zhuoming spoke, he merged his four mouths into one. His features returned to their original positions. "This person is extremely sly, always hiding something. He'll have anticipated that many of his enemies will be at this gathering in the South Sea. It's likely he won't rashly come with his true body. An ascended spirit of the ungovernable way can swap his true body with his accompanying plant for thousands of li around at will. The vegetation on Southern Shu's Three Islands is lush, and misty willow is a lowly wood that grows in any corner. It's everywhere here... He's certain to order a trusted subordinate to go on ahead and send a sliver of his consciousness to watch in secret from a nearby misty willow.

"This time, as long as he sends a single sliver of consciousness..."

Zhuoming's newly collected features twitched uncontrollably. His eyes nearly went flying. "I won't give him another chance to escape."

Wangge Luobao sighed. “In fact, as I see it, all the preparations that individual made back then were for the purpose of protecting himself. If you hadn’t attacked him first, no matter how many backup plans he had, he wouldn’t have had a chance to use them. There was no need for things to reach this stage. Stubborn biases always have a reason. If you can’t clearly work out what this Tai Sui means to you, even if you capture his consciousness, you’ll still only have a new source of unhappiness...”

Before he could finish, a lotus stalk struck at his forehead like a flash of lightning. Wangge Luobao’s figure flashed, and he was somewhere else, leaving behind only a strand of long hair broken off by the lotus stalk.

“You’re only a speculator in spiritual beast offal. Don’t try to teach me how to go about my business,” Zhuoming said coldly. “I aided you in becoming an ascended spirit, so you have to pay tribute to me for ten years. We each get what we need. Don’t forget that my lotus seal is on your consciousness. If you speak out of turn again, I’ll restrain you.”

As he spoke, the man and the python burrowed into the furthest depths of the sea bed. The fine sand of the seabed churned and absorbed them.

“There’s another person you must be careful of.” Zhuoming’s voice reverberated over the empty seabed. “The shadow of the Slumbering Dragon Sea, Yu Chang. The Misty Willow removed his spiritual image brand and has used Yu Chang's vital power many times. There is a deep connection between the two of them. They must be colluding.”

In the north—

With Southern Shu's Three Islands as a boundary, looking out from the towering peaks of the Lingyun Mountains toward the ocean that touched the sky, to the south was the South Sea, while to the north was the Slumbering Dragon.

Only the “foot” that the Slumbering Dragon Sea extended toward the peninsula of Chu and Shu was temperate. Going north, meanwhile, it was a world of eternally unmelting ice and snow. The glaciers on the sea were linked to the frozen soil of the northern plains. This was the truly a place “with no birds in flight, unmarked by the step of man.”⁸⁹

Currently, in the southern half of the continent, the plums were already yellow, and Southern Shu's Three Islands had entered the rainy season. Even the wildflowers at the feet of the Kunlun Mountains had blossomed, and familiar wild geese had returned to Yanning.

The glacier in the North Slumbering Dragon Sea at last melted slightly. There was a crisp crack. A huge ice floe fell from the glacier, revealing only a tip above the water. Underwater, there were still a thousand zhang, plunging into the abyss like a long drill.

A black shadow spread upward from the lower part of the ice floe. In an instant, it had stained the ice pure black, as if it had been soaked in ink. When it had floated all the way to the surface of the water, the black shadow dispersed into the seawater all around.

As the seawater oscillated, the delicate-featured face of a Chu man appeared faintly within it.

“The South Sea...” the person in the shadow whispered. His voice reverberated through the ice, shaking another ice floe off the glacier.

Then the shadow on the surface of the water collected together, and a person emerged. The chief offering who had once been imprisoned in the shallows of Yu Family Bend was already an ascended spirit. The aura surrounding him was even more unfathomable. “Tai Sui, it’s about time you returned my Discard the False and Keep the True book.”

At the Chu-Shu border—

Past the sheltering mountains of Chu, the terrain gradually leveled out. A vast rainforest separated the nations of Chu and Shu. It was called the All-

Devouring Marsh.

This place had few signs of humanity. The rainwater went where it would. Each pool of accumulated rainwater might be hiding fatal marshland beneath it, capable of swallowing an elephant; at the shared border between the two nations, the spiritual energy was disorderly. Spiritual energy vortexes would appear in midair out of nowhere. In the past, Sanyue had sent some inner sect masters along with Qilin Guardsmen to explore it. Over a dozen established foundation and open-eyed elites, and they had vanished without a trace, dead or alive; not one person had returned.

Therefore, it had become forbidden territory for both the mortal and immortal worlds.

In the silent dense forest, a patch of level ground caved in without warning. Boiling bubbles floated up. Suddenly, a human hand reached out of the marsh, untouched by mud. It was clear at a glance that this was a cultivator protected by spiritual energy.

The veins on this hand stood out. It formed a hand seal overhead, and the surrounding spiritual energy immediately formed a talisman in accordance with that hand seal. Visible to the naked eye, a number of ancient trees drooped slightly. When the talisman had just taken shape, the hand suddenly trembled fiercely, like a convulsion, and was pulled downward fiercely by an unknown force.

The completed talisman condensed the surrounding spiritual energy into substance. Clutching its master's hand, it rubbed the fingers raw, but in the end this was futile.

The hand sank into the marsh. A moment later, weak spiritual energy diffused. A final bubble emerged from the marsh, like a burp while digesting.

The peaceful marsh faded bit by bit and became pure white. It turned into Xuanwu, wearing his mask.

Xuanwu gently wiped the mouth drawn on his mask.

“It is everyone's duty to punish evil cultivators who pilfer heaven's order.”

He cast his gaze southward and whispered, “The South Sea...”

—

Author's Note

I won't reply in the comments. Concerning the part in the last chapter about steam in this novel:

Smelting and mining have always existed, and coal was always a raw material, but the technology of the human world was insufficient to support an Age of Steam (in the true Age of Steam, steam engines, smelting, mining, navigation, and so on all developed together, spiraling upward).

The reason that an Age of Steam incompatible with society's development came ahead of time before is that it had Moon Plated Gold to support it. Moon Plated Gold burns spiritual stones and has a certain ability to conduct spiritual energy. Its various properties can change according to its application. It's a "divine iron" developed based on magic that raised production capabilities. You could say that the mortal world's industry and technology were weakly built upon magic, completely different from development in the real world.

But in the last chapter, the new edition of Moon Plated Gold pulled up the smelting and mining industries past a certain threshold, finally stimulating true technological reforms belonging to mortals. Mortals began to break free of Moon Plated Gold (though of course they'll return to it later).

This structure in fact closely resembles the 17th century's natural theology. At first, England's Royal Society attempted to use science to strengthen religion, believing that nature had a holy order and that science expounding on natural law was the same as analyzing divine oracles. But later science matured and became independent, and instead dragged conservative religious authority down from its altar.

CHAPTER 147 - The Storm Begins (5)

It was the fifth month. The days began to shorten after the summer solstice. Pestilential miasma hid beneath the lush leaves.

The heroes who couldn't see the light of day wouldn't give up on exploring any avenue of survival. Each harboring their own designs, they hastened toward the South Sea.

A realistic big whale passed over the sea bed a thousand zhang deep. The inscriptions on its belly flashed faintly—this was an immortal tool for moving stealthily through deep seas.

This immortal tool was somewhat similar to the “big cuttlefish” White Amaranth had used back when he had been looting Great Wan's spiritual stone shipment convoy, but its movements were far smoother than that vulgar cuttlefish's. When it was far from the continent, the huge whale would occasionally emerge from the surface to let the people in its belly see some daylight. Sometimes it would attract pods of real whales.

It was said that in the past, the common people in the southern coastal area of ancient He had all worshipped whales, believing that after the huge whales died, they would sink to the sea bed, and their corpses would bless all living things; therefore, it was said that whales became gods when they passed away.

Anyway, Wei Chengxiang hadn't seen this happen, so she couldn't say whether it was true or not. At any rate, when the huge whale of Lancang had sunk, all it had supported were things like "the demon host in the East Sea" and "the greedy officials of Western Chu."

With her hands behind her back, she passed through the long, narrow passageway in the ship's hold, inspecting the spiritual stone supplies of the arrays. Everyone she met coming her way stopped respectfully to greet her, calling her Wei-laoban—in the Land of Turmoil, there was no one who didn't know the story of the established foundation cultivator White Amaranth being stabbed to death in one blow by a little girl who had just opened her spiritual eyes. Especially after the Exonerators had spent years hunting her, wave upon wave coming her way, and not only had they not killed her, she had run them ragged and depleted their main forces, lending an additional aura of mystery to her bloody reputation.

At the moment, she was on the ship of an ascended spirit master called the Queen Mother of the West, one of the Three Heroes of Turmoil.

The Three Heroes of Turmoil—these were the three who had nearly founded a country in the Land of Turmoil. Their titles were all as aggressive as their actions. To the west was the Queen Mother of the West, to the east was the Emperor of the East, and to the south was Lord Guang'an. At any rate, hearing these names made one want to shout out loud, "Long live Your Majesties!"

East and West were both local personages. They had previously been married.

The Queen Mother of the West had formerly belonged to Lancang, while the Emperor of the East had been a feral evil cultivator of Southern He. When Southern He was vanquished, the Emperor of the East had already been an established foundation, the gang leader of the local evil cultivators, while the Queen Mother of the West had been a girl who had entered the way of medicine making not long before.

With her sect scattered, her home destroyed, and her family dead, the former noble daughter had wed an evil cultivator peasant. It was hard to say how willing the Queen Mother of the West had been; from what came after, it unfortunately seemed that the answer was not very. She didn't care very much about the Emperor of the East keeping other women elsewhere. Once the little pretty boy Lord Guang'an had shown up, between the two of them, they had turned the Emperor of the East into the Cuckold of the East.

While due to discord between their Ways of the Heart, the Emperor of the East's wife had by then been so in name only, he still couldn't stand this profound humiliation. He had immediately issued an execution order for these two people in the Land of Turmoil. His network in the Land of Turmoil was large and deep-rooted. The Queen Mother of the West and Lord Guang'an had had a rough several years of it. It was fortunate that Lord Guang'an was a battle-ready sword cultivator.

These three had spent over a century fighting, until White Amaranth, one of the Emperor of the East's right-hand men, had somehow overturned his boat in Wei Chengxiang's gutter. Taking advantage of the Exonerators turning out in full force to hunt down Wei Chengxiang, the Queen Mother of the West and Lord Guang'an had picked up the Exonerators' den, sweeping the accumulated resources of the Land of Turmoil's largest snow wine merchant into their pockets, becoming ascended spirits one after the other.

The weightiness of ascended spirits wasn't something that a "force" composed of rabble could handle. The Emperor of the East was one against two. He knew that there was nothing he could do to this adulterous couple. Yet, after all, he was one of the lords of the Land of Turmoil. The Queen Mother of the West and Lord Guang'an couldn't budge him, either. So the three of them had strangely shook hands and made up, peacefully coexisting on the same patch of the continent. They had even held their noses and formed an alliance.

Not long after that, the Queen Mother of the West had sent Wei Chengxiang a letter, asking whether she wanted to come be a “visiting courtier”—in other words, a hatchet girl and errand runner. In exchange for working for her, the Queen Mother of the West supplied her with spiritual stones.

With the killing of White Amaranth to connect them, the Queen Mother of the West offered very lax terms. She didn’t require her to pledge her allegiance, and she didn’t stamp a spiritual image brand on her.

Wei Chengxiang had adopted a group of Turmoilers in the Land of Turmoil, including those Liang Chen and the Indignant Cicadas had left behind. She spent every day fretting about not having enough money. Hearing that this kind of assignment was on offer, she had agreed without a second thought. Anyway, there was Tai Sui. Even if they did give her a brand, she still wouldn’t be afraid.

After that, Tai Sui must have planted an informer beside the Emperor of the East or something—that gentleman truly was so magical that Wei Chengxiang wouldn’t be surprised by anything he got up to—no matter what evil schemes the Emperor of the East came up with, Tai Sui could always provide timely information. After performing several meritorious services, Wei Chengxiang had entirely become the Queen Mother of the West's trusted aide. On this journey to the South Sea, the Queen Mother of the West had taken her along.

Wei Chengxiang took her money and did her work; she had never let her bankroller down. She had arranged the arrays in the huge whale into shipshape order and made minor adjustments daily. They hadn't had a single problem the whole way. After finishing a round of inspection as usual, she went to the huge whale's head. Before she came close, her olfactory spiritual sense was touched—a warm, luxurious fragrance was filtering out from the prow of the ship. The smell seemed to be summoning her.

Wei Chengxiang's steps paused. Then she went down the steps and turned into the prow.

There stood a resplendently attired woman in the old garb of Southern He. The hems of her skirts dragged on the ground for three chi. The heavy, complex fabric and embroidery made it hard to count up how many layers she was wearing. But an ascended spirit in the high clouds had a sense of distance that made people not dare to look at her up close. This splendid attire, which was enough to bury a person, not only didn't seem overly solemn on her, it instead served to set off the appearance of an immortal queen.

In a shadow three paces away from her was a standing figure holding a sword, dressed all in black fighting attire, almost one with the shadow. A glance from him could make anyone's spirit sting—this was the sword cultivator Lord Guang'an. Guang'an was practically growing out of her shadow. To quote the Emperor of the East's bitter phrasing, "Not even a dog follows a person as closely as him."

"Madam, Lord Guang'an." Wei Chengxiang avoided Lord Guang'an's spearhead gaze and reported to her bankroller, "According to our itinerary, we ought to be there soon. I've checked one last time. There has been nothing unusual in the ship's course."

Hearing this, the Queen Mother of the West turned and gave her a courteous, old-fashioned salute. "Thank you, A-Xiang."

Each and every one of her movements was bonelessly soft, like a perfectly doled out noble lady. Wei Chengxiang immediately felt that even her breathing was coarse. She automatically lowered the sound of her breathing a little. "You're most welcome."

The Queen Mother of the West opened her hand. A richly colored waking dragon scale flew out of her palm and hung automatically at the prow of the ship.

This was Wangge Luobao's invitation.

The dragon scale moved and a faint light flashed. A few words in Southern He writing that looked as though they had been printed flickered. They said: "To be opened personally by the Queen Mother of the West"—Guang'an also had one.

The method of opening them personally was to put spiritual energy into them; it could only be spiritual energy belonging to the invitee. Then the invitation would pull the big ship along on its own. Wei Chengxiang had been keeping an eye on it the whole time. Not only could this invitation lead the way, it also seemed very familiar with the routes of the various nations' navies and spiritual stone convoys. It automatically avoided them and adjusted the speed of travel.

In other words, no matter where the invitee was, so long as they poured spiritual energy into the invitation, reasonably speaking, they could even punctually and precisely reach the legendary South Sea Hidden Realm while lying down.

Even more considerate, the Emperor of the East's invitation had led him along a different path. They were clearly going the same way, but since setting out, they hadn't encountered each other again. The inviter seemed to know of the discord between them and had made thorough provision.

“Under the oppression of the spiritual mountains, each one of us is short on manpower and resources. If we remain a tray of scattered sand, sooner or later, we will be eliminated one by one,” the Queen Mother of the West said slowly and softly. “I have heard that in this instance, all of our... ‘kindred spirits’ of the middle established foundation stage and above have received invitations. It is inevitable that there would be private grudges among some of them. In his letter, Wangge Luobao says that he will ensure no disputes arise. I do not know how he plans to do this.”

Just then, Lord Guang'an, who had thus far kept silent, suddenly raised his head and said, “We're here.”

No sooner had he spoken than Wei Chengxiang also sensed something. The next moment, the invitation hanging at the prow of the ship began to turn rapidly. The huge whale let out a long sigh and floated toward the surface on its own.

The surrounding seawater was immediately pushed apart by the spiritual energy of the huge whale. Spiritual light blazed brightly. Next, the huge whale vanished into thin air.

On the whale, Wei Chengxiang's consciousness immediately enveloped all the arrays and inscriptions on the ship, in case there was a problem. Then came a subtle sense of space and time warping. Her extended consciousness temporarily lost focus. After a moment, there was a light before everyone's eyes. The huge whale had completely emerged onto the surface and stopped beside a small island.

The island was deserted. There was a tidy house prepared with all the usual daily utensils of every kind, and oppressive spiritual energy—there couldn't be spiritual stones on a reef island only a few mu large like this; evidently attendants had placed them in advance.

Lord Guang'an and the Queen Mother of the West immediately sent out their consciousnesses to inspect the surroundings, but they found all of a sudden that their consciousnesses were constrained within a radius of fifty li around the little island. Small writing appeared on the wakening dragon invitation. It said: My guests have come from all four corners of the seas. All of you have entered the hidden realm through different entrances and will not disturb each other. If you are uncomfortable, you may exit the hidden realm by crushing the invitation and leave freely.

The Queen Mother of the West and Lord Guang'an exchanged a look: indeed, this Wangge Luobao really could keep people from meeting each other.

Almost at the same time, a shadow landed on another desert island. Yu Chang, his irises slightly reddened, walked out of the shadow, examined the surroundings, and frowned.

The Land of Turmoil's Emperor of the East, a mysterious sword cultivator from Northern Li, and various major and minor evil cultivators from Western Chu disembarked one after another on their islands.

There was only one little island, planted full of reincarnation wood, that remained silent.

In the depths of the South Sea, lotus stalks like the limbs of an octopus climbed wildly. A pair of odd-colored eyes opened.

Over and over, Zhuoming asked, "Well? Well?"

"Nearly all of them have arrived." Wangge Luobao frowned and discerned for a moment. "That individual...hasn't appeared yet. I can't even sense his invitation."

Meanwhile, Xi Ping, who was in the mouths and hearts of a crowd of evil cultivators, didn't feel like sneezing at all.

At the end of the fourth month, he had swaggered into Southern Shu's capital city, Zhaoye, with a team of horses and carriages and put up at what was known as Southern Shu's premier money squandering establishment: the Mirage Building.

He spent every day eating well and drinking heartily and still found time to settle two business deals.

On the whole continent, the further west you went, the more enthusiastic and less restrained the culture became. If you said that Jinping took toiling in silence to excess, always striving for "composure," and Dongheng was already considerably more demonstrative, then once you reached Zhaoye, they were simply afraid that they couldn't dazzle visitors' eyes.

The Mirage Building was actually eight floors high, with gold powder murals on the four walls and the rooftop. It couldn't support steam power, so all the lighting came from precious pearls.

The building formed a big ring with an open garden in the center. In the garden, many rare types of medicinal herbs grew in manmade green ore soil. If the guests opened their back windows and breathed in, they could expel the weariness of their journeys.

Colored glass viewing platforms of various lengths hung in midair above the garden. Propelled by complicated gears and bearings, they slowly revolved like the sun, moon, and stars. Every evening, a stage would rise above the garden, full of beauties. Guests would buy gold leaves to throw down. In the Mirage Building, music and singing were endless, and gold fell endlessly like rain.

As for how much it cost to stay there for a single day, Zhao Qindan, who had spent eight years working as an “instructor” in Tao County, didn’t ask to keep it from troubling her.

“Thank you, no need, I’m not hot...” She waved a hand to politely refuse a Miah girl who was running after her to fan her. Then, seeing that the young woman was about to step forward to lift her hems for her, she quickly said, “That’s...that’s not necessary, either!”

The young woman sheepishly drew back her hands. Zhao Qindan smiled at her and said in somewhat unpracticed Shu official language, “Go about your business, I do not need service.”

Having said so, as if fleeing, she opened a door and went into lodgings on the top floor.

The lodgings had just received a wave of guests. The guests had bid farewell, and seven or eight attendants were just clearing away the feast. These people were extremely nimble. They didn't make a sound. Seeing her walk in, an attendant immediately got out some silk and knelt to wipe the already very clean floor in front of her.

Zhao Qindan: "..."

The young mistress wasn't inexperienced in the ways of the world, but in all honesty, she thought that Southern Shu's customs were a little over the top.

She nodded in thanks and quickly went in, then heard a middle-aged man saying, "I'd been thinking, the railroad between Chu and Shu has gone through, so freight fees will be cheaper now, and we ought to lower our prices, too..."

Across from him sat a rather refined man who seemed to be in his forties or fifties. His bearing seemed to belong to an aged dandy. Interrupting, he said, "The railroad's gone through, so the stuff will be even more novel. Why should we lower our prices? When the spring tea comes out next year, we'll say it was just processed within the last three days in Tao County, and the spiritual energy hasn't dispersed yet. Oh...if you want it to sound nice, we'll say that every year when we sell five hundred jin, we'll double the price."

“Double...Tai...no, I mean, Cui-laoban, wouldn't that be drinking gold?”

This Chu merchant going by the name of “Cui Buqiong”⁹⁰ was the Luwu's Tai Sui—Xi Ping.

“What do you think they want to drink? They only use tea as a symbol because gold doesn't taste good. Just make up a story that'll justify the expense to them. The story only has to be good enough, not too sloppy. The buyers have a tacit understanding with us, they won't ask serious questions.” Xi Ping carelessly picked up a cup of plain water and drank a mouthful. “Otherwise, you'd have to be sick in the head to pay ten liang of silver to drink leaf bathwater.”

Zhao Qindan remembered her family's expenditures in the past and somehow felt like she was being mocked.

Seeing her come in, Tai Sui nodded to her. The middle-aged man with the look of a shopkeeper across from him quickly stood up. “Sir...Miss Zhao.”

This middle-aged man was also a Luwu who regularly worked in Tao County. He was acquainted with her, a “temporary staff member” of the Luwu.

While Zhao Qindan didn't meddle with the Luwu's internal assignments, she still generally knew that they had been divided into two groups over these last years. One group focused on carrying out assignments, and the other group earnestly did business. People in the two groups could swap identities any time.

But what she hadn't expected was that Tai Sui, a master who ought to have left the hubbub of the mundane behind long ago, was also involved to manage affairs. To hear the Luwu talk, the scope of his management seemed to be pretty wide, too.

It was already shocking for an ascended spirit master who could easily go into seclusion for several decades to be so good at converting between the currencies of each nation. This unconventional senior not only knew the commodity prices in every nation like the back of his hand, when it came to doing business, he kept perfect accounts—like an old shopkeeper who had steeped in an abacus for decades.

What could he possibly be cultivating...if not the way of money?

She sat down and hadn't yet had time to speak when someone cautiously knocked on the door. The Luwu responded, and a rather dignified Xiuyi steward came in, holding a flower freshly cut from a medicinal herb in his hand.

The steward wrapped the flower in silk and offered it to Zhao Qindan. Smiling brightly, he said in the Chu language, “This is the first ‘phoenix flame’ to open this morning. The bud grew the day you arrived, young mistress. I suppose it must have bloomed for you. I hope that a divine person like the young mistress will not take offense at the actions of servants. If you truly despise the Miah clansmen, we can have the supervisor reassign only Xiuyi to wait upon you.”

Zhao Qindan was bewildered. “Huh?”

“No need,” Xi Ping put in. “My niece enjoys quiet and doesn’t like having people coming and going around her. Just leave her be.”

The Xiuyi attendant quickly agreed, put down the flower, closed the door, and withdrew. The disappointment on his face was hard to disguise.

Xi Ping said, “There was always a clear distinction between the two clans here, but I recall...that it wasn’t so tense before?”

“This has come up in recent years,” the Luwu across from him said. “Especially after the toilet bulletins spread here. Before, there was a tacit understanding, but in recent years, everything has been announced in the bulletins. An article by Zhaoye’s Senior Scholar Duyu Ju spread very far. It said that the cranial circumference of Miah is on average half a cun shorter than that of Xiuyi, and a small head means a small brain. Their dispositions are impulsive, so careful work and anything that requires using one's brain is unsuited to them. There was also research saying that the Miah language is harmful to orderliness. Recently there was an anonymous article mentioning that the spiritual images of Miah were inferior to those of Xiuyi. Lingyun Mountain's Miah won't be able to keep still much longer."

Zhao Qindan: "..."

She hadn't researched brains and didn't know how to refute this, but according to this reasoning, the smartest person in all the Xuanyin Mountains would undoubtedly have to be the Latent Cultivation Temple's Luo-shixiong.

Only now did she at last realize that because she had refused to let the Miah girl fan her and carry her hems, these Xiuyi had thought she was dissatisfied and had wanted to seize the opportunity to elbow out the other clan... Even the attendants in an inn wanted to oust dissidents!

"You're looking at it the wrong way. The tips the attendants in the Mirage Building receive in a month come to eight or nine liang of silver per month. It's a cushy job. Many big machinery plants are recruiting workers and apprentices now, and they've made it clear that they don't want Miah. They're being elbowed out everywhere on the main peninsula.”

Having heard about the matter of the toilet bulletins, Xi Ping frowned thoughtfully.

Zhao Qindan asked, “Why don't the Miah dispute it?”

The Luwu said, “Southern Shu's official language and its grammar developed out of the Xiuyi language. The Miah believe in nature. Not many of them study or learn to read. Only the scholars among the Xiuyi would bother to write articles and research these things. If you go and buy a few toilet bulletins in Zhaoye, you'll know that it's practically all people from a few places debating back and forth. There are practically no Miah voices.”

Xi Ping glanced around himself. Formless spiritual energy abruptly spread out, placing a talisman to prevent eavesdropping all around.

The Luwu and Zhao Qindan instantly went silent.

Because he was wearing a spiritual image mask, Tai Sui's actions and mannerisms resembled a mortal's exceedingly. The Luwu and Zhao Qindan, who had both spent a long time in Tao County with its prohibition on spiritual energy, were always forgetting that this individual was an ascended spirit.

In front of an open-eyed cultivator, an ascended spirit was like a living spiritual mountain. If he let off a bit of his aura, he could sweep right through the meridians of low level cultivators.

It was only for a moment. Then Xi Ping once again withdrew his aura and quietly said, “I suspect that it isn’t necessarily Wangge Luobao himself assembling evil cultivators from all sides.”

In fact, he had always wanted to have a look at all the heroes in the world who rose in contravention of the spiritual mountains, but it had only been wanting. He hadn’t actually assembled them—he didn’t have the power.

And leaving aside people like Yu Chang and Zhuoming, whom he’d made trouble for, the others each had their own forces and powers. Other people hadn’t been “raised” up to being ascended spirits by a series of shed skin elders. Every one of those people who had struggled to live for centuries until they’d become ascended spirits was a remarkable personage.

So how could this Wangge Luobao be so self-confident?

If he didn't already have a tacit agreement with those great evil cultivators he had invited, then he was a blindly overconfident idiot—but judging from the reactions of the three individuals in the Land of Turmoil, it wasn't the former, and Wangge Luobao had previously been a nobody without any apparent powerful lineage, acting secretly at the feet of the spiritual mountains; he really didn't seem like a hothead who didn't know his own strength.

There was only one possibility—behind Wangge Luobao was the support of the Miah in the Lingyun Mountains.

This time, while on the surface it seemed to be great evil cultivators colluding with each other while individuals in Lingyun's inner sect violated the rules and divulged secrets, in reality it was likely that because of the internal strife between the Xiuyi and the Miah, the Miah wanted to use some means to assemble and use these great evil cultivators.

The toilet bulletins, the new version of Moon Plated Gold—these disturbing winds had evidently already blown all the way to the western continent. The steam monsters didn't suit the Miah traditions. The Miah would sooner or later be thrown off by the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon. The wise people in the immortal mountains' inner sect had evidently already noticed that if things went on like this, the Miah wouldn't have enough land to stick an axe into on their native soil.

Xi Ping took out a small colored glass bottle. Inside the bottle, the invitation made of a waking dragon scale was “imprisoned.” The scale gently bumped against the colored glass bottle, as if trying to lead him in a certain direction. When it bumped into the bottle, the inscriptions bounced it back.

You didn’t even give me a map, and you expect me to go wherever you tell me to?

Xi Ping gently tapped the bottle. “We’ll go straight to the Lingyun Mountains.”

CHAPTER 148 - The Storm Begins (6)

Shu's Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon had gotten a late start and still used steam engines made of the old version of Moon Plated Gold, which by now wasn't to be found in either Chu or Wan.

Small, strong Miah laborers hefted shovels, shoveling coal into the boiler the whole way, themselves turning as black as charcoal, with only many pairs of eyes of all different colors showing. Occasionally they straightened up and looked around somewhat blankly.

The Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon's carriages were divided into four classes. The Mirage Building could simply arrange for you to get a private compartment.

The compartment took up an entire carriage, complete with tea room, study, and bedroom; there were both male and female attendants assigned to the compartment, who came at the press of a bell.

Behind that were the first class and second class carriages, boarded entirely by respectable Xiuyi. Only after the previous class of passengers had boarded did the next class of carriage allow people to board.

When it came to the third class carriages, the “dragon-leading managers” on the platform would bawl as though herding sheep, shooing the pushing and shoving passengers onto the train. Often the people crowded to the very back wouldn’t have time to board before the train got moving, so they had no choice but to throw themselves at it like locusts descending on a rice field, clinging with difficulty to the outside of the carriage, then climbing inside amid scolding and cursing, assisting children and the elderly.

Up until she boarded the westbound Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon, a question was constantly echoing in Zhao Qindan’s mind: Are the Lingyun Mountains your family business?

For an ascended spirit cultivator like Tai Sui, trespassing into another country for no reason might end up attracting the notice of the great divine tool of the mountains. Last time, when all the ascended spirits in Tao County had violated the taboo, it was only that Xuanwu hadn’t wanted to make enemies of his neighbors and had decided it wasn’t worth it to punish the majority. This time it was only him. Even if he ranked among the thirty-six peak masters, if he died here, Xuanyin Mountain still wouldn’t be able to say anything about it.

These were another country’s immortal mountains, a blessed place of great importance. The great mountain array was connected to tens of thousands of li of veins of the earth. A foreign cultivator illegally entering the country would want nothing but to stay as far away as possible. And he was going there, just like that?

Had they been in Chu, Zhao Qindan might have suspected that Tai Sui was up to no good and was once again planning to play the “marriage alliance” card and slip someone a bearded, middle-aged Luwu for a wife. But this was Southern Shu. The Shu were extremely cautious about marriage. They didn’t have the Xiang family’s fondness for marrying all over the place like a dog pissing. If someone’s child had an illicit affair with an outsider, they would kill them if it meant guaranteeing that their bloodline would remain untainted.

She was so curious she was about to explode, but in the private compartment’s small tea room, Senior Tai Sui seemed to be meditating, and Zhao Qindan wasn’t in a position to rashly disturb him.

An ascended spirit cultivator, no matter how slovenly a spiritual image mask he was wearing, became solemn when he entered meditation.

He was like the Illuminating Dragon;⁹¹ when he closed his eyes, the surroundings changed according to his mood—the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon’s attendants, who came in periodically to inquire after their well-being, somehow didn’t come bother them again. To Zhao Qindan’s hearing, on the level of a near-established foundation cultivator, the jolting and rumbling in the compartment of the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon's movement was actually completely inaudible. She felt that even her consciousness was being drawn in by the ascended spirit aura. Her heart, which seemed before to have sprouted hair, calmed within a few breaths. She suddenly felt a bit of enlightenment. When she came back to herself midway, the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon had already entered the next station—she had inadvertently begun to meditate.

Zhao Qindan suddenly understood—it was no wonder that the disciples from each class who went directly into the inner sect cultivated far faster than those in the outer sects, and those who had the fortune to be chosen by some peak master as a direct disciple were faster still. Resources and natural endowments were one aspect, but it turned out that being beside a senior meant you could be taken by them to visit new heights!

Tai Sui ordinarily didn't appear often. The majority of the time, he was in long-distance contact with them. This was an opportunity that couldn't be passed up. Looking around, the Luwu cultivators who had come with them had seized the opportunity to do their daily lessons. Zhao Qindan also quickly picked up a few spiritual stones and began to meditate.

However...Flying Jade Peak's General Zhi might not have especially approved of the conclusion she had come to.

Zhaoting being restored had made up for the strength that had nearly been boiled out of him by the Bell of Tribulation. Little by little, Zhi Xiu could occasionally catch his breath. He was no longer restricted to buzzing.

Whenever he had free time, he would run over to Xi Ping to watch that brat practice swordsmanship; it seemed as if he wouldn't die content if he couldn't manage to teach his disciple a second sword move.

In order to get the Unbound Furnace for him, Xi Ping had gone pilfering under the nose of a full moon sage and nearly been turned into a lotus root. How could he let his shizun say as inauspicious a word as "die"?

So this great "filial" disciple had spent eight years learning many crooked teachings from the surviving Lancang manuscripts Qiu Sha had left behind, listening at the windows of the Three Heroes of Turmoil to a bellyful of grievances and romantic grudges, single-handedly leading Tao County to prosperity, developing the prototype of the toilet bulletins inspired by boundless vulgarity and spreading print culture throughout the whole continent... One could say he really hadn't been wasting his time, but he hadn't learned that second sword move.

The young mistress didn't know that right now, the unfathomable ascended spirit "senior" she beheld, steady as the landscape, was being beaten by Zhaoting.

“Focus.” Zhi Xiu sighed feebly. “Xi Shiyong, what’s got you distracted now?”

Xi Ping was very wronged. “I’m not distracted. It’s not like you can see what I’m thinking, shifu. My consciousness has even turned into the shape of a sword!”

Zhi Xiu in fact couldn’t see what he was thinking, but he could sense that there wasn’t a trace of sword aura in his spirit.

An ascended spirit couldn’t study the sword by practicing moves. He needed to become completely absorbed in the sword aura, repeatedly temper and refine himself...but Zhi Xiu teaching this rebellious disciple to “sink into the sword aura” was like teaching a feral cat to wear clothes—if you held down his head, he’d extend his claws; he wouldn’t be shoved in dead or alive.

“While sunk in the sword aura, a person loses their powers of speech. And you’re still bantering with me!”

Doubtfully, Xi Ping said, “Practicing swordsmanship makes you lose your powers of speech? The way of the sword is too bizarre. Wouldn’t everyone in it eventually turn into a mute? Shifu, could it be that you spent so much time squatting on your snow-capped mountain with no one to talk to that you forgot how to talk...ow!”

Zhaoting had dealt him another blow.

“Unreliable” may have been an inherent natural trait. Xi Ping had probably reached his present age without knowing the feeling of “a clear mind with only one thing in it” or “forgetting heaven, earth, and self”—when this kid had opened his spiritual eyes, shattered to bits and been held together by Princess Duanrui, he had still been mentally cracking jokes to himself; while establishing a foundation, he had been simultaneously scheming against his san-ge and the heart demon; on becoming an ascended spirit, the circumstances had been even more amazing—while being struck by heavenly lightning, he had been consulting with Zhou Ying on how to take precautions against the Heartless Lotus.

“I was mistaken.” Zhi Xiu sighed again. “How fortunate that you did not enter the way of the sword with me back then, or else perhaps you could not even have established a foundation.”

These words softly touched the past. For a moment, Xi Ping’s mind wandered.

If he couldn't establish a foundation, perhaps he never would have left the mountain. He would only have been a troublemaking little disciple living with his shifu, now and then breaking pieces off the snow-capped mountain, going down into the mortal world for the New Year and festivals to check in back home, bringing local specialties back and forth between the two ends.

With shizun watching over him, perhaps he would never have grown up. He would have hung around Flying Jade Peak for two centuries, and then, when his lifespan ran out, would tranquilly have gone away. When that happened, shifu would probably have been sad for a time, as if a pet cat or dog had died, but there was no such thing as an endless feast; having lived to this age, the peak master had long ago accepted this. Since they hadn't let each other down in life, there was nothing to feel uneasy about after death. Perhaps, feeling lonely, shifu might have taken another step forward in the way of the sword and, working according to the prescribed order for some centuries, he could have become a shed skin all the same.

What connection would the bewildering changes of the world have had with Xi Ping?

How ignorant a life that would have been, and also how carefree.

Xi Ping laughed. "Put that way, it's a real pity."

A pity that by a series of coincidences he had seen the universe and taken the part of all living things; the eternal unbound flame had come into his hands.

Zhi Xiu only paused for a moment, then understood what he meant. He was briefly silent, then, deliberately light-hearted, he said, “Forget it, just practice on your own. If you really can’t do it...well, if you really can’t do it, then when I leave seclusion, I’ll store another couple of moves in your meridians so you can use them to give people a scare... Ah, Shiyong, you’re better off being a good-for-nothing piece of rotten wood. In the way of the sword, a dumb piece of wood still beats a flea.”

Xi Ping picked up posthaste: “That’s right, shifu. In the way of the Dignitary of Fate, a dumb piece of wood still beats a...hss, I didn’t say anything yet!”

When it was through beating him, Zhaoting quieted down. The sliver of consciousness Zhi Xiu had split off returned to Flying Jade Peak.

Biting wind and stabbing frost simultaneously pressed down on him. He was ready. A beam of sword energy that feared neither gods nor demons surged toward the sky, holding out under the latest of some thousands upon tens of thousands of blows.

The elders thought that he was comprehending the mind of the universe, but actually he had long ago comprehended.

The will of the Way of Heaven was infinitely clear. If he only compromised, Zhaoting would become a nail fixing the land in place. Jinping's Dragon Vein, which Zhaoting had previously just managed to sustain, would from then on cease to waver.

His Way of the Heart complete, he would be among the wisest, unmoved by sentiment, connected to the intentions of the spiritual mountains. He would set aside everything that ought to be set aside.

He would no longer worry about the Land of Turmoil, and he would no longer be uneasy.

The Zhou clan, which had brought about the disaster in the East Sea, would ultimately decline; all "evil cultivators" would sooner or later be suppressed. When the time came, he would feel the instinct to kill when he heard the words "evil cultivator"; Zhaoting would flash. Even if he knew intellectually that not all evil cultivators were necessarily wicked beyond redemption... Floods were not wicked either, earthquakes did not scheme, plagues nibbling away at human bodies were only following their instincts; even if they were not evil, they must still be cured. This was the instinct of the spiritual mountains.

He would become a new “sage.”

An echo from the depths of the spiritual mountains passed over the cliff of the north slope: Is there anything wrong with that?

Was there anything wrong with that?

Wailing, a blade appeared out of nowhere. Once again Zhi Xiu hewed a gash in the will of the Way of Heaven.

But his little disciple would be disappointed.

Why was he always going to see Xi Shiyong?

In fact, Zhi Xiu had seen long ago that this kid’s thoughts were too noisy. He didn’t have what it took to study the sword. Naturally he wasn’t afraid of being humiliated, either—anyway, the brat had lost all face for him long ago.

It was only that...the legendary General Zhi was also an ordinary person; he could also be weak. Without this disciple whose way was ungovernable, perhaps he would have compromised by now. It was the pressure coming from his junior that forced him to stay where he was, forced him to think carefully before making any decision: there was a child without a Way of the Heart using him as a standard; was he worthy?

This was the light at his back.

He hadn't died yet. He still had to show later generations how far the mortals of one age could go in a world that had "always been like this."

If even the hard and fast rule that evil cultivators couldn't become ascended spirits could be broken, then couldn't the impenetrable heavens split open a little further...?

A mighty sword cultivator couldn't possibly be outdone by a member of the famously weak way of toolmaking, could he?

A ponderous force pressed down on Zhaoting. The Sword that Mended the Heavens, though it was a sliver thinner, had passed through the tempering of the Unbound Furnace; it gave a long cry. Sword energy even keener than before swept out, knocking a crack in the snow-capped mountain.

The sword cultivator had exhausted his strength for now and went back into hibernation...and from the crack in the snow-capped mountain, a fragile shoot grew.

On the Principal Peak, Princess Duanrui opened her eyes, feeling the Bell of Tribulation quiver.

She cocked an ear and listened for a moment, then expressionlessly raised her head and sent out a beam of ice-cold spiritual energy, stilling the Bell of Tribulation before it could ring. After a moment, the trembling of the Bell of Tribulation quieted. As if nothing had happened, she drew back her hand and formed a hand seal for a Heavenly Question: Zhou Ying is a direct descendant of my family. He may study with me, go on record as a disciple of Green Pool Peak. Green Pool Peak does not accept men, but he is always away from the sect. If he needs to cultivate in seclusion, it will suffice to order him to proceed to the Latent Cultivation Temple.

The Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon on the western continent gave a long wail. At the front of the train, it was raining, but at the back it was still bright and sunny. Like a dragon, the train passed through a small curtain of rain. Its head breathed out rolling smoke that poured into the rainforest to either side.

As soon as Xi Ping opened his eyes, the clanking of the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon running over cracks in the tracks immediately filled the whole compartment. The mundane world, kept out by the aura of an ascended spirit, returned.

Zhao Qindan's head cleared at once. The handful of spiritual stones in her palm had already turned to powder.

For a moment, she couldn't quite come back to herself. Then Xi Ping said, "We're almost there."

A ke later, they came to a town beneath the Lingyun Mountains, called Quancheng, quite small.

Because further up ahead were the Lingyun Mountains and trespassers were forbidden to enter, there was a Dragon Subduing Knights sentry post at the town's border. The boundary of the great mountain array was less than sixty li from Quancheng. Here, the might of the spiritual mountains could already be faintly sensed.

Quancheng was the terminus of the westbound Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon. Many traveling merchants and hired laborers disembarked at this stop, because there was a market here: on the fifth of every month, the Lingyun Mountains would bring out the skin, fur, and bones that the sect couldn't use and auction it off to the mortals. Many wholesalers waited there to pick up goods. Then they would process them slightly and turn them into unconventional ornaments and clothes, more precious than any pearls or jade.

Only the major merchants with the best connections and financial resources were qualified to come to the spiritual beast fur auction house. Years ago the Luwu had paid a big price in order to enter this channel. Xi Ping had come in no big hurry. The other major buyers had arrived ahead of him. He was quite familiar with all these people. As soon as they arrived in Quancheng, they attended three social engagements in one night. Only then did Zhao Qindan learn that which spiritual beast's fur was recommended each season was settled among this crowd of merchants, who would agree to promote it together. They were in a tacit understanding to maintain a collaborative framework, and privately there were hidden undercurrents surging as they competed with one another.

The night of the fifth, when the auction concluded, Zhao Qindan saw a special person.

Unexpectedly, this was a Turmoiler.

The Turmoiler had deathly pale skin and only a few scant hairs on his head. He was the height of a half-grown child, with a back as bent as a shrimp. His fingers were crooked to the point of being deformed, like disproportionate claws. His face was overgrown with gullies, and when he smiled, he showed a mouthful of sharp teeth, as if he were about to suck blood and eat flesh at any moment.

Zhao Qindan had never seen a Turmoiler. When the door opened, she jumped in alarm and thought, What kind of monster is this? She nearly drew her sword.

But Tai Sui stood up. Coming forward to greet him, he said, “Queru is here.”

The Turmoiler gave a proper bow and saluted. A sharp trill came from his throat. He spoke the Wan language clearly and slowly: “The conflagration burns on, the cry of the cicada is without end—greetings, Tai Sui. I trust you have been well since we parted.”

“Oh, go on, get in here,” Xi Ping said, laughing. “Hasn’t Wei Chengxiang taught you people anything worthwhile?”

Zhao Qindan’s eyes opened wide. She thought, This is one of A-Xiang’s... people? Is he a person?

“You shouldn’t say that, Tai Sui. What you see as a senseless slogan is spring thunder when heard by those in a lightless place. When everything is too much to bear, you need an incantation to give you a hand.” The Turmoiler unhurriedly strolled in, took off his bamboo hat, and casually saluted Zhao Qindan. “My surname is Li, given name Manlong, nickname Queru.

Because I was born in the Land of Turmoil, my appearance is shocking. I've frightened the young lady. Pardon me."

Zhao Qindan was even more astonished, because she had heard that, owing to having lost the protection of the spiritual mountains, the Turmoilers had turned into monsters who killed people and ate rotten flesh, living ignobly like farm animals or wild beasts. This was her first time learning that Turmoilers could talk...that they could have surnames, given names, and nicknames, and even speak the Wan language with erudition!

"Enough, you're full of arguments." Xi Ping poured him a cup of tea and said, "Why have you come yourself? Where's Renjiao?"

The Turmoiler who called himself Li Manlong thanked him and accepted the tea, neither obsequious nor supercilious. Then he said, "Renjiao passed away at the beginning of the year."

Xi Ping instantly froze.

"The cultivator stewards of the spiritual beast farm made an oversight and didn't repair the arrays in a timely manner. Two lightning foxes escaped. Renjiao happened to be on duty that day. He had gone to feed the terrestrial beasts and didn't have time to dodge. He was bitten," Li Manlong said. “The bite was extremely toxic. There was no pain. Set your mind at ease, Tai Sui.”

Only then did Zhao Qindan realize that these Turmoilers came from the spiritual beast farm at the feet of the Lingyun Mountains.

In the Lingyun Mountains, people and beasts lived together. Apart from the spiritual beasts kept by beast-taming cultivators, which acknowledged them as masters, the other spiritual beasts were all on the farm to be bred, trained...or provide materials for the medicine and toolmaking ways. The spiritual beast farm had cultivator stewards, but how could lofty cultivators do dirty, tiring work like feeding animals and shoveling manure? Before, they had enlisted mortals to do it, primarily the Miah, who were skilled in rearing spiritual beasts.

But the spiritual beast farm belonged to the periphery of the Lingyun Spiritual Mountains. There was plentiful spiritual energy. As time went on, some people among these Miah workers, like the miners in the southern mines, would have their spiritual eyes opened.

The Xiuyi believed that the crafty Miah were doing this deliberately. They had picked several fights about it. Finally, it had been forbidden for mortals to enter Lingyun Mountain’s spiritual beast farm. They only brought in Turmoilers with relatively clear intellects from the Land of Turmoil. The Turmoilers had unusual constitutions. They couldn't open their spiritual eyes. They were only a little smarter than dogs. All you had to do was feed them; there was no need to pay wages. And if these clumsy things died, that was no problem. There were plenty of them in the Land of Turmoil. All you had to do was snatch up another batch and beat them until they behaved.

In his shrill voice, Li Manlong calmly said, "The human world is an abyss of misery. We struggle to survive only because we are unreconciled. Death means freedom. There is no need for you to be troubled, Tai Sui. Anyway, it isn't necessarily without benefit to us that the spiritual beast farm's oversight is so lax. Though Renjiao is gone, I am still not lonely. Many of the brothers in the spiritual beast farm are our people now. It is only that our tongues and throats are unusual, and it is difficult for us to learn to speak. I was worried about offending Tai Sui and didn't bring them today."

"Don't worry about it," Xi Ping said after a moment's silence. "My teacher often says that the human speech I know is limited, too."

Having said this, the person in the high clouds met the eyes of the Turmoiler, and they both laughed. Zhao Qindan's mind heated. She broke out in gooseflesh.

Then she heard Tai Sui point to her and say, "You could call Miss Zhao a close friend of A-Xiang's. She recently completed her Way of the Heart and spiritual bones and wants to find a place to establish a foundation. How about the spiritual beast farm?”

“My life is too unimportant,” Li Manlong said seriously. “I guarantee Miss Zhao’s safety on my honor.”

“All right, then I’ll entrust her to you. Your honor is worth more than any bullshit spiritual mountains.” Saying so, Xi Ping took out a brocade bag containing a handful of reincarnation wood seeds. “Take me into the Lingyun Mountains.”

CHAPTER 149 - The Storm Begins (7)

It was over eight hundred li from the Lingyun Mountain Range to Southern Shu's west coast. All of this was given over to the spiritual beast farm.

The spiritual beast farm backed against the spiritual mountains and was surrounded on the other three sides by the sea. Its size far exceeded Zhao Qindan's imagination.

The nominal stewards very rarely came here, only used their consciousnesses to give it a sweep at fixed intervals. Zhao Qindan used a spiritual image mask to turn herself into a Turmoiler and infiltrated the spiritual beast farm following Li Manlong.

“No need to worry, Miss Zhao. The cultivator lords can't tell us apart,” Li Manlong said, “and no one will look closely at us.”

In fact, Zhao Qindan herself didn't dare to take a casual glance at her reflection when she passed by bodies of water. Though she couldn't bear to comment, the reality was that the Turmoilers looked less human than a shaved monkey.

Large-scale aquatic spiritual beasts encircled the main island, dwelling in the surrounding seas, their songs mixing closely with the sound of the waves.

On land, to the south was rainforest beyond what the eye could take in, extending all the way to the feet of the Lingyun Mountains. In the center was a wide swath of mixed wetlands and inland lakes, and to the north were grasslands.

Howls and shrieks came in waves one after another. They were a little frightening. Hearing the whistling wind, Zhao Qindan raised her head and saw an enormous avian creature that blocked out the sky as it passed. It was over ten zhang long. When the bird's body brushed against the tops of the ancient trees, it knocked down all the water droplets preserved on the branches and leaves. It was as if a small rain shower were falling.

“That is a west winder. It's only a youngster, not fully grown. It's a little mischievous,” Li Manlong said unhurriedly, hands behind his back. “The west winder is large, but its disposition is docile. Once it gets to know you, it is even willing to let you fly it. So it's raised free range... Ah, and here's this wretched bunch.”

No sooner had he spoken than they passed by a range of small hills. There were many openings in the hills, from which surged a particular musk. When they passed by, a Turmoiler's head emerged from each opening and spun around.

Zhao Qindan: "..."

Who were they trying to scare?

Li Manlong let out two shrieks. The heads heard and turned a full circle in unison, revealing their true appearances—they were a group of big-eyed monkeys, grinning as they laughed indistinctly.

"These monkeys are called bluffing monkeys. They can imitate the appearances of living creatures around them. Sometimes you see a spiritual beast or a person acting strange and then smell that musk—most likely it's them playing with you. But while these monkeys like scaring people, they also function as an early warning. The spiritual beasts from the free range area can't get into the sealed area. If we see the bluffing monkeys turn into some violent beast, we know to be careful, because most likely an array has broken somewhere and a dangerous spiritual beast has escaped."

Soon after, they encountered a spiritual snake that traveled underground, a giant clam frog that belched out one dreamland after another, a knowing fish that could grow legs and walk up on shore... Medicinal herbs and spiritual beasts that Zhao Qindan had only read about in books appeared along the way in numbers too great for the eye to take in. It made her forget her own frightening appearance for a time.

Suddenly, she heard an excited whistle from a Turmoiler not far off and looked in the direction of the whistle. She saw that there was a spiritual beast the size of a water buffalo not far away, with an enormous pair of horns curving like a full moon behind its head. Its breast was thrown out, its four limbs long and slender. It was unbelievably graceful. Its whole body was pitch-black. Standing in the forest, it was like a lithe silhouette. It wasn't afraid of people. It nodded toward them as if presenting its compliments, then slowly strolled away.

“It's so pretty. What is it?”

“A sable sheep,” Li Manlong said softly, as if afraid of startling something. “One of the three auspicious omens of Southern Shu. They don't permit themselves to be kept, and they don't accept masters. They live free and unrestrained... We see them very rarely. You have brought us good luck, miss. Something good will happen soon. All wishes will be granted.”

Zhao Qindan smiled politely and didn't take it to heart. Back when her group had entered the Latent Cultivation Temple, there had been blue luan and white deer to greet them. The steward seniors had also said they were “auspicious omens,” but ultimately no one had had rapid success. Instead, just at the start of autumn, the Latent Cultivation Temple had blown up, and at the end of the year had come the fire in Jinping's southern outskirts that had nearly burned down Great Wan. And after that...

A shadow flitted over her heart, so she quickly pulled back her train of thought to keep it from sweeping away her interest in sightseeing.

After walking longer toward the depths of the forest, Zhao Qindan sensed very powerful arrays in the vicinity.

“Further in is the sealed area. This is the terrestrial beast area. All the spiritual beasts inside the ring are dangerous. Please don’t approach carelessly, miss. Those of us who look after them must go in to feed and clean at fixed times and follow fixed paths. When the arrays are intact, they can hide a person’s scent. Despite this, we still have to be extremely alert. When these beasts run mad, it is hard for even a half-immortal to withstand them. As for us, if we run into them... Heh, when it’s someone’s turn to enter the sealed area, they’ll bid farewell to their friends and family before leaving.”

Zhao Qindan’s heart tightened. She was just about to say that she could help deal with it, but she heard Li Manlong add softly, smiling, “It’s a glorious period of time. Any discord you have with anyone automatically disappears. You feel that the human world is vast. Even a breath of morning mist is delicious. It’s us old things who take up this fine assignment. We can let the young people store up experience and wait.”

For a time, Zhao Qindan couldn't speak.

Li Manlong went on to caution her, "This place is already within the scope of the great mountain array. Miss Zhao isn't one of Lingyun Mountain's people. Remember Tai Sui's instructions. You absolutely must not use spiritual energy carelessly. Also, don't take out your reincarnation wood lightly. If you need to send him a message, you need only to tell me."

Xi Ping hadn't come with them.

Zhao Qindan could enter this spiritual beast farm, but he couldn't. Because a half-immortal had no essence and couldn't retain spiritual energy, as long as Zhao Qindan didn't take it upon herself to draw a talisman or use an immortal tool and kept wearing her spiritual image mask, she could appear like a mortal.

But an ascended spirit master was different.

Last time, Xi Ping had only been an established foundation. Adding in that Sanyue was full of all kinds of people, that had allowed him to sneak in. Now he was an ascended spirit, like a giant weighing hundreds upon thousands of jin. While the Replica could hide his aura and spiritual image, his "weight" was still on display. Unless Lingyun Mountain's great mountain array split apart like Sanyue's had back then, if he took a step inside, the spiritual energy he disturbed would immediately summon Lingyun Mountain's divine tool.

“You can have a peaceful stay. If you take a liking to anything in the spiritual beast farm, go ahead and take it. No need to be polite,” Xi Ping had told her before leaving. “Then wait.”

“Wait for what?”

“Wait for the divine tool of the mountains to become restless and the Lingyun Immortal Mountains' spiritual energy to leak out,” Xi Ping had said, smiling brightly. “When the whole crowd of evil cultivators has assembled, if the immortal mountains still don't react at all...then they're really good for nothing. Don't worry, if that's really the case, I'll drop them a 'hint' when the time comes.”

This veteran shit-stirrer's statement had rendered the young mistress speechless. She could only dryly say, “Well...th-thank you, senior?”

“Before that, you can continue to refine your Way of the Heart.” At this point, Tai Sui once again became serious. He changed in an instant, once again becoming the mysterious ascended spirit senior. “Your Way of the Heart originates from your own heart. You must seek everything out on your own, not like those who copy their Ways of the Heart straight from their elders... I once had a friend who spent a whole sixty-year cycle refining his Way of the Heart before it turned a corner. If you wish to, you can also tell those Southern He people about it. They can only listen, not talk. They won't ask a lot of questions to disturb your resolve. It won't be comfortable for you to live there, but it will benefit you."

He hadn't been lying about the benefit. The spiritual energy here was more plentiful than in the Latent Cultivation Temple. Precious medicinal herbs that could hardly be bought for any money outside were spread over the ground like wild grasses. She could use them to restore her meridians whenever she wanted to. The only problem was that it was a little difficult to talk to the Turmoilers.

Apart from Li Manlong and a small number of people who could communicate simply, gesticulating and stuttering, the vast majority of the Turmoilers couldn't really talk. Among themselves, they used whistles of varying pitch to communicate. An outsider couldn't tell where to start interpreting it.

Chief Li was the uncrowned king of the whole spiritual beast farm. Every Turmoiler who saw him would stop to greet him, lower their heads and let him stroke their bald pates.

It was very difficult to distinguish gender and age among these Turmoilers. Their bodies were all huddled, their voices were all sharp, and they were covered up in colorless rags. Only looking very closely could you tell that the women had slightly more strands of hair and slightly finer bones under their thin skins.

“The women live here. I had them clean up a house for you ahead of time. We aren’t very attentive hosts. Please don’t take offense, miss.”

“Of course not, thank you, Chief Li.” In fact, Zhao Qindan had prepared herself to live in a cowshed—and that was nothing; a half-immortal’s body could remain unstained, and she didn’t have an obsession with cleanliness. To establish a foundation, she would have to endure rebuilding her meridians. Was she afraid of living in a slightly bad place?

But the house surprised her.

Southern Shu’s climate was warm. There was no need to shut the doors and windows year round. The natural lighting in the house was very good. A mugwort leaf curtain to repel mosquitoes hung over the window, the ends of it made into exquisite little embroidered pouches. There wasn’t a speck of dust on the walls or floor. There was a hand-woven blanket of straw laying on the cogongrass bed. Someone had been very thoughtful—at the window was a bunch of small, light yellow flowers the same color as the straw.

The Turmoilers, knowing that she wasn't one of them, worried that she would find them distasteful, kept away and peeped at her from afar, not daring to approach.

Li Manlong said something in the ancient Southern He language, pointing at the bunch of flowers. Probably it was praise. Only after he had said it several times did a slender Turmoiler run over somewhat mincingly and present her head for Chief Li to pat.

Her features clustered horrifyingly at the center of her face. A hole seemed to appear in that face... This was the frightening smile of the Turmoilers. She ran over hastily and gave Zhao Qindan an ancient Southern He salute that nowadays could only be seen in books. Not waiting for her to return the salute, she slipped away.

But for a moment, Zhao Qindan had realized with perfect clarity that this was a Southern He girl trapped in a monster's body.

"Chief Li," Zhao Qindan couldn't resist saying, "I don't mean to offend, but...you people aren't at all like the rumors I heard before."

"The rumors aren't fake. We who have been abandoned by the spiritual mountains are unable to live decently. Many people do not live past twenty or thirty before dying young. Nearly half of us are born witless, and then there are those who aren't originally witless...but later find they can't make it if they aren't witless, so they have to go with the flow. It's Wei-laoban who gave us a way to survive, and Tai Sui who gathered us. As long as there is a path, we will walk it to the end no matter what," Li Manlong said. "Or else who will there be to remember our old homeland?"

On the immortal islands in the South Sea, the Queen Mother of the West stilled a pipa. The lingering music of ancient He dissipated.

She let her mind wander for a while, seeming to be waiting for an echo to appear out of empty space, but there was none.

The Queen Mother of the West sighed. "You're back. Well?"

Lord Guang'an appeared as if out of thin air and landed behind her. "With my cultivation level, I cannot break through it. The arrays around this island are comparable to a spiritual mountain's great mountain array. The inscriptions at the bottom of the sea are unheard of... Forgive me."

The Queen Mother of the West shook her head. "I heard a rumor that says that Southern Shu's Three Islands and its main peninsula are in fact connected, but the connection was somehow covered by water. Underneath, a branch of the Lingyun Mountains' spiritual veins actually extends to them... Could it be that the so-called South Sea Hidden Realm is that spiritual vein?"

Just then, an unusually soft and low masculine voice sounded: "That is correct."

"Who's there!"

Lord Guang'an had already sent a beam of sword energy flying toward the sea, but it came up empty.

A human figure emerged above the sea. The sword energy cleaved a deep gouge in the seawater, but it couldn't harm that image one bit. The image gave the two of them a Southern He salute and said in not very smooth but very genuine He language, "I am Wangge Luobao. This event was prepared in haste. I have not been an attentive host. Your Highness's pipa song just now provoked a myriad of thoughts in me. I came without invitation. I did not deliberately overhear. Please forgive me, Your Highness."

The Queen Mother of the West flatly said, "Merely a stray dog's tune of a vanquished nation."

"The Miah feel your pain," Wangge Luobao said, sighing. "I suppose the two of you must have heard about my clansmen's predicament in recent years. The threshold for my clansmen to enter the immortal sect has become higher and higher, and furthermore, apart from the ways of medicine and toolmaking, there is practically nowhere they can go. Not that there is anything wrong with the ways of medicine and toolmaking. It is only that they both require a concentrated consciousness and a keen spiritual sense. Not just anyone can make headway in them. Moreover, neither of these two ways excels in fighting. Over time, my clan has become increasingly oppressed in the spiritual mountains. The winds of Miah exclusion in the mortal world have also grown more and more fierce. My clan no longer has a place on the main peninsula.”

The Queen Mother of the West and Lord Guang’an exchanged a look. They hadn’t expected Wangge Luobao to be this frank.

The Queen Mother of the West asked, “Fellow cultivator, do you mean to say that you have the support of Lingyun Mountain’s Miah behind you?”

“That is correct. I myself began as a walker in the mortal world in the Dragon Subduing Knights. Because the Way of the Heart I found was not of the ways of medicine or toolmaking, the spiritual mountains would not permit me to establish a foundation,” Wangge Luobao said. “My clan leader shishu couldn’t win in a fight. He ordered me to fake my death and escape. Relying on the strength of my whole clan in my cultivation, I was able to succeed in becoming an ascended spirit as I am now.”

“You must be extraordinarily gifted, fellow cultivator.”

Wangge Luobao shook his head. “You flatter me. I was lucky. The Way of the Heart I inherited comes from Lingyun Mountain’s founder, Tianbo-zhenren.”

As Wangge Luobao spoke, his form turned into mist and swirled upward. His voice resounded above all the islands. When it fell into different people’s ears, they heard it as different languages: “For many years, the Way of the Heart of Tianbo-zhenren has been scattered among the islands of Southern Shu, protecting the nation and the people, not appearing in the world. He himself was of mixed Xiuyi and Miah blood. It was only owing to him that our two clans were united in the past and cleared away all evil, forming the Lingyun Spiritual Mountains. Before leaving behind the mundane dust, the ancestor left a secret message. If the two clans remained happy and harmonious, his Way of the Heart would never appear in the world. If one day the two clans split apart...the one who inherited his Way of the Heart could find the Lingyun Mountains’ hidden realm at the bottom of the sea to protect his clan.

“This ought to have been my fate, but opening the hidden realm requires the cultivation of a shed skin, and the Xiuyi are already impatient to wipe us all out. That is why I invited all of you fellow cultivators to aid me, in spite of my honor. The Miah are willing to share all the resources in the hidden realm with you. Wangge Luobao is prepared to swear a heart demon oath with you all!”

Just then, on the heartless lotuses in the depths of the sea, all the eyes opened simultaneously. Zhuoming abruptly emerged from the lotus stalks—someone had touched reincarnation wood; as expected, someone was in constant contact with Tai Sui!

“Caught you.”

At the same time, Xi Ping’s true body crushed a slip of paper and sent separate messages to the Luwu and Li Manlong. He sensed briefly. The reincarnation wood seeds had already been hidden in the spiritual beast feed and passed through the viscera of some spiritual beasts, falling in corners of the Lingyun Mountains.

Meanwhile, Zhao Qindan had already spent ten days in the spiritual beast farm.

At first, she would often be startled by roars coming out of nowhere, and she couldn’t communicate with the Turmoilers. After only a few days, while Li Manlong was teaching the Turmoilers to speak the ancient Southern He language, Zhao Qindan quietly walked over. Though she was wearing a Turmoiler spiritual image mask, her each and every movement was still very different. Everyone recognized her as different from them at once and cautiously shifted aside to make an empty space for her. They didn't dare to approach out of a sense of inferiority.

As Chief Li taught a sentence, even his voice reading it out became quieter.

But Zhao Qindan openly repeated after him—Southern He had been vanquished and its language had long ago fallen out of use. Even as learned as Zhao Qindan was, she had only studied a bit of it for fun when she was little. She could only get a general sense by guesswork, and she was thick-tongued when she spoke it.

Li Manlong unflappably corrected her pronunciation. Zhao Qindan didn't seem to find this humiliating at all. Like a clumsy child, she loudly repeated it again. The Turmoilers found to their astonishment that this cultivator young mistress with her nimble tongue and throat also spoke haltingly, often forgetting the words and coming up short.

The second day, a few bold young people worked up their nerve and recited along with her.

The third day, the fourth day...

Bit by bit, the Turmoilers became accustomed to this voice that recited the loudest and made the most mistakes and forgot that she was different from them. When Chief Li suddenly asked a question and she didn't react fast enough, someone would sneakily poke her and gesticulate. Hearing her make a funny mistake, the features of the Turmoilers would sink inward and they would rock back and forth with laughter.

The empty space around the cultivator young mistress gradually disappeared.

She still couldn't really tell the whistles of all different pitches apart, so she tried to put her learning into practice, using the Southern He language she had just learned to speak to the Turmoilers. She would often use the wrong expressions, and everyone would laugh benevolently at her.

The night wind carrying spiritual energy touched her meridians. The Way of the Heart Zhao Qindan had always felt wasn't very firm because she hadn't inherited it suddenly became fixed amid the mournful-seeming laughter of the Turmoilers.

People were born different. Some people were born with a silver spoon in their mouth, and some people's swaddling clothes served as mourning garb for their deceased parents; some people were born full of wits or with the strength to lift a cauldron, and some people were naturally deformed, bedridden all their lives; all people were divided among male and female, strong and weak, clever and foolish, their natural endowments separated into many grades...but so what?

If you were frail and sickly, did that mean you should lie in bed and wait to die? If you were born lowly, did that mean you had to be lowly all your life? Should a woman marry and take on a slave's brand, be a playing chip with no freedom of her own, birth another's children?

She wanted every person in the world to be able to live for the sake of achieving their own goals, even if their whole life was spent exhausting their strength in a struggle to remain human.

Just then, a rumble like thunder suddenly came from underground.

The Turmoilers who had been laughing playfully suddenly became nervous. The countless spiritual beasts around them let out uneasy quiet howls. Spiritual beasts called moonlight birds rose collectively into the sky, arranging themselves into a triangle.

Zhao Qindan quickly stood up and formed a hand seal—she had read about moonlight birds in ancient texts. They were the wisest of birds and could predict a crisis.

“Keep calm, don’t panic.” Li Manlong efficiently directed the Turmoilers to inspect all the spiritual beast cages and arrays. “Miss Zhao, come with me.”

Zhao Qindan quickly followed. She saw Li Manlong return indoors, carefully inspect the surroundings, then open a hidden compartment behind the bed. Inside was a machine very familiar to Zhao Qindan...

It was the “new goose” machine⁹² that had just sprung up in Southern Wan in recent years.

Zhao Qindan didn’t especially grasp the principles. She only knew that this thing was neither an immortal tool nor a downgraded immortal tool. It was made entirely through mortal means, but it could encode writing and send it from one place to another.

A slip of paper came out of the machine. Li Manlong briefly checked it against a densely-written codebook and translated the encoded writing. It said: The time has come.

CHAPTER 150 - The Storm Begins (8)

Wait, how had the time come just like that?!

Another spell of ominous dull rumbling came from the ground. Zhao Qindan held herself up against the wall, thoughts surging through her mind continuously like waves: What has Tai Sui done? Why does it seem like he isn't sneaking into the Lingyun Mountains but walking in and tearing down their great mountain array? Have the Luwu gone mad? Or is Great Wan planning to start a war with Southern Shu?

The Luwu lying low and awaiting orders in Quancheng were also stunned. This wasn't what they had agreed upon.

In this respect, the Luwu had a wealth of experience. They immediately submitted a report describing everything in full detail to Mr. Bai.

Even Xi Ping was a little bewildered right now—because this quake wasn't his doing.

To be precise, he hadn't yet had time to do this wicked thing!

When Xi Ping had received A-Xiang's message and learned that Wangge Luobao had appeared and the evil cultivators had all assembled, he had gone on to send that “goose letter” to Li Queru.

The goose letter had to be decoded. He figured that it would take Chief Li some time to decipher it, giving him just enough time to activate some reincarnation wood seeds that had infiltrated the Lingyun Mountains in a leisurely fashion—Xi Ping had already sensed that there were quite a few reincarnation wood trees near Wei Chengxiang, but he hadn’t touched them. Wangge Luobao had even buried a letter under a reincarnation wood tree to deliver it; evidently he had knowledge of his accompanying plant at his fingertips. He clearly knew that Xi Ping could send his consciousness through the reincarnation wood and swap it with his true body, yet he hadn’t torn down all the trees and had even sent him an invitation to lead the way; there was obviously something not right here.

Over the years, Xi Ping had immersed himself in crooked paths, learning quite a few things. He knew that the reason he had been able to run wild through reincarnation wood before was that the majority of people at the time hadn’t been on their guard. If others had a mind to it, they wouldn’t be incapable of tracking his true body or even injuring his consciousness.

Xi Ping had been planning to turn this tactic around and use the reincarnation wood to steer the notice of the immortal mountains toward the South Sea, let the two sides get acquainted, then sit back and watch the fun.

Instead, before the seeds could sprout from the natural fertilizer, the Lingyun Mountains' veins of the earth had suddenly begun to quake.

All the spiritual energy in the western continent began to surge in a strange pattern!

Xi Ping liked hanging out in the human world and eavesdropping and didn't enjoy questioning heaven and earth, but that didn't mean that he didn't understand veins of the earth after being an ascended spirit for eight years.

A huge force swept out from the Lingyun Spiritual Mountains. A thunderclap startled the birds for several thousand li around. Xi Ping attached his spiritual sense to his eyes and saw to his surprise that there was a patch of dense cloud above the Lingyun Mountains, with nine raging dragons seething madly among the clouds—this was Lingyun's divine tool of the mountains, the Cauldron of Nine Dragons!

Xi Ping's spine went cold.

The divine tool of the mountains also alerted Zhaoting in his spirit. Zhi Xiu abruptly opened his eyes and woke up. Zhaoting's light instantly enveloped

Xi Ping. “The Nine Dragons... I only took my eyes off you for a moment. Xi Shiyong, what have you done now?”

At the same time, Zhou Ying’s voice came through the reincarnation wood, so gentle it made your scalp prickle: “Xiaobao, don’t you think someone here needs a leash?”

Xi Ping didn’t want to make shifu waste his strength. His consciousness wrapped around Zhaoting and blocked it off. “No, I’ve been falsely accused, it really wasn’t me this time! I’ve made an unsuccessful attempt at most!”

Wei Chengxiang had just sent him the message. Wangge Luobao had just appeared and hadn’t yet finished presenting the history of the Miah’s persecution. This ought to have been when the great evil cultivators were at their most cautious. Moreover, in recent years, the divine tools of the four great spiritual mountains had been benumbed by a blood moon rising practically every other day. Even if some good-for-nothing in the South Sea had given themselves away and been sensed by the Cauldron of Nine Dragons, reasonably speaking, there still shouldn’t be such a big commotion.

It was bizarre. What was it that had gotten in ahead of him to anger the divine tool of the mountains so much that it was going crazy?

On the South Sea, Wangge Luobao's not especially fervent presentation was interrupted by a boom.

Lord Guang'an's figure flashed. He landed beside the Queen Mother of the West.

Next, the ground of the little island began to quake. A large quantity of bubbles suddenly rose from the surrounding sea.

The inscriptions at the bottom of the sea that Lord Guang'an had been helpless against stuck to these bubbles and floated up, exploding one after another. Then, a distorted human face appeared among the bubbles, white-clothed and white-haired, with veins standing out on his neck and plunging under his white paper mask like snakes.

Wei Chengxiang and the other low level cultivators took only one look before their eyes began to hurt, yet that didn't keep her from recognizing that the face in the bubbles was Xuanwu's.

Xuanwu had been born during the age of the Great War of Gods and Demons. He was next in rank after Sanyue Mountain's sect leader. He had obtained the authentic inheritance of the Black Emperor in inscriptions, arrays, and talismans. His level of mastery was something the Shu couldn't even imagine. Had Lingyun's Tianbo been living, even that beast-taming ancestor might not have been able to use inscriptions to restrain Xuanwu!

The inscriptions that had isolated a crowd of ascended spirits instantly lost effect. All of them were exposed before each other. With the hearing of an ascended spirit, they could hear all the whispered discussions for several thousand li around on the sea with perfect clarity.

“That's Sanyue's Xuanwu!”

“Didn't Sanyue Mountain say his boundary had fallen?”

Now, even those who hadn't recognized Xuanwu knew who he was.

The next moment, an enormous wave rose on the sea. A huge, ghastly pale hand extended from the water, as high as a mountain, and made a grab for Wangge Luobao's image in the air.

Wangge Luobao vanished like mist.

The Queen Mother of the West waved her long sleeve. The big whale ship flew out of her palm and swallowed up all the people on their island. Lord Guang'an didn't board the ship. His pitch-black sword left its sheath. The blade of the sword was as simple and unadorned as he was himself, its cutting edge almost invisible. A sword slash parted the sea, slicing toward the big hand in the water.

The moment the big hand touched the sword energy, it turned back into seawater. To either side rose huge waves dozens of zhang high. They completely submerged the small island.

The big whale ship was tossed aside by the sea waves. Another ghastly pale hand reached out and grasped the ship the Queen Mother of the West and her people were on.

Lord Guang'an struck another blow backhanded. At the same time, the Queen Mother of the West activated all the arrays on the whale ship. Poisonous black miasma was released from the body of the whale, blooming into a big cluster of black camellias.

With the two of them working together, the whale ship broke free. When it hit the water, it let out a long cry.

Lord Guang'an tersely said, "A-Wan, go!"

Xuanwu's snow-white figure broke out of the sea. "It is the duty of all to punish practitioners of evil ways. Where do you think you're going?!"

No sooner had he spoken than the South Sea practically began to boil. Never mind the low level cultivators, even Lord Guang'an was nearly shaken out of the air by this speech.

The established foundation cultivators who hadn't had time to slip into protective immortal tools were knocked unconscious by that voice. Though Wei Chengxiang had already taken shelter in the belly of the huge whale, her vision still darkened. When she came back to her senses, she was already half-kneeling on the ground, the taste of blood in her mouth.

Instinctively, she reached a hand into her mustard seed to feel for the reincarnation wood amulet sealed inside it.

When her fingers touched the ice-cold amulet, Wei Chengxiang gave a start and came back to herself.

Before her departure, Tai Sui had instructed her that there might be a possessor of a paramount spiritual sense among the great evil cultivators, who hadn't yet shown himself. No matter what happened, she wasn't to use reincarnation wood while in the South Sea. She must not let that person see that she had a connection to Tai Sui and instead use mortal means to contact him.

She bit through her fingertip and put an elixir pill into her mouth, calming her seething internal energy. She quickly used the new goose machine she carried to send a message.

“Xuanwu?” Xi Ping decoded the ciphertext; the corners of his eyes twitched.

Above the Lingyun Mountains, the Nine Dragons had nearly coiled themselves into fried dough twists. Rainclouds scudded everywhere. Mad downpours fell intermittently.

Xuanwu couldn't be associating with “evil cultivators,” or else he would have thoroughly lost his mind and become the next Zhao Yin.

He had been gravely injured by Xiang Rong, his essence damaged. For him, all “evil cultivators” were perfect restorative pills that could be eaten raw. None of the major or minor evil cultivators now in the South Sea, no matter what kinds of plots they were concealing, would have voluntarily ganged up with him.

So how had he found this South Sea Hidden Realm? Who had summoned him?

Xi Ping's thoughts moved quickly: the Miah had sent out Wangge Luobao and attracted evil cultivators from all over. Either they were low on manpower and resources themselves and really did want to unify some of the common world's strength to rebel against the Lingyun Mountains, or they wanted to cook these evil cultivators in a pot to make something out of them.

As Xi Ping saw it, the likelihood of the latter was greater—if he had been the Miah, if he really wanted to form an alliance, he would have privately bargained with them one by one to reach a deal. Because great evil cultivators weren't obedient sheep. These people had made it this far escaping death by the skin of their teeth. Each was craftier than the next. No one could command them all. Moreover, the resources of the mortal world were limited. It was hard to avoid clashes. It was likely that there would be grudges among them. Rashly assembling them was likely to make nothing but trouble, as too many chickens would lay no eggs.

Now it seemed...

“My vision was lacking,” Xi Ping said, whether to himself or to Zhaoting. “An ascended spirit can't even fill a gap in your teeth. I'm afraid it isn't those ascended spirit shrimps they want to cook—they wanted to use the ascended spirits to lure in Xuanwu, then use Xuanwu to lure in the Cauldron of Nine Dragons.”

It was as if Xuanwu were covered in white paint that leached away color. Starting from his feet, the ghastly paleness permeated the seawater, spreading in all directions.

Though he had been ousted from Sanyue as a traitor, he still scrupulously abided by his vow not to pilfer heaven's order. Without the spiritual mountains to restore his damaged essence, all he could do was use the living as spiritual stones—the established foundation cultivators he had just knocked unconscious, who were now floating on the surface, were all swept by the white seawater, instantly turning into one desiccated corpse after another.

Lord Guang'an's sword made an arc, the lashing sword stopping the water. At the same time, another beam of gleaming sword energy fell. With the wordless understanding between sword cultivators, it handled the other side. The two beams of sword light, one bright and one dark, formed a circle that blocked the ghastly whiteness spreading in all directions, encircling Xuanwu.

Lord Guang'an raised his head and saw a tall, broad man in grey clothes nearby. He had a square face and long brows that extended toward his temples. His hair was even curlier than Wangge Luobao's, plaited into two long, thick braids that hung behind him. He held a soft sword like a spiritual snake—this was a feral ascended spirit from Northern Li, said to be the heir of the Blind Wolf King at the feet of the Beijue Mountains. He was called the Snow Wolf.

Lord Guang'an exchanged a look with the Snow Wolf. Each quickly nodded to the other.

The next moment, Xuanwu gave an angry shout and once again pulled out the inscriptions at the bottom of the sea. They surged toward the circle drawn by the sword light.

There was a sizzle as of hot oil pouring into water. Spray splashed a hundred chi high when the inscriptions touched the sword energy. Every water droplet that spurted out contained sword energy. A shark in the water was thrown right out from the surface and flew into midair. Before it could fall, the big fish's body was sliced to ribbons by the remaining sword energy in the water droplets. A rain of blood spurted out.

The circle of sword energy broke.

Countless inscriptions once again lined up at a dazzling speed, reaping the large quantities of spiritual energy on the battlefield, turning into layer upon layer of armor around Xuanwu.

Then there was a whistle, and a halberd fell out of the sky, stabbing into the seawater like a divine pillar.

This halberd seemed to have the power to topple mountains and raise seas. The wild spiritual wind in the surroundings was instantly drawn in and began to revolve. Beam after beam of spiritual energy seemed to turn into an arrow, ramming into the inscriptions and making them scatter.

A hand wearing a jadeite thumb ring gripped the halberd—the newcomer's attire was extremely luxurious. He wore a crown of purple gold. His sideburns and mustache were trimmed to perfection, without a single stray hair. His coquettish air made it seem as though he had just gotten through wedding eighteen concubines.

Northern Li's Snow Wolf beheld that halberd. "The Emperor of the East."

"Oh, hey, Crown Prince Snow Wolf, how very nice to meet you. Your humble servant..." As the Emperor of the East spoke, he abruptly pressed the halberd down, stirring up a huge whirlpool in the South Sea, chaotically sweeping up all the inscriptions Xuanwu had activated. "...has come to give you a hand!"

"Impertinent!" Xuanwu's white hair suddenly burst out of its tie. In the thrashing sea wind, he was like a Queen of the Night flower in full bloom.

A curved blade like a crescent moon appeared and swept out over the South Sea, chopping toward the Emperor of the East Halberd.

Before the Emperor of the East could finish bragging, on the hand holding his halberd, the skin between the thumb and forefinger tore. He was knocked dozens of zhang away by Xuanwu's blow. The Emperor of the East desperately stuck the halberd into the water to maintain his balance, nearly cutting the seawater in two.

A sneer appeared on Xuanwu's paper mask. "Four of you. Who else is there? Who else?"

No sooner had he spoken than he soared upward.

There were reflections of Xuanwu in the water, in the foam floating on the sea...in all reflective surfaces. All these reflected "Xuanwus" put on bizarre smiles. A convincing imitation of the crescent moon blade's sword wind flew from all the reflections, chopping toward Xuanwu himself!

The interweaving blade light collected into a big net, tangling around Xuanwu, hanging in midair. But the wild blades didn't slice one bit off of Xuanwu. The moment he was encircled by the blade wind, he once again turned into seawater, scattering with a splash.

Once the original had scattered, the reflections scattered along with him. The many “Xuanwus” reflected in the spray and water collectively disappeared. There was only one figure that was a bit slow to disperse.

In that mere moment of sluggishness, a hand in the water made a grab for the person in the reflection.

The person in the reflection gave a low shout. A pitch-black branding spike extended and was crushed by that huge hand. The person in the reflection somewhat desperately seized that instant to escape. He appeared in the water, revealing a delicate Chu countenance. There was a rim of red around his pitch-black irises—this was the chief offering of Yu Family Bend, the first person to break free of a spiritual image brand, Yu Chang.

The Queen Mother of the West freed herself from the belly of the whale. She put on a pair of gauze gloves that reflected light. She reached out to stir the seawater. Black camellias burst forth and spread surrounding her hands. Thread upon thread of poison came from them. The shoals of fish that hadn’t had time to flee went belly up in droves. Unexpectedly, the ghastly pale hand in the water was dyed by that black energy. Xuanwu quickly flung off the black mist surrounding him and leapt away.

At this point, five great ascended spirits of the present age, from Li, from Chu, and the Three Heroes from the Land of Turmoil, all surrounded Xuanwu.

Just then, Wei Chengxiang, hiding in the belly of the huge whale, with difficulty deciphered the new coded message from Tai Sui. Her pupils contracted slightly. It said: The Cauldron of Nine Dragons has appeared. Get out!

The features on Xuanwu's paper mask were level. He looked around and softly said, "There are still three missing."

Yu Chang put his reincarnation wood amulet in his sleeve and smiled blandly. "High Elder, why don't you take a guess where they're hiding?"

The corners of the mouth on Xuanwu's paper mask turned up high. "The clever ones won't show themselves, silly child... Didn't you hear what that southern barbarian said? The South Sea Hidden Realm can only be opened by a shed skin. Do you really think that a few ascended spirits can stand in for a shed skin?"

"Ascended spirits are as ants before a shed skin sage. Unless there were thousands upon millions of us, we wouldn't be able to bite one to death." The Emperor of the East stroked his mustache. "But as far as I know, Elder Xuanwu, you were gravely injured by your sect leader, your essence damaged. I'm afraid you have fallen from the shed skin boundary. Even if you had been able to go into seclusion to treat your wounds in the Sanyue Mountains, I suppose a mere eight years wouldn't have been sufficient for you to recover? And now I see that your appearance is wasted and travel-worn. You've spent these years homeless and forlorn."

Xuanwu gave a "ha," not bothering to respond to this sort of idiot.

A lowly breed like the Miah could only ever hide in the shadows playing sly tricks. They were naturally despicable, skilled in treachery and deceit. It wasn't unreasonable for them to be oppressed and excluded. Wangge Luobao had vanished long ago. It was clear he had wanted to use these greedy ascended spirit evil cultivators to lure him in, attract the Cauldron of Nine Dragons, borrow strength to crack open the so-called South Sea Hidden Realm, and seize possession of the divine tool of the mountains on behalf of Lingyun's old guard.

It was said that the Miah shed skin had been "in seclusion" for a long time, having his disciple act as clan leader in his place. He had probably died long ago, such that the younger generations of the southern barbarians had bitten off more than they could chew—even if his boundary had fallen, he was still the mighty elder of Sanyue's East Peak. He could dispose of a few ascended spirits in a flash. The essence of these five people happened to be just enough to restore his fallen boundary. He would see when the time came whose name the South Sea Hidden Realm would bear—

CHAPTER 151 - The Storm Begins (9)

Wei Chengxiang rapidly destroyed the note and poured a beam of spiritual energy into the arrays of the huge whale. “Your Highness! Xuanwu’s appearance has disturbed Lingyun Mountain’s Cauldron of Nine Dragons. We cannot remain here. Hurry!”

The Miah were plotting something, but Xuanwu was evidently confident in his ability to withstand them. If the rumor about his boundary having fallen wasn’t incorrect, then he must have had some other chance encounters over the years... No matter who was plotting against whom here, none of the people caught in the middle would come to a good end.

The Queen Mother of the West’s eye twitched, but matters were now out of her control. Several great ascended spirits had been swept into the huge waves in a blink by Xuanwu.

In a flash, she only had time to give a push, flinging the huge whale ship far away from the battlefield.

The whale ship only had a brief encounter with the huge waves, and the better part of the arrays on the ship were destroyed by the brutal spiritual energy. The feet of Wei Chengxiang and the others on the ship all left the ground as they flew up. All kinds of precious Southern He antiques were smashed into a pile of fragments.

Nearly everyone aboard this ship was a former citizen of Southern He who followed the Queen Mother of the West. Cries of alarm rose in wave after wave: “Her Highness!”

“Hurry, hurry and turn the ship around!”

“Wei-laoban, turn back! Turn back!”

“We can’t turn back. Sixty percent of the ship’s arrays have been destroyed. It’ll break apart if we take another hit. Without a ship, those waves so much as touch you, you’ll all die,” Wei Chengxiang said calmly, rapidly inspecting the huge whale ship’s condition. “Since she tossed you out, it means she wants you to escape with your lives. You...”

A red-eyed bodyguard interrupted her: “Abandoning one’s master is a dereliction of duty. Better to die for loyalty! There is no need for an outsider to get involved!”

Wei Chengxiang turned and fixed her eyes on him. “What, will ‘loyalty’ shed tears of gratitude for you?”

“You dare!”

“If your princess had been ‘morally upright’ and died for her country back then, all of you would be Turmoilers by now.” Wei Chengxiang had been responsible for looking after the whale ship’s arrays during the whole trip. Now she skillfully repaired a few key arrays and ordered the ship to return to its base.

The whale ship quickly steered toward the east of the South Sea. Wei Chengxiang locked in the arrays and didn’t continue to dispute with the others. She turned and vanished, coming to the prow of the ship.

A half-immortal’s consciousness didn’t dare to probe outward. She could only look out through the “whale’s eyes.” On the sea, she saw billowing waves rising to the sky. She couldn’t find the Queen Mother of the West’s figure anywhere.

Wei Chengxiang stuck her hand into the mustard seed she carried and closed her eyes briefly: before she came, Tai Sui had given her two things. As long as she didn’t go looking for death, she would certainly have no problem escaping.

Her country had never been vanquished. Along the course of Jinping’s Grand Canal, her friends and family were no longer to be found on either bank. Let it be vanquished. If it was vanquished, that would be just as well. It was hard for Wei Chengxiang to understand the thirst these people of He felt to restore their nation. There was always a barrier between her and them.

But the Queen Mother of the West had always treated her well, despite knowing very well that there was another power behind her.

Wei Chengxiang knew her own worth. Apart from having some extra sources of information, the usefulness an open-eyed half-immortal could have for an ascended spirit master were very limited. She didn't even have the qualifications to be a maid. The reason that this couple kept her around to carry out tasks was only that she had coincidentally slaughtered White Amaranth, and there was some good karma between them.

Just now, when she had thrown the whale ship out of the battlefield, the Queen Mother of the West—Yang Wan—had done very well by her.

Loyalty, filial piety, justice, and virtue—these were things her grandfather had carved into her bones with his life. A person only had to be worthy of them.

After a moment, a little boat made of a rolled-up willow leaf left by the whale ship's secret back door, holding Wei Chengxiang. It was an ascended spirit grade immortal tool—the same one General Zhi had used to protect Xi Ping when the great demon of the East Sea had emerged. A crack had been smashed in the edge of the willow leaf by the Tai Sui Qin. Later, Master Lin had returned it to the furnace and repaired it. Now its grade was a level higher.

Yet it still couldn't escape its fate of carrying ants bound for danger.

Xi Ping received Wei Chengxiang's new coded message: No sign of the Heartless Lotus. The ascended spirits are no match for Xuanwu.

The Cauldron of Nine Dragons left the mountains. Lingyun's great mountain array was in turmoil, all the spiritual energy in the mountains like a swaying swing.

Xi Ping quietly seized this moment to activate a reincarnation wood seed.

The quickly sprouting seed was crammed into a corner of the Lingyun Mountains' dense rainforest. It broke through the earth, spiritual light lashing over its trunk, shaking off the "natural fertilizer" of the spiritual beasts. The next moment, it abruptly stood up and turned into human form, which, without disturbing a single leaf, disappeared amid the rainforest.

Though he knew intellectually that spiritual energy could make him cleaner than anything, emotionally, Xi Ping still couldn't get past this concern. "I'm dirty, I've lost my purity. Truly I'm enduring humiliation for the sake of this mission."

"Enough, don't be unreasonable." Zhou Ying's consciousness was hidden in a reincarnation wood amulet he had with him. As he used his paramount spiritual sense to quickly inspect the interstices of Lingyun's great mountain array, he casually said, "When you were little, on Plowing Day, you rolled around in the mud a farm cow had just defecated in, clutching its leg. The adults couldn't stop you. There were all kinds of things in that mud."

Xi Ping held himself up as one of the rare male beauties of the world, his charm unmatched. He absolutely couldn't acknowledge that he had done such a thing. "Impossible!"

"They couldn't get your hair clean and had to shave it off," said Zhou Ying. "You were balder than the Heartless Lotus. I still have a picture of your august countenance then. I'll have Bai Ling print some copies and give them to you."

Zhi Xiu: "..."

How fortunate that Xuanyin Mountain stipulated that disciples could only join when they were sixteen or over. The ancients had been wise.

“Wait,” Zhou Ying suddenly said, “the inscriptions here have been altered.”

The Lingyun Mountains had eight major peaks. Originally, they had been evenly split among the Xiuyi and Miah. In recent years, as the power of the Miah had waned, all the Miah cultivators had been crowded onto an out-of-the-way little peak, Miah cultivators of the medicine and toolmaking ways living in the same place. Spiritual beasts that could consume tree seeds were pretty much all small herbivorous spiritual beasts, usually used as materials for making tools and elixirs. The place Xi Ping had snuck into was precisely the domain of the Miah.

Miah disciples with varicolored hair and eyes were keeping watch at the foot of the mountain, taking strict precautions. There was nothing unusual along the outer perimeter of the peak, but the protective array laid out with inscriptions inside had subtly fallen out of step with the great mountain array. It saved Xi Ping from doing any tampering himself.

“A fly can’t sting a seamless egg.” Zhou Ying sighed. “As expected, the Miah already intend to rebel. Lucky you. Follow the interstices between the inscriptions to enter, I’ll tell you where to go. Remember to use your protective spiritual energy to keep your smell firmly under wraps. Lingyun’s cultivators generally have their spiritual sense in their mouths and noses. Don't get upwind of them."

Xi Ping bristled. "I don't stink!"

"That's right," said Zhou Ying, "you smell lovely. You're a human-shaped piece of ambergris."

In the space of these few words, Xi Ping's figure had flashed. He followed the cracks in the inscriptions to enter. He soon found that Zhou Ying's instructions were superfluous, because the higher he went, the fewer people he saw. The three palaces of the Miah ascended spirits at the summit of the mountain were empty. There were only some traces of an array left behind in an empty space on the ground of the main palace.

"I used the upheaval of the great mountain array to sneak in, and they used the upheaval of the great mountain array to sneak out," Xi Ping whispered. "Isn't that a coincidence?"

Just then, a voice from the distant South Sea came to his ears.

When he and Yu Chang had signed a blood covenant back then, he had given that little boy toy from Chu a piece of reincarnation wood so he could contact him at any time.

Yu Chang had called for him before, and Xi Ping had ignored it. When Yu Chang spoke again this time, he sounded even more hard-pressed than the first time. “Tai Sui, whether you’re the mantis or the oriole, allow me to warn you, if all of us die here today, you’ll be the target of all the great spiritual mountains!”

In the South Sea right now were five great ascended spirit evil cultivators: there was a sword cultivator each from the north and south; there was the Emperor of the East Halberd with its claim of “I bring the storm”; there was a medicine cultivator who carried her own poisonous miasma; and there was the offering who could travel through shadows and pass through any opening... Put together, while they weren’t perfectly coordinated, at any rate they weren’t holding each other back; but they could hardly put up a fight. They were simply held down and beaten by Xuanwu.

This was the greatest master of Sanyue, who would only be hard-pressed facing a full moon sage.

The vanished Wangge Luobao’s true body appeared dozens of li away. The vicious force in the seawater had yet to disperse; it brushed over the protective spiritual energy surrounding him.

As soon as he showed himself, he was immediately caught by the shed skin consciousness, brimming with might. Xuanwu's frightening ghastly whiteness began to emerge on the surface of the sea.

Without any hesitation, Wangge Luobao formed a two-handed seal. Out of nowhere, densely-packed giant kelp appeared on the surface.

The white shadow immediately permeated the giant kelp. Cluster after cluster of the giant kelp sticking up dozens of zhang high withered and rotted. Just then, a big fish flew out of the water. It opened its mouth and snatched up Wangge Luobao.

All of this had taken only a moment. In a flash, there was almost nothing left of the huge kelp being swallowed by the white shadow. The big fish just managed to disappear in the seawater before the giant kelp fell.

Like an illusion.

Wangge Luobao knelt on one knee inside the fish's mouth. He had lost the ease of the "sea god."

He was covered in seawater and cold sweat indistinguishable from each other. His legs had even gone a little weak.

The big fish that had taken him in its mouth was called a “next life spiritual fish.” In Miah folklore, it was a kind of fish god that could carry people to the world that came after death. Only the dying who had fallen into the deep sea could see it—only the best cultivators among the Miah knew that the “fish god” of legend really did exist.

The scales of the next life spiritual fish were very thick. They couldn’t be pierced without the cultivation of an ascended spirit or above. The body of the fish could block out spiritual energy and consciousnesses, and cultivators couldn’t track it. Moreover, this was the only one left in the world. It was a secret treasure Ancestor Tianbo had left behind for the Miah... It was so ancient it was like a stone on the point of crumbling. There was a smell of decay in its mouth. Its lifespan had nearly come to an end.

Inside the mouth of the next life spiritual fish was space to hold four or five people. As soon as Wangge Luobao entered, a face protruded from the inside of the fish’s mouth.

The protruding face was fused with the surrounding flesh of the fish. At first glance, it seemed to be an ulcer in the big fish’s mouth. The features weren’t especially distinct. There was only a pair of unusually protuberant grey-blue eyes. The face urgently asked, “Wangge, what’s happening?”

“Clan leader shishu.” Wangge Luobao recognized him by the look of his eyes. He evened out his breathing with difficulty. “The Heartless Lotus and that most mysterious Tai Sui have yet to appear. Of the major guests I invited, only five have come, fewer than we anticipated. Xuanwu came too soon. The strength of his cultivation far exceeds my expectations. I even think that it doesn’t seem as though his boundary has fallen. I’m afraid those ascended spirits won’t be able to hold out until the Cauldron of Nine Dragons arrives.”

Just then, two other faces emerged in the fish’s mouth, one with amber eyes, one with dark brown eyes.

The Miah clan had originally had a shed skin, a master of the way of toolmaking. He had taken a clear-cut stand against Moon Plated Gold at the outset and had specifically debated with Lancang Mountain because of this. Since the spiritual mountains had formed, this was the only time a clash between masters had come close to a “frivolous debate.” While it had ended at that, after returning, the Miah elder had sunk into a lengthy seclusion—the same sort of “seclusion” as Xuanyin’s Dignitary of Code and Sanyue’s Xiang Rong.

Since then, the circumstances of the Miah in Southern Shu had changed dramatically. At present, only three unremarkable ascended spirits remained among Lingyun Mountain’s Miah cultivators—the blue-eyed clan leader belonged to the way of toolmaking, and the other two were medicine cultivators.

Among the inner sect established foundation disciples, the Miah represented less than one in ten, and the outer sect walkers in the mortal world, the Dragon Subduing Knights, only accepted Miah on the Three Islands.

And even in the Miah's homeland of Southern Shu's Three Islands, those who held power in the Dragon Subduing Knights were still Xiuyi who had been transferred there.

Now, the three Miah masters who had escaped from Lingyun Mountain in the confusion had become "ulcers" in the fish's mouth, all of them surrounding Wangge Luobao.

The amber-eyed medicine cultivator spoke: "The Cauldron of Nine Dragons has already left the mountains. The Xiuyi's Li Dui is escorting the Cauldron of Nine Dragons. He can handle Xuanwu. Don't panic. They only need to hold out for a short while."

Opening the South Sea Hidden Realm would take enough spiritual energy to unseal its long-sealed entrance. Whether it was Xuanwu or Lingyun's elder, a shed skin must die today. And the South Sea Hidden Realm had always been a part of the Lingyun Mountains. Once it was opened, the Cauldron of Nine Dragons would naturally submit. If they could only take hold of the Cauldron of Nine Dragons, the Miah would have their own spiritual mountains. Once the Lingyun Mountain Range on the main island lost its divine tool, it would be nothing more than an abandoned spiritual stone mine.

Wangge Luobao said, "I'm afraid that a short while won't be..."

Before he could finish, the seawater once again rose into huge waves. Even the invisible next life spiritual fish was thrown out onto the surface. With a hum, there came an enormous quaking, nearly raising a tidal wave in the South Sea.

The Emperor of the East's halberd and the swords of the Snow Wolf and Lord Guang'an collectively slipped from their hands!

The blue-eyed Miah clan leader spoke decisively: "Notify the Three Islands. Order all the clan's cultivators to set off at once."

For a moment, Wangge Luobao suspected that the clan leader was too far away for him to hear clearly. "Who...who should set off?"

Weren't all the Miah cultivators on the Three Islands half-immortals in the Dragon Subduing Knights?

Could half-immortals approach an ascended spirit battlefield?

Never mind “reinforcements,” this couldn’t even be called “delivering food.” After all, half-immortals didn’t even have an essence. There was hardly any spiritual energy to be squeezed out of them. They couldn’t be used as spiritual stones.

The dark brown-eyed medicine cultivator sighed. “This action concerns the survival of our clan. We must not lose. Established foundation pills were sent out ahead of time. Among the clan members in the Dragon Subduing Knights on the Three Islands, there are sixty-four clan members in all whose spiritual bones are complete. The clan leader has ordered them all to enter the way of beast-taming... Sixty-four people, precisely the number of people there were when Shu’s ancestors activated the spiritual beast tide, driving out the demons and overthrowing the tyranny of the Shamanic Way...”

Wangge Luobao couldn’t resist interrupting: “Elder, where did we get so many beast-taming Ways of the Heart?”

“Naturally from the clan’s martyrs,” the blue-eyed clan leader said. “No need for you to worry about it. Just do what you need to do.”

Wangge Luobao immediately understood what he meant—the Miah had been squeezed out of the way of beast-taming for many years. Though there had been some beast-taming ascended spirits in the past, there weren't nearly enough to go around for over sixty people—in other words, it was likely that the Ways of the Heart the clan leader had brought out all belonged to established foundation cultivators!

Established foundation cultivators themselves had little experience, and if they had gone no further than an established foundation before passing away, it was most likely that their Ways of the Heart were insufficiently steady. How could you let later generations inherit Ways of the Heart like that?

Wangge Luobao's eyes opened wide. "Shishu, do you take our clan members to be disposable goods?"

"If cultivators die, more can be fostered!" the clan leader interrupted him. "Did you know that Zhaoye has issued a 'Material Decree'?"

"What..."

"On the surface, it says that evil has proliferated in recent years and the black market has run wild. The prices of spiritual beast and medicinal herb treatments are irregular. Southern Shu wants to bring every spiritual beast farm within the nation's borders under the control of the immortal mountains, for the immortal mountains to sell under a unified system—including the Three Islands in the sea. Do you know what that means?" The Miah clan leader's glaring eyes nearly popped from the fish's mouth. "It means that in the future, the Miah will be like those Turmoilers. They will serve them as slaves to raise spiritual beasts, be bought and sold like animals, with no one to investigate even if they're beaten to death in the streets. We can't even protect our own homeland! The Xiuyi have gone too far. Our clan has come to a fatal pass, do you understand?"

As they spoke, Wangge Luobao's spiritual sense had already been touched. He whipped his head around in astonishment. Through the spiritual fish's eyes, he saw hundreds upon thousands of "flying arrow gulls" diving toward the South Sea. Enormous gold-armored zhengs leapt out of the water. Terrestrial spiritual beasts stood on the backs of avians and waking dragons. Oppressive spiritual energy extended to the horizon—the spiritual beasts on the Three Islands, driven by cultivators who had forcibly established foundations, had all come out, blotting out the sky and covering the earth. They really did block the waves on the South Sea.

They...as well all those that came before and after them, were swept by knife light. Flesh and blood flew, the cultivators and the spiritual beasts indistinguishable.

The Miah clan leader said sternly, “Think of how your father raised you! Think of how your clan educated you! Wangge...”

“Clan leader,” Wangge Luobao said very softly, “I know all of that. But where are you?”

The Miah clan leader hadn’t expected that he would dare to talk back. For a moment, he was stunned.

Then Wangge Luobao smacked the spiritual fish’s mouth. The three faces in the spiritual fish’s mouth suddenly disappeared. Then, under his orders, the big fish charged toward the battlefield.

A face appeared out of nowhere on the lotus flower earring hanging from his ear. “Tsk-tsk, the Miah clan. No wonder outsiders think you people are lowly. Even your own clan leader uses your clan members as cannon fodder.”

“Be quiet.” The earlier “helpless panic” had vanished from Wangge Luobao’s face. He gently tapped the lotus flower on his earring, then said in his sing-song voice, as though throwing a cute tantrum, “So you see, we need to change clan leaders.”

Zhuoming laughed loudly.

Amid his laughter, the next life spiritual fish's mouth suddenly opened.

Wangge Luobao appeared out of nowhere amid the chaos and gave a long whistle.

He was an ascended spirit beast-taming cultivator. He simply steamrolled the battlefield. The spiritual beasts directed by the Miah all instantly slipped their masters' control, stopping in unison.

Wangge Luobao whistled again. The legendary fish god appeared on the surface. He flipped over and landed on the back of the next life spiritual fish, projecting his voice outward: "Tell the clan leader and the elders that I do not agree—I do not agree to using the blood of my clan members to purchase this hidden realm!"

He extended his hand. A flute fell into his palm. Wangge Luobao played a few brief, sharp trills. There was a rumble from the bottom of the sea. He had summoned a flood dragon out of nowhere. The clouds massed overhead.

He had suppressed the spiritual beast tide single-handedly. The spiritual beasts turned their heads in droves, picked up their dumbfounded masters in their mouths, and retreated outside the ring of battle.

“And I also do not agree to turning the guests I invited into bait.” Wangge Luobao leapt into the battle and blocked one of Xuanwu’s blows coming toward the Queen Mother of the West. There was no time for him to clean the blood from his lapels.

Lord Guang’an caught the Queen Mother of the West and looked toward the Miah ascended spirit in midair.

“The Miah were born of this earth. We are not a lower class of person!”

CHAPTER 152 - The Storm Begins (10)

Zhuoming heard Wangge Luobao efficiently sell out the Miah clan leader, then glanced at the Miah's blood-stained faces and saw light flicker in their eyes like flints being struck. He thought, Tsk, southern barbarians.

This Miah rabble was holed up on islands in the sea, complacent and conservative, spending all their days like animals, eating or sleeping, giving birth to a pile of little ones who would follow the same pattern as the last generation. They had never understood anything in their lives apart from shoveling manure and putting animals out to pasture. They had no possessions but the mere basics, so all they could do was adhere rigidly to their bloodlines and traditions. The harder the oppression from the outside, the closer they huddled together, huddling until they died.

An animal would run wildly before the whip, and a fool would give up their life for the sake of a grand but meaningless slogan.

But Zhuoming didn't do anything to complicate the situation. He kept his mad spitting hoard of mouths under control and said with restraint into Wangge Luobao's ear: "There's not much time. Follow the plan."

Wangge Luobao's eyes flashed. He jumped and headed south.

On the wide open South Sea, enormous spiritual beasts fanned out like islands. The vast majority were animal spirit images, but any one of them might suddenly “come alive” and throw itself at Xuanwu.

The towering giant kelp that had come in response to a summons withered in swaths. The roars and screams of the spiritual beasts rippled far outward. Xuanwu cast aside the others and went in pursuit of Wangge Luobao.

The spiritual beast tide that had been controlled by the flute regained its freedom, but suddenly a Miah cultivator let out a heartbroken roar.

No one organized them. The Miah called to each other in the jabbered Miah language, the tides of people and beasts both letting the hot blood go to their heads. Whoever first started it, they once again raised a spiritual beast tide on their own and swarmed in pursuit of Wangge Luobao—just as Zhuoming had anticipated, humans wouldn’t scatter in confusion like sheep. Established foundations crushed their mortal bodies and rebuilt themselves; this was a pass that there was no turning back from. Once you started out along a certain way, even with an imposed or a useless Way of the Heart, that was all you could do for the rest of your life.

The sixty-four Miah cultivators, after receiving the clan leader’s order, had known that they were already “sacrifices,” but no one had dared to voice an objection, because the clan was above all. The utmost grievance and resentfulness of “a sacrifice for righteousness” had been ignited by Wangge Luobao’s words—since they were going to “die for the clan,” did that mean they weren’t Miah anymore? If they sacrificed one generation to take the hidden realm, then who would enjoy the benefit of it in the future? The clan leader and the elders had even left the Lingyun Mountains by stealth. Thinking closely about these underhanded tricks, were they really the traditions the Miah clan took pride in?

Though the Miah were all new established foundations, the spiritual beast tide that blotted out the sky was nothing to be ignored. Among the ascended spirits, no one dared to get in the way of its keen edge. For a time, there was nothing else they could do; they let themselves be swept up by the tide of people and beasts, leaping madly.

As for Wei Chengxiang, who had just arrived, there was no question. Before she could even puzzle out the situation on the scene, the willow leaf boat that could only hold one person was swallowed whole by an enormous gold-armored zheng—now she could even save the strength it took to navigate and control the immortal tool!

Zhuoming, hidden in the earring, said softly into Wangge Luobao’s ear, “Nice trick, Lao Wang.”

Wangge Luobao had no time to pay attention to him. Xuanwu was hot on his heels. Even though he was on favorable terrain, with innumerable spiritual beasts in the sea ready to heed his summons, he was still beset by perils as he ran.

“Those idiots in your clan don’t know what they want themselves, but you know. You’ll give them what they want, so those people will follow you like tamed horses.” Perhaps Zhuoming couldn’t hold his tongue because he had too many mouths. In the end, he did start chattering on annoyingly.

“Worthy of a member of the way of beast-taming... Heh, guess what? Your clan leader and the elders are getting frantic.”

When the upheaval on the sea had started, the Miah clan leader and the elders had already known that Wangge Luobao had escaped their control.

The Great Way has three thousand paths, all of them equal in standing—this held up in the other immortal mountains; only in the Lingyun Mountains had a bias arisen because of the people. Even the Miah themselves thought that the ways of medicine and toolmaking were inferior.

“The way of beast-taming...” The amber-eyed medicine cultivator sighed. When everyone involved was an ascended spirit, a member of the way of beast-taming couldn’t willingly accept being manipulated by others.

“And of mixed blood,” the clan leader said with a bitter laugh. “How could you expect him not to be a thankless wretch?”

As he spoke, he opened his palm. A complicated inscription emerged in his hand—had Xi Yue seen it, he probably could have recognized that this inscription’s basic framework closely resembled the dragon-taming chain that had once hung around his neck for over half a year.

The dragon-taming chain was a Southern Shu specialty to begin with. It could tame beasts, so naturally it could also tame people.

After the founder’s Way of the Heart had chosen Wangge Luobao, the clan leader had personally stood guard and placed this on his consciousness the moment he established his foundation.

What a pity. If only Wangge Luobao had been obedient and behaved...

Without warning, a ring of golden light like a necklet lit up around Wangge Luobao’s neck as he rushed madly over the South Sea. Countless densely-packed inscriptions crawled out of it and spread over his whole face.

Wangge Luobao stopped still.

With Xuanwu's breadth of knowledge, he realized at a glance what this was. "Even the Miah slaves can have internal strife."

This opportunity couldn't be lost. Xuanwu grabbed Wangge Luobao and raised him high. "Evil cultivator—"

Just then, Wangge Luobao raised his head. His odd-colored eyes fixed on Xuanwu's white paper mask.

A lotus flower suddenly shot out from the center of his brow. In just a flash, it had consumed nearly all the inscriptions of the dragon-taming chain.

"I apologize," said a voice infinitely familiar to Xuanwu, "his consciousness is already my domain."

Before the expression on Xuanwu's mask had time to change, innumerable giant kelp once again shot out from the sea. The moment they broke the surface, they were assimilated by a large cluster of dark red lotus stalks that twined around Xuanwu's limbs.

"Zhuoming!" said Xuanwu furiously.

The latter half of the name went off key, because a beam of warm "moonlight" had suddenly come toward him, flowing along the lotus stalks wrapped around Xuanwu and striking Xuanwu's back. Xuanwu only managed not to let out a scream by clenching his teeth. His upper body, rigidly facing upward, seemed about to snap off. The purple veins in his neck nearly burst out from his skin.

“This is a full moon scab that the Silver Moon left me. I've spent eight years refining it,” said the lotus stalks twined around him. “How does it feel, shizun? Oh...your disciple is unfilial. I'd forgotten that your essence was pierced by the Silver Moon...”

At the same time, Wangge Luobao sliced open his hand without hesitation and fiercely pressed it downward.

An enormous hand appeared on the sea, over ten li high. The palm pressed down onto the surface. Where drops of blood fell, a whirlpool arose, spinning at a speed hard to distinguish with the naked eye. In the blink of an eye, it had stirred up this whole area of the sea.

The sky darkened. The sun was eclipsed in the sky.

Northern Li's Snow Wolf, who had come in pursuit, raised his head and looked from a distance. With an ascended spirit's eyesight, he could see the coast to the north.

Could this be the legendary South Sea Hidden Realm?!

The whirlpool spun faster and faster. The five great ascended spirits and the Miah spiritual beast tide had been pursuing before, but now they felt that they were moving involuntarily. They had the impression that they were about to get sucked in by that whirlpool.

Xuanwu, who was closest to the whirlpool, bore the brunt. Along with the myriad lotus stalks on him, he was dragged right into the water by the whirlpool. After that, it was Wangge Luobao himself.

Inside the whirlpool, lotus seals constantly attempted to invade Xuanwu's senses—Xuanwu's face was covered with a white paper mask, leaving only his ears exposed. So the lotus stalks grew many mouths. Countless fragmentary remarks poured into Xuanwu's ears.

“Shizun, I could never understand it—when I followed you joyfully to the spiritual mountains, didn't let you down and wasn't unfilial, why would you hate me so much?”

“Later, I understood that you look upon me as though looking at yourself, and you hate me just as you hate yourself.”

“Even the name you bestowed on me is based on yourself.”⁹³

“Shizun, you struggle desperately to uphold the orthodoxy of the immortal mountains because you aren’t orthodox.”

“Unorthodox people spend their whole lives feeling guilty, spend their whole lives wanting to make so-called ‘orthodoxy’ accept them... Haha, you’ve fallen to the condition of a stray dog, yet you actually haven’t lost your mind yet.”

Along with these words, dizzying lotus seals burrowed into Xuanwu’s ears like monsters. As soon as some phrase managed to move him, the heartless lotus’s lotus seal would immediately wrap around his consciousness like an ulcer on the bone.

The lotus stalks holding Xuanwu were constantly disintegrating, but Wangge Luobao seemed to have summoned all the giant kelp in the South Sea. It grew ceaselessly, and was ceaselessly assimilated by the heartless lotus.

Xuanwu, whose old wound had flared up in the afterglow of the Silver Moon, was trapped in the whirlpool, wrestling with the two great ascended spirits.

“Giving succor to the enemy...” Xuanwu nearly bit through his own mouth to draw blood. “Zhuoming...you know what the outcome will be...once the hidden realm connected to the spiritual mountains falls into the hands of evil cultivators... You know that as soon as the evil cultivators obtain the means to rebel against the immortal...ugh...”

“I don’t know.” Zhuoming’s head emerged from the lotus stalks and spoke a lotus flower.⁹⁴ “What does it have to do with me?”

The Miah cultivators going to their deaths saw Wangge Luobao also get sucked into the whirlpool before their eyes. They urged the spiritual beast tide to jump into the whirlpool in droves. The Emperor of the East was the first to come to his senses. He scooped up his vital weapon, which had flown away, and aimed it at Xuanwu’s back. “Everyone, this is an opportunity not to be missed! The South Sea Hidden Realm needs sufficient spiritual energy. If we take Xuanwu down here, won’t that be perfect?”

Wangge Luobao, hearing this through the water, decisively dipped a finger in his blood, which hadn’t dried, and drew an inscription in midair, which he sent into the center of his brow—a true heart demon oath required an inscription. Low level cultivators couldn’t make inscriptions and needed to ask a master to “bear witness.” The inscriptions recorded the oath forever, and the fate of one who violated the oath truly would be miserable. It was nothing like how Xi Ping had tricked Xu Rucheng into helping him back in Tao County—casually swearing an oath and calling it a “heart demon oath,” then turning around and not even cutting down all the trees.

“I, Wangge Luobao, am willing to swear a heart demon oath.” The spiritual beasts in the area spoke in human tongues along with him, simultaneously using the Chu, He, and Li languages to say, “If we succeed today, the Miah clan will be your allies forever and share the resources of the hidden realm.”

Currently, even without swearing a heart demon oath, Wangge Luobao had no reason to trick these ascended spirits.

It was clear now that the South Sea Hidden Realm was different from the man-made “hidden realms” of the big families. This was a true hidden set of spiritual mountains.

Wangge Luobao had clearly just betrayed the Miah in the sect. It was a wild fantasy to suppose he would be able to defend the spiritual mountains with his own strength and the strength of the crowd of Miah cultivators who had been forced to establish worthless foundations—it was no good counting on the divine tool of the mountains, either.

Forming an alliance with the “evil cultivators” who longed for resources and a place to shelter was now the Miah’s best choice.

“The expert in pulling down the east wall to prop up the west wall,” Zhuoming said, laughing. “Lao Wang, you’re the first person I’ve ever known to get this far selling yourself. Genius!”

The heart demon oath disseminated over a hundred li away, knocking on the heart of each ascended spirit.

Yu Chang pursed his lips. If they had a range of spiritual mountains, he and these other stray dogs with no dependable resources would no longer need to flee here and there, no longer need to worry that they, like Qiu Sha, would easily be wiped away by the divine tool of some immortal mountains.

The sea wind fanned out the Queen Mother of the West’s messy hair. Perhaps in the future they could stand level with the extant great immortal mountains, harry the four nations who had divided up the Lancang Mountains back to their homes, return Southern He to its former glory. Steam engines were no longer dependent on spiritual stones; no longer would a nation be extinguished due to Moon Plated Gold appearing in the mortal world. Southern He was the homeland of craftsmen skilled in exquisite work...

For a time, the expressions of all the ascended spirits were very complicated. Each one was considering something, each one was looking at the others.

The Emperor of the East once again prepared to be the first to speak and decisively set the tone. Yu Chang already had a resolution in mind and had raised his back heel...and just then, Tai Sui's response at last came through the reincarnation wood that seemed to have died.

Tai Sui said, "Save Xuanwu!"

Yu Chang: "..."

He nearly snapped his own ankle.

"...What?"

Far away in the Slumbering Dragon Sea, Yu Chang had heard of events in Western Chu. If he recalled correctly, this Tai Sui seemed to have nearly died at Xuanwu's hands several times over... He'd just said he wanted to save what? Were Yu Chang's ears acting up because he had exhausted his essence, or was there something wrong with Tai Sui?

At this moment, Xi Ping was in the Lingyun Mountains. His hands were shaking uncontrollably.

Earlier, Xi Ping had been investigating the array left behind by the escaped Miah clan leader, attempting to work out some clues from it, then follow after as the real oriole stalking behind the mantis. Though things were developing somewhat differently than he had anticipated and his hopes of seizing that hidden realm under the noses of all the various forces weren't large, it was still possible to look out for a chance to gain some advantage.

Who would object to some extra money?

But after Wangge Luobao had aroused the South Sea Hidden Realm and the solar eclipse had begun, the true Lingyun Mountains had let out a wail like a sigh.

This sound was very hard to describe. It wasn't the sound of ridges snapping and boulders sliding, like when Xiang Rong and Xuanwu had brought down mountains in their fight.

Back then, however miserable a state the Sanyue Mountains had been in, the impression they had given was that this was temporary. No one had been worried that the Sanyue Mountains collapsing would impact anything. Everyone had known that when the battle was over, even if no shed skins or ascended spirits took action, the spiritual mountains would still gradually repair themselves.

It had been nowhere near as terrifying as the sigh of the Lingyun Mountains.

This wail stabbed directly into the bodies of all the people...of all the intelligent beings in the mountains. Flocks of birds landed, the free range spiritual beasts on the peaks all went to their knees, and Xi Ping's heart gave a jump as he was nearly submerged in unreasoning panic.

In eight years of being an ascended spirit, he had walked through the mortal world like a celestial being, nearly forgetting the feeling of panic. But now he once again became an ant swept away by a flood, as if flying through the sky and burrowing into the earth had been only a drunken dream.

The spiritual beasts in the mountains all threw back their heads in the same posture. The roars of the quadrupeds and the shrieks of the avians gradually rose, echoing the voice of the mountains.

Xi Ping's heart was being pressured by something from the outside world. The heartbeat he normally took no notice of and didn't feel struck beat by beat against his ribs. A thought touched his spiritual sense: the spiritual mountains were dying.

But how could mountains "die"?

What did it have to do with a passing visitor like him whether the Lingyun Mountains died?

Even if the whole western continent sank into the sea, it still couldn't drown an ascended spirit...

For a moment, Xi Ping's intellect lagged behind his spiritual sense. Bewildered, he was towed along by fear. His first reaction was to send Zhou Ying's consciousness away.

Amid the spiritual mountains, more and more spiritual beasts joined that endless wail, which resounded powerfully through all the valleys.

Xi Ping turned his head in astonishment, just in time to see the sun entirely disappear at the crests of the Lingyun Mountains. The richly colored auspicious clouds became as gloomy as black streamers.

The spiritual energy was sinking toward the ground. It was visible to the naked eye as the natural white spirits exposed on the ridges lost their luster. Immortal palaces built atop piles of spiritual stones began to move without wind. Like Xi Ping, all the cultivators stood with their feet nailed to the ground.

In that moment, Xi Ping's mind buzzed. Countless blurred images flashed before his eyes—and it wasn't just him. Every person in the Lingyun Mountains now who had found their way to the ascended spirit threshold or had a sufficiently strong spiritual sense saw it.

The spiritual mountains collapsing, the monsters of iron and steel belching out steam that hid the clouds and blotted out the sun, foul water bursting onto wide swaths of farmland, rainforests burning to deadwood amid the rain and then collapsing and lying flat, the dust they raised concealing the rotting corpses of spiritual beasts.

People—it was unclear whether they were cultivators or mortals—grappled at close quarters, as if they had been transformed into the demon host at the bottom of the Impassable Sea. Savage-faced Xiuyi shouldered the newest firearms from Western Chu; when they pulled the triggers, the Miah who faced them lay flat, like wheat seedlings lodging. There were people whose bodies were still standing while half their heads had been blown away; out of the shadows surged a Miah with hatred on his face, who pressed something. Behind him, seven or eight cars of a Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon exploded into fragments with a bang. The small, slender Miah was knocked to the ground by the flaming wreckage, yet he still laughed up at the sky...

“Shiyong!”

Amid the wails, an ominous crack pricked Xi Ping's ears at the same time as Zhi Xiu's voice. He gave a start, as if that crack had been his own spine breaking.

“Shifu...what is that voice?”

“A vein of the earth breaking.” In his spirit, Zhi Xiu's voice was also strained. “In all my life, I've also heard it only once.”

“Just now, I saw...” Xi Ping had never reached the boundary of “so immersed that he lost the power of speech” while practicing the sword, but now he experienced it vividly. He bit the tip of his tongue and used the taste of blood to come back to himself. “The Lingyun Mountains' spiritual energy is flowing outward, isn't it? Why would that happen? Even when Xuanwu and Xiang Rong smashed up the Sanyue Mountains, it didn't...”

Zhi Xiu didn't speak.

But Xi Ping stopped himself—an established foundation needed to be told the hidden rules of the universe, but an ascended spirit could perceive them for himself.

His spiritual sense, connected to the Lingyun Mountains on the point of collapse, had already told him the answer: the strife between Xuanwu and Xiang Rong had been internal; up to the present, while Xuanwu had been nominally declared a wanted criminal by the cultivation world, he had never truly betrayed his sect's orthodoxy. But now, with the Miah revolting over a trifle like a clash between clans, no matter what small patch of duckweed this wind had arisen from, it had in the end by a series of coincidences led to an outcome no one had expected: the "evil cultivators" were about to seize the spiritual mountains.

The "order" of the western continent was about to collapse.

Since he had always considered himself an "evil cultivator," Xi Ping ought to have rejoiced that the spiritual mountains were about to collapse, ought to have stood back and watched with pleasure at their misfortune, but he couldn't smile.

Out of nowhere, he had an ominous feeling.

"Save Xuanwu. You signed the blood oath. Within ten years, you have to do three things for me. Ten years haven't passed yet." Xi Ping didn't have time to overthink it. He passed word to Yu Chang far away in the South Sea. "I'll return your Discard the False and Keep the True book!"

CHAPTER 153 - The Storm Begins (11)

The Emperor of the East said something that Yu Chang didn't listen to closely. He only wished he could strangle his past self for underestimating the enemy—the blood oath hadn't stipulated that the parties couldn't fall out and kill each other after the fact. He'd had a very good plan back then: first sign the blood oath to lower the other's guard, then, when he was done using him, kill him when he least expected it; anyway, there was no need to pay back a debt to a dead man.

Just that moment of naïveté, and the lousy stone he had picked up himself was still crushing his foot eight years later.

“Just because of that, you want me to face a crowd alone, henceforth be pursued to the ends of the earth by those who walk my path?” After listening to Tai Sui briefly tell him what the unusual circumstances in the Lingyun Mountains were, Yu Chang was simply about to go crazy. His speech was so rapid he forgot his poise. “Fellow cultivator, is there something wrong with you? What does it have to do with you and me whether the Lingyun Mountains die or not? Anyway, was this brought about by the rebellion of a clan? The conflict between the Miah and the Xiuyi is of long standing. As for evil cultivators...ha, why don't you start with Qiu Sha becoming an ascended spirit on the fifteenth of the eighth month? According to you, we'd all be better off committing suicide!”

Xi Ping interrupted him. “Enough nonsense. Anyway, if Xuanwu falls in the South Sea’s damned hidden realm today, you’ll be in breach of contract.”

Yu Chang: “...”

Screw your ancestors!

And meanwhile, the Emperor of the East, with the Emperor of the East Halberd over his shoulder, had charged toward Xuanwu. While the Snow Wolf and the others hadn’t agreed, their interests were currently aligned, so naturally they also followed him one after another.

Yu Chang was a step behind. Then he jumped and blended into the shadows on the surface of the water.

He was one of those rare people who had entered the Way as a child. He had struggled with tears of blood in his eyes for every grain of spiritual stone that had merged with his essence. Resisting the spiritual image brand, he had climbed for over four hundred years, until finally he had climbed to the starting point of those wealthy young masters—the feet of the spiritual mountains.

No one on earth had better natural endowments than him. No one had a stronger will than him. No one's road was harder than his.

The mediocre rabble in the mundane dust were ignorant and cowardly. Stuck in the mud themselves, they could only turn their anger onto those weaker than they were; what use did they have, apart from eating and defecating?

Shouldn't the useless die?

Fuck you, Tai Sui!

The great ascended spirits reached Xuanwu in an instant. Sword, halberd, and poisonous mist were set loose simultaneously. Yu Chang turned his murderous gaze onto Xuanwu's back.

Just another step, and those spiritual mountains would be in their grasp!

When he openly violated the contract, the blood oath he had signed with his own hand eight years ago immediately retaliated. All the blood in Yu Chang's body seemed to boil, bubbling around his bones. Next, his spiritual eyes were sealed and his essence congealed. The blood oath locked all the meridians in his body, firmly clamping him in place...and then his Way of the Heart began to waver. Years and years of the past flitted before his eyes like illusions. Once again, he became that powerless child who had thrown himself onto a bonfire.

Blood nearly dripped from the red eyes that the spiritual image brand had left Yu Chang with.

Unexpectedly, Yu Chang jumped out of the shadows and knocked back the killing blows all the ascended spirits had struck. Then a sharp spike broke free of the surface and pricked at the lotus roots wrapped around Xuanwu.

“What are you doing?!”

“Yu!”

“Are you crazy?”

Yu Chang had never felt such hatred in his life.

Xi Ping was feeling no better than he was. Right now, he had no time to attend to anything else. He jumped and flew toward the place where the vein of the earth had snapped—Quancheng, which was nearest to the Lingyun Mountains.

The collapsing vein of the earth had torn a deep gully in the ground, which a person would die falling into. The spiritual energy hidden within it surged out as if going crazy. By unlucky coincidence, the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon that came once a day was pulling in at just this critical moment.

The crack in the earth split the rails in two. The unprepared Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon pitched headfirst into the deep gully. A number of Luwu who had been awaiting orders in Quancheng, not caring about exposing their identities, acted simultaneously, narrowly managing to stop the front of the train in midair.

Before they could find a place to put the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon down, a nearby slope was knocked down by the collapsing vein of the earth. A herd of boulders carrying violent rage smashed into the village at the edge of Quancheng.

The village clock tower collapsed like a pile of sandy soil. In less than the blink of an eye, stones and mud had buried the village.

The lead Luwu was almost stunned. But the next moment, the place that had been buried moved. Countless reincarnation wood trees grew wildly in an instant, narrowly managing to create a gap people could run for their lives through.

From the depths of the thicket, someone loudly shouted: “Go!”

The Shu, scared silly by the abrupt natural disaster, didn’t understand the Wan language he had blurted out; they were only startled back to their senses by the voice.

A timber mill at one corner of Quancheng collapsed. The bodies of a row of tree-felling machines ruptured. Machine oil splashed, setting fire to the reincarnation wood trees holding up the “sky.”

The burning pain of the trees, the bone-deep hatred coming through the blood oath—Xi Ping felt every bit of it.

Even that as Yu Chang hated the ignorant people of the world, what he had originally hated were the spiritual mountains.

The silent wellness talisman had been hanging inside his lapels. The disordered spiritual energy roiling at the place where the vein of the earth had ruptured snapped the string. Xi Ping flew by in midair and picked up a child trapped in the rubble, then threw the child toward the fleeing crowd. The unguarded wellness talisman rolled off of him, falling right into the burning thicket.

The little brocade bag holding the wellness talisman had been embroidered with extremely fine silk. It was only lapped briefly by the flames, yet when Xi Ping reached out to snatch it back, the delicate colored threads embroidered on it were already burned through.

Some people were running wildly, some were calling the names of their loved ones in heartrending cries, some were running unwillingly, dragged away by others, wailing as they ran...

Xi Ping's ears were full of sounds that seemed to come from a pit of suffering. He squeezed the burned brocade bag containing the wellness talisman in his hand—it was called “wellness,” yet it couldn't even protect itself; it also couldn't really safeguard this body that had crawled out from the bottom of the Impassable Sea...and had been crushed to thousands of pieces and turned to dust.

And the Lingyun Mountains were about to fall. The sky that had loomed over his head was also about to fall, amid tears of blood.

He had once been...

He had once been an idler picking fights beside the Lingyang River.

For a divine tool to leave the mountains, there had to be a shed skin overseeing it. Just now, Xi Ping had roughly seen the location of the South Sea Hidden Realm through the reincarnation wood amulet. With a shed skin's speed, the divine tool would nearly be there by now.

Looking at the response speed of the Lingyun Mountains, they were just as bewildered as an outsider like him. When the Cauldron of Nine Dragons, Lingyun's shed skin, Xuanwu, and the South Sea Hidden Realm all came together, what would happen?

What should he do now?

“Shifu,” Xi Ping said blankly, “I...I don't understand.”

Was it that past generations hadn't stood high enough?

Was it that later generations had the will but not the strength?

Hui Xiangjun, who had seen through the nature of the spiritual mountains and turned herself into flame, had been unable to shake the spiritual mountains; the Luwu who were hidden everywhere and all the many and varied toilet bulletins had only been able to disgust the important personages a little, and had still been unable to shake the spiritual mountains; the Riverward, the Law Breaker, the Late-Autumn Red, the great demon of the East Sea, Zhou Ying when he had nearly lost his mind, the laborers who had suffered in silence, the evil cultivators crying out indignantly against injustice....none of them had been able to shake the spiritual mountains.

But now, the spiritual mountains were about to collapse into some handfuls of dust...because of the internal strife among the Shu, who believed that “If you are not one of us, we cannot be united.”

If the spiritual mountains “died” because of a lowly reason like this, then wouldn’t their death be very unjust, very sorrowful?

Before Zhi Xiu could answer, Xi Ping’s somewhat numb spiritual sense was suddenly touched.

In the South Sea, Zhuoming had in fact already sensed Yu Chang using the amulet to contact the Misty Willow, but he hadn’t done anything. He had only quietly fixed on the reincarnation wood Yu Chang carried—even the lunatic hadn’t thought that with the hidden realm yet unopened, and the “sacrificial offering” Xuanwu yet to be absorbed, these two irresponsible clods would defect at a time like this.

Had that Misty Willow gone off his rocker? What was he playing at?

Zhuoming had been caught off guard. The lotus stalks had relaxed for a moment.

Xuanwu had seized the opportunity to struggle fiercely, nearly pulling Zhuoming up “by the roots.”

A group of spiritual beasts suddenly leapt out of the water, throwing themselves toward Xuanwu and Zhuoming as if looking for death. They were immediately pulverized. Flesh and blood flew everywhere. The bloody reek was oppressive.

Among them, a gold-armored zheng that had been torn to pieces sank into the big whirlpool along with the corpses of several Miah cultivators. As it sank, its slashed abdomen was pushed open by the seawater. Its gory guts slowly flowed out—where no one noticed, in the stomach of the gold-armored zheng was a willow leaf boat with room for only one person.

With the bloody mist to shield him from others’ gazes, Zhuoming took the opportunity to instantly abandon this small cluster of heartless lotuses and escape to the edge of the giant kelp.

He reached out and took hold of a reincarnation wood amulet—when they had passed by each other just now, he had taken it off Yu Chang.

Originally, Zhuoming had been planning to wait until they succeeded, and then, when all the evil cultivators relaxed, to take action against the Misty Willow. He hadn't expected him to ruin his plans.

He had to capture the Misty Willow's consciousness now.

The Misty Willow was everywhere. That brat's consciousness was like water—you couldn't grasp it all with one hand. Even if he went through the reincarnation wood to seal one place with a lotus seal, he could still shatter himself and escape.

Unless...

Zhuoming held down the reincarnation wood amulet with a bloody hand. His blood soaked into it. The lotus seal went out blended into his voice.

Up in the blue empyrean or down in the underworld, no matter what nook or cranny the "Misty Willow" had his consciousness hidden in, these words would touch him. If only his consciousness was touched, the lotus seal could catch him.

Zhuoming said, "Xi Ping, Xi Shiyong!"

Xi Ping, just caught in a dilemma, was unprepared to have his identity exposed.

Disciple of an immortal sect, great evil cultivator, Tai Sui, Luwu, Cui Yugan, Cui Buqiong... All the protective armor he had used over the years instantly turned to dust. For a moment, Xi Ping's heart and mind were shaken.

The lotus seal carried by that voice seized the whole of his consciousness.

Zhaoting could protect his body, but it couldn't protect his consciousness. Zhi Xiu cried out involuntarily, "Shiyong!"

The next moment, it was as if something had stifled the shard of Zhaoting. The consciousness Zhi Xiu had split off into it was forcibly thrown out.

A chill poured into the top of Xi Ping's skull. Something was covering his consciousness. The Heartless Lotus's indecipherable lotus seal was like mist entering water, dispersing at a touch.

The reincarnation wood amulet in Zhuoming's hand turned to ashes.

Before Xi Ping could recover from the moment of mortal peril, he sensed a particular reincarnation wood tree contacting him. Reincarnation wood was his accompanying plant, but very oddly, he couldn't sense the location of this tree.

Next, a mild voice spoke into his ear: "The reason you do not understand is that you are too young."

Even in death, Xi Ping wouldn't forget that voice. It was as if his whole body was frozen.

That person continued, "In the cultivation world, even your shifu is only an extremely talented half-grown child. He himself still has many uncertainties, so how can he dispel your doubts? His seclusion is just at a critical moment. He is hardly able to fend for himself. Do not impose upon him."

This was Xuanyin Mountain's Dignitary of Fate High Elder—Zhang Jue.

At the bottom of the Sea of Stars was a reincarnation wood tree that had been pruned neat and upright.

"With the spiritual mountains present, evil cannot rear its head, and the common people have a place to shelter... The spiritual mountains were born through the hearts of the people. How could they collapse through the hearts of the people?" Zhang Jue said evenly. "What destroys the spiritual mountains are only the demons in people's hearts. So it was with Lancang, and so it is now with Lingyun. The Xiuyi are skilled in combat, the Miah are beautiful and delicate. Tianbo-zhenren combined the strength of the two clans, stamping out the demons, bringing peace to the western continent. With the two clans now at odds like this, the aspirations of the full moon founder have been rent apart by his unfilial descendants, allowing demons to slip in to fill the void. How can the spiritual mountains continue? How can the people at the feet of the mountains live on?"

Xi Ping's lips moved. Bearing enormous pressure, he spat out four words: "I don't believe it."

Zhang Jue didn't quibble with him. He only raised a hand and tapped the reincarnation wood.

Xi Ping felt his vision blur. The name token of a disciple of Xuanyin Mountain's Flying Jade Peak fell into his hand—without a doubt, this was a prison more impregnable than the Heartless Lotus's prison made of lotus stalks.

"You do not understand now. That does not matter. But since your cultivation has already reached the ascended spirit level, when you return to the Xuanyin Mountains in the future, you can enter the Sea of Stars with me once... You have mistakenly entered a wrong path and taken a very long detour. I have always watched you. Fortunately Jingzhai has led you quite well. In this catastrophe on the western continent, if the monsters are permitted to consolidate power, it will bring great affliction onto living creatures. The spiritual mountains form boundaries that I and those like me cannot cross. Only you, arising from vegetation, are not restricted by national boundaries—child, you have the answer yourself, do you not?”

Just then, Lingyun Mountain’s inner sect cultivators at last came to their senses as well. Countless points of spiritual light lit up on the mountaintops. Each peak master used their own essence to hold up the collapsing spiritual mountains. The established foundations left the mountains in a panic, making futile attempts to repair the veins of the earth, which were damaged everywhere.

The spiritual beast farm was also full of chaos. Just as Tai Sui had said, the spiritual energy of the spiritual mountains was indeed leaking out.

Li Manlong said to Zhao Qindan, “Miss Zhao, this opportunity cannot be lost. You can establish...”

Before he could finish, Zhao Qindan suddenly pulled him aside—the alarmed cries of the Turmoilers went up; a number of spiritual beasts came charging out of nowhere and destroyed Chief Li’s little house.

The new goose machine was shoved out by these big spiritual beasts and crushed to pieces.

Next came a surprise attack of the heavy musk of the bluffing monkeys. Zhao Qindan raised her head and gave a jump of alarm, seeing countless ferocious spiritual beasts charging directly toward them, letting out strange cries—there were big birds whose long beaks were like hooks and spiritual snakes as fast as lightning. And on the fangs of the giant beasts rolling toward them like a mountain, there were traces of blood!

She didn't need to ask to know that these were all spiritual beasts from the sealed area.

The Turmoilers let out shrieks. These frightening spiritual beasts immediately turned into a crowd of little shouting monkeys. Without so much as looking at the people who normally reared them, they ran forward without a look back.

“Chief Li,” Zhao Qindan said, abruptly turning her head to look at Li Manlong, “I remember you told me that...”

“The arrays of the sealed area have been damaged,” Li Manlong said.

“Miss Zhao, to establish a foundation, you'll have to change...”

“Establish what foundation?” Zhao Qindan drew her sword. “Gather your clansmen, follow me!”

Replies from the Turmoilers were everywhere in the spiritual beast farm. Zhao Qindan flew up on her sword. Gazing into the distance, she saw that an ominous miasma had risen in the midst of the spiritual beast farm. There was clearly no wind, yet the trees and grasses were moving. A snake the height of two people sprang out of the ground and precisely clamped its jaws onto a passing spiritual beast. In a flash, it had crushed that spiritual beast’s body in its coils and swallowed it.

That spiritual beast was a sable sheep.

The strikingly beautiful big horns dangled behind it, bulging the big snake’s chin. The “auspicious omen” was like the wellness talisman; both were bits of foam that couldn’t even protect themselves.

Zhao Qindan smelled blood on the wind.

Humans—never mind the Turmoilers, who were half the height of a human—absolutely couldn’t outrun spiritual beasts.

As Li Manlong directed his clansmen to run to high ground, he lit all the signal flares he had on hand and sent them up into the sky, trying to call the spiritual beast farm's cultivator stewards to come—but no one paid attention.

It was already disastrous if a single spiritual beast ran out into the human world. All the inner sect cultivators of the Lingyun Mountains were already hardly able to fend for themselves; who would care about the Turmoilers in the spiritual beast farm?

Zhao Qindan took out a piece of reincarnation wood. “Tai Sui!”

But something was hindering Tai Sui; he didn't respond right away. Out of the corner of her eye, Zhao Qindan glimpsed a flock of west winders flying up in a panic.

Zhao Qindan formed a talisman with her hand—the only talisman she had learned that was related to beast-taming, which could only control good-tempered ones—and sent it out.

CHAPTER 154 - The Storm Begins (12)

Two Turmoilers were tripped by a suddenly-appearing hidden river deer. They were about to be trampled by the spiritual beast with its head like a lion's or a tiger's when a beam of sword light swept over. Zhao Qindan descended on her sword and sent out a talisman across empty space, knocking the huge beast aside several chi.

Then she dragged down a west winder like a kite, its wings flapping. The Turmoilers on its back each reached out their hands, pulling their companions onto the bird's back before the mindlessly charging spiritual beast could reach them.

The west winder was big but timid. Normally, it fled faster than the wind when it heard any movement. It hadn't thought that it would now be forced by a talisman to serve as a mount; it must have accumulated eight lifetimes of bad luck. It raised its head skyward. With the bearing of a roc, it was so scared it squealed like a pig. Its wings, flapping in alarm, sent Zhao Qindan reeling. She narrowly dodged a fierce beast coming her way. She flew her sword into the air and had hardly stood firm when a group of spirit-eating birds with long beaks like knives dove from the mountains.

The spirit-eating birds' long beaks could peck spiritual stones to pieces. When they were startled, they instinctively attacked cultivators with spiritual energy in them. Once they swarmed, they were capable of stabbing a handful of established foundations to death. Zhao Qindan had spent eight years in Tao County. It was a long time since she had fought with anyone. She was slow to react at first.

A sharp wind swept over with a whoosh. She crouched automatically. Another screeching west winder flew up from behind her, its huge body bumping into the swarm of spirit-eating birds.

Li Manlong, riding on the bird's back, tossed something glittering to Zhao Qindan. As soon as it touched Zhao Qindan, it instantly unfolded into a suit of armor.

“A grade-crossing immortal tool,” Li Manlong called loudly. “When a low level cultivator or a mortal wears it, as long as they have spiritual stones, it can block one fatal attack of ascended spirit grade. Keep it to protect yourself, miss!”

“Chief Li, where does it come from?” said Zhao Qindan in shock.

“A relic from Southern He,” Li Manlong said. “When Wei-laoban mistakenly fell into Qiu Sha's hidden realm, she obtained many things from that individual. She gave all those that mortals can use to us.”

Zhao Qindan said, “Then why don’t you use it yourselves?”

If they put it on, wouldn’t they no longer need to keep their hearts in their mouths when entering the sealed area?

At the same time, many questions flashed through her mind: there were in fact some immortal tools that mortals could use, but they were nearly all open-eyed grade, and none of them were “activated” with spiritual energy; they were protective items you carried with you, like the heart-protecting lotus. But hearing that it could “block one fatal attack of ascended spirit grade,” it would have to use a large quantity of spiritual energy. How could mortals use it? Unless inside the immortal tool was a living ascended spirit who could be called upon at any time.

Also, she had heard a bit of the general rumors about late-autumn red and eternal spring brocade—would Qiu Sha have casually gifted Hui Xiangjun’s things to someone? And if they hadn’t been made by Hui Xiangjun, then why would Qiu Sha have had “many” relics of Southern He’s Lancang?

“It can only be used once. We couldn’t bear to, and we are unworthy.” Li Manlong’s sharp voice was nearly sliced apart by the whipping wind. “It was left behind from our Great He!”

The desperate homesickness of the wanderer in these words punctured Zhao Qindan's flash of doubt and made the rims of her eyes heat up.

Just then, the mournful cries of the Turmoilers sounded in the distance. These were some elderly Turmoilers who had volunteered to stay back to bring up the rear.

Zhao Qindan said, "What are they saying?"

"The beast tide has come," Li Manlong said as he urged the west winder to fly toward his old companions. "Miss Zhao, take..."

But Zhao Qindan's sword flew faster than the bird. She got ahead of it and dove.

When she passed by him, she peeled off the armor and tossed it into Li Manlong's arms. "I can't bear to, either!"

"Miss Zhao!" Li Manlong became frantic. "My people live in the Land of Turmoil. The old pave the way and bring up the rear for the young. Life and death are predestined. Do not..."

Zhao Qindan leapt off her sword without pause and tore off the spiritual image mask. Her figure instantly extended, turning back into the tall and graceful young mistress. She reached out across empty space, caught up a Turmoiler, and sent him up into the sky with a talisman, placing him onto a west winder's back. Then she raised her sword and beheaded a spiritual beast she didn't recognize and sent another Turmoiler flying.

But the frantic beast tide couldn't be held back by all the courage and energy of a mere half-immortal. They surged forward like a flash flood.

Seeing that the people on the ground were about to be drowned by that "tide," Li Manlong's eyes nearly burst from their sockets.

Just then, there came the thrum of a qin playing. Everything seemed to slow down.

A man's ghostly form went against the tide. He held a narrow qin. The qin played three notes fit to rend the rocks and shake the clouds. In a moment, he had arrived in front of Zhao Qindan and the Turmoilers.

"Tai Sui!"

"Senior Tai Sui, what's going..."

Xi Ping waved a hand, interrupting her. "I didn't expect this. Forgive me, Miss Zhao."

Zhao Qindan froze briefly. Out of nowhere, she felt that Tai Sui seemed to have grown “old.”

She knew that he definitely wore a spiritual image mask. Wearing a middle-aged face, his gestures would occasionally give him away, revealing a trace of vigor that couldn't be concealed. But now she felt that he had turned grim. The sound of the qin, not forming a tune, seemed like a trapped beast at the end of the road.

Xi Ping didn't look at her. He only said, “Go.”

Zhao Qindan knew how formidable he was. She quickly snatched up a few Turmoilers bringing up the rear and took them onto the west winders. The big birds carried them into the sky.

Xi Ping rapidly formed an array, simply and crudely using spiritual energy to build a temporary barrier, stopping the rampaging spiritual beasts by force. He didn't belong to the way of beast-taming. This thing wouldn't hold them for long. Fortunately, the sound of his qin had disturbed the Lingyun Spiritual Mountains. They would soon send people to clean up.

Xi Ping looked at the savage-faced spiritual beasts through the bloody wind, then turned and went in pursuit of Zhao Qindan and the others.

A beast tide or an ocean tide could be blocked with a cultivator's strength, but what about the flowing current of the world?

The west winders groaned and chirped breathlessly as they flew. Suddenly, their beaks were collectively held by an invisible force, only breathy sounds remaining in their throats. A gale swept toward them. The dozen big birds sped up under the force of that wind, going as fast as shooting stars.

With an ascended spirit's might spreading everywhere, the west winders didn't dare to let out a peep.

“Senior!”

“If the South Sea Hidden Realm is occupied by evil cultivators, the spiritual mountains of the western continent will collapse,” Xi Ping briefly explained to Zhao Qindan. “I'll drop you off in a safe place on my way. I'm going to the South Sea.”

Having heard this, Zhao Qindan didn't utter a word for a long moment, as if she couldn't digest this information right away.

After a long time, her thin voice came through the gale: “The sky presses down on us, making us powerless, and because we are powerless, we cannot withstand the sky falling... Gods oppress us, and demons also oppress us. Ha, so what should we do? Senior, aren't there some people who should kill themselves as soon as they're born?"

Xi Ping wasn't her senior, so he kept silent.

Meanwhile, they had reached the edge of the spiritual beast farm, the coastal zone of the southernmost end of the Lingyun Mountain Range.

Xi Ping was following the direction of the spiritual wind toward the "tide." He had meant to find a safe place to set Zhao Qindan and the others down, but his gaze paused—at the edge of the spiritual beast farm was a blank zone of spiritual energy that stuck out.

That place looked wholly unremarkable, but there seemed to be an invisible boulder blocking the surging spiritual energy.

At the edge of the Lingyun Spiritual Mountains, there was an invisible... little hidden realm?

The shape of the hidden realm was regular. It was clear at a glance that it was manmade, and it was no common product—even with Xi Ping's ascended spirit consciousness, if that place hadn't been made obvious by the vast wash of spiritual energy, he would have overlooked it.

Just then, Zhao Qindan, whom he'd pushed and dragged the whole way, suddenly gave a cry. Something fell from her.

This was a small inscription character stored in a small glazed bottle. It had been submerged in the green ore dust in the bottle, but now it suddenly lit up. As if something were drawing it, it rushed toward the hidden realm.

The two cultivators' eyes met in a flash. They spoke almost simultaneously:

“The Zhao family hidden realm!”

“You still have the inscription key to the Zhao family hidden realm?”

Eight years ago, the Zhao family had scattered throughout the nations. Using this as a pretext, the Luwu had dispatched many more personnel abroad. But leaving aside their good neighbor Chu with its messy domestic affairs, things hadn't gone smoothly in either Northern Li or Southern Shu—Northern Li was too large and sparsely populated, as well as insular; the appearances and customs of the people of Li were also very different from those of Wan. Xi Ping had heard that they had only started making inroads in the last few years.

In Southern Shu, the situation had been exceedingly tragic. It was cut off by the sea and didn't share a border with Wan; a great deal of information couldn't be sent in time. Before Xi Ping had freed himself up to help them put together the merchants' group, eighty percent of the Luwu represented by code names on the cenotaphs in the Kaiming Department Memorial Forest had died here.

Over in Northern Li, the Zhao clan had evidently had the tacit consent of Kunlun Mountain in entering the country. Western Chu's Zhao clan, meanwhile, had used the Yu family to contact Sanyue's West Peak directly. All that remained were the Zhaos in Shu. It was said that a portion of the Ning'an branch was still here. They had the greatest inside information, yet they were unusually discreet. At first there had still been some indications, but later they seemed to have had no contact with Lingyun Mountain.

If not for the Luwu whose bones had been buried here, it would have seemed that these Zhaos had only found a place to retreat into seclusion. For eight years, the Luwu had learned through clues that they were in the southwest coastal area of the western continent, but they had never been able to find them... In fact, in bringing Zhao Qindan here to help her establish a foundation, it couldn't be said that wanting to try his luck hadn't been part of Xi Ping's plans.

He hadn't expected that when he really did come up lucky, the Zhaos would turn out to be openly living at the feet of the Lingyun Mountains!

Xi Ping gave Li Manlong a quick look. Li Manlong immediately said, "This is a medicinal herb field specifically provided for the use of the inner sect. All it needs is for the spiritual stones in the arrays to be swapped out at fixed intervals. These herbs aren't sold, so there's no need for anyone to stay here to look after or harvest them. Only inner sect medicine cultivators come here to collect materials."

Lingyun Mountain's medicine cultivators...

No wonder that despite the huge sum of money they carried, this group of Zhaos hadn't sought shelter with Lingyun Mountain. No wonder the Miah had money to secretly foster their established foundation cultivators and an ascended spirit. No wonder the defecting inner sect Miah cultivators could act so stealthily. The conflict between the Xiuyi and the Miah intensifying so rapidly in recent years—it seemed that it wasn't only because of the toilet bulletins.

Xi Ping turned to Zhao Qindan. "Can you..."

Zhao Qindan didn't say a word in protest. She only gave a bitter laugh and flew down in pursuit of that fallen inscription.

The Yuzhou Zhao clan belonged to a different branch than Southern Shu's Zhao clan. Zhao Qindan's inscription key didn't match. It gently tapped on the entrance, then dropped. Zhao Qindan hesitated, then bit through her middle finger and drew a special symbol in the air in front of the entrance with the blood from her fingertip. The blood slowly seeped in. After a moment, a small door, just large enough to let one person pass through, opened in an ancient tree next to them.

Xi Ping held up his hand to hold her back, first sweeping inside with his consciousness.

"It's all right, senior, this is a side door," Zhao Qindan said, automatically lowering her voice. "To prevent against mortals and half-immortal disciples losing their inscription keys and not being able to get home when there is danger, the clan's hidden realms can be entered by verifying your bloodline. With my position in the family, I can only use the side door...but that means it won't make so much of a stir."

Fortunately, the Zhao family came from Xuanyin. No matter what, under Xuanyin's rules and regulations, high level cultivators had to go to spiritual mountains. When the Zhaos had rebelled, the Zhao clan established foundations and better had all been sealed within the immortal mountains by the high elders. Those that had escaped had at most just established a foundation. Without any fortuitous encounters, eight years might just be enough for an early stage established foundation to stabilize their boundary.

So, with an ascended spirit's consciousness, Xi Ping easily swept the whole secret realm without alerting anyone—underground was a huge spiritual stone storehouse, though half of it had been emptied. Some established foundations were warily keeping watch there. There were people from Wan, and there were Miah.

The early stage established foundation cultivators were completely unprepared. All of a sudden, their consciousnesses were shaken simultaneously. They fell all at once without making a sound.

Xi Ping slipped in like a ghost. As soon as he touched the lead cultivator's spirit, he performed a soul-searching.

Zhao Qindan, catching up to him, shuddered as she looked at his stern profile. She opened her mouth, but in the end said nothing, only turned her head away.

There were truly too many Luwu who had died at the hands of the Zhaos.

Like a skilled butcher cutting up an ox, Xi Ping rapidly turned the souls of a bunch of established foundations inside out, then simply burned the corpses to eliminate the evidence with a wave of his sleeve. A handful of papermen flew out of his sleeve. When they landed, they took on the appearances of those established foundations.

The papermen took no notice of them. As if nothing were the matter, they dispersed to patrol. Xi Ping sped toward the levels deeper underground. Tossing out a mustard seed to cover up his actions, he quickly carved the inscriptions he had seen while performing the soul-searchings onto the blank flagstone floor.

The inscriptions on the flagstones activated one after another, then split off into all directions. A passageway that had curled into the ground unfolded before his eyes. Dense spiritual energy with the salt smell of the sea mixed into it wafted toward him, indicating that the passage led to the South Sea.

This was how the Miah cultivators who had ganged up with the Zhao clan had gotten away.

“You all hide here for now, I’ll have the Luwu come pick you up,” Xi Ping instructed Zhao Qindan, then walked in, sending the location of the Zhao family hidden realm to the Luwu in passing.

Only then did he suddenly realize something was off... With all kinds of beasts stampeding, his emotions had been in a state of upheaval. He hadn’t had time to consider anything else—after he had pushed san-ge’s consciousness away in a panic, why had Zhou Ying kept quiet and not asked after his wellbeing?

It was as if...he knew that when the spiritual mountains were on the point of collapse, an unexpected person would contact him.

In the Xuanyin Mountains, the Dignitary of Fate High Elder waved a hand. The reincarnation wood sapling disappeared as he transplanted it elsewhere.

Next, the Dignitary of Rule Lin Zongyi projected his image into the Sea of Stars.

“Destiny has always been lofty and inscrutable,” Zhang Jue said softly.

“Dignitary of Rule, I suppose you know now why I wanted to protect him?”

Lin Zongyi’s mouth was sealed. He didn’t respond.

Zhang Jue closed his eyes and slowly said, “During the meteor shower fourteen years ago, upheaval in the spiritual mountains became a foregone conclusion. Now the great tribulation is beginning on the western continent. No one can escape it. The frequent appearance of evildoers everywhere is already unstoppable. No matter how much you and I wish to cling to past ‘boundaries,’ the boundaries will break from being too rigid. When that time comes, what will be the suffering of living creatures?”

Lin Zongyi cast down his eyes slightly. He seemed to be sighing.

“He has spent so many years in the outside world and has never pilfered heaven’s order, nor has he done anything that could not be taken back. Rather than allow another evil cultivator to exist in the world, it is better to take him back into the Xuanyin Mountains... Tell me, what kind of person does it take to nearly allow his spirit to fall to the enemy because someone called his true name?”

A person with an identity, a person with ties, a person with roots.

Zhang Jue sighed. “He will return.”

Lin Zongyi removed his mouth seal and briefly said, “Then Zhou Ying ought to enter the way of clarity.”

Zhang Jue was silent for a moment, then nodded. “Fair enough. Too sharp a spiritual sense can easily go astray in unexpected ways. Clarity may not be without benefit to him.”

Lin Zongyi’s image disappeared from the bottom of the Sea of Stars.

Zhang Jue sent his consciousness to Flying Jade Peak. Now that the master of Flying Jade Peak was a near-shed skin, even a high elder could no longer glimpse where he himself was located.

Zhi Xiu's fate as he grappled with the Way was chaotic and hard to discern. The Sea of Stars could not see its course.

"Jingzhai," came Zhang Jue's voice, "I have rescued that child for you. Set your mind at rest and cultivate. Do not become distracted again."

Flying Jade Peak was silent. The wild wind only swept the flying snow a little further.

Zhou Ying's consciousness had been pushed back to Prince Zhuang Manor in Jinping by Xi Ping, but there was no expression of surprise on his face.

He held the reincarnation wood amulet in his hand and stroked it for a moment, but he didn't contact Xi Ping again. He sealed the amulet into his mustard seed and went to the window of the south study.

Because of the eclipse, the nearby Azure Dragon Tower had lit its lanterns during the day. A walker in the mortal world wearing a stealth talisman came to reinforce it and strengthen its defenses.

The newcomer was Xi Yue.

Xi Yue knew that Zhou Ying could see through stealth talismans. When he landed on the Azure Dragon Tower, he saluted him from afar.

Zhou Ying nodded to him and watched the Xi family's half-puppet walk into the Azure Dragon Tower.

Bai Ling was just at his wit's end from all kinds of information coming in from Southern Shu's Luwu. Suddenly, he heard his lord say out of nowhere, "That kid can establish a foundation now."

Bai Ling reacted half a beat slow. "Oh. What?"

Of course a half-puppet could also establish a foundation, but there was a rather different method of establishing it than for humans. A half-puppet proficient in arrays could normally alter his own arrays, but when establishing a foundation, it required his master doing it himself, required the master's Way of the Heart to guard the half-puppet's spirit as he changed his meridians and cast his essence, as well as to determine what path the half-puppet would walk.

Aside from that person, Xi Yue certainly wouldn't permit another person to hold that knife, such that of the people in the Jinping headquarters of Heaven's Design Pavilion, he was one of the few among those most useful to Pang Jian whose cultivation was only at the open-eyed level.

Zhou Ying didn't continue. He suddenly ordered, "Tell the Luwu to obey our Viscount. The situation in Southern Shu has stabilized. Leave it alone, help me straighten out some relics."

Bai Ling couldn't make heads or tails of this. He didn't know what had gone wrong with his lord. It was a total mess over there—what did he mean the situation had stabilized?

"My lord, the Lingyun Mountains..."

Zhou Ying waved a hand impatiently and went to rifle through the south study himself.

He had soon turned up all kinds of junk in the usually spotless study. Even Bai Ling hadn't known there were so many things in the nooks and crannies: there was a spice pouch in a small casket, evidently a work of embroidery bestowed by a female elder; there was a book filled with a naughty child's scrawls and some little knickknacks whose origin Bai Ling had forgotten; there was also a Northern Li knife that the Marquis had brought back from a distant journey, letters, talismans clumsily drawn by a certain young half-immortal who had just begun to cultivate...

“Right,” said Zhou Ying, “do you still remember where I put those drawings of mine?”

“What drawings?” said Bai Ling.

“Didn’t I spend a few days studying drawing with Zhao Tanghua? I dashed off quite a few cats and dogs to fulfill the assignments.”

Bai Ling went blank. “Weren’t those all...”

“Oh, right.” Before he could finish, Zhou Ying remembered. “I burned them before going to the Latent Cultivation Temple. Tsk...put these things away for me. Help me change.”

Bai Ling caught the brocade box he had tossed to him. “To do what? Go where?”

“I’m going to the Marquis Manor. Take what I’ve brought out and get rid...” At this point, Zhou Ying paused, then changed what he was going to say. “Put it all in one place and seal it.”

CHAPTER 155 - The Storm Begins (13)

Bai Ling sensed at once that something was wrong. Before he could ask, a Heavenly Question landed in the study.

“Faster than I anticipated. These old things... How can they expect to get hold of him with a couple sentences of their own? Such self-confidence,” Zhou Ying ridiculed. Then he instructed Bai Ling, “Open it, then. It’s from the Principal Peak.”

“Princess Duanrui?” The ominous premonition in Bai Ling’s heart became heavier and heavier. He picked up the Heavenly Question. “Is it still about you establishing...”

His voice caught. His gaze was nailed to that Heavenly Question, as if its neat handwriting concealed a dreadful calamity. From Bai Ling came the sound of paper rustling.

A hand reached out to take hold of his elbow.

“Careful. That’s a Heavenly Question from the Principal Peak. Though I suppose that having severed her emotions, Princess Duanrui isn’t particular about etiquette, how would it come off if you took one look and ripped it apart?”

Bai Ling abruptly raised his head: “It says...”

“Yes, they’re telling me to enter the way of clarity.” He clicked his tongue. The paperman stood there like an idiot, not coming to help him change, so he was forced to slowly put on his outer robe and adjust his sleeves himself. “They know I have spiritual bones and no Way of the Heart and concentrate solely on personal gain. If the spiritual mountains want to rush a malingerer like me into establishing a foundation, naturally they have to grant me a Way of the Heart.”

“So why is it the way of clarity? Even on Green Pool Peak there are few formal inner sect disciples who take the way of clarity and unfeeling, why do they want you to... My lord!”

Zhou Ying shushed him. “Don’t shout. The way of clarity severs the emotions, not the senses. I haven’t gone deaf—bring me the fresh fruit Zhou Huan sent yesterday, I’ll take them to the Marquis Manor.”

When he was young, Emperor Jiahe had worried every day that his throne would get away from him. In his dreams he saw himself bitten by vipers; the vipers were uniformly named “Zhou Ying.” Worldly affairs were hard to anticipate. He had at last become emperor, but not only could he not hold his head up high, he now had the Kaiming Department’s tight grip around his neck and was even more humbled. When he sent things to his brother's manor, he didn't even dare to say he was "bestowing a gift." Lord Yao had become the emperor's father-in-law, but the high position seemed to have shortened his lifespan. He had departed his mortal frame not long after. It was said that before he had foamed at the mouth and passed on, he had thrice cried out "ancestors above"; everyone said that this cry was auspicious. The venerable old fellow must have gone to be an official in the heavens.

"Before, of the three elders, one supported the Luwu for the sake of selfish motives, one opposed the Luwu for the sake of justice, and the last paid no attention at all. The supporting one was half unwilling, and the resisting one, ha, he didn't manage to nip it in the bud. That is the only way the Kaiming and the Luwu were able to muddle through, put down roots, and sprout. Because these are all affairs of the human world—the immortal mountains are above it all, and all that transpires in the mortal world is merely trifling. If a king of beasts in his period of splendor has his tail stepped on by a panicked pika, will he take it seriously?" After changing his outer robe, Zhou Ying reached out and snatched the Heavenly Question from Bai Ling's hand. He carelessly said, "When the king of beasts is plagued by fears and always baring his teeth, that means he has grown old—the spiritual mountains have also grown old. That Xu what's-his-name... the one who got into the Sanyue Mountains in women's clothes, what did he say in his letter last month?"

Bai Ling's mind was a tangled mess. He responded automatically: "Within three years, two Xiang clan ascended spirits have passed away. The density of the spiritual energy on Sanyue's West Peak has decreased since last year. Every year it gets worse..."

"If the Xiang clan can no longer rule alone, then naturally Sanyue Mountain can no longer continue to hold itself supreme, either. The mountains in Western Chu stand thick as trees in a forest. When a group of tigers determines that Xiang Rong is no longer in the land of the living, it will be time for the Silver Moon to fall to earth. As for Shu...thanks to that brat, I just had a chance to personally experience the crying of the spiritual mountains—whether the evil cultivators in the South Sea succeed or not, from the day the Miah allowed the Ning'an Zhao clan into their home, the Lingyun Mountains were doomed to a bad end. A group of outsiders, with at most some low level cultivators who had just hastily established foundations among them, and in a mere eight years, they have shaken the roots of the spiritual mountains. If you were the high elders, wouldn't you be wary? Wouldn't the little houseflies of the Kaiming and Luwu become important? And it isn't suitable for the mighty to take a hand in mundane affairs. If they want the Luwu not to be influenced by worldly desires, then isn't the way of clarity a ready-made solution?"

Bai Ling was looking at him in disbelief. “Does that...mean that you were ready for this? Since when?”

Zhou Ying smiled without answering.

Back in the Latent Cultivation Temple, Princess Duanrui had revealed this intention—that ancestor who took nothing to heart had stopped in her tracks and, almost indiscreetly, had asked, “How does all that you see appear to your eyes?”

He hadn’t responded.

Back then, he had been only a step short of losing his mind. He couldn’t find clarity... Now, he would at last be able to resolve his cares and accept the princess’s Way of the Heart.

“No need to worry. The way of clarity isn’t death, and I won’t cast aside the Kaiming and the Luwu,” Zhou Ying said as he walked out. “You can continue to work with me afterward, anyway, just like before. Perhaps I’ll treat you better.”

In front of the Marquis and his grandmother, Zhou Ying was a junior. In front of Xi Ping, he had to act as an older brother. Much of the time it was inappropriate for him to indulge his temper. Therefore, when he was unhappy, there was only Bai Ling for him to pick a fight with...and he was always unhappy, so he was always picking fights over nothing.

The way of clarity could sever attachments, and it could also sever resentments. He would probably be much easier to serve then.

For the sake of convenient communication, Bai Ling carried a reincarnation wood amulet with him. In his consternation he heard Xi Ping suddenly ask, “Bai-da-ge, are you with san-ge? Why isn’t he answering me?”

Bai Ling didn’t know what to say, and he didn’t have attention to spare for him. “My lord, if the Viscount finds out in the future...”

“He’s coming home soon.”

Bai Ling froze.

“Had the high elders not given him the disciple name token, I wouldn’t have received Princess Duanrui’s letter,” Zhou Ying said. “As for the future...we’ll see about it then.”

After he left, as before he had come, the joys and sorrows of others would have no impact on him.

Bai Ling babbled, “But since ancient times, the way of clarity has never produced a shed skin! This way...”

“Heavens, you do think far ahead.” Zhou Ying laughed aloud when he heard this. “I do not wish to be a shed skin.”

“Then...then what do you want?” said Bai Ling.

Once again, Zhou Ying didn't respond. He only narrowed his eyes and looked up at the sky.

The eclipse had yet to pass. The lights of Jinping burned anxiously.

He had often been ill in his youth and unable to speak or laugh loudly. Therefore, he had always been sedate, every word and gesture ponderous.

But now, when he had been weathered by decades of dust, his step had suddenly become light.

Zhou Ying ducked down and got into a carriage—now, the west bank of the Lingyang River had also started switching over to using steam carriages.

There was no need to speak of the east bank. The houses and shopfronts had collectively retreated. The bluestone streets that a girl had once run across entering the city to buy osmanthus duck had long ago been swapped out for broad roads. A number of railway lines passed from the southern outskirts into the city along the river, with “jingling cars” running back and forth over them. A single car could convey a few dozen people.

The ticket seller wearing a little red-brown cap stuck his head out the window and shook a big bronze bell to warn pedestrians to get out of the way. As he shook it, he looked toward the sky, muttering something, praying for someone to bless them and release the sun.

The sky in Jinping wasn't clear today, but it was still fairly calm.

But in the west, the Shu were fighting for their lives.

The turbulent spiritual wind blew through the Lingyun Mountain Range and rushed right toward the South Sea.

The western continent had already been in the rainy season, and now torrential rains poured down over it. The veins of the earth snapped, dams burst. Lingyun Mountain's inner sect disciples and the Dragon Subduing Knights flew around like headless flies.

In the air above the South Sea Hidden Realm, Xuanwu, having nearly become a “stepping stone to fortune,” had struggled free because of Yu

Chang thrusting his oar in.

Wangge Luobao and Zhuoming had fallen short of success at the last moment.

How could Xuanwu allow them to flee? A shed skin's consciousness immediately enveloped the whole South Sea, trapping all the ascended spirits. The Miah cultivators desperately protected Wangge Luobao. As the spiritual beasts were constantly brought out under control of cultivators of the way of beast-taming, the sea became a slaughterhouse.

Yu Chang changing sides at the front line could make people hate him enough for it to reflect on eighteen generations of his ancestors. Anyone who had the chance would deal him a blow.

But while he had saved Xuanwu, Xuanwu didn't take him for an "outsider." Treating everyone alike, he had entered him into the category of "evil cultivators whose lives must be taken"—Yu Chang's appraisal of himself was extremely accurate; indeed, there was no one on earth who had it harder than him.

The masters present joined in a chaotic struggle, and the established foundation cultivators and spiritual beasts mixed in died by the batch.

The essences of the dead cultivators surged onto the surface of the sea, raising bubbles everywhere, as if the water were boiling. That gold-armored zheng was worthy of being a fierce beast that could chew up a half-immortal; its intestines were as sturdy as if forged of iron. Before Wei Chengxiang, trapped in its stomach, could struggle free, she was pressed down and buried at the bottom of the sea by all kinds of dismembered bodies. For a time, she danced with the hearts, lungs, and bellies, feeling that she had simply become the base for a pig offal soup.

The churning spiritual energy over the ascended spirit battlefield collided with what was surging from the western continent. The linking land bridge beneath the South Sea's Three Islands nearly broke from the quaking. The Miah mortals on the islands fled for higher ground in a flurry.

Under cover of the rising sea level, Xi Ping put on the Replica and, continuing to contact Bai Ling, who didn't respond, he took on the appearance of a Zhao family established foundation and slipped through the hidden passage at the bottom of the sea.

This hidden passage went from the edge of the Lingyun Mountains to the South Sea. It was an unexpected colossus. Xi Ping swept it with his consciousness and felt that he had swept a bunch of tangled skeins—the inside seemed to be stacks of mustard seed spaces, full of twists and turns going in all directions. If someone with slightly low cultivation had wandered in by mistake, they might have lost their mind with a single look.

He was all alone in front of this incomprehensible maze, struggling to calm his mind and understand what he was seeing, find a way through.

First Xi Ping tried walking in a little. When he found that something was wrong, he withdrew. But the “maze” was changing every moment without end. He went back and forth several times and soon got dragged in. The spiritual energy around him became even more disordered and bewildering.

He was full of wits to begin with. Trapped in any surroundings, he could calmly think up a crooked notion and, with an air of complacency, shamelessly saunter out. But now, this “Tai Sui” who was so steady and sedate in front of Zhao Qindan and the others, after a moment of silence, suddenly clenched his teeth, as if he had reached the end of his endurance, and began to tremble all over.

Just then, a soft sigh came to his ears. “If I were you, I’d go back.”

Zhou Ying, long fallen out of contact, had finally taken out the reincarnation wood.

Xi Ping took two deep breaths and laboriously and desperately put himself together. He didn't want to expose his shameful weakness in front of his family. He forced out a reasonably calm "san-ge."

"I just received a letter from the inner sect, informing me that the Dignitary of Fate High Elder had put in a personal appearance, so I didn't dare to disturb him. Has he gone?"

"You knew." Though Xi Ping did his best to keep his voice as relaxed as possible, it still came out in a somewhat altered tone. "You knew—what, san-ge, are you going to teach me how to endure humiliation for a higher purpose?"

"I couldn't teach you that. My powers aren't so vast." Zhou Ying sighed. Prince Zhuang Manor was very close to the Marquis Manor. The car reached it in the blink of an eye. When the porter saw him coming, he hurried out to receive him as he sent someone to go in to report his arrival.

Zhou Ying didn't hide the reincarnation wood. He squeezed the amulet in his hand and stepped into the Marquis Manor's garden. With his consciousness, he said to Xi Ping, "Don't you want to come home? They've just repaired the courtyard. The stone steps are much smoother. All the lotuses in the yard are blooming. The shade is just right."

In the maze, Xi Ping's tottering composure nearly disintegrated on the spot at his light words.

“Shiyong, I know that you can't accept it, but these are the facts.”

“...What facts?”

“Those who wish to bring peace to the world cannot break through the canopy of heaven above them. You may have very fine ideas, and others may let the blood go to their heads when they hear them and be willing to follow you, but in the end, because you refrain from taking action against evil for fear of harming the innocent, you'll find yourself in a dilemma, and those who believed your promises with joyful hearts will be disappointed.”

“You're saying that I can't do it,” Xi Ping said.

“You can't,” Zhou Ying said, gently but coldly. “If you could, the demon host from the Impassable Sea would have shattered the Bell of Tribulation eight years ago.”

“Then you would have died by Zhaoting's blade eight years ago.”

“If one can leave behind a name that will go down in infamy through history, what do life and death matter?” Zhou Ying said, laughing. “Only those rogues who climb up single-mindedly, letting everyone else die, not stinting on the misery of the living, can pierce the sky.”

“Stop trying to convince me,” Xi Ping said, “I won’t... I don’t believe it, I can...”

He could certainly think of a way, find some way out between the immortals and the demons. He didn’t believe this high-sounding reasoning.

Zhou Ying unhurriedly interrupted him: “If I said that, right now, Xuanyin wanted my life, that I was on the verge of death, and wanted you to seize the South Sea Hidden Realm as a foundation at once, rebelling and letting the Lingyun Mountains collapse like a heap of broken tiles and a hundred million southern barbarians on the frontier die there unburied, would you go?”

You can swagger before the slaving demon host, be ungovernable before the mighty sages...but can you cackle amid the wailing of ants?

“San-ge!”

“I’m teasing you. I’m at your house.” Zhou Ying put the amulet on a small table, meeting the Marquis of Yongning’s astonished gaze. This time, he simply spoke to Xi Ping aloud. “With strange phenomena in the sky, Xi Yue has gone to stand duty at the Azure Dragon Tower. I was uneasy and came with Bai Ling to look in on them. The Miah are skilled at constructing snares and illusions. Bring my consciousness over, I'll lead you out.

“The spiritual mountains have stood for thousands of years. With the weight of the old pressing down on them, new things can never rise. You are not the one to command a demon host. Stop being obstinate.” Zhou Ying drank a mouthful of the Marquis Manor’s freshly picked Yu Qian tea. Like sending Xi Ping to study when he was younger, he instructed, “Get through with your business and come home.”

In the South Sea, frenzied spiritual energy poured desperately into the hidden realm, but it was never enough.

Xuanwu and the great evil cultivators were red-eyed with murder. Just then, there was a long wail in the sky. All the great masters collectively froze for an instant.

Dense clouds gathered, and an extremely bright golden light trickled down, making one nearly think the eclipse had ended and the sky had lit up once more!

Next, the shadows of nine dragons cut apart the vast sky. Where the light was, a human figure floated above a big cauldron—this was Lingyun’s Xiuyi high elder of the way of the beast-taming, bringing the Cauldron of Nine Dragons with him.

“Practitioners of evil ways who desire to plunder the spiritual mountains and destroy the foundations of my nation—you must be punished with a thousand deaths.”

The nine dragons roared in chorus, the sound of their roars blanketing the South Sea.

“First cut down all evildoers, then capture the traitors. Do not permit a trace of spiritual energy to leak out and disturb the South Sea!”

Leaving aside Xuanwu, who was looking directly at the Cauldron of Nine Dragons, all the ascended spirits had sensed the might of that great divine tool of the mountains. At an order from Lingyun’s High Elder, the nine dragons dove with a scream.

If you said that the Silver Moon made you shudder for no reason, that it had a bone-piercing gloom, then the Cauldron of Nine Dragons was stark, bloody terror.

When the huge dragons descended, all the ascended spirits who could topple mountains and overturn seas turned into rabbits in the sights of a hawk. When the muzzles of the dragons came down, there was practically nowhere for them to run. They were pressed in succession into the sea.

An azure dragon sucked away the better part of the whirlpool in the sea. The bodies and essences of the established foundation cultivators who had met tragic deaths all went into its belly, not a bit leaking out.

Xuanwu was tightly encircled by three huge dragons; he might have been dead or alive.

The dragons' scales lit the pitch-black surface of the sea. The silhouettes of the frantically fleeing ascended spirit evil cultivators were nearly fixed in that moment.

Just then, an unfamiliar sentence in the Miah language came from the bottom of the sea.

The three great Miah ascended spirits who had been cast aside by Wangge Luobao just before the battle had appeared out of nowhere at the bottom of the sea. The blue-eyed Miah clan leader had a ball of dark blue fire held up in his hand, burning at the bottom of the sea.

With every step he took, the Miah clan leader recited a line of a secret Miah incantation, and the fire grew a shade brighter, the images of the nine dragons inside the flames became a bit clearer.

The Miah clan leader's features had all split open and were bleeding, but the hand that supported the fireball didn't move a hair. The nine dragons, which were like the punishment of heaven, stagnated in their movements bit by bit as though they were puppets on strings. Finally, they could only remain where they were, struggling slightly.

One of the Miah medicine cultivators raised his head and spat out a few bubbles, sending his voice up to the sky: "Elder Li, haven't you forgotten that the Miah also have a share in the Cauldron of Nine Dragons? This is the Cauldron of Nine Dragons inscription that our old clan leader in 'seclusion' exchanged his life for. Today we will introduce you all to it..."

The Miah clan leader took a deep breath. The hand supporting the flames rotted to the bone. His eyes were bursting from their sockets. He was about to shout the final line of the incantation.

CHAPTER 156 - The Storm Begins (14)

The Miah clan leader's original plan had been, before the Cauldron of Nine Dragons arrived, to lead Xuanwu and a bunch of great evil cultivators to their deaths, pour them into the South Sea, and open the hidden realm. When the Miah had their own "spiritual mountains," he would use those "spiritual mountains" to take the Cauldron of Nine Dragons. If Xuanwu proved too strong, he would use the evil cultivators to hold him back, and when the Cauldron of Nine Dragons came, egg them on into a fight to the death, and then, when a shed skin died and his essence dispersed, find an opportunity to direct the spiritual energy to break open the entrance to the South Sea Hidden Realm.

All of that had been ruined by Wangge Luobao's selfishness.

In order to seize the South Sea Hidden Realm, Wangge Luobao had activated the entrance with his own blood and then botched it; he hadn't been able to take Xuanwu down at one fell swoop.

Now the Lingyun elder holding the Cauldron of Nine Dragons evidently knew their intent. Seeing that his great scheme was about to fail, the Miah clan leader was compelled to resort to his final trump card. But, after all, the clan leader was only an ascended spirit. When he struck to wrest the Cauldron of Nine Dragons away by force, he himself cracked like a flaky pastry left sitting for three years.

But despite this, the big cauldron in the sky still went out of control.

The Lingyun elder controlling the Cauldron of Nine Dragons was trapped above the big cauldron. While admittedly he was a shed skin of the beast-taming way, the Miah medicine cultivator who belonged to the generation below him had been right: the Miah also had a share in the Cauldron of Nine Dragons.

He was only one of two Xiuyi shed skins, while his opponents were the entire Miah clan—the combined will of everyone from the shed skin to the walkers in the mortal world, the dead and the living, the orthodox and the evil.

On the sea, the nine dragons hanging in the air were pushed and pulled by two forces, their bodies twisting as though about to tie themselves into fast knots.

The sound of their teeth chattering was extremely similar to that of the veins of the earth of the western continent snapping. After wrestling several times, they finally opened their bloody maws one after another and sprayed out the spiritual energy they had just swallowed. Wave after wave rushed at the South Sea Hidden Realm, which Wangge Luobao had dragged out to the surface.

The two Miah medicine cultivator elders, seeing the situation, were also prepared to sacrifice anything—to sacrifice the clan leader.

One to either side, the two of them each put a hand on the clan leader's shoulders and, with the resolve that they were willing to blow the clan leader up, poured essence into him, narrowly allowing his incantation, which was about to go off key, to continue.

If only they could seize the Cauldron of Nine Dragons, if only...

Everyone present, ascended spirits and shed skins alike, was about to be buried by the dragons' talons and turn into a spiritual wind that would open the South Sea Hidden Realm and pull down the Lingyun Mountains!

The western continent, which had been occupied by the brazen Xiuyi, ought to have collapsed long ago!

Just then, a series of qin notes like a tempest came unexpectedly from behind the three Miah, as if it had flown out of their shadows.

All the essence of the three great Miah ascended spirits had been swept into that ball of dark blue fire. None of them had the excess strength to watch their backs.

The sword energy in the qin music was as sharp as the north wind on a snow-capped mountain. One stroke cut off the Miah clan leader's hand. The dark blue flames fell along with the severed hand.

The three Miah ascended spirits were sent flying by the qin music. The Cauldron of Nine Dragons instantly escaped both sides' control.

Amid the chaos, Zhuoming's eyes nearly burst from their sockets. "Misty—Willow!"

But no one had attention to spare for fighting anymore—the situation was hopeless for the Miah; it was only a small matter of time before the Lingyun shed skin elder snatched back the Cauldron of Nine Dragons. Neither the lunatics nor the fools wanted to test the hardness of their skulls against the Cauldron of Nine Dragons.

The five great ascended spirit evil cultivators, Xuanwu...the whole crowd of calamity-bringing masters scattered like flies as the out-of-control Cauldron of Nine Dragons made waves.

The nine dragons had been bewildered by Southern Shu's two clans openly turning against each other. They reeled against each other. Even more spiritual energy was swept up by these nine worms and smashed against the South Sea Hidden Realm.

From the depths of the sea came one loud hollow thump after another. The seal on the hidden realm seemed about to tear open at any moment. The sound struck listeners with terror.

But terror was no use. At this stage, the only one who could pick up the pieces was the Xiuyi shed skin. It was Lingyun's business whether the Cauldron of Nine Dragons could be controlled before the divine tool of the mountains pounded open the hidden realm. Xi Ping had done all that he could. Once his attack had come off, he didn't even show himself. Letting people hear his music without seeing him, he leapt and withdrew into the Miah's hidden passage.

Beneath the divine tool of the Lingyun Mountains, no one dared to send their consciousness out at random, and the seething seawater, the human corpses and beasts' blood, had obscured everyone's lines of sight. Xi Ping, coming and going in a hurry, hadn't seen that Wei Chengxiang was less than ten zhang away from him.

Hearing was more use than sight now. Xi Ping hadn't seen Wei Chengxiang, but Wei Chengxiang had heard the sound of his qin.

It was Tai Sui!

She laboriously extended a hand from the improved willow leaf boat, attempting to use a talisman to knock aside the dismembered heap of corpses pressing down on her from above. Sadly, while a half-immortal flying this way and that in the mortal world seemed pretty impressive, in a place where the torrent of spiritual energy could wash away the spiritual mountains, she couldn't even raise a breeze.

The talisman only flashed for a moment before it was silently extinguished. Then the crimson dragon among the nine dragons, wrung into a fried dough twist, fell out of the sky and knocked the pile of corpses apart.

Wei Chengxiang and the little boat floated lightly up in the water, brushing against the crimson dragon's big head. For a moment, her breath stopped; she felt herself touch those ice cold scales.

Death kissed her gently on the forehead, then let her go.

The huge dragon sprayed a long breath, tossing Wei Chengxiang and the pile of corpses away. Filled with abject terror, like a small winged insect caught in a gale, she rolled and tumbled every which way for a long time, then collided with the passing protective spiritual wind of an ascended spirit.

Wei Chengxiang's nails clinging to the small boat had long ago been pried up. Holding back the urge to vomit, she focused her gaze. As if it was fated, she had bumped into the fleeing Three Heroes of Turmoil!

Tai Sui's whereabouts were unknown. She was just about to pass word to the Queen Mother of the West, but before she could open her mouth, she saw the Emperor of the East, following the Queen Mother of the West, get a glint in his eyes.

At this unguarded moment, the Emperor of the East Halberd swung toward the Queen Mother of the West's back!

Guang'an was a sword cultivator. A single attack might not take him down. But that bitch Yang Wan was only a medicine cultivator, unsuited for combat!

Over the years, the Emperor of the East had put on the appearance of civility, but inside he bitterly hated the Queen Mother of the West. When the Queen Mother of the West's loose hair swept before his eyes in the seawater, it instantly ignited the Emperor of the East's malice. This woman was his disgrace...so let her be buried in the South Sea with the corpses of these animals.

Wei Chengxiang's pupils contracted sharply. Without a second thought, she drew an item out of her clothes—this was a “hand cannon,” made almost after the model of Heaven's Design Pavilion's General Commander Pang Jian's talisman gun. Its shell was of some unknown material that gleamed like quicksilver. Round after round of obscure, meticulous inscriptions wound around it.

The more urgent the situation, the steadier Wei Chengxiang's hand usually was. She raised the gun with the false hand Lin Chi had given her and pulled the trigger.

But what flew out of the hand cannon was no bullet. It was a beam of sword energy.

Her intent had been to disrupt the Emperor of the East Halberd and warn the Queen Mother of the West and Lord Guang'an to be careful, but she was herself nearly knocked out by the sword energy! The instant the sword energy flew out, the hand cannon shattered into pieces. A big handful of spiritual stone powder hit her in the face.

Even more bizarre, when this immortal tool had activated, it had simply drained spiritual energy from the surroundings without going through her. This was clearly the feel of a “downgraded immortal tool.”

She had just used a “downgraded immortal tool” to shoot a beam of sword energy that was at least established foundation grade...

That utterly scornful sword energy cut directly at the Emperor of the East Halberd, sending the halberd flying—along with the Emperor of the East himself!

No, this was ascended spirit sword energy!

That hand cannon was, apart from the willow leaf boat, the other item Tai Sui had given her. He had only said that it had been made by Master Lin, an early experiment made in the course of developing some kind of “spirit-conducting gold.” At its present stage, it could only be used once, and it wasn’t very stable. He’d told her to take care of it, and if she encountered a life-threatening situation in the South Sea, it could give her a chance to escape with her life.

Wei Chengxiang had thought that this was another protective immortal tool made by the kind and generous Master Lin...

The Queen Mother of the West and Lord Guang'an were both startled by this earth-shattering sword energy. The Emperor of the East, seeing the situation had turned against him, took the opportunity to run off miserably in the opposite direction. And just then, yet another violent spiritual wind stirred up by the nine dragons pressed down on them.

Wei Chengxiang was swept up by the spiritual wind. Her brains were all jumbled: if such a spiritual weapon existed...such a thing existed...then what was the point of cultivating? Or refining your bones? Or seeking a way?

Lord Guang'an pulled the Queen Mother of the West into his arms.

The Queen Mother of the West said, "Wait, what was..."

"That sword energy belongs to the mysterious master who just took down the Miah clan leader. Their cultivation is no weaker than yours or mine. No need to worry about it, we can thank them later. For now, let's go!"

The two of them vanished into thin air just in time. The sword energy that had nearly broken the Emperor of the East Halberd just now had yet to be exhausted. After the Emperor of the East got out of its way, it was snatched up by the spiritual wind and sent slicing toward the South Sea Hidden Realm. There was a loud rumble as the impact of the spiritual wind and the sword energy provoked a whirlpool above the seal on the South Sea Hidden Realm. In an instant, Wei Chengxiang fell into the whirlpool and knew nothing more.

An ominous crack came from the South Sea Hidden Realm. Just then, several dragons' cries sounded in the sky. Their voices went from wild to weak. The Cauldron of Nine Dragons lit up once more. At the moment of ultimate peril, the Lingyun shed skin elder had at last snatched back the Cauldron of Nine Dragons.

Just before yet another vast spiritual wind could reach the surface of the sea, it was absorbed by the Cauldron of Nine Dragons. The nine dragons circled in the air above the South Sea, swallowing the erratic spiritual energy in big gulps.

After a long time, the whirlpool above the South Sea Hidden Realm finally dispersed. The hidden realm that Wangge Luobao had awakened with his blood gave a long groan and sank back into the bottom of the sea.

By this point, all the major and minor evil cultivators had run off, leaving not a hair behind. On the surface of the sea, only the remnants of the Miah remained. It was a total mess.

The Lingyun elder had previously had the appearance of a young man. Now half his hair had turned white. When he withdrew the Cauldron of Nine Dragons, he sent his consciousness toward the western continent and saw that the upheaval of the Lingyun Mountains had at last ceased. On the point of imminent disaster, the spiritual mountains had been preserved, and Southern Shu's veins of the earth had been preserved...but to the consciousness of a shed skin elder, it was clear to see that the spiritual mountains had been pared down considerably. Nearly half of their spiritual energy had been lost.

The blood in the South Sea dispersed. The sun once again hung in the sky, but it was already sinking into the west.

Mournful cries echoed in the Cauldron of Nine Dragons. Though the way of the beast-taming was not skilled in observing destiny, he still sensed something.

One of the two great shed skins that still remained to the Lingyun Mountains sighed and disappeared along with the Cauldron of Nine Dragons—he still had to go back to clean up the mess.

No one knew that when the last spiritual wind had come down, the ascended spirit grade sword energy caught up in it had unexpectedly opened a tiny rift in the South Sea Hidden Realm, and an obscure open-eyed half-immortal had vanished there.

When the Luwu received the order to eliminate the surviving members of the Zhao clan, they moved at once in orderly fashion. After eight years of silent endurance, many people took relics of comrades in arms who had been buried in Southern Shu from their mustard seeds and hung them on themselves.

The Luwu who regularly operated here in Shu didn't know Zhao Qindan. The one who had followed Xi Ping from Tao County was afraid that people would misunderstand in their rage—after all, she was also named Zhao—so he kept watch over her and the Turmoilers. He quietly said to Zhao Qindan, “Sir Xu, the Zhao family's spiritual stones are abundant, I think you could also use the spiritual stones here to establish a foundation. Anyway, these things ought to have been... I'll stand guard for you.”

Zhao Qindan was silent a while, then asked, “Where is Tai Sui?”

The middle-aged Luwu said, “I suppose Tai Sui might be busy with something. We can't contact him for the moment. Don't worry, he brought you here because he wanted to help you establish a foundation. Anyway, you could say that you've rendered a meritorious service this time. He'll think of a way to settle the spiritual stone accounts for you.”

Zhao Qindan gave him a forced smile. “Thank you, there is no more need.”

Having said this, she went into a corner to meditate.

Only when her worries had been laid to rest as the veins of the earth had calmed had she found that her desire to pursue cultivation and establish a foundation had all trickled out along the way.

What was the point?

She could no longer return to the orthodoxy of the immortal mountains, and if she went down another road, she would only become like those Three Heroes of Turmoil or the Miah rebel...unless she went and replaced the Luwu Xu Rucheng in being the third-rate imperial grandson's wife.

The Luwu had the third-rate imperial grandson under control. It would be in name only. In a few decades, he would die of old age. If she could accept it, it would really be no big deal for her to go.

But she couldn't accept it.

She had lived with A-Xiang for a while in Tao County. Sometimes when they spoke of the past in the dead of night, they could in fact relate very much on the subject of some desperate straits they had been through. But Zhao Qindan thought that she and A-Xiang still weren't the same. A-Xiang had fled for her life, while she had fled an arranged marriage. Those fleeing for their lives struggled in the cracks, sometimes indifferent to whether they were male or female, young or old; but those fleeing arranged marriages had all been ruthlessly humiliated because they had been "born female." That humiliation grew at the foundation of her Way of the Heart, supporting her, making her incapable of bending to suit herself to her situation.

"Senior Tai Sui, can you help this junior through the maze?"

There was silence in the reincarnation wood. Everyone had their own road. In the end, you could only find your own way through the maze.

And Xi Ping didn't hear her voice. He was hiding.

The dust had settled over the farce of the South Sea Hidden Realm, so he had sent Zhou Ying's consciousness back to Jinping, left some instructions for the Luwu, then placed a mind calming talisman on his own spirit, blocking all the voices in the reincarnation wood.

He hid his aura, then picked a place at random to come on shore, returning to Southern Shu's main peninsula on the western continent.

He took no notice of where he made landfall, and he didn't know where he was going. Muddled, he went into a small Southern Shu town whose name he didn't know.

This place was probably not very far from the Lingyun Mountains. The veins of the earth here had also been damaged. Half of the buildings in the small town had collapsed. The Dragon Subduing Knights had used immortal tools to temporarily stabilize the broken veins of the earth until the inner sect could dispatch people to repair them.

The common people had been chased off by government soldiers and were temporarily sheltering outside of town. With walkers in the mortal world from the Dragon Subduing Knights in control, it was orderly enough. It was getting late now. Big pots were set up along the streets, and the soldiers began organizing people to boil water and prepare food.

Xi Ping had removed his spiritual image mask. His looks were Wan.

When he had taken down the Miah ascended spirits, his hands had been cut by the qin strings snapping. There was blood all over him, but he hadn't done anything about it. He looked like a vagabond down on his luck. A green-eyed Miah girl stared at him for a while, then carefully trotted over to stop him. She began to gesticulate.

Xi Ping lowered his eyes, looked at this little thing that wasn't even as tall as his waist, and said, "I understand."

So the little girl said in a childish voice, "My big sister is an apothecary. Wait a bit, uncle."

Having said so, she gravely backtracked, running on her short legs, her attitude like a walker in the mortal world undertaking an assignment of utmost urgency.

Xi Ping had nowhere to go to begin with, so he stood where he was indifferently, staring blankly at the place where the sky was still glowing after the sun had set.

The mind calming talisman was useless. Even if he couldn't hear them, the Dignitary of Fate, san-ge, Yu Chang with his bleeding-eyed rage, the white-haired Marquis...all of them still pestered him like ghosts, binding him tighter and tighter, like the legendary immortal binding cords. He couldn't catch his breath.

The people of Wan were a little taller than those of Shu. Standing where he was, he was a little like a crane among chickens. He was soon noticed.

“Young fellow, are you a tourist or a merchant?”

“From Wan? On his own? So tender-skinned, he must be a young master who’s been separated from his family... Where did that blood come from?”

When they found that he understood the Shu language, quite a few people came over to start conversations all at once. Seeing that his reactions were a little slow, as if he had been scared out of his wits by the disaster, a crowd of Xiuyi pulled him over to their group.

Someone handed him a bowl, someone called a person who looked like a barefooted doctor over to clean the blood off him, someone nearby started singing a Shu ditty, reassuring everyone that the disaster would soon be over.

He drank a mouthful of the strangely sweet vegetable porridge in the bowl. His mortal memories came crashing back into place. Xi Ping recalled that when he had gone with Cui Ji’s people when he was little to play in Shu’s capital Zhaoye and had been attracted by those hybrid fake spiritual beasts, he had accidentally been separated from his family. At the time, he hadn’t known a word of the Shu language, and he’d had no fear of strangers. He had a stupid smile for everyone he saw. He had also been picked up by the locals. They had stammered in poorly-worded Wan language, cheering him up, and they had sung for him.

The Shu were warm-hearted and hospitable. They sang when they were happy and when they were sad. As long as they weren't dead, they would do all they could to be cheerful.

Yes. When he had traveled all over in his youth, Southern Shu had been his favorite place.

Xi Ping stared blankly at the bowl. His eyes regained focus.

Suddenly, he sensed something and raised his head. He saw the little girl who had run off to find medicine for him standing far away holding a small paper bag. Seeing him surrounded by a crowd of Xiuyi, an expression of frustration appeared on her face.

Then she looked at him and silently went away.

For some reason, that look cut Xi Ping, more painful than having his fingers sliced by the snapping qin strings. His spirit shook, breaking the frail mind calming talisman.

Xi Ping gripped the disciple name token he had put into his clothes.

Just then, Wei Chengxiang's voice came to his ears: "S-senior, can...can you hear me? Do you want to come over and have a look?"

CHAPTER 157 - The Storm Begins (Final)

Wei Chengxiang was woken by the sound of lips smacking.

She had plainly been swept up by spiritual energy and waves and forced down all the way to the bottom of the sea. But when she opened her eyes, she found herself on a grassy field beside a black sheep with horns bigger than its head, which was munching single-mindedly, as if no one were around.

Wei Chengxiang had been bored on the way to the meeting and had seen this animal while flipping through an illustrated handbook of spiritual beasts. This seemed to be one of the auspicious omens of Southern Shu's Three Islands, the sable sheep.

This ethereal auspicious omen didn't eat grass. It only nibbled on flowers. It nibbled all the way to Wei Chengxiang's feet, raised its head, and said to her: "Baa—"

Wei Chengxiang: "..."

Why did the "auspicious omen" sound the way soy sauce stewed mutton did when it was alive?

A half-immortal couldn't entirely eschew food, but the Queen Mother of the West and all her subordinates considered themselves to be people of a vanquished nation and viewed the desire for food as a sin. Those who couldn't eschew food all relied on inedia pills to survive. Wei Chengxiang had had to follow their custom after joining. Now, faced with a big, plump sheep, she involuntarily swallowed a mouthful of saliva—the truth was, she was a little gluttonous.

The sable sheep had a docile temperament. It didn't take issue with her. It good-humoredly moved her foot aside with its curved horns, ate a little cluster of jasmine she had accidentally covered, then gave a floral-scented belch.

Wei Chengxiang heard the flutter of birds' wings. She narrowed her eyes and saw a red-faced, white-feathered scarlet ibis fly by, chasing a rainbow phoenix. A rosy glow spread over the sky like satin.

She found herself at the summit of a mountain.

It was hard to say how big this place was. At any rate, it exceeded the scope that a half-immortal's consciousness could cover. Wei Chengxiang looked far into the distance and saw that there were eight principal mountain peaks here. The mountains surrounded a valley. There was running water in the valley that passed through and then rushed off to somewhere unknown. The gentle mountain ridges were full of medicinal herbs whose names she couldn't come up with. At the feet of the mountains, meanwhile, was a cluster of ancient trees reaching up to the sky. It seemed to be a rainforest.

Looking in the other direction from the mountaintop, you could vaguely see where the sky met the water...which seemed to be a sea.

Was this sea connected to the South Sea?

Supposing it was, then if she had washed up here, shouldn't she have been on the shore? How had she ended up on the mountaintop?

Wei Chengxiang couldn't understand it. She only felt that the spiritual energy in the mountains was astonishingly dense, exceeding the southern mines that had once been part of the Lancang Spiritual Mountains.

“This seems like a set of spiritual mountains.” To guard against her intellect being clouded, she took a mind calming pill from her mustard seed, chewed it, and gave Xi Ping an incoherent account of what had happened. Then she came to what she thought was the only reasonable conclusion: “Could this be the legendary South Sea Hidden Realm?”

Xi Ping's first reaction was that this was impossible.

If the South Sea Hidden Realm had opened, how could the Lingyun Mountains still exist?

Anyway, there had been so many ascended spirits and shed skins present, all with their eyes fixed on the South Sea Hidden Realm. It was impossible that none of them would have noticed—but presently he found that he could only hear Wei Chengxiang’s voice; he couldn’t sense her location, and he couldn’t send his consciousness there.

“How many principal peaks did you say there are just now?”

“Eight.” Wei Chengxiang cautiously floated up on her sword. Afraid that there would be some unknown dangers here, she didn’t dare to fly too high. She roughly described the form of the terrain and used the setting sun to determine orientation. She added, “It’s very close to the sea to the south.”

Eight big principal peaks, a rainforest at the feet of the mountains, the south end on the sea... Along with the form of the watercourse in the valley, the more Xi Ping heard, the more he thought she was describing the Lingyun Immortal Mountains.

But when he looked up, he saw only devastation everywhere. There was no “rosy glow” in the sky like she had said—in many places, the fires had yet to be put out. The smoke and flames had formed a choking haze in the air.

Just then, he heard Wei Chengxiang give a cry of alarm.

“What now?”

Wei Chengxiang was always wandering through the Land of Turmoil and various black markets. She was cautious to a fault. Seeing numerous different species, her first reaction wasn't to become enraptured by the beauty but to think “How many kinds of spiritual beasts must there be here?” For a half-immortal, wild spiritual beasts were very dangerous. As Wei Chengxiang carefully observed the surroundings, she reached a hand into her mustard seed, ready to put on something protective.

As soon as her hand reached in, she froze: her completely undamaged mustard seed was half empty!

Wei Chengxiang had been responsible for looking after the arrays on the whale ship. She was the custodian of all the spiritual stones that drove the arrays. This meant that her pauper's mustard seed had for once contained some white spirits and blue jades.

“The white sprits and all the blue jades larger than a fist are gone!”

It wasn't only the white spirits. Many things were missing from the mustard seed.

Xi Ping sometimes helped Lin Chi, who couldn't do accounts, balance his books. He often managed to get hold of some protective immortal tools that low level cultivators could also use. He himself was tough; for him, being broken to bits counted as cultivation. So he casually handed the immortal tools out among his friends and family. Wei Chengxiang had some items that were of established foundation grade and above.

But now they were all gone, including the willow leaf boat that not even that huge dragon had been able to blow off her.

“It's the elixirs, too. The established foundation pill is gone, along with its bottle. There are only a few open-eyed grade ones left...” Wei Chengxiang turned her mustard seed upside down. “Wait, are established foundation pills an established foundation grade item?”

Concerning what grade established foundation pills belonged to, there was a dispute in the cultivation world. Going by their users, a pill meant for open-eyed half-immortals to take ought to be called “open-eyed grade,” but the materials that needed to be refined for them, as well as the spiritual energy that went into them, were in fact of the established foundation grade—of course, no one apart from medicine cultivators cared about this dispute.

In other words, all things of established foundation grade and above, including “Xi Ping’s consciousness,” couldn’t enter that hidden realm.

Xi Ping, as though afraid she would be in danger, said a few words to Wei Chengxiang and hurried over—in fact, when she was fifteen or sixteen, Weilaoban had set foot all on her own onto the path of no return to Demon Country. In all these years, she had experienced every kind of situation. There was no need for others to exert so much strength fretting about her. Xi Ping just wanted to run away.

A hundred thousand mountains were weighing down his heart. He urgently needed a seemingly legitimate reason to “rescue” him from the misery of the mortal world, even if it meant running around for the sake of some trifle.

When he rushed back to the South Sea, the spiritual energy and the smell of blood over the sea had both largely dispersed. Xi Ping made a few circles near the entrance to the South Sea Hidden Realm that Wangge Luobao had summoned, even ran the risk of sending out his consciousness, but came up with nothing—Lingyun’s high elder must have inspected everything after putting away the Cauldron of Nine Dragons. If there had been anything unusual, it wouldn’t have taken Xi Ping to find it.

He frowned, then suddenly remembered that willow leaf immortal tool of Wei Chengxiang's.

It had been an ascended spirit grade item to begin with and had become even sturdier after Lin Chi had improved and reinforced it. No matter what happened, it would closely protect the person inside it. If the place A-Xiang had gone into had stripped her of everything established foundation grade and above, then that willow leaf boat...or its wreckage ought to have been the last thing to have fallen off her. It had likely been left behind at the entrance.

The willow leaf boat's grade was too high. While a low level cultivator could use it, it would only acknowledge an ascended spirit or above who spilled blood onto it as its master. This willow leaf boat's previous master had been Zhi Xiu, who had given it to Xi Ping after the latter had become an ascended spirit. The boat had a drop of his blood on it.

Xi Ping formed a seeking talisman in his palm and followed the talisman's lead into the sea. He went about a hundred li south before his spiritual sense was finally touched as he sensed that drop of his own blood.

There were no more signs of the battle here. Xi Ping hid his aura and withdrew into a ball of spiritual energy. He sank to the bottom of the sea and found that willow leaf boat.

The boat was stuck in a crack at the bottom of the sea. For several li around were all kinds of familiar immortal tools and elixirs...as well as high grade spiritual stones, which had attracted a large number of deep-sea fish to crowd around them.

Xi Ping waved a hand to collect all the items. He grabbed hold of the willow leaf boat and sent his consciousness down along the hull, but no matter what he couldn't keep probing—this was his first time finding that his consciousness was too “fat.” Even if he pared it down to a thread, he still couldn't get it in.

After he tried several times without success, Xi Ping could only shout in the direction the boat was pointed: “A-Xiang, can you hear me?!”

Inside the hidden realm, the sable sheep was startled by the faint voice coming from outside. It raised its head warily.

Wei Chengxiang quickly straightened up. “Senior, did you shout something just now?”

“I may have found the entrance. Follow the qin music.” Xi Ping tapped lightly on the boat's hull with his fingers, his fingers rapping out the soft sound of the Tai Sui Qin. The qin music had spiritual energy. It could condense into a thread and serve as a guide.

Wei Chengxiang said, “What qin music?”

Xi Ping’s fingers stopped.

The two of them went back and forth a few times and quickly found that anything holding Xi Ping’s spiritual energy—for example, the music of the Tai Sui Qin, and words sent or amplified by spiritual energy—would be blocked by the crack. Only when he didn’t touch a sliver of his essence and simply used his throat to shout could his voice get through.

Xi Ping: “...”

All he could do was wrap himself up in the spiritual energy bubble, take a deep breath, and start shouting toward that crack.

The two cultivators used this primitive method to find each other, with eight out of every ten sentences being nonsense like “Can you still hear me?” and “This way!”, like two desperate mortal miners performing a search and rescue on the scene of a mine collapse.

Xi Ping hadn't used his throat like this since he'd begun cultivating. He shouted so much his mouth went dry and his head rang. He had scared off all the fish within a few li.

But strangely, he also seemed to have spat out a considerable amount of the gloom caught in his chest.

Finally, he managed to lead Wei Chengxiang to the "entrance"—according to her, it was in a little lake on a mountaintop.

She called it a lake, but in fact it looked to be only one or two mu in area, more like a little pool.

The water was so clear you could see right to the bottom. The water at the deepest part at the heart of the lake only came up to Wei Chengxiang's chest. The little fish and aquatic plants in the water undulated vibrantly.

A corner of the willow leaf boat was stuck at the heart of the lake. There was a long, narrow crack at the bottom of the lake holding it. Spiritual light flashed at the edges of the gap. There seemed to be three thousand miniature worlds in the crack. Neither human eyes nor consciousnesses could see through them.

Tai Sui's voice came from the water. He sounded a little distant. "Try and see if you can get out. I'll meet you at this end."

Wei Chengxiang did as he said, first attempting to reach her hand out of the gap.

When her hand touched the crack, it was as if it had dissolved within it. Wei Chengxiang instinctively curled her fingers to feel the location of her hand, then felt a cold, slender hand with faint calluses on it take hers.

"I see you," said Tai Sui. "I'll pull you out. Tell me right away if anything's wrong."

Having said so, he yanked her out.

Wei Chengxiang had hardly ever eaten a solid meal in her life. She'd never put on any weight. She had never expected to experience the sensation of being "too fat" and getting stuck.

She felt as though she had been jammed into an ill-fitting piece of clothing, all her bones and flesh squashed a size smaller. For a moment, she seemed to be pressed flat and stretched out.

Just when she couldn't take it any more and was about to cry out, she smelled the salt of the sea. Next, a spiritual energy bubble wrapped around her. Wei Chengxiang took a deep breath and felt her flattened body expand once again.

“Tai...”

Then she saw the newcomer clearly—this was a Wan man covered in blood, with an exceptionally ostentatious, one-in-a-million face that could capture the gaze. But there was unspeakable weariness on his brow. It was hard to say whether his mind had ended up behind this face by mistake, or whether the face had covered the wrong mind.

Panting, Wei Chengxiang said, “S-senior, you must have been in a hurry when you shaped your spiritual image mask. It's a little unnatural.”

Only then did Xi Ping remember that he had forgotten to put on a spiritual image mask. “What's wrong?”

“It's a little strange,” Wei Chengxiang said casually. “It feels like it doesn't especially suit you.”

A face for idly watching the scenery go by on Tai Sui...tsk.

A little caustically, she thought, He looks like a little pretty boy who just got through hooking up with all the married women in Dangui Lane, and then, after cuckolding the nobles one after another, got himself hunted all the way from Great Wan to the South Sea... And the little pretty boy looked a little familiar. Where had she seen him?

This thought only flashed by. Wei Chengxiang didn't consider it closely: she had seen too many people; everyone with well-proportioned features looked somewhat alike.

But Tai Sui, on hearing her, froze for a long moment, then gave a bitter laugh. "If you don't like it, then don't look—stop observing me, have a look at what's going on with that crack."

The two of them soon found that mortal objects could easily pass through the crack, while open-eyed grade objects got a little stuck but could be shoved in.

But if you had an established foundation object and above, even just a tiny established foundation pill, you shouldn't even think of getting it through.

Xi Ping tried widening the gap, but the gap didn't move a hair.

Unlike Wangge Luobao, he didn't have a Way of the Heart inherited from Ancestor Tianbo. There was nothing an outsider like him could do about this hidden realm being sealed.

Xi Ping reckoned: even if he could snatch Wangge Luobao and bleed him, without the support of the Cauldron of Nine Dragons swallowing and spitting out spiritual energy from the ascended spirit and shed skin battlefield, his mere ascended spirit cultivation would be nowhere near sufficient to open a crack here—that whole crowd of evil cultivators had known that in order to open the South Sea Hidden Realm, you had to at least sacrifice a shed skin here.

“Wait.” Xi Ping considered, then split off a sliver of consciousness and flew back to Law Breaker's space inside Tao County. In a heap of junk, he found a downgraded immortal tool—this thing used as its basis a “camera” from the mortal world that flashed when pressed; after being modified with spiritual stones and a miniature array, it could take very clear pictures, and they developed immediately with no need to wait—only there was a very limited audience for downgraded immortal tools, and the pictures of people it produced were excessively lifelike; everyone thought that it was like getting your soul sucked out—very frightening. So this item had become unmarketable.

A downgraded immortal tool could be stuffed into the crack. In no time at all, Wei Chengxiang, having been pressed flat once again, brought out a stack of clear photographs.

Xi Ping only took one look, and his heart began to beat wildly.

The hidden realm in this crack was identical to the Lingyun Immortal Mountains, as if it was a reflection in a mirror.

Except that there were no signs of human activity, no struggle between the Xiuyi and Miah fouling the atmosphere, no bloody and forbidding divine tool of the mountains, no immortal palaces or inscriptions and arrays denying entry... It had its own land, its own sun and moon, clear and calm; perhaps this was the original form of the spiritual mountains.

In the calamity the Lingyun Mountains had experienced, close to half of the mountains' spiritual energy had dispersed. Xi Ping now knew where that portion of spiritual energy had gone.

It hadn't dispersed into the universe. It had all been collected in a place where no one who possessed an "essence" and walked a fixed immortal way could enter.

The two of them looked at each other helplessly.

Perhaps because her neck had been squeezed so many times going back and forth, Wei Chengxiang's voice was suddenly a little dry. "Tai Sui, what... what does this mean?"

Before Xi Ping could answer, Zhao Qindan's voice suddenly came through the reincarnation wood.

Her voice was a little low, but her tone wasn't rushed.

"Senior," she said, "I asked you many questions just now, but you did not respond to a single one. I suppose you wanted me to make my own choices."

Zhao Qindan glanced at Li Manlong, consoling his clansmen one by one nearby, and clenched her teeth slightly. "Thank you for advising me, and for taking me to Shu to temper my Way of the Heart—however...I have decided not to establish a foundation."

There was still no answer from the reincarnation wood, but once she said these words, her expression became even more determined. She continued: "When I began to cultivate, I already knew that only with a Way of the Heart could one sustain one's spirit while establishing a foundation, keep one's consciousness from dispersing; that only when one had refined one's

Way of the Heart could one survive amid the divine lightning of the high heavens and allow one's spirit to ascend... Looked at that way, it would seem that a Way of the Heart is a footpath leading to heaven.

“But while I have a Way of the Heart, my Way of the Heart is incompatible with the immortal sects. I could use my Way of the Heart as a ‘Way of the Heart,’ take an established foundation pill. I could go on to fool others and myself, contort that Way of the Heart into the form of the ‘orthodox way,’ and perhaps by dumb luck I might even become a great master. But... senior, it may be that my cultivation is weak and my knowledge is shallow, but I think that this is not how a Way of the Heart is meant to be used.”

At last, Tai Sui answered her, very softly. His voice seemed hoarse. “If you don't establish a foundation, what will you do from now on?”

“Pursue my Way of the Heart,” Zhao Qindan said. “If my lifespan runs out in two hundred years, then I will die at the age of two hundred. If I encounter a disaster tomorrow, then I will die tomorrow. All my life, I will never enter the immortal sects, and I will not be an evil cultivator. Tai Sui, even if this is a wrong road, I still...”

All of a sudden, Tai Sui laughed aloud.

Zhao Qindan wasn't very well acquainted with him. For some reason, every time this Senior Tai Sui spoke to her, he was more brief and to the point than with others and deliberately kept his voice lowered, as if afraid that speaking would waste spiritual stones.

This was her first time hearing him laugh like this. She couldn't help but be astonished.

“You aren't taking a wrong road. I'm the one on the wrong road,” Tai Sui said, laughing. “A pity there's no turning back. All I can do is guard the entrance and take the rest of you part of the way. Come—”

CHAPTER 158 - Flower in the Mirror (1)

“My lord.” Bai Ling knocked gently on the door of the south study.

It could be said that Zhou Ying had lived at the Latent Cultivation Temple for several years without “catching” a trace of ethereality. Never mind flying a sword, he wasn’t even willing to take a few extra steps from one year to the next. When it came to things like drawing talismans and making arrays, if he could order someone else to do it, he wouldn’t do it himself. He had no truck with the “three improvements and three abstinences,” preserving intact the fussiness of a Jinping elite, not devoting any excess effort to cultivation. When it was time to sleep at night, he slept. He never relied on a half-immortal’s resilience to stay up all night meditating.

But since returning from the Marquis Manor, he had spent a long time in the south study, without sleep or rest, not permitting even Bai Ling to enter at will.

The shadow cast on the window swayed, as if he had been disturbed.

Bai Ling said, “The Viscount asks why you have put the reincarnation wood amulet away again.”

The rustling of paper and brush came from the study. Then Zhou Ying said, “Come in.”

Inside the room, the smell of ink had yet to disperse and the little weasel hair writing brush on the brush rest had yet to dry, but on the table, only a few sheets of blank paper remained. It was impossible to know now what he had written.

Zhou Ying lowered his sleeves and washed his hands. Without surprise, he said, “Has he accepted it so fast?”

As expected, presenting the Marquis had been more efficacious than anyone talking themselves blue in the face could be.

“Give it to me...hss.”

No sooner had his hand touched the reincarnation wood amulet than Zhou Ying’s consciousness was tempestuously swept away by Xi Ping.

“San-ge, come with me.”

“Impudent,” Zhou Ying perfunctorily chided him, tolerantly allowing himself to be dragged through the South Sea, arriving in Xi Ping’s hand.

For some reason, Xi Ping had gone to the bottom of the sea, and he hadn't put on a spiritual image mask, only used the spiritual energy surrounding him to crudely put together an obfuscation, making the mist inside the bubble hide his face and the bloodstains on his clothes.

Before Zhou Ying could recover from the dizziness of having his consciousness moved, he heard Xi Ping call to someone, "Take this. There's a precious person inside. Be careful."

Zhou Ying said, "What the hell..."

...are you up to?

Before he could finish, his vision darkened. Zhou Ying felt as if he had been shoved into a crack. He was squeezed so firmly he couldn't move. He nearly missed a breath. The next moment, the piece of reincarnation wood he was occupying was taken by a false hand produced by Lin Chi. With a splash, it left the water.

In an instant, he went from the bottom of the sea to the top of a mountain, burrowing into the reflection of the whole world. A view filled with verdure struck his paramount spiritual sense eyes all at once.

Zhou Ying's unfinished rebuke caught in his throat.

Wei Chengxiang didn't know who he was and treated him as she would Lin Chi. She politely said, "Senior, in accordance with Tai Sui's wishes, I am going to take you around. Let me know if you have any requests."

At the same time, Xi Ping's voice had become very distant, as if he were talking through something. He quickly explained the whole sequence of events.

"...There are at least two requirements for opening the hidden realm: first, you need Wangge Luobao, who inherited Tianbo-zhenren's Way of the Heart. He's the only one who can bring out the concealed hidden realm. Then you also need the essence of at least one shed skin to open the hidden realm's seal. The immortal mountains don't have the Way of the Heart Tianbo left behind, and the evil cultivators don't have a shed skin—Xuanwu doesn't count. These two sides just fought a battle to the death. They probably won't be in a hurry to hold their noses and get into cahoots."

As he spoke, a crowd of excited Turmoilers hopped and skipped over. In their hands were all kinds of simple weapons. They called in high and low whistles that only they themselves could understand. Each one of them was smiling as if their face had been punched in, a frightening sight if they had jumped out in the middle of the night.

The Turmoilers, behaving like wild monkeys, saw Wei Chengxiang from a distance and finally remembered their manners. Pushing and shoving each other into upright postures, they tidied their clothes and hair and saluted her.

Their bodies were deformed. Even the solemn gesture of cupping their fists and bowing looked like performing monkeys trying to win a reward. But no one ridiculed them here, so they also temporarily forgot that they were ridiculous. They were scrupulously courteous.

In the ancient Southern He language, Wei Chengxiang said, “There are many unknown spiritual beasts here. Everyone be careful and stay with Sir Zhao. Do your best not to get separated, and don’t go far from the sable sheep area.”

A Turmoiler spoke laboriously, stammering a response: “Thank you...Wei-laoban. This...is much better than the spir-spiritual beast farm.”

“They really like it here, I’ve never seen them so happy,” Wei Chengxiang said. “After Southern He was vanquished, the spiritual energy stayed in the southern mines like a corpse, the veins of the earth ran dry, and the people of He became generation after generation of ‘Turmoilers.’ I don’t know whether these spiritual mountains at the bottom of the sea can ‘heal’ them...but I think they probably can. Even if it doesn't work for this generation, perhaps their descendants can revert in the future.”

Zhou Ying seemed not to have recovered yet. He was silent for a long time. Then he suddenly said to Wei Chengxiang, “Miss, could I trouble you to take me to a place with a clear view of the sea?”

So Wei Chengxiang took out a battered sword and rose into the air from the mountaintop, flying to a height where the sea at the end of the mountain range could be seen.

“This place is the same as the Lingyun Mountain Range that runs through the western continent. From north to south, it's longer than Suling Province. My cultivation is low and my manpower limited. I really haven't had time yet to explore so far, or else I would be able to take you out over the sea to have a look.”

“This will do fine, my eyesight is decent.” Zhou Ying stared at the distant horizon of the sea. “Do you see the horizon?”

Wei Chengxiang looked in the same direction as him and saw only vast water holding up the bright moon. Where sky and sea met was gorgeous moonlight, a sight to ease the mind.

So she responded loftily, “I see it. I don’t know where the end of the sea in this hidden realm is. One day, we’ll build a ship and set sail for a distant shore.”

“As I thought,” Zhou Ying said to himself, “she can’t see it.”

In his eyes, the horizon in this hidden realm wasn’t much like the true horizon. There was a blur where sea and sky met, which extended outward, connecting to a place his vision could not reach—it was identical to the border of the Law Breaker’s space in Tao County.

“So there exists...such a place.”

“The spiritual mountains certainly don’t want the hidden realm to appear. Wangge Luobao can hardly fend for himself right now. He may wish for the South Sea Hidden Realm, but it is out of his reach, and he probably won’t appear rashly in the South Sea. The willow leaf boat holding the entrance open contains a drop of my blood. I can make the boat invisible, so apart from me, no outsiders will be able to find that entrance again. Supplies can be brought in and out via the Law Breaker—I’ll have Zhao Qindan return to Tao County to communicate with outsiders. A-Xiang’s true body will stay here for now, and her consciousness can enter the Law Breaker to receive supplies at any time,” Xi Ping said. “They can build their own houses, explore, settle down... If they have the luck, perhaps they can open their spiritual eyes, but at most they can be half-immortals. It takes a master of at least the established foundation level to make an established foundation pill, and neither the person nor the pill could enter.”

Since time immemorial, spiritual mountains had been forbidden ground for mortals. The immortals had used the spiritual mountains to hold the veins of the earth in the palms of their hands, to rule the land and the people.

So...what would spiritual mountains that belonged to mortals turn into?

“San-ge, you said, ‘With the weight of the old pressing down on them, new things can never rise.’ One must either submit or become a demon.” Xi Ping said with emphasis, “I still don’t believe that.”

A half-immortal was after all a half-immortal. Staring at that mysterious horizon too long was dizzying. Zhou Ying closed his eyes to rest. Somehow, amid the darkness that had cut off his line of sight, he remembered some very trivial events of the past.

Imperial Consort Xi had once again been unable to hold on to her flesh and blood, and he, along with the people around him, had been stained with the snow wine-scented pall of death. He had found an excuse to leave the palace and stay briefly at the Marquis Manor. He had come in search of clarity, but unfortunately, a child had been born at the Marquis Manor. Other children grew up drinking milk, but this one might have been sneaking sips of machine oil while still in his swaddling clothes. It was as if he had a spring in his spine. He never stopped.

The young Zhou Ying could hardly contain his jealousy of that weedlike vitality, and he was vexed. He said mildly and steadily to the nursemaid, who was at her wit's end, "It's no matter, leave him here with me," and then, once the servant had left, he unhurriedly dragged the gap-toothed child waiting to hear a story into the nightmare of the Impassable Sea along with him.

As expected, the naked malice of the demon host scared the child ashen. Halfway through listening, he burrowed right into his quilt. Zhou Ying's nose was too sensitive. The stink of milk on the child made him want to throw up. He simply left the quilt to him and recoiled to the bedside himself. He thought, Let's see you dare to come again.

But this gap-toothed lump hadn't yet developed the ability to understand people's expressions. He had no idea that he was being shunned. He only stopped for a moment, then once again wriggled over like a worm and grabbed Zhou Ying's sleeve.

"Weely? I don't b'lieve it much." This lispng "hero" curled up in his arms, mumbling, "Don't be scared, gege... We'll hit them! Hit them!"

In the blink of an eye, all his teeth had grown in, and he was so grown-up.

“I used to think that talk of fate was utter nonsense.” Xi Ping’s voice came through the reincarnation wood from the outside world. “Now I believe in it a little... Not that I want to go to the Dignitary of Fate for a divination. It’s just that I think some things might arise at opportune moments. Otherwise, after the Great War of Gods and Demons, why would a crack like this that only mortals can pass through have been left behind?”

“You can’t enter it,” Zhou Ying said slowly.

“Hui Xiangjun couldn’t enter the Law Breaker, either, or hold the Riverward,” Xi Ping said indifferently. “San-ge, do you know what something Miss Zhao said made me think of?”

“Yes?”

“She said that all the people in the cultivation world now don’t pursue Ways of the Heart but use Ways of the Heart as a means to get ahead. They’ve put the cart before the horse.” Xi Ping gave a grim laugh. “Perhaps the young mistress grew up reading too many holy books. Whether she’s betraying them or holding fast to them, she’s still too high-minded. As I see it, it isn’t the cultivators using Ways of the Heart as stepping stones. It’s obviously those so-called ‘Ways of the Heart’ driving the cultivators upward, turning them into furnace slag...and the piles of furnace slag compete to see which can burn the most vigorously.”

Zhou Ying’s voice became even gentler. They couldn’t see each other, but for some reason, Xi Ping thought that he seemed to be smiling. “What makes you think that?”

“The shed skins all seem inhuman, the full moon sages get swallowed whole by the spiritual mountains, and then there’s my shifu.” Xi Ping paused, lowering his voice inadvertently. “My shifu lived alone on Flying Jade Peak, practicing the sword for four shichen without fail during the day, questioning heaven and earth and refining his Way of the Heart at night, not slacking off a single day in over two hundred years—a person like him, when he’s clearly at a critical moment in his seclusion, about to cross a boundary, still keeps splitting off his attention to come hang out with me... I don’t suppose it can be for the sake of carving designs into this piece of rotten wood.”

Zhou Ying sighed softly and made no judgment.

“We can’t yet contend in strength against heaven and earth. The South Sea Hidden Realm is like a gold mine in the hands of a baby. But I’m going to raise that baby—using this as a foundation, they can win themselves a means of survival that no one will be able to repress.”

The demonic god, toying with fate, had forced these evil undying bones onto him. The spiritual mountains had labeled him an evil cultivator without cause.

They had shattered the body he had been born with and banished his consciousness to the slime, where he had been awakened by the mournful cries of the voiceless, then called to turn back and see the shore.⁹⁵

The gods were liberal with their magnanimity. The demons would drag him into their own decay. How careless were heaven and earth in their treatment of people.

Outside the world, Xi Ping grit his teeth, biting off the indignation he had nearly blurted out in front of Zhou Ying. Forcing a smile, he said, “What do you think, san-ge, this is a good place, right? I know Xuanyin Mountain wants to foist a Way of the Heart onto you, compel you to establish a foundation. I know you must have a means of escape. Come on, let them go fuck themselves.”

Zhou Ying didn't answer.

“You don’t need to have qualms about me, and you don’t need to have qualms about the Marquis Manor. Since the Dignitary of Fate has returned the disciple name token to me, naturally I have to ‘accord with the venerable fellow’s wishes’ and return to contend with all the gods and demons in heaven. I’ll plug the holes the gods and demons leave in their endless squabble, and you come help me look after this place, all right?”

This time, I’ll stay on the outside and look after all your troubles back home, shield you all from the piercing wind and biting frost.

For the rest of it...when you have the time, just take some pictures and send them out through the crack to cheer me up.

“San-ge.” Not hearing Zhou Ying’s response for a long time, Xi Ping became a little apprehensive. “Trust me this once...”

Zhou Ying interrupted him: “While this is a good place, you cannot be overhasty.”

Xi Ping held his breath in spite of himself.

“In the early stage, the fewer people know, the better. It’s best to use Turmoilers to open up land—the Turmoilers have nowhere else to go and won’t want to betray you. When the local force is sufficient to neutralize newcomers, you can slowly move forward. You have the immortal mountains and the evil cultivators to deal with at once. It's like tightrope-walking over a cliff. Equilibrium must be maintained, internally and externally."

"San-ge! You've agreed!"

"Don't interrupt," Zhou Ying said, slightly impatiently. "Remember that no place that has people in it can be paradise. No matter how hot your blood is, first establish rules, then divide up authority. With this hidden realm's resources, it won't be a problem to start supporting these people, but there is always a limit to resources. If you support people, you'll also be supporting greed, gluttony, and stupidity. It isn't enough for you to treat them as human, the people here must think of themselves as human. Education is just as important as being well fed. The simplest thing is to use something to give them 'status.'

"When others come in the future, you can let them keep their original customs and writing systems, but this place needs to have its own systematic 'official language.' Each community needs to have its own channel for integration. There can be intermarriage and alliances, and you can also have each group exchange stewards amongst themselves.

“Though the relationship is distant, the Kaiming and Luwu both have communication channels to the spiritual mountains, so none of them are trustworthy. You can continue to have dealings with the Luwu, but you cannot reveal the hidden realm to them. You can think of a way to train your own people to infiltrate the Luwu, but it can’t go the other way...”

Bai Ling was waiting apprehensively at Prince Zhuang Manor in Jinping. Xi Ping had contacted him very hastily, only saying, “I have a way to break san-ge free of Xuanyin Mountain.”

Zhou Ying’s true body was meditating in the south study, and his consciousness had been called away by the Viscount, not returning all night. In the blink of an eye, it was midmorning the next day.

Over and over, Bai Ling had picked up a piece of reincarnation wood, wanting to ask what the situation was, then forcing himself to hold back—concerning the Heavenly Question that had come from the Principal Peak, his lord had strictly prohibited him from exposing it by any means to any person. This cousin young master was truly too astute. He might even work out from a superfluous question that something was wrong... While Bai Ling wished he could tell him everything at once, he was also petrified lest he make a fool of himself by taking matters into his own hands.

The half-demon could only comfort himself: the Viscount said he had a way, so he must have a way. From the time he had been possessed by an evil cultivator while alone and cut off from help in the Latent Cultivation Temple, to the time he had robbed the Impassable Sea's altar as a mere half-immortal...time after time, when had the situation not been "impossible"? And hadn't it ultimately all passed with alarm but no harm done?

This time, he was also sure to...

The desk clock in the study spat out a thread of steam. It was precisely noon.

Zhou Ying's eyelashes trembled. His consciousness had returned.

Bai Ling's spine stiffened. He heard Xi Ping say from the reincarnation wood, "It's settled, no problem."

Zhou Ying opened his eyes and calmly said, "Write back to Princess Duanrui for me..."

On Bai Ling's solemn face which rarely wore a smile, seldom-seen happiness appeared—

“...tell her to give me a month to deal with some trifling affairs in the mortal world.”

Bai Ling agreed and waited for his instructions for the following arrangements, for how to escape, but he waited for a long moment without hearing Zhou Ying continue.

“My lord?”

Zhou Ying waved a hand. “Once you’ve responded, go about your own business. Don’t keep hovering around me. There’s something off about the items confiscated from the Zhaos in Southern Shu. There ought to be far more than that. Tell them to check again.”

Bai Ling, watching him, suddenly realized something. The happiness gradually curdled on his face. “My lord, the Viscount said...”

“He has his own direction to go in, though it isn’t quite what I expected.” Zhou Ying paused. From that selection card up to the present, the road Xi Ping had walked had always run counter to his own wishful thinking.

“He understands everything he needs to understand, and he’s old enough now...”

Saying so, Zhou Ying took a small box from under the desk and stored it in his mustard seed. “This time I won’t go to the Heyin Building to see him off.”

San-ge was all-powerful. So Xi Ping trustingly sealed away the disciple name token, hiding all alone and “downhearted,” while in reality he was running back and forth between the South Sea and Tao County, hopelessly busy.

He had to get a set of open-eyed grade and downgraded immortal tools as well as firearms to give to the mortals in the hidden realm for self-defense; had to think of a way to make the willow leaf boat holding the crack open invisible and rack his brains to set layer after layer of protection around it; and he had to plan a passageway leading from Tao County to the South Sea Hidden Realm... So many trifles, and not one he could delegate to someone else. He himself often slipped up, but fortunately Tao County was Zhou Ying’s domain, and he could always point out the shortcomings.

The people in the hidden realm were also extremely busy. In one short month, they had met with two dangerous spiritual beast attacks, and there were only two half-immortals to protect them. They had to build their own village and sentry posts in the spiritual mountains, and while protecting their own home turf, they also had to work up their courage and constantly scout the surroundings.

During the day, the people inside and outside the hidden realm were all busy with their own affairs, unable to help each other; at night, apart from those standing the night watch at the sentry posts, everyone would crowd around the shores of that tiny lake on the mountaintop to talk.

Xi Ping stood watch outside the hidden realm alone, wrapped in a bubble full of spiritual energy. He rarely interjected. The sound of the Tai Sui Qin couldn't enter, so he found an ordinary flute somewhere.

At first, apart from Li Manlong and Wei Chengxiang, everyone—including Zhao Qindan—was reserved, but later they little by little became accustomed to the melodious and distant sound of the flute and began to speak their own wishes under Chief Li's guidance... Each person had to speak. Each person had a wish.

They also discussed rules. Every time they reached a consensus, Chief Li would relate it and turn it into law, having the two half-immortal young women carve it into a huge stone beside the small mountaintop lake.

After a whole month and more, the first small mortal village at last took rudimentary shape inside the South Sea Hidden Realm.

Xi Ping had left several hidden reincarnation wood trees in the array formation at the hidden realm's entrance and arranged that everyone would assemble beside the lake on the fifteenth of every month at zi hour.

“Everyone, I have another request. Can you help me build a little compound by the lake?”

All the Turmoilers were descendants of Southern He with its long history of skilled craftsmanship. So Li Manlong said, “What are you saying, Tai Sui? What kind of compound do you want?”

Descriptions were too lifeless, and Xi Ping couldn't draw, but fortunately there were cameras. So he sent photographs of the little compound where old Madam Xi had lived in the Marquis Manor through the crack into the hidden realm.

“Build it according to this,” Xi Ping said. “If you're short on anything, just tell me. He's very delicate. Thank you, thank you.”

Bai Ling was an established foundation half-demon; he certainly wouldn't be able to enter. It was also unrealistic to think of moving Prince Zhuang Manor over in the early stages. Xi Ping had considered it and could only devote some care to it himself.

He sent Zhou Ying a letter and saw Zhao Qindan back to Tao County, the whole time recalling what had been in the room in Grandmother's compound that san-ge had stayed in when he was little.

As he thought and remembered, he boarded Tao County's Great Wan-bound Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon.

Once across the national boundary, Xi Ping took off his spiritual image mask. All the inscriptions on the border were disturbed by the presence of an ascended spirit. Faint light invisible to the naked eye spread outward, traveling along the veins of the earth to Jinping, and to Xuanyin Mountain.

Since leaving his country, in a flash, fourteen years had passed.

Snow-white steam surged up to the sky. Xi Ping blended into the crowd and walked into Great Wan's border post to the accompaniment of rumbling. At once, he saw a stream of Heaven's Design Pavilion's blue-clothesers nervously charge into the little border inspection booth.

Xi Ping didn't stop, only waved the inner sect disciple name token in front of the blue-clothesers and raised a finger to his lips to stop their terror-stricken cries of "shishu." Then his figure flashed, and he floated away.

“I’ll have to buy the flower seeds in Jinping,” he was thinking. “Will Southern Shu’s climate suit them?”

Zhou Ying was already in the Latent Cultivation Temple. He crumpled the Heavenly Question in his hand that read “The Viscount has returned to the country.” He turned and bowed to the white figure that had at some point appeared behind him. “Your Highness Duanrui, I have kept you waiting.”

CHAPTER 159 - Flower in the Mirror (2)

Nowadays, the Latent Cultivation Temple was divided into two levels. The valley and the lower slopes were left to the provisional disciples who hadn't yet begun to cultivate. Half-immortals who came from the outer sects to advance their cultivation could fly swords, so all their activities took place in the heights. Near the area of the inner sect was a tall mountain with many cave dwellings carved into its face. In imitation of Sanyue, they were separated by small manmade hidden realms so as not to disturb each other.

Zhou Ying was residing at the mountain's summit. When the clouds were thin, he could turn to see the whole valley of the Latent Cultivation Temple, and in front of him, he could overlook all the thirty-six peaks... Only the Qiu courtyard, where he had stayed before, was shielded by the dense forest in the valley. He didn't know which family's scion in this class of disciples had been assigned to it.

Duanrui nodded. Time was eternally stagnant for her. She repeated the question she had asked before: "How does all that you see appear to your eyes?"

This time, Zhou Ying didn't fob her off. He responded frankly, "Your Highness's spiritual light is dim. Your form is occluded by dust. If you do not retire to seclusion to cultivate, you do not have long."

These words amounted to pointing to someone's nose and saying "There is darkness between your brows, your lifespan is nearing its end"; it could be described as the extreme of discourtesy.

But Duanrui was completely indifferent. She calmly said, "You can see my Way of the Heart?"

Zhou Ying, looking at her, said, "And also how the foot has been cut to fit the shoe."

The corners of Duanrui's mouth twitched, as if she were smiling. With a wave of her sleeve, she raised a cool breeze that landed in the valley and disturbed the bells of Chengjing Hall.

The glow of the setting sun gilded Chengjing's Hall's bamboo forest, submerging the paths many people had walked.

Xi Ping stared blankly at the Lingyang River for a long moment, avoiding several cars that honked at him. He was a little lost—the pleasure boat ferry crossing he had once run past barefoot had been torn down.

Cui Ji still occupied the most luxurious location on the west side of the Lingyang River. Its outer wall had already been revamped several times in pursuit of people's rapidly changing interests. If not for the small brocade carp mark at the gate, Xi Ping would hardly have recognized it. Despite its best efforts, it still showed inevitable signs of decline. It was quiet and cheerless.

The steam carriages filling the street had no lanterns hanging from them; it was impossible to tell which families they belonged to. Among the faces flashing by ostentatiously, not a single one was familiar to him. There was no knowing how many crops of rich wastrels Jinping had been through.

Finally, he found his way back to Dangui Lane navigating by the Azure Dragon Towers.

The flagstone path had changed into a carriage road, and the appearance of Dangui Lane had also greatly altered. San-ge had said that the Marquis Manor had renovated its courtyard, but for some reason, the outer wall, along with the front and side gates, hadn't been made over along with it. They looked so old that they stuck out.

Out of nowhere, timidity rose in Xi Ping's heart. He dithered at the gate for a long time, instinctively looking for people he knew; that was when he found that neither Zhou Ying nor Bai Ling had responded to his letter.

He was just thinking something was off when he heard the sound of a door. A man walked outside in the Marquis Manor, around thirty, with a big face, dressed in long robes and wearing a short beard; he had quite a dignified manner. This man was assigning work to a group of servants and pages. The porter was nodding and bowing, constantly repeating "Master Zhang," rather fawning on this person.

He had heard that the old butler Wu Letai had died last year. Xi Ping guessed that this might be the new butler.

It was natural for staff to be replaced, and Xi Ping had no objections to a new butler...but he still felt a little unhappy for no reason.

Perhaps sensing his gaze, the new butler inadvertently glanced in Xi Ping's direction. Only a glance, and at once it was as if he had been struck by lightning.

His small eyes instantly turned round. He stared dumbfounded at Xi Ping for a long time, then stammered out, "...Young master?"

Xi Ping felt that this man's features, pushed into a lump by flesh, were a little familiar, so he smiled at him and thought, Who's this now?

Before he could remember, the round-faced man, casting aside his dignity, took to his heels and scrambled toward him. He tripped over the threshold and nearly fell flat on his face. The porter and the servants quickly came forward to help him up, but the man shook them off as if in a state of unbearable anxiety. Forgetting himself, he stumbled before Xi Ping and said tearfully, “Young master! Have you come back?”

He fell to his knees with a thud. “I’m Haozhong!”

Xi Ping nearly took half a step back—Haozhong had grown from his namesake bell into a whole set of bells. He had stubbed his toe against the marks left by time on this childhood companion.

Before he could recover, someone went to bring the news to the Marquis Manor. Xi Yue was the first to charge out through the crowd. Then it was the Marquis, and Madam Cui, who could no longer walk very nimbly...

The bottomless mundane world swallowed him up in one gulp.

In the spiritual mountains, Zhou Ying gathered back his consciousness and listened to Princess Duanrui’s voice, still as an ancient well.

“The way of clarity and unfeeling is an ancient inheritance—‘the wisest is unmoved by sentiment, and unmoved by sentiment sees the greatest good.’

Therefore, it has historically been viewed as the ancestor of the three thousand paths of the Great Way, as well as the basis of cultivation. But this way is unusually arduous. Since time immemorial, it has produced no shed skin. My shizun died in the middle ascended spirit stage. At the time, she was teaching scripture to all her disciples as usual. She was merely reading from the text, not saying a single phrase out of the ordinary. But halfway through, a smile suddenly appeared on her face. She closed her eyes and passed away—before me, she was the person to go farthest in the way of clarity.”

She paused briefly. “As for me, you must have seen that the end of my life is near.”

“Yes,” Zhou Ying responded.

Duanrui continued, “Once you enter this way, you will be untouched by emotion, your bonds to the world severed, all love and hate dispelled. Have you thought it through?”

Zhou Ying didn’t answer at once. He turned his head slightly eastward—that was the direction of Jinping.

To avoid disturbing the Azure Dragon Towers, Xi Ping had hidden his aura when entering Jinping, but the activity in Dangui Lane couldn’t be kept down.

Pang Jian landed on a streetlamp at the corner and looked at the brightly lit Marquis Manor from afar. He didn't bother them rashly. After their parting in Demon Country, the tip of years of filth had been uncovered, then once again hastily covered up at the bottom of the Impassable Sea by the Bell of Tribulation. Zhou Ying had towered into view in the mortal world like the projection of a demon. General Zhi had Flying Jade Peak locked up to this day. And the life of the puny half-immortal who had been involved in it all had become an enigma, something no one in the immortal mountains could breathe a word about.

Walkers in the mortal world were unqualified to rise to heaven or sink into the earth, but he had scented the moisture of an approaching storm.

Pang Jian glanced toward Prince Zhuang Manor and saw that the half-demon paperman Bai Ling had appeared at some point and was also watching the Marquis Manor from afar.

Pang Jian's lips moved. He sent a message: "I heard..."

Bai Ling raised a finger toward him expressionlessly: Shh, not now, this is a rare happy reunion.

Xi Ping was rejoicing that he had no Way of the Heart. In a daze, he understood somewhat why Xuanyin Mountain didn't especially encourage inner sect disciples to establish foundations and become set in a way before their relatives in the mortal world passed away. At a loss, he couldn't resist being weak enough to try anything that might help. He once again called a cry for help to Zhou Ying across the distance.

Zhou Ying didn't hear it. He averted his gaze and nodded to Princess Duanrui. "Yes."

"The tribulation of the Impassable Sea arose because of me and ended with you. I suppose there must be destiny in this." Watching him, Princess Duanrui's spiritual light suddenly dimmed considerably. For an instant, a trace of weariness appeared on her unaging, unchanging sculpture of a countenance.

She was eight hundred years old.

"In this matter, no predecessors have had the natural gifts you possess. The way of clarity has been waiting for you for a long time." She extended a hand to tap Zhou Ying's spirit. "Follow me."

There was a roar in Zhou Ying's ears. The pain of the demon host sucking his marrow in his youth, innumerable sleepless nights in the Guangyun Palace, a ridiculous ballad, the taste of blood, the taste of snow wine, the smell of putrefaction, his grandmother's warm smell of elderliness... Many sharp emotions that had been concealed over the years surged up. His spirit shook violently. For a moment, he couldn't catch his breath.

But he didn't dodge it. He inspected his past bit by bit, hearing the ancient echoes pour into his consciousness.

Anger, enmity, happiness, anticipation... One after another, they stagnated, freezing into ice sculptures that no longer clamored, arrayed in his spirit. Zhou Ying abruptly looked around and saw that a mirror seemed to have appeared in his spirit. The mirror showed him raving, crying, and laughing, in many different states. All of them were cut off by the surface of the mirror. All the things that touched his state of mind were inside the mirror. Then, they disappeared.

His past was clear. He had never been so calm in his life.

Having removed all interference, the suspicions that each person with the misfortune to be born with a paramount spiritual sense spent a lifetime strenuously pursuing settled clearly before his eyes.

Zhou Ying's eyes opened.

Not getting an answer from him three times, Xi Ping at last became alarmed. His restrained consciousness swept through the whole of Jinping without warning, immediately catching Pang Jian and Bai Ling.

Pang Jian gasped—this was an ascended spirit!

Bai Ling turned, ready to leave, but he was nailed in place by a beam of spiritual light.

In the immortal mountains, Princess Duanrui held up an established foundation pill, but she hung back, not giving it to Zhou Ying. “You have seen the way of clarity. What did you see?”

The false courtesy and ingrained cruelty on Zhou Ying’s brow were gone. He shook his head toward her. “Your Highness, I cannot say.”

First, Duanrui froze. Then she seemed to understand something. The center of her brow abruptly cracked. Wrinkles appeared all over her face. Her hair turned white. The spiritual energy around her billowed the sleeves of her robes. Lightning flashed outside the window.

But it was only for an instant. Then she once again suppressed all unusual manifestations, offered the established foundation pill to Zhou Ying, and nodded gently. “As I thought.”

Meanwhile, Jinping's seven Azure Dragon Towers seemed to have been scared out of their wits. Their bells shook wildly. Pang Jian said in horror, "Xi Shiyong, you..."

Before he could finish, a figure crossed the skies like a white rainbow, its arc flying toward the Xuanyin Mountains.

Torrential rain was falling in Jingzhou. The dense clouds were unexpectedly ripped apart by that figure. The people busy dredging the gutters looked up blankly.

The arrays of the Latent Cultivation Temple, one of the sect's important locations, were torn apart barehanded. The young disciples attending evening class in the Qiankun Tower watched in alarm as Luo-shixiong fell on his rear amid the shaking.

Xi Ping disregarded Xuanyin's brutal great mountain array and charged right in, narrowly stopping in his tracks before bumping into the protective screen Princess Duanrui had created.

Spiritual light glimmered at the summit of the mountain, a rosy glow like satin—an immortal was establishing a foundation.

Being born with spiritual bones was connected to bloodline. After generation upon generation of selection by the Zhou family, innate spiritual bones had nearly become a family speciality.

But not the paramount spiritual sense.

It seemed to have nothing to do with bloodline. It fell at random among the multitude. It could be an imperial kinsman, or it could be a member of the common people—of the latter, even fewer survived.

A first-class spiritual sense was a gift; a mortal who had it was sure to win when gambling, and with it, cultivation brought twice the results for half the work. But a paramount spiritual sense seemed to be a curse, each person who possessed it having a rougher lot in life than the next; therefore, each had their own insanity...as if there was an obscure power silencing those who would divulge the designs of heaven.

When it came down to it, every survivor who bore this curse wanted this world to answer for it.

This was what Wangge Luobao thought to himself as he watched Zhuoming from afar.

Zhuoming was using a small knife to carve a portrait onto his own body. His handiwork was poor. No one could tell whom he was carving.

When he was finished, he grew a mouth on the bloody portrait and began to hurl insults at himself.

This time the mouth was calling him a “rebellious disciple”; presumably the face he had carved was Xuanwu’s. He spoke nothing but obscenities.

Wangge Luobao looked on, feeling that, no matter what, this didn’t seem like a shed skin sage... It seemed like Zhuoming’s own hatred.

At first, Zhuoming listened to this abuse without responding. He shook all over amid torn skin and gaping flesh. As the portrait of Xuanwu cursed him more and more heatedly, Zhuoming trembled like a fallen leaf in the autumn wind. At last, he gave a shout and brought down the knife to gouge out the portrait’s eyes, as if taking the portrait carved into his own skin for the real Xuanwu. He smeared the portrait until it was a gory mess. Then he lay down in the seawater as if he had exhausted his strength, letting the blood spread.

They were currently on a nameless island in the South Sea.

The South Sea had many small islets like this. They vanished at high tide, then appeared all over when the tide receded.

After failing to open the South Sea Hidden Realm, Wangge Luobao had escaped with a small bunch of surviving Miah cultivators to one such little island... In the depths of the islet was a large stash of spiritual stones and immortal tools.

The Miah cultivators were nursing their wounds. Wangge Luobao slowly walked up beside Zhuoming. Anxiously, he bent down and gently asked, “Do you want an elixir, or do you want me to stay with you for a while? I think you seem very lonely.”

Zhuoming lay on the surface of the water, eyes glaring up at the sky. He muttered, “...Save it. Scram.”

Wangge Luobao didn't scam. Not at all disdaining him, he sat down and dangled his legs in the bloody seawater.

Zhuoming blinked. “You'd be better off thinking up how to rope in your stray dogs. Your Miah clan leader hid so many of the Zhao family's things. It's not like the Luwu can't count. By this point, they may already have joined forces with the Lingyun Immortal Mountains to put out an arrest warrant for you.”

Wangge Luobao sighed. “Fate is against me.”

“Why aren’t you out looking for your stupid clansmen?”

“There’s no rush.” Wangge Luobao glanced at the wretched Miah cultivators in the distance. His voice was as low as the sea wind. “The Miah clan elders colluded with outsiders, committed an open betrayal, kept evil cultivators in their pay, damaged the Lingyun Mountains’ veins of the earth, and left countless people destitute and homeless. As one of the evil cultivators in their pay, will I be able to convince the general public among my clan? They’ll also hate me.”

Zhuoming moved one of his eyeballs to the side of his face and looked at Wangge Luobao. “What do you mean?”

“The immortal mountains have suffered such a heavy loss. They won’t let it rest at that. If the Luwu come to see them over the matter of the Zhao family, the immortal mountains will have even more reason to launch an attack against the Miah. If I return when they’ve vented most of their wrath, my clansmen will naturally know who they need to follow to survive.”

Zhuoming gave a sharp laugh. “Ha, you truly are number one in wicked designs among the southern barbarians.”

Wangge Luobao was unmoved. He spread his hand. “As for the Luwu, they’re certain to come to the Lingyun Mountains, because among the items the clan elders hid, I found this.”

CHAPTER 160 - Flower in the Mirror (3)

This was an antiquity, a small, palm-sized bronze mirror, likely the vital weapon of some deceased cultivator. It had faint traces of a Way of the Heart on it. But it was evident that the former owner's cultivation hadn't been high, not exceeding the middle established foundation stage.

What was so interesting about a dead established foundation's scrap relic?

But Zhuoming, floating in the sea like a corpse, slowly sat up straight. His misplaced eyes even returned to their original positions.

A lotus stalk reached out of the seawater like a snake and snatched the bronze mirror. There was a flash of spiritual light, and the mirror reflected a vague map. The surrounding seawater also seemed to have been disturbed. Tiny eddies swirled up in it.

Wangge Luobao said, "We southern barbarians have limited knowledge. What does Sanyue's proper immortal say—is this...the legendary Territory Map of Great Wan?"

"Of course not, do you think an established foundation can shoulder the Territory Map of Great Wan? Not even Zhao Yin had that authority—anyway, the original was destroyed long ago by the Southern Sage."

Zhuoming pressed himself up against the bronze mirror. After his fit just now, he was temporarily normal for a while. “It’s said that Zhao Yin once fell into the Territory Map and assimilated a part of it into his Way of the Heart. This must have been passed down to his kinsmen through his Way of the Heart.”

“Tsk. Other families’ inheritances are pearl and jade ware at most, while their family has a Way of the Heart,” Wangge Luobao said, laughing. “Amazing, worthy of a great family of Xuanyin.”

“All those Zhaos made it as one of Xuanyin’s four great families purely thanks to their high birthrate. Each generation of them is worse than the one before. Never mind fumbling around for their own Way of the Heart, it’s rare for them to be accomplished enough to go out and find someone else’s. When those good-for-nothings establish foundations, each one of them has a vestige of their ancestor.”

As he spoke, a small lotus seal appeared on the surface of the bronze mirror. As the seal dispersed, the bronze mirror turned to slag, which was sucked up by a mouth on a lotus stalk.

Zhuoming smacked his lips. “Tsk, a chicken rib—is this the only one you found? Are there more?”

“There are many.”

Wangge Luobao blew a whistle. A number of Miah cultivators carried a big box over in response. Inside, it was piled full of all kinds of immortal tools. There was a rattle as it was put down. The box was overflowing. Quite a few immortal tools fell out.

Each of these items had once been the vital item that a cultivator committed their life to, that had been tied to their thoughts. After death, like their distinguished nameless owners, they were heaped together like junk, tossed around by the “evil cultivators” and “southern barbarians” they had regarded as lower classes of person.

“The legends about the Territory Map sound truly bizarre,” Wangge Luobao said. “The reflection of the spiritual veins...does that make it the reflection of the spiritual mountains? And that reflection wouldn’t be ‘tamed.’ It ran off as soon as it came into the world, and its every tremor shook the roots of the spiritual mountains, as if that Red-Eyed Yu had latched onto the spiritual mountains’ shadow.”

Zhuoming didn’t so much as glance up. “What’s so strange about that? People have shadows, so why can’t spiritual mountains have shadows? The spiritual mountains are far filthier than you imagine—the work of the sages, the shelter of the people, bah! Everything high-sounding is contemptible, the grander the dirtier. Aren't your Shu's Lingyun Mountains and South Sea Hidden Realm more of the same ugliness?"

Wangge Luobao sensed that he was implying something. "Wait, are you saying that the 'Territory Map' the Southern Sage destroyed is probably like the South Sea Hidden Realm? It's also a hidden realm?"

"How would I know? It's some grubby history from thousands of years ago." Zhuoming leaned against the immortal tools inside the box. "The history books wouldn't record anything disgraceful."

Having said this, he started picking and choosing, selecting the Ways of the Heart in good condition and "eating" them as if he were munching on melon seeds, even providing commentary as he ate.

"The Zhaos really do have monotonous ways. Apart from a few medicine and toolmaking Ways of the Heart thrown in like props, they've pretty much all followed after Zhao Yin. Inheriting their ancestor's Ways of the Heart without a second thought—it's no wonder the tree fell and the monkeys scattered as soon as Zhao Yin died."

"This one is different... Bah, this one died by losing their mind."

“And this one, too... Hss, is there some flaw in their family’s bloodline? They can only choose among a few Ways of the Heart, and if they choose a different one, they lose their minds?”

“I advise you not to taste the ones who didn’t follow the path of their clan.” Wangge Luobao leaned languorously against the box. “That sort, unless their family background is perfect, and they’re talented themselves, they’re certain to be pushed out to the fringes of their clan. What worthwhile resources can they have?”

As Zhuoming sucked up the Ways of the Heart in the relics, he freed up an eye for him. “Are you being reasonable again?”

Wangge Luobao said, smiling, “Since time immemorial, groups of people with a great deal of curiosity and a love for new things have been like scattered sand, prone to internal conflict. A big clan like the Zhaos, with thousands of years of history, its branches scattered through every part of the country but still maintaining its identity, must be extremely close-knit and isolationist, with the ones holding power in the clan already old hidebound walking corpses. Old walking corpses only like young walking corpses. Those who are daring enough to rebel must all carefully weigh their opponents.”

Zhuoming, sneering, said, “Wow, there speaks the experience of steering southern barbarians.”

“That’s right. That’s why my Miah clan won’t allow those steam-belching iron monsters and factories to establish a presence in the Three Islands, and, apart from weapons of self-defense, won’t permit those iron tools to destroy the rules of my clan’s ancestors.” Getting to his feet, Wangge Luobao said, “There is hidden intent behind Moon Plated Gold. The Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon upsets the environment. The Xiuyi kiss the asses of the Chu and the Wan, parroting their ideas, and the rich and powerful congratulate themselves on having friends in Great Wan’s Jinping. They forget their own origins...they simply ought to be killed. Listen to this.”

At this point, Wangge Luobao suddenly raised his voice. In the melancholy ancient Miah language, he began to sing a mourning song.

It wasn’t only the Xiuyi who loved to sing. Among the Miah, it was even more common for people to have good voices, and they rarely sang alone. They were particular about joining in when you heard singing. Even if a courting couple were singing a love song, if a passerby heard, they still had to help out with a few notes of backup.

When the Miah cultivators on the island heard his voice, no matter what they were doing, they all stopped.

Hoist my brother's bones, return the beautiful pearls...

As more and more voices joined in, the atmosphere changed little by little.

The originally lingering and sorrowful mourning song began to turn ferocious. When the Miah cultivators sang accented syllables, they pounded the ground heavily with their hands or feet.

Pearl, please do not weep.

Boom—boom—

Weave a pair of gloves, I will raise my brother's knife.

Boom—boom—

It was as if they had all formed a resonance with the song. Little by little, they all turned and faced north—the direction of the western continent.

Even a person who didn't understand a single word of the Miah language would have been able to guess the grief and hatred in the singing from these people's expressions.

Wangge Luobao, leading the song, had easily provoked the Miah cultivators' emotions. He looked down and seemed to inadvertently meet Zhuoming's eye. There wasn't a trace of a spark or any anger in those odd-colored eyes; rather, they held self-satisfied derision, as if he were showing off: You see, it's not that I'm deluding the people with lies; this is the will of the people.

Zhuoming pulled a long face and slowly digested the Way of the Heart of another immortal tool. He thought, I'd heard that the way of beast-taming often turns out assholes, and sure enough, this guy really is bad news.

Suddenly, Zhuoming stopped eating. He sank his consciousness into the thousand hearts and hundred ways of the lotus roots. He found that the "chicken ribs" he had been gobbling up for fun had gradually formed a recognizable picture.

This group of Zhaos came from Southern Wan's Guzhou and Ning'an, and Ning'an wasn't much more than a hundred li from Jinping.

The Territory Map he had put together seemed to be precisely the area of Ning'an and Jinping.

Zhuoming's eyes slowly opened wide. His head turned upside down. The corners of his mouth reached up to his temples.

The word was that...the most luxurious, most yearned-for city of Jinping, which could pull the tide of the whole continent effortlessly, had a Dragon Vein that wasn't very stable.

The den of the Kaiming and the Luwu was also there. For over a decade, because of the Kaiming Department, Great Wan's domestic "evil cultivators" had practically been eliminated. Heaven's Design Pavilion's dog Pang had fixed up the borders until they were like impregnable fortresses. The other three nations had suffered at the Luwu's hands for a long time, yet they still didn't dare to imitate rich and arrogant Southern Wan in opening their doors to a large quantity of common cultivators.

If they knew there was a means of crossing the borders and going straight for Jinping...

Would the three great spiritual mountains think it was more important to punish the "evil" that hadn't been fully eliminated after all these years, or would they think it was a higher priority to drag down Southern Wan, which refused to play by the rules?

He thought Jinping also had one of the Misty Willow's roots.

“Lao Wang, Lao Wang, stop leading the chorus in mourning.” Zhuoming stuck his head out of the sea. “After this event in the South Sea, no matter what prejudices the four great spiritual mountains have, I figure that they’ll make an attempt to hold their noses and collaborate, work together to hunt down all us evil cultivators. Rather than wait for that, wouldn’t it be better if we struck first?”

Xuanyin Mountain’s Latent Cultivation Temple, above the clouds.

By the ninth day Xi Ping stood guard outside the protective screen the princess had left behind, the vertebrae and ribs that had been broken by the great mountain array had healed.

Duanrui’s protective screen only blocked interference from the outside world. She hadn’t put much strength into it, and it certainly wouldn’t have been harder to break through than the great mountain array. With Xi Ping’s current cultivation level, he in fact wouldn’t have had a hard time breaking it if he’d wanted to.

But when Duanrui had left, she had only given Xi Ping a calm look, as if to say, “You’re just in time.” Without reinforcing that protective screen in any way, she had floated up, returning to the Principal Peak and her own business.

A Way of the Heart was a path of no return. Once a Way of the Heart was complete, it couldn't be broken; if it broke, the person would be finished.

When an established foundation cultivator's Way of the Heart was first completed, the boundary would be unstable; they would be at their weakest. Even if Xi Ping was dying to charge in and throw a tantrum like he had when he was little, ask ten thousand "why"s, all he could do now was stand guard and save the princess the trouble.

Xi Ping didn't move a muscle, as if he had become a rock on the mountaintop. No one knew what he was thinking.

On the evening of the ninth day, the spiritual light and rosy glow on the mountaintop suddenly gathered into a thread pointing to the place where Zhou Ying was in seclusion. Then a faint sound reached Xi Ping on the wind. It was the protective screen Duanrui had left behind breaking. The person inside had left seclusion.

The superimposed light swept over Xi Ping's eyes. His eyelashes trembled, as if he were waking from a dream.

Then the next moment, without waiting to see Zhou Ying, he turned tail and ran, as if he would run into a ghost if he lingered for a moment.

Only when he was once again intercepted head-on by the great mountain array did Xi Ping in his agitation remember to take the disciple name token out of his mustard seed. He tumbled into Xuanyin Mountain's inner sect practically in a panic.

The sound of an ascended spirit battering down the "door" had made all the auspicious animals in the Latent Cultivation Temple bristle. Zhou Ying had naturally heard it, but he had been entirely unmoved, as if it had been only an impetuous bird flying past the window.

He opened a pair of entirely new eyes. He beheld the mountains and waters as though he were the universe. Clamorous noises and colors passed through his senses and no longer vexed him.

A stack of letters from the Kaiming Department and the Luwu awaiting his response had accumulated. Zhou Ying paid no attention to them. His eyes fell on the note Duanrui had left behind.

Princess Duanrui had written: I am incapable of guiding you. You must explore this way yourself.

Zhou Ying was entirely unsurprised. He shredded the note and took a brocade box from the mustard seed he carried.

Before entering the Latent Cultivation Temple, he had emptied the mustard seed of everything, including the reincarnation wood, giving all of it to Bai Ling for safekeeping. All he had brought with him was this one thing.

The lock on the box was called a “conscience-examining lock.” It was only a common open-eyed grade immortal tool—little different from a mundane “cypher lock” that could only be opened with the matching cypher; it only had a few extra embellishments.

When he touched the lock, a line of text appeared above the box: The way of clarity’s Way of the Heart is utterly sincere. It does not practice self-deception. A thing either is, or it is not.

Zhou Ying said, “Yes.”

The old writing above the box disappeared at his answer. The cypher that needed to be matched appeared: In fact, the way of clarity and unfeeling is not among the so-called “three thousand paths of the Great Way of the spiritual mountains,” yes or no?

Zhou Ying paused. Then he gently tapped out spiritual energy, erasing all the writing except for the “yes.”

The cypher sank into the immortal tool. There was a click. The conscience-examining lock was gone. The brocade box opened. Inside the box was a thick stack of notes, hundreds upon thousands, all of them with spiritual energy attached.

Zhou Ying didn't riffle through them. Now that his emotions had been sealed, it seemed that even his curiosity had vanished. But one of the notes was swept up by the preserved spiritual energy. As if it had come to life, it jumped out on its own and landed in his hand.

On it was his own handwriting: Duanrui cannot lead you. You might as well try finding the heart demon seed and using it to refine your Way of the Heart.

When Zhou Ying had read it, the slip of paper dissolved automatically. He waited patiently for a moment. No second slip of paper flew out of the box. So he calmly closed the little box and put it back into his mustard seed.

When he came to the window, Zhou Ying looked in the direction of Xuanyin's inner sect.

After establishing a foundation, his vexatious spiritual sense had become over a hundred times stronger than before. Had he entered a different way, it would have been difficult for him to maintain spiritual clarity when he opened his eyes. He supposed that the Heartless Lotus had gone entirely insane then.

But the way of clarity and unfeeling was precisely capable of making all that passed through a person's senses ephemeral as mist, completely changing that excessively acute spiritual sense into a mere tool.

Zhou Ying "saw" at a glance the faint demonic energy spreading through Xuanyin's thirty-six peaks.

The heart demon in the Impassable Sea was dead. Only this seed that Zhou Kun had stolen remained. It had at first been hidden in the Impassable Sea. Then it had been unwittingly brought along by the three high elders, directly leading to the Dignitary of Rites Zhao Yin passing away.

A heart demon was a fairly powerful thing; whether ascended spirit or shed skin, if you picked up a trace of it, even if you wouldn't die, it would still peel off a layer of skin. But at the same time, it was also very "weak." Once a person became alert and noticed it, it was easy for its traces to be exposed. Xuanyin's masters inspected their Ways of the Heart every day; they weren't befuddled mortals. Yet eight years after Zhao Yin's death, they had yet to find that heart demon seed hidden among the Xuanyin Mountains... That didn't make sense.

Zhou Ying pondered objectively and without a trace of judgment: so the heart demon seed that had come up the mountains with the three elders in the first place must have taken root in a place that everyone thought was impossible.

Zhou Ying turned his gaze toward Xuanyin's Principal Peak. His special eyes allowed him to see the Bell of Tribulation concealed above the Principal Peak.

The great immortal tool of the mountains, said to punish all evil it met, was making no sound, but it was quivering every moment, like a fierce beast with drooping eyelids ready to open its mouth and snap its jaws.

Zhou Ying sent a Heavenly Question, asking Princess Duanrui whether he could come cultivate on the Principal Peak for a time.

Just then, another letter from Bai Ling flew in through the window. Zhou Ying waved a hand and pressed it down, tossing it unopened into a corner with the other letters.

He was no longer interested in the mundane trifles of the Kaiming and the Luwu. They only took care of things for the immortal mountains. Since the immortal mountains had given no instructions, he wasn't going to bother to read the letter. It would suffice for Bai Ling to deal with it himself.

On the Lingyang River, a puffing Jinping Day Cruise boat had just set out. The scattered shoals of fish reassembled, mouths opening and closing as they ate the algae at the bottom of the river.

Suddenly, a strange lotus stalk reached out from the sparse aquatic plants at the bottom of the river. Some fish with poor vision were lured over. Blood spread faintly outward.

But the Lingyang River was full of stains left by people and bubbles spat out by steamboats. That trace of blood quickly vanished.

CHAPTER 161 - Flower in the Mirror (4)

The lotus stalk went on to burrow into the waterway, trying to spread into the surroundings. When it had only infected a small portion of the aquatic plants around it, it touched something, and the bronze bells of the Azure Dragon Heart Tower rang in response. A beam of spiritual light flashed, burning away that lotus stalk.

Almost at once, a walker in the mortal world wearing a stealth talisman appeared beside the Lingyang River, reported his location, and sent a message to Heaven's Design Pavilion's head office: "Some filth just disturbed the Heart Tower, I don't know what, a little like a snake... It's been destroyed. But there seems to be a tear in the spiritual vein underwater. Please send someone from the head office to have a look."

"Strange," the walker in the mortal world muttered to his colleague on duty at the head office, carefully avoiding the workers and tourists jostling beside the river, "why have the Azure Dragon Towers been constantly ringing here and there lately, picking out small holes in the spiritual veins? It's as if someone's snooping on the city. Who's biting off more than they can chew thinking they can attack Jinping?"

"Could be plenty of people. The spiritual stones being two or three times cheaper than in other countries alone is enough to make those evil cultivators go red-eyed and run the risk,” his colleague responded. “Last month, we collaborated with the Yuzhou Department and caught a bunch of Chu wearing spiritual image masks. Didn’t they stop to think who invented the spiritual image masks? Don’t worry, there isn’t a more peaceful place in the world than Jinping.”

While with people coming and going and machinery roaring, minute tears were unavoidable, it would be absolutely impossible for evil cultivators and foreign spies to make much of these small holes—before, the Dragon Vein had had to wait for the inner sect to send someone to repair it during the year of the Grand Selection. Since the rule that “walkers in the mortal world cannot establish foundations” had disappeared, Great Wan’s Dragon Vein and all the spiritual veins everywhere could be repaired as soon as a flaw was discovered. Jinping’s Dragon Vein had broken, but it had been repaired by the Dignitary of Fate High Elder himself. Unless a shed skin master fell out of the sky, with the whole capital enveloped by the Azure Dragon Towers, not even a single suspicious fly could get in.

“I hope so. Do the Luwu have a grip on it? How come they’ve been acting like they’ve lost their souls ever since Prince Zhuang left...?” The walker in the mortal world lowered his voice to grumble, “I haven’t even been back ‘home’ for a month.” He exchanged greetings with the colleague who had come to inspect the spiritual vein and returned to the Heart Tower.

In the South Sea, a Territory Map rubbing one zhang square was spread out over the surface of the water. Zhuoming had just buried himself entirely in that map, spying on Jinping through the rubbing.

Out of nowhere, the lotus stalks he had left hanging out withered and burned. Wangge Luobao knew that he had once again run into the Azure Dragon Towers, so he gathered spiritual energy in the fingers of one hand, reached into the Territory Map rubbing, and scooped Zhuoming out.

During the Zhao clan's rebellion, nearly all the elites who held authority over the Territory Map had met their ends inside the country. From those who had gone into exile abroad, it was hard to reassemble the glory of their ancestor. All the immortal tools that the Miah had turned up were established foundation grade. The Way of the Heart of a cultivator who had died as an established foundation had fewer benefits than a chicken heart, so the Zhaos had used these things like ordinary immortal tools.

In order to put together this small map, Zhuoming had eaten raw the vital immortal tools of sixty-four deceased cultivators. The most distant owner had died over nine hundred years ago, and the most recent had established a foundation only when the Zhao clan had rebelled and left the country. Even for the Heartless Lotus, this was still a rather tall order. By the end, Zhuoming seemed to have started babbling in incoherent Wan language.

With profound melancholy, Wangge Luobao watched the lotus stalks tie themselves into knots underwater, feeling that this unhinged associate's brain had even more screws loose now; he might be about to fall apart. "Are you all right? Take your time, haste makes waste. Why are you always in such a rush?"

Zhuoming and all the mouths covering his body strove to outdo each other in delivering a lengthy harangue in a language that was a cross between Chu and Wan.

It was less comprehensible than an ensemble of frogs after the rain. Wangge Luobao, exasperated, pursed his lips and whistled. The sharp whistle usually used to herd gold-armored zheng pierced the Heartless Lotus's spirit. Zhuoming gave a start, his ears falling into the water from fright. Only after a long moment were they fished out by two dripping lotus stalks.

"Excuse me, Zhuoming-xiong," said Wangge Luobao, "could you use language that an ordinary fool like me can understand?"

"I heard a piece of information." Zhuoming's eyes were fixed dead ahead. He spoke with emphasis. "The Kaiming Department's Zhou Ying. He's entered the way of clarity."

The corner of Wangge Luobao's eye twitched slightly.

The mouths on the heartless lotuses opened, ready to wail along with him.

“Shut up!” Zhuoming berated himself. Lowering his voice, he said, “He still holds power over the Luwu, but the way of clarity is special. A person’s frame of mind will change drastically after entering it. He’s just established a foundation and must avoid trifling matters of the mortal world. A one-of-a-kind opportunity, not to be missed.”

As he neared the end of his words, his voice, like a kettle about to boil, became faster and faster, sharper and sharper. Eerily, he repeated “A one-of-a-kind opportunity, not to be missed” seven or eight times. The heartless lotuses underwater erupted.

Wangge Luobao, hearing the sound of boiling water, was ready. In a flash, he was elsewhere. With a wave of the hand, he created a protective screen for himself and his clansmen behind him, in time to block the tidal wave raised by the heartless lotuses.

The Miah were used to this—they all regarded Zhuoming as a spiritual beast their mighty new clan leader was domesticating.

Watching Zhuoming acting like a sea monster, some Miah cultivators ran over and asked, “Clan leader, did he eat something bad? Why is he having another fit?”

“He just heard that a monster like him got something that he’s failed over and over to get.” Wangge Luobao put a finger to his lips. “He’s crazy with jealousy. Everyone, be careful. Stay away from him.”

But people have different joys and sorrows.

Xi Ping fled in a panic. After escaping from the Latent Cultivation Temple, he headed straight for Flying Jade Peak—he truly had nowhere else to go.

His parents had grown old. He was afraid he wouldn’t be able to control his expression and would upset them.

Bai Ling wouldn’t be feeling any better than he was. It was better not to see him.

Of his old friends in Jinping, whether mortals or walkers in the mortal world, all of them had drifted away from him. He wasn’t in the mood to reminisce about that distant past in the midst of their many speculations.

As for A-Xiang, the young mistress, and Li Queru... All of them called him “Tai Sui.”

Flying Jade Peak was sealed. The mountain seal could block even the gaze of a shed skin high elder, but before Xi Ping, it was as if it didn't exist. By the time he came back to himself and remembered that there was such a thing as a "mountain seal," he had already landed wholly unhindered on the slope amid thickly falling snow.

There had been no sign of humans on Flying Jade Peak for over a decade. He put down the first set of footprints.

In that moment, Xi Ping's heart, blown numb by the stiff wind on the mountaintop in the Latent Cultivation Temple, sprang a leak. Nearly all his unreasoning sense of grievance spilled out.

He lowered his head and tightly clenched his teeth. First, he used his consciousness to block the shard of Zhaoting in his spirit off completely. Then, facing the ice and snow at his feet, he manipulated his already frozen features bit by bit, forcing a careless expression onto them.

"Shizun!" With the cold of the snow-capped mountain, Xi Ping fixed that "high-spirited" expression in place. Stepping on his sword, he rode the biting cold northwest wind. "I'm back!"

The little mustard seed house teacher and disciple had lived in before was still in its original location, buried nearly to the roof in snow. The cottage and yard had vanished long ago, blown somewhere by the north wind.

Xi Ping followed Zhi Xiu's aura, searching, using all his strength to pretend that his step and his voice were equally light. "With all the forces of evil running wild in the South Sea, the old bastards took a look and finally thought that compared to them, my crimes weren't so bad as to merit being broken into eight hundred pieces. They gave me back my name token trying to enlist my services... Damn it, they have the final word in everything. While I can't overpower them, it really makes me mad to see them, so I've come to hide out here with you and curse a little, or else I'm afraid I won't be able to control myself and do something disgraceful on impulse... Hey, I..."

An astral wind coming out of nowhere swept toward him. At first Xi Ping thought it was shifu chiding him for his insolent remarks and only mischievously dodged a direct hit, accepting the blow like he was used to doing. Only when the wind was right in front of him did he realize with a start that something was wrong.

Xi Ping abruptly twisted in midair, the protective spiritual light around him flaring up. There was a crisp sound. The harsh sword energy carried by the wind unexpectedly pierced the hastily raised protective spiritual energy, its remnants breaking his hair crown.

Xi Ping's hair, loosed from its binding, tumbled down to the backs of his knees, while he himself slanted for several zhang before finally steadying himself in midair—this was wrong; shifu never went all out chiding him.

With a flash, his figure merged with the wind. At the same time, Zhi Xiu's voice echoed over Flying Jade Peak: "Shiyong, stay away..."

But an ascended spirit's movements were far faster than speech. In an instant, Xi Ping had followed his voice to the other side of the snow-capped mountain.

Before he could understand what was going on, a constriction that blotted out the sky hit him head on. All the hair on the back of Xi Ping's neck stood on end. There was no room for him to resist. Something flung him out of the air and down onto the ground. He fell into snow that went over his waist.

All his senses seemed to be blocked. For a time, Xi Ping couldn't catch his breath. He felt like a carrot that had been wedged into the earth by a shovel.

Just then, the almost mournful whistle of a sword tore through the sky. Xi Ping's whole body lightened. He finally opened his eyes—and was struck dumb.

With the sword platform where Zhi Xiu often spent time refining his sword aura as a focus, for a hundred li around, on the whole slope, all the protruding rocks had been pared flat. The ground was covered in crisscrossing sword cuts, the deepest of them too deep to see the bottom.

The sword aura was awe-inspiring. Had Xi Ping not already been an ascended spirit, just one glance at those cuts might have shattered his spirit.

This was no place for quietly cultivating in seclusion. This was an ancient battlefield, the site of an all-out close combat.

Xi Ping gasped...but before the breath could reach his chest, he was choked by the frosty northwest wind.

The nameless heavenly might that had just “planted” him in the ground descended once again. The blood vessels nearly exploded on his temples.

As for what this heavenly might was, Xi Ping was not yet qualified to “hear.”

It was only that he had never known that the nape of his neck was so soft. No matter what, he couldn't raise his head. As a so-called “person in the high heavens,” at this moment, each and every one of his joints, every bit of his meridians was firmly pressed down. Never mind bursting out into resistance, he didn't even have the latitude to take a deep breath and shout.

The sword light once again stabbed through the oppressive sky. The cold wind suddenly pouring in nearly wrung his neck. He coughed.

Zhi Xiu's voice came amid the echoes of the sword's whistle. He was a little out of breath, but despite this, his tone still maintained its old mildness.

“Why are you still standing there like a fool? Go now, while you can. If you want to curse someone, go curse them yourself on the other side of the mountain... Don't let me hear you cursing my shifu.”

Xi Ping didn't move. He turned his face up to the sky. As if his strength were exhausted, he fell backward into the piled snow. “Shifu, where filial piety is concerned, you can be held up as a model disciple.”

“Rebellious disciple,” said Zhi Xiu, “go...”

Before he could finish the last word, a fresh round of heavenly might pressed down on Flying Jade Peak.

Xi Ping's pupils contracted sharply. This time, lying on his back, he vividly sensed the blatant attitude of brooking no disobedience.

This heavenly might wasn't aimed at him. He only caught the edge of it. Yet Xi Ping could hardly keep himself from starting to tremble. Next, the unruly sword struck the boundless canopy of heaven. The scattering sword energy was tattered by the snow-capped mountain, then brushed past Xi Ping, but he not only didn't dodge, he couldn't even bring himself to blink.

He watched the sword light rise in defiance of the universe's chaos and be annihilated time after time, fearing neither the living nor the dead.

Past midnight, the heavenly might became increasingly violent. Zhi Xiu had no more attention to spare for him. Flurries of snow shot up high. Falling for half the night, they buried Xi Ping, who couldn't move a muscle.

The sound of stone fracturing pierced through the snow, earsplitting.

Xi Ping didn't know how many times he had been knocked unconscious by the shaking. When he awoke, the horrifying heavenly might had temporarily calmed, as if heaven itself had grown weary.

The dense clouds dispersed over deadly silent Flying Jade Peak, revealing stars and a moon that seemed within arm's reach.

Xi Ping's mind was a blank. It was a long time before he remembered where he was. Next, he gave a start of terror. He couldn't sense Zhi Xiu's aura anymore, neither on the snow-capped mountain nor in the shard of Zhaoting in his spirit!

“Shifu!” Xi Ping panicked. He laboriously “plucked” himself from the snow, then scrambled up, trying to fly his sword into the sky.

But no matter what grade it was, no sword would dare to pass through this horrifying sword array. Frantic, Xi Ping simply tossed aside the useless piece of metal and climbed up the mountain on foot. He passed through floating ice and was repeatedly sent flying by the remaining sword energy in the sword cut. By the time he came within a hundred meters of the sword platform, he could hardly move forward.

Xi Ping raised a hand to summon the Tai Sui Qin, planning to force his way through. Before he could strike, his gaze froze.

Friendly moonlight fell on the snow. Among the crisscrossing sword cuts, he had seen a small sapling.

The trunk of the small sapling was snow-white. What ought to have been an upright tree was crooked and bent—it had been broken innumerable times by the wind and snow, even pulled up by the roots. Its root system was spread very far. Only a small portion remained on the surface. There were no leaves or branches, but...it glowed in the moonlight. It was alive.

Xi Ping, holding the Tai Sui Qin, slowly knelt. He held his breath, gazing almost piously at that unthinkable sapling.

After a long while, he tried raising his frozen hands and using the gentlest of melodies to transfer spiritual energy. The music of the qin brushed the dusting of snow off the tree. After a long moment, a new shoot grew on the tree. It unfurled in the moonlight, like a fairytale.

The dim shard of Zhaoting in Xi Ping's spirit at last showed signs of life. An extremely weary voice said, "...Good child, finally there's something other than elopements in your head. As your teacher, I am deeply gratified."

Xi Ping wiped the snow and water off his face. Shards of ice clung to his brows and lashes. His eyes seemed to flash with a peculiar light.

"Shifu," he said softly, as if afraid to disturb that shoot, "what kind of tree are you growing?"

"Newly born accompanying plants are all ones that did not previously exist in the world. It has no name," Zhi Xiu said softly, conserving his strength.

"What do you think of 'snow shuffler'?"

Xi Ping: "..."

Zhi Xiu laughed somewhat laboriously. “A cheap name means it will be easy to care for.”

As he laughed, the sapling shook gently. A newly-grown tender leaf fell and flew into Xi Ping’s hand.

The leaf was very thin, diamond-shaped, somewhat resembling a birch leaf. It was too fragile. Xi Ping held it with his frozen fingers spread apart, not daring to touch it carelessly.

“Take it as a wellness talisman. The Dignitary of Fate High Elder has been waiting for you outside Flying Jade Peak for a long time. It is rude to make your elders wait,” Zhi Xiu said softly. “Don’t be afraid.”

“Who’s afraid of him?” Xi Ping scoffed. But his sneer was fleeting. He lowered his head and gazed at that new leaf. He felt desolate. The snow-capped mountain felt even colder to him. “It’s just that I...suddenly remembered what you said to me before I left the mountain back then...”

Shiyong, the Great Way leads to heaven. There are no family and friends on that road.

“What did I say? It’s been years. I’ve forgotten.”

Xi Ping was silent.

Then Zhi Xiu continued, laughing, “It’s not important. I’ve said lots of things. When haven’t you treated my words like the wind blowing past your ears, you fiend?”

Xi Ping was stunned for a long time. For some reason, the gloom that had been stifling him for several days suddenly eased.

Once again, he looked at that tender sapling. “Shifu, I think that...it shouldn’t be like this.”

“What a coincidence,” said Zhi Xiu. “I think so, too.”

So, bearing a thousand tribulations, they would go on fighting with their backs to the wall.

The new leaf burrowed into the Tai Sui Qin, leaving a tiny outline below the qin’s name. Zhi Xiu said, “Go on.”

“Yes, shifu. I have understood the lesson.”

Xi Ping took a final glance at the sword platform, then turned and flew off—after all these years, shizun had yet to impart knowledge successfully, but he had indeed always transmitted wisdom and resolved his doubts.

The rules of heaven said that evil cultivators could not be ascended spirits, yet Qiu Sha had painted the moon red.

The rules of heaven said that there would be no more accompanying plants after the Great War of Gods and Demons, yet that snow-white tree had sprouted in the spiritual mountains.

The rules of heaven said that a Way of the Heart was irreversible, that once you started, you could only walk that one path—did it really have to be that way? Did a person really have to be driven and enslaved by a “way”?

He went faster and faster. In his spirit, from the distant South Sea Hidden Realm, he heard Wei Chengxiang’s voice.

Two ke earlier, Wei Chengxiang had narrowly dodged a fireball belched out by a spiritual beast, then abruptly swooped down on her sword, lancing into the depths of the dense forest. The carnivorous spiritual beast behind her opened its mouth wide. Its fireball instantly raised dense smoke in the rainforest. The fierce beast’s line of sight was momentarily obstructed.

Just then, a big crowd of Turmoilers charged out in the dense forest. Each one held a hand cannon that had been turned into a downgraded immortal tool. Li Manlong gave an order, and the spiritual beast, which had just come in firing range of the hand cannons, was shot as full of holes as a sieve. It came crashing down—Wei Chengxiang rolled lithely on the ground, then bounced up. A talisman came flying to snap the big bird's neck.

The fierce beast that had been burning the Turmoilers' domain for the last half month had been killed by them pooling their forces. Wei Chengxiang gulped a deep breath. From midair, she saw those abandoned people hugging each other like a ritual.

Suddenly, one of the Turmoilers went weak at the knees and fell onto her companion. Wei Chengxiang was startled and quickly leapt down from the sky.

“What's wrong with A-He?” She had spent a long time with the Turmoilers and could tell them all apart. She could easily come up with their names.

The Turmoiler named A-He was surrounded by concerned companions. Li Manlong trotted over to examine her.

After a moment, he slowly raised his head. There seemed to be tears in his exposed eyes.

Wei Chengxiang had never seen him with an expression like this. She was alarmed. “Don't worry, Chief Li, I'll contact Dandan, have her find medicine in Tao County...”

Li Manlong interrupted her softly. “Wei-laoban, she’s carrying...our new clansman in her womb.”

Wei Chengxiang’s eyes opened wide.

Everyone’s eyes fell on A-He’s skinny, flat lower abdomen. After a moment of utter silence, someone let out a scream with all their might toward the dense forest.

This cry called back their souls. They began to stamp their feet and howl. Some smiled stupidly, some wept bitterly—in two hundred years, this was the first child among them who would be born with the nourishment of the spiritual mountains. He or she would escape the curse of the Turmoilers, grow up to be an ordinary person...become what the people of He had been in the past.

The weather in Shu changed rapidly. A cloud floated over the sky. The Turmoilers hastily raised big plantain leaves, shielding the pregnant woman from the rain.

Wei Chengxiang raised her head toward the sudden rain and clasped the reincarnation wood hanging from her neck. It seemed as though tears were streaming down her face.

CHAPTER 162 - Flower in the Mirror (5)

Flying Jade Peak had been only one of thirty-six peaks to begin with, but because there was a sword cultivator becoming a shed skin here, it had turned into something of a forbidden territory. From a distance you could sense the harsh mountain seal, more forbidding than either the Sea of Stars or the Discipline Hall.

The Xuanyin Mountains' two great shed skins—Lin Zongyi and Zhang Jue—were both kept well outside.

Lin Zongyi, hands behind his back, faced the fish belly pale dawn at the farthest reaches of the sky. In a rare occurrence, he spoke voluntarily: “Zhi Jingzhai entered the Way due to turbulence in the spiritual mountains. His progress has been quick, previously unheard of. When he has become a shed skin, there will be another upheaval in the cultivation world.”

The blindfolded Zhang Jue responded expressionlessly, “I am the Dignitary of Fate.”

Basically everything Lin Zongyi said was an assertion. When he was through asserting, he wasn't especially concerned with how others reacted. When he was contradicted by the Dignitary of Fate, he didn't dispute it. He was just about to replace his mouth seal.

Suddenly, the two of them simultaneously sensed something. Lin Zongyi looked into the distance and saw a youthful figure covered in frost and snow stroll out of Flying Jade Peak.

His hair crown had gone missing. His hair hung loose down his back. His robe was covered in slashes from a sharp weapon. His gait was unusually lax. While he evidently knew there were people waiting for him, he still wouldn't hurry up.

When he reached the mountain pass, he looked down and saw that one of his thin boots had frozen and cracked—he had come in haste and was still dressed in summer attire—so he simply kicked off both shoes. He had no sword. He stepped barefoot onto a tree branch and flew before two of the world's current shed skin sages. “Gentlemen, it has been a long time.”

Xuanyin Mountain's sect rules and general principles—“improve your body, mind, and morals, abstain from luxury, lust, and sloth”—were the first words written on a provisional disciple's selection card. Never mind encountering a high elder in the inner sect; even if you wore a blue robe in the outer sect, you still had to constantly examine yourself. Who would dare to act with such presumption and wantonness?

Lin Zongyi was the Dignitary of Rule. Restrictions and regulations were his purview. He frowned at once.

The newcomer—Xi Ping—noticed it right away. He met his eyes unflinchingly and gave him a rather provocative smile.

Lin Zongyi's displeasure deepened.

Zhang Jue waved a hand and said, "Yuan Hui's temperament was also like this. Their way..."

Xi Ping interrupted him languorously: "Whose way? I don't acknowledge any rotten bones with no one to bury them."

Lin Zongyi seemed to reach the end of his endurance. He broke his silence: "Xi Ping, impudence!"

Each of the Dignitary of Rule's words was weighty. These words fell onto Xi Ping, pressing down so hard his face turned white. The branch at his feet cracked.

But he only wavered once, then managed to steady himself.

Xi Ping had been hunted by a full moon sage, and he had just been planted in the snow for a night by heavenly might. He was boiling with ferocity. He directly engaged the shed skin elder in a dispute. With a fake smile, he said, “If Elder Lin truly can’t stand the sight, why doesn’t he do as Elder Zhang does and cover his eyes?”

Lin Zongyi’s sleeves moved on their own. The branch at Xi Ping’s feet turned to dust. He fell out of the air into the ground.

His fall left a hole in the ground, but Xi Ping didn’t seem hard-pressed at all—as long as he wasn’t hard-pressed, it was the other guy who’d be humiliated—he took the opportunity to sprawl out on his back and even crossed one leg over the other. Laughing, he said, “High elders, take care. Last time, thanks to your tender care, I got beaten to a near-ascended spirit. This time, if you beat me into a shed skin, I’ll have to fight back.”

Lin Zongyi’s slanting brows practically stood upright. Zhang Jue swept his sleeve and separated the two of them. “Dignitary of Rule.”

Lin Zongyi’s sleeves billowed out. He stared fixedly at Xi Ping for a long moment, then, without a word, pulled his mouth seal back into place and left with a flick of his sleeves.

Xi Ping watched him leave with slightly malicious ridicule and remembered the rumor in the street about the Dignitary of Rule High Elder—they said that Lin Zongyi was the first among Xuanyin Mountain's shed skins, with a will like iron and just as impartial, with the Yuntian Palace Discipline Hall in his charge. Because he stood so high, he viewed all living creatures as merely fulfilling their functions, taking no issue with anyone, as steady as a cultivator of the way of clarity.

It was said that this ancestor of the Lin clan was, of all those in the Xuanyin Mountains, the person closest to the "Great Way."

And now, with a couple of sentences, he had sent this "Great Way" running off in a rage.

Xi Ping slowly got up and, with highly artificial "astonishment," said to Zhang Jue, "Is the Dignitary of Rule Elder cultivating some kind of 'great pufferfish art'? How is it that in the decade or so since I last saw him, the venerable old fellow's temper has grown so much? I do hope he hasn't encountered some stumbling block."

How could Jingzhai have turned out a scoundrel like this?

Zhang Jue sighed to himself and said, mildly, "At the bottom of the Impassable Sea, he shattered your consciousness in a momentary slip.

Meeting you again in the immortal mountains, it is as though he has come face to face with his own error of judgment. Indeed, this matter touches on his Way of the Heart. Some testiness is inevitable.”

“Oh, so that’s what it is.” Xi Ping rolled up his ragged sleeves, picked up a broken stone, and flew up on it. There was only enough room on the stone for one foot, so he stood on one leg like a rooster. He said, “Here I thought it was because Elder Lin failed to get rid of me back then, and now that he’s had to hold his nose and call me back, it’s put him in a bad mood.”

Zhang Jue had been a shed skin for nearly a thousand years. Whether orthodox or evil, all who met him were struck with fear, filled with respect. This was his first time dealing with someone so completely indifferent. For a time, even he couldn’t avoid feeling a headache.

This was his first time finding that it was rather inconvenient not having Zhao Yin around anymore—the Xuanyin Mountains were missing their smooth talker.

“Let us go. Come down into the Sea of Stars with me.” Zhang Jue waved a hand at Xi Ping. Seeing that he had no lengthy remarks to deliver, he moderated his tone even further and said, “According to Xuanyin’s rules, after a disciple has become an ascended spirit, he may immediately complete his studies and take his place among the thirty-six peak masters.

As you have now...”

Before he could finish, he was interrupted by Xi Ping’s rude laughter.

The Dignitary of Fate instantly shut his mouth.

“You flatter me, you flatter me, I am truly overwhelmed by the favor.” As Xi Ping laughed, he waved his hand over and over. “The thirty-six peak masters...”

Before, when he had been a minor disciple who admired the immortal mountains, they had “eliminated evil” without considering his guilt. Now that he was a renowned shit-stirrer who could even receive an invitation to a meeting of the South Sea’s demon host, they wanted him to take his place among the thirty-six peak masters.

“That really beats anything, haha, no wonder the Dignitary of Rule Elder is as mad as a gourd.”

The Dignitary of Fate: “...”

He ought to put a seal over his mouth like the Dignitary of Rule.

Xi Ping shook the foot that was dangling in midair. “Also, just when did I say that I belonged to the Xuanyin Sect? I’m only a fiend from Flying Jade Peak. It’s up to my shizun to decide whether I’ve completed my studies. There’s no need for your sect to stick its nose in and meddle! ...Hey, Peak Master Wen! You’re on your way out? How have you been?”

Rosy Cloud Peak was next to Flying Jade Peak. Rosy Cloud Peak’s Peak Master Wen Fei had just been about to fly out on his sword when, to his surprise, he had seen that the Dignitary of Fate High Elder had left the Sea of Stars. He had hurriedly straightened his clothes and stood at attention. But before he could say hello, he was forced to overhear these heretical remarks.

Wen Fei was dumbfounded. He almost suspected there was something wrong with his ears. He thought, Where did this great monster come from? Damn it, he’s so arrogant! Wait, how does he know me? What peak did he say just now?

Once the two of them had gone by, Wen Fei turned into a comet, “plummeting” straight toward Moon Plated Peak.

The summit of Moon Plated Peak was no longer the isolated place it had been before, always closed off and declining visitors. Since Master Lin had left seclusion to make tools, it was as if all of Moon Plated Peak had taken on new life. Now, it wasn't yet daylight, and carts were already racing back and forth over the rails on the slopes.

Moon Plated Peak's carts were driven by arrays. They carried sample products up from the toolmaking disciples at the bottom of the mountain to line up for Lin Chi's inspection. Once he had inspected, if he had any objections, he would write a note and have the cart send the item back.

Wen Fei arrived outside the arrays at the summit of Moon Plated Peak like a streak of smoke. He waved his folding fan wildly, waving several dozen Master Lins toward Moon Plated Peak's array in a single breath. Finally, Lin Chi showed himself.

Master Lin had changed to a light grey robe. He waved a hand to open a hole in the array that had intercepted the uninvited guest. "Wen-shixiong, wh..."

Wen Fei landed in front of him, words quickly popping up on his fan: Was there a complication when you repaired Zhaoting for Zhi Jingzhai? Otherwise, with him always in seclusion and the mountain sealed, where would Flying Jade Peak have picked up such a great monster? Truly evil, I'm telling you, he challenged the Dignitary of Fate High Elder to his face, utterly fearless...

Lin Chi couldn't read so quickly. His eyes blurred from hopping around.
“Wait, slow down... What complication?”

Wen Fei said, A great monster with his clothes all in disarray has shown up on Flying Jade Peak! He shook his foot in front of the Dignitary of Fate High Elder!

Lin Chi went blank for a moment, touched something in his sleeve, then, unperturbed, led his guest inside. “Oh, he's back—Wen-shixiong, don't you remember, that's the direct disciple General Zhi took in.”

Wen Fei chased after him. Which direct disciple?

“What do you mean, which?” said Lin Chi. “Doesn't General Zhi only have one direct disciple? The one who let off those fireworks that brought down the north slope.”

As Flying Jade Peak's busybody good neighbor, of course Wen Fei had seen Xi Ping, but that had been fourteen years ago. Wen Fei only remembered that that boy was good-looking, sweet-talking, quite a lot of fun... It wasn't that Peak Master Wen had a bad memory for faces. Put anyone in his place, they wouldn't have been able to connect the charming boy from back then with the mysterious master who had just flown by on a rock.

The writing on Wen Fei's fan turned into wild, barely legible cursive: What do you mean "he's back"? Didn't Zhi Jingzhai's little disciple go into seclusion with him when the mountain was sealed? Anyway, that was an ascended spirit! Listen to me, is there such a thing as an ascended spirit under fifty? Tell me the truth, Master Lin, is Jingzhai dying? Did he use some evil art to transfer his whole lifetime's worth of cultivation to his disciple on his deathbed?!

Lin Chi: "..."

Xuanyin Mountain did not advocate the use of external objects in cultivation; the higher one's cultivation, the fewer opportunities there were to use elixirs; such that some medicine making masters did very little work themselves and spent all their time immersed in bizarre stories from the mortal world.

"Don't joke. A person isn't a sack. Cultivation isn't something that can be transferred," Lin Chi said. "It's a long story..."

Lin Chi had known Xi Ping for many years. Even though he hadn't gone out of his way to ask, from casual conversation, he had still picked up most of Xi Ping's story. So, covering up Hui Xiangjun's part as much as he could, he gave Wen Fei a rough explanation of the whole history. Then he picked up Wen Fei's dropped fan and handed it back to him. "The immortal mountains have acknowledged him, but the way he walks isn't orthodox, after all. Speaking of it openly would unavoidably cause dispute. You're on friendly terms with General Zhi, so let this matter stay with you. Don't tell others."

Wen Fei waved his fan slowly. For a long time, no more words popped up.

Finally, a line of writing haltingly passed over his fan: You're saying that the one who started all of this...that half-evil cultivator who provoked Jingzhai into leaving the mountain, the one who possessed a child...

Lin Chi said, "Was the former nominal general commander of Heaven's Design Pavilion, named Liang Chen. What a pity, he was once..."

Wen Fei waved a hand to interrupt him: That's not the important part—you said just now, there was a dragon in his shadow?

Lin Chi said, "He didn't obtain the complete Way of the Heart of the ungovernable way. He attempted to use Jinping's Dragon Vein to rebuild his body. Therefore, there was a dragon in his shadow. After all, you and I don't understand crooked techniques like this."

Wen Fei frowned, shaking his head. No...the imagery is highly inauspicious. You were in seclusion at the time and don't know—did you ever hear why a shed skin elder accepted a mortal as his disciple? Zhaoting began as mundane iron—did you ever hear how it became the Sword that Mended the Heavens?

Lin Chi froze.

Wen Fei said in a rush of writing on his fan: When Lancang invaded Jinping, I was still an established foundation disciple, part of the main workforce. Many mortals in the Jinping area were impacted by the battle. Either there were changes to their bodies, or their spiritual eyes were forced open. There was a need for a large quantity of open-eyed grade restorative pills. When the Dignitary of Fate High Elder went to repair the spiritual veins, he took me along—that was when I met Zhi Jingzhai. Guarding the borders and suppressing bandits are both drudge work. Naturally the Zhi family didn't amount to a distinguished line. They had no association whatsoever with Xuanyin's great families. But Elder Zhang took one look at him and asked whether he wanted to become his direct disciple. After being refused on the grounds of "My father and elder brother have aged, the nation is not yet secure," he said he would leave the position open for him. When he was through with matters in the mortal world, he could enter the sect directly.

Lin Chi thought, What's so unusual about that?

Master Lin thought everyone was impressive, and as for Zhi Xiu, an ascended spirit after a century and a shed skin at two hundred, able to subdue a disciple like Xi Shiyong, Lin Chi looked up to him as a god. The strange thing would be for a god to be left out in the dust of the mortal world.

Then he saw a line of writing flash across Wen Fei's fan: For those in the medicine making way like me, it is necessary to be able to see where the focus of a person's infection lies. Even if we encounter a person whose cultivation is slightly higher than our own, as long as the difference isn't as big as a major boundary, we'll still be able to pick something up from looking at them. But back then, I couldn't see Jingzhai clearly... He was already not entirely human then.

At the bottom of the Sea of Stars, while Xi Ping understood nothing of the star sand swirling all around, his ascended spirit's spiritual sense kept prodding him.

There was fog of varying density everywhere. While passing through a patch of thick fog, Xi Ping, as though sensing something, couldn't help himself from extending his consciousness to peer outward, faintly glimpsing the lines drawn by the star sand... The map that flashed there for a moment was familiar.

But when he tried to distinguish it, his consciousness was bounced back by the fog. The center of his brow stung. His spirit wavered.

“Do not look at random.” A strip of gauze fell, covering his eyes, and the Dignitary of Fate High Elder’s voice spoke. “The places where the fog appears thick and impenetrable to you have karmic connections to your fate. You must not pry into them.”

Xi Ping ignored him. Enduring the pain in his head, he continued considering what he had just glimpsed. Suddenly, in a flash, he remembered: it seemed to be Jinping.

So he asked, “My family is in Jinping, so that means it has a karmic connection to me?”

The Dignitary of Fate was silent for a moment. “Your shifu is also in Jinping.”

Xi Ping was bewildered. He thought, Shizun didn’t go down the mountain once in a hundred and eighty years. Does it count that he ordered a bowl of wontons in a shop in Jinping?

“When Jinping’s Dragon Vein broke, Zhaoting, as mundane iron, held off Lancang’s army. Before I could repair it, the Dragon Vein chose your shifu, entrusting itself to him,” the Dignitary of Fate said slowly. “Or you could think of it as your shifu being the living Dragon Vein. Back then, the Sea of Stars passed judgment, saying that when he had become a shed skin sage, there would be no more need to repair the Dragon Vein. All would be at peace, impregnable to evil. Even if the four nations' spiritual mountains all collapsed, there would still be nothing that could shake Great Wan... Shiyong, before that happens, we must undergo a period of upheaval.”

Chu's Sanyue Mountains—

Elder Xiang Ning withdrew his consciousness from a routine inspection of the great mountain array. Brow tightly furrowed, he opened his eyes—the spiritual mountains' spiritual energy had once again grown scarcer.

After Sect Leader Xiang Rong had “returned” to the spiritual mountains, all of Sanyue's spiritual energy had at first been unprecedentedly dense, replete. But over the last eight years, with Chu's political situation unstable and the Xiang family losing power, the spiritual energy had unavoidably scattered outward...until now, when the density of Sanyue's West Peak was about the same as in Great Wan's Xuanyin Mountains.

As a shed skin elder, Xiang Ning was well aware that the human world and the immortal mountains reflected each other.

The spiritual mountains determined the nation's boundaries and terrain, and the mortal world's order in turn maintained the stability of the spiritual mountains. When an event like one of Southern Shu's clans defecting occurred, the immortal mountains might even collapse.

In other words, if they couldn't stabilize the situation with all haste, Sanyue might end up as the next Lingyun.

The Luwu...it was all the Luwu.

Those toilet bulletins that could get in anywhere—starting at the top from the spiritual mountains and going down all the way to the black market, there was no place where they didn't have their spies. And what made Xiang Ning most uneasy was that the Luwu likely already knew that the sect leader was dead, and they might leak it at any time.

If the hyenas all around knew that the Xiang family's mainstay was gone...

Just thinking about it, Xiang Ning's scalp went numb.

Suddenly, his spiritual sense was touched. Xiang Ning waved his sleeve, sending out a beam of spiritual energy. "Who's there?!"

An invisible spiritual beast had at some point snuck into the Sanyue Mountains. When Xiang Ning took it down, it fell to the ground, twitched twice, then died. It spat out a lotus seed.

The lotus seed rolled on the ground. From it emerged a face to give you nightmares.

Xiang Ning abruptly stood up. “You?”

“Xiang-shishu,” the face on the lotus seed said, slowly adjusting its features, “how about we strike a deal?”

CHAPTER 163 - Flower in the Mirror (6)

A Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon ran from Jinping's Maze Station to Ning'an. It stopped midway at a town called Zheluo.

Since ancient times, the area of Jinping and Ning'an had been prized land, the roads smooth, the natural disasters few, and it hadn't been divided up by big factories like Suling. You could pick up any job and make a living. Naturally Zheluo Town didn't amount to being impoverished, but there was truly nothing special about it.

This wasn't a major transportation thoroughfare, and neither was it a center of trade. It had no famed scenic spots and no prominent families. It was like countless other towns near Jinping, the better part of its adults in the prime of life sucked away by the flourishing capital, making it ordinarily seem somewhat lonely. The Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon stopping here for half a ke actually brought some liveliness to the town.

Short-haul Cloud Soaring Flood Dragons didn't need to restock; no one knew why this train route had a stop here.

Disembarking at Zheluo Town and going approximately ten li south, you would pass a big patch of paddy fields and lotus ponds, then come to a wild lake. The locals called it Crane Crossing Lake. No intellectuals came to write poetry or carve tablets, so it didn't amount to much of a scenic spot.

Fishermen's songs floated among small boats for fishing boats and lotus seed gathering boats as they went home by starlight. There was only one boat with a black sail going against the current of homebound singing, heading toward the heart of the lake. The "person" rowing the boat wore a big bamboo hat, the face under it invisible. The force of each stroke of the paddle was extremely uniform. A wind blew over the surface of the water and raised the person's hems, revealing interlocking gears under the short jacket... It turned out that this was a puppet of the "straw child" model.

The small boat went all the way to the heart of the lake. There was a small island there, connected to nothing, with wetland and dense forest on it. The birds stopped over here in their migratory flights.

Zhou Xi followed Pang Jian, who was dressed in civilian clothes, off the boat. He held a wooden box. He carefully wrapped his feet in spiritual energy. After taking several turns in the dizzying forest, his field of vision widened onto a beautiful vista.

Zhou Xi's eyes opened wide. He saw "Jinghua Village"⁹⁶ carved onto a stone tablet at the entrance to a village; spiritual light shimmered over the writing.

He took only one glance, and inexplicable comfort welled up in his heart. For a moment, all his cares disappeared. He forgot himself and the world. It was as if he had come to his final resting place. He was intoxicated.

Without looking back, Pang Jian extended a hand and snapped his fingers in front of his face.

Zhou Xi gave a start and came back to his senses. He quickly averted his gaze. “What...what’s on that?”

“Nothing at all.” Pang Jian sighed. “Only the feelings left behind by the person who established the tablet. It’s just that that person is now a ‘person in the high heavens,’ so while it’s only a bit of writing, if those with a wavering will look at it, they will be somewhat influenced.”

Zhou Xi heard his implication. His face flushed red.

Pang Jian glanced at him out of the corner of his eye and involuntarily sighed to himself—going by mortal reckoning of age, His Fourth Highness, who was over thirty, had passed the age of maturity. By now he ought to have had a family, built a career, taken on the attitude of a patriarch. But never mind that cultivation had preserved his body in its adolescent form, he had spent all these years in Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s head office on the strength of his family background, playing the role of an attendant who had no need to experience trials, so his intellect had also permanently halted in the wet-behind-the-ears youngster phase. He hadn't grown up at all after over a decade... He would have been better off being transferred to a lower level to go get some experience.

Pang Jian said, "Were you in the same class as the Yongning Marquis Manor's Xi Shiyong?"

"Yes," Zhou Xi answered, forcing himself to focus, "but then Xi-shixiong went into the inner sect, and I never saw him again. I was young and frivolous then, I didn't know he was suffering at the hands of an evil cultivator, so I brought about some misunderstandings. Afterward I didn't have the chance to contact him again...though I hear he came down from the mountain recently. I'll have to pay a visit if I get the chance."

You're better off not visiting, Pang Jian thought. If you visit and find out that you have to call your former classmate "shishu," I'm afraid you'll hang yourself out of shame.

He'd only caught a fleeting glance at the Yongning Marquis Manor that day, but Pang Jian knew that his perception had been right. That had been an ascended spirit—and certainly not one of those weak ascended spirits.

Bai Ling was a half-demon, his constitution different from the average person's. He could cultivate as soon as he was born, and could control inscriptions before he had established a foundation. After establishing a foundation, it went without saying—during the Zhao family's mutiny, Pang Jian had had a chance to get acquainted with his eccentric methods. That half-demon was entirely up to going a couple of rounds with an ascended spirit master, but on that day, held down by the consciousness sweeping out from the Marquis Manor, he'd had no room to resist.

But while that consciousness had been potent, it had also been unusually judicious—steady, precise, but not relentless. Unlike those “immortals from the mountain” who could make the Lingyang River rise by taking a couple of steps, he was reserved and concentrated; he had injured no one, and he virtually hadn't impacted the surroundings.

You could rely on your cultivation level to hack through a mountain, but to carve patterns into tofu with a sword...you had to have been thoroughly tempered in the mortal world.

All these years, while Xi Shiyong had nominally been in seclusion on Flying Jade Peak, what had he actually experienced?

Then there was also Zhou Ying suddenly tossing aside the Kaiming and the Luwu and entering the way of clarity. One came when the other left, as if they were swapping places; was there some connection here?

For some reason, there was a tightness at the center of Pang Jian's brow, as if his spiritual sense were revealing something... His mood was a little unsteady; he didn't notice Zhou Xi's expression behind him.

Pang Jian's careless question had brought forth many concerns weighing on the young walker in the mortal world's mind.

Zhou Xi had been born into the imperial family. He had known since he was little that he had the resources of the Zhou and Lin families behind him, his starting point higher than others' ending points. Therefore, on entering the Latent Cultivation Temple, he had as a matter of course considered himself to be the "chief"...but it had all turned out to be a joke.

He wouldn't compare himself to Xi Shiyong, who had disturbed two great peak masters, brought out the Bell of Tribulation, and brought down half the Latent Cultivation Temple—that was beyond the scope of human capability.

But among the remaining "normal" disciples, he had still been unable to stand out. His ninth younger sister, whom he'd never made direct eye contact with in his life, had smoothly opened her spiritual eyes before the first snow had fallen; she had obtained the qualifications to enter the inner sect's Green Pool Peak in advance.

Zhou Xi would never forget how he had felt when he heard the news in the dining hall early that morning.

Then, before he could digest it, that very day, another one of the female disciples had drawn spiritual energy and opened her spiritual eyes... That had been a nobody from a side branch of the Zhao family. It was said that she had entered the Way even more calmly. It was clear she had been prepared and it was only that, out of respect for Green Pool Peak, she hadn't wanted to steal the thunder of the Zhou family's direct descendant and had tactfully allowed the ninth princess to get a step ahead of her.

At the time, Zhou Xi hadn't even gotten the feel for opening his spiritual eyes. After that, his whole period of cultivating at the Latent Cultivation Temple had become a muddle. In desperation, he had made a mediocre showing; the inner sect no longer had anything to do with him. He had even just barely scraped through Heaven's Design Pavilion's entrance exam. Then, the first day he had put on the blue robes, he had found that the "senior" taking them around to get to know the trivialities and procedures was the mute half-puppet who had dressed Xi Ping and done his hair.

Even that chronic invalid third older brother who, in his eyes, could only “squabble over mundane power,” had turned around and become the master of the Kaiming Department and simply changed the structure of Great Wan’s...even the whole continent’s cultivation world; he had constantly been spoken of with fear by General Commander Pang for years.

Bewildered by political changes, confused and helpless when it came to cultivation, Zhou Xi had at last discovered that being the “treasured hope of both the Zhou and Lin families” had been only his self-aggrandizing notion. The big clans looked upon their descendants as trash. They had only allowed him to grow up on account of his bloodline; they hadn’t given him any extra attention.

Over a decade later, Zhou Xi had yet to find his place.

Zhou Xi’s footsteps seemed to be trapped in the mud, growing more and more sluggish. He accidentally lost track of Pang Jian.

“Woolgathering?” Pang Jian had turned back to find him. Forcing down his impatience, he said, “There is a labyrinth here left by a powerful senior. It’s easy to get lost. Follow me.”

Zhou Xi quickly restrained his emotions and quickened his steps to catch up.

Where the two of them passed, in a lotus pond in the wetlands, some wild lotus flowers suddenly began to move on their own.

The small island where Jinghua Village was located, if drawn on a map, might at most take up a few mu, but inside, it had been expanded with mustard seeds into a spacious village that could hold over ten thousand people, on the same general principle as the living quarters in the rear courtyard of Heaven's Design Pavilion's head office in Jinping—only it was more “real” than that stage setting, so lifelike that it was impossible to see anything unnatural about it...or at least, Zhou Xi couldn't see anything unnatural about it.

This was the fake village where Heaven's Design Pavilion's walkers in the mortal world hid their names and played house with mortals.

It was late now, but there were still lights burning on the stage in the village. People were making music.

They were all neighbors. No one amused themselves at another's expense. Anyone who wished to perform could go on stage. Some slightly older women were just enjoying themselves singing old Lingyang River tunes from over a decade ago. Children were riding fashionable bicycles back and forth beneath the stage. An old woman went by driving a horse-drawn cart, now a rarity in the outside world, hauling a cartful of freshly husked rice. When she passed by the stage, she hummed a couple of phrases. As she receded into the distance, so did the melody.

Here, chickens, dogs, cows, and sheep all ran free. The only machinery was for lighting. Everyone wore the reserved style of clothes from previous years, unlike in Jinping now, where there were chemical dyes everywhere, so bright that they stabbed the eyes.

Apart from the children, nearly all those permanently residing in Jinghua Village were married women. Therefore, the surroundings were incredibly clean.

With Heaven's Design Pavilion for backing, they had no need to worry about their livelihoods; they could do whatever they liked. When their husbands weren't on leave, they could happily and harmoniously idle away the time with their sisters. It was a true paradise.

But when the people in "paradise" saw Pang Jian, they were all somewhat nervous. When Pang Jian and Zhou Xi entered, the singing and laughter on stage came to a halt. Countless gazes fell on the two of them. Zhou Xi had never in his life been stared at by so many women. His movements nearly became unnaturally stiff.

The old woman driving the cart pulled it to a stop and waved a hand toward the others. She stepped forward somewhat cautiously to give a salute. Forcing a smile, she said, "You're here, Lord Pang, and you've brought a handsome young fellow with you today, quite unfamiliar. Where is that tight-lipped little Young Master Xi who usually comes with you?"

Both Pang Jian's tone and his bearing were very subdued. "Xi Yue's older brother has come home. He has things to do at the manor right now, so he's taken leave."

"Good, that's a happy event." The old woman nodded repeatedly. "His brother is safe, his mother and father are both living, that's the good life... What brings you here today?"

Zhou Xi acutely noticed that as soon as this question was spoken, many women looked concerned.

Pang Jian, keeping to himself, said, "I came to deliver my colleague Wang Run's things..."

No sooner had he spoken than there was a loud noise. One of the women playing accompaniment on stage abruptly got to her feet, accidentally knocking over her qin stand.

She was slightly older, with an oval face and willow leaf brows, still very beautiful, like a delicate flower in full bloom that had met with a sudden rainstorm. First she was frozen for a long moment. Then, as if refusing something, she began to shake her head desperately. The woman playing the pipa next to her quickly put her instrument aside and came forward to embrace her. The women who had just been singing came back to their senses and huddled around, tightly encircling the woman with the oval face, as if that could keep Pang Jian and Zhou Xi out.

Pang Jian had come to return “last effects”—it wasn’t that this woman’s walker in the mortal world husband had unfortunately died in the line of duty; quite the reverse, he had taken a step forward, received the favor of the inner sect, established a foundation.

After establishing a foundation, your Way of the Heart settled. No matter what the way, associating long-term with a mortal would harm your cultivation...and the mortal couldn’t take it, either. A half-immortal could still have children, but at the established foundation level, if they stayed with a mortal, the mother and child dying together would be getting off easy.

So, as far as the wives and children in Jinghua Village were concerned, a person who established a foundation was “dead.” During the brief life of a mortal, these established foundation cultivators would never set foot in Jinghua Village again.

Afraid of their emotional state being unstable, they often didn't come in person to say goodbye, so Pang Jian was the "crow delivering bad tidings."

Pang Jian had originally taken a step toward the stage. Seeing the situation, he tactfully retreated, indicating that Zhou Xi should give the wooden box to the old woman driving the cart. "I won't go over and make myself offensive. Please pass this on, Auntie Song."

After some more empty words along the lines of "Contact Heaven's Design Pavilion at once if anything happens," Pang Jiang also felt uncomfortable, so he didn't delay any longer. He called Zhou Xi over and prepared to leave.

Just then, all of a sudden, the encircled woman said sharply, "Wait, Lord Pang!"

Pang Jian paused slightly.

With a sob in her voice, the woman asked, "Did he have anything to say to me...to the two children?"

Pang Jian didn't respond. He turned and bowed deeply, almost to the ground, startling Zhou Xi so badly that he jumped a step sideways—he'd never seen General Commander Pang humble himself like this, not even in front of inner sect peak masters.

The woman cried, “A mortal’s life only lasts a few brief decades, exalted. Don’t you people have the patience to wait just a few decades?”

Zhou Xi opened his mouth—walkers in the mortal world who could establish foundations were all exceptional talents among their peers. It was no easy matter to refine your spiritual bones in the mortal world. Each one of them was around a century old. If you established a foundation too old, it would impede your cultivation in the future. Even if the walkers in the mortal world could live several more decades without their appearances changing, it would greatly alter their status and future prospects.

With a look, Pang Jian stopped him from justifying. Humbly, he said, “Sister-in-law, I apologize on his behalf.”

His apology was worthless. The woman began to wail, making all the others’ eyes redden. There was faint resentment in their gazes.

Amidst Zhou Xi’s discomfort, Pang Jian faced all that resentment directly, backing up as the two of them left Jinghua Village together.

Zhou Xi couldn’t resist saying, “General Commander...”

Pang Jian waved a hand. “Walkers in the mortal world marrying mortals is a violation of sect rules to begin with. As the general commander of Heaven’s Design Pavilion, I did not fulfill my duty and turned a blind eye to it. Now there is no way to resolve the situation. I bear the blame for it. Kneeling or kowtowing to them isn’t much. In the future, I won’t permit anyone else to bring families to Jinghua Village.”

Zhou Xi assented and couldn’t resist looking back again. Behind them, the words “Jinghua Village” slowly blended into the labyrinth and became invisible. The sound of crying seemed to linger in his ears. Zhou Xi’s vision blurred; it was as if a small lotus flower seal had flashed in front of his eyes. He thought that he was too tired, rubbed his eyes, and didn’t think anything of it. He followed Pang Jian.

Meanwhile, Wen Fei, gossiping with Lin Chi on Moon Plated Peak, froze.

Wen Fei’s eyes were excessively vivacious. It was hard to say whether they were peach blossom eyes or fox eyes. There was usually no sense of propriety about them. Now though, his expression growing grave out of nowhere made a person nervous to see it.

“What’s wrong?” said Lin Chi.

Wen Fei removed the sentence he had gotten halfway through from his fan. The fan shut and opened. The wild writing on it had turned into a scene from the mortal world—what it showed was precisely Jinghua Village at the heart of Crane Crossing Lake.

It was the dead of night, the shadows of cranes flickering, the lotuses in the wetlands undulating in time to the ripples. There was no sign of anything unusual.

Lin Chi saw that he didn't mean to hide it, so he craned his neck to take a look. "This is..."

Wen Fei wrote carelessly: The place where Heaven's Design Pavilion settles their wives and children. I sealed the entrance to the village... Strange, I thought something had entered just now. I'm a little uneasy.

Before Lin Chi could work out why Heaven's Design Pavilion would have "wives and children," Wen Fei's consciousness reached out following the Jinghua Village stone tablet he had left behind. The stone tablet at the village entrance glowed with fluorescent light, wrapping the whole small village in mist.

Wen Fei's consciousness scanned the whole village. He didn't find anything out of the ordinary, but he did get an earful of grievances and weeping. As soon as he heard, he knew what had happened. He couldn't bear to watch. He sighed, then hurriedly averted his gaze.

Just after his gaze had left, in a small brook in the village, the center of a lotus flower in full bloom tumbled down.

A child's ball accidentally rolled into the brook. He hopped and skipped down to get it, just in time to see that lotus without a stamen turn and grow a tiny human head where the stamen had been.

The child gazed at that head in astonishment. The person at the heart of the flower smiled and raised a finger toward him. "Shh—"

In the boy's clear eyes, two small lotus seals appeared. With a plop, the ball he had just picked up rolled once again into the mire.

"Papa..."

"Papa's knife's in need of honing..."

The child crooned a line in oddly-accented Wan language, climbed out of the brook, and ran into a pile of children who had gone to sleep for the night.

After a moment, like an infection spreading, one child after another began to recite with him.

“Papa's knife's in need of honing, Mama's got the water boiling. Fat white baby's lost his smock, lying laughing on the block. My bones are soft and tender too, my flesh is sweet and good to chew, toss some red peppers in the stew—heehee...heehee...”

At the bottom of the Sea of Stars, the star sand scattered everywhere began to roil.

Xi Ping, blindfolded, frowned. He cocked an ear and said, “What's wrong?”

The Dignitary of Fate's blindfold fell. He saw the scattered star sand begin to gather in one place, forming a whirlwind that came whistling toward the two of them. The Dignitary of Fate and Xi Ping moved aside to make way, one to either side. The whirlwind cut off a lock of Xi Ping's hair.

In Jinping, Zhou Xi said goodbye to Pang Jian as though nothing were the matter, then went to stand his shift at an Azure Dragon Tower. When he turned away, a peculiar smile appeared on his face.

CHAPTER 164 - Flower in the Mirror (7)

A karma beast that had been curled up in the wall napping instantly bristled. Pang Jian said, "Wait."

Zhou Xi turned his head. His twisted features returned to normal. "Hm?"

The karma beast quickly raced from the wall to the floor and warily sniffed at his heels.

Zhou Xi was bewildered. He lifted the hems of his robes to let the sacred beast smell him. "What's wrong, General Commander? Have I picked up a stink?"

Pang Jian scanned Zhou Xi with his consciousness and aimed an evil-expelling, pestilence-avoiding talisman at him, but...nothing happened.

The karma beast didn't sniff anything out, either. It tossed its head in confusion and began to chase its own tail.

"It's nothing." Pang Jian wearily pinched the center of his bow. "I'm a little dizzy. You don't need to stand your shift, you're also tired after today. Find a colleague to swap shifts with."

Zhou Xi was very perplexed. He thought, What's tiring about going on a short trip to Zheluo?

But the general commander had said he was tired, so he couldn't very well boorishly insist on saying "I'm fine, actually," so he agreed and, obeying orders, left.

Before, whenever Pang Jian had gone to Jinghua Village, he had taken Xi Yue. Xi Yue spoke little, but he could always understand the sighs of others. Unfortunately, Xi Yue had taken leave today, and it wouldn't have been appropriate for Pang Jian to go alone, so he had snatched up Zhou Xi before going. As expected...he would have been better off not taking him. The prince probably couldn't imagine that lowly mortal women could have their own joys and sorrows.

Perhaps because he had taken a different person, Pang Jian kept feeling that something was off. Feeling awkward himself, looking at Zhou Xi also made him feel awkward, and that had made him a little paranoid—when the karma beast had bristled just now, he had thought that a shadow had flitted over Zhou Xi.

Pang Jian focused. If someone really had brought to bear methods undetectable to him, that person would have to be an ascended spirit or better. With the current tightness of Jinping's defenses, the Azure Dragon Towers would have started up a "concert" by now; it wouldn't be so quiet.

Taking a glance at the already calm karma beast, he shook his head to shake off his inexplicable thoughts.

"Tsk." Zhuoming briefly pulled his consciousness out of the Territory Map rubbing. "The Xuanyin Mountains really are the mountains of tortoises. They all live in their iron shells."

"Really," Wangge Luobao echoed, maintaining the posture of meditation. "No wonder they're the originators of this bad precedent of sending spies to foreign nations. You can only seal yourself up like a drum if you know everyone else's leaks inside and out. Shu's Zhaoye City couldn't catch up to them after three centuries of trying."

One of Zhuoming's eyes rolled up to the top of his bald head. "Ditch your little ploys, don't think I don't know you're making fun of how I talk. If you're in such a hurry to give me your mouth, just come out and say it."

"My Chu is poor, and you're the only proper Chu person around me. It's unavoidable that I would inadvertently imitate you. Of course I'll stop if you're unhappy about it," Wangge Luobao said indifferently, smiling.

"Zhuoming-xiong, that soul-sucking lotus seal of yours makes too much of a fuss. You can only borrow a person's senses temporarily. Just now when you tried to seep into that little half-immortal's consciousness, you immediately alerted Jinping's sacred beast. If you really tried to seize his consciousness, I'm afraid the Azure Dragon Towers wouldn't agree to it. What is to be done?"

"I got to use their eyes to find the entrance to the legendary Jinghua Village thanks to that wife-deserting, child-abandoning blue-clotheser, didn't I? That Jinghua Village was built out of nothing by a master using a layered mirror array. A place like that, which tramples all over their 'three improvements and three abstinences,' naturally has to come up with a way to avoid the surveillance of the spiritual mountains. It's a blindspot in the sightline of the Xuanyin Mountains' spiritual veins, perfectly suited for planting lotuses."

As Zhuoming spoke, he extended a hand. His arm grew seven or eight chi long. He broke off a length of lotus stalk from under his own ass and shook it out into the water. From the sticky crack, the images of some young children floated out, disappearing as soon as they came to light—these were the children from Jinghua Village.

When the Heartless Lotus swallowed a person's consciousness, whether they were an established foundation or an ascended spirit, if they had slipped up and let their consciousness be seized by the Heartless Lotus, they would all turn into empty shells, dead as doornails, controlled for a while by lotus stalks before they rotted.

There were thousands upon millions of evil cultivators in the world, but tied together in a bushel, they couldn't outdo one single Heartless Lotus for evil. This Zhuoming's behavior was excessively deranged. In a rare occurrence, Wangge Luobao frowned. He closed his eyes and didn't watch.

“A child's intellect isn't fully developed, you can't keep them if you absorb them, and there are limits to what their bodies can do. Why would you do something so atrocious and detrimental to yourself...”

Before he could finish, the lotus stalk that had been gamboling around him suddenly sprang toward him like a viper and gave Wangge Luobao a firm slap in the face.

“Are you lecturing me?” said Zhuoming.

A few nearby Miah cultivators happened to catch sight of their clan leader being insulted. They gave angry cries and raised their weapons, ready to charge over and start hacking at lotus stalks.

Zhuoming didn't give a damn whether anyone understood him or not. In the Chu language, he said provocatively, “Come at me. I've put my stamp on your new clan leader. He sold himself into slavery to me long ago. We'll see who he'll be able to protect when I kill you all!"

Wangge Luobao raised a hand, stopping his clansmen from a distance.

He seemed to go deliberately still for a moment. Then his thin eyelids covered his odd-colored eyes. Like a person made of dough who had no temper, with the red mark from the lotus stalk's slap on his face, he spoke an ancient Miah proverb: "The tamer of beasts lives cheek by jowl with talons and fangs. It's no matter."

The Miah cultivators continued to glare wrathfully at Zhuoming.

Though Wangge Luobao's tone was light, there was no question about his ascended spirit might. "Do not meddle where others tame beasts. Go."

The Miah were powerless. They made some local rude gestures toward Zhuoming and then were driven off by their new clan leader, muttering oaths.

"You misunderstood me, Zhuoming-xiong. I meant nothing by it. I was only worried about you," Wangge Luobao at last said earnestly. "Since there is an array left behind by a master in Jinghua Village, if you cause too much commotion, it's sure to alert that person. Anyway, even if you can have your own way in Jinghua Village, what's the use? The moment those walking corpses get walked out of the village by the lotus stalks, how will it be any different from you yourself walking around in Southern Wan's main streets? It will also alert Xuanyin. Moreover, while Jinghua Village can avoid Xuanyin's surveillance, you've already taken the lives of mortals. Even if the spiritual veins don't spot it, the Xuanyin Mountains still have the Sea of Stars. Aren't you alerting the enemy..."

Seeing that he was neither alarmed nor angry, Zhuoming felt very bored, so he said, sneering, "Bah, you beast-taming vipers. You'd let a person spit on your face and wait for it to dry. There must be nothing but ice flowing in your veins—who said I wanted to make a bunch of walking corpses leave? I'm not a corpse-puppeteer. Do you think it takes tricks to control mortals, idiot?"

Having said this, like a child eager to show off his talents, he snatched up Wangge Luobao's consciousness, which he had put a lotus stamp on, and plunged into the Territory Map rubbing.

However much one felt another's pain, other people were still other people. The people in Jinghua Village had in the end scattered, and the abandoned woman desolately went home alone.

Her little daughter was still in her swaddling clothes, her son only five years old. She had to endure the remainder of her days.

As soon as the woman came in, she found to her surprise that the lights were on at home. Her little boy hadn't obediently gone to bed, nor had he snuck out to play. Under the dim gas lamp, he was oh-so-quietly sitting beside the soundly sleeping infant, now and then lightly rocking the cradle.

The woman turned around hurriedly and wiped her face. She squeezed out a smile and softly called the boy's nickname: "Fuhu, why haven't you gone to bed yet? Careful not to wake your little sister."

The boy jumped off the bed without a sound and ran over to hug the woman's legs. He turned his face up to look at her. Those big black eyes were like two wells in which corpses had been sunk.

The woman didn't notice anything unusual about the boy. Her nose stung, and she nearly wept. She drew the child into her arms, seeking a trace of consolation from that small body.

A blurred lotus seal flashed on the side of the boy's neck. In that body that had been taken over by an evil cultivator, the original owner's immature consciousness had vanished. The dead spirit contained only two malign evil cultivators.

Zhuoming made a scornful pronouncement: “The enmity of mortals is like oil. It goes up in flames at a single spark. Watch the show. Today I’ll slit a hole in the Dragon Vein without anyone the wiser.”

He made the boy slowly turn his head and whisper poisonously into her ear, “Mom, when is Papa coming home? I miss him.”

The woman’s body stiffened. Her arms tightened around him.

The boy’s lips turned up at both sides. “Mom, they say I look like Dad.”

Wangge Luobao looked on, thinking with admiration, What skill. Even his breathing is hateful.

But contrary to his expectations, the tempest Zhuoming was anticipating didn’t develop.

The haggard woman, as if about to collapse, took several deep breaths, then unexpectedly controlled her trembling body. She picked the child up gently. “Your Dad, he’s gone very far away to fight demons. We can’t let those evil cultivators get in and disturb our Fuhu’s sleep.”

Wangge Luobao raised his eyebrows in some surprise.

A clean scent came from the woman as she exhaled. With her weak, useless hands, she patted the boy's back. "Our Papa is a big hero. Fuhu has to eat up, sleep well, and in the future..."

Zhuoming's expression turned cold. He interrupted the woman: "He left you."

The woman's already bloodless face paled further. "Fuhu...what are you saying? Has someone been saying things to you?"

Zhuoming outperformed himself in the Wan language. His pronunciation was extremely crisp, nearly surpassing the average level of a Wan child. "He's gone to find his future and tossed you aside."

Come on, vent your powerless anger on your son, you useless good-for-nothing. Your man's gone, so who are you playing the loving mother for?

"You're an undignified piece of old clothing, and me and that sniveling brat are two wads of used toilet paper..."

The woman's lips were trembling. Her expression nearly fell several times, but she narrowly managed to hold out. Finally, she only looked into the boy's wrathful eyes and gently said, "Child, it's not like that."

Wangge Luobao sniggered.

His quiet laughter lit an indescribable anger in Zhuoming. “You’re lying...”

“It’s not like that.” The woman gently stroked his hair. The same clean scent came from her sleeve. Maybe the scent she used was a specialty product of Southern Wan. In all the centuries he had lived, Zhuoming had never smelled anything like it.

“You don’t understand grown-up business yet, but whether Papa comes back or not, you and Baozhu are still my treasures.” As she spoke, she smiled, accidentally squeezing traces of tears from the corners of her eyes. “What bad person taught you to talk like that? Little ingrate, Papa loved you so much when he was here, but you don’t trust him, you’d rather believe what bad people say. What’s the sense in that? Your Dad has just left it all to your Mom to love you. Just wait and see, Mom is much stronger than him...”

Wangge Luobao laughed aloud. “Zhuoming-xiong, you really are lucky. How did you pick out such a good mother at random?”

Zhuoming was simply beside himself with rage.

The boy's small body erupted into inhuman strength. He broke free of the adult's arms. A lotus seal emerged on his forehead. He opened his mouth and spat out fog.

“Hey,” said Wangge Luobao, dying to make trouble, “you said you weren't going to use any tricks. Why are you using illusions on a mortal...?”

Zhuoming flung out a hand and sent him away. He began to torment the mortal's untempered mind with all-consuming illusions.

“No more nonsense, listen to me, we'll leave here quietly, go give those blue-clothed dogs and Jinping bighats something to look at. Mom, be good—”

The Heartless Lotus's tricks could make an established foundation long for death, but when half the night had passed, this mortal, whom he could have poked dead with one finger, still wouldn't do as he wished. With her life and her dignity, she kept her rage and resentment contained, unwilling to reveal a sliver of it in front of her child.

At last, amid Zhuoming's howl of “Why won't you listen?”, the mortal's mind completely collapsed.

But while the light of her spirit had been extinguished and saliva was leaking uncontrollably from the corners of her mouth, she didn't stop whispering the nicknames of her two children.

“Fuhu...don’t be scared...Baozhu...don’t cry...don’t cry...”

The lotus stalks controlling the boy broke through the body’s forehead.
Zhuoming had nearly lost his mind from anger.

Her consciousness was dead. He had failed!

The mighty Heartless Lotus had wasted half the night, unable to delude a mortal!

Zhuoming had never thought that his first attempt would fail so miserably, nor that the “gutter” he overturned his boat in would be so small.

He grabbed the hair of the boy he was possessing and desperately pulled down. The infant in the cradle, after being forced to share a room with demons, was crying so hard she was nearly blue in the face.

Why did a woman like this exist?

Why did these gap-toothed brats with no redeeming qualities deserve to be protected like this?

Why...why...

“To hell with it!”

Wangge Luobao’s voice entered his consciousness from far away. “There’s no more time, Zhuoming-xiong. Give it up, leave at once. The people you’ve killed tonight will alert the Sea of Stars. Those two walkers in the mortal world have your lotus seals on them. They can’t sense it themselves, but a master will understand at a glance. It’ll be a matter of moments for them to find Jinghua Village then. I think we ought to take it a little at a time. Well, it’s too bad. We’ve spent so long plotting, but we’ve still alerted the enemy in advance.”

This Miah degenerate really knew how to start a fire. Zhuoming had already been on the edge of losing control and flying into a rage. The provocative words turned him into a Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon, all the apertures of his face insufficient to spurt out the steam!

In the room, the infant’s crying came to an abrupt halt. A clump of reckless “fog” exploded from the small house. An ascended spirit grade illusion instantly covered the whole of Jinghua Village, reached into every person’s dreams.

Now completely unreasoning, heedless of the consequences, Zhuoming clean forgot all previous plans like “infiltrate in secret, no one the wiser.”

The spiritual energy bursting out in the village instantly disturbed the village’s array. In the Xuanyin Mountains, Wen Fei, who had already averted his gaze, instantly woke with a start from meditation. Who was that!

And meanwhile, in Jinping City, Pang Jian kept feeling a little dizzy. On returning to his residence at the general office, he sat quietly to examine himself and settle his mind. He felt faintly that he had picked something up on his eyes, ears, nose, and tongue, but it was vague, hard to see clearly with his level of cultivation...

Suddenly, a Heavenly Question from the inner sect flew in. Disturbed, Pang Jian’s mind wavered.

The faint traces that had only been lightly stuck to his senses came to “life,” seizing the opportunity to start burrowing into his consciousness. Seven or eight karma beasts scrambled over to surround him. The bronze bells on the eaves clamored.

Crap!

By the time Pang Jian realized something was wrong, it was already too late.

The faint traces turned into lotus seals, firmly biting down on his consciousness. His spirit ached sharply. Just then, someone kicked open the layer upon layer of arrays on this critical location of Heaven's Design Pavilion, charged right in, and landed in front of Pang Jian. Two ice-cold fingers touched the center of Pang Jian's brow.

There was a buzz in Pang Jian's head. A blizzard seemed to blow through his spirit, chilling him to the marrow. The sinister lotus seals were shattered to bits.

He heard someone curse under his breath in a familiar voice: "That relentless bald donkey again?"

Pang Jian abruptly opened his eyes. A face not one whit different from fourteen years ago struck them. But while he opened his mouth, he didn't dare to recognize him at first.

The newcomer was Xi Ping, who had returned through the night from the Xuanyin Mountains. There was no time to exchange pleasantries. He rudely yanked over the Heavenly Question and tore it open. "That medicine-making mute? What's his connection to Jinghua Village...? So is that where you were just now?"

Trespassing into Heaven's Design Pavilion, starting right off with an impertinent remark, hair down and not wearing shoes..."medicine-making mute"...

Pang Jian was poleaxed by the aura of evil cultivator coming off him. For a time, he didn't know whether the bronze bells outside were ringing because of the lotus seals or to "welcome" this personage.

"Yes, what about Jinghua Village..."

Before Pang Jian could finish his sentence, messages from his colleagues suddenly surged in like an explosion.

"General Commander, has something happened in Jinghua Village? Why did my wife just leave without authorization?"

"My wife, too, I can't sense the protective talisman I placed on her..."

"Wait, I sense her now, why would she suddenly be in Jinping!"

Day was just about to break in Jinping. A woman from Jinghua Village, riding a talisman, landed in a Jinping street. There just happened to be an unobtrusive break in the spiritual vein there.

She looked vacantly around her for a moment. In her blank, staring eyes, bitter rancor appeared bit by bit. She picked something out of her hand and flung it fiercely at the vein of the earth—it was a lotus seed.

Jinping's defenses were instantly activated. Dazzling light fell from an Azure Dragon Tower. Just then, a sapphire-blue figure flashed by as if flying, protecting the woman, using his back to block the light coming from the Azure Dragon Tower. The mortal and half-immortal were simultaneously obliterated amid the dazzling light.

The lotus seed the woman had dropped seized that opportunity to fall into the spiritual vein, put down roots and sprout, spreading outward.

At the same time, the same thing was happening in several places throughout Jinping. The Dragon Vein began to tremble, warping the tracks where public trams ran. Underground, the sewage drains ruptured. A foul stink floated up—

There was a twang as the sound of a qin reverberated in the air above Jinping.

A figure landed on the Azure Dragon Horn Tower in Dangui Lane. Wrapped in the music of the qin was sword energy received from Zhaoting.

It instantly settled the uneasy Dragon Vein and took aim right at the mutinous lotuses.

The clamoring bells on the eaves abruptly stopped.

Pang Jian was startled. He hadn't yet had time to give Xi Ping the Dragon Vein map, yet the latter seemed to know it like the back of his hand...

Was this Xi Shiyong? For a moment, he was dazed, unable to match his memories to the person he saw.

Never mind the Dragon Vein underground, Xi Ping might not even have been able to find his way around if he'd been standing in Jinping's main thoroughfare. But the instant the Dragon Vein had started to heave, the shard of Zhaoting in his spirit had immediately responded. Instantly, the whole shape of the Dragon Vein and the broken areas were projected within his spirit.

The Tai Sui Qin didn't stop, but a heavy shadow flitted over Xi Ping's heart. While he didn't completely buy what the Dignitary of Fate had said, it was evident that his shifu's vital sword did indeed have a profound connection to the Dragon Vein.

There were ten thousand questions in his mind that he couldn't untangle, and there was no longer a person at the other end of the reincarnation wood who had listened to the talk of all the demons and could dispel his doubts.

Now Xi Ping had only his intuition as an ascended spirit, and he had a very bad feeling about this... How could the fate of a whole nation depend on a single person? Wouldn't he be crushed by that weight?

But there was no time now for all of that.

The seven Azure Dragon Towers were brightly lit. Heaven's Design Pavilion and the Kaiming Department had been fully deployed.

Wangge Luobao watched Zhuoming in front of him, his consciousness sunk into the Territory Map as cut after cut from a sharp weapon appeared on him. He couldn't resist a laugh.

Though he was only too eager for the lunatic Heartless Lotus to get chopped to pieces by his old acquaintance, he still resolved to put the big picture first—

Wangge Luobao grabbed a lotus seed next to him and said to the person at the other end of that lotus seed, "Elder Xiang, if you hesitate any longer, you'll lose your chance.”

If the four great spiritual mountains didn't fall out now, the road to heaven that he and the other ascended spirit evil cultivators had torn open for themselves would be under threat once more.

CHAPTER 165 - Flower in the Mirror (8)

On Sanyue's West Peak, an incense seal used to promote concentration flickered constantly in the faint breeze. In the bowl of writing brush water on the desk in front of High Elder Xiang Ning floated a lotus without a stamen.

On the snow-white petals, the Territory Map rubbing of the Jinping and Ning'an area appeared intermittently, fused with the veins inside the petals, constantly urging him to choose.

Eight years ago, Sect Leader Xiang Rong, the closest person in the world to a full moon position, had "disappeared." The Sanyue Mountains' backbone had collapsed without warning, and Southern Wan had seized the opportunity to rise. The new version of Moon Plated Gold had come into the world, Jinping's political reforms had shown their first results, the Kaiming and Luwu had become firmly entrenched... A whole succession of acts that had shaken the world. Jinping seemed to have become a Resurrection Vortex on dry land, rampantly sucking in the vigor of the whole continent.

Large sums of money flowed steadily to converge upon the coast of the East Sea. The prices of spiritual stones were twenty to thirty percent lower than in the surrounding countries. With the support of plentiful spiritual stone supplies, the Kaiming and Luwu became all the more powerful. The Kaiming Department took part in manufacturing, the Luwu scurried through every nation's black market, turning around and instead making money for Southern Wan.

And despite this, for Chu, which had previously mocked the institutions of the Kaiming and the Luwu, it was already too late to follow that example: after the Kaiming Department had been established, large numbers of "common cultivators" had fled to Chu. The status of these people was too complicated. No one knew how many of them were spies or had been bought off, making the already muddy waters of Western Chu even more confused. Trying to incorporate these people's strength wouldn't have worked even when Sanyue had been flourishing, never mind now.

Anyway, after their spiritual stones had drained away, they couldn't afford to support those people anymore.

With Moon Plated Gold behind it, Southern Wan's technology had gone a step ahead of the other nations'. Wan's merchants had nearly monopolized transportation and mining. Leaving aside Northern Li, which had halfway locked its gates and clung obstinately to its old ways, industry in Chu and Shu had been firmly suppressed; with this cruel oppression, domestic conflicts immediately became magnified. In Sanyue, the wolves had their eyes on the Xiang family, and in Southern Shu, there was now the unrest between the Xiuyi and the Miah—

“Elder Xiang,” said that voice with a slightly foreign lilt once again, “half of the Lingyun Mountains’ spiritual energy has scattered, but spiritual energy can’t disappear into nowhere. Where do you think it has gone? If your Sanyue Mountains’ spiritual energy keeps being depleted like this, how many more centuries do you have left?”

“Evil cultivator,” Xiang Ning interrupted him, “stop trying to be clever. Don’t think I don’t know what you people are planning.”

“You have misunderstood us. Once the four great spiritual mountains join forces, it will only be a matter of time before there is no more place for us to shelter—both the so-called ‘common cultivators’ and my Miah clan,” Wangge Luobao said candidly. “This is plain to see, I don’t believe Elder Xiang wouldn’t have observed this much. What I want is for rifts to form among the four nations, and I hope that you will be on my side.”

Sneering, Xiang Ning said, “You really are daring.”

Wangge Luobao answered calmly, “Of course, you can use the so-called ‘Great Way’ as your bottom line, stand firm by an immortal’s position of ‘defeating evil and upholding orthodoxy’; it would only mean giving up the Xiang clan and the Sanyue Mountains. When the time comes, we will serve as an example for Sanyue to learn from. The only difference is that we will be knocked down at once, while Sanyue will be slowly drained dry by Xuanyin. Elder Xiang, the biggest mistake Sanyue has made over the years is relying excessively on Sect Leader Xiang Rong.”

Xiang Ning’s expression became grave. Wangge Luobao had poked him in his sore spot.

Since the sect leader had left, Xiang Ning hadn’t even dared to take the Silver Moon down from the mountains to track down the rebel Xuanwu... because he had no idea whether he would be able to control the Silver Moon when he left the immortal mountains. If, when the time came, instead of vanquishing evil he ended up offering himself up as a feast, he really would become a laughingstock.

“The Xuanyin Mountains currently have two shed skins and two near-shed skins. Zhuoming belongs to those people who have had their ‘mouths sealed by heaven,’ you ought to trust his guesses—as soon as that Sword of the South becomes a sage, none of you will have another chance to shake Southern Wan. When that happens, Western Chu, as a near neighbor... Haha, elder, this is Sanyue’s final chance. Since you do not dare, then you can sit there peacefully, like a crab letting the hot water rise over it. During the Wan-He War, all of you stuck in your oars to muddy the waters. Times have moved on and you no longer remember, but Southern Wan remembers it all. That is all I have to say—”

“Wait,” said Xiang Ning.

He was a direct descendant of the Xiang family to begin with. Below the sect leader, he was the hidden clan leader of the Xiang clan. But with the sect leader in seclusion, all the cultivators in the mountains...even the Xiangs, while deferential to him on the surface, had all taken orders from that bastard Xuanwu.

Now that the power of the Xiang clan was waning, there were even some in the clan who had begun to make faint noises—even Wenqing had furtively sounded him out—about whether there was any leeway for Xuanwu to return to the immortal mountains. It was clear to see how illusory the Great Way was. It was never the first bottom line in the human heart; it was only a much-mended tattered flag.

On the island in the South Sea, it was raining. There was no trace of the Miah cultivators or their large quantity of possessions. Wangge Luobao alone remained beside Zhuoming.

Wangge Luobao ducked a beam of undiminished sword energy that flew from Zhuoming. He smiled slowly.

Through the Territory Map rubbing, Zhuoming had stuck a part of himself into Jinping City and was elbowing his way around; naturally he had also exposed himself to the qin music.

They both had accompanying plants and both knew that the other was a tough customer, so Xi Ping showed Zhuoming no mercy. When he ran into him, he struck to kill. With new grievances added to old resentments going to his head all at once, like a miracle, he used that second sword move he hadn't managed to learn in eight years, stabbing right through Zhuoming, whose true body was far away in the South Sea.

Zhaoting resonated with Jinping's Dragon Vein, multiplying the sword energy over a hundred times, striking back directly at the Territory Map rubbing and hitting the South Sea. The Southern Shu Luwu immediately followed that lead to find the location of the island and report it once they found it.

Bai Ling simultaneously passed the information on to Xi Ping.

“In other words, the large quantity of possessions we didn't find while searching the Zhao family hidden realm likely fell into Wangge Luobao's hands, and that slops-eating pig of a Heartless Lotus put together a portion of a Territory Map rubbing?”

“Viscount,” said Bai Ling gravely, “this person is capable of causing no end of trouble.”

The Horn Tower was in Dangui Lane. Xi Ping could see the Marquis Manor out of the corner of his eye.

Xi Yue was protecting the whole area of Dangui Lane. When he felt the gaze fall from the sky, Xi Yue turned his head to meet his eyes. This child, who now wore the blue robe, was standing on top of a wall, in precisely the spot where Xi Ping had stood witnessing a beautiful soul from the Blissful Village demand Young Master Dong’s life and make him break out in song in the middle of the night.

Xi Yue squeezed the reincarnation wood he had just taken up, sending his voice through it: “Ge, when this is over, I’m going to go with you. I want to establish a foundation!”

Xi Ping ignored him, thinking, The world’s full of collapsing establishments, you’re not establishing shit.

That lunatic Heartless Lotus had been beaten until it hurt; his mind had finally cleared a little. He seemed ready to shrink back and turn around. Xi Ping sent his consciousness underground and grabbed hold of a lotus stalk that hadn't had time to flee. "Don't go, Brother Lovesickness, I haven't yet repaid the favor of your ardent call in Southern Shu last time. Haven't you been friends in spirit with my cousin His Highness Prince Zhuang for a long time? Too bad he isn't here, he's gone to establish a foundation and cultivate in the inner sect..."

As Xi Ping said this, he accidentally cut his tongue with the tips of his teeth. His mouth instantly filled with the taste of blood. He softly sucked in a breath. There was cruel laughter in the words he hissed out: "It's just that he's chosen the way of clarity, which is unmoved by sentiment. He's very quiet and comfortable now. I'm afraid he won't be able to find much common ground with you in the future. But I can fulfill the duties of a host, take you to pay your respects at his manor, see if you can pick up some good fortune."

Zhuoming's reason, brought back by the stab of the sword, was once again sent flying by these words. Hearing the words "way of clarity," he gave a howl and turned into a mad dog.

Bearing the pain of being hacked to pieces, the Heartless Lotus's lotus stalks seeped out from the gutters, the sewers...every hidden and filthy place in Jinping City. The great masses of stinking white flowers were covered in mouths, roaring in unison: "Misty—Willow!"

Pang Jian fired a whole clip of fireproofing talismans in one shot, suppressing several places throughout the city where sparks had broken out due to the fighting, to keep a fire from starting among the residences. Overhearing the incomprehensible confrontation between those two individuals, he suspected that he was too parochial—why were pseudonyms so popular among all the evil cultivators these days? And they all chose such fanciful names!

The heartless lotuses struggled to the death, growing wildly. On the tower, the Tai Sui Qin played three soul-shaking notes, each note louder than the one before, as if the Bell of Tribulation had descended. An ascended spirit consciousness covered the whole area of Jinping and Ning'an. Xi Ping brushed the air with one hand, picking up a plain book.

This was the Discard the False and Keep the True book that he hadn't returned to the blame-bearing Yu Chang!

The pages of the book moved on their own. Countless lotuses identical to Zhuoming's lotus seal flew out.

It was as if a blizzard had started in Jinping, and each snowflake was in the form of a lotus flower.

Out of nowhere, the cultivators in the city felt bone-deep dread. Pang Jian's pupils contracted sharply. He waved a hand and raised a big umbrella. The half-immortals without established foundations had no time to respond; they stiffened in place.

But those snowflake-like lotus seals seemed to be intelligent. Not a single one so much as landed on an unrelated plant. They all stuck to the heartless lotuses that were seeping in everywhere.

When the Discard the False and Keep the True book copied the attack of a cultivator of the same grade, it certainly couldn't match up to the original. But with the resonance between the seven Azure Dragon Towers and the Dragon Vein, as well as Zhuoming for some reason being a little deranged, he actually fell for his own trick!

In his long life, the Heartless Lotus had captured innumerable consciousnesses, strong ones, weak ones, interesting ones, boring ones... This was his first time getting a taste of the lotus seal for himself. He was like a flower about to be torn from the stem, each vein in its petals rupturing.

“You really think...!”

All of Jinping reverberated with Zhuoming's scalp-numbing scream. The snakes and rats in the gutters fled helter-skelter.

Xi Ping's control over every lotus seal was precise down to the finest grain. The veins on the hand holding the Discard the False and Keep the True book stood out; though he was an ascended spirit, his essence was still nearly drained dry.

He abruptly drew in the lotus seals. "Let's see how you like it."

In the instant Zhuoming was nearly "pulled up by the roots," Wangge Luobao shouted, "Catch!"

Xiang Ning, far away on Sanyue's West Peak, split off a portion of his consciousness to sink into the Territory Map rubbing on the lotus in front of him, instantly shattering all the lotus seals stuck to the heartless lotuses.

Wange Luobao grabbed Zhuoming and jumped into the sea. The next life spiritual fish took them both into its mouth. The fish's form disappeared in a flash.

Xuanwu, who had been attracted by the sword energy, and the Lingyun cultivators, lured over by the Luwu, reached that barren island practically at the same time. The two sides looked at each other in dismay. The Lingyun cultivators sent to catch the Miah traitors were three ascended spirits leading seven or eight skilled established foundations. They had thought that this force would be more than adequate to capture Wangge Luobao and Zhuoming, but unexpectedly they had run into this personage. They were at a loss. They immediately moved to send a report to the inner sect.

Xuanwu's reaction was swift. With a two-handed seal, he wove a spiritual energy cage, trapping all of them inside.

Blood dyed the seawater around the barren island. The invisible next life spiritual fish sank through the water, silently following the current into the distance, letting hatred float upward.

With the passing of ascended spirit masters, lightning flashed and thunder rumbled over the South Sea. A hurricane welled up. The storm even reached the South Sea Hidden Realm far underwater. The bustling Turmoilers raised their heads, hearing the grief-stricken weeping of waking dragons pass through the valley.

At the other end, Xiang Ning, with the strength of a shed skin, having stuck his oar in, passed through the Territory Map rubbing like a flash of lightning, pouring into Jinping City through the crack held open by the Heartless Lotus.

The better part of Xi Ping's essence had just been drained by the Discard the False and Keep the True book. The unexpected backlash broke his ribs. His punctured lungs choked him with a mouthful of blood. The music of the Tai Sui Qin instantly went astray.

Everyone was stupefied.

Since the spiritual mountains had formed, apart from the ancient demonic god who had fled into a dead end thousands of years ago and Sanyue's Xuanwu, who had recently revolted, a shed skin openly appearing in another country's territory was an earth-shattering, unprecedented event. Even when Southern He had invaded the north, the mad Lancang Sect Leader still hadn't personally come down to the mortal world!

It wasn't that Lancang was particular about the "ethics of war." It was that once a cultivator reached the shed skin boundary, they became a part of the spiritual mountains. If one spiritual mountain went and crashed into another spiritual mountain, no one knew what frightening thing would happen.

Xiang Ning was one of the small number of shed skins who had been born after the Great War of Gods and Demons. He had experienced nothing; he was ignorant and undaunted. And now, unexpectedly, there were no more tigers in the Sanyue Mountains, only him, and he'd let his brain get fished up and cooked into soup—there was no one left to mind him!

The moment Xiang Ning struck, he did in fact already feel faint unease, but once the arrow was on the string, there was no turning back.

Once he had seeped into the Territory Map rubbing, he had no more room for regrets. In these circumstances, fear will cause people to work even harder to deceive themselves and others.

Xiang Ning could never forget how, many years ago, the Sect Leader had inadvertently passed judgment on him. He had said, “A-Ning, in conduct and in cultivation, you can always handle everything, but you err slightly in being indecisive. Faced with a major event, you find it hard to come to a resolution. You ought to be more like your Xuanwu-shixiong.” These words had placed him beneath Xuanwu, not letting him see the light of day for centuries.

Xiang Ning decisively suppressed all his misgivings: The Sect Leader was wrong. Shixiong was out of touch with reality. He never really knew people. What does that ingrate Xuanwu amount to? I’m Sanyue Mountain’s real hope for the future—

A loud crack came from the earth of Jinping. Before Xi Ping’s handful of blood could leak out from between his fingers, he was frozen in place. He had the impression that his spine had broken. Indescribable panic instantly swallowed him. In his spirit, Zhaoting trembled fiercely.

Pang Jian, ashen pale, raised his head. The Dragon Vein that the Dignitary of Fate High Elder had repaired had been snapped by the strength of another shed skin!

Then Xi Ping was standing on emptiness. The Azure Dragon Horn Tower fell to pieces. Xi Yue shouted something and flew toward him.

Then it was Neck, Room, Heart... The seven Azure Dragon Towers collapsed one after another.

But the strange thing was that the rupture of Jinping's Dragon Vein was completely different from what had happened in Quancheng at the feet of the Lingyun Mountains.

Perhaps because the terrain was level, Jinping didn't experience anything like the impact of the ground splitting and the mountains cracking in Lingyun's Quancheng. Aside from the Azure Dragon Towers, not even the ramshackle buildings on the east bank of the Lingyang River collapsed. There was near total silence.

A silence that chilled you to the bone.

Xi Ping landed gracelessly on the ground. He had no time to say anything to Xi Yue. A thought flashed through his mind like lightning, touching his spiritual sense: something was about to be released.

It was now light in Jinping, the sky quite clear. There was no wind and no clouds. But out of nowhere, an enormous shadow emerged on the ground, “crawling” out from the place where the Dragon Vein had broken, moving slowly, intent on permeating the whole capital.

Xi Ping’s consciousness, enveloping Jinping, glanced at that shadow, and his scalp went numb: it was the shadow of a dragon.

This shadow couldn’t be more familiar to him. It had swallowed Jiangli in the Blissful Village and hurled him into the cultivation world with its tail; in the Latent Cultivation Temple it had attached itself to his shadow, and after coveting his body unsuccessfully, it had left him with half a set of hidden bones that had damned him forever.

It had appeared at the feet of a person who called himself “Tai Sui”—Liang Chen.

What did this mean?

Xi Ping didn’t know where to start.

But he shuddered. Just like Zhi Xiu facing the ancient demon host in the Resurrection Vortex and the Impassable Sea, he caught a glimpse of the threads of fate.

CHAPTER 166 - Flower in the Mirror (9)

There were a number of provinces between Jinping and the Xuanyin Mountains, not like Dongheng, which was right at Sanyue's feet.

And while the Sea of Stars had given him a warning, it hadn't concretely shown what was going on. There had only been a vague direction—evil cultivators were meddling, and those evil cultivators came from the South Sea.

That whirlwind had dispersed at once after brushing shoulders with Xi Ping. Its approach had been menacing, but the followup had caused little commotion; it had seemed to be only the unsuccessful attempt of some “acquaintance” in the South Sea. Xi Ping had only been uneasy and left the mountains by night to go have a look because the walkers in the mortal world were early stage established foundations at most, and he didn't know whether the Kaiming and the Luwu had had time to get accustomed to losing their head.

No one had expected that there could be such an addlebrained shed skin.

And the whole thing seemed to be a repeat performance.

The last time a similar dragon shadow had appeared, it had also been the Sea of Stars giving misleading directions that had led to Zhi Xiu, alone and under myriad restrictions in the mortal world, hastily warding off Liang Chen and the half skeleton of hidden bones. The current strictness of Jinping's defenses was incomparable with what it had been in the past, the skilled walkers in the mortal world had all established foundations, and the bogus "near-shed skin" had also risen to suit the occasion, changing into a true shed skin.

Xi Ping's message sounded in Pang Jian's ear: "A Heavenly Question! Quick!"

Fortunately Xuanyin Mountain could prohibit the use of spiritual energy throughout the country. If matters really reached the point of no return, even if the elders couldn't get here in time, they could still...

Just then, in a flash, another frightening thought arose. In Jinping's late summer, Xi Ping's hands turned cold faster than the blood he had coughed up.

He thought: Wait, why is it only Xuanyin that can prohibit the use of spiritual energy?

When his cultivation had been weak, he hadn't thought there was anything unusual about this. After all, shed skin masters could blow him sky-high with a single breath. Xi Ping hadn't even seriously considered what methods they might have at their disposal. But now that he had climbed higher and higher up the ranks of cultivation, now that even ascended spirits had become peers that he could measure himself against and shed skins were no longer unreachable, he had realized that shed skins weren't omnipotent.

At any rate, Xiang Ning certainly couldn't prohibit the use of spiritual energy throughout Western Chu, or else the Xiang family wouldn't have ended up in its current desperate plight.

Also, when the Lingyun Mountains had all been wailing and countless surrounding cities and counties had been shattering to pieces, their shed skins had still been busy hunting evildoers and putting down rebels. It had only been ordinary inner sect cultivators who had been sent to repair the veins of the earth.

Why had it been the Dignitary of Fate High Elder, who sat at home like a fine lady in a compound, who had come in person to repair Jinping's Dragon Vein?

Just because Jinping was the capital, more privileged than other places?

But in just the space of a thought, the better part of that dragon shadow had already “crawled” out, as if it were alive. Where the Dragon Vein had broken, Xi Ping caught Xiang Ning’s aura.

Wait...who?

For a moment, Xi Ping thought he had misidentified him. Even if the person who had barged into Jinping City today had been Xuanwu, gone entirely out of his mind, Xi Ping might still not have been so shocked.

He had only had one brief encounter with the shed skin of Sanyue’s West Peak. He only remembered that that gentleman’s heels had been well greased indeed. When Xiang Rong and Xuanwu had just started their kerfuffle, he had slipped away even faster than Xu Rucheng’s third-rate husband.

How could it be him?

In the eight years since he had last seen him, had this old fart eaten a leopard’s guts, or had he finally been driven mad by the toilet bulletins?

Right now, Xi Ping was the only ascended spirit in Jinping City. There was no time for overthinking. He braced himself and sank his consciousness into the split Dragon Vein, trying to block the dragon shadow spreading in all directions.

He was just in time to hear Xiang Ning laughing. “The Territory Map! Hahaha! It really is the Territory Map!”

In the mouth of the next life spiritual fish in the South Sea, Zhuoming had become a bloody gourd. He lay face-up inside a heap of lotus stalks, his face ashen, not making a sound.

Wangge Luobao surveyed him for a moment, then couldn't resist expectantly raising a hand to his nose to check his breathing... To his disappointment, he felt fleeting puffs of laughter.

Wangge Luobao calmly drew back his hand. “It seems you've won your bet. The Territory Map really is sealed within Southern Wan's veins of the earth.”

“All that nonsense about ‘the reflection of the veins of the earth in the water,’ haha...cough-cough-cough.” Zhuoming laughed breathlessly as he coughed. “The spiritual mountains are the heart, and the veins of the earth that extend from them are only blood vessels. What's so important about the reflection of a bunch of blood vessels? That hypocrite Southern Sage didn't dare to acknowledge it—the Territory Map is the shadow of the spiritual mountains!”

“So back then the sage didn’t destroy it, but sealed it within the true veins of the earth of the spiritual mountains. It was originally a seamless solution. But then Lancang made trouble, the cultivation world shook, and Lancang’s sword slit open the Southern Sage’s seal.” Wangge Luobao sighed softly. “No wonder the Dragon Vein was so unsound even after the Dignitary of Fate High Elder himself repaired it. It was the Territory Map beneath the seal constantly trying to escape.”

“It’s fallen into Xiang Ning’s hands. As soon as it breaks free of the veins of the earth, Xuanyin Mountain is done for. As for Xiang Ning, he’ll be hunted by Xuanyin to the ends of the earth. Sanyue won’t necessarily be able to provide for themselves...” As Zhuoming spoke, he turned over and sat up laboriously. He extended his hand and stuck it into a mustard seed holding spiritual stones. Enough spiritual energy to fill a sea poured into each and every one of his lotus stalks. All the sword cuts on him healed rapidly.

“What do you want?”

“The Misty Willow,” Zhuoming said softly. “This time I’ll make sure he can never reincarnate.”

Xi Ping could be said to have learned his lesson. The most useless shed skin was still a shed skin; a new ascended spirit like him, whose boundary still wasn't very stable, had no chance of withstanding him.

Even worse, the seven Azure Dragon Towers and the Dragon Vein beneath them had all been on his side just now; they had not only succeeded in guiding him in learning the sword move his own shifu hadn't been able to explain clearly, they had also helped him get a better hold over the Discard the False and Keep the True book and use Zhuoming's own trick against him.

But whatever had just been released from beneath the Dragon Vein evidently hated its "cage," and it hated him into the bargain!

Xi Ping only had time to push Xi Yue away. His consciousness was under a double pressure, and he had hardly any leeway to resist. His protective spiritual energy exploded—fortunately his essence had just been drained by Zhuoming until there was nothing left.

Xi Yue only had a half-immortal's cultivation and couldn't get near him. Suddenly remembering something, Xi Yue turned and ran, his figure nearly turning into a sapphire blue lightning bolt.

Under the weight of the chaotic spiritual energy, Xi Yue dashed toward the split in the Dragon Vein and tossed out a brocade bag.

The little brocade bag was shredded in midair by the sharp wind. Countless reincarnation wood seeds scattered. The moment they fell, they were urged to sprout by the master of the reincarnation wood.

Xi Ping's tightly constrained consciousness immediately had room to turn around, burrowing into countless reincarnation wood trees. Linking to the vestiges of the Dragon Vein, those saplings wove a frail net, trapping the constantly struggling dragon shadow within it.

Good child! No wonder Pang Jian takes you everywhere!

The dragon shadow seemed to have been enraged. Its beard flared out wrathfully. Xiang Ning was nibbling away at the Dragon Vein. "Puny junior, you overestimate your strength!"

All of Xi Ping's meridians twitched painfully. He had gone to the Xuanyin Mountains in a hurry; he'd hardly brought any spiritual stones.

"Half-immortals retreat!" Pang Jian tossed Xi Ping a bag of spiritual stones across the distance. "Catch!"

Lao Pang really hadn't stinted. There were dozens of liang of blue jade among the spiritual stones he had thrown, as well as a number of white spirits. He must have dug deep into his coffers for this.

Unfortunately, for an ascended spirit, this bit of spiritual energy was like trying to put out a fire with a cup of water. Xi Ping knocked the bag aside. "That's not even a mouthful for me, look after yourselves, go repair the Dragon Vein!"

"Here," said Bai Ling.

He had brought out the spiritual stone stores of Prince Zhuang Manor and the Kaiming Department. The mustard seed holding several thousand jin of spiritual stones didn't even reach Xi Ping before they were all drained to powder.

"I know it's not enough," Bai Ling said grimly. "A portion of the spiritual stones from the southern mines has yet to be delivered. It'll be here soon. I've also ordered the spiritual stone stores of the Ning'an and Suling Kaiming Departments to be transferred. Hold out a little longer, Viscount."

Pang Jian's scalp went numb when he heard this. He could hardly keep count. "Xi Shiyong, what kind of glutton are you?"

“The kind you ought to be calling shishu...” said Xi Ping.

Xi Ping absorbed the spiritual energy dispersed around him in one gulp. The Tai Sui Qin played fast as a driving rain, carrying sword energy like lightning, smashing into Xiang Ning’s consciousness.

At the same time, all the established foundations in Heaven’s Design Pavilion followed Pang Jian’s lead in tightly encircling the broken Dragon Vein and quickly forming an array. They were always patching up the veins of the earth here and there; they were practiced hands.

The dragon shadow’s shrieks echoed in Jinping’s underground as it was pushed back down by the assembled walkers in the mortal world. The huge dragon claws scabbled at the earth.

Just then came Zhuoming’s spiteful voice: “A mighty shed skin, defeated by a snot-nosed brat who’s been an ascended spirit for less than a decade commanding a bunch of established foundation ants. Tsk-tsk-tsk, Elder Xiang Ning, you little runt... If you had any fight in you, those cultivators from other families wouldn’t get so mad when they saw the Xiang family keeping the Sanyue Mountains all to themselves.”

Xiang Ning gave an angry roar.

Zhuoming said, laughing, “Since you did just help me escape, I’ll give you a hand, too.”

Right now, Xi Ping was using the reincarnation wood to keep the dragon shadow trapped while hacking at Xiang Ning. Even with the support of the Dragon Vein, there really was too much for him to do. He couldn’t free up a hand to keep a lid on Zhuoming.

Zhuoming extended a hand and grasped the Territory Map rubbing he had put together from the relics of innumerable Zhaos. “Allow me to demonstrate how the true power of the Territory Map ought to be used.”

As if it had been whipped, the dragon shadow that had crawled out of the broken Dragon Vein went crazy. The arrays the walkers in the mortal world were using to repair the veins of the earth were instantly destroyed. The better part of Xi Ping’s reincarnation wood trees were pulled up by the roots. At the same time, Zhuoming’s lotus seals struck back like a reprisal, pulling apart the dozens of portions of his consciousness he had split off.

Xi Ping’s vision went dark.

Never mind mortals, even half-immortals could hardly move now.

The place where the Dragon Vein had snapped just happened to be on the densely populated east bank of the Lingyang River. The lines of tall buildings were about to cave in. A child's heartrending cries went up. He was hanging in midair, hands losing their hold on a slanting railing, about to fall into the dragon shadow's mouth.

From the dust crawled a woman covered in dust herself, perhaps the child's mother. She was bleeding, her skinny arms like grass that had sprouted from a crack in a stone. In the midst of this irresistible catastrophe, she managed to struggle forward and reach out, firmly grasping the child's sleeve. There was a long rip as the sleeve tore. The woman screamed desperately.

Four or five hands reached out simultaneously. The people who normally squabbled as they shared these cramped living quarters all scrambled to catch the child. There were old people and young people...just as if they themselves weren't on the brink of dropping.

But the building would fall in the end. It only held out for a moment before there was a teeth-aching snap. The rescuers fell along with those who were struggling.

In a flash, several Kaiming half-immortals charged in against orders, using weak talismans and spiritual energy to weave a big "mesh bag," knocking aside the building and the mortals who were about to fall into the dragon shadow.

It was already all that a half-immortal could do to charge into a place like this. The mesh bag tore apart, and the figures of several half-immortals flashed. Before they could make a sound, they fell into the dragon shadow's mouth.

Like spiritual stones drained dry, they turned to dust in the blink of an eye, and the dust was thrown up into midair.

Just then, at the docks, the spiritual stones conscripted at the last moment from the southern mines arrived. Xi Ping once again managed to raise the few reincarnation wood trees still remaining to him.

“Is Xuanyin Mountain's Heavenly Question,” he said, gritting his teeth so hard they nearly snapped, “slower than a flying goose letter?!”

What were those two high elders doing? Why hadn't they prohibited spiritual energy yet?!

Zhuoming laughed aloud. “Poor wretch, why are you still baffled? Don't you understand yet? The reason that the Territory Map rubbing the Zhaos inherited from their ancestor could move the land wasn't that someone of Zhao Yin's ilk could shake the roots of the spiritual mountains' veins of the earth—what they moved was the Territory Map itself, sealed within the veins of the earth. Your Xuanyin Mountain high elders prohibiting spiritual energy was only a by-product caused by spiritual energy not flowing through the veins of the earth when its seal was used to stifle the Territory Map. The Dragon Vein has broken, the Territory Map has been released, and they're all out of cards to play!”

What the hell was this Territory Map? Why hadn't the Southern Sage destroyed it, leaving a hidden danger like this lurking for future generations?

“Shiyong!” Just then, Zhang Jue's voice came through the reincarnation wood—yes, Xi Ping had always treated them as outsiders and hadn't recalled that the Dignitary of Fate High Elder had a reincarnation wood tree; he didn't need to go through Pang Jian to contact him.

“Dignitary of Fate El...Elder.” At the end of his endurance, Xi Ping turned to impertinence. “If you...were telling f-fortunes in the mortal world, you'd get your stall knocked over twice a day...”

The Dignitary of Fate was thousands of years old; naturally he wouldn't bicker with him. “The Dignitary of Rule and the Dignitary of Rites are on their way. If the Territory Map falls into Xiang Ning's hands, the thirty-six peaks will fall and shake the foundations of this nation. You...”

Xi Ping didn't hear the rest of it. As soon as he split his attention, Zhuoming's lotus seals reached the consciousness within his true body. His ears rang.

But in the midst of the fierce pain, his mind was still working.

The Dignitary of Rule and the Dignitary of Rites were on their way... Why wasn't Zhang Jue coming himself?

Had the Dignitary of Fate messed up a divination and gotten his leg broken by a dissatisfied customer? What was he busy with? Why wasn't he coming in person to clean up the Dragon Vein he himself had failed to repair properly?

Suddenly, Xi Ping remembered Zhang Jue saying in the Sea of Stars that when his shizun became a shed skin sage, the Dragon Vein would no longer need to be repaired, and Great Wan would be eternally secure.

So this was what he had meant—when the Dragon Vein had broken then, it, along with a part of the Territory Map that had leaked out, had ended up in Zhi Xiu. Once General Zhi became a sage, it would mean that the Territory Map belonged to the spiritual mountains.

But...what kind of sage?

Xi Ping hadn't yet had time to change his clothes after they were sliced to rags by the struggling sword aura on Flying Jade Peak. His heart sank: obviously not the kind of sage that planted an accompanying plant in the earth.

Meanwhile, Zhang Jue had landed outside of Flying Jade Peak.

“Jingzhai,” the Dignitary of Fate High Elder sent his voice into Flying Jade Peak from afar, “I shouldn't rush you, but events have been sudden...”

In Xi Ping's spirit, a new crack appeared in Zhaoting.

“No...” With difficulty, Xi Ping split off a sliver of consciousness and futilely wound it around that crack. “Shifu, no...”

Zhi Xiu was silent—perhaps he couldn't speak under the pressure of a fresh round of heavenly might. Neither Xi Ping, far away in Jinping, nor Zhang Jue, kept out by the mountain seal, had any way of knowing.

But Xi Ping could sense from the shard of Zhaoting that he was wavering.

A person could resist his own fate, resist the enlistment of the spiritual mountains, but...could he pay no heed to Jinping City on the point of collapse?

The crack in the shard of Zhaoting grew.

“Shifu, you were only a mortal then, and you defended Jinping from the Lancang Sword for a day and a night. I can do it, too... Shifu!”

San-ge had said that shed skins were fettered by divine will. That, like the Dignitary of Fate and the rest, they became part of the spiritual mountains. The person who came out of seclusion in a hundred years might not necessarily be the person he knew.

He had talked big then, said, “That’s his business.”

Now he was babbling, pleading desperately: “Shifu, I can defend Jinping, don’t listen to them, don’t go there...”

San-ge had entered the way of clarity. If shifu also had his hands bound and went into the spiritual mountains, became a lofty sage, then next time he fled the Latent Cultivation Temple in a panic, where would he go?

“Shifu, I’m begging you...”

On Xuanyin Mountain's Principal Peak, everyone was buzzing with anxiety. There was endless gossip and surmise. Terms like "Jinping," "Dragon Vein," and "war" constantly floated through Zhou Ying's ears.

But he ignored them.

His consciousness had already made countless patient circles around the Bell of Tribulation.

Xuanyin Mountain's divine tool hung invisible in the air above the Principal Peak. Zhou Ying could "see" the path of its every tremor, and the direction that its spiritual energy surged in.

There were thousands upon millions of inscriptions on the Bell of Tribulation, so vast that a single look could drive a person mad.

Fortunately, the way of clarity was immovable as a mountain. He couldn't go mad.

With the Way of the Heart standing guard, Zhou Ying was utterly patient. As if untangling a knotted skein, he probed inward layer by layer.

Just as Princess Duanrui, in her capacity as Dignitary of Rites Elder, urgently left the Principal Peak to hurry toward Jinping, he found the gap.

Zhou Ying's consciousness, so mild it was as if it didn't exist, instantly poured in, grasping the faint aura in the depths of the Bell of Tribulation—the heart demon seed.

As expected, the heart demon seed was inside the Bell of Tribulation!

As soon as the heart demon seed, which had appeared to be on its last gasp, touched him, it immediately cast off its pretense of weakness and violently lashed out against Zhou Ying—at the moment of capturing a heart demon seed, a person was often at their most lax and self-satisfied.

But Zhou Ying didn't resist. He casually opened his spirit and let the heart demon seed dive in, burrowing into his spirit and taking root.

The moment the heart demon seed landed, every nook and cranny of his memories was brought out.

But Zhou Ying only looked on like an observer, watching the past calmly, his mind unmoved.

The moment he had entered the way of clarity, it had frozen and rinsed away his emotions.

On his spirit, the place where the heart demon seed had taken root petrified little by little. A crust like colored glass grew on the heart demon seed's root system and slowly swallowed the whole seed.

CHAPTER 167 - Flower in the Mirror (10)

It was said that each demon seed contained nine thousand facets, nine thousand smiling faces, reflecting the circles within which humans had confined themselves since time immemorial.

Only without self could one see the truth.

In fact, the way of clarity wasn't the "way of demon-subduing." It was mainly that Zhou Ying's current situation was special—his Way of the Heart was external, and it had been inherited directly from the current pinnacle of the way of clarity, a master half a step from a shed skin.

This was different from the Ways of the Heart those like Zhao Qindan totteringly fumbled toward on their own and made from scratch. The disparity between his cultivation level and Duanrui's was too great. Within herself, her Way of the Heart could hardly cope, but it could envelop Zhou Ying in his entirety like a mountain. He couldn't digest it right away. And precisely because he couldn't digest it, he had temporarily entered an unusual state of "void," the restriction becoming a powerful protection—there would be nothing to worry about now even if a master came to fight a duel of Ways of the Heart with him. He would only need to relax and let the Way of the Heart carry him through it.

Precisely because of this, the heart demon seed, which could only attack the mind and was otherwise toothless, could do nothing to him.

Moreover, Zhou Ying had grown up alongside the demon host in the Impassable Sea. He was well acquainted with the nature of the heart demon seed. He was simply the heart demon seed's natural predator.

He only quietly waited off to the side while the last heart demon seed in the world exhausted all its efforts and finally stopped struggling.

Like amber, it congealed.

The surface of the heart demon seed wasn't smooth. It was made up of countless small facets. Zhou Ying didn't actually count to see whether there were nine thousand. He only watched the rich play of color over them—it was actually rather pleasing to the eye.

He pierced the tamed heart demon seed with his consciousness. When he opened his eyes, in the depths of his pupils flashed a pair of “multifaceted gemstones.”

The cursed descendant of the demon subduers had obtained a pair of demon's eyes, as if predestined.

Through the demon eyes, just like when Zhou Ying had first established his foundation, the world seemed once again to turn completely on its head. The last layer of “gauze” covering his eyes had also vanished.

First he raised his head to look at the Bell of Tribulation in the sky above the Principal Peak.

The Bell of Tribulation didn’t come out to frighten people for no reason. Only the eyes of those who had found the edge of the shed skin boundary or those with a paramount spiritual sense could see it.

An established foundation with a paramount spiritual sense could see the Bell of Tribulation at a glance from the Latent Cultivation Temple. At the Principal Peak, he could clearly see every inscription on it, as well as its spiritual energy.

And right now, Zhou Ying could see that there was “color” to the spiritual energy surrounding the Bell of Tribulation. The vast majority of the spiritual energy blended with the surroundings, constantly gathering and dispersing in its flow. But the lower part of the great divine tool of the mountains was linked to a special thread of spiritual energy, which was grey as the smoke belched out by the factories in the southern outskirts. It was clearly spiritual energy scattering outward, yet it didn’t move a hair in the strong wind of the mountaintop. It maintained a fixed form—like a big hand supporting the Bell of Tribulation.

No...wait.

Zhou Ying's demon eyes went deeper. He found that at the join between the "smoke" and the Bell of Tribulation, the Bell of Tribulation's edges were blurred.

Rather than saying that the grey spiritual energy was supporting the Bell of Tribulation, it would be better to say that the Bell of Tribulation had itself "grown out" of the spiritual energy; it was a physical embodiment of that grey spiritual energy.

Staring at the Bell of Tribulation for a moment, Zhou Ying at once saw through Xuanyin's thirty-six peaks.

He saw the established foundations bustling all over the mountains, all with more or less essence within them, and the grey spiritual energy of the spiritual mountains curled up within their essences like an infant's umbilical cord; the Zhou clan's ascended spirit peak masters were currently gathered to talk about something, and unknowingly they were allowing that grey spiritual energy to pass through their meridians.

Then he looked at the only shed skin who was still within the spiritual mountains at present—Zhang Jue.

Through the demon eyes, a person's emotions were crystal clear: the Dignitary of Fate High Elder was outside of Flying Jade Peak right now, feeling hesitant and distressed, with faint unspeakable remorse mixed in... but none of that was important—what the demon eyes saw was that Zhang Jue was a “half-person.”

Only half of his body was flesh and blood, with all kinds of subtle emotions churning within it as with the ascended spirits; the other half, however, was completely grey. At a glance, it looked like it was made of clay brick.

The high elder was in the air on a sword. It was easy to see that the “clay” half of his body was connected at the foot to the grey spiritual energy extending from the spiritual mountains. Like the Bell of Tribulation, he seemed to be a person who had “grown out” of the spiritual mountains.

While the ascended spirits were also full of smoke, it was only interwoven with them; they still had plenty of emotions, desires and weaknesses.

Zhang Jue, however, was different. His grey half was completely separate from his other half...and it wasn't “dead”; in the grey spiritual energy, the demon eyes saw panic.

This was the panic of the Bell of Tribulation, the panic of the spiritual mountains as a whole.

The demon eyes paused briefly on Zhang Jue, then continued to probe onward. They penetrated Flying Jade Peak's mountain seal and beheld...a magnificent sight.

On Flying Jade Peak, the "smoke" of the spiritual mountains covered everything. When panic became concentrated enough, it would turn to rage. The "smoke" so dense it had nearly condensed into clay bricks was desperately throwing itself at the sword platform on the slope.

The person on the sword platform was evidently half a step from a shed skin, yet there wasn't a sliver of grey spiritual energy within him. The wondrous sword cuts that covered the ground kept resisting the corrosion of that "smoke." Beside him was a sapling that looked something like a birch tree.

The connection between that tree and the person was just like the one between the Bell of Tribulation and the Xuanyin Mountains.

Without any judgment, Zhou Ying thought, "There's a rebel against the spiritual mountains here..."

But the resistance on the sword platform was growing weaker and weaker, and the sapling was withering at a speed visible to the naked eye.

“...though it seems he won’t hold out much longer.”

Just then, Zhou Ying’s spiritual sense was touched. The box of notes in his mustard seed opened on its own and spat out a slip of paper.

He reached out to remove the note. On it was written: Sanyue’s Heartless Lotus is an ascended spirit, and he was trapped in the Silver Moon for centuries. He has seen more secrets than all the world’s shed skins put together. He must already have guessed the location of Great Wan’s Territory Map. Now, while that lunatic is attacking, take a look at the veins of the earth—what is this “Territory Map” that the sage wouldn’t breathe a word about?

Concerning what the Territory Map actually was, why did it seem that all the shed skin sages of Xuanyin weren’t as well informed as Zhuoming, who had been locked in a cage for centuries?

Zhuoming was using the Territory Map rubbing to push his way through, and Xi Ping, at an impasse, wanted to “blindfold” Zhaoting with his consciousness, not let shifu see what was happening in Jinping now.

But that was only futile self-deception. The crack in the shard of Zhaoting in his spirit deepened.

Xi Ping had the feeling that if that shard of Zhaoting disappeared, he would no longer have a shifu.

Crushed between the oppressive immortal mountains and the shameless evil cultivators, he couldn't catch his breath. There was a gloomy lump of stagnant blood in his chest. For a moment, he even came to the edge of losing his mind. He wished the universe would collapse; he wished he could kill everyone.

Just then, his consciousness, beaten and scattered all over the place by Zhuoming's lotus seals, slipped into an unexpected place—as Jinping City wavered, the poor of the east city were fighting for their lives, while the wealthy of the west city had retreated into their inscriptions if they had them, had shut up their houses if they had arrays; whether it was any use or not, they all ordered their guards to surround their houses tightly.

Only the Yongning Marquis Manor hadn't been shut up.

The front gate was open. The Marquis at his age couldn't stand up for long, so the servants had brought a chair for him to sit in. Madam Cui ordered a bowl of hot soup to be sent to him. In the midst of the turmoil, he said, “Thank Madam for this gift.” He held the bowl of soup in both hands. At his feet was the miniature reincarnation wood tree that before had been growing in Prince Zhuang Manor.

The dim lantern at the gate swept over the “Peace Under Heaven” gate pins and fell on the reincarnation wood, quickly brushing over Xi Ping’s eyes, steadying his scattered mind.

Next, a familiar bracing smell came flying toward him head-on. Xi Ping’s consciousness, fallen into the reincarnation wood, returned to his body. He blocked automatically, but the thing turned into a thread of clear energy and seeped into his sense organs—it was a mind clearing pill.

The scent of the elixir diffused everywhere, as if it had no need to perform a diagnosis and could sniff out where the injured were, then dissolve the correct medicine into the wind.

At the same time, a fierce wind flew straight toward the white lotuses in the gutters; a segment of heartless lotus stalks that couldn’t dodge in time corroded and turned black.

The taste of this mind clearing pill was all too familiar. Xi Ping looked up and saw that the first person to arrive from Xuanyin’s inner sect turned out to be neither the Dignitary of Rule nor the Dignitary of Rites—it was Wen Fei.

This medicine cultivator could fight, far exceeding Xi Ping's expectations. He instantly alleviated the one-against-two pressure Xi Ping was struggling under. His fan shook, sending a handful of talismans flying toward Xiang Ning.

People normally classed the medicine and toolmaking ways together—as a representative of those too weak to undertake a burden, Wen Fei himself was in fact always grouping himself with Lin Chi. But Xi Ping found to his astonishment that it was possible Master Lin was the only one of Xuanyin's thirty-six peak masters who really couldn't look after himself.

When Peak Master Wen, who normally seemed somewhat unreliable, got down to it, he let out a string of killing blows, more direct than Xi Ping, who had rolled out of a heap of evil cultivators. Why did his posture as he tossed out talismans without batting an eye resemble Pang Jian...?

A line of writing on the fan quickly swung at Xi Ping's chest: Your humble servant was the General Commander of Heaven's Design Pavilion...some number of office holders back.

Xi Ping: "..."

Pardon his lack of manners, it was Lao Pang imitating him.

“Zhi Jingzhai,” Wen Fei suddenly shouted to Zhi Xiu through Xi Ping. It turned out that he wasn’t mute. It was only that, perhaps because he hadn’t spoken in a long time, he bit off each word individually. “Don’t—listen—to—them.”

Wen Fei landed beside Xi Ping, glanced at him, still couldn’t stand the sight, and gave a sigh of lamentation. He brought his fan up in front of Xi Ping’s eyes. On it was written: The Heartless Lotus is poison. I can’t defeat him. You go ahead.

These words flashed and vanished. Had Lin Chi been reading them, he probably wouldn’t even have had time to understand them. Then Wen Fei took out something like a giant seal and pressed it toward the constantly quaking ground of Jinping City. To Xi Ping, he said, “Follow me!”

Zhi Xiu wasn’t a person who liked a lot of bustle, but from Duanrui, Su Zhun, and other such people, to Zhao Qindan, whom he had casually added to the list of provisional disciples, his appraisal of people was quite good. Rosy Cloud Peak just happened to have the most interaction with Flying Jade Peak of all the thirty-six peaks.

Xi Ping had no time to think carefully. He could only temporarily trust in his shizun's ability to choose his friends. His consciousness followed Wen Fei into that black seal.

He felt his consciousness enter the earth. As a Jinpinger born and bred, he had never been so close to Jinping. His consciousness seemed to have melded with the earth of Jinping. It struck violently against the Heartless Lotus.

Enemies walk a narrow path—the lotus seals copied by the Discard the False and Keep the True book crashed into the real lotus seals. Xi Ping and Zhuoming simultaneously felt stabbing pain in their consciousnesses; each retreated.

While the faux lotuses couldn't defeat the real lotuses, Xi Ping's consciousness had the hidden bones attached to it; cultivation for him was being constantly broken and remade; he was much more resistant to attacks than the “delicate flower” Zhuoming. He didn't care at all about a little wound like this. After a pause, he immediately continued the pursuit.

As he chased, he asked, “Wen-shishu, what is this?”

“The Territory Map rubbing of the Jinping area.” Wen Fei used his consciousness to communicate directly, sounding much more normal. His speech was even rather fast. “No, sword god’s disciple, don’t call me ‘shishu.’ It makes me feel old.”

Zhuoming had stuck together his Territory Map rubbing by swallowing the relics of countless Zhaos, but the one Wen Fei had was evidently complete. It had clearly come from the hands of a Zhao inner sect master.

Where had it come from?

“Wen” was no distinguished noble surname, and he’d said himself that he came from Heaven’s Design Pavilion. Why would he have something belonging to the Zhao family stashed away?

Xi Ping suddenly realized that it was because Wen Fei had set out as soon as he sensed something going wrong in Jinghua Village that he had been able to arrive faster than the two elders.

In other words...when he had left, he hadn’t told the immortal mountains; he hadn’t even followed the rules and gotten a token to leave.

On Xuanyin’s Principal Peak, Zhou Ying crushed the note. Following his own instructions, he gazed into the depths of the spiritual mountains with the demon eyes.

The veins of the earth—also called the spiritual veins—extended from the spiritual mountains, covering all of Great Wan like blood vessels. The offshoot that reached into the capital city of Jinping was the so-called Dragon Vein.

Now a hideous tear had opened in the Dragon Vein. A bit of blackness had seeped out of the “wound,” causing the thing that had lain perfectly dovetailed within the veins of the earth to fall slightly out of alignment, revealing its true face.

It was an enormous shadow, its main body crouching beneath the Xuanyin Mountains, the “branches” extending from it identical to the veins of the earth flowing out of the immortal mountains.

In the immortal mountains, there was a statue of the Southern Sage. It was solemn and stately; it seemed to be alive.

And in the same spot within shadow, there was an inverted statue of the Southern Sage.

Zhou Ying paused: he had heard that the great demon in the depths of the Impassable Sea had a face identical to the Southern Sage’s.

Just then, spiritual light flashed from the demon eyes. Zhou Ying, the new master of the heart demon seed, having subdued it, seemed to sense something. Following the spiritual light, his consciousness sank into the demon seed.

After a moment, he had a sudden realization.

The countless facets of the heart demon seed reflected Xuanyin's thirty-six peaks; the history hidden within the heart demon seed ran backward before Zhou Ying's eyes and played out once more.

He saw the instant the Southern Sage reached a full moon position—countless spiritual stones gathered around the sage's Way of the Heart and assembled into Xuanyin's thirty-six peaks.

The demon eyes saw that the moment the sage stepped over the full moon boundary, the Way of the Heart that had been fed by endless cultivation and spiritual stones broke free of the Southern Sage and turned around to pollute his body.

The sage became the vessel of the Way of the Heart, and he didn't know it himself.

And just then, he received word from an old friend who, while they didn't follow the same path, was still on fairly good terms with him. This friend invited him to go to the East Sea's Impassable Sea to vanquish demons.

This person's name was Yuan Hui. His way was called "ungovernable." His temperament was a little unsociable, but he wasn't a bad person. When all the forces of evil had been running amok, he had even helped the Southern Sage look after his young disciples.

The Impassable Sea was a nest of demons. It ought to have been cleared out long ago. So the Southern Sage brought along a demon subduer and went to accept the invitation.

In the Impassable Abyss, the demon eyes reflected the truth about becoming a god: Yuan Hui had no Way of the Heart; when he discovered that he was being controlled by his hidden bones, this shed skin master who had always been ungovernable personally cleaved the hidden bones, killing himself at the bottom of the Impassable Sea.

And the Southern Sage saw his own true face reflected. His heart demon was immediately born. At the same time, the spiritual mountains quaked, and the "Territory Map" came into being.

But Southern Wan's borders had just been established; the common people had been given a place to shelter. He could no longer afford to pay the price of the spiritual mountains collapsing. All he could do was join hands with the demon subduer to seal the secrets of the Impassable Sea and the spiritual mountains beneath the Resurrection Vortex forever.

The Territory Map wasn't the supposed "reflection of the spiritual veins in bodies of water"; it had been born from the sage's heart demon.

It existed alongside the spiritual mountains. The sage had been well aware of it, but he could never get rid of it.

When Zhou Ying had entered the way of clarity, Duanrui had asked him what his special eyes had seen. He hadn't answered then, because had he said it, Princess Duanrui's Way of the Heart would have crumbled on the spot like Zhao Yin's.

What he had seen was: the way of clarity and unfeeling was a scam. There was no such thing as all-embracing, all-comprehending pure intellect.

If a person had a heart, whether it belonged to a way, to a demon, or a mortal, they could never forget emotion and become a god.

And the way of clarity and unfeeling was seen as the origin of the three thousand paths of the Great Way. Reasonably speaking, every road to becoming a sage ought to arrive by different paths at the same destination that the way of clarity led to. Supposing the way of clarity had no endpoint, then none of the three thousand paths of the Great Way could have an endpoint.

When the full moon sages had “broken free of the mundane dust and ascended,” where had they ascended to?

Clarity’s Way of the Heart wiped away the fog before the eyes of the paramount spiritual sense: they hadn’t gone anywhere; the Southern Sage was still in the mundane world.

His corpse was called the thirty-six peaks of Xuanyin.

CHAPTER 168 - Flower in the Mirror (11)

So that was it.

Within the Way of the Heart of a near-shed skin, Zhou Ying was like a small insect all alone inside a spacious mansion. Because he was so negligibly small, even the sky falling couldn't have much impact on him.

But despite this, the moment the heart demon seed reflected the spiritual mountains, he actually felt the Way of the Heart waver.

Fortunately, this Way of the Heart wasn't his.

He hadn't taken a close look at any of the questions contained within the Way of the Heart, never mind experiencing and inheriting them. Zhou Ying had absolutely no interest in this way. At the same time, having disconnected his emotions, he didn't care that his cultivation path would end before reaching its destination, and he didn't care about heartbreak or death. In a peculiar fashion, this meant he accorded with the way; he remained calm.

Since the formation of the spiritual mountains, Zhou Ying was the only person to reach this point.

The common people looked to the immortal mountains for guidance, ignorant of the reality. And once you truly set foot on this path, however many unanswered questions there were in your heart, you could still never face this truth.

Even Princess Duanrui, at the end of the way of clarity, having long ago received hints from her cultivation level and her spiritual sense, was still attempting to find an “exit,” as if it was only that her boundary wasn’t high enough, that she hadn’t quite made it “through.” Once she made it through, she would be able to find the answer she wanted.

Standing here meant the collapse of your Way of the Heart, meant facing your own hundreds upon thousands of years of utterly meaningless bitter struggle and search.

Only a person on the verge of death would look this way.

The Heartless Lotus could only count as halfway capable of understanding him. Perhaps he had also been here. But he was burdened with a hundred and eighty bickering Ways of the Heart. They wouldn’t permit him to preserve his reason for so long before the tombs of the sages.

Inside and outside the immortal mountains, in the whole vast sea of people, Zhou Ying was the only one to come in solitude to pay homage at the place where the gazes of generations of the dying had converged.

Fortunately, he was currently incapable of feeling loneliness.

Just then, the box of papers in Zhou Ying's mustard seed moved for the third time. He received the third...“guiding last testament” from the past.

In Jinping City—

Events were happening too quickly. Xi Ping had no time to work out what the “Territory Map” was; he only relied on his instincts, which told him that this big four-legged worm that had been sealed by the veins of the earth crawling out meant nothing good.

But a person couldn't fight a “shadow,” and with Xi Ping's experience and cultivation, he didn't know how to force this thing back. Next to him there were also the old weasel Xiang tearing right at the Dragon Vein and the damned bald donkey constantly provoking the black dragon.

Fortunately, Wen Fei had brought along another “Territory Map rubbing.”

When he poured his consciousness into it, Xi Ping could at last touch the black dragon—the Territory Map itself—directly.

From the black dragon's body, he heard the loud rushing of rivers and the echoes of human voices underground; he heard a heavy heartbeat coming from within the earth, like a pump, scattering the spiritual energy that gave life to all things, growing more and more urgent.

Even Xi Ping's own heart was influenced by that pulse. He quickly dismissed preoccupations and placed a mind calming spell over his ears.

“Wen-shi... Peak Master Wen, how do we use this thing?”

Wen Fei answered with his consciousness: “I'll lure away that crazy shed skin, you think of a way to control the Heartless Lotus and use the rubbing to lure the Territory Map...that dragon back into the veins of the earth, and then we'll seize the opportunity to repair the hole in the Dragon Vein!”

In answer, Xi Ping picked up a string of faux lotuses and knocked Zhuoming flying. Zhuoming, wounded, broke away from the Territory Map rubbing.

Xi Ping quickly covered the rubbing with his consciousness: Go back!

But the black dragon shadow underground tilted its head toward him: it seemed to be “alive.” After hundreds upon thousands of years sealed underground, its dreams were all of escape. The scraps of Territory Map rubbings from the Zhaos could only touch it, awaken it; they couldn't command it.

The rubbing was obviously no dragon-taming chain.

How was he supposed to convince it to return to the veins of the earth? Use well-meant admonitions, persuade the dragon with virtue?

Seeing the withered heartless lotuses once again ready themselves to climb up along the gutters, Xi Ping decisively pulled over the Tai Sui Qin. Music holding sword aura pierced through the Territory Map rubbing, firmly hitting the black dragon on the head.

The black dragon went sideways. It seemed to have been knocked silly.

“Wh-wh-what are you doing?” Wen Fei was perturbed. He nearly let a talisman Xiang Ning had parried snag him. He had no attention to spare to use his consciousness to pass a message. He yelled out, stuttering, “Are-are you...beating up the Territory Map?”

He's punched it right in the head!

“Is that not allowed?” said Xi Ping.

Then, not waiting for Wen Fei to hold him back, he bashed the black dragon over the head with one beam of sword energy after another.

Wen Fei's tongue didn't seem to be very nimble. "You'll...you'll anger it..."

"Did it look particularly calm to you before?" said Xi Ping.

"At this point, I only know two sword moves," Xi Ping cried out toward the shard of Zhaoting frozen in his spirit. Two beams of sword energy slapped the black dragon's face, one left and one right. On the ground, the dragon shadow's long beard flew wildly. "Look at me! Don't you feel humiliated, shifu?!"

Zhi Xiu: "..."

Since its birth, no one had pulled a sack over the Territory Map's head and boxed its ears. The whole dragon was being hammered into the damaged Dragon Vein by the Tai Sui Qin like a nail.

Wen Fei: "..."

That works?

You couldn't judge by appearances. Shaking his foot in front of the Dignitary of Fate High Elder was nothing; he thought that this hero might think nothing of running naked through Xuanyin's thirty-six peaks! Where the hell had Zhi Jingzhai picked him up?

The black dragon returned to its senses. It was beside itself with rage. The dragon shadow's beard bristled like a porcupine.

Seeing this, Xiang Ning pushed Wen Fei aside and took the opportunity to slam against Jinping's already torn Dragon Vein.

Xi Ping howled: "Elders, Duanrui-shishu!"

Xiang Ning and Wen Fei both paused in the midst of their struggle: What? Where?

Xi Ping quietly scattered an immortal tool like a dandelion—this was the same one that, during the revolt of the nine great Zhao ascended spirits, Lin Chi had used at his urging to counterfeit the Bell of Tribulation to scare the rebel faction.

There came the droning of a bell, crossing all of Jinping City, colliding with the big bells at the Southern Sage Temple in the mountains to the south, striking an echo.

At the same time, Xi Ping used the Discard the False and Keep the True book to create a handful of lotus seals that he tossed at Xiang Ning's consciousness. The two attacks overlapped. Xiang Ning's consciousness shook; he was almost overwhelmed with terror.

Xiang Ning didn't belong to Xuanyin. Unlike Xi Ping, he couldn't immediately work out that Wen Fei hadn't taken a token when leaving the mountains, so there had to be something fishy going on. From his perspective, Wen Fei arriving with the Territory Map rubbing represented the arrival of Xuanyin's inner sect. With the Dragon Vein unstable, it was only natural for Xuanyin's three elders to come in person.

Xiang Ning was perfectly well aware that he had only been able to become a shed skin because there was no one else in the Xiang clan, and the sect leader, not wanting there to be no one who could curb Xuanwu, had piled up all the West Peak's resources, personally stood guard, and shoved him up to being a shed skin himself. He was definitely no match for Xuanyin's old geezers, who had lived through the Great War of Gods and Demons... He might not even be able to beat the near-shed skin rising star.

The game was as good as lost. Xiang Ning came to a decision—he had to run.

When Xuanyin came for him after the fact, he would simply deny everything.

Anyway, the Lingyun Mountains had half-collapsed. The decline of Shu was already a foregone conclusion. Next to the spiritual energy bandits at Xuanyin, those southern barbarians would have no other choice; they would have to side with Chu. Northern Li had always disliked the south with its billowing smoke. They certainly wouldn't step in to help Southern Wan... Xuanyin stood above the crowd on the continent, but they were also beset on all sides; he wasn't afraid of them coming after him!

In a flash, Xiang Ning had his whole line of retreat perfectly planned out. He skillfully activated his marvelous powers of skedaddling and abruptly retreated, serving up Zhuoming in front of the two great ascended spirits.

Wen Fei was well aware of the fact that Xuanyin's elders couldn't get here fast enough—and even if they did, they wouldn't bring the Bell of Tribulation. Jinping wasn't Tao County; no one could bear the responsibility if there really was a three-year drought.

Anyway, the Bell of Tribulation had to remain in the inner sect to keep watch over Flying Jade Peak.

Gracious, what were public morals coming to? Here was a young sprout terrorizing an elderly man nearly a thousand years old in broad daylight!

Wen Fei rapidly pulled together his attention, which had been dispersed by the ascended spirit grade scare machine. He scattered a handful of poison, killing all the heartless lotus stalks reaching out of the nooks and crannies and wiping out all the rats and mosquitoes under Jinping into the bargain. For the next three years at least, there was no need for Jinping to worry about an epidemic.

Meanwhile, the highly efficient Kaiming Department had transferred a large quantity of spiritual stones from nearby.

Bai Ling felt that something was faintly off. He roughly calculated the volume of freight and found to his surprise that the spiritual stones that had been delivered to Jinping far surpassed his impression of the Kaiming Department's reserves.

Yes, he suddenly remembered, his lord had previously always been storing up the spiritual stones the Luwu collected on the black market.

His lord seemed to have...expected that such a thing would happen. Had he seen something in the South Sea Hidden Realm?

Strangely, a bit of Bai Ling's barely suppressed anxiety lifted. These spiritual stones pouring steadily into Jinping seemed to be his lord coming in person...the one from before.

As soon as he thought this, Bai Ling suddenly once again found his bearings. He turned around and joined the group of Heaven's Design Pavilion's established foundations.

After Wen Fei finished sprinkling "weedkiller," he created an inscription in midair, drawing a large quantity of spiritual energy to stab at the black dragon's head.

The black dragon, unreconciled, struggled. The veins on the back of Wen Fei's hand holding his fan stood out. Countless spiritual stones turned to powder and brushed past him. The medicine cultivator's hands were as steady as the most precise machine in the southern outskirts. A series of inscriptions without a stroke out of place crashed out like a thunderstorm and were picked up by Xi Ping's utterly merciless sword energy, joining forces to shove the black dragon back into the Dragon Vein.

Wen Fei landed and staggered. "Quick!"

Pang Jian gave the order, and Heaven's Design Pavilion's established foundations quickly began to repair the damaged Dragon Vein.

Just as this crisis seemed about to stabilize, there was a sudden change.

Xiang Ning, fleeing the battlefield in pants-wetting terror, froze. In silence, some vast will that even a shed skin was powerless to resist engulfed him without warning, instantly suppressing his consciousness.

At this time, there was a sudden peal of thunder in the Sanyue Mountains. The spiritual energy began to stir, flowing spontaneously toward the West Peak, forming a sinister whirlpool in midair.

All of Sanyue's great ascended spirits were disturbed. One after another, they rushed over to the West Peak, but they found that none of them could get near the elder's residence.

They exchanged looks of bewilderment. Before they could come up with anything, they saw a sudden burst of glaring light pierce through the dark clouds.

Someone cried out, "Look, the Silver Moon!"

The Silver Moon had originally been on Sanyue's East Peak. After Xuanwu had fled, Xiang Ning, in order to pretend that the sect leader was still there and bolster morale, had placed the Silver Moon on the Central Peak. Now, the invisible “moon” had suddenly appeared in midair and was heading toward the West Peak along with the surging spiritual energy. It landed on the summit of the West Peak.

The Silver Moon’s cold light burned brightly, pelting down like rain on the summit of the West Peak, turning most of the top half of the peak into a ghastly white silhouette. Then, following the moonlight, a large quantity of spiritual energy poured into the West Peak elder’s residence!

The ascended spirits scattered like rats, terrified of being splashed by the Silver Moon. There remained only Xu Rucheng, concealed at the foot of the West Peak. This Luwu was a hothead who would even dare to spectate at a shed skin battlefield. Rather than fleeing for his life, his first reaction was always to get a better look and send out the information.

Xi Ping and Bai Ling received his message at the same time.

Bai Ling frowned: “What does that mean?”

The Silver Moon thought Xiang Ning had disgraced himself, so it had decided to cook him like an evil cultivator?

But after a moment’s blankness, Xi Ping’s pupils contracted sharply. “Peak Master Wen, out of the way—”

Before he could finish, Wen Fei's spiritual sense was also touched.

This former general commander of Heaven's Design Pavilion reacted extremely fast. First he waved his sleeve to sweep all the established foundations away. Then he flung his fan up high and opened up a temporary protective mustard seed, shielding himself and all the walkers in the mortal world behind it.

The sleeves that had floated up in his haste had yet to settle when from the nearly sealed crack in the Dragon Vein began to ooze a quiet light...like moonlight—it was shining through Xiang Ning's consciousness.

However unworthy a shed skin, he still belonged to the spiritual mountains. A shed skin's greed was never purely his own foolishness.

The wailing of the Lingyun Mountains had not only shaken the western continent; it seemed that it had also awoken the terror of the other spiritual mountains.

Terrified Sanyue, desperate to maintain its position as “sole authority,” had pointed a sword at Xuanyin.

Just like Lancang over two centuries ago.

The fatal moonlight, using the consciousness of the perhaps already dead Xiang Ning as a medium, seeped out of the crack in the Dragon Vein, passing through the whole area of Jinping and Ning'an.

It was as if a peculiar string of lanterns had been lit underground.

The Silver Moon's instinct to destroy evil still remained. As soon as it latched onto its old acquaintance Zhuoming, it immediately wiped out all of his hidden lotus stalks.

The other cultivators, who had "status" and were under the protection of the Xuanyin Mountains, didn't turn to ash beneath the Silver Moon's light, but they still couldn't budge.

Wen Fei's fan fell to pieces. The inscriptions on the Lingyang River's west bank melted in the moonlight coming out of the ground; there was no more distinction between Jinping City's wealthy and poor.

Like fracturing porcelain, the level ground silently cracked.

Jinping's Dragon Vein, which before had only broken in one place, was now completely shredded by the malignant moonlight. The black dragon shadow underground was free of its fetters.

The dragon's head swallowed Jinping City. The dragon spread throughout Southern Wan broke free of the veins of the earth. The Territory Map's seal was broken!

The black dragon that had been imprisoned for thousands of years turned its head and roared toward the Xuanyin Mountains, opening its mouth wide. The spiritual energy of the human world and the immortal mountains surged into its mouth.

It was striking back against the spiritual mountains!

Just like Zhao Yin in the past, the consciousnesses of all the cultivators closest to that black dragon were sucked into the Territory Map.

The half-immortals on the outer rings protecting the mortals as they fled all went blank—with one exception.

Zhou Xi, who just happened to be maintaining order in Dangui Lane, paused. In the chaos, lotus seals appeared in his eyes. The consciousness of this person who had once been the favorite of heaven was swallowed up like a stone sinking into the sea.

There were no ripples.

“Zhou Xi”’s eyes simultaneously made several circles in different directions, then fixed on the Yongning Marquis Manor—the only place in all of Dangui Lane with a light burning at the gate.

In the sudden upheaval, no one noticed one of their colleagues going missing.

“Zhou Xi” seemed to have been half-paralyzed. Limping, he went inward along the path of Dangui Lane. He began to croon a strange ditty indistinctly: “Papa’s knife’s in need of honing, Mama’s got the water boiling...”

From several zhang away, the butler Haozhong, desperately counseling the Marquis to go inside, saw the “blue-clothser” dragging one leg behind him as he walked. He froze, then stood up and said, “Exalted?”

“Zhou Xi” stared at the potted reincarnation wood tree the Marquis was holding. The twitching corners of his mouth formed a smile.

Haozhong stepped forward. “Can I...”

A lotus stalk erupted from “Zhou Xi”’s mouth, aimed right at the center of Haozhong’s brow.

CHAPTER 169 - Flower in the Mirror (12)

A mortal couldn't see this swift-as-lightning "immortal skill" clearly. Before Haozhong had time to blink, just as the lotus stalk was about to break through his skull, a talisman came out of nowhere and lit the killer lotus stalk on fire. Haozhong was pulled away by the collar. When he looked again at "Zhou Xi," his mouth had been slit open by lotus stalks, stretching until it took up half his face. His chin had dropped right off. His front teeth were gone. The Marquis Manor's new butler plopped to the ground in fright.

Xi Yue, knife extended, shielded the Marquis Manor. The Marquis waved a hand to dismiss the servants. He stood up.

"Zhou Xi"—the walking corpse controlled by Zhuoming—tossed his head with force. He'd had a direct collision with Xi Ping via his consciousness, and his brain had been buzzing from the bump with the iron-plated head of that expert in being torn to pieces. Then all the lotus stalks in the city had been burned by the Silver Moon. Now, his vision was swimming.

Dragging Zhou Xi's body, Zhuoming, as if drunk, squinted at the Yongning Marquis Manor in front of him. The Marquis Manor was no opulent dwelling. The people of Wan were naturally mincing; even if they were going to show off, they couldn't be ostentatious about it, or else they would be “descending to vulgarity.” So to Zhuoming’s eyes, this courtyard gate was a little plain, far inferior to his “home”... After all, his father’s surname was Xiang.

But his home hadn’t had this kind of lantern.

In his youth, there had been no Moon Plated Gold yet. The lanterns had to be lit, and the wicks would leap about; they weren’t this steady. There were a great many rules at home. The lanterns were lit and extinguished at set times. That bit of dim light was a sight seldom seen all day. His father’s official wife seemed to be worried that he would scare the sun; she had put him in a lightless wing. He couldn’t move, so he only lay there, bored out of his mind, watching the one ray of daylight that leaked into the courtyard, looking forward to the lanterns being lit.

When he woke, the lanterns were unlit. The next time he woke, the lanterns were still unlit.

“Zhou Xi”’s eye reflected the milky white lantern over the gate. He straightened out his bearing until he was practically urbane. He replaced his dropped chin and saluted the Marquis of Yongning. “Hello, Marquis, I happened to make the acquaintance of the Misty...of Shiyong. You could say we survived mortal peril together. I’ve long heard that Jinping City is the pearl of Southern Wan, the finest place in the world. I've always wanted very much to come and see his home."

Xi Yue, treasuring words like gold, said, "My older brother isn't here."

"Yeah, I know." "Zhou Xi"'s right eye didn't move a bit, but his left eye swiveled to look at the half-puppet. With a laugh, he said, "He's been sucked into the Territory Map. Back then, when Xuanyin's Elder Zhao Yin was sucked into the Territory Map, the Southern Sage was there to stand guard in person, and he was still trapped inside for a full forty-nine days and only escaped using the divine lightning from the high heavens when he became an ascended spirit. Now that the Territory Map wants to steal the spiritual mountains' light, even the Xuanyin Mountains will collapse. I'm afraid no one will have time to spare to look after anyone else. Why don't you all come with me and settle down in a 'nice place,' then wait for him to come back so you can reunite."

Before he was finished speaking, Zhuoming, controlling Zhou Xi's body, came forward like a ghost.

Xi Yue met him with a talisman. "Stop!"

Zhou Xi's body was only a half-immortal one. Xi Yue's talisman broke the not-fully-cleansed bones. His form instantly became warped...like Zhuoming in his youth.

Innumerable lotus stalks reached out from among the fractured bones, holding up the beaten human body. Though Xi Yue wasn't friendly with Zhou Xi, they were after all colleagues. Seeing him silently become a puppet in the hands of an evil cultivator, to be molded at will, he still felt horror. Zhuoming didn't spare this puppet body at all. The lotus stalks tore open the wounds and used the no longer flowing human blood as seal ink. A bloody lotus seal came right toward Xi Yue.

Just then, a bolt of lightning fell out of the sky and nailed the expanding light of the Silver Moon. Enormous inscriptions pressed down on Jinping City like a mountain, stabilizing the crushed veins of the earth. At the same time, blazing spiritual light flashed. A whip pierced the air and wrapped around the black dragon's neck. The Dignitary of Rule and Dignitary of Rites elders had at last arrived!

Lin Zongyi's mouth seal was blown down by the wild wind. "Xiang Ning, is Chu declaring war?!"

When this taciturn mouth opened, two sets of spiritual mountains on the continent reverberated simultaneously.

Xi Yue's brows moved. Instantly, the joy of "We've been saved" appeared on his face. But then there came a boom. The black dragon shadow rose from the ground and gave a fierce shake, dragging down Princess Duanrui, who had her whip wound around its neck.

The place where Duanrui landed was the very same Guangyun Palace where she had spent her whole youth. Jinluan Main Hall, carved all over with second-class inscriptions, folded like paper; the nine dragon pillars carved of stone crumbled. Guangyun Palace caught fire. Everyone was running for their lives. No one had attention to spare for putting out the fire. The south-facing heated room bore the brunt. The Welcoming Spring painting by the "Carefree Old Man" that Emperor Taiming had once hung there vanished as soon as it was licked by a tongue of flame.

All relics of the mortal world were lighter than floating dust.

Duanrui was after all only a near-shed skin. She was now being entirely dragged along by the Territory Map, which even a full moon sage was powerless against, while Lin Zongyi was in a deadlock with the Silver Moon that was seeping through the Territory Map rubbing. It just so happened that no one had attention to spare for tiny Dangu Lane.

Zhuoming laughed aloud. The lotus stalks exploded from Zhou Xi's body. While the Silver Moon was too busy to attend to him, this audacious lunatic freed himself of the hindrance of his half-immortal puppet's skin, his true body simply swapping places with his accompanying plant!

Inside the next life spiritual fish in the depths of the sea, Wangge Luobao sat by and watched as Zhuoming disappeared before his eyes. He said nothing, and he wasn't surprised.

He only holed up alone inside the fish's mouth, tapping his right palm with his left hand. In an unusually soft and tender voice, he began to croon an ancient Miah tune—a song of eternal parting used during funeral processions.

Sadly, Zhuoming couldn't hear it.

Jinping's burst Dragon Vein could no longer prevent the incursion of the ascended spirit evil cultivator. The moment Zhuoming's true body arrived in Dangui Lane, apart from the reincarnation wood, from every place in the Marquis Manor where there was water, as if a plague of snakes had descended, lotus stalks that would swallow anyone they saw erupted.

Xi Yue was pushed a hundred meters away and knocked over someone's courtyard wall when he crashed into it. He was very popular with the Kaiming Department. Though events had happened so quickly that there had been no time to call for help, a large number of Kaiming Cultivators had rushed over upon hearing a stir.

The half-immortals valiantly charged into the Marquis Manor's courtyard, shielding the mortals.

Zhuoming couldn't restrain his laughter. Without so much as looking at these half-immortal ants attempting to shake a tree, he knocked them aside like dust and landed into front of the Marquis of Yongning—the Marquis instinctively shielded the potted reincarnation wood tree in his arms, even though the big flowerpot was too heavy for him and weighed him down so much that he couldn't stand up straight.

Zhuoming's staring eyes flashed, stabbed by this sight. He tilted his head stiffly. The lotus stalks quickly wrapped around the Marquis's lapels, dragging the old Marquis so that he staggered half a step; a lotus seal stamped the center of the Marquis's brow.

Just then, from the Marquis's brow and from the Marquis Manor's courtyard, several beams of utterly cold sword light flew out, carrying the frostiness of the north, and pierced the lotus seal.

Zhuoming was caught off guard. The blow nearly sliced off half his head.

The way of the sword was a direct and daring way, but the sword wind that had shot out from the Marquis Manor was out of the ordinary; its chill seemed capable of permeating a person's spirit.

The sword wind wrapped around Zhuoming's already injured consciousness like winding silk. All the malice in the depths of his heart was uprooted, revealing the "seed" buried deep beneath the malice. His paramount spiritual sense-bearing senses were swallowed by lengthy illusions. The Marquis of Yongning before him turned into Xuanwu, into his stranger of a father, into his puppet-like mother, into the frightened, shirking servants...

The heartless lotus stalks extending in all directions flew wildly. Two Kaiming Cultivators, guarding the Marquis with their lives, got him out of the way. The potted reincarnation wood tree fell out of his arms. It landed on the ground and was snatched by the deranged Zhuoming.

Spiritual light flashed beneath that small tree. A transport array hidden beforehand was activated.

But the weak spiritual light of this half-immortal grade array couldn't attract the lunatic's notice. Out of control, the Heartless Lotus swallowed everything he saw. He swallowed the item that came through the transport array directly into his spirit.

The next moment, Zhuoming stiffened abruptly. The lotus stalks that were wreaking havoc stopped moving. They gave a twitch as if dying, bringing down the Marquis Manor's porter's lodge.

On Xuanyin's Principal Peak, Zhou Ying was holding the third note. On it was written: The Yongning Marquis Manor must not be lost. Get rid of the Heartless Lotus. The Blind Wolf King's Perplexing Sword Attack is with the Marquis. You can assist with the heart demon seed.

In front of Zhou Ying was a very simple transport array. Through it, he transported a prism-like demon seed.

While the note said "must not be lost," it wouldn't matter if it was lost. Zhou Ying couldn't feel worry, and because he wasn't concerned, he was steady. He chose his time precisely.

The flowerpot of that reincarnation wood tree was a downgraded immortal tool for communication. Across the vast distance, it allowed him to meet the world's other paramount spiritual sense.

But Zhuoming could no longer see him.

Zhuoming clutched his own throat tightly, staring in front of him as though his eyes were about to burst from their sockets, but his gaze was unfocused.

The heart demon seed flashing through his pupils had completely blocked his line of sight.

Zhou Ying could practically hear the rejoicing of the heart demon seed. There was no place on earth more suitable for a heart demon to sprout than on the Heartless Lotus. The moment Zhuoming swallowed it, the demon seed couldn't hold back from taking root and sprouting in every segment of lotus root. In the blink of an eye, it had formed a big net.

Every consciousness Zhuoming had swallowed was reflected by the facets of the heart demon seed. Innumerable interwoven loves and hates fractured his mind.

The Kaiming Cultivators surrounding the Marquis watched dumbfounded as this horrifying great evil cultivator's flailing lotus stalks withered. His flesh shrank bit by bit as though being dessicated. A shell like crystal formed around him. On countless small facets flashed countless faces belonging to Zhuoming.

From instinct, Zhuoming was struggling fiercely. As the heart demon nibbled away at him, he was constantly forgetting his own story. He thought vaguely that he had said something; then he heard in the depths of his lotus heart a person saying blandly to him, "Right-side up. Why don't you put those down?"

Zhuoming was stunned. Through the prism, he saw his own face—the wan face of his youth, when he couldn't yet rearrange his features like a monster.

In his heart, he dimly knew who the person answering was, and he knew what fate it would lead him to if he followed this person, but just like three hundred years ago, his tears still fell uncontrollably.

That person said to him, “Come with me.”

The Kaiming Cultivators saw this evil cultivator suddenly stop moving and, as if letting his hands be tied, allow himself to be locked inside a “stone shell,” like a winged insect in amber. The “stone shell” wrapped around him was constantly shrinking. At last it shrank to the size of a broad bean. Because of the refraction of light through the prisms, the transparent stone appeared to be a particular shade of grey.

One unusually erudite half-immortal mumbled, “This...seems to be what's written of in books...a ‘star stone’ from the bottom of the Sea of Stars.”

No sooner had he spoken than the Heartless Lotus's unruly lotus stalks fell with a crash.

Zhuoming had captured the consciousnesses of countless people, trapping them in the lotus stalks, forever unable to reincarnate.

His own consciousness was trapped in the heart demon seed, forever unable to reincarnate.

Zhou Ying's face appeared above the flowerpot. Then he said to the half-immortal who had spoken, "This isn't a star stone—put it in the transport array and send it over for me."

Then he nodded to the Marquis and gently said, "Thank you, uncle."

The corner of the Marquis's eye twitched violently, as if he had been slapped. After a long moment, he finally waved a hand to dismiss the servants coming to support him and softly said, "Your Highness."

Zhou Ying took back the heart demon seed. In the midst of Jinping City, wavering on the point of collapse, he smoothly wished good health to the Marquis. When he was finished, he was about to cut off the communication and crush the note.

Then he saw a line of his own slightly hesitant writing on the back of the note. It said: Wait a bit.

CHAPTER 170 - Flower in the Mirror (13)

He had written the note himself, and the way of clarity wasn't the way of memory loss. Zhou Ying could easily "remember" what he had meant: if the Heartless Lotus could infiltrate Jinping City and swagger into Dangu Lane to make mischief, Jinping would have to be in the midst of chaos, and Xi Shiyong would be trapped.

His "past self" had wanted him to stay here and keep the Marquis company for a while.

Zhou Ying felt there was no need for this. In this battle, he had done all that an established foundation like him could do.

And as for the Marquis of Yongning—while it cost the Marquis an effort to stand for too long, he was still giving directions with perfect ease. The Kaiming Cultivators were unlike Heaven's Design Pavilion. They had practically all begun cultivating within the last fifteen years or so; they were young and inexperienced. Seeing Zhou Ying stand by saying nothing, they all matter-of-factly obeyed the old fellow. The Marquis was urging the petrified Haozhong to go inside and check on Madam Cui...perhaps he meant for her to look after him. Then he called Xi Yue over. Seeing that Xi Yue wasn't seriously injured, the Marquis bowed to the nearby Zhou Xi and said to Xi Yue, “Please invite His Fourth Highness inside to rest, don’t leave him out in the middle of the street to... Take care.”

He had made perfect arrangements for the living and the dead. Zhou Ying didn’t see that the Marquis needed anyone’s company.

But he had nothing else to do, anyway. He wasn’t in a hurry. When the Kaiming Cultivators came to their senses, they trotted over to cautiously pay their respects. Whenever anyone came to greet him, Zhou Ying nodded to them.

He toyed absently with the heart demon seed and in the end remained above the flowerpot, joining the Marquis in watching the indistinct daylight hanging unsettled in the sky above Jinping.

At present, the shed skin grade battle of the spiritual mountains and the Territory Map was no longer something that an ant of established foundation level or below could see. Lin Zongyi had long ago opened a temporary mustard seed. Looking from Dangui Lane, the sky was a muddle; even the wind had stopped. The Azure Dragon Tower that had seemed to be eternally standing tall at one end of Dangui Lane was gone; this changed the whole look of Dangui Lane. Half the sky had emptied. Who knew where the crescent moon would hang when next it rose?

Supported by a servant, the Marquis of Yongning sat in a new rattan chair that had been brought over; he couldn't bear to look at Zhou Ying. His slightly emaciated and dry hand lightly stroked the reincarnation wood sapling—not long ago, while delivering the potted tree to the Marquis Manor, Zhou Ying had said that Shiyong returning was a sign; it meant that the strength of the spiritual mountains was waning, the orthodox sects were stretched too thin. They could no longer control the rampant growth of evil cultivators. There would certainly be great turmoil in the future. He had asked the Marquis to prepare.

That was when Bai Ling and Xi Yue had used a Perplexing Sword Attack to place a sword array in the Marquis Manor. The Perplexing Sword was the vital sword of Northern Li's rebel, the Blind Wolf King. Its sword energy could shake a person's Way of the Heart. It had been extraordinarily effective against that evil cultivator just now who had called himself Shiyong's friend... Presumably the trap in the Marquis Manor had been tailor-made for him.

His Highness had also said that with events at this stage, the time for him to establish a foundation and enter a way had come. He couldn't tell Xiaobao, or else he might refuse to behave and come home, go make more trouble instead.

As for what way he would enter, there was no need for him to say; the Marquis understood.

“When I was young, I wanted to go north, but I never managed to set out,” the Marquis said softly, his breath a little short. “In order to protect you, your mother decided to stay. In fact, she had been pampered and spoiled all her life. Her temperament was weak. Back then she was only a girl who had never gone through any trials. I knew her. If I had really set my mind to it, it wouldn’t have been impossible to take her away by force... But I had an old mother and a frail wife. With Ziyi as my excuse, I compromised in the end. My generation has been cowardly. We’ve left it all for your generation to bear.”

If the child bearing a double curse hadn’t been born, there would have been no consciousness to pry up a corner of the Impassable Sea to escape. Liang Chen wouldn’t have wandered in there by mistake, wouldn’t have come to a fork in the road and been enticed by the Territory Map. Reincarnation wood wouldn’t have had the chance to see the light of day again... All the events that had followed, none of them would have happened.

As for Zhou Ying and Xi Ping, one might have died in the womb, and the other would probably have become a shepherd at the feet of the Beijue Mountains. They wouldn’t have been forced into “ways” that they had to walk alone and unaided, wouldn't have been sentenced to serve out prison terms in the mortal world while innocent.

When the Marquis's hand fell on the flowerpot, it began to tremble. "Your Highness, A-Ying... If your grandmother knew, in the future, when we meet in the underworld...she would blame me for it."

Unruffled, Zhou Ying soothed him: "Cicadas have their ends, humans have their lifespans, and spiritual mountains also grow old. The cause was buried thousands of years ago, and now the effect has come. No matter what, this chaos in the world was an inescapable doom. It was nothing you could alter with a single thought. Do not take it to heart, uncle."

While they spoke, Xi Yue and some Kaiming Department half-immortals had used talismans to clean up Zhou Xi's body, carefully sewing up the damaged places. Then Xi Yue took off his own sapphire blue outer robe and covered him with it. He was carried into the Marquis Manor's courtyard.

During the passing of the deceased, the living all kept silent.

From politeness, Zhou Ying watched the final journey of this brother who had a different mother from him, toying with the heart demon seed that held a murderer—time and space inside the heart demon seed were both illusory, different from the outside world. In this space of time, Zhuoming had once again followed Xuanwu into the Sanyue Mountains, had once again been let down and betrayed.

In that prism like a kaleidoscope, he once again launched his scheme for revenge.

While taking revenge, he could be completely focused. When he was avenged, his pleasure was practically such that he could have died without regrets. But soon, he fell back from his ecstasy and sank into unending despair, so that he once again became frantic, once again came to a dead end...was once again called away by a sentence from Xuanwu in the illusion, repeating his whole life.

Zhou Ying suddenly noticed something. His fingertips tapped the heart demon seed. A thread of smoke flew out from Zhuoming's consciousness.

Zhou Ying clutched that thread of thin smoke and sniffed out a noxious smell only to be found in spiritual beast feeding grounds. When that smoke came upon a person, it would try to burrow into their sense organs. Zhou Ying felt his own heartbeat suddenly change as it was seized by that thin smoke, as if being dragged into mud. At the same time, his breathing became slightly unsteady. He observed briefly and felt that this was a physical reaction akin to "sadness."

So Zhou Ying concentrated and locked onto that smoke, using clarity's Way of the Heart to knock it apart. His heartbeat returned to normal, and he understood the purpose of this smoke—this must be a method peculiar to the way of beast-taming that could magnify a living creature's emotions without being noticed.

Wangge Luobao.

This Miah rebel who would sell himself in all directions had betrayed the Lingyun Mountains and obtained the sage's Way of the Heart, and then, as soon as he was strong enough, he had colluded with Zhuoming to betray the Miah clan leader. After usurping the clan leader's position, he was naturally unwilling to be controlled and manipulated by the lotus seal, so he had turned upon the Heartless Lotus. He truly was a remarkable individual.

Zhou Ying raised his eyebrows. He watched as Zhuoming inside the heart demon seed escaped Wangge Luobao's interference, but he only froze where he was and raised his head to cast a glance outward.

Who knew what those eyes of his that also possessed a paramount spiritual sense saw? Zhuoming had no "great awakening." Instead, he kept calling for "shizun," willingly going further into the depths of the heart demon seed.

In his whole life, only two paths were “true”: the first was whole-hearted adoration as he racked his brains and exerted all his efforts for a nod from his shifu; the later was whole-hearted hatred as he schemed incessantly for centuries to get revenge on Xuanwu. He had single-handedly destroyed Sanyue’s thousand-year glory and reached the pinnacle of life.

All that a person wanted in life was but one wild fantasy after another. Attaining it, you were left empty-handed and had to go on choosing new illusory goals, like flowers in a mirror, the moon in water, eternally racing on without pause to the next difficult journey.

What difference was there between racing in the real world and racing in the heart demon seed’s illusion?

Clarity’s Way of the Heart reflected this mockery in Zhuoming’s glance perfectly. Zhou Ying, immovable as a mountain, savored it briefly, then put away the heart demon seed.

From Xuanyin’s inner sect, all the ascended spirit peak masters and the middle and late stage established foundations had set out. While the two high elders firmly held down the thrashing Territory Map, the inner sect masters hurried to various spots to steady the mountain ranges and waterways.

The sage who could suppress the Territory Map was not longer present. All of Xuanyin was fighting the Territory Map with their lives.

Xi Ping, who had been sucked into the body of the “black dragon,” felt that he had been swallowed by the universe. When he opened his eyes, all he saw was darkness all around.

Even a half-immortal could see easily in the dark. It had been many years since Xi Ping had found himself in pure blackness like this. He was dazed, almost feeling that he had “disappeared.” He automatically clenched his fist. Just as he was about to form a talisman, he heard someone cry out: “D-don’t use spir...spiritual energy! Do you have a tin...tin...tin...”

Peak Master Wen’s actions were swift as the wind, but his speech was truly too aggravating.

Fortunately, Xi Ping caught on quickly. Before Wen Fei had finished stammering “tin,” there was a pop as Xi Ping lit a tinderbox—burning pure kerosene, with a mortal-made shell; there wasn’t even any Moon Plated Gold.

The bean-sized light shone into the distance. Xi Ping saw at once the cultivators lying higgledy-piggledy nearby. He gave a start and quickly bent to feel a walker in the mortal world’s neck.

“They...they’ve been...knocked out by—by the Territory Map.” Wen Fei approached, following the light. “I-it’s...fine.”

Xi Ping raised the flame. By firelight, he observed the surroundings and found that he must still be in Jinping City. The surrounding scenery was no different than it had been when he had fallen in. The collapsed buildings east of the Lingyang River were identical. It was only that the whole scene had a deathly air. Apart from the cultivators who had been sucked in, there were no living creatures, and the spiritual energy was extremely stagnant. His nose was flooded with the earthy smell of an ancient grave.

“We’ve been sucked in like Zhao Yin was back then?” Xi Ping asked. “How big is this place? How did Zhao get out?”

“As...as...as big as Great Wan, that...that’s how big it is,” Wen Fei said very laboriously. “Zhao...Zhao...Zhao...had help from the South-southern Sage and a h-heavenly calamity to...”

Xi Ping: “...”

It was said that the Xuanyin Mountains had four pities: General Zhi didn’t take disciples because of his “puzzlement,” the princess didn’t wear colorful clothes because of her “way,” Master Lin didn’t make tools because he was preoccupied...so Peak Master Wen didn’t speak because he stuttered?

Why was he unlike the rest?

Wen Fei’s fox eyes glared. “W-what-what’re you—looking at!”

Xi Ping considered, then sincerely presented a lousy idea: “Wen-shishu, you say we can’t use spiritual energy here, and you’ve lost your fan. It’s hard for you to talk, and it makes me feel bad to hear it. Why don’t you sing instead? I’ve heard that when...some people sing they stop stuttering. Shan Po Yang or Zhe Gui Ling?⁹⁷ You don’t have to rhyme or match syllables. I can provide whistled accompaniment.”

Angrily, Wen Fei said, “Y...you’re teasing me! I’m...I’m telling your shifu!”

In this respect, Xi Ping was so covered in lice that another one wouldn’t itch—Lin Chi had gone to lodge appeals at Flying Jade Peak’s door countless times. Xi Ping thought, It’s been over a decade. Do you think shifu doesn’t know what I’m like by now?

“Fine, tell him when we get out. You brought the Territory Map rubbing, what do we do now?” Xi Ping waved a hand. He frisked himself and came up with a piece of reincarnation wood. “Don’t sing if you don’t want to. If you trust me, spill your blood on this. It'll be faster to use your consciousness to 'talk' directly."

At any rate, the monk could run away, but the temple couldn't run with him; if the disciple got him in trouble, at worst he could always go to Flying Jade Peak to demand repayment from General Zhi. Wen Fei didn't so much as think about it before pressing a drop of his blood to the reincarnation wood.

"The spiritual energy in the Territory Map is different from the outside world's. Once it worms its way into your essence, you'll be here forever." As long as Wen Fei wasn't speaking aloud, his speech would be as quick as the words that flashed over his fan. As he spoke, by Xi Ping's light, he fed a mind-clearing pill to each of the unconscious established foundation cultivators.

As Xi Ping provided lighting for him, he transmitted the urgent information in his speech to the newly awoken and completely lost established foundations. Then he asked Wen Fei, "If we can't use spiritual energy, how are we going to get out? Walk? Where's the exit?"

Wen Fei's expression was a little grave. He shook his head and said, "We may not be able to get out in the near future. Back then, the Southern Sage suppressed the Territory Map with his own consciousness, forcing open a way out for Zhao Yin. Zhao Yin followed the lightning of his ascended spirit tribulation to get out... Unless another full moon sage emerges among us to tear open a passage...we'll have to wait for someone to take care of the Territory Map again.”

Xi Ping stopped in his tracks.

All of them put together would probably still be as far from a full moon sage as heaven was from earth. And as for someone who could take care of the Territory Map again...

Just then, the ground began to shake. There was a roaring in Xi Ping's ears. Mournful screams burst into the black stillness of the Territory Map. Xi Ping instinctively sent his consciousness toward the sound.

In the Ning'an area near Jinping, as the buildings and the ground collapsed, mortals were being swallowed by the Territory Map—the cracks in the veins of the earth had reached Ning'an, and Lin Zongyi and Duanrui were trapped in Jinping, unable to attend to so distant a place!

CHAPTER 171 - Flower in the Mirror (14)

“Don’t move!” said Wen Fei.

But it was too late.

There was a certain danger in sending your consciousness out where your senses couldn’t reach. You would be in for it if you were caught by a malicious master. Half-immortals and established foundations would often have misgivings. But for an ascended spirit, all the mortal world’s continents and seas were theirs to stroll through at will. There weren’t so many “malicious masters” out there.

Except in a situation like the South Sea’s chaotic battle, where he had known very well that Xuanwu and Lingyun’s Cauldron of Nine Dragons were nearby, Xi Ping never had any misgivings. In eight years, he had gotten used to running rampant through the human world. This instance could serve as a lesson to him.

In the dark, his extended consciousness was like a frail kite. It enraged the Territory Map. A savage gale that seemed to come from the wild past came out of nowhere to attack him. Xi Ping was caught off guard. The out-flung thread of his consciousness was pulverized.

His vision darkened; even his gaze lost focus. He folded like an empty shell.

Next to him, Pang Jian had just woken up after taking the elixir. He was still confused. His reactions were a little slower than normal. He only caught Xi Ping by the hair.

Wen Fei's scalp tightened. He looked away, simply unable to stand the sight.

Fortunately, before he was sucked into the Territory Map, Xi Ping had gone a round against the Heartless Lotus; his consciousness had been so badly shredded by that baldy that it had gone numb. He recovered in time, before General Commander Pang's talons could pluck him a bald spot. His consciousness, spread throughout the surrounding reincarnation wood trees, speedily returned to hold up his body. He narrowly managed to plant his heels in the ground. Inclining in the direction of Pang Jian's tug, he turned a half circle like an awl and fell to one knee with a thump.

Wen Fei, afraid that others would be as rash as him, impatiently opened his mouth to give a warning: "D-don't l-let out your con-consciousness here!"

Xi Ping's temples felt as though someone had crashed a pair of bronze cymbals on them. The veins on his forehead stood out. He felt that his brains had turned spindle-shaped. The blow from the Territory Map was comparable to the Heartless Lotus shredding his consciousness.

But for the moment, he had no attention to spare for anything else—in order to handle Zhuoming, his consciousness had been hidden all over the place. There was still a portion in the reincarnation wood trees in the outside world; and just now, he had discovered that he could still contact those portions of his consciousness. It was only that something divided the worlds inside and outside the Territory Map. The responses lagged heavily, and his consciousness couldn't enter and leave freely; he also couldn't swap his body with the reincarnation wood trees outside.

But it was still enough.

Ning'an Province's outlying counties had reincarnation wood. Enduring a splitting headache, Xi Ping sent his thread of consciousness on the outside through countless reincarnation wood trees and ended up at the place where Ning'an's vein of the earth had cracked.

Ning'an was too close to Jinping. The local Heaven's Design Pavilion branch was basically Jinping's rearguard. If anything happened, they would immediately be transferred to the capital. Ning'an had currently become a blind spot.

There was a waterway running through the little town. The residences were all clustered along the banks. Under the riverbed, a black shadow was seeping out of the vein of the earth, which was cracking bit by bit, greedily spreading through the river within the town. The land of both banks was like melting wax, softening and being absorbed by the black dragon shadow.

Like a miser seeing a bank note fall into the fire and finding no tools to hand, Xi Ping's first reaction was to reach out his hand to scoop.

Outside the Territory Map, the reincarnation wood trees growing along the riverbanks all fell toward the crack. Perhaps because he was inside the Territory Map himself, just like when he had obtained the Territory Map rubbing, Xi Ping could use the reincarnation wood trees on the outside to touch the Territory Map.

The reincarnation wood trees' suddenly growing branches rapidly sketched a stream of talismans and stopped the constantly falling people and things.

At the same time, while his essence had yet to be emptied, Xi Ping made the reincarnation wood trees in the corresponding place inside the Territory Map grow wildly, connecting to the ones outside that had lain down and been caught in the hole in the vein of the earth. The reincarnation wood trees inside and outside of the Territory Map swiftly interwove, weaving a big, tangled and complicated net with an array plaited into it—he had picked it up while the walkers in the mortal world were repairing the Dragon Vein.

The Territory Map, which had pulverized his consciousness earlier, erupted into fury. The force of collapsing mountains and overturning seas crashed against the thicket. Xi Ping felt that his brains were about to spurt out of his ears. His consciousness shouted to the dumbstruck mortals, “Move it!”

Gritting his teeth, he forced the tree branches down, blocking the hole. Whether the array had been drawn correctly or not, he had no energy left to fix it. He could only plaster it inside and out several times over, making a hideous “patch” over the vein of the earth.

Xi Ping’s eyes hurt as though they had been stabbed. Blood dyed the hair at his temples. Bai Ling held him up.

The hole in Ning’an’s vein of the earth was only a small crack, covering less than one li, but Xi Ping’s essence, which had emptied out nearly half the Kaiming Department’s reserves of spiritual stones, was once again in a critical state—with an ascended spirit’s essence, it was possible to guard one’s spiritual eyes while using spiritual energy and keep the contaminated spiritual energy inside the Territory Map from entering one’s body. But once the essence was used up...

Bai Ling quickly pulled out a handful of spiritual stones, but the moment the spiritual stones left his mustard seed, they turned to dust—the spiritual energy in a spiritual stone would disperse throughout the surroundings. This Territory Map was a bottomless whirlpool, greedily swallowing spiritual energy from the outside world.

“Spiritual stones are n-n-no good.” Wen Fei quickly took a handful of objects, each the size of a walnut and with a glossy surface, from his mustard seed. It wasn’t clear whether they were metal or stone. He stuffed them into Xi Ping’s hand. “Take for yourself!”

Xi Ping’s senses had nearly gone out of commission from the Territory Map’s attack. He didn’t take a close look at what the things were. He only felt that each “walnut” contained about as much spiritual energy as an established foundation’s essence. He instinctively probed them with his consciousness and drained the “clean” spiritual energy inside.

Though for an ascended spirit, this bit of spiritual energy was like putting out a fire with a cup of water, at least it let him catch his breath and protect his spiritual eyes.

The drained “walnuts” fell to the ground, becoming an inauspicious slate grey. Next to him, Pang Jian was stunned. “Are those...silk dragon hearts?”

The silk dragon heart was the most valuable material that went into the established foundation pill. Probably the only person on earth who could fish up a handful at a time was the master of Rosy Cloud Peak. This thing could repeatedly absorb the surrounding spiritual energy and store it long term. It was like a portable cultivator's essence.

Many years ago, Pang Jian had gone south to the Land of Turmoil with a young man who understood nothing. The two of them had been as bad as each other, their minds filling with evil designs at the sight of riches. They had plotted to go to the spiritual beast pasture in Southern Shu's encampment to poach a silk dragon.

That young master who had grown up in the lap of luxury had said he didn't want the heart; he only wanted a bit of the silk dragon's horn... because a silk dragon horn could treat dim sight disease. He had been viciously ridiculed by Pang Jian.

Later, during the events of the East Sea, he and his things had disappeared together amid the vast waters. That segment of rather hard-won silk dragon horn had fallen into the Resurrection Vortex as well; no one had wanted it anymore.

Now, this was all like something from a past life.

Pang Jian automatically stepped forward to pick up the silk dragon hearts and was blocked by a wave of Wen Fei's sleeve.

“Don’t.” Very determined to save face, Wen Fei kept his voice very slow, doing his best to only say each syllable once. “When the silk dragon...heart is empty, it...sucks in nearby spiritual energy, it’s...hss...already... contaminated.”

Having said this, with a grave look, he turned to Xi Ping, “Xi Shiyong, can’t...can’t you be more like your shi...shifu? D-do you think y-you’re the Southern Sage?”

“I’m not,” Xi Ping mumbled almost inaudibly. “Thank you... I’m not—and neither are Lin Zongyi or Her Highness Princess Duanrui.”

All the walkers in the mortal world, hearing him actually refer to the Dignitary of Rule High Elder by name, collectively drew in a breath.

“Stop hissing, if calling his name could summon him, I’d sit here yelling ‘Lin Zongyi’ ten thousand times, yell it until he wanted to change his name.” Xi Ping tilted his head to wipe the blood from his ears and heretically said, “Let me give you all some news that may or may not be good. The Dignitary of Rule and the Dignitary of Rites have both reached Jinping.”

When he had been repairing the vein of the earth, though he knew perfectly well that he shouldn’t waste his strength, he had still been unable to restrain himself from looking toward Jinping—his consciousness had lingered for a moment in the flowerpot at the Marquis Manor.

A number of houses and courtyard walls in Dangu Lane had collapsed; everything was in disarray. A group of half-immortals, along with Xi Yue, were collecting someone's corpse. But the Marquis was still sitting safe and sound at the gate. Xi Ping felt his father's warm palm on the reincarnation wood tree and halfway relaxed; he meant to leave, but he heard that his dad seemed to be...talking to san-ge.

From the point of view of the reincarnation wood, he couldn't see Zhou Ying. In the confusion, Xi Ping's mind was shaken. He instinctively followed the Marquis's gaze toward the sky. But that look didn't find Zhou Ying. Instead, through the chaos before those mortal eyes, he had seen Lin Zongyi and Duanrui in desperate straits.

The elders had come in time. Didn't that mean Jinping was secure and someone would take care of the Territory Map?

Before the others could feel pleased, they saw that the expression on Xi Ping's pale face wasn't right.

“Viscount, what's wrong?” said Bai Ling.

Xi Ping, leaning on Bai Ling, straightened up with difficulty. “I think that good-for-nothing Lin Zongyi...”

Pang Jian was shocked. “Xi Shiyong!”

Wen Fei seemed to have gotten stuck: “B-b-be c-c-care...”

“...doesn’t seem to be a match for the Territory Map,” Xi Ping finished.

Everyone instantly went silent.

It was well known that the Dignitary of Fate High Elder controlled the Sea of Stars, the Dignitary of Rites took care of the daily tasks of the thirty-six peaks, and the Dignitary of Rule, apart from being taciturn, had once been the Southern Sage’s head disciple—and was now the foremost among Xuanyin’s shed skins.

In the current age, apart from Sanyue’s Xiang Rong and Kunlun’s Sect Leader, who was supreme in the way of the sword, there were few people to rival him.

If even Lin Zongyi couldn’t take care of the Territory Map...

Xi Ping looked up at Wen Fei. “Wen-shishu, Princess Duanrui isn’t a shed skin yet. If we can’t rely on Lin Zongyi, what else can we do?”

Wen Fei automatically glanced toward the center of Xi Ping’s brow, then quickly averted his gaze. With a bitter smile, he said, “The Territory Map’s seal is broken. Any rub-rubbing is...useless. What—what else can we do?”

Xi Ping immediately understood what he had left unsaid—if Lin Zongyi couldn’t do it, then Xuanyin’s only hope for taking care of the Territory Map had to fall on Zhi Xiu.

The moment the Silver Moon had swept through Jinping City and the Territory Map’s seal had broken, the heavenly might oppressing Zhi Xiu had abruptly lightened.

Xuanyin’s thirty-six peaks were shaking. The wrathful “heavenly might” had begun to focus all its strength outward, seeming to weaken moment by moment. Not long after, it had had no more attention to spare for him. It disappeared entirely.

Zhi Xiu went to his knees, leaning on Zhaoting. The cold sweat on his back had frozen long ago. He was like an ice sculpture. Ringing echoed in his ears. For a time, he could hear nothing.

Echoing repeatedly was Xi Ping's cry coming across the vast distance: "I'm begging you."

The Dignitary of Fate High Elder was outside Flying Jade Peak. Zhi Xiu's consciousness was being pushed and pulled repeatedly. He was exhausted.

The heavenly might that had wished to force him to bend his head had dispersed, but Zhi Xiu knew that this was no good omen. It was likely that the spiritual mountains were too busy to deal with him.

In a rare occurrence, Zhi Xiu took out a pill—sword cultivators didn't like to borrow external force. Though all the medicine Wen Fei had made for him was of the gentle strengthening and healing type and didn't even count as "external force," he had always thought that injury and illness were a part of cultivating the way of the sword.

But now he no longer cared about "cultivating." Rosy Cloud Peak's elixirs were the best on earth. As soon as the pill slid down his throat, Zh Xiu's mind cleared. His meridians, which had nearly tied themselves into knots, immediately smoothed out. He caught his breath and split off a sliver of his consciousness to go to the shard of Zhaoting.

But he couldn't make contact—he could clearly feel that the shard of Zhaoting was still there, but something seemed to be obstructing his consciousness.

Zhi Xiu's pupils contracted slightly: what had happened?

Then he heard the Dignitary of Fate Elder's voice come to him on the wind and snow. "Jingzhai, the Territory Map's seal has broken, the Dignitary of Rule cannot handle it. He just sent word. I can no longer stay here with you."

The Territory Map's seal was broken...

A cloud flitted by, driven by a wild wind. The shadow of the lofty mountain moved rapidly, covering the Dignitary of Fate High Elder entirely.

"But I fear that there is no help for it. Only the consciousness of a full moon sage could suppress it." Zhang Jue sighed softly and closed his eyes. When he spoke, it was unclear whose voice came from him: "In Jinping City, nearly all the established foundation disciples have been sucked into the Territory Map... I do not know how long we can hold fast. If the Territory Map escapes, the thirty-six peaks will collapse. I am afraid...that I ought to bid you farewell."

Having said this, Zhang Jue's figure flashed, and he flitted toward Jinping... practically somewhat flurried.

Zhi Xiu's gaze fell on the struggling birch sapling. In this brief span of time, the little sapling that had been repeatedly broken had once again put forth new shoots, just like grass after a brush fire. Beneath the flourishing life force that had been repeatedly honed, a spiritual light closely connected to yet also repelled by the Xuanyin Mountains glimmered on the branches and leaves, unwilling to submit.

Zhi Xiu touched a leaf with his consciousness. The spiritual light on the leaf echoed his consciousness. He sighed.

Zhaoting's light flashed as it finally sliced toward that small sapling.

Just then, a wooden amulet passed through the mountain seal, meeting no resistance, just in time to shield the sapling from Zhaoting's blow. The amulet, sliced in half, gave a miserable wail, nearly shaking the accumulated snow off the sword platform. "Lin—Chi! Did I dig up your fucking ancestral graves?!"

Zhi Xiu: "..."

There was only one person apart from the master of Flying Jade Peak who could be allowed in by the mountain seal.

“What kind of way is that to talk, fiend?” Zhi Xiu raised a hand to summon the reincarnation wood Zhaoting had sliced apart into his palm. His scarred hands were still shaking. “Where are you?”

“Inside that big worm’s...that damn Territory Map’s belly. There’s not much of my consciousness left outside, if you break it I won’t be able to contact you. Take it easy, shifu.”

As he’d thought—Zhi Xiu’s hand tightened.

But then he heard this unruly disciple, as if he were stupid and had no idea what kind of deathtrap he’d wound up in, give three rather light-hearted laughs. “You know, it brought this on itself, daring to swallow me. This little master’s going to make sure all its guts run today.”

“Who are you calling yourself a master in front of? I’ve really spoiled you. Your manners get worse and worse,” Zhi Xiu interrupted him in exasperation. “Shiyong, listen to me...”

“La-la-la, I’m not listening. Heh, why don’t you work on that big worm instead, tell it to have a nice long chat with the Latent Cultivation Temple, the north slope, the Sanyue Mountains, and the Lingyun Mountains.”

“...Impertinent,” said Zhi Xiu.

“Shifu,” Xi Ping said, suddenly becoming serious, “do you know about how, years ago, my old dad wanted to rebel and run away to Northern Li on account of my aunt and unborn san-ge?”

The Zhou family’s demon-raising plot had come to nothing. For Zhi Xiu, belonging to the lineage of the Dignitary of Fate, the schemes of the mortals connected to it were apparent at a glance. All he’d had to do was take one look at the Sea of Stars.

“Yes.”

“My dad regrets up to this day that he didn’t persist back then. He’s always thought that even if san-ge died in the womb, he would still have been better off than he has been living this life. If he’d succeeded back then, everything would be different now,” Xi Ping said. “I used to think that the old fellow was right, but lately I’ve had some different thoughts about it...”

Far underground, Xi Ping, sealed into the Territory Map, as he talked to Zhi Xiu, was using his drop of consciousness on the outside to send all the people he knew in circles.

First he needed spiritual energy. It was the same for Xi Ping and Wen Fei—an ascended spirit’s essence couldn’t be restored with a few silk dragon hearts. If there was another small crack in the veins of the earth anywhere and they had no spiritual energy to restore themselves with, never mind the established foundations, even the two of them would be drained dry.

If a spiritual stone was taken out here, its spiritual energy would immediately be snatched away by the Territory Map. The only thing they could use was the silk dragon heart, like a cultivator's "portable essence."

Xi Ping had quickly contacted Lin Chi through the reincarnation wood. When he had asked him to deliver the reincarnation wood amulet to Flying Jade Peak, he had also taken the opportunity to loot next-door Rosy Cloud Peak, turning up all the silk dragon hearts stuffed full of spiritual energy that the master of Rosy Cloud Peak had stored up. Lin Chi's consciousness, carrying a large quantity of silk dragon hearts, was brought into the Law Breaker's space by Xi Ping—Xi Ping had tried it out; the Law Breaker could actually penetrate the Territory Map.

When the first silk dragon heart lit up the Territory Map, a crowd of veteran walkers in the mortal world nearly burst into tears of joy.

In Tao County, in the Land of Turmoil, in the South Sea Hidden Realm... even in the Sanyue Mountains, everyone who held a reincarnation wood amulet heard Tai Sui's voice.

“Everyone,” said Tai Sui, “this time, I need you to give me a hand.”

Xi Ping raised the tinderbox in his hand, sending the manmade flame far out into the Territory Map. He said to Zhi Xiu, “...If my san-ge hadn’t happened to pry open the Impassable Sea, the Zhou family’s demon-raising plot might have succeeded by now, and Great Wan would have been destroyed fourteen years ago. I don’t suppose that demon would have paid any attention to national boundaries or ethnicities, and he wouldn’t have needed any papers to cross a border. The world would have collapsed into its state before the Great War of Gods and Demons.

“Isn’t the current situation much better than a life and death struggle like that?”

“Shifu, don’t you think that the hidden bones coming to me was actually because heaven couldn’t stand to see all life extinguished and was leaving a gleam of hope for survival?” Xi Ping said softly. “What do stars know of destiny? They can’t even explain Detailed Account of Meridians.”

CHAPTER 172 - Flower in the Mirror (15)

The Silver Moon had used Xiang Ning's body to shatter Jinping's Dragon Vein. When Zhuoming disappeared, that patched-together Territory Map was also annihilated in the spiritual wind, and the Silver Moon withdrew from Great Wan.

On Sanyue's West Peak, Xiang Ning sat in his room without moving a muscle. He was like a human-shaped glass lantern, glowing all over, lighting up the whole room, a peculiar smile fixed on his face. Then, as if operated by clockwork, both the Silver Moon above the West Peak and Xiang Ning simultaneously turned in a half circle to face Great Wan.

Northern Li, Southern Shu, even the Queen Mother of the West and the others who had already returned to the Land of Turmoil, all of them sensed the upheaval in Jinping.

Outsiders couldn't work out at first what had happened. They could only tell that the Xuanyin Mountains were on the point of collapse—it was even more heart-stopping than the crying of the Lingyun Mountains.

First Lingyun, then Xuanyin. The impregnable spiritual mountains seemed to have turned into paper houses overnight, ready to topple at any moment.

In the Lingyun Mountains, the still fearful sect leader, elder, and all the Xiuyi masters were gathered near the fretful Cauldron of Nine Dragons, their hearts brought into their throats by the ominous noises coming from across the sea.

And just then, news reached Lingyun's summit that the inner sect masters who had been ordered to capture the Miah rebels had all passed away.

Apart from the sect leader and the shed skin elder, whose emotions didn't appear on their faces, all the Xiuyi erupted. Public sentiment was aroused.

Amid the pandemonium, Lingyun's sect leader at last gave a quiet sigh. "The Miah acting clan leader and two elders betrayed the nation. Without someone to sponsor them, all Miah on the main island must return to the Three Islands to face inspection. The Three Islands will be overseen by the main island's Dragon Subduing Knights. From this day forth, all Miah cultivators in both the inner and outer sects will be strictly investigated. But do your best not to disturb..."

The voice of the Lingyun Mountains struck word by word against the mortal world, sending clouds of dust flying.

The sect leader's conclusion of "Do your best not to disturb the mortal common people" was drowned out by rage and didn't reach anyone's ears.

There was only the sorrowful wailing of the Cauldron of Nine Dragons.

In the mouth of the next life spiritual fish in the depths of the sea, Wangge Luobao felt the lotus seal on his consciousness quietly vanish. Like a sigh, he breathed in the stench of freedom. His song didn't stop.

This scheming “savior” had waited long enough; the disaster he wanted had arrived.

In Western Chu, after all the previously broken lines of transportation between Chu and Shu had been reconnected, today the Chu-Wan border was tightly locked down. All the boats on the Xia River received emergency orders to return to port. The Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon was canceled without warning.

Across the river, thick clouds covered the sky in Southern Wan's Yuzhou, and there was smoke everywhere. It was said that major and minor earthquakes were coming nonstop. And everyone knew that these were no ordinary earthquakes, because there were absolutely no tremors in Chu.

Rows of cannon were set up along Western Chu's border. The Xia Waterborne Troops all stood by awaiting orders. The riverbank was covered with standing Qilin Guardsmen. In mountainous Chu, a rare gale blew in. Raising your head, you could see the major and minor “offerings” of local thugs everywhere. Though it was nearly late morning, there was still a moon fixed in Western Chu's sky.

Taking advantage of the chaos, after eight years, the red-eyed Yu Chang passed through the Slumbering Dragon Sea and returned to Western Chu. He was toying with a new reincarnation wood amulet.

Between Wan and Chu...one was sure to come to a bad end today.

Only Tao County couldn't be reached by the wild wind. The earthquakes couldn't shake this place. It was as calm as a lone boat carrying a divine blessing in the midst of a stormy sea.

Men shouted, working together to chop down reincarnation wood trees. Aproned women moved deftly, gathering a large quantity of seeds in one place.

Tao-er-nainai was standing with some old neighbors by the street, watching the young people work. Waving a fan, she said, "Back when the government soldiers came and also wanted to cut down the trees, in order to save these misty willows, our people nearly started a fight with the Xia River Waterborne Troops... Who would have thought that one day we'd be bustling about cutting them down ourselves?"

“The misty willow can still grow as long as you don’t dig up the roots. Haven’t many of the ones that got cut down back then grown back?” a person next to her responded. “This time it’s Tai Sui himself telling us to do it... In a flash, it’s been a decade, and we’ve heard him speak once again.”

“Tai Sui doesn’t speak, but when you’re asleep at night, you can always hear qin music in your dreams. Any irritations that happened during the day vanish. Since spiritual energy was prohibited, these last eight years, I haven’t had any nightmares.”

“I haven’t heard it recently. I’ve heard people say there’s trouble everywhere outside.”

“That’s right, the southern border has been locked for months, and now in the east...”

“Let it go to hell. We follow Tai Sui.” Tao-er-nainai’s voice rose, the power of her lungs no less than in previous years. “This is Tao County. Even a god who shows up here has to walk on the ground. If a monster or demon stirring trouble outside dares to barge in, we’ll get together and beat him up like we did before. We’re not scared of anything!”

A large quantity of reincarnation wood trees were transported to the center of the Xia River Waterborne Troops’ garrison to await the Luwu there to send them batch by batch through the Law Breaker space to the various Kaiming Department branches.

Zhao Qindan had just secured a large quantity of silk dragon hearts off the black market. She stopped to catch her breath and looked east—toward her old home.

When Tai Sui had asked her to move silk dragon hearts from the black market, he had naturally told her the current situation with the Territory Map, regardless of whether she needed to know. Now, outside of the Kaiming and the Luwu, she was one of the few people who knew what had actually happened in Southern Wan.

A half-immortal forced into foreign exile who was living under an assumed identity in a strange land—when the mountains were collapsing and the earth was cracking, apart from obeying orders and rushing around, what could she do?

Zhao Qindan stared blankly toward the sky-blotting dense clouds to the east for a moment. Suddenly, she strode back to the little school where she taught female students to read and write, picked up a brush, and started drafting a letter.

Those who had debated with her, those who had sympathized with her, those who had called her a hen crowing at daybreak...

The silk dragon hearts from the black market and from Rosy Cloud Peak were sent into the Territory Map, bringing spiritual energy.

In recent years, because Xuanyin had expanded the threshold for outer sect disciples to establish a foundation, the demand for established foundation pills had greatly increased, making the price of silk dragon hearts rise sharply—and this had been a valuable material that the evil cultivators of the Land of Turmoil would crack their heads open to snatch. Rosy Cloud Peak had been forced to reduce the remainder of its expenses, tightening its belt while wrangling with the Principal Peak for resources.

For the sake of these silk dragon hearts, Wen Fei's medicine-making disciples had each cultivated themselves into accountants. It could be said that at present all of Rosy Cloud Peak's fortune was concentrated in these silk dragon hearts.

Wen Fei silently swallowed a begrudging mouthful of stale blood, forced an "it's nothing" expression onto his face, and managed to say nothing. Clearly you had to be a man of iron to have served as the general commander of Heaven's Design Pavilion.

The above-mentioned man of iron went behind the others' backs and, through the reincarnation wood, settled the account with Xi Ping at length: "Listen, sword god's disci...ancestor, even if you can bring together all the silk dragon hearts on the black market, empty out all the silk dragons in Southern Shu and let them die without progeny, bring all the spiritual energy from Rosy Cloud Peak here, will that be enough? No amount of spiritual energy can turn you into a shed skin. You're only 'eight years old,' you only know two sword moves. Wake up, you can't pluck an unripe sprout like this—anyway, the real shed skin is no use, either. Didn't you see that for yourself?"

Xi Ping gave him a wary glance and quickly retorted with his consciousness, "Who says I only know two sword moves? For a medicine cultivator, Peak Master Wen, you have quite the 'understanding' of the way of the sword."

Had they not been surrounded by people and eyes, Wen Fei would have put his face in his hands. "You smacked the Territory Map dozens of awe-inspiring times, and your posture throughout 'changed superficially without departing from the central idea.' A boiler-tender like me has no understanding of the way of the sword, but that doesn't mean I can't count!"

Xi Ping: "..."

At the same time, Zhi Xiu's voice came through the reincarnation wood. "Shiyong, you don't understand the Territory Map. Do not put on airs."

"I know, I just got pulverized by it," Xi Ping said. "Before the Territory Map escaped, only the Territory Map rubbing could touch that worm. But for some reason, Xuanyin Mountain only has the rubbing for Jinping and the surroundings. The reincarnation wood trees on the outside originally couldn't touch the black dragon shadow, but because I'm inside it, they could just now. I know I can't compete against the Territory Map, but I can act as a 'rubbing' to connect the inside and outside."

"Be a rubbing for whom? Your shifu?" Wen Fei immediately said through the reincarnation wood. Because only the two of them could hear him like this, Wen Fei didn't need to worry about splashing cold water on anyone. He was rather free of scruples. "Allow me to explain. Your shifu's connection to the Territory Map isn't what you think. He isn't the 'master' of the Territory Map. He was only the person who got trapped at the rupture in the Dragon Vein... Let me put it like this, he's connected to the Territory Map at one end and to the Dragon Vein seal at the other. If he submitted to the spiritual mountains and became a sage, the spiritual mountains could naturally use him as a medium to suppress the Territory Map. But if he becomes an unconventional shed skin, Xuanyin won't acknowledge him. The Territory Map might have some friendly feeling toward him, but if you want to make a new shed skin whose boundary is unsteady do the work of three high elders, wouldn't that be pushing him beyond his strength?"

"I've been meaning to ask," said Xi Ping, "Peak Master Wen, your surname isn't Zhao, and you've had no dealings with the Zhao family. Why do you know the inside story about the Territory Map so well?"

"That's not important." Wen Fei waved a hand. "Anyway, I'm afraid this Territory Map that's always ready to make trouble won't wait for Zhi Jingzhai to become a shed skin. You don't have..."

Even without his fan. Wen Fei's crow's mouth was just as powerful.

Before he could finish saying "you don't have time," another ominous snap sounded inside the Territory Map. Wen Fei said, "Oh no!"

This time, a vein of the earth had snapped in Yuzhou.

Fortunately, reincarnation wood was plentiful in Yuzhou. As soon as the vein of the earth began to split, before it could swallow up the surroundings, Xi Ping's consciousness had instantly moved there. Wen Fei was afraid he wouldn't be able to handle it on his own. "Take me!"

Xi Ping didn't stand on ceremony. The next moment, Wen Fei's vision swirled as Xi Ping swept his consciousness to the corresponding area in Yuzhou inside the Territory Map. Rapidly growing reincarnation wood trees clustered thickly to block the hole in the Territory Map, connecting to the reincarnation wood on the outside.

Wen Fei felt the pressure of the Territory Map that no one but a true full moon god could subdue pour into the top of his skull. As one of the medicine cultivators famous for the firmness of their consciousnesses, he felt extremely despairing—this was only a crack, and it had brought two great ascended spirits to this pass. Who could take care of the whole Territory Map?!

“Help me hold out a while!” said Xi Ping.

“You...you don't ask for much...” said Wen Fei.

Fortunately, Xi Ping had learned from experience. His speed in repairing the vein of the earth was much more practiced than before.

But despite this, the two of them still used up quite a bit of the silk dragon hearts that Lin Chi had just sent in.

“You said it yourself, how could I make a shed skin whose boundary is unsteady do the work of three elders?” Xi Ping took a breath. “It’s not like the three elders are dead.”

Connecting inside and out, the reincarnation wood trees that had repaired the crack in the vein of the earth were clustered as if they were planted within the earth and towered to the sky. Looking from a distance, they were like the legendary pillar holding up the sky.

“I just asked some friends to help me prepare a large quantity of reincarnation wood seeds. There’s the Kaiming Department to provide support on the surface. I want to use this spiritual energy to drive ‘pegs’ into the Territory Map at all the veins of the earth throughout Great Wan.”

Before Xi Ping could finish, throughout Great Wan, the veins of the earth tore again and again, and some places had no reincarnation wood nearby!

“Stop bragging,” said Wen Fei. “There’s the Kaiming Department to provide support on the surface, but who’s going to plant the seeds underground?”

Before he could finish, he saw Pang Jian, who had also worked out Xi Ping’s predicament, take the initiative, flying up on his sword. “Give me the seeds. Split up to maneuver!”

Wen Fei's consciousness immediately returned to his body. He shouted toward Pang Jian, "G—g-g-get down! An est-established foundation's bit—bit of essence can't match an a-ascended spirit's, don't use spiritual—spiritual energy, even a silk dragon heart can't b-block the Territory Map's encroach—encroach..."

"Peak Master Wen, you are a senior." Wen Fei's speech truly couldn't keep up with Pang Jian's progress. Before he could finish shouting this sentence, Pang Jian had already vanished. Only his voice came their way. "Have you forgotten that to leave one's bones in the ground is all a walker in the mortal world of Heaven's Design Pavilion asks for in this life?"

CHAPTER 173 - Flower in the Mirror (16)

“Lao Pang!” A segment of reincarnation wood reached out of nowhere and caught Pang Jian roughly. “Wait, I’ll have the Luwu think of a way to send steam cars in...”

“Who can drive one of your metal shells that goes slower than a horse? If you tried going cross-province in that thing, you’d be seeing in the New Year on the road!” Pang Jian scolded, “Xi Shiyong, you’re shredding my pants!”

“Well, who told you to...” While Xi Ping narrowly held him back, he had already transported over via the nearest reincarnation wood. Then he barreled out of the tree and turned into a gust of wind, taking the shortest possible route to a hole without reincarnation wood nearby. “...pull my hair! Why are you talking like a pedantic old geezer who’s swallowed ancient wisdom without digesting it?”

At the urging of his spiritual energy, the reincarnation wood seeds, like their master, grew too fast for their own good.

Xi Ping was up to his ears in work, hastily running between the various cracks. Before his ears, struck painfully by the enraged Territory Map, could recover their hearing, the consciousness he had left on the surface glimpsed the Dignitary of Fate Elder arriving in Jinping City.

The Territory Map was struggling even more fiercely. Evidently the Dignitary of Fate's arrival hadn't brought about a turn for the better. The three elders were still going in circles around Jinping, desperately holding down the Dragon Vein while they tried to go through the Territory Map rubbing that Wen Fei had stamped on the ground to wrestle the black dragon shadow back underground.

It seemed that apart from Wen Fei's Territory Map rubbing of the area around Jinping, Xuanyin Mountain really had nothing else!

Even worse, the spiritual energy dispersed in the fighting was constantly being absorbed by that black dragon shadow. The more powerful the suppression, the more spiritual energy dispersed. The essence of a shed skin elder was comparable to one of Xuanyin's peaks. The Territory Map grew "fat" feeding on them. In this brief span of time, the black dragon shadow's girth had doubled. In one ferocious attempt to escape, it actually split apart the Grand Canal!

The banks of the canal had thrived since ancient times. It connected north to south. The speed of the canal rupturing was too fast for Xi Ping to repair by planting trees on his own!

Watching the breaks spread, Pang Jian shook off and snapped the tree branches that had turned his robes to rags. “If I hadn’t started cultivating young, I’d have grandchildren older than you by now. If I’m not an old geezer, then what am I?! You’re going to get yourself killed showing off. Can you look after so many mortals...”

Before he could finish, he was interrupted by a long whistle. The familiar whistle spread through the spacious and silent Territory Map; unexpectedly, there was something sorrowful about it.

Pang Jian froze. This was Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s whistle to summon the sacred beast.

Before the whistle was finished, a beast’s roar answered. A palm-sized karma beast appeared out of nowhere and rushed toward the whistling Wen Fei.

Inside the Territory Map, the karma beast, which could only travel over things like walls and paper, had turned into a “living creature” that could be seen and touched, like the time Pang Jian had taken Xi Ping through the walls.

The little karma beast landed on the ground and gave a roar, then grew countless times, becoming a huge beast as tall as an elephant. Its roar was earthshaking. It lowered its head to gaze at the dumbfounded walkers in the mortal world. Its eyes were so big they were a little frightening, but in them was warmth and friendliness.

The big karma beast bent its big head and rubbed it against Wen Fei's hand. The next moment, it split into many avatars. One of them dashed away, just in time to catch Pang Jian, who had fallen from the reincarnation wood tree.

Wen Fei said, "Whose—whose elder are you playing at, d-disobedient little b-brat..."

The karma beasts moved much faster inside the Territory Map than on the outside. In a flash, they had leapt over a hundred li, far surpassing even the speed of masters riding swords on the surface. Only Xi Ping, who could swap places with distant trees any time, could keep up.

The karma beast avatars, carrying a group of walkers in the mortal world, planted reincarnation wood along the banks of the canal in the blink of an eye.

At the same time, the locally garrisoned Kaiming Cultivators also arrived one after another under orders. Along the banks of the canal, the reincarnation wood trees inside and out twisted into a patch like a scar, twining tightly around the veins of the earth. Countless silk dragon hearts broke in the process.

Xi Ping caught his breath and immediately pulled a portion of everyone's consciousnesses into the reincarnation wood so that the walkers in the mortal world dashing in all directions astride karma beasts could communicate easily. "Talk here!"

"Wait!" Pang Jian, who had been carried over a hundred li in an instant by a karma beast, was scattering seeds with perfect accuracy, but he was still bewildered. "What the hell is going on?"

The karma beast, looking at the reincarnation wood trees that spread as far as the eye could see, seemed somewhat displeased. It thought that these "evil cultivator's trees" stank unbearably. It puffed out a breath, but, bowing to the dictates of the situation, didn't use its claws and talons.

On seeing the exhausted Xi Ping stagger out of a tree, the karma beast only bared its tusks, charged over with earthshaking force, stamped him into the fragrant mud beneath the tree, and rolled him around—new grievances and old resentments were avenged.

Xi Ping: "..."

In the pitch dark, Pang Jian didn't see this clearly. He only felt acute jolting beneath him. He blurted out his pet name for the karma beasts: "Careful, what did you step on to get tripped on like this? Peak Master Wen, why would Karmie be here? How did you know?"

Xi Ping dug himself out of the earth with difficulty, inwardly cursing in the languages of five nations at once. "Karmie... Hss, Lao Pang, have you gone around the bend from being an old bachelor? How sappy!"

Pang Jian was very perplexed by his attack. "What business is it of yours? I wasn't talking about you."

The karma beast, immensely proud of itself, rushed into the distance, letting out a sound halfway between a cat's meow and a tiger's roar.

Only now did Wen Fei, half a beat slow, say, "I didn't know...I was just... just trying."

His expression looked unusually bad. He didn't stutter when he spoke with his consciousness, but now he was for once a little incoherent. "Isn't the Territory Map also a dragon's shadow? So I had a sudden thought..."

Pang Jian and Xi Ping were both extremely clever. In the confusion just now, they hadn't thought about it, but now, seeing his expression, they also realized something was wrong.

The karma beast was a special kind of beast spirit. Tradition had it that it had once been the Southern Sage's treasured pet. After it had changed into a beast spirit, the Southern Sage had left it to the walkers in the mortal world, and it had become Heaven's Design Pavilion's exclusive sacred beast. It hated evil like a mortal foe. For thousands of years, it had accompanied batch after batch of blue-clothesers through life and death, walking between light and shadow, coming when called.

It could travel over all flat surfaces with human markings, but it didn't like to run over the ground—unless there were arrays or inscriptions on it.

But wasn't the Territory Map the ground's shadow?

So it wasn't that the karma beasts didn't like running over the ground. It was that when they passed through the earth, they were inside the Territory Map. Before, with the seal in the way, people had been unable to see it.

The sacred beast was like a magical ancient totem. The blue-clothesers had grown accustomed to having the company of the karma beasts. No one had considered where they went when they weren't working.

Supposing...

Supposing the karma beasts had always been inside the Territory Map, then didn't that show that this hateful Territory Map, which was wholeheartedly determined to break free of its seal and strike back against the spiritual mountains...had some inexplicable relationship to the Southern Sage?

Why had the Southern Sage kept the Territory Map such a closely guarded secret?

Xi Ping had witnessed Xiang Rong becoming a full moon sage, and he had heard the crying of the Lingyun Mountains. From the bottom of his heart, he held absolutely no veneration toward the spiritual mountains. He was the first to recover. He thought, So just as expected, if you dig down into the spiritual mountains' old roots, there'll be smelly fertilizer.

But right now, in order to avoid lowering morale, as though nothing were the matter, he still talked Wen Fei skillfully out of his predicament: "It was the Southern Sage who sealed the Territory Map, what's so strange about him leaving a fat watchdog to guard a locked gate? I've always wondered why back when Liang Chen used inscriptions to seize the Dragon Vein, that gap-toothed big-eyed lamp managed to bite through his burial robes..."

As if it could hear their conversation inside the reincarnation wood, the karma beast gave an angry roar.

But then a round-faced walker in the mortal world bluntly put in, “In that case, when the sage sealed the Territory Map, why didn’t he just leave behind a rubbing instead of being all hush-hush and saying the Territory Map had been destroyed, putting us and the elders in this wretched situation?”

Xi Ping, who had just managed to turn the subject away: “...”

“He did leave one. The former Dignitary of Rites Elder Zhao Yin was a living Territory Map rubbing. If he were still alive, as a shed skin, he ought to have been able to control the Territory Map.” Suddenly, Wen Fei was no longer flippant. “Unfortunately, the Territory Map is too great. Each of the disciples who inherited Zhao Yin’s Way of the Heart only had a small portion of the rubbing branded onto them, and each successive generation was worse than the one before. The one I placed on Jinping came from the former master of Resonant Stone Peak, Zhao Long. He was Zhao Yin’s direct disciple. Because the portion of the rubbing he inherited was of the capital, he was highly valued.”

The former...master of Resonant Stone Peak?

But all the walkers in the mortal world—as well as Bai Ling—sighed when they heard this name. Xi Ping froze, finding that it seemed that apart from him, everyone present knew who was being spoken of.

Wen Fei, presuming that Zhi Xiu wouldn't have told his disciple about this rotten business, explained briefly: "In Xuanyin's dispute between the Li and Zhao families, the Dignitary of Code Elder Li Fengshan went into strict seclusion for a thousand years, and the great ascended spirit Li Yuelan had her spiritual bones removed. The charge was murdering a fellow sect member—oh, you could also say killing her own husband. That 'husband' was Zhao Long."

Xi Ping was shocked. "The internal strife was that bad? An ascended spirit even passed away?"

"No, the master of Resonant Stone Peak's passing must have been two hundred years ago, not long after Southern He's invasion of the north. It was only that the true culprit was unknown at the time." Pang Jian finally remembered that Xuanyin's internal strife had taken place nearly forty years ago. Xi Ping hadn't been born yet. So he put in a word. "This came out during the internal strife... Oh, Zhao Long was poisoned."

Xi Ping was fairly well-acquainted with this trope, but it was his first time hearing of a version of it playing out in the Xuanyin Mountains. "Wait, without anyone knowing? The Sea of Stars didn't know either?"

“Haven’t you been down in the Sea of Stars? It only gives a general direction for everything. It can’t spit out a note with the killer’s name written on it. Back then...for certain reasons, they wrongly accused another person and only reversed that verdict thirty-some years ago.” Wen Fei didn’t seem to want to say any more. “All right, none of that’s important. The Heartless Lotus must have put together his Territory Map rubbing after swallowing the Ways of the Heart of a crowd of Zhao family juniors. Others don’t have his skills or appetite. If you wanted to get a complete Territory Map rubbing, you’d need to use a forbidden art to strip it right off Zhao Yin or his chief direct disciples—more or less like peeling off a person’s skin and ripping out their tendons. Never mind that you couldn’t manage it—Xuanyin is an orthodox sect. It wouldn’t do that kind of thing. The Jinping piece really is the only part of the Territory Map rubbing on hand. It’s no wonder the elders are at wit’s end.”

Xi Ping heard his implication. “So the Territory Map rubbing you pressed onto Jinping was peeled off an ascended spirit?”

“Yes. The killer wanted it but didn’t get it,” Wen Fei was vague. “Later, by a series of coincidences, it fell into my hands.”

Xi Ping felt that his brief words hid countless secrets—“the killer wanted it”; after Jinping’s Dragon Vein had been damaged, Li Yuelan had deliberately gone after the Jinping Territory Map rubbing, not stinting to murder her own husband. What had she wanted? And taking a step back, fights among cultivators had in fact been common in ancient times. It was only in recent years that the spiritual mountains had stabilized the social order and everyone had begun to abide honorably by the laws for the sake of the big picture. Reasonably speaking, Li Yuelan's crime of murder wouldn't have merited having her spiritual bones removed—the last person who'd had the “fortune” to suffer this punishment had been Hui Xiangjun, who had nearly shaken the foundations of the immortal mountains.

And was leaving aside that this case had also drawn in one of Xuanyin's four elders. You could count the extant shed skins on your fingers. As long as they didn't publicly defect like Xuanwu, anything an elder did was “in compliance with the Will of Heaven.”

Also, among Xuanyin's thirty-six peaks, Wen Fei was the only proper medicine cultivator at the ascended spirit level. So in a case involving “poisoning,” who would have been tasked as the lead investigator? And thirty-some years ago, who was it who had reversed the verdict and brought an end to the struggle between the Li and Zhao families?

Through the reincarnation wood, Xi Ping took a glance at Wen Fei. He saw this medicine cultivator who never looked decent with his eyes slightly cast down. In the dark, he wasn't smiling, exposing the icy-cold underpinnings of his flesh and bones.

Yes—on learning last night that something had happened in Jinghua Village, seeing Zhuoming destroying Xuanyin’s veins of the earth, Peak Master Wen’s first reaction had been to take the Territory Map rubbing and leave the mountains without authorization... It seemed that Wen Fei hadn’t been “seized with anxiety” and forgotten to notify the elders. The history of his Territory Map rubbing must be something he couldn’t account for.

“In the end, this is my fault,” Wen Fei said, understanding the meaning of Xi Ping’s silence. “I had thought that Zhao Long’s complete rubbing would be enough to handle an evil cultivator like the Heartless Lotus. I came rashly without reporting to the elders. I hadn’t expected that the Sanyue Mountains would really dare to openly invade the imperial capital. If there is no way to repair the situation brought about by the Territory Map’s seal breaking today, I ought to be the one to pay for it with my life. I shouldn’t have gotten all of you involved...as well as Jingzhai...”

Zhi Xiu, who had been silent until now, suddenly spoke. “Had the Silver Moon not smashed apart the Territory Map’s seal, even if you had voluntarily turned in the rubbing, the elders still wouldn’t necessarily have done anything with it. Rather...”

Zhi Xiu always made allowances in his speech. For him, saying this much could already be described as harsh—rather, they would have locked up

Wen Fei along with that rubbing of unknown origin.

A few cracks in the veins of the earth were nothing to worry about. As long as the Territory Map didn't break, matters wouldn't reach the point of no return. Great Wan had been peaceful too long, such that the country had forgotten that there were eyes watching them covetously over the borders; "disloyalty" could even grow within their own spiritual mountains. A small upheaval would have been just right to force Flying Jade Peak, where "grass" was growing, to get back on track and return to the orthodox Way, stop being "willful."

Zhi Xiu raised his head to watch the rapidly changing sky over the spiritual mountains: it took a hundred million ants to shake the spiritual mountains; in tiny Jinping...there weren't a hundred million people, after all.

Just then, there was a sudden boom among the thirty-six peaks that even passed through the mountain seal to disturb Flying Jade Peak.

Zhi Xiu froze. At the same time, everyone inside the Territory Map felt their consciousnesses nearly squeezed to nothing. The overlapping conversations inside the reincarnation wood were cut off.

Another sliver of Xi Ping's consciousness shattered. He grit his teeth, maintaining a thread of clarity to keep from losing his connection with the Law Breaker and being unable to get silk dragon hearts in time. Then he heard Lin Chi say, “Resonant Stone...Resonant Stone Peak has collapsed!”

After a peak master died, their disciples would be dispersed among the remaining peaks to wait for the next ascended spirit to take over. Resonant Stone Peak had been the Zhao family’s asset. After the Zhao clan’s revolt eight years ago, Xuanyin had emptied out nine major peaks at once. There weren’t so many ascended spirits in the inner sect. The peaks couldn’t be managed, so they had all been sealed.

Now, the corner of the spiritual mountains that had been under the control of the Territory Map rubbing’s master seemed to have melted. As the vein of the earth collapsed, the thirty-six peaks became thirty-five peaks!

Reincarnation wood couldn’t be permitted to grow in the vicinity of the Xuanyin Mountains. This place was one of Xi Ping’s blindspots.

The Territory Map, which had just been caught in coordinated attacks from inside and outside and had seemed nearly spent, had simply broken the mountain seal while no one was paying attention. This thing had to be a scourge left behind by the Southern Sage. How could it even extend inside the spiritual mountains?!

The Territory Map, taking the “pillars” that Xi Ping and the others had woven with reincarnation wood for foreign objects, was trying to squeeze them out. All their consciousnesses added together could hardly withstand it. The Kaiming Cultivators on the surface, seeing the situation, sank their consciousnesses into the reincarnation wood without hesitation, protecting the pegs they had just managed to drive into the Territory Map.

But these were only a few half-immortals who had opened their spiritual eyes less than twenty years ago. The bulk of the forces were still overseeing the evacuation of the nearby common people and couldn’t make it in time.

“Lin...get the inner sect...”

There was no need for Xi Ping to speak; Lin Chi and Zhi Xiu simultaneously sent Heavenly Questions that flew throughout the country—all the ascended spirits and the experts among the established foundations of Xuanyin’s inner sect had already spread throughout the provinces. The Heavenly Questions clearly pointed out the locations of the arrays created from reincarnation wood. The inner sect’s masters each arrived in the blink of an eye.

On seeing the scalp-numbing clusters of reincarnation wood, Xuanyin’s inner sect masters froze. Hearing the Kaiming Cultivators say that they needed to spill their blood and send their consciousnesses into the wood, they immediately became hesitant.

Blood, consciousness, spiritual image... There were all taboo objects in the immortal sects. The inner sect wasn't the inexperienced Kaiming Department; who among them hadn't heard of the ancient demonic gods and accompanying plants?

An ascended spirit said, "The implications of this action are profound. We must ask the elders for instructions..."

How could the elders be in the mood to pay attention to them right now?

All of Resonant Stone Peak's spiritual energy surged into the Territory Map. Even the flow of air and water in Southern Wan's part of the continent went wild, rivers turning back on themselves—

In Jinping City, the Dignitary of Fate said "oh no" to himself and tore off his blindfold. "Careful!"

He and Princess Duanrui were holding down the black dragon shadow together, while Lin Zongyi had sunk practically all of his consciousness into Jinping's shattered Dragon Vein. One series of inscriptions after another passed over his face. He was temporarily filling in for the Dragon Vein himself.

The black dragon shadow suddenly began to swell. It gave a sudden shake, and Zhang Jue and Duanrui were simultaneously thrown off.

At this, the factories in the southern outskirts caught fire. Guangyun Palace had already turned to ruins. Lin Zongyi's efforts fell short at the last moment; the inscriptions covering him abruptly disappeared. A mouthful of blood stained his mouth seal.

The black dragon shadow took aim at the foremost of the Xuanyin shed skins, abruptly raised its head, and was just about to fight free of the hateful reincarnation wood nails holding it and swallow Lin Zongyi.

Teeth-aching cracks came from the reincarnation wood array formation that seemed impregnable as a fortress. Inside the Territory Map, no one could contact each other anymore.

Just then, Xi Ping sensed something.

Those densely-packed, interwoven reincarnation wood trees inside and out seemed to have become a passageway. In an instant, millions of consciousnesses poured in like the tide, narrowly bearing up under the pressure.

These consciousnesses were extremely weak, nearly all without spiritual light, a large portion of them even formless—formless consciousnesses usually belonged to people who were feeble-minded...or even completely witless.

Wen Fei and the others had never seen this many consciousnesses belonging to mortals. Surrounded by them, they hardly dared to breathe too deeply: the tiniest injury to a mortal's consciousness would kill them.

But these countless consciousnesses, slender and frail as ox hair, arranged into a closely-packed formation, actually managed to sustain the pressure that even an ascended spirit peak master couldn't endure.

In the Land of Turmoil, in the South Sea Hidden Realm, the Turmoilers who considered themselves Indignant Cicadas had their hands on all forms and kinds of reincarnation wood, concentrating breathlessly. Many of them had been born mentally handicapped and didn't even understand what they were doing; they were only willing to brave any danger for Tai Sui.

The Territory Map was yanked back, and Duanrui narrowly managed to pull Lin Zongyi away with her whip. The black dragon shadow clung to the earth of Jinping with all four feet.

CHAPTER 174 - Flower in the Mirror (Final)

“A-Xiang!” Xi Ping was the only one not in the least bit shaken. His scalp went numb. He immediately passed a message to Wei Chengxiang, far away in the South Sea. “Who’s leading this? Have they gone crazy?”

Inside the Territory Map, even the consciousness of a master could easily be mauled. It was only that cultivators tempered their minds daily and their consciousnesses could move freely; if they really couldn’t stand it, they could always withdraw back into their bodies in time to catch a breath. Mortals, however, were nowhere near so nimble.

Mortals hadn’t opened their spiritual eyes. Their spirits were in chaos, and their consciousnesses couldn’t leave their bodies voluntarily, unless they “consigned” themselves using a special medium like reincarnation wood. Once they were consigned, they couldn’t voluntarily withdraw. These consciousnesses with no control over themselves were like snails that had lost their shells. Even a slightly keen spiritual wind could destroy them utterly.

Xi Ping was furious. “Control them! I can’t even look after myself! How could I protect so many people?”

Wei Chengxiang, hearing his indistinct irascible voice, for some reason suddenly remembered the scene of her first contact with this person. He’d been angry enough to swear when she called him “Tai Sui” and, stamping his feet, had drawn a clear line between himself and his “believer.”

Never mind that he spent all his time putting up the steady and competent front of “Tai Sui”—thinking back on it, he really had been unreliable back then. Even ignoring his bellyful of lousy ideas, he hadn’t known a single proper thing. Relying solely on good luck, he had only been able to trick a child in her teens.

“Uncle,” Wei Chengxiang said, using this former form of address half-mockingly, “in the human world, the Turmoilers aren’t even good enough to make up the numbers. When they die by the road, it’s no different from rats dying. What do you care? If they’re any use, make do and use them.”

Xi Ping thought something was wrong with his ears. “What the hell are you saying? What’s wrong with...”

Wei Chengxiang sank her consciousness into the reincarnation wood. She was closer than anyone in the world to the master of the reincarnation wood—after all, she had once pawned her “life while living and corpse after death” to this tiny amulet...though they had later been returned.

Inside the reincarnation wood, her consciousness led the Turmoilers, like an expert guide who could distinguish directions with a look at the sky.

“Unless you view them as people.” While she could still speak, Wei Chengxiang used the last of her strength to interrupt him. “How could a person control another person? Can anyone control you? I don’t think so. So how am I supposed to control them?”

After Liang Chen had learned the truth about the Impassable Sea, he had been unable to get past it. In the Land of Turmoil, which had no one to govern it, he had established a small village to take in Turmoilers. Pang Jian had discovered it, but he had been unable to bring himself to disturb those people; he had let them be. Later, they had fallen into the hands of the Indignant Cicadas’ fake holy woman Wei Chengxiang.

The holy woman was fake; “Wei-laoban” was real.

She was unaccomplished as a cultivator. She had spent her time fleeing left and right, looking for food to scrounge while thinking up ways to get money and materials to use to support these abandoned people. She had turned the small village into a town with the flame of civilization in the Land of Turmoil.

Still later, Tai Sui had personally gone to the Land of Turmoil, bringing with him the powerful network of connections and resources of the Luwu at his back, turning her small town into countless sparks scattered across the wilderness of the Land of Turmoil. Many people like Li Manlong were scattered everywhere. They were once again picking up the old customs of Southern He, educating and bringing enlightenment to He's descendants... Now, in the depths of the sea, they even had their own home and were moving there group by group.

Xi Ping was doing all he could to withstand the Territory Map's attacks. He couldn't prevent the constant stream of mortal consciousnesses coming in. "What does trouble in Southern Wan have to do with them? Doesn't Li Queru teach history? Hasn't he told them why Southern He was destroyed, how they ended up like this?"

Wei Chengxiang could no longer speak. She thought, It wasn't because of you, anyway.

At this point, Xi Ping had already "sewn up" dozens of cracks in the veins of the earth with reincarnation wood, spreading practically across all nine provinces, but the patches were very evenly distributed.

He only needed to take advantage of the elders holding down the Territory Map, follow the veins of the earth, and drive in another dozen or so "nails" of reincarnation wood at some critical junctures in the veins of the earth according to what he had already done. Then he would be able to hammer out a complete Territory Map rubbing with reincarnation wood.

With that rubbing, the people on the surface would be able to touch the Territory Map itself. The three elders would no longer be closely restricted to the area of Jinping, and the masters outside would no longer have to risk their lives holding down all the veins of the earth.

They only needed to use a drop of blood, and they would be able to lead their consciousnesses into the reincarnation wood, alleviate both the symptoms and the root of the problem, beat the troublemaking Territory Map right back into the earth.

Xuanyin had three high elders, a passel of ascended spirit masters, and countless hardworking established foundations on the thirty-six peaks... Everyone said that Xuanyin's established foundations were stronger than Sanyue's ascended spirits surnamed Xiang. Was it possible that if they pooled the strength of the whole sect, they wouldn't be able to suppress one Territory Map?

But that turned out to have been wishful thinking on his part.

After rushing around, asking people abroad to send seeds and chop down trees, nearly draining dry all the silk dragon hearts on Rosy Cloud Peak and the black market—having done all he was capable of doing—the only thing he hadn't thought of...was that the masters on the outside wouldn't do it.

The immortal mountains were orthodoxy. They wouldn't entrust their consciousnesses to a conceited "evil tree."

He ought to have been disheartened, but instead a crowd of fools who didn't even look human had come ready to die for him indiscriminately.

This was simply the most absurd thing in the world. Xi Ping didn't know whether he ought to laugh or cry, and he didn't know for whose sake he was pouring out his utmost effort.

He would have loved to give it all up on the spot, do his best to send these Turmoilers away and be done with it. Let the mountains fall, let the country die. At worst he'd spend the rest of his life underground with the Territory Map, treat it as being imprisoned in another Impassable Sea.

But Jinping still had the Marquis Manor. The spiritual mountains were still holding his shizun. San-ge was still going farther and farther along a path of no return... He was bound by many cares like a spiderweb, making life intolerable but death impossible.

The Tai Sui Qin was moved by his heart. Unplucked, it played the Soul Calling Melody on its own.

Just then, a leaf floated out from the qin, breaking off its music.

“Shiyong.” Zhi Xiu’s voice spoke into his ear. “If today the spiritual mountains topple because of the Territory Map, the condemnation of the ages will fall on me and the Xuanyin Mountains, not on you.”

“Shifu...”

“Do your best,” Zhi Xiu said, his voice as steady as the backbone of a snow-capped mountain, “and leave the rest to me...and fate. Of the thirty-six peaks, at least Flying Jade Peak is still here.”

As he finished speaking, a beam of clearest sword energy flew out from the snow-capped mountain and tore Flying Jade Peak’s mountain seal—the inner and outer layer both.

Thunderclouds curdled above the snow-capped mountain.

But these thunderclouds were overhasty. One of the thirty-six peaks had just collapsed. The Territory Map at the spiritual mountains’ feet had bitten their “tail.” They couldn’t even look after themselves; they had no strength left to suppress the traitorous sword cultivator on the snow-capped mountain.

Flying Jade Peak, which had always been sealed because of its master's laziness, shook off the frost and snow, revealing its true appearance. All the auspicious omens on the mountain felt something and scattered in a panic. Several of the surrounding mountain peaks began to shake as well. The Bell of Tribulation gave a loud dong, but when it struck the decade and more's accumulation of sword cuts covering the slope, it revealed that its strength was only a cloak over weakness.

When Sanyue's Xiang Rong had become a full moon sage, the tumult had been large enough to nearly flatten the whole Sanyue Mountain Range. But the shed skin on Flying Jade Peak was almost silent.

The snow melted. The new snow-white trees grew instantly into a forest, spreading outward from the sword platform, stabilizing the tottering north slope, trapping the spiritual energy that was leaking out.

The fleeing figures of the frightened auspicious animals calmed bit by bit, and the wild wind also came to a sudden halt. The sharply rising "snow shuffler" precisely caught a blue luan nest that had been blown down by the wind.

There was only a single beam of sword energy pointing toward the firmament, its keenness undisguised.

“Move.”

That sword energy met the thunder and lightning. It pierced through the thunderclouds as easily as crushing dry weeds. Where Zhaoting’s light passed, the thunderclouds were torn to shreds by this sword that had begun life as mundane iron.

What clouds of tribulation are qualified to pass judgment upon me?

The spiritual mountains had blotted out of the sky and rewritten the heavenly commandments. This was the first cicada to crawl out onto the surface.

The snow shuffler leaf on the Tai Sui Qin disappeared, carrying away a reincarnation wood seed, and was instantly taken by its master to the place in the Territory Map corresponding to the Xuanyin Mountains.

At the same time, Lin Chi appeared riding a sword and tossed a handful of reincarnation wood seeds toward collapsing Resonant Stone Peak.

The reincarnation wood narrowly managed to nail down the black dragon’s tail in the spiritual mountains.

But a collapse among the spiritual mountains was beyond Xi Ping's ability to repair. As soon as the reincarnation wood grew, the Territory Map tried to uproot it.

Following the branches of the reincarnation wood connecting the inside and outside of the Territory Map, the southern continent's sole shed skin sword cultivator sent his consciousness to split open the Territory Map.

The snow shufflers swiftly followed where the sword energy passed, filling the trench left by Resonant Stone Peak's collapse. The trunks of these trees were upright as spears, like ranks of soldiers utterly loyal to their duty. The leaf inside the Territory Map, on its master's urging, turned into a beam of sword energy. Zhaoting's light lit up the pitch black Territory Map.

Wen Fei caught his breath and let out a long sigh as though in relief—Zhi Jingzhai had chosen his path in the end.

Everyone's consciousnesses were connected by reincarnation wood. Pang Jian intellectually understood what had happened, but he was instantly struck dumb: General Zhi a shed skin... An accompanying plant... Not the kind of accompanying plant that came of wandering by mistake onto the wrong road, by a series of coincidences inheriting some demonic god's way; this was the first one in history to break through the earth on its own among the spiritual mountains.

But...wasn't it said that only one who betrayed the three thousand paths of the Great Way would cause an accompanying plant to be born?

Betrayed...

“Shiyong, don't get distracted!”

The snow shuffler had blocked the opening through which the Territory Map was absorbing the spiritual mountains' spiritual energy. The shed skin's consciousness all at once undertook the majority of the Territory Map's pressure. The few remaining silk dragon hearts seeped into the root system of the reincarnation wood. Following the veins of the earth, throughout Great Wan's nine provinces, countless reincarnation wood trees grew inside and outside of the Territory Map.

Then Xi Ping grit his teeth and turned back to Jinping—at the most intense point of Jinping's battlefield, there were still a scant few reincarnation wood trees left over from the seeds Xi Yue had tossed out.

Shielded by the sword energy, under the weight of the shed skin battle, he forced the reincarnation wood to grow. A layer of sword light plated the trunks of the reincarnation wood trees, bouncing back the spiritual wind around them.

Xi Ping had nearly fallen unconscious. In his spirit, only the light of the shard of Zhaoting was illuminating a bit of awareness for him. The reincarnation wood's branches moved bit by bit, forming a thread linking inside and outside, making a tiny knot over the original hole in the Dragon Vein.

In an instant, Xi Ping's consciousness covered the whole of Great Wan. He could feel it as a complete Territory Map rubbing, crystal clear, landed on his spirit!

The spiritual mountains, the veins of the earth, the mountains and rivers were all visible at a glance.

Xuanyin's elders were all masters; they were extremely acute. The moment the new Territory Map rubbing formed, Duanrui, Zhang Jue, and Lin Zongyi all felt it.

Duanrui relaxed slightly: at last there was a turn for the better.

But in the eyes of Zhang Jue and Lin Zongyi, murder flashed.

The same thought arose in the minds of both great shed skins: The Territory Map always wants to strike back at the spiritual mountains. Zhao

Yin is dead, and the only complete rubbing that can touch the Territory Map has now fallen into the hands of an outsider.

Xuanyin had only just managed to control this wild and ungovernable successor to a demonic god...

Zhou Ying watched the battle from the west bank of the Lingyang River—Guangyun Palace had been trampled, and Dangui Lane had been unable to remain intact; half the street had collapsed as well. Even the Marquis Manor's main gate was gone. Xi Yue and a group of Kaiming Cultivators had escorted the mortals in Dangui Lane to Cui Ji's compound.

The demon eyes pierced through the obfuscation. Zhou Ying saw Zhang Jue and Lin Zongyi become more than halfway "grey," hardly looking human anymore.

He picked his time precisely, calmly sending a message to Duanrui: "Your Highness, look out."

Then a fierce struggle flashed over Zhang Jue's face. His expression momentarily looked unexpectedly savage. Then it was once again forced to flatten out by the "grey energy." He aimed a blow at the frail reincarnation wood knot.

Princess Duanrui's whip dropped Lin Zongyi and swept over.

She held up Zhang Jue himself for a moment, but the force of his blow had already flown out. At the same time, Lin Zongyi's figure flashed over. His eyes, as ice-cold as the Yuntian Palace Discipline Hall, were fixed on the reincarnation wood on the ground.

Duanrui, one person half a step short of the boundary, couldn't stop two shed skins no matter what—

Xi Ping had in fact not anticipated that under these circumstances, Zhang Jue would drop the Territory Map and strike at him. But for some reason, when he considered it, he thought that this was the way it ought to be. He actually laughed.

The shard of Zhaoting in his spirit fractured into countless points of light, enveloping his whole body, pulling his consciousness from the reincarnation wood, ready to meet the Dignitary of Fate's attack.

Zhou Ying lightly tossed the heart demon seed in his palm as though it were a die and caught it on the back of his hand. He thought, The true shed skin who has torn open a thread of heaven is matched against the spiritual mountains' two puppets. Who will be superior?

But in a flash, Lin Zongyi, staring fixedly at the reincarnation wood, contrary to everyone's expectations, pierced through the "grey energy" tightly binding him and blocked the force of Zhang Jue's blow.

The reincarnation wood trees' leaves shook gently in the remnants of the blow. Lin Zongyi didn't pause. Taking advantage of his momentary freedom, he cut open his finger and spilled a drop of blood onto the reincarnation wood. Through Xi Ping, the new rubbing, his consciousness sank into the Territory Map.

Maybe sometimes, until the final juncture, people themselves do not know what choice they will make.

Even Xi Ping was stunned.

Xuanyin's most cold-blooded and unfeeling Dignitary of Rule Elder had chosen to stand with the reincarnation wood, doing what no other inner sect master had dared to do. His consciousness reached into the Territory Map and caught the black dragon around the neck. The pressure on Zhi Xiu instantly decreased by half.

At the same time, Lin Zongyi's voice was sent throughout Great Wan by the reincarnation wood. He ordered: "Seal the Territory Map!"

The irresolute inner sect elites followed suit one after another. Inside the Territory Map, tears of joy brimmed in eyes of the walkers in the mortal world who were sprawled on the backs of the karma beasts—the Xuanyin Mountains, which had been in constant internal strife ever since the time of the Southern Sage, could for once join forces and act with one mind.

Zhou Ying alone finally frowned—this deviated from what he...what the “him” from before entering the way of clarity had anticipated.

Reaching out for the small box he carried with him, Zhou Ying put the lid on the box of notes.

“This is bad,” he said inwardly to the box. “Lin Zongyi has created a new problem.”

“Uncle,” Zhou Ying said, “take my aunt into a room protected by arrays. Don’t watch.”

At the same time, he sent a message to Duanrui: Lin Zongyi’s consciousness must not enter the Territory Map!

Duanrui, just about to follow, froze: Why?

At precisely that moment, there was a sudden change. Inside the Territory Map, an ominous tolling sounded... It was very similar to the sound of the Bell of Tribulation. Only Lin Zongyi could hear it.

The ancient shed skin froze in place.

The cultivation of the ascended spirits wasn't strong enough, not qualifying them to touch the true origins of the Territory Map, and Zhi Xiu had removed the stamp of the spiritual mountains from himself when his accompanying plant had been born. There was only Lin Zongyi—the person closest to the Southern Sage—who, the instant he touched the heart of the Territory Map, without warning, saw clearly the truth that the Southern Sage had once understood through the demon host.

Slowly, Lin Zongyi's consciousness turned its gaze onto the surface. He saw his own puppet-like body, as well as the grey spiritual energy inside him.

At the final juncture, the humanity he had narrowly won through a momentary slip had pushed him toward a dead end.

Xi Ping, connected to his consciousness, quaked with terror as he heard a crack—the Dignitary of Rule's Way of the Heart had shattered.

The Territory Map, which they had forced into an impasse, was ready to burst into applause. Boundless darkness swept over, ready to swallow the shed skin who had come especially to offer himself up.

Lin Zongyi came to his senses and used the last of his strength to break free of the Territory Map. The grey energy that had covered him like armor dispersed, revealing the person beneath. Two trails of blood flowed from the corners of his eyes. “Zhou Xueru!”

With the passing of a shed skin, Jinping...nearly half the country would collapse.

Duanrui didn't stop to think. She caught Lin Zongyi with her whip and dashed toward the East Sea like a meteor.

The Dignitary of Rule's crushed Way of the Heart had raised a spiritual wind. Lin Zongyi no longer had the strength to cover up what he had touched inside the Territory Map. It threw itself at Princess Duanrui along with the overflowing spiritual energy.

Duanrui, who had spent eight hundred years bitterly seeking a way out, saw the end of the way of clarity—a dead end where all came to nothing.

But after a pause, she quickly averted her gaze. She only very firmly turned her head to take a glance at her native land.

In Great Wan, late summer was blending into early autumn. There was a riot of color.

She saw countless people...mortals, workers, farmers...following the lead of people holding up toilet bulletins and flying goose letters, surging toward the reincarnation wood trees beside the veins of the earth. When a person loudly read something out, one after another, the people cut open their fingers and grabbed hold of the reincarnation wood growing through the cracks.

Men and women, young and old, all in great numbers.

The perennially frozen corners of Duanrui's—of Zhou Xueru's—lips moved. She smiled. Then, with the crumbling Lin Zongyi, she jumped into the Resurrection Vortex.

There lay the place where her ancestors had been buried.

To the end of her days, she never cast off her plain clothes.

CHAPTER 175 - Tomb of the Sage (1)

“...you either live in cramped quarters or wander the marketplaces. You draw heavenly light to plate mundane iron, pay tribute to sages past with your toilsome study. On your shoulders rests the weight of parents whose temples are weathered with frost and snow, of children whose flesh and bones are as frail as matchsticks. Born into this world, you rise early and retire late—how could you dare to snatch a moment’s leisure?”

“When the wind rises, your lives are pricked like paper. Fragrant clouds stoke the consuming flames, luxurious mansions hasten the profusion of desolate graves. Cries of distress meet with no response, only attract the inquiries of monsters and ghosts...”

The black dragon shadow was like a flood dragon meeting floodwaters head on. Its claws scrabbled wildly with nothing to cling to. Now, the time had come for it to behold heaven and earth.

The dragon shadow that had fallen over the earth was forced down. Inside the pitch black and silent Territory Map, there was a cacophony of voices.

They came from Great Wan’s nine provinces, in a mixture of accents, sticking heavily to the reincarnation wood, reciting over and over in Xi Ping’s ears the article distributed by Zhao Qindan under her pen name “Scholar Xu.” There were some who were literate and could memorize it, but the majority of people didn’t really understand. They listened to others explain it—the same way they usually chased after the scholars to hear gossip and anecdotes from the toilet bulletins, laboriously asking after their own stories, remembering only a phrase here and there.

It had been a rare year of favorable weather. The harvest was nearly here. Yet now the waters were about to breach the dykes. When the factories caught fire and people hastened to the rescue, they couldn’t predict that the houses behind them, which they had spent three years saving up to repair so they didn’t let in the rain, would half collapse. They would miss seeing their old mothers paralyzed in bed one last time, their wives would be missing, perhaps dead...

Was it true that this time they could shoulder the catastrophe just by sinking into the earth?

In a mortal’s life, could there also be a moment when they would not have to submit to the will of heaven?

“The spiritual mountains are distant—not a speck of dust will reach to stain them. The Great Way is boundless—the people do not have a speck of land to call their own.”

Even the “Territory Map rubbing” itself—Xi Ping’s consciousness—was submerged in the wave of voices. In that moment, Zhao Qindan’s voice was bigger than him.

Through the Law Breaker, Lin Chi transported a newborn birch sapling to Jinping’s Kaiming Department.

His mouth was too slow. He didn’t have time to explain clearly. The one who received the sapling happened to be a Luwu who had returned to Jinping to report. He was holding the ice-coated sapling in both hands, completely at a loss, when he collided head on with a Kaiming Department colleague dashing back to get medicine to treat injuries.

The sapling fell to the ground and put down roots in the Kaiming Department’s yard. The perfectly straight trunk rose steeply. In the blink of an eye, it was several zhang high.

General Zhi, who had defended Jinping City over two hundred years ago, walked out of the snow-white tree, saluted the two dumbfounded half-immortals, and was at once outside the courtyard walls.

He didn’t fly, only walked along the Dragon Vein holding Zhaoting. His steps weren’t long, and he didn’t seem to be moving quickly, but somehow, each person only just had a chance to glimpse him; after that glimpse, that figure would disappear without a trace.

With Lin Zongyi gone, there was no one left who could fix the Dragon Vein by force. The earth of Jinping had cracked in the shape of a dragon. As if sensing the arrival of an old friend, the half-crumbled old city let out a wail.

Where Zhi Xiu walked, the cracked earth closed. Exhausted Kaiming Cultivators were held up by a spiritual wind; their vision would blur, and then an open-eyed grade healing pill would appear before their eyes.

“Who is that...?”

“It’s General Zhi,” a walker in the mortal world of Heaven’s Design Pavilion said softly. “Over a decade ago, he presided over the Grand Selection from Heaven’s Design Pavilion. I saw him.”

Back then, General Zhi had also come on foot like this. He was even wearing the same light grey robe.

The Kaiming Cultivator holding the pill between his fingers was still perplexed. “I’ve heard that General Zhi went into seclusion when he was half a step from a shed skin, so by now he would be... Why would a master like that have so many open-eyed grade elixirs?”

No one answered. Everyone looked toward the ground in astonishment. Many tiny inscriptions were climbing automatically out of the cracks, spreading in all directions. The Dragon Vein, which had been shattered by the Silver Moon and the Territory Map, repaired itself bit by bit—in the blink of an eye, Zhi Xiu had already arrived in front of the Dignitary of Fate Elder.

Zhaoting left its sheath with a clank. Zhang Jue, who had yet to recover from Lin Zongyi's passing, unconsciously backed away half a step, then saw Zhi Xiu abruptly thrust Zhaoting into the earth.

Branches and leaves seemed to flash on the sword. Next, the inscriptions that were everywhere repairing the veins of the earth gradually converged on the sword and sank through it into the earth.

At this point, the black dragon shadow had no more room to resist, held underground by the consciousnesses of millions. The piece of his consciousness that Zhi Xiu had kept underground connected with his true body.

Inside the Territory Map, the walkers in the mortal world rushing around all of Great Wan astride karma beasts saw brightness before their eyes. Soft white light flew along the veins of the earth, pointing in the direction of Jinping. The karma beast seemed to understand without needing orders. As if gamboling, it used all its avatars to skip and bounce after the light, carrying the blue-clothesers.

Pang Jian felt that he was speeding along a string of lanterns. The warm white light coiled beside him. Staring at it wouldn't dazzle your eyes, but the karma beast was moving too fast; he couldn't quite see clearly. Inside that white light, countless human faces flashed before his eyes, holding down the black dragon like an impenetrable bastion.

His eyes that could dispel barriers saw faintly behind the crowd. Perhaps it was his mistake, but Pang Jian thought that the edges of the Territory Map were blurry where the white light shone.

The karma beasts, like lightning bolts, brought the walkers in the mortal world back to Jinping one after another, stopping beneath the reincarnation wood tree in Jinping that had made a knot over the hole in the Dragon Vein. The karma beast's avatars reluctantly set down the blue-clothesers on their backs and returned to the main body.

Surrounding the reincarnation wood tree that was holding up heaven and earth was a circle of inscriptions containing sword aura. Passing through them, you could return to the human world.

As the general commander, Pang Jian, despite arriving early, didn't immediately go up. He kept watch beside the circle of inscriptions, waiting until all his subordinates and colleagues had gone, and only then turned to look at the Territory Map, which was "ablaze with lights."

The karma beast, as if throwing a cute tantrum, took the hem of his clothing in its mouth and gently butted him with its big head, sending Pang Jian reeling.

"All right, all right," said Pang Jian, petting it. "Things will be unstable for a while. When it calms down, come to the mural, I'll brush your fur."

Hearing this, the karma beast let out a whine, then at last unwillingly released his clothing and watched him go. Pang Jian suddenly felt a little unhappy. He thought that that body as big as an elephant standing alone in the wide and empty Territory Map seemed extremely lonely.

It was said that the karma beast "moved through writing and art," but in fact, this was only the usual fussiness of the Wan people. It wasn't so finicky. When the blue-clothesers got busy and summoned the karma beast, they would all scribble a line on a wall in charcoal, no more sophisticated than wild moss. Rather than saying "writing and art," it would be more accurate to say that what the karma beast wanted were human markings.

Pang Jian suddenly thought: the Territory Map rubbing was a “bridge” that let people on the ground touch the Territory Map itself, and “human markings” seemed to be a “rubbing” for the karma beast, letting the sacred beast that watched over the darkness alone come out and see a glimmer of daylight.

When the Southern Sage had sealed the Territory Map and placed the karma beast inside it, what had he been thinking?

“Don’t delay.” Just then, Wen Fei, who had hurried back, landed beside him. “We cannot remain here long.”

No sooner had he spoken than he gave Pang Jian a shove. The two of them plunged into the inscriptions together. Soon after, Xi Ping walked out of the trunk of the reincarnation wood tree.

As a sacred beast, the karma beast had always been reliable and mighty. The only time in its life it had ever been humiliated had been because of this brat. It boiled with rage as soon as it saw him.

The sacred beast of the ancient sage was bold and fearless. It wasn’t at all afraid of a mere ascended spirit. Now that all the others had gone, it crouched and tensed to spring, planning to have a good fight with this scoundrel junior. But when it pounced, it suddenly caught a whiff of something from Xi Ping. The karma beast came to a sudden halt. Its bared teeth retreated. After a while, it reluctantly puffed out a breath and, with its back to Xi Ping, insultingly mimed digging a hole and burying shit in it. Then it ran off.

Xi Ping dispersed the talisman he had prepared for “beating the dog.” The sword light surrounding him pulled back and withdrew into his spirit, turning back into a slightly damaged shard of a broken sword.

Xi Ping sighed. “Shifu, even if I’m not very good with a sword, I still know what I ought to know... I won’t have much of a problem unless I go up against a shed skin on my own. There’s really no need for you to...”

Keep looking after me.

Zhi Xiu interrupted, shushing him. Out of nowhere, he said, “I know...but the snow-capped mountain is too cold.”

Xi Ping was stunned.

Zhi Xiu said, “Send them off and hurry back.”

By this time, the Territory Map was completely still. Xi Ping sank his consciousness into the reincarnation wood. The cultivators’ consciousnesses had already left on their own, so, as if leading the current, he sent the mortals out of the reincarnation wood one by one. Amid the human tide, Xi Ping skillfully passed through the joys and sorrows of countless people. He had meant to thank them but on second thought decided it would be superfluous, so he didn't speak, only silently plucked the Tai Sui Qin—he played a country tune to celebrate the harvest.

He had traveled in his youth and by chance had heard a cart driver in Guzhou singing it once.

Inside the Territory Map, a response came at once from the area around Guzhou.

“That’s wrong...”

“It’s off-key...”

There were hundreds upon thousands of voices speaking simultaneously in the response. Then many people, in order to correct him, all began singing different tunes. Xi Ping didn't know what the original ought to have been like. The Tai Sui Qin ran hither and thither after them for a snatch of phrases at a time, getting increasingly off-key.

Some people became frantic, some people laughed.

Then those voices little by little became distant as he gently carried them back to the human world.

Now, Xi Ping at last saw the whole Territory Map clearly, but at a single glance, he froze—the people had all gone, but the soft light hadn't disappeared. Some strange alteration had taken place to the seal in the veins of the earth. The edges of the Territory Map seemed to be dissolving in that light. The Territory Map and the veins of the earth seemed to be slowly blending!

Xi Ping was startled. What did this mean?

The veins of the earth were the “meridians” of the spiritual mountains. That menacing black dragon shadow seemed to have wanted to drain the spiritual mountains dry just now. They had barely managed to subdue it. If it became one with the veins of the earth...wouldn't that be sticking a drinking straw into the spiritual mountains for it?

Xi Ping quickly sent his consciousness out and made separate observations on the surface and inside the Territory Map. The surging spiritual energy had by now returned to its usual state, slowly spreading all over through the veins of the earth and the spiritual wind. It wasn't being sucked up by the black dragon like he had been worried it would be. The black dragon shadow seemed to be “dead.”

“Shiyong, come out first,” Zhi Xiu said. “I’ll explain it to you soon.”

Right, shifu was still waiting to seal the Dragon Vein. Xi Ping couldn’t linger. Bearing heavy doubts, he turned and entered the passageway Zhi Xiu had opened with inscriptions.

A stench hit him right in the face. The pestilential Heartless Lotus had ruptured all the sewers in Jinping City. Had Wen Fei not been there, there might well have been a plague.

When Xi Ping’s true body broke free, a final thread of sword light from the Sword that Mended the Heavens “flowed” into the damaged Dragon Vein. Devastated Jinping fell silent.

Only then did Zhi Xiu return the sword to its sheath. From over a zhang away, he respectfully called to Zhang Jue: “Shifu.”

For some reason, the wrinkles on Zhang Jue’s face deepened a great deal. After a long time, he said quietly, “According to Xuanyin’s rules, an ascended spirit has left his teacher.”

Zhi Xiu didn't turn a hair. "Dignitary of Fate High Elder."

There was a violent tremor at the corners of Zhang Jue's eyes.

This was the place where the three high elders had just fought against the Territory Map. Never mind walkers in the mortal world, even ascended spirits didn't dare to approach. So apart from the two shed skins, there were only the people who had just climbed out of the Territory Map.

Wen Fei, who had been leaning against the reincarnation wood tree like a dead dog, resting, now straightened up indolently. With his back to Zhi Xiu, he shifted a step closer to him.

Peak Master Wen's feet seemed capable of performing a consecration. With a single step, the atmosphere went off. Next, Xi Ping's true body appeared in the reincarnation wood tree. With one leg crossed over the other, he leaned back against the treetop, closely watching Zhang Jue with a slightly derisive smile.

The division among these four masters was evident.

There was no question about Bai Ling. As soon as Xi Ping appeared, he floated over like a kite, hanging himself from a branch beside the master of the reincarnation wood. Only the walkers in the mortal world were helpless and bewildered. Their gazes turned in unison toward Pang Jian.

Pang Jian: "..."

Without a word, he simply toppled onto the ruins, using his power of passing through walls to sink into the earth.

"Since the Southern Sage reached the full moon boundary and Xuanyin formed, up to the present, over a thousand years have passed," Zhang Jue said slowly. "Over a thousand years of peace and prosperity, Jingzhai... Do you know what you are doing?"

Zhi Xiu calmly responded, "When Jinping's Dragon Vein broke, by a series of coincidences, the Dragon Vein and the Territory Map sealed within it passed through me, and since then, I have had the fortune to be closely bound with both of them. I was granted shi...the Dignitary of Fate Elder's introduction into cultivation. If I had committed myself to the spiritual mountains, it would have allowed the spiritual mountains to subdue the Territory Map through me, destroy the danger that had lurked for a thousand years. I have disappointed the spiritual mountains."

"Why have you betrayed your sect?" Grey energy invisible to others flashed in Zhang Jue's eyes. "Don't you know that because you have entered an evil way, the Territory Map has fallen entirely into the hands of an evil cultivator? If he...”

“Elder.” Xi Ping didn’t give a damn whether he had any place in this conversation. He impudently opened his mouth to interrupt the Dignitary of Fate. “When you had a use for me, you would have allowed me to take position among the thirty-six peak masters. Now I’m an ‘evil cultivator’ again?”

“Shiyong, you mustn’t be rude,” Zhi Xiu scolded him mildly. Then he said to Zhang Jue, “The Territory Map will not mutiny under his control...”

Zhang Jue abruptly interrupted him. “Can you guarantee that? You’ve placed all of Great Wan into the hands of a person with selfish desires. Zhi Jingzhai, you...”

“No, I ought to have said, the Territory Map will not mutiny again,” Zhi Xiu said softly. “Because I have become a shed skin, the Territory Map and the Dragon Vein have already become one. In some decades, no longer than a single generation, the two of them will be able to resolve their misunderstanding. Isn’t this also a way for the Territory Map to be committed to the spiritual mountains?”

Zhang Jue's expression was aghast. Even Pang Jian couldn't resist sticking half his head out of the ground—by now, he had understood everything. Supposing Zhi Xiu had become an orthodox shed skin, cast off his selfish desires and surrendered to the spiritual mountains, the Territory Map would have become an auxiliary of the spiritual mountains, been controlled by the spiritual mountains. But the shed skin Zhi Xiu had planted an accompanying plant in the spiritual mountains, unwilling to be tamed. The Territory Map and the spiritual mountains were naturally equal now... When they blended together like this, which would come out on top?

“Zhi Jingzhai,” Zhang Jue said, his voice so tense it shook, “do you want to destroy the Xuanyin Mountains, destroy Great Wan's millennia-old foundation?”

Xi Ping and Wen Fei froze simultaneously. Their eyes looked toward Zhi Xiu.

Zhi Xiu laughed. “The spiritual mountains will cast off the form of the thirty-six peaks and by this means slowly disperse through the veins of the earth, henceforth be with the mountains and rivers of the land. Does that amount to destruction?”

Zhang Jue said, “Do not forget that beyond our borders...”

Zhi Xiu raised a hand to interrupt him. “The Xuanyin Mountains and I both still have some decades left, don’t we? I will make suitable arrangements. Please return to the Sea of Stars, Dignitary of Fate Elder.”

CHAPTER 176 - Tomb of the Sage (2)

Inside Great Wan, Zhi Xiu and Zhang Jue were the only two shed skins remaining, and the Xuanyin Spiritual Mountains were now entwined with the Territory Map, “faithful unto death.”

Since an accompanying plant had grown on Flying Jade Peak, the spiritual mountains had been powerless to inhibit this traitorous sword cultivator. If even the spiritual mountains were powerless, then what could the Dignitary Fate do, under siege in the Sea of Stars?

The dust had settled in Jinping.

Seeing the “conclusion,” Zhou Ying bid farewell to the Marquis of Yongning, then added, “I will be leaving the mountains shortly. In all trifles relating to repairs of the Marquis Manor, if you have any difficulty, uncle, by all means have Bai Ling attend to it.”

The Marquis of Yongning seemed to want to say something, but before he could speak, Zhou Ying had cut off the communication.

The peak masters of Xuanyin had yet to return. Only a crowd of inner sect disciples remained. They were watching the collapsed Resonant Stone Peak anxiously; there was no one to step forward and take responsibility.

The dim Bell of Tribulation seemed to have rusted. When the wind blew through it, its chafing made an almost hoarse rustle.

Zhou Ying took out the box full of notes and took a rough look through it; that told him that more than half of the notes inside were now useless.

The current outcome had deviated from what the pre-clarity “him” had anticipated. The previous Zhou Ying had thought: all the evil cultivators had collectively appeared in public and nearly dragged the Lingyun Mountains down into a ditch; though they had failed at the last moment, this had evidently already aroused the dread of the cultivation world. If the spiritual mountains united, the great evil cultivators would stand no chance. All they could do was think of a way to split up the four nations. Northern Li was a sealed drum, Southern Shu was on edge, Western Chu was jumping at shadows. If, under those circumstances, the news that “Zhou Ying has entered the way of clarity and gone into seclusion, with no attention to spare for the Luwu” got out, Southern Wan was certain to become a lantern flame attracting insects.

The Zhao family’s scraps of the Territory Map were certain to end up in Zhuoming’s hands; Southern Shu’s Miah rebel would help him “think of a way.” After all, what Wangge Luobao primarily cultivated was the way of “destroying the bridge after crossing the river,” with a side of governing beasts. After using Zhuoming to shake off the Miah clan leader, he certainly wouldn't permit the lotus seal to remain on his consciousness for long.

Zhuoming was certain to come to Jinping, though he lacked some strength in cultivation. The greatest likelihood was that he would drag Sanyue's Xiang Ning underwater.

And some person in Xuanyin would have to bring out that hidden portion of the true Territory Map.

The rubbing that had been stripped from the former master of Resonant Stone Peak would be far better than what Zhuoming had glued and patched together. With it, there wasn't much chance that Xi Ping would be unable to defeat Zhuoming—even in his right mind, the Heartless Lotus wasn't as clever as Xi Ping.

With Zhao Yin dead, the Xuanyin Mountains would be unable to bring out another complete Territory Map rubbing. If Xi Ping could seize this opportunity to obtain a Territory Map rubbing, he would no longer be a wandering ghost being offered amnesty by an enemy. He would have a bargaining chip he could use to keep Xuanyin in check.

The rest of the path was his to walk. The previous "Zhou Ying" could set his mind at ease.

There were three risks involved in this.

One was the Heartless Lotus. The disciple of Sanyue's former elder had been deranged to begin with, and swallowing a large quantity of Ways of the Heart within a short span of time in order to stick together a Territory Map rubbing was sure to further damage his mind. Adding in the poisonous beast-taming cultivator beside him to further agitate him, there was no saying how muddled he would get. One couldn't evaluate him on the basis of common reason—it wasn't impossible that he might forget what he was doing halfway through the battle, let envy and hatred go to his head, and turn his attack on mortals. So before entering the way of clarity, Zhou Ying had spoken to the Marquis about preparing the Perplexing Sword Array at the Marquis Manor. If he added a heart demon seed into the mix when the time came, it would make a perfect treatment for the Heartless Lotus, resolving the problem permanently.

As Zhou Ying saw it, the Heartless Lotus couldn't make too big of a stir. The second risk was harder to deal with: Xuanyin's elders.

The Xuanyin elders wanted to use Xi Ping. If there was trouble in Jinping, they would first send him back there to see whether he would be easy to prompt. But as soon as they realized that he would seize the opportunity to obtain the Territory Map rubbing, Zhou Ying's malicious conjecture was that the elders would likely choose to first put out the “fire in the backyard.” If it really came to that, Xi Ping still wouldn’t be caught between two enemies; Zhi Xiu and Duanrui would be certain to step in—when Zhao Yin had passed and the Zhao clan had revolted, the elders had only been concerned about the Impassable Sea; one could in fact say that it had been the other two who had cooperated to stabilize the Xuanyin Mountains.

Though they were both not quite shed skins, and one was still in seclusion, their combat skills were superb. Moreover, at a time like this, a near-shed skin wouldn’t violate their own will for the sake of safeguarding the orthodoxy of the spiritual mountains, giving them an edge over the real shed skins.

It was certainly unrealistic to hope that they could defeat those two millennia-old codgers, but they would have no problem giving Xi Ping enough room to maneuver.

The greatest risk, however, was that Zhi Xiu would become a shed skin just before the battle.

It was hard to assess what Zhi Xiu’s standpoint would be after becoming an “inhuman” shed skin. And leaving aside that a shed skin sword cultivator was more frightening than a natural disaster, if it came to a fight, Xi Ping certainly wouldn't be able to attack him. This situation might turn out hopeless.

But the pre-clarity Zhou Ying had cautiously reckoned that the likelihood of this taking place wasn't great. Though this General Zhi was excessively high-minded, often making him feel that he was pretentious and hypocritical, between Xi Ping and Xuanyin, Zhi Xiu's standpoint had always been apparent. Except as a last resort, Zhou Ying couldn't imagine what reason he could have to choose that moment to become a shed skin, and Xi Shiyong, who was always babbling about "shizun this, shizun that," probably wasn't about to let him be in a position to need a "last resort."

If such a thing really did happen, then it would be like the Zhou family's last-moment failure in the Impassable Sea—fated.

But Xi Ping was very well-acquainted with the Heartless Lotus. With Zhuoming present, his consciousness was certain to be hidden all over. With his hidden bones, he wouldn't be so easy to kill. It would be a chance for him to make a complete rupture with the spiritual mountains. When he had recovered from his injuries and regrouped his forces, some decades would have passed; his ties to the mortal world would have severed. It would be just as well if he went on to be a great demon bringing prosperity to his supporters and destruction to his opponents—it would beat being ground away to nothing in a narrow crevice by the Xuanyin Mountains.

Sadly, no one's plans were perfect. His "past self" had provided for three risks, but there were three others he hadn't counted on.

The first was the Silver Moon appearing in Jinping.

Before obtaining the way of clarity's Way of the Heart and the demon eyes, while Zhou Ying had had his vague guesses, he hadn't understood the essential nature of the spiritual mountains. Fortunately, this lapse had had no impact. When the Silver Moon invaded, the high elders had acted at once. Xi Ping had been forced into the Territory Map, and Zhuoming had been caught in the net. The Silver Moon had in fact aided them in keeping Lin Zongyi and Zhang Jue in check.

The second thing he hadn't counted on was Zhi Xiu. After all, without the demon eyes, not even a paramount spiritual sense could see through the mountain seal of Flying Jade Peak's Peak Master. Who would have thought there would be someone growing an accompanying plant in the Xuanyin Mountains?

But, in fact, neither of these two counted as oversights. They came from Zhou Ying's limited field of vision before he had entered the way of clarity. Therefore, upon discovering them, he hadn't been surprised. But the last thing he hadn't counted on had been entirely beyond his expectations—Lin Zongyi.

At the critical moment, Lin Zongyi had betrayed the spiritual mountains. He had died, and his Way of the Heart had been destroyed; he had even nearly fomented a catastrophe. Fortunately he had been able to hold out. He had escaped in time and in the end hadn't flattened half of Great Wan's nine provinces.

But despite this, his consciousness entering the Territory Map had led to two consequences unforeseen by Zhou Ying: the first was Princess Duanrui, for the sake of protecting Jinping, being infected by the Dignitary of Rule's shattered Way of the Heart and dying for her country; the second was that new shed skin comprehending something from all this and using the particular relationship between himself and Territory Map to single-handedly push Xuanyin's fate in a direction no one had expected.

Before entering the way of clarity, Zhou Ying had only wanted to use this tactic to extricate Xi Ping from Xuanyin's control. At best, he would be able to openly and legitimately stand up to the Xuanyin Mountains as an equal. At worst, his delusions of "world peace" would be thoroughly shattered, pushing him onto the "evil path" of carnage—whichever direction it went in, there would still be a lengthy struggle.

But instead the shed skin masters had slipped off the game board one after another. Through a series of unexpected events, they had squeezed time into a ball, bringing about the “death” of Xuanyin.

The demon eyes could see the Territory Map in the process of fusing with the veins of the earth. The “way” and the “shadow” that the full moon god had left behind would no longer be separate. Within a century, Xuanyin’s thirty-six peaks would disperse throughout the veins of the earth. At that point, ascended spirits and shed skins alike would become rootless trees. When the spiritual mountains died of old age, could cultivators live long?

The common people were in fact going on steadily now, but in a hundred years, when they had lost the protection of the immortal sect and were living on precious ground, they would certainly become fish on the chopping block. General Zhi wouldn’t let that happen. In choosing this destination for Xuanyin, he had also made a public declaration that in the coming decades, his sword would be pointed at the whole cultivation world.

In terms of both timing and structure, everything had thoroughly overturned the plans left by the previous Zhou Ying.

Fortunately, he could no longer feel thwarted.

Zhou Ying destroyed the notes that were no longer useful. The box became much emptier all at once. He didn't understand why his past self had behaved so superfluously, writing down so many pointless trifles while "blindfolded"—as long as all the goals were laid out clearly, he would attend to them point by point himself; the way of clarity wasn't the way of imbecility, anyway.

Then he picked up the next note and saw that on it was written: Once Shiyong has obtained the Territory Map rubbing, when you see him, smile at him. There will be no more need to worry about him. It's time to bury the Great Way.

The first half could already be classed in the invalidated pile. Observing impassively, Zhou Ying had a sudden realization. All this longwinded repetition with no regard for importance came from a tangled skein of profound anxieties. It turned out that deep down, behind what appeared to be a cautious, gradual plan, jumbled and disorderly emotions were buried.

Without his deliberate study, a bit of the Way of the Heart Princess Duanrui had given him had silently been digested.

Zhou Ying destroyed the note after reading it. When he stood up, he made the robes he was wearing fade to white—he had inherited Princess Duanrui's way. While he was only a disciple of record from an outer sect, he still maintained a disciple's etiquette.

Before burying the Great Way, according to the rules, he ought first to pay his last respects to Princess Duanrui.

The disciple standing watch on the Principal Peak was apprehensively waiting for news. Suddenly, he heard the sound of a door. Turning his head, he saw the master of the Kaiming Department, who was “cultivating in seclusion,” come out. He quickly stepped forward to greet him. “Zhou-shixiong...what are you doing?”

Zhou Ying raised his head. Wherever his gaze passed, one white streamer after another tumbled down from the main hall’s eaves.

Then, to the panicked disciple on duty, he said, “Shixiong, please find someone to notify the Zhou and Lin peak masters that Princess Duanrui and Elder Lin have passed away.”

As if disturbed by his airy sentence, the immortal cranes on the Principal Peak gave a long cry and flew through the white streamers into the air. The mourning cries lingered.

Zhou Xueru, Master of Green Pool Peak—since Zhao Yin’s death, Xuanyin Mountain’s acting Dignitary of Rites.

She was the eighth daughter of Emperor Shizu, after many years of silence the first possessor of innate spiritual bones to be born to the Zhou clan since the passing of their progenitor. She had been pampered in childhood. At eighteen she had entered the Latent Cultivation Temple and had the title of “Princess Duanrui” conferred upon her. In the same year, she had entered the inner sect.

By the time her nephew Gaozong inherited the throne, she had already entered Green Pool Peak’s way of clarity. Gaozong had conferred the title of Princess of the First Rank upon her and from then on had led his whole clan onto a forking road.

Guangyun Palace and the Latent Cultivation Temple both had records concerning Princess Duanrui. Zhou Ying had leafed through them at idle moments.

It was said that she had been very sensitive toward color when she was young and had especially liked things like painting and calligraphy. She was a skilled painter and had once dreamed of entering a way connected to this—the Zhao family had a way devoted to painting and calligraphy. But later, everyone had thought that while her hand was deft enough, her aesthetics and taste were lacking; she wasn’t cut out for this way.

Strange to say, as Great Wan's imperial family, the Zhous often turned out vulgar princesses fond of gaudy colors; Zhou Xueru had been like this, and Zhou Qing, who had been buried amid a sea of flowers many years later, had also been like this.

It was said that because of her talents, she hadn't felt any of the restrictions social convention placed on women. Both her horsemanship and her martial arts had been good; she wielded a mean whip. After painting and calligraphy didn't work out, she wanted to enter the way through martial arts, but when she learned how the sword cultivators of Northern Li lived, she was scared into giving it up. At the time, Hui Xiangjun's fame had spread in Southern He. All kinds of rumors had flown to the Latent Cultivation Temple. Hearing them gave the teenage girl a deep longing, so she also dreamed of entering the way of toolmaking... She had all kinds of notions, without any settled idea.

While innate spiritual bones meant that you would be half a step from an established foundation as soon as you opened your spiritual eyes, the inner sect had seen that her temperament was unfixed and slow to mature, so they had instructed her to cultivate for a decade, let her intellect finish growing before she entered a way.

With this delay had come a drastic change in the situation.

Ten years later, Hui Xiangjun had passed away, Lin Chi had been locked up, and the cultivation world was keeping it all a closely-guarded secret.

And the girl who had been full of dreams, even bewildered by her options, had slowly grown up; then she had learned that she had never actually had a choice.

When her innate spiritual bones had entered the mountains, blue luan and white deer had welcomed her at the gate of the Latent Cultivation Temple. Now, the lively girl had turned into an ice sculpture of an old ancestor and been buried in the East Sea. All the auspicious animals in the mountains cried for her.

Her vital weapon had been a whip. It had lashed evildoers, and it had stopped traitors. It feared neither the gods nor demons of the universe. Purple lightning like dark rime followed its passage.

The whip was called “Remorseless.”

In Jinping City, Zhang Jue, having reached a dead end, from unknown motives left behind a final word for Zhi Xiu.

He said, “You will be censured by the whole cultivation world, Jingzhai—I leave you to look after yourself.”

Having said this, he put on his blindfold and returned to the powerless immortal mountains, leaving behind only a crowd of stunned ascended spirits and established foundations.

Xi Ping broke a branch of the reincarnation wood tree, lost his balance, and fell out of the tree, nearly stomping on Pang Jian in the ground.

Neither of them noticed it. Xi Ping said, “Shifu...”

Zhi Xiu’s consciousness could now reach all the way to the Xuanyin Mountains, “escort” the Dignitary of Fate Elder the whole way like his shadow, but with utmost courtesy, he still watched Zhang Jue’s figure depart. Then he finally turned and said to all the people gathered around, “In taking this decision into my own hands, I have ruined the immortal path of the spiritual mountains. I apologize to all of you. Today’s affairs concern the fate of the nation. To avoid the information leaking out and attracting the covetous eyes of malefactors, I ask you to keep them strictly secret.”

As he finished speaking, each person felt the might of a shed skin. There was no frightening sense of oppression, but they all understood at once that they would be unable to reveal what they had heard today, as though this were a natural law.

Pang Jian moved Xi Ping's foot away and came out of the ground. "Shishu, does this mean that in some decades, Xuanyin won't exist?"

Zhi Xiu nodded patiently. "That is correct."

Pang Jian's mind roared. He opened his mouth, searched his guts and belly for ages, and finally came up with, "So...so what about you? And all the seniors in the inner sect?"

Before Zhi Xiu could answer, next to them, Wen Fei suddenly laughed aloud. Whether because he was stuttering or because he intended to, he said "good" several times over.

Zhi Xiu raised a hand. Many points of light flew out of the ground and restored Wen Fei's fan, which had been destroyed over the veins of the earth, as good as new. Before the loquacious medicine cultivator had even taken it, writing was already popping up impetuously on the fan.

Zhi Jingzhai, after all these years, I admire you.

Wen Fei took his fan and pointed to Pang Jian. Walkers in the mortal world, come with me to Jinghua Village.

Seeing the words “walkers in the mortal world,” Pang Jian’s lost and uncertain gaze suddenly focused.

Then he earnestly saluted Zhi Xiu. His eyes swept over his colleagues and subordinates. “Walkers in the mortal world are only concerned with events in the mortal world.”

Having said this, Pang Jian waved a hand, commanding the crowd of confused blue-clothesers to follow him, and went after Wen Fei. Before leaving, he didn’t forget to lodge a complaint. Pointing to the disheveled Xi Ping, he said, “Zhi-shishu, we’re powerless against a great evil cultivator. Control him!”

CHAPTER 177 - Tomb of the Sage (3)

When Pang Jian poked him in the spine and called him out, Xi Ping at last came back to his senses. He turned his head to glance at deserted Jinping, then suddenly looked down and laughed.

Supposing that all the spiritual mountains blended into the veins of the earth, then would there still be spiritual stones? Would the human world become what it had been before the Great War of Gods and Demons?

That would be the dream of evil cultivators and demons come true. Shizun couldn't accept that.

So...probably the only way it could go was that all the "old ones" bound each by their own "way" would by some means slowly withdraw from the scene, either die or, like the full moon sages, ascend to heaven after laying down a new order, turn into gods that existed only in legend, not in the human world.

Not only did Xi Ping not feel afraid, out of nowhere, he was glad.

Why should he care what happened to him decades from now? Weren't people not meant to live more than a hundred years, anyway? After all the twists and turns, his teachers and friends would all be there... There was only san-ge who had undertaken a distant journey, but that was all right. Supposing that all paths led to the same end, they would still be reunited one day.

The blank road ahead had suddenly gained an endpoint. He seemed to have been pressed back into the mundane dust by the imminence of time; unconsciously, he stamped on the ground.

Zhi Xiu beheld his wretched disciple's august mien and also thought it offensive to the eyes. Therefore, he sighed, extended a hand, and drew back the sword energy remaining in Xi Ping's ragged clothes. The cuts closed up automatically. Then, a pair of shoes and a wooden hairpin fell beside Xi Ping.

"At least put on some shoes." Having a rebellious disciple aged a person. Zhi Xiu hesitated, then pronounced an assessment that seemed to belong to an old man. "Disgraceful."

The young master taken in by Flying Jade Peak had left the mountain, and that parting had nearly become final. Over a decade of springs and autumns had raced by, and the whole time, the shard of Zhaoting had shone upon Xi Ping on his lonely wrong road.

And this mutual dependency that spanned mountains and seas might at any moment have become one that spanned the worlds of the living and the dead.

Xi Ping had always been broad-minded, impervious to apprehension. Since before all his teeth had grown in, he hadn't worried when he got lost in a busy street. The thoughts "my family has abandoned me" or "I hope nothing's happened to my family" hadn't even entered his mind...until he'd had a shifu who really could disappear at any time.

He was flighty and frivolous, with too many distracting thoughts, so all his efforts in studying the sword had come to little avail. In fact, the blame was all on shifu, or else how could he have learned that move as soon as the broken Dragon Vein had forced him to it? More than half of his distracting thoughts were "Is shifu still there?" Shifu instructed him to sink into the sword, forget self and the world, but he was always afraid that some piece of instruction would be the last thing shifu ever said. Worried that he wouldn't hear it clearly, his consciousness was always clinging to the words, going nowhere, not daring to abandon the person in favor of the sword.

Since Zhi Xiu had picked him up in the Blissful Village, it seemed that half a lifetime had passed. At last he was seeing him in person again.

Xi Ping thought that had he still been a teenager, he would have thrown himself at shifu and wailed while clutching his leg.

But he wasn't a teenager anymore, so he only looked down at that pair of shoes, hiding his expression, and said disdainfully, "Shizun, do these shoes come from the time of Renzong or something? Are they wearable?"

"Give them back if you won't wear them." Zhi Xiu saw a pair of boots appear on his feet as soon as he moved them. "Why didn't you put those on if you had them?"

"Just deliberately embarrassing people," Xi Ping said very candidly while putting Zhi Xiu's pair of "antiques" away in his mustard seed. "This is Ning'an embroidery, right? There are textile mills all over Ning'an, the embroiderers have all changed profession. Ning'an embroidery is a dying art. Old things from the Renzong and Xiaozong eras are favorites with Southern Shu's upstarts. If we try them out in the Zhaoye antiques markets, they'll sell for thirty liang of gold at least. Hey, shifu, why don't you gather up all the junk you couldn't stand to throw away back then, I'll move it for you next time, family discount thirty percent off...hey...ow!"

He seemed to have taken "thirty percent off" Zhi Xiu's parting sorrow, too; he instantly recalled this little bastard's unsavory track record. "Do you have anything decent to say for yourself? Moon Plated Peak's Lin-shixiong is such a quiet person. He doesn't readily interact with people. But because of you, these past few years, he's sent over three hundred Heavenly Questions to Flying Jade Peak."

Xi Ping froze at a distance of two zhang away. "Oh...three...three hundred letters? Complaining about me?"

The corner of Zhi Xiu's eye twitched. "What, do you think it was because he wanted to have some light intellectual chitchat with me?"

Xi Ping only knew that that punching bag Lin Chi would file a complaint when he was at the end of his tether. He hadn't thought that in addition to his toolmaking, Master Lin could also "relentlessly live by pen" like this—even Zhao Qindan, who was always wielding her pen and hurling abuse, would feel ashamed of her own inferiority if she heard about this!

So his first reaction was, "Do you still have the manuscripts? Can you pick through them and see if there's any we can publish? I'll have someone assemble them and bind them to be sold."

No sooner had he spoken than he was already prepared to dodge the small branch that came whizzing toward him. In a flash, he had covered nearly half of Jinping City. "I'll go help repair Jinping... Shifu, repairing the city will take spiritual stones, too, and the Kaiming Department is so poor it rattles. Without all the money I've been sneaking around extorting all over the place, where would we be getting the spiritual stones now? Ask Bai Ling!"

Bai Ling: "..."

He was a half-demon. Beside an upright shed skin cultivator, he was having some trouble catching his breath. Therefore, he had been pretending to be a piece of paper, not expecting that their cousin young master would sell him out without warning.

Perhaps he had been the Viscount's shield in a previous life. Every time a certain person was getting beaten—regardless of who was doing the beating—he would always get dragged in.

Bai Ling was helpless. All he could do was brace himself and salute.
"General Zhi."

Zhi Xiu had just become a shed skin. His sword aura was still overflowing somewhat. He deliberately toned it down a little, put Zhaoting away in his mustard seed, and politely said, "Thank you for your efforts. Does the Kaiming Department have enough spiritual stones?"

“It’s all right. Many people in the Kaiming Department come from poverty. Everyone is very frugal,” Bai Ling said. “It’s only that there are many people and a great deal of things to attend to, and the immortal mountains allocate limited funds to outer sects. Sometimes we have trouble making ends meet when we encounter something like a natural disaster. Fortunately the Luwu have business abroad. With an ascended spirit like the Viscount to convoy them from the shadows, it goes fairly smoothly. They can transfer spiritual stones when the Kaiming Department falls short.”

So Zhi Xiu said, “I suppose that the Kaiming Department has no established foundations as yet?”

“That is correct. Apart from myself and my lord, the Kaiming Cultivators have all been cultivating for a very short time, and none of them have yet had time to rinse their spiritual bones...and they don’t have the resources to establish foundations.”

Zhi Xiu nodded. His consciousness watched Xi Ping call up a crowd of Kaiming Cultivators. Xi Ping always made himself at home, not taking himself for a stranger with anyone. He assigned work to the Kaiming Cultivators the same way he usually ordered the Luwu around.

The Kaiming Cultivators’ skill level with talismans was generally not high—they had all taken crash courses and had no systematic knowledge. Anyway, practicing talismans wasted spiritual stones. They wouldn't usually learn "useless" talismans and arrays.

But when these people got down to repairing the ruins, they were very skillful, as if they had practiced it hundreds of times. They were more adept at coordinating amongst themselves than even Heaven's Design Pavilion. It was clear to see who had been safeguarding Great Wan in recent years when it encountered droughts, floods, and earthquakes.

Of the spiritual stone reserves Bai Ling had urgently transferred over, a small amount still remained. Not a wisp of spiritual energy was wasted. All of it dissolved into Jinping City.

The fractured riverbed and roads were joined with countless talismans. Damaged brick and tile returned to their original locations, the cracks in them "glued" shut by spiritual energy until they looked even stronger than before. The ruptured sewers underground, the broken tracks aboveground, were all restored to their former condition bit by bit. Even the somewhat muddy and smelly waters of the Lingyang River became considerably clearer. The glazed tiles of Guangyun Palace shone as if consecrated...

Except that the things that had burned to ashes couldn't be restored. Except that the dead couldn't be brought back to life.

Zhi Xiu said, “Many silk dragon hearts were spent inside the Territory Map. I’m afraid that established foundation pills will be in short supply in the near future. Xuanyin Mountain won’t be expanding the established foundation quota for now. But the funds allocated to the Kaiming Department can be doubled in the future, supplied so all the branches can recruit new open-eyed cultivators. If it isn’t enough, we can discuss it again.”

He was a new shed skin who had suppressed the Xuanyin Mountains with an accompanying plant. When he spoke these light words, an echo instantly came from underground. The mountains and rivers agreed. The spiritual mountains were forced to obey.

Bai Ling knew perfectly well that he meant no harm, but he still couldn’t keep his spine from tensing amid this echo.

Zhi Xiu was also slightly shaken. He had an unprecedented sense that a single thought from him could affect all of Great Wan—the Dignitary of Rule sealing his mouth, the Dignitary of Fate blindfolding his eyes, both were in fact in order to shackle themselves, ensure that they would be cautious in word and deed... No matter how you looked at it, while listlessness had come to Xuanyin after a thousand years, the fact that it hadn’t ended up like Sanyue and Lingyun was entirely down to the seals these two seniors had willingly taken on.

And the way of the sword was to begin with the most imperious and isolated way in the world. He needed a seal...

“In legend, the Kaiming and the Luwu are two divine guardian beasts. They protect the world of the gods, are mighty yet benevolent, have sharp claws and fangs but do not injure the meek. They are good names.” Zhi Xiu was talking to Bai Ling, but it also seemed that he was talking to himself. “Please convey to His Highness Prince Zhuang that I hope the Kaiming and the Luwu will stay true to their original intentions. If one is motivated by resources, one becomes the claws and fangs of spiritual stones. It unavoidably chills the heart.”

Having said this, he nodded to Bai Ling and instantly landed beside Xi Ping.

“Take this,” Zhi Xiu said, sounding casual. “Put it away for me and keep it safe. Don’t auction it off.”

Xi Ping was just quickly familiarizing himself with Jinping’s layout. Hearing this, he turned his head. “Wow, shifu, have you finally brought yourself to open the mountain...”

Before he could finish, a beam of light shining like a white rainbow fell on him. This thing seemed to weigh over a thousand jin. With Xi Ping’s ascended spirit cultivation level, he was still pulled down from midair and stumbled when he landed.

Xi Ping: "..."

Astonished, he got a clear look at what Zhi Xiu had given him: Zhaoting!

Zhi Xiu—the same stingy shizun who had just wanted a pair of old shoes back—as nonchalant as if he had just tossed his disciple a piece of candy, pulled the map of Jinping out of his hands. “How much more is there? Let me see... Apart from the canal and Guangyun Palace, I don’t recognize any of it... Tell the Kaiming Department brothers to go repair people’s homes, I’ll take care of these two places. Let’s get it done as fast as we can, let the frightened common people in the city go home—you also ought to go look in at home.”

Xi Ping, clasping Zhaoting two-handed, hadn’t come to his senses yet. He blurted out, “Will you come visit my house, shifu?”

Zhi Xiu gave him a strange look, as if he had said something completely superfluous. “Naturally I must go pay my respects to your honored parents.”

Xi Ping: "..."

He had a bad feeling.

Zhi Xiu said, “Or else how will I deal with those three hundred plus letters of complaint?”

A female cultivator from the Kaiming Department who had come to draw upon the spiritual stone stores heard these words and couldn't resist turning her head away to smile. Zhi Xiu had old-fashioned manners. Seeing a strange woman, he swallowed the rest of what he had been about to say and temporarily let Xi Ping off the hook. He gave him a “behave” expression and went toward the canal.

Unlike the members of Heaven's Design Pavilion, who had nearly all come in through Xuanyin's Grand Selection, the Kaiming Cultivators had started out in the common revolt during the final year of Taiming. Among those who had been driven by anger at oppression to enter evil ways, there had been no small number of women. Later, they had also been pulled into the Kaiming Department. So the Kaiming Department had always accepted many female cultivators; they were no longer only limited to princesses.

Fair enough. The brave entered the Kaiming.

At any rate, there would be no more Jinghua Village.

Centuries later, Jinghua Village at last saw the arrival of the one who had carved its tablet.

The mustard seeds and arrays holding the small village open were still there. Wen Fei gently tapped on the stone tablet at the entrance to the village with his folding fan, and the prohibition on the entrance silently dispersed. Though the blue-clothesers all knew what had happened in Jinghua Village, when they saw the devastation with their own eyes, they still turned their heads away automatically.

There was only one blue-clotheser with a newly established foundation who, as though he had lost his soul, staggered inside.

“Wang-shixiong...” A colleague wanted to go after him, but he was held back by Pang Jian.

“Let him be alone,” said Pang Jian.

No sooner had he spoken than they heard suppressed wailing nearby.

“He’d just returned from the Latent Cultivation Temple,” Pang Jian said softly. “He dithered for days, but in the end he didn’t dare to come... Earlier, he asked me to deliver his ‘last effects’ to his wife.”

The cowardly man had been enticed by the prospect of a road to heaven and had in the end abandoned the mundane dust. He hadn't even dared to come in person to break it off with his wife and children. There had still been fantasies in his heart... He had imagined that in the future he might sneak a look at them, look after them from the shadows—after all, a mortal lifespan wasn't long.

But instead...instead...

The long night had ended, and amid the first rays of dawn in Jinping, they had heard the sage say that the spiritual mountains' days were numbered; they wouldn't even outlast a mortal lifespan.

Then what had all of this been for?

Wen Fei narrowed his eyes, looked at all the strange yet familiar sights of Jinghua Village, then stepped in. Where he passed, the corpses of women and children were appropriately laid out. He didn't look closely at these people. He only took out a piece of "white paper" from his mustard seed, scattering it as he walked. The scraps of paper, like snowflakes, landed on the bodies and automatically turned into light blankets like silk that wrapped the bodies.

Everywhere he cleaned up the bodies, he reached out to remove the mustard seed folded there.

Bit by bit, he dismantled Jinghua Village. The original appearance of these few mu of wetland at the heart of the lake was revealed, as bleak and desolate as a shattered immortal dream.

A walker in the mortal world quietly said, “General Commander, does this mean that...there won’t be a Jinghua Village from now on?”

Pang Jian raised his head to look at Wen Fei’s back and remembered what was said in Heaven’s Design Pavilion concerning this person.

In its entire history, the most special of Heaven Design Pavilion’s general commanders had been Wen Fenghan—other people got into the immortal sect based on either birth or luck; he had gotten in based on his face.

Among the men Pang Jian had had dealings with over the years, on the score of appearance, it seemed that the only one who could compete against him was the Yongning Marquis Manor’s Xi Shiyong...but that brat Xi Ping had been spoiled rotten all his life and knew only too well that he was good-looking, so he wanted to show off as soon as he met a person. If no one paid attention to him and he was left to his own devices, he would gaze infatuated into a mirror, so there wasn’t much sense of looking at something forbidden—looking closely at him could easily inspire the desire to beat him up.

Peak Master Wen had much better deportment than that guy.

In his time, Great Wan's Dragon Vein had been in perfect condition, and Xuanyin Mountain had yet to institute the "Grand Selection Year." How long passed between selecting disciples depended on heaven—when one of the four great families produced a scion with excellent endowments, members of that clan within the inner sect would lead the way in starting a Grand Selection.

That year, the unexpected Grand Selection had happened to coincide with the imperial examination. Wen Fei had had nothing to do with the cultivation world to begin with. He had come to the capital to take the exam—he wrote good verse and had a name for being a romantic. He was a literary man. The emperor himself had conferred on him the title of Tanhua, the third-place examinee. While he had been out parading before the crowd, he had run into the immortal envoy coming to the capital.

The immortal envoy that year had been a medicine cultivator disciple from Li Yuelan's peak. Her nature was shy. Because she hadn't wanted to disturb the mortals, she had hung a stealth talisman on herself and gone against the flow of the crowd toward Heaven's Design Pavilion.

Wen Fei had a first-class spiritual sense. A first-class spiritual sense was already extremely rare, and his spiritual sense was naturally concentrated in his olfactory sense.

The overwhelming majority of people had their spiritual sense concentrated in their eyes, and roughly another thirty percent had their spiritual sense concentrated in their ears—it was whatever their most acute sense before opening their spiritual eyes was.

Even Southern Shu's beast-taming cultivators, who were celebrated for their sense of smell, mostly cultivated it deliberately after entering the Way. People whose spiritual sense was naturally concentrated in their nose were rare—clearly this person had been born less than honorable.

When they brushed shoulders, this uncommon nose caught the scent of medicine on the lady immortal of the way of medicine making through the stealth talisman. The stealth talisman instantly dissipated. Wen Fei's eyes met those of the young immortal lady; gazing on her, he smiled.

Immediately upon entering the mortal world, the immortal lady slipped and fell to sexual charms. So that year, the name of the Tanhua first appeared on the Grand Selection roster, the reason given being his “uncommon spiritual sense.”

By an odd coincidence, the Tanhua didn't enter the Hanlin Academy; instead, he joined Heaven's Design Pavilion.

CHAPTER 178 - Tomb of the Sage (4)

Wen Fei had no backing. After entering Heaven's Design Pavilion, he was first assigned to the remote Hongyin branch, and in the following decades spent time in places like Suling and Guzhou. He passed through all the most unrestful places, doing the most unrestful work, accumulating a thick stack of meritorious achievements. In addition, he was smooth and slick, unusually good at mingling. Reasonably speaking, he ought to have climbed the ranks long ago, but the trouble was that tumultuous romances were written into his destiny. He left behind a trail of messy love affairs wherever he went. Heaven's Design Pavilion's headquarters in Jinping repeatedly wanted to promote him, but over and over he would cause some different slight problem.

He himself didn't care. When he had money, he'd go tinker with bizarre bagatelles. The black market was full of his informers. The two centuries of an open-eyed immortal's lifespan seemed to exist just to give him time to play around in the mortal world...until the third year of the Wen Emperor, when an unusually troublesome evil cultivator killed nine of Heaven's Design Pavilion's people in Hongyin and entered the annals due to his ruthlessness.

The nine people who had died in the line of duty were all Wen Fei's former comrades. He had already been transferred to Guzhou then. When the news reached the South Sea coast, Wen Fei, who got along with everyone, for the first time turned on his superiors. Disobeying orders, he went north.

Both Li and Wan sent inner sect established foundations who, working together, were unable to contain that evil cultivator. Wen Fei, using a poison he had turned up who knew where and an array of his own making, managed to detain the evil cultivator who was a major boundary above him for half a night, holding out until the arrival of an ascended spirit sword cultivator from Northern Li.

The Xuanyin Mountains and Northern Li's Kunlun had lost one inner sect established foundation each, and of the half-immortals who had come along, practically all of them had been annihilated, with the exception of Wen Fei. Wen Fei himself had been poisoned; no one in the outer sects could cure him. The general commander at the time sent a Heavenly Question to the immortal mountains, asking the inner sect to save him.

Of Xuanyin and Kunlun, one concentrated on mental cultivation, while the other concentrated on physical training. In the early years, neither sect had had anyone cultivate the way of medicine making. Put together, the two sects couldn't come up with a single medicine making master. So the inner sect could only send an established foundation of the way of medicine making to do whatever she could toward saving him.

By coincidence, that medicine cultivating shijie was the immortal envoy who had drawn Wen Fei into the Latent Cultivation Temple.

When the medicine cultivator reached the Latent Cultivation Temple and took a look, she was stunned. She had no idea what the hell he had managed to get up to. All she could do was keep him alive while thinking up a way to wake him up and ask him for the details.

Wen Fei had been gathering bizarre objects purely for his own amusement; he also couldn't clearly say what he had done. So the patient and the healer could only spend every day racking their brains as if investigating a case, guessing and fumbling. In several breathtaking instances, he nearly died, only to be pulled back from the brink. He spent three years bedridden in the Latent Cultivation Temple, bringing the early established foundation shijie to the middle established foundation stage... It was lucky that a cultivator couldn't go bald.

The Latent Cultivation Temple was the boundary between inner and outer sect, a place of quiet cultivation. Under the noses of a crowd of stewards, naturally nothing untoward could happen.

Everyone only knew that when he was cured of the poison and returned to the outer sect after three years, Wen Fei's whole personality seemed to have changed. He no longer fooled around all over the place—it turned out that he also knew how to behave decently.

Because of his great service in punishing evil, Wen Fei was transferred to Jinping after he left the mountains. Within a decade, he succeeded to the post of general commander. At the time, his spiritual bones were already complete, but he hadn't deliberately gone in search of a Way of the Heart. He seemed to have no intention of entering the inner sect.

He bought a bit of land in Zheluo Town near Jinping. Following the model of the place where the walkers in the mortal world lived, he used mustard seeds to transform that land into a small villa. He called it the Village of Apricot Blossoms. Not confining himself to apricot blossoms, he planted all kinds of flowers, and saved up his own spiritual stones to create a small patch of spiritual ground that he weeded in his free time. During festivals, he would receive his colleagues there for drinking and fishing. It was an excellent place to be happy and carefree, forget yourself in drunkenness.

He didn't buy things at random anymore. When he had money to spare, he spent it on his little hidden realm. After over a decade of meticulous care, the spiritual field grew a rare spiritual flower that was hard to come by even on Southern Shu's Three Islands—the orchid of immortality.

The orchid of immortality was already rare, but all those circulating on the market were lilac, while this one was snow-white.

This was of paramount quality. When the flower bloomed to its ripest, you could distill three drops of flower dew from it—this was the main ingredient in the spirit-protecting pill.

Tradition had it that the spirit-protecting pill could protect the spirit of a dying person, keep it from being extinguished for at least half a shichen, so you could keep the deceased emotionally stable enough to recite the whole Detailed Account of Meridians before closing their eyes... Of course, the average person wasn't so wicked as to make such difficulties for a person on their deathbed. The greatest use of the spirit-protecting pill was that, during the great heavenly tribulation of a cultivator becoming an ascended spirit, it could cover the spirit with a fragile layer of protection, raising the chances of success by one tenth.

That one tenth wasn't to be underestimated. This was the single extant medicine in the world that would aid in passing the ascended spirit boundary.

Only the purest and truest Way of the Heart of the way of medicine making, devoted heart and soul, could grow a pure white orchid.

It was only then that everyone learned that General Commander Wen already had a Way of the Heart.

Since the formation of the Xuanyin Mountains, this was the first Way of the Heart for medicine making that anyone in Southern Wan had found for themselves.

The walkers in the mortal world furtively spoke through their own communication devices. One person said, “So after Wen-shishu entered the inner sect, he left the Village of Apricot Blossoms to Heaven’s Design Pavilion? What about the spiritual field?”

Pang Jian said, “The terrain has changed over time. When he built the small hidden realm here, it wasn’t surrounded by water yet... The spiritual field sank into the lake long ago, and with no one to attend to it all these years, the spiritual energy has long since drained away as well. Give it up.”

Another blue-clotheser said, “Actually, I’ve been wanting to ask, who changed the name to Jinghua Village? It doesn’t sound auspicious at all. What were they thinking?”

The blue-clotheser who had spoken before put in a word: “I don’t mean to be disrespectful, but...I’m just curious, Wen-shishu...um...did he also talk like that back then? Even if he was born with that problem, wouldn't it have healed by the time he became an ascended spirit?"

"No, I believe it was an accident with elixirs," Pang Jian said. "When he had been poisoned with some strange poison and was being treated in the Latent Cultivation Temple, that medicine making shijie tried many medicines on him, and one of them had negative side-effects. First he was completely mute for three months, and afterward, he could speak, but not very smoothly."

The blue-clotheser who had asked the question said in astonishment, "What kind of elixir was so powerful that the master of Rosy Cloud Peak couldn't cure it?"

"He could," Pang Jian said after a brief silence. "I heard from Chief Su that after returning to the inner sect, that shijie couldn't get over it. She went into seclusion for over a year to produce a cure. Before her enthusiasm could wear off, she sent it over. But when he received it, he didn't take it. He said he was used to it already, and he felt that it was better this way. It would cure him of his philandering. If he avoided love affairs, he could concentrate on cultivation."

For a half-immortal who had yet to establish a foundation to breed a snow-white orchid of immortality, he must in fact have been entirely free of distractions.

“So what happened to that orchid of immortality?”

Pang Jian said, “I don’t know about that...”

“A medicinal herb wouldn’t be any use to anyone who wasn’t a medicine cultivator. You can’t stir-fry and eat it,” another blue-clotheser put in. “Did he give it as a gift to that inner sect shijie?”

“Is that shijie also surnamed Li?”

They had been calling her “shijie” all along because it was well known that Wen Fei was the only ascended spirit medicine cultivator among Xuanyin’s thirty-six peaks. Since the female immortal in the story was also a medicine cultivator, then she had to still be an established foundation.

Pang Jian received his eyebrows. “How would I know? What’s your guys’ problem? Why would you need to know about a female cultivator from the inner sect? How is her surname any of your business?!”

“She wasn’t surnamed Li.”

Just then, an unfamiliar consciousness interjected, putting down a line of writing.

All the blue-clothesers, Pang Jian included, felt their spines stiffen. As one, they put the communication devices they held behind their backs.

They'd been careless. An ascended spirit peak master was capable of casually spying on their conversation at this distance.

Pang Jian gave a dry cough. "Wen-shishu."

Wen Fei seemed indifferent. With his back to them, he gazed at the blue-clotheser whose wife and children had been in Jinghua Village, listening to his wails.

Words popped up automatically on the immortal tool. They said: "There was no future for a medicine cultivator in the Xuanyin Mountains. A direct descendant of the Li clan wouldn't have taken that way. She was only a girl from a slightly distant offshoot branch of the Li clan. At the time, two new ascended spirits had come out of the Zhao family within ten years, and they had taken the lead twice in a row in holding the Grand Selection. They were very much at the center of events. The other big families naturally couldn't let them get complacent. While bending over backward to get their own people onto the provisional name list, they tried to dig up dirt about the Zhao family members on the list. Her background was too ordinary. In all these years, the Xuanyin Mountains haven't had a female cultivator of lower birth than her. The families were too busy scuffling to take notice, so she made it in among the mess. As the only daughter of a minor family, her ideas were too pure, and she wasn't very sensible. When she got to the Latent Cultivation Temple, she didn't know that she was supposed to make way for the princesses and children of nobles and ended up becoming the first person to open her spiritual eyes that year. Li Yuelan saw that she was talented and could be counted as part of her family, so she accepted her into her own Gold Osmanthus Peak."

Wen Fei had finished dismantling Jinghua Village. Finally, he glanced at the stone tablet. "Oh. I was the one who changed the name to Jinghua Village."

Then, under his gaze, the stone tablet silently turned into a heap of powder, many former affections coming to an end.

"I ought to have dismantled this place when I left. I've known all along that there were people fooling around with mortal women, but I didn't attend to it. It ought not to have happened. The many lives that ended here before their time today can all be put down to a disaster of my making. When Jinping has been cleaned up, if anyone who has had a family member die here cannot be at peace, just come to Rosy Cloud Peak to take it up with me."

All the blue-clothesers hurried to say, “We wouldn’t dare.”

“This cannot happen again in the future.” With this, Wen Fei waved a hand and was about to fly away on his sword.

Suddenly, a blue-clotheser quietly asked, “Since the orchid of immortality is so valuable, did Wen-shishu plant more afterward?”

Wen Fei’s expression was very bland. “I didn’t have the time. The orchid of immortality is only rare. It has no use. The spirit-protecting pill cannot save a person’s life. It can only prolong the pain of parting. If you take a spirit-protecting pill, even if you get past the ascended spirit boundary, you’ll still be weaker than other cultivators of your grade, and you’ll never be able to take another...”

He paused, remembered that discussing “taking another step along the Great Way” was now meaningless, and therefore erased the following words. He added, “The orchid of immortality is also called ‘the flower in the mirror’ in Southern Shu. It isn’t a good thing. Let it go. If you run into it on the black market, remember to look after your purse. Don’t be a sucker.”

Before the words had all appeared on the communication device, a light breeze swept by. Wen Fei rose with the wind and was gone in a flash.

The Kaiming Cultivators along the line had already repaired the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon tracks. An empty train just happened to be trying to go through. Wen Fei's figure vanished amid its snow-white steam.

“A white orchid of immortality?” Xi Ping rolled up his drooping sleeves. “In all these years hanging out on the black markets in the north and south, even I haven't come across one. No wonder that stutt...”

Zhi Xiu raised his wine cup and shot him a glance.

“Stu...stupendous medicine making master is the number one medicine cultivator of the thirty-six peaks,” Xi Ping said, quickly changing what he had been about to say and turning the subject away. “Then why didn't he plant any more afterward? If it were me, I'd have planted a whole mountainful, sold 'em to that crowd of good-for-nothings in Sanyue at a hundred thousand white spirits a flower.”

This Tai Sui, whose name had shocked all four nations, currently had his pant legs and long sleeves rolled up and was digging in the rear courtyard of the Marquis Manor. Xi Yue was silently standing by holding a lantern for him.

The Marquis of Yongning had never expected that after all these years, the only son he'd thought was gone would return, and that a "teacher" would come to the house to complain about him! For a moment, the Marquis had been unsure of the date. If not for this "teacher"'s unique identity, he practically would have felt that time had turned backward...as if his nuisance of a son were still six years old and, after a month of being a study companion, had angered the imperial instructor into a migraine.

Among all the Marquis of Yongning's jumbled feelings, he had wanted to crawl into a hole from shame. He must have said "I have educated my child badly" and "I am ashamed" a hundred times in one day. He couldn't beat him anymore. Therefore, he had given him the punishment of cleaning up the garden.

Xi Yue and the Kaiming Cultivators could repair the courtyard walls and the rockery, but they couldn't bring the plants that had burnt to ash back to life. Xi Ping didn't need to sleep at night, so it would have been a waste of labor force not to use him. Zhi Xiu was supervising, not letting him use talismans.

"The spirit-protecting pill is forbidden within the Xuanyin Mountains," Zhi Xiu said. "It is said that when the former master of Resonant Stone Peak was murdered, in order to peel the Territory Map rubbing off his consciousness, the killer used a spirit-protecting pill to keep his spirit from collapsing for as long as half a shichen.”

Xi Ping froze. He suddenly recalled Wen Fei saying inside the Territory Map that when Zhao Long had died, someone had been wrongly accused of being the murderer.

“That medicine cultivator was surnamed Shen. She was a disciple of Golden Osmanthus Peak’s Peak Master Li,” Zhi Xiu said. “The Li and Zhao families never got on well. When Peak Master Zhao and Peak Master Li found each other congenial in their younger years, someone thought that this was a good opportunity for a reconciliation and facilitated their marriage. But then, as both of them went further and further in cultivation, following separate Ways of the Heart, it didn’t work out in the end. They became ascended spirits one after another and grew more and more distant. Husband and wife lived separately on their respective peaks year round. Apart from a marriage contract filed with the Principal Peak, their marriage was basically in name only.”

Xi Ping had heard many stories of lovebirds broken up. There were ones of malicious in-laws playing dirty tricks, ones of relationships forbidden because the couple were of different clans, ones of nobles stealing common women away from their beloveds... This was his first time learning that a “Way of the Heart” could also act in this role. For a time, he was speechless.

“But though they had each gone their separate ways, a couple is still treated as one entity. There were many occasions where they had to appear together. When it came to discussing private matters, Peak Master Li usually sent a disciple in her place. This errand was extremely awkward. Naturally the disciples didn’t want to go. This Medicine Cultivator Shen didn’t belong to the Li family’s main branch and unavoidably suffered some wrongs. She often made trips between Resonant Stone Peak and Golden Osmanthus Peak, and because of this, some rumors got started.” Zhi Xiu paused. Choosing his words carefully, he said, “The master of Resonant Stone Peak...uh, I never met him myself, but the word was that his character was somewhat ‘unruly,’ and in the early years quite a few fellow sect members denounced him.”

Xi Ping took the hint at once. “Oh, I see, a lecherous old pervert.”

Zhi Xiu gave him a “mind your tongue” look, but he didn’t correct him. “He was a direct descendant of the Dignitary of Rites Zhao Yin. With Zhao Yin there, as long as there wasn’t a major scandal, others couldn’t very well say anything...until there was an unusual shift in the Sea of Stars. It pointed to Resonant Stone Peak and said there was a ‘romantic crisis.’”

“I’ve got goosebumps. Call that a romantic crisis?” Xi Ping muttered. “Hey, wait, shifu, wasn’t he getting his skull peeled open at the time?”

“The spirit-protecting pill can keep a spirit from collapsing. As long as the spirit didn’t collapse, Xuanyin’s disciple name token wouldn’t be destroyed, so the Sea of Stars didn’t say that he had already died of poisoning.” Zhi Xiu sighed. He also felt that speaking of these things was a little vulgar.

“The Dignitary of Fate Elder notified the Principal Peak, and that was when everyone learned that this Medicine Cultivator Shen had gone to Resonant Stone Peak and had yet to return. Golden Osmanthus Peak had already asked for her twice. Yuntian Palace’s Dignitary of Rule was furious and wanted to search Resonant Stone Peak at once, the Zhao family instinctively shielded their peak master... They bickered for half a shichen, until Zhao Long’s disciple name token was destroyed.”

“In my opinion,” Xi Ping said earnestly, “he had it coming.”

Zhi Xiu flicked a seed at him.

Xi Ping casually caught the seed and looked for a good place to plant it. “So what happened to the lady medicine cultivator surnamed Shen?”

Zhi Xiu softly said, “When the elders broke through the prohibition on Resonant Stone Peak and charged in, they saw her next to the body with her clothes all... Then she took one look at her shifu, Peak Master Li, and, without a word, killed herself. They found flower dew of the orchid of immortality among her last effects, a small bottle. Of the three drops, two were gone.”

Xi Ping immediately froze. “Was it Wen-shishu who gave it to her?”

Zhi Xiu gently took a sip of the Marquis Manor’s sweet wine and didn’t answer. He only said, “At the time, it was thought that perhaps her cultivation level had been insufficient while making the spirit-protecting pill and she had made a mistake. It was within reason to think she had wasted some of the materials... But later, there was something that always seemed strange to me.”

Xi Ping came back to himself and caught up quickly. “You mean Liang Chen.”

“After a Way of the Heart shatters, a person dies, body and soul extinguished. Not even a shed skin can escape... Even the Dignitary of Rule Elder could only just keep himself together for a brief moment to ask Duanrui-shijie to take him away. Why was Liang Chen able to hold out until he obtained the half-skeleton of hidden bones after his Way of the Heart shattered at the bottom of the Impassable Sea?” Zhi Xiu stroked the wine cup and glanced south. “Did the heart-protecting pill that killed Zhao Long really take two drops of flower dew?”

Outside the courtyard walls, the road had been repaired. The sounds of cars passing through Dangui Lane came to the rear courtyard. A flying goose machine was set up on a stone table with people far abroad sending illegible scrawls at all times which, once deciphered, were summaries of toilet bulletins from all over.

His old hometown of Jinping was already very strange to Zhi Xiu. The earth monkey digging in the ground in the courtyard was his only point of reference.

Zhi Xiu skimmed the sensational toilet bulletin summaries. There were ones from Western Chu that went “Dongheng on lockdown, Northern Xia mutinies,” “His Majesty’s whereabouts unknown, it is feared he will be deposed,” and so on and so forth; ones from Southern Shu that went “Miah being hunted through the streets,” “Miah clan leader said to have committed treason,” with fragments mixed in like “troops gathering at Northern Li’s borders.”

In the north, the defensive walls stood high. On the southern continent, all was chaos. Only the Land of Turmoil wasn’t subject to these varying opinions.

Zhi Xiu sighed. “It’s been over two hundred years. I ought to go to the former location of Southern He.”

CHAPTER 179 - Tomb of the Sage (5)

Xi Ping was unsurprised.

Zhi Xiu had never been able to let go of the Land of Turmoil. Sometimes Xi Ping even suspected that shifu spending all these years trudging through the ice and snow with his sword was largely for the sake of that place.

In the twenty-eighth year of Taiming, when Liang Chen had coveted the Dragon Vein, the shadow he had produced seemed to have been a shrunken version of the Territory Map. This person had spent a lifetime diligently mining in the Land of Turmoil, wrongly devoting all of his ardor to the Zhou clan, such that his Way of the Heart had shattered as soon as he laid eyes on the truth in the Impassable Sea. With the levels he would have been able to reach, it wasn't very likely he would have known about the Territory Map.

That the true Territory Map was sealed in the veins of the earth was known only to the Dignitary of Fate and the Dignitary of Rule, who had been the Southern Sage's disciples...as well as Zhi Xiu, who had touched heavenly might while becoming a shed skin.

Even the Zhao family members who bore the Territory Map rubbing didn't know, or else they wouldn't have struck blindly during their revolt eight years ago. Great Wan's imperial family was also evidently ignorant, or else there would have been no need to spend all these years offering their own family members as sacrifices to the sea. Wouldn't it have been much more straightforward to simply blow up the veins of the earth and let everything go to hell?

So...who had pointed Liang Chen in the direction of the Dragon Vein? Who had aided him in surviving the shattering of his Way of the Heart?

Xi Ping said, "So can we trust Peak Master Wen? How did he solve the case?"

"At the time, the Li and Zhao families had an open break over the quota for the Grand Selection. There were still three years to go before the Latent Cultivation Temple opened its mountain gate for the next class, and the two families had raised a furor in court with their fighting. The late emperor could not bear the disturbance and dispatched a letter to the Xuanyin Mountains. The Zhou clan suggested a contest among the established foundation disciples of the thirty-six peaks, with the winner to be the next immortal envoy," Zhi Xiu said. "The arenas were on the unclaimed peaks, arranged by all the peak masters together. During the match on Resonant Stone Peak, a disciple made a sneak attack contrary to the rules, resulting in a person falling off the cliff at the rear of the mountain and breaking through some array. Those of us on the scene scrambled to the rescue and were incautious in our haste. The spiritual energy we stirred up disturbed Zhao Long's spiritual bones, which had been laid to rest there—after two hundred years, those spiritual bones were completely black. The poison in the corpse had permeated the bones. Medicine Cultivator Shen, who had been taken for the killer at the time, had only been a near-ascended spirit. While as a medicine cultivator, it wouldn't have been hard for her to cross over a boundary to fatally poison Zhao Long, for the poison to permeate the spiritual bones would have taken the cultivation of an ascended spirit or above. The Zhao clan was furious and requested a thorough autopsy. Therefore, Wen Fei was brought forward.”

Shizun spoke like a court historian.

“I get it,” Xi Ping said with a sigh. “The Li and Zhao families lost their heads fighting, the Zhou family got in between to stir shit up at both ends, and Peak Master Wen saw his chance to fish in muddy waters.”

“Why does everything sound so bad coming out of your mouth?” Zhi Xiu shot him a glare. “Fenghan became absorbed in meticulous study of strange new elixirs after becoming an ascended spirit. He reported at least two or three types per year, with rarer and rarer ingredients. Many times, he nearly died out there, and in the end, none of the medicines he made had much practical use. Bit by bit, everyone came to know that he was weird, and no one cared about the ‘fruits’ of Rosy Cloud Peak. But that year, it just happened that one of the new medicines Rosy Cloud Peak submitted was called ‘heed the grave.’ When the medicinal powder soaked into a body, it could discover whose essence the spiritual energy surging around the deceased at the time of death belonged to—the remaining spiritual energy in Zhao Long’s body pointed directly to Li Yuelan, but there was also a very faint thread that pointed to the Dignitary of Code Li Fengshan.”

Playing dumb, plotting and scheming, dealing a fatal stroke.

Extremely craven, yet also extremely straightforward.

No wonder that, upon learning the cultivation world was coming to an end, he had only laughed.

“Since the war between Wan and He ended, the Dignitary of Code had always been in seclusion on and off. When this happened, he was forced to appear. Everyone was surprised when they saw him. He was skin and bones, half his hair white. It was clear his Way of the Heart had been damaged and he was showing signs of failing... It was my first time seeing that a shed skin could show signs of declining with age.” Zhi Xiu sighed. “A person can fool everyone in the world, but in the end, he cannot lie to the universe or himself.”

“Forget about it, shifu,” his rebellious disciple said, putting forward his viewpoint. “When they’re doing rotten things, if it isn’t ‘to right wrongs on behalf of heaven,’ then it’s ‘for the greater good.’ They’re always confident in having justice on their side. I haven’t seen any of them suffer an attack of conscience. As I see it, it was that Li Fengshan had betrayed the Xuanyin Mountains and suffered some kind of mysterious backlash.”

Though Zhi Xiu didn’t assent, he only acted as if he hadn’t heard it, silently drinking his wine. It was clear that in his heart he rather agreed with this.

Xi Ping said, “So how did the Territory Map rubbing end up in Peak Master Wen’s hands?”

Zhi Xiu shook his head. “If he hadn’t voluntarily produced it now, no one would have known that Zhao Long’s Territory Map rubbing was in his hands. He has his priorities straight. Since he was willing to expose himself now, it was because he was putting the country first and did not plan on concealment. If this had been a matter of consequence, he would have come out and said it. If he didn’t say anything, it was because it was a personal matter. It will do no good to try getting to the bottom of it.”

As Xi Ping scattered seeds according to a sketch, he considered: that they still had time to maneuver and arrange was built upon the premise that Xuanyin’s situation was a secret.

It wasn't important whether the people who knew about this matter at present sincerely supported Zhi Xiu or not. When the order to keep silent had come from a shed skin sword cultivator, they couldn't say anything even if they wanted to. A few walkers in the mortal world couldn't make any big waves.

But if there really was some mysterious individual involved, the situation became dangerous.

Once word leaked out, they would be attacked on all sides.

In Xuanyin's inner sect alone, there were close to thirty ascended spirits if you counted the ones confined to seclusion, and there were tens of thousands of established foundations. When these people learned that their path to immortality would be severed, nothing they got up to would be surprising.

Even if Zhaoting on its own could suppress the thirty-six peaks, what about the other three nations? What about Kunlun's legendary Wanshuang Sword?

And then there was that crowd of evil cultivators who had made names for themselves in various places...

“Alas, peril all around.” Xi Ping sat down crosslegged and tapped the ground with his fingers. Extremely fine spiritual energy poured into the new mud. The seeds of flowers and trees immediately broke ground and sprouted.

In the blink of an eye, the bleak garden became covered in greenery. In another blink, a mass of flowers spread out like brocade.

The big tree from the snow-capped mountain was so upright that it stood out in the little garden, but as its leaves and branches unfurled to shade the flowering shrubs, it no longer seemed lonely. Xi Yue, holding the lantern and not watching his step, was lifted into the air by a reincarnation wood tree that had been planted underfoot at some point. He was raised as high as the streetlight outside the courtyard wall.

The lantern light shone on the snow-white tree trunk, making it look like moonlight, lighting up the person under the tree who was like an unconventional flower fairy.

Then the “flower fairy” stretched and, looking pleased with himself, crooned, “The repulsive rat crossing the street, out parading is sure to be beat. Though the bonfires are lit, it cares not one whit, and runs the old cat off its feet, heh-heh...”

Zhi Xiu nearly choked on his wine. “You’re the rat crossing the street, scoundrel!”

Xi Yue: “...”

Was there any of that bad medicine Peak Master Wen had taken left? These two needed a dose right now.

When Xi Ping was halfway through stretching, Xu Rucheng’s voice suddenly sounded in the reincarnation wood.

“I don’t know what’s going on,” Xu Rucheng said quietly, keeping his eye on an immortal tool for monitoring spiritual energy. “The spiritual energy on the West Peak suddenly became denser. I don’t know about the Central and East Peaks yet, I can’t easily go out...”

Before he could finish, a bright light swept past the window. Xu Rucheng’s heart tightened. He instinctively held his breath and shut his mouth. Only after a long moment did he dare to look out the window. “The Silver Moon has moved away from the West Peak. It seems to be going east.”

The Silver Moon seemed to have given up on something. When the grim moonlight was gone, the West Peak was deathly still.

Some ascended spirits circling outside the West Peak exchanged glances. Xiang Wenqing, who was in the lead, got his nerve up and landed at the door of Elder Xiang Ning's residence. He said loudly, "Disciple Xiang Wenqing requests to see his shizun."

There was no answer.

"Disciple Xiang..."

A thin spiritual wind suddenly blew past, interrupting him. Xiang Wenqing's gaze followed the wind. His pupils contracted slightly: the inscriptions outside of Elder Xiang Ning's residence were manifesting one after another, the spiritual energy in them dissipating piecemeal.

An ascended spirit not surnamed Xiang suddenly went around Xiang Wenqing and charged right in, coming face-to-face with Xiang Ning, who was facing south. The ascended spirit felt his heart stutter. He broke out in a cold sweat, regretting his rashness. "Forgive me, Xiang-shishu, I..."

The ascended spirit was just searching his belly and guts for an excuse when he saw Xiang Ning, like a dandelion in a strong wind, disintegrate before his eyes. The ascended spirits following closely after him were dumbfounded—the passing of a shed skin ought to have been an earth-shattering event, but Xiang Ning went to pieces without a sound. There seemed to be a ray of moonlight inside him. It guided the shed skin's essence as it blended into the mountain at his feet, not a drop of it leaking out... He had been swallowed whole by the Sanyue Mountains!

The Silver Moon had already returned to the Central Peak. It wavered there briefly. Then it was as if the divine tool of the mountains was being pushed and pulled by two forces. The huge moon itself remained at the Central Peak, but the moonlight streamed toward the East Peak.

On the face of Xuanwu, exiled in Southern Shu, the white paper mask was suddenly lit by moonlight. The drawn-on features, as if cracking open, took on a frightening smile. Xuanwu slowly turned his head to look east—though there was interference, the Sanyue Mountains were summoning him back.

At the same time, like an explosion in Xi Ping's ears, news came from Chu.

“Sanyue's inner sect has been sealed. No one goes in or out.”

“Sanyue's inner sect is reinforcing the great mountain array.”

“The Silver Moon seems to have been blunted!!”

In Tao County, the Luwu keeping an eye out in all directions were also on the alert. “Quite a few cultivation masters have entered the county, including some familiar ones. They seem to be the ‘offerings’ of distinguished families.”

Zhao Qindan put down the pocket thousand-li eyeglass made of brass in her hand and said categorically, “Yu Family Bend’s former chief offering Yu Chang is included. His disguise isn’t very good. He’s recognizable at a glance.”

This evil cultivator was very bold.

Xi Ping narrowed his eyes, then heard a voice in the reincarnation wood overpower the babble of the others.

Through the reincarnation wood, Yu Chang said, “I don’t know whether your news is faster or my news is faster. There’s been a letter from Dongheng, inferring that Xiang Ning may already be dead. The Silver Moon has at last abandoned the good-for-nothing who’s let the Xiang family lose its grip on the country. Can you guess who it’s going to call back?”

Xi Ping didn’t respond.

So Yu Chang continued his solo performance toward the reincarnation wood. “Xiang Ning didn’t have the strength to keep the Central Peak under control. Over the years, Sanyue has turned into a joke for the toilet bulletins. But once Xuanwu returns, there is sure to be a frantic expulsion of dissidents. Not one of the powers that have taken advantage of the favorable conditions in recent years to spring up all over the place will escape, including your Tao County. Tai Sui, do you want to consider working with me?”

“It’s like this, shifu. Let’s prepare for several eventualities.” Xi Ping was finished stretching. “If Xuanyin’s situation does get out, we need to send our malicious neighbors back home to sweep the snow at their own gates and stay out of our business. If it’s a false alarm, then that’s just perfect.”

“What’s just perfect?” said Zhi Xiu.

Xi Ping raised his head. “I know you’ve always wanted to put an end to the southern mines, shifu.”

When Southern He was vanquished, its veins of the earth had been broken, keeping its spiritual energy from transmitting throughout the whole country, fixing all of it within the Lancang Mountains. Lancang had turned into the mines that supported Moon Plated Gold; the smoke and dust amid the steam, the demon host in the Impassable Sea—all they burned, all they consumed, were the ashes of the Turmoilers.

Zhi Xiu froze. Suddenly, he remembered when this spendthrift rebellious disciple had used two spiritual stones to send back a double handful of fireworks suspected of delivering dire insult to his shizun, putting on a big show for the thirty-six peaks to see; it seemed that that had been precisely when he had just reached the southern mines.

The vast majority of the time, Xi Ping was an extraordinary scoundrel, yet when he occasionally revealed a trace of thoughtfulness, he always seemed to know what the people around him were thinking.

“If it’s a false alarm, we’ll seize the opportunity to level that grave disease,” Xi Ping said. “When it comes to the Land of Turmoil, Northern Li is separated from it by the whole southern continent, and Southern Shu by the South Sea—it’s beyond their reach. I’ll take the Luwu to stir up trouble in Western Chu—chalk it up as returning our good neighbor’s hospitality.”

Zhi Xiu was silent for a moment. “There is another matter I ought to instruct you about.”

Xi Ping lowered his eyes slightly. “My san...His Highness Prince Zhuang?”

Zhi Xiu had seen with his own eyes how, as a half-immortal, Zhou Ying had gone down into the Impassable Sea and yanked out the Zhao family's colossal spine, and that had been him being lenient. In a few short years, he had used the Luwu to sow discord among all the great spiritual mountains, splitting them apart. Now, just by taking a step back, he had drawn out the Territory Map that Xuanyin had kept buried for a thousand years. When one thought about it, his traces were to be found in all the major changes of the last decade and a half.

This prince's cultivation clearly wasn't high, but he seemed to be the incarnation of the demon host.

Only the Kaiming and the Luwu, though they had been established with ulterior motives, were full of Xi Ping's traces...but now Zhou Ying had entered the way of clarity, washing away all external objects. Naturally, Xi Ping was also an "external object." It was hard to say where the Kaiming and the Luwu would stand in the future.

If either the Dignitary of Rule or the Dignitary of Fate had ever paid attention to the "ant" Zhou Ying, they probably would have gotten rid of him ages ago. It was only Zhi Xiu, who would take the trouble to mention him behind his back in such a tactful manner, who wasn't capable of "preventative measures" like that.

“When a person enters a way and spends hundreds upon thousands of years believing in a Way of the Heart, it is easy to mistakenly think that their own way is ‘orthodoxy.’” Zhi Xiu sighed. “Since the way of clarity is the origin of the three thousand paths of the Great Way, all these years, Xuanyin’s elders have believed as a matter of course that it would bind a person to be a tool on their side. They didn’t necessarily have a true understanding of the way of clarity.”

“They just wouldn’t acknowledge that they had selfish desires,” Xi Ping said with a false smile, “so they thought a way ‘without selfish desire’ would have to look just like themselves. Before all my teeth had grown in, I also used to think that everyone on earth who didn’t look like me was ugly.”

Zhi Xiu said, “...Did I not tell you not to let me hear you talking like that?”

Xi Ping stood up and patted the mud off himself. He said, “There’s no need to worry about His Highness Prince Zhuang. He...he sometimes goes a little too far, but essentially it isn’t for the sake of being a scourge upon anything. At most I suppose it’s to be a scourge upon Bai Ling.”

“Then in your opinion,” Zhi Xiu said seriously, “what is he doing it for?”

Xi Ping considered, then softly said, “Perhaps it’s because he’s looking for an answer.”

Zhi Xiu raised his eyebrows.

“We commonplace people, if we occasionally get stuck in some hopeless situation, there may be many things we can’t get over, but there will always be other things to block our sight. We’ll look at others, then look back at ourselves, run around for a while, and maybe by then we’ll have forgotten about it. But it doesn’t work like that for them... I’m also talking about the Heartless Lotus Zhuoming. They have to constantly consider, is it that others are blind, or that they’re insane? So they always want to get to the bottom of things. He doesn’t belong to the inner sect, anyway. It doesn’t take long to establish a foundation. In a few days, he ought to be leaving the mountains. Don’t worry, shifu, I’ll contact him.”

Xi Ping was familiar with Zhou Ying’s conduct and methods. Naturally it was for the best to have him take care of it. But Zhi Xiu didn’t need to look to the stars to know why his disciple had “fled” to Flying Jade Peak that day. Therefore, he hesitated. “You...”

“I’m better.” Xi Ping waved a hand, as if all he needed was a patch of shade so he could catch his breath and start frisking around happily again. “It’s just the way of clarity. That’s no big problem... Look at Duanrui-shishu—she never got angry. With that smile-hiding-a-knife rotten temper of his, if he really manages to cultivate Princess Duanrui's self-restraint, I might miss out on a few beatings from the discipline rod in the future.”

Having said this, he washed his hands, ran over to warm wine for his shifu, and changed the subject just as quickly as he had fled the Latent Cultivation Temple. “Shifu, have you tried out a steam carriage yet? I see there's one parked in the Marquis Manor's rear courtyard. Why don't we drive it out and give it a spin now, while there's no one on the roads? If we run into a wall, at worst we'll have to pay compensation...”

Zhi Xiu was like Pang Jian, politely declining to have anything to do with these racing “iron bulls,” so he drove his annoying disciple away.

Xi Ping went inside, humming his off-tune “runs the old cat off its feet,” until he reached a deserted place.

He was alone now. There was no more need to pretend.

He stared emptily at Jinping's night sky, for once perfectly clear. He had the disciple name token. A member of the inner sect could send a Heavenly Question. The Heavenly Question was a direct connection to the Xuanyin Immortal Mountains that avoided all prying.

Spiritual energy collected at his fingertips, then dispersed again, several times over. The spiritual energy inside the room overflowed; plants and small living creatures all instinctively chased spiritual energy, so it wasn't long before a multiflora rose seed that had ended up outside the window had sprouted and climbed over the whole wall in the blink of an eye. Outside the glass window, a crowd of little birds gathered to scrounge spiritual energy.

They were all babbling at once. It was too noisy. Xi Ping had been on edge to begin with, so he pushed open the window, sending the birds flapping up to the top of the courtyard wall.

“Freeloading food and water, and talking so much crap,” he complained irritably. But suddenly, under the rose bush, he saw a little black cat so skinny that it looked like a chicken. It opened its mouth and meowed at Xi Ping. Its voice was thin and sharp, almost inaudible to mortals.

Xi Ping instantly remembered the cat he had picked up when he was eight years old.

In that litter of cats, there had only been one pure black one. The adult cat didn't seem fond of it, so it had bedded down alone, away from the group. Occasionally it would open its eyes to look at the other gamboling and frisking kittens, but soon it would avert its gaze disinterestedly and lick its own fur. Somehow, it had reminded him a little of san-ge.

Later it hadn't been like him anymore. That black cat had gotten so fat its head and neck became one. He had heard that in the end it had died of old age in the Latent Cultivation Temple, having lived to the age of twenty, a half-immortal among cats.

Xi Yue sensed the spiritual energy leaking out of his room and felt a little uneasy. As soon as he walked into the courtyard, he saw a spiritual wind lifting a filthy feral cat.

“You're just in time, Yue-bao'er, look what I've picked up,” Xi Ping's high-spirited voice said from inside. “Heh, it bites! Same bad habit as you when you were little.”

It was night. A Heavenly Question came straight to Xuanyin's Principal Peak, nimbly passing through a pile of mourning streamers.

Objects resemble their owners. This Heavenly Question boldly barged into the mourning hall and nearly landed in the incense ash.

Mist suddenly appeared above the incense burner. A hand reached out of nowhere from among the mist and grabbed the letter.

Other people's Heavenly Questions were a single page. Relying on the abundance of an ascended spirit's essence, Xi Ping had written a whole volume. The proper business was crammed in among trivial matters; there were even doodles here and there.

Zhou Ying didn't waste time with rubbish like "I picked up another cat." With a beam of spiritual energy, lines tumbled from the voluminous Heavenly Question like a flower's petals falling, leaving only a few urgent sentences on the page.

"Xiang Ning is dead, Xuanwu has returned, the Silver Moon has come to the end of the road and gone mad. Yu Chang wishes to start an armed rebellion and has asked me to think of a way to remove the spiritual image brands of offerings from various places in the country. Western Chu is in chaos. Lend me some of what's buried under Tao County."

Zhou Ying casually responded with "okay," then stood up to meet Wen Fei, who happened to have just returned to the mountains.

CHAPTER 180 - Tomb of the Sage (6)

The people of Xuanyin's inner sect, apart from the elders, couldn't enter and leave the immortal mountains at will; they had to go to the Principal Peak to request and then return a token. Though Wen Fei had run off without authorization, on the way back, owing to his unstable emotions and unsteady state of mind, he unconsciously came to the Principal Peak. When he saw the sky filled with white streamers, he stared blankly for a long moment, then at last remembered that two of Xuanyin's three elders were gone; everything had changed.

Wen Fei glanced in the direction of Resonant Stone Peak. The whole mountain was gone, as if there was a tooth missing among the uninterrupted stretch of the Xuanyin Immortal Mountains. Even the wind had become much stronger than before.

Who could have thought that the untouchably lofty immortal mountains could collapse?

A disciple was passing by and quickly came forward to offer a greeting on seeing him. Wen Fei nodded and averted his gaze. He strode toward the main hall and waved his fan toward the disciple at the door: I've come to pay my respects to the two elders and, while I'm here, receive my punishment for leaving the mountains without authorization.

A crowd of established foundations looked at each other in dismay—the elders had nearly all died off; which junior would dare to take it upon themselves to punish him?

“Uh...you must be joking, Wen-shishu, we...”

“Peak Master Wen.” Zhou Ying appeared at the door, gave the salute appropriate for a junior, and rescued the disciples on duty on the Principal Peak from their embarrassment. “Please come this way.”

The incense altar of the Xuanyin Mountains’ main hall was located beneath the divine image of the Southern Sage. It was normally invisible. Only when a master of ascended spirit level or above passed away would the incense altar automatically appear with the name token of the deceased resting on it.

The altar hung in midair, like a projection from the underworld. The name tokens of the two high elders were arranged at the very front; their spiritual light had dimmed. Behind these two name tokens that provided a focus for those commemorating the dead, there was a vague mist. With an ascended spirit’s vision, it was possible to see that the mist was “planted” full of dim name tokens, like a crowd of ghosts silently peering into the human world; it was unspeakably gloomy.

In a momentary daze, Wen Fei had the impression that the dead were behind that mist, still with the immortal mountains.

He shuddered involuntarily—this truly was being eternally unable to reincarnate.

Zhou Ying led Wen Fei up to the incense altar, offered incense, and stepped aside. “The sect rules are on the stone tablet in front of the main hall’s door, to the right. Once you have finished offering incense, Peak Master Wen, you need only consult the sect rules yourself and act as you see fit.”

Wen Fei examined him briefly: the Kaiming Department’s Prince Zhuang?

The Kaiming Department’s swift reaction, the spiritual stones prepared ahead of time, the mysterious Luwu communication network that could pass through the Xuanyin Mountains, the Territory Map, and the mortal world... Though Wen Fei turned deaf ears onto everything “outside the mountains,” though there were many people he didn’t know and many things he only half understood, he could still sense that this “little established foundation” was dangerous.

Wen Fei screened the lower half of his face with his fan, using the fan to represent his mouth: In your opinion, what ought to be my punishment?

Zhou Ying answered candidly: “I don’t know. I haven’t finished reading the sect rules.”

Wen Fei: “...”

He suddenly thought that, considering appearances alone, this individual was a little like Zhi Jingzhai’s evil disciple!

Wen Fei tried sounding him out: Nicely done, Your Highness Prince Zhuang. Everything calculated to the smallest detail. How did you know that the Territory Map rubbing from Zhao Long’s head was in my hands?

“I guessed.” Zhou Ying had no intention of evading. “There was nothing from the Li clan for two hundred years. It was evident that the Territory Map rubbing stripped from Zhao Long back then hadn’t fallen into their hands. Senior Shen was an innocent scapegoat. In those circumstances, there was no latitude for her to pull any tricks. It wasn’t very likely that the Territory Map rubbing had fallen into her hands, either. Furthermore, this case was odd: medicine cultivators have resilient consciousnesses; their wills are steady and tough. With her near-ascended spirit cultivation level, some humiliation wouldn’t have led to her killing herself. Zhao Long’s wrongdoing had come first, and the Dignitary of Rule Elder didn’t belong to the Zhao family. He would have handled the case justly. Why would she have been in a hurry to die?”

Wen Fei’s hand tightened. A crack appeared on the fan. His eyes flashed, and the fan was repaired by spiritual energy.

“All I could think of was that she had done it in order to conceal something only a medicine cultivator would know—in other words, the issue was likely with that pill. At the same, Senior Shen was Xuanyin’s leading medicine cultivator, just preparing to become an ascended spirit. She had in fact made a spirit-protecting pill...but a single orchid of immortality produces three drops of dew, and two of the three were missing. The vanished drop of orchid of immortality dew may have been lost in a failed refining, and it may have been turned into another spirit-protecting pill. Supposing there really were two pills, both made by her, then there would seem to have been nothing to hide. After all, everyone knew about her. So was it possible that one of the pills—for example, the one that had been used on Zhao Long—just happened not to have been made by her? And just happened to have something to do with the mysterious whereabouts of the Territory Map rubbing?”

On Wen Fei’s fan, a number of words appeared, as regular as though inscribed on a memorial tablet: If she did not make it, who did?

“Indeed. The spirit-protecting pill not only uses materials that are hard to come by, it is even harder to refine. At the time, Peak Master Wen, you had just recently entered the sect. You were a nobody, so no one thought of you. Looking back on it after two hundred years, I’d have to be blind not to understand.” Zhou Ying waved a hand. “These are my wild guesses. Forgive any inaccuracies, Peak Master Wen.”

Wen Fei stared at him, his expression changing several times, but he saw no probing on Zhou Ying’s face, and no curiosity. It was as if he were only asking him about the different weather on the thirty-five peaks.

Watched by this gaze that contained practically no humanity, unexpectedly, Wen Fei’s tense shoulders gradually relaxed. After a moment, he gave a laugh and thought, The Xuanyin Mountains’s death really will deserve their deaths at the hands of you fiends.

He turned and offered incense to the two elders almost solemnly. Suddenly, with nearly every word dragged out very long, he clumsily said, “I heard rumors before that said when Green Pool Peak’s disciples found themselves bewildered or doubting, they would all go tell their peak master about it. When outsiders heard that, they didn’t believe it. Who would dare to babble in front of a person like Duanrui-shijie? Now it seems that it may have been true. Anyway, no matter what you way of clarity cultivators hear, you can treat it all as ephemeral.”⁹⁸

As he spoke one word at a time, Zhou Ying waited expressionlessly beside him, neither fretting on his account nor finding him ridiculous.

Wen Fei didn't look at him. When he was finished offering incense, he concentrated all his spiritual sense in his eyes and strove to look into the mist behind the incense altar, trying to find the name he had pronounced many times in his heart, but in the end, he couldn't see anything clearly. Instead, he felt colder.

He had chosen the way of medicine making and come to the inner sect. He had seen the dozens of heavenly rules at the gate of the Principal Peak, unexpectedly even stricter than those for the outer sects. Learning that she was soon to become an ascended spirit, he had been even more reluctant to rashly disturb her. He had only used a Heavenly Question to furtively send her the orchid of immortality flower dew—two drops of it; the third drop he had used to make a pill himself. He didn't dare to call it a “gift,” afraid of showing off before an expert and afraid of giving offense, so he had only said, “This is my first time making it. Please instruct me, senior.”

Only the medicine and toolmaking ways would use the spirit-protecting pill. The people in these ways often neglected physical training and found it hard to pass through heavenly tribulations...and their success didn't depend on their combat skills; they didn't care very much about whether they would be strong or weak after becoming ascended spirits.

But Wen Fei had still wanted to give her the best, so he had thought long and hard and come up with a lousy idea: in the ancient texts of the medicine making way, it said that the ascended spirit tribulation was a test. Only if it pierced the spirit and touched the consciousness could it grant the cultivator the comprehension of the ascended spirit boundary. With the spirit-protecting pill putting in its oar, the heavenly tribulation would feel that it hadn't struck to its satisfaction, so what it gave would be lesser.

So he'd had a fantastic idea. Taking inspiration from the idea of the spiritual image doll, he had used the secret art of an evil way obtained from the black market to include a sliver of his own consciousness in that spirit-protecting pill. This way, when the heavenly tribulation fell, it would first strike the spirit-protecting pill—in other words, him—and only reach the real spirit after shattering the pill. The lightning she would endure would be decreased, and the heavenly tribulation would have attacked to its heart's content—wasn't that the best of both worlds?

Of course, it was possible that the recipient didn't think much of him and wouldn't use his pill. That was all right. At any rate, he had sent both the flower dew and his intentions. If she disdained him, she could just as well make one for herself. He would know how she felt and wouldn't bother her in the future.

But mortals possessed of emotions and desires very often only say that they are taking the philosophical approach. When the consciousness in the spirit-protecting pill was touched, Wen Fei was in Jinping, running around everywhere under pressure. As soon as he felt the touch, he knew that the pill had been taken by a stranger.

Though he bragged about being ready to take whatever came, he still couldn't restrain a bitter laugh.

Looking at the desolation of Jinping City, the former general commander of Heaven's Design Pavilion who had abandoned walking in the mortal world had felt all his guts ache. What had he been doing, going all the way to the inner sect for the sake of a relationship? In the end, his affections had turned out to be unrequited. It was utterly lamentable and utterly despicable.

But once he had made his intentions known, there had always been the possibility that he would be shot through the heart. Wen Fei grit his teeth and readied himself for a heavenly tribulation to strike his outreaching consciousness. He waited for a long time, but there was no heavenly tribulation.

He felt that something was wrong and couldn't resist probing the spirit of the person who had swallowed the pill. That was when he found to his astonishment that this person's consciousness was already dead, and it was only the spirit-protecting pill keeping the spirit together. The person's cultivation was quite high, too!

Someone was speaking nearby.

First a woman said with a soft sigh, "Bailu is one of my most talented disciples, on her way to leaving my tutelage and taking her place as a peak master..."

Another voice, imposing, interrupted her: "The Xuanyin Mountains have only thirty-six peaks, and at present thirty-three of them have masters. Haven't you noticed that there have been fewer and fewer ascended spirits over the years?"

"Yes, the disciples are all worthless..."

"It isn't that the disciples are worthless," that imposing voice said.

"Xuanyin's thirty-six peaks were left behind by the sage. The Xuanyin Mountains can hold thirty-six ascended spirits at most. Once there are too many ascended spirits, no matter how talented the established foundation disciples may be, their boundaries will be kept down if they cultivate in the inner sect. Shen Bailu isn't a direct descendant of the Li family, her talents aren't precisely outstanding, and she'd have had to rely on the aid of a pill to become an ascended spirit. There's nothing to regret."

"Shen Bailu" was her name. Wen Fei, scared witless, thought, What does that mean? They aren't going to let her become an ascended spirit because she was using the spirit-protecting pill?

He had already realized that the woman speaking was Li Yuelan, master of Golden Osmanthus Peak. Li Yuelan's position in the Li family's generational ranking was very high. Who dared to speak so commandingly to her? Could it actually be...

Wen Fei's heart came up to his throat. He listened with all his might. But his consciousness was trapped in the spirit-protecting pill and couldn't move at will.

Then he heard the imposing voice say, "Do not waste any more time."

Wen Fei's first reaction was that he should send a Heavenly Question to the Dignitary of Fate Elder. Before he could stand up, he felt a sharp pain in the part of his consciousness attached to the spirit-protecting pill.

The spirit of the dead person who had taken the pill was quaking. Something was being peeled off by force. With Wen Fei's cultivation level at the time, he couldn't see what it was clearly. The others spent a long time peeling, and he seemed to be cleaved in two for a long time. By an odd coincidence, just at the moment that the thing was removed, the spirit-protecting pill wore off. The dead person's spirit collapsed, and Wen Fei's external consciousness recovered its freedom of movement...and ran head-on into that dead person's thing. A map was imprinted whole and entire onto Wen Fei's consciousness.

Faintly, he heard one of the killers cry out in alarm, "Why has the Territory Map rubbing disappeared?"

He had no time to see what place this was a map of. The moment his consciousness was free, he finally caught sight of the indistinct scene around him. He was overwhelmed with grief—

"Li Yuelan and Li Fengshan knocked Senior Shen unconscious and used her spirit-protecting pill to kill Zhao Long so they could strip off the Territory Map. As a master medicine maker, Senior Shen must have already seen what special processing you had applied to the pill you had given her. When she woke up, she realized that the Territory Map rubbing must have ended up with you through a series of coincidences. But the elders had already barged in then, along with others. She knew that she would be unable to explain herself, and in order to protect you, the only thing she could do before the colossus of the Li clan was to die.” Zhou Ying nodded. “That makes sense. Thank you for resolving my doubts, Peak Master Wen.”

Wen Fei ignored his heartless answer. He was silent a while, then said, “Way of clarity cultivator, instruct me—why are so many name tokens preserved behind that mist? Is it...that their spirits continue after death?”

Zhou Ying answered, “After becoming an ascended spirit, if one’s consciousness is resilient enough, one may be able to seize another body after one’s physical body dies. But a person’s death is like a flame being extinguished. Ghosts are only the vain fantasies of the living who are greedy for life and fear death.”

“Then...then what are they?”

Zhou Ying looked in the direction of his gaze. “They are ways.”

“What?” Wen Fei gave him a look of incomprehension. This youngster’s age wasn’t great—why was his tone like that of the old cultivators in the Latent Cultivation Temple who taught the basics of cultivation, saying things no one could understand and then demonstrating them with useless scripture?

The candle flames in the mourning hall dimmed for a moment for some reason. Wen Fei just happened to see a strange light shining from Zhou Ying's eyes. Instead of being spherical, his eyeballs had become multifaceted. It was only a flash. Before he could get a clear look, that light had vanished.

Zhou Ying opened his mouth, but for some reason, he didn't say whatever words had come to his lips, swallowing them back.

Wen Fei frowned. This was even stranger—cultivators of the way of clarity either said whatever they had to say or else said nothing. How could he “wish to speak but hold back”?

“Peak Master Wen, a person may be guided by others to open their spiritual eyes, can deliberately exercise themselves, or they may find themselves in a place where spiritual energy is thick, and it will happen naturally through happy accident.” Zhou Ying's voice suddenly became much softer. As if afraid of losing his voice, he was keeping it low in his throat. Fortunately, sound carried well in the mourning hall. “But there is only one way to establish a foundation, and that is to take an established foundation pill.”

Wen Fei waved his fan and wrote in dense small regular script: Establishing a foundation is the formal entrance into cultivation. Having an essence in one's body is by nature colossally different from being an open-eyed cultivator. If one wants to preserve an “essence” within one’s body, then one must refine a material for elixirs like the silk dragon heart, which is capable of storing spiritual energy. In fact, reasonably speaking, even if there were no silk dragon hearts, there would be something similar. It is only that we of the medicine making way have yet to find any more ideal material. We shall see whether the geniuses of the toolmaking way can create a “spirit-storing gold” in the future.

“You must be joking, Peak Master Wen,” Zhou Ying said with no show of surprise. “If one used metal as part of one’s body, wouldn’t one become an earworm half-puppet?”

Wen Fei became even more curious: this cultivator of the way of clarity not only had the ability to “wish to speak but hold back,” he could also say “words that mean more than what they say”; how could he have so many tricks?

So he asked, “What does that mean?”

“Nothing, only idle chat.” After this, Zhou Ying did not speak to him again.

Wen Fei left the main hall with his mind full of misgivings. When he passed by the stone tablet carved full of sect rules, his steps paused slightly. The Xuanyin Mountains’ regulations and taboos numbered in the several dozens to over a hundred, and all they regulated were the cowering little disciples.

Wen Fei thought, Well, you can go fuck yourself.

Thereupon he stepped onto his fan and flew toward Rosy Cloud Peak like a meteor. But the ghastly disciple name tokens behind the incense altar and Zhou Ying's "Wouldn't one become an earworm half-puppet?" remained stuck like a fish bone in his throat. Wen Fei returned to his own mountain, avoided the salutes of the disciples coming to welcome him, and wrote: The silk dragon heart stores have bottomed out. I'm afraid we will not be able to restock in the near future. Find me all the ancient texts concerning the established foundation pill. I'm going into seclusion to research whether there is any possible substitute.

In the mourning hall on the Principal Peak, Zhou Ying coughed up a mouthful of blood.

Before he could finish speaking the word "ways" earlier, a force like a heavenly tribulation had flown from the incense altar and penetrated his body, piercing his lungs. Zhou Ying, slowly repairing the wound with spiritual energy, cocked an ear toward the incense altar.

He heard countless clamoring voices behind the mist of the incense altar. They were all human voices, but none spoke in human tongues.

Fortunately, the way of clarity could feel no terror, or else the sounds in the mourning hall could have scared a person sick.

In other words, there had in fact been two spirit-protecting pills back then.

Wen Fei's cultivation had after all still been shallow. Shen Bailu had seen what he had done and been unable to bring herself to let him undertake the tribulation in her stead, so she had made another spirit-protecting pill, only carrying his gift with her, not expecting that it would become another person's tool to commit murder and shift the blame.

Wen Fei's pill had been taken by Zhao Long. So what had happened to the one Shen Bailu, who hadn't had time to become an ascended spirit, had made herself?

It was said that the Sea of Stars had pointed to a "romantic crisis" at the time. If it had only been Li Yuelan, "romantic crisis" might have been justifiable, but Wen Fei had heard with his own ears that the Dignitary of Code had been present and might have been called the mastermind.

Elder Li had at any rate been over a thousand years old; "romantic" would have been rather a stretch.

The star stones in the Sea of Stars looked very similar to the heart demon seed...

The Xuanyin Mountains were the corpse of the full moon god. All cultivators from antiquity to the present were the puppets of their Ways of the Heart. After death, their essences returned to the spiritual mountains and the universe, and their Ways of the Heart, like these name tokens, also merged with the immortal mountains.

Compared to a full moon sage, even shed skins were ants. An ant naturally could not shake the immortal mountains. So what about countless ants over hundreds upon thousands of years?

Xi Shiyong said that the Silver Moon had “gone mad.” The body of the tool was on the Central Peak, while the “moonlight” had run off to the East Peak. That was nothing to wonder at—after all, the Sanyue Mountains were the only immortal mountains with two “full moons.”

Flowers born from the same stem, twins, the Heartless Lotus... This truly was the fate of the Sanyue Mountains.

When the flimsy Heavenly Question reached the Yongning Marquis Manor, Xi Ping only glanced at it and put it away without opening it. He only said to Xi Yue, “Meat’s no good, it’s too little, it can’t eat it. Go get some sheep’s milk and dilute it a little... Xi Yue, you’re really in a hurry to waste a fortune!”

Xi Yue had taken out a small jade stamp stone and pulverized it, then used plain water to feed it to the kitten that couldn't chew and tear solid food yet. He looked at Xi Ping. "The Heavenly Question..."

"Oh, it's nothing. No need to read it. I asked His Highness Prince Zhuang for something, is he going to be stingy and not let me have it? I was the one who made the money to buy it, anyway."

Just then, both their spiritual senses were touched. Xi Ping glanced toward the garden.

Xi Yue said, "The Peak Master has left."

"Yeah." Xi Ping paused, then said, "He has things to do."

Even if he hadn't had anything to do, he wouldn't have stayed long. Never mind the Yongning Marquis Manor, Dangu Lane...even Jinping City itself had no room for a shed skin sword cultivator. Zhi Xiu was uncomfortable, and others were even more uncomfortable—Xi Ping had never known the servants at the Yongning Marquis Manor to be so well-behaved.

It was now the still of night, and also the stillness of the whole house not daring to breathe too loud. Tonight, probably no one had dared to sleep. The indolent Marquis Manor, which not even the arrival of the selection card back then had been able to wake, would be rising early tomorrow morning.

Xi Yue suddenly grabbed him. "I want to establish a foundation."

"What's a little brat like you need to establish a foundation for?" Xi Ping gently tapped on his head, then pulled his sleeves back down. "So you can also make the whole family get up early to attend on you? The path to the immortal mountains is a path of no return..."

Xi Yue stubbornly interrupted him: "I want to come with you. I want to establish a foundation."

"Fine, I'll go talk to Lao Pang about it first thing tomorrow," Xi Ping said. "There are open-eyed disciples in the inner sect, too, you don't need to establish a foundation to come with me."

"It's not the same!"

"How is it not the same?" Xi Ping said. "What, all your colleagues have established foundations, and you're jealous? Why the rush? All those geezers in Heaven's Design Pavilion are older than Dad..."

Xi Yue was inarticulate, he couldn't explain it clearly. For his every sentence, Xi Ping could use ten sentences to shut him up. After a long moment of frustration, the half-puppet could still only squeeze out, "It's not the same."

It wasn't because he wanted to raise his cultivation level or be more powerful. It was because he dimly sensed that as long as he hadn't established a foundation, there would be an ice-cold barrier separating him from Xi Ping.

That person was on the other side of that barrier, digging up the earth and planting flowers, now ordering him to do this or do that, now wanting to go out driving a steam car and fool around running into walls, filling the Marquis Manor with his bustle...but still extremely lonely.

"I..."

Xi Yue was just about to say something when another Heavenly Question flew in.

Xi Ping froze. He hadn't expected san-ge to send another letter.

When he tore open the second Heavenly Question, he caught a faint scent of blood. The letter said: "Beware the spiritual sense."

Beware...what?

The middle of the night was the time many cultivators were hard at work, especially after such an eventful day when they were all uneasy and urgently needed to calm down. In Xuanyin's inner and outer sects, the cultivators who had no official duties to attend to all began to meditate without prior consultation, but the sounds in their ears didn't grow quiet at once as usual.

The Ways of the Heart inherited from their forebears were in constant agitation. As if they had something to say, they gently touched the cultivators' spiritual senses.

CHAPTER 181 - Tomb of the Sage (7)

People were born with a spiritual sense. A paramount spiritual sense was in fact also an “abnormal spiritual sense”—it wasn’t completely human.

Ordinary people’s spiritual senses were separated into first, second, and third class.

Of these, the first-class spiritual sense came near to the level of the average person after they had opened their spiritual eyes. It was very rare and was among the natural endowments valued by the cultivation world. The third-class spiritual sense, meanwhile, belonged to those whose intellect wasn’t entirely sound. Apart from these, over ninety percent of people were second-class, with minor variations. Slightly more sensitive people had an easier time winning at dice and could often avoid a catastrophe through a flash of inspiration, but under ordinary circumstances they also easily became agitated by slight disturbances in their surroundings, and might be prone to illness. The slightly slower ones, for example the type that would carry out a prank right under their own father’s nose and still brag about it, were more robust; they only had a tendency to throw themselves at the discipline rod.

A mortal’s spiritual sense wasn’t separate from their physical senses; only after their spiritual eyes opened could the spiritual sense stand alone and be free to control. Up to a point, cultivators could attach their spiritual sense to one of their physical senses, making it more acute. And when danger was near, some major event that concerned them took place, or there was a master in the area, the spiritual sense would be touched.

“Beware the spiritual sense” read like “beware the eyes” or “beware the nose.” If you didn’t know better, you would have thought this letter had been meant for Zhuoming and had been sent to the wrong person.

Xi Ping concentrated for a moment, but now that shifu was gone, there was no person or object in the vicinity that could touch his spiritual sense. His constantly stressed spiritual sense had gone dormant in the still night, for once resting.

For the first time in his life, he couldn’t understand san-ge’s letter.

Xi Ping suddenly felt an unreasoning distress. An unprecedented sense of distance passed through the four words on the paper and hit him in the face like a slap.

The kitten was frightened by the aura coming off him; it shrieked. Xi Yue saw that there was something wrong with his expression. “Ge!”

Xi Ping was quickly pulled back by their voices. He clenched his teeth tightly, forcing down his turbulent emotions, making himself return to the state of “there are no big problems.”

“It’s all right, let me think,” Xi Ping said softly. He deliberately deepened and lengthened his breaths. Across empty space, he picked up the little cat and held it in one hand.

Controlling the extremely faint spiritual energy at his fingertips, as if he were using Zhaoting to carve designs into tofu, he cleaned the dust and dirt from the cat bit by bit. As his fingers stroked the kitten’s soft fur, he commanded himself again and again: Calm down...calm down...

San-ge had entered the way of clarity, not the way of “I’m not telling you.” He had no reason to be deliberately vague.

The Heavenly Question looked spotless, but there was a smell of blood clinging to it. The handwriting that had been written with spiritual energy was obviously unsteady in a few places. It was clear that the writer had been injured. Princess Duanrui had just died, and the way of clarity stood aloof from the world; on the Xuanyin Mountains’ Principal Peak, who would dare to harm the successor to her Way of the Heart? Even if there were external foes in the immortal mountains, it wouldn’t be up to an established foundation to step in.

So the greatest likelihood was that he had encountered some backlash...
San-ge probably couldn't say what it was.

If it wasn't some great matter of vital importance, san-ge wouldn't have sent an extra Heavenly Question. But if it was a great matter of vital importance, then why was Xi Ping's own spiritual sense so quiet?

Xi Ping considered briefly, then sent a message through the reincarnation wood: "Is all at peace tonight?"

Practically none of the cultivators were sleeping. Zhao Qindan, Wei Chengxiang, and the Luwu abroad were the first to respond; they reported whatever they happened to be busy with.

"The Sanyue Mountains aren't at peace, two groups of cultivators have started gearing up for a fight."

"I wouldn't say it's at peace. There are more and more evil cultivators in Tao County. Even that Bu Zhichou has come."

"What do you mean 'at peace,' senior? Everyone is on edge in Zhaoye. The government troops are going home to home searching for Miah. They won't even let the old people and children slip by."

“It’s all right, don’t you worry. Everyone’s consciousnesses returned intact, no one was injured. Our village and the traps to ward off spiritual beasts are basically finished, I was just talking it over with Chief Li, we might have another batch of people come over at the end of the year...”

Xi Ping listened with one ear, feeling that there was nothing out of the ordinary. What remained were the comparatively strong consciousnesses. Bai Ling and Zhi Xiu simultaneously asked him “What’s wrong?”, while Wen Fei and others like him were surprised that the reincarnation wood could be used as a communication device and asked him in the spirit of intellectual inquiry, between reincarnation wood and a Heavenly Question, which was more resistant to prying.

Xi Ping quickly realized that only one person who was normally quick to respond hadn’t answered: Lin Chi.

“Look after the house, Yue-bao’er,” Xi Ping said to Xi Yue, then turned and disappeared in the courtyard.

Lin Chi had been helping him transport trees. A few reincarnation wood seeds had fallen on the summit of Moon Plated Peak.

One of the reincarnation wood seeds that had dropped into a thicket easily found a place to put down roots and sprout. Before the sapling could finish growing, Xi Ping came out of the tree, crouching.

In a rare occurrence, the summit of Moon Plated Peak was enveloped by an extremely oppressive aura. The spiritual wind had stagnated, hardly moving. With a flash, Xi Ping headed straight toward the peak master's residence.

He was feeling more and more uneasy: Lin Chi's routine was more regular than an old man's. If there was no "great work" that he needed to keep an eye on, at this time, he would usually be meditating to do his daily lessons. With such a major event having just happened in the Xuanyin Mountains, there was no way he could focus enough to create tools. Reasonably speaking, he also wouldn't put away the reincarnation wood. What had happened?

Lin Chi was in fact doing his daily lessons. A cultivator ought to have been at his calmest while meditating, but for some reason his brow was deeply furrowed.

Xi Ping sent over a spiritual wind. "Peak Master..."

Before the spiritual wind reached him, Lin Chi abruptly opened his eyes. There was actually some ferocity on his delicate features, aimed at Xi Ping.

Xi Ping's fingers curled instinctively to take hold of an invisible qin string. But Lin Chi quickly got a good look at him and pinched the center of his brow hard, pinching away the bitter enmity.

Before Xi Ping could speak, Lin Chi, for once in his life, got ahead of him and said, "The Xuanyin Mountains and the Territory Map are blending together, and in less than a hundred years, the thirty-six...the other thirty-five peaks will completely dissolve into the veins of the earth like Resonant Stone Peak—is that true?"

After a pause, Xi Ping broke out in gooseflesh—though Lin Chi was a friend, the battle in Jinping had just been fought. Apart from Wen Fei and the others who had been present, Zhi Xiu had yet to tell anyone else.

"How do you know?"

Even a person like Lin Chi, who was virtually without desire, couldn't resist being dumbfounded. He blankly mumbled, "It's actually...it's actually..."

He had lived over eight hundred years, one lonely and weary day after another, and suddenly he was learning that this immortal path would soon be severed. Lin Chi felt as if he had put a foot wrong going downstairs. He didn't know how to react.

Xi Ping said urgently, “This has profound implications. Peak Master Lin, who was it that told you?”

Lin Chi came back to his senses and grabbed hold of Xi Ping. “Leave now. I’m afraid they also know that you’re here.”

These words were even more bone-chilling. Xi Ping said, “Wait, are you telling me a ghost story? Who knows I’m here? Why should I...”

“While I was meditating just now, my spiritual sense was touched by a ‘heavenly edict.’ It was the heavenly edict that told me.”

As Lin Chi spoke, he tossed the Unbound Furnace and a pile of stuff on the summit of Moon Plated Peak into a mustard seed. It was said that when a cultivator was absorbed to the utmost point in their Way of the Heart, able to forget self and forget the world, they would sometimes have a subtle sensation, as if they were glimpsing the designs of the heavens. Once they attained this “heavenly edict” that could only be come upon by chance, not sought, they would make great progress.

Xi Ping didn’t get a clear look at what he was sweeping into the mustard seed. He hadn’t come around yet. “What kind of heavens are so talkative? Overcast ones?”

In a rare occurrence, Lin Chi bristled. “Don’t be flippant! When you came to Moon Plated Peak just now, it was as if something had pricked my spiritual sense. My head was full of ‘The pilferer of the immortal mountains’ heavenly order is here.’ How could a heavenly edict like this come only to a toolmaker like me? I’m afraid all thirty-six peaks must know by now! Even General Zhi might not be able to handle it if he returned. Take the things and go!”

When he had just spoken, a message came to Moon Plated Peak with a whizz. Lin Chi’s heart skipped. Before he could read it, all kinds of messages were coming thick and fast. There were spoken messages and Heavenly Questions. In hardly any time, all the great peak masters had Moon Plated Peak surrounded.

Thoughts flew through Xi Ping’s mind: what the hell was this “heavenly edict”?

If someone was sending the peak masters a message, why hadn’t Wen Fei received it? Because he was an accomplice?

But so was Lin Chi an accomplice! Lin Chi had run back and forth between the Xuanyin Mountains and the Law Breaker on his own, emptying out Rosy Cloud Peak and planting trees on Resonant Stone Peak, hopelessly busy... Wouldn't the heavenly edict have to have been blind to miss an ascended spirit of his stature?

Also, why was there someone who could disguise themselves as a heavenly edict and prod directly at the peak masters' spiritual senses?

Never mind the likes of the Dignitary of Fate, even the full moon Xiang Rong couldn't have done it!

“The immortal path has been severed” was a sentence to drive every mighty cultivator mad; it was no different from having your spiritual bones removed with a blunt knife.

Each of Xuanyin's ascended spirit peak masters competed with the next in outward propriety, but now they had involuntarily lost hold over decorum. Without waiting for Lin Chi's response, they joined forces and barged onto the summit of Moon Plated Peak—after Lin Chi had rekindled his furnace, because he needed to be able to send materials in and out and communicate with the Principal Peak at all times, he had dispersed the mountain seal on Moon Plated Peak's summit. After all, most of the people in the inner sect weren't as rude as Xi Ping. Normally, if you “left the door open,” people still wouldn't come in uninvited.

Who could have expected something like this to happen?

Lin Chi stuffed the mustard seed into his hands. “Go!”

Xi Ping quickly absorbed the mustard seed into his palm. He didn’t delay for a moment—among ascended spirits, he was in the early stage of the early stage; an “eight-year-old” was a baby, and he wasn’t a fiendish sword cultivator. How could he withstand being ganged up on by a crowd of veteran ascended spirits?

But just as he was preparing to swap places with a reincarnation wood tree outside the immortal mountains, he suddenly found his consciousness confined.

Next, the Dignitary of Fate’s blindfolded figure flashed, appearing above the Sea of Stars.

This was bad. Shifu must have already left Great Wan by now.

Once Zhi Xiu went beyond the national boundaries, Xuanyin’s great mountain array would take instructions only from the Dignitary of Fate. The whole area of the Xuanyin Mountains seemed to have become like the bottom of the Impassable Sea had once been, completely cutting off contact between inside and outside. Xi Ping couldn’t leave by swapping places!

At the same time, this meant that he couldn't contact shifu, and shifu likely couldn't return to the Xuanyin Mountains via his accompanying plant, either.

Rosy Cloud Peak wasn't very far from Moon Plated Peak. Wen Fei arrived quickly. "What is this? What has happened?"

No one paid attention to him. All the great peak masters came to stand at the summit of Moon Plated Peak at once. It had never been so full of people.

Xi Ping and Lin Chi were surrounded.

Xi Ping only now realized that he had only been calm on the surface before. In reality, he hadn't been calm. Otherwise, he wouldn't have rushed straight to the Xuanyin Mountains just because he had taken back his disciple name token.

"Zisheng, move aside," a peak master surnamed Lin said to Lin Chi in a relatively mild manner, but his eyes didn't leave Xi Ping. "Dignitary of Fate Elder, just now, obeying the heavenly edict, I probed the immortal mountain's veins of the earth and saw that the immortal mountains are indeed inseparably mingled with that Territory Map—so was everything the heavenly edict said true? Will the immortal mountains...truly come to an end under our auspices?"

The Dignitary of Fate glanced expressionlessly at Xi Ping and responded, "I have received no heavenly edict. As to the rest, I cannot say."

A silencing spell only made a person unable to reveal information voluntarily. If someone else developed a suspicion and asked, the silencing spell couldn't control what hints the person it had been placed on gave. When the Dignitary of Fate said "I cannot say," what more did the peak masters need?

"Fine—a fine two-hundred-year-old shed skin. He has always been mild and refined, keeping his head down, and now he's turned around and placed a silencing spell on his own shifu—how far he has gone to give insult to his teacher and his sect!" another peak master said. "Here I was wondering how he could produce an accompanying plant when he became a shed skin—his must be an evil way that heaven and earth cannot abide! Is his shed skin boundary very firm? Does he really think that now that the Dignitary of Rule Elder and Princess Duanrui are dead, he can hoodwink everyone in the Xuanyin Mountains?"

"Indeed," Xi Ping answered, "it's too disgraceful. In my opinion, Peak Master I-don't-know-your-name, you ought to immediately write him a Heavenly Question calling him back and have it out with him.”

Lin Chi was about to kneel down before him. Xi Shiyong, have a heart, don't stoke the flames!

“You...”

Xi Ping quietly waved a hand at Lin Chi, changing tack quickly. The next moment, he smiled very charmingly and saluted the peak master who was seething with rage. “Do not be angry, senior. You criticized my shifu just now. It made me unhappy to hear, so I spoke out of turn. Please forgive me. Yesterday, Jinping was invaded by evil cultivators and enemies from Chu, who shattered the Southern Sage's seal. The situation was urgent, you know that as well as I do. We all did whatever we could. No one had attention to spare for the consequences. My shifu knows that we have incurred a catastrophe and is already considering a means of remedy. Do you not see that he is still out working on it now and has not yet returned to the mountains?”

It was just that the method of “remedy” might not be very well suited to the immortals' wishes.

The thirty-six peaks hadn't turned out such a glib talker in centuries. The restlessness and rage about to blow the tops of the peak masters' skulls off was suspended and held down; it fell slightly.

Anyway, Old Man Zhang Jue couldn't very well say anything. Even if his bladder burst from holding it in, all he could do was listen.

Xi Ping assumed a grave expression and said with deadly seriousness, "As soon as I heard Lin-shishu mention the heavenly edict, I hurried back to learn the details. Before he could explain, all of you showed up. That will save me going to pay each of you a visit. We can all pool our wisdom and efforts, quickly discuss what to do—what did the heavenly edict say? Were there any other indications?"

In order to keep him here, Xuanyin's great mountain array had sealed the mountains. Xi Ping couldn't contact the outside world, so others were sure to be unable to make contact either. After all, other people didn't have accompanying plants.

This wasn't necessarily a bad thing. Him being trapped in the Xuanyin Mountains was much better than this deadly information secretly spreading in all directions.

Xi Ping calmed down: maybe this was just what san-ge had meant. The most pressing issue was for him to work out as soon as possible just what was going on with this heavenly edict.

He hoped that san-ge had escaped after sending him that letter.

But even in this, events ran contrary to his wishes.

When Xuanyin's great array rose, its hum disturbed the Bell of Tribulation. The Bell of Tribulation moved on its own, causing the strange incense altar on the Principal Peak to sway gently.

Seeing Zhang Jue "hanging" above Moon Plated Peak, Zhou Ying silently disappeared—his immortal path had always been unlike that of ordinary people. The Heartless Lotus had at least had the lotus seal; Zhou Ying had had no vital weapon as a consummate open-eyed cultivator, and he still didn't have one after establishing a foundation.

Perhaps he himself was the "weapon."

Before establishing a foundation, Zhou Ying could deceive a cultivator a major boundary above him when he turned into mist. After establishing a foundation, with the way of clarity inhibiting his emotions, he had become even more unfathomable. When he dissolved into mist, even he sometimes couldn't find himself.

His mist blended with the mountain mists. While Zhang Jue was being kept in check by Xi Ping, Zhou Ying silently snuck into the Sea of Stars.

No one below an ascended spirit could enter the Sea of Stars, because low-level cultivators would be ensnared by chaotic fate and lose their way.

Once inside, Zhou Ying, who had turned to mist, was blown back to his original form by the wind. Stars hinting at his destiny automatically drew near him, tempting him to look at them.

Zhou Ying turned a blind eye, avoiding these obstructions with complete unconcern, going straight to the very core of the Sea of Stars.

CHAPTER 182 - Tomb of the Sage (8)

In the deepest recesses of the Sea of Stars was the Dignity of Fate Elder Zhang Jue's place of quiet cultivation. It was an empty space containing nothing but a faded prayer mat. There wasn't even a place where one could occasionally recline.

It was said that the Dignitary of Fate Elder had sat here day and night for a thousand years, refining his Way of the Heart by resisting the desire to open his eyes.

Fate could not be grasped. If you couldn't take the temptation and glimpsed your own fate and that of those closest to you, the originally fixed trajectory would take a turn in an unknown direction. At best, matters would go contrary to your wishes. At worst, you would become obsessed and perish, body and way both.

The person sitting here on this lonely old prayer mat could only look at two kinds of things: things that had already happened, which the Sea of Stars could aid in interpreting, and things that would influence the general course of events in the world, for which the Sea of Stars would create a fog to give warnings to all living things, which the Dignitary of Fate could convey on its behalf.

Zhang Jue did not cultivate the way of clarity. Relying purely on his personal self-restraint, he really had kept himself blindfolded here for a thousand years, not taking a step over the line.

One didn't know whether to admire him or pity him.

The slightly glowing "dust particles" floating in the air were the "stars" in the Sea of Stars. They would float for the length of a lifetime before falling to the ground. When these particles stuck together and congealed, they formed a star stone.

The Xuanyin Mountains had formed over a thousand years ago.

Surrounding that prayer mat, the star stones were spread all over the ground.

These star stones that seemed dirty because they had so many facets did indeed closely resemble the demon seed, though they were of a different material. Because they were made of fine sand stuck together, the star stones were slightly more spongy, and the facets on them weren't as regular as the demon seed's. Moreover, the star stones covering the ground were all different sizes: there were those as big as a human head and those as small as a bean.

The saying that “mirrors reflect the heart” had existed since antiquity, and prisms took the shape of countless “small mirrors.” In the cultivation world, things with this structure were usually all connected to the “heart.” Many “mirrors” meant that they could reflect many points of view, easily echo what was in the depths of the human heart. It wasn’t strange that they should obstruct the senses and trap the consciousness like the heart demon seed.

But the metaphor in this made one fearful: after the luminous stars “died,” they gathered together to become stones like the demon seed.

Just then, there was a loud noise from outside; they must have started fighting on Moon Plated Peak. Zhou Ying ignored it. He put a pill to suppress pain and focus the mind in his mouth. His eyes changed shape, becoming demon eyes.

The excuse Xi Ping had come up with at the last moment after hearing the contents of the heavenly edict from Lin Chi wasn’t exactly seamless, but Zhi Xiu’s prohibition was keeping Zhang Jue from speaking to refute him, and there seemed to be no problem with what he had said at first listen. But no sooner had he spoken than a peak master surnamed Li tossed a talisman right at him without a word.

“What a glib tongue! The heavenly edict distinctly said that you people had used us to take possession of the Territory Map and steal the immortal power of the spiritual mountains.”

The Xuanyin Mountains didn't necessarily adhere to reason, but they certainly adhered to politeness. Since the downfall of the Li family's backer, the family had drifted along as though they were invisible. Xi Ping hadn't expected there to be such a fractious peak master among them.

The talisman turned into a rain of swords above Xi Ping's head, dense enough to turn him into mincemeat. Lin Chi quickly stepped forward. A line of light flashed on the ground. As if it had turned into a screw, the summit of Moon Plated Peak twisted downward a zhang. Twelve rabbit heads leapt out of the ground, drawing spiritual energy directly from Moon Plated Peak to shoot upward, shooting up twelve astral winds.

This gust seemed to scatter even the stars in the sky. The rain of swords in midair was also swept away.

“Stop,” said Lin Chi, “why would the heavenly edict...”

But his words were shouted too slowly. The other Lis had already charged forward. Two sword thrusts from the Tai Sui Qin flew out. Xi Ping hadn't gone easy; his meridians were even aching faintly. After forcing his opponents into a brief retreat, he immediately wanted to find a reincarnation wood tree in the Xuanyin Mountains to swap places with, but as soon as he moved, he froze—there was no more reincarnation wood in the Xuanyin Mountains.

The ones Lin Chi had planted on Resonant Stone Peak, the reincarnation wood trees and seeds that had accidentally been left behind in thickets and bushes during the process of transport... At some point, all of them had been wiped out.

Xi Ping abruptly looked up. Around countless heads, he looked at Zhang Jue, standing in midair.

At Zhang Jue's feet, there were only two small stones. From a distance, he looked like a puppet hanging there.

During this brief pause, an iron chain came hurtling toward Xi Ping's head. Yet another peak master was seizing the opportunity to attack. In a moment of desperation, Lin Chi summoned forth his own vital toolmaking furnace. The furnace crossed the sky to block that iron chain.

A toolmaking furnace was for making tools, not for fighting. Lin Chi was thoroughly shaken. He took several steps back. But he was entirely unharmed. There was only a crack—a “Fly Ten Thousand Li Like the Roc” green jade pendant he was wearing had split apart.

This had been bestowed on him by the Dignitary of Rule when he was young.

At the time, he had been immersed in intensive study of the spirit-conducting gold, abandoning food and sleep, making tremendous strides along the way of toolmaking, accidentally becoming outstanding among his peers.

Xuanyin’s Lin clan didn’t have as many people as the other big families, but they were all very close. Every year, they had a “family feast” for the Mid-Autumn Festival. Anyone who wasn’t in seclusion came. That year, for some reason, the Dignitary of Rule also made an unexpected appearance. The atmosphere of the whole family suddenly became like the Yuntian Palace Discipline Hall. Everyone greeted each other with looks. Some ascended spirit seniors kept the elder company, not daring to breathe too loudly.

Fortunately, Lin Zongyi only stayed briefly. As if performing routine business, he pointed out a few juniors to ask about their cultivation, naturally including the “outstanding” Lin Chi. Lin Chi even got nervous speaking to his own shizun. When he saw the Dignitary of Rule, it was like a mouse seeing a cat. He nearly fainted. He had no idea what answers he gave...though they had definitely been stupid. When the Dignitary of Rule Elder, who was like an ice sculpture, had heard him out, his eyes actually curved slightly. In a rare occurrence, he spoke, saying to Lin Chi's shifu, "I remember him."

Then he beckoned him over and gave him that jade pendant, pronouncing a weighty utterance: "Your future is boundless."

He couldn't not wear an item that the old ancestor had bestowed on him. Though the jade pendant carried the harsh and awesome aura of the Yuntian Palace, over time, he had still gotten used to it. In the centuries he had spent confined and confining himself, it had even been the only living energy beside him.

Sometimes, Lin Chi would wonder whether that utterance of "Your future is boundless" had been one of the Dignitary of Rule Elder's rare mistakes. Would the elder be disappointed when he recalled it? But probably he wouldn't—what expectations could a sage have had of him?

Instinctively, Lin Chi reached out to grab for it, but the familiar aura flew out from between his fingers and vanished.

Xi Ping's eyes became cold. The sound of the Tai Sui Qin was nearly sharp enough to pierce a person's skull. Sword energy swept out. Then he pulled out the Discard the False and Keep the True book and tossed lotus seals copied from the Heartless Lotus everywhere.

His cultivation was limited, and the lotus seals were copies. He couldn't simply capture the consciousnesses of great ascended spirits whose boundaries were higher than his, but he could still stab their consciousnesses hard enough to hurt.

At the same time, the Lin family member who had told Lin Chi to get out of the way struck, beside himself with rage, aiming directly at the person who had launched the sneak attack with the iron chain. His voice brimmed with spiritual energy: "What a disgrace!"

Lin Chi came back to himself. All the rabbit heads on Moon Plated Peak quickly shifted to form an array, encircling Xi Ping and Lin Chi. They puffed out a patch of dense steam. The situation became deadlocked.

One of the Li family members forcibly stabilized his wavering spirit and coldly said, "What powerful evil cultivator tactics. You all saw that. With the tightness of Jinping's defenses, how could it be invaded by external enemies? Why did evildoers mount a surprise attack as soon as he returned?"

The members of the Zhou clan, who had thus far been standing by and watching, exchanged veiled looks amongst themselves. One peak master surnamed Zhou put in a word hesitantly. “Do not get excited, shixiong. You are only speaking in anger. The Territory Map will soon blend with the veins of the earth, and the spiritual mountains’ immortal power will then disperse throughout the country. There do not necessarily appear to be selfish motives here...”

“If you’re pilfering millet, everyone looks like a thief.” Xi Ping gave a “ha.” Amid his bitter sarcasm, he didn’t forget to sow discord. “It was Li Fengshan who wanted to steal the Territory Map and kill a fellow sect member, not me. Take a good look, why don’t you? None of you are my unworthy descendants.”

The rabbit heads were forced to puff away yet another killing blow for him.

As expected, when the unknown Zhou peak master heard these words, he said without batting an eyelash, “But hasn’t Flying Jade Peak thought that, without the Xuanyin Mountains, the border inscriptions and arrays will all fail? When that happens, won’t a patch of fertile land like Great Wan become a fish on the chopping block for others?”

Though these words were critical, there was still the intention of turning Flying Jade Peak into one of their own.

“Accompanying plants are possessions of the ancient demonic gods. Zhi Jingzhai has betrayed the spiritual mountains. The spiritual mountains were born on account of the full moon sage, and they are closely bound to the existing shed skins. As for why they were so powerless in the face of the Territory Map, there must be a connection to Flying Jade Peak’s traitor. The heavenly edict commanded that, if there was truly no other way, we must first think of a way to sever the whole country’s veins of the earth, execute the evildoers, and allow the immortal mountains to regain their strength.”

As soon as this last sentence was spoken, disapproval appeared on the faces of a number of peak masters. Even Zhang Jue frowned.

“The heavenly edict I heard wasn’t so extreme. If the veins of the earth are severed, wouldn’t the common people...”

“Shixiong, you didn’t listen to the heavenly edict in its entirety. If the veins of the earth are temporarily severed, some of the elderly and frail in the current generation will indeed be harmed, but in this way, we will keep future generations safe. Otherwise, if we preserve this generation, it might be Great Wan’s last!”

“Shixiong, that’s your interpretation.”

Xi Ping forced down his seething internal energy and met Wen Fei's eyes from a distance.

Seeing that he had the situation under control, Wen Fei hadn't stepped in. He had blended in with the crowd of peak masters, pretending to be on their side. Whenever anyone spoke, he would nod enigmatically.

Now, Wen Fei silently squeezed the reincarnation wood in his sleeve. "Why are these people all singing in different keys?"

All the peak masters seemed to be saying the same thing, but there were subtle differences in the details and their attitudes.

Xi Ping said, "Peak Master Wen, you didn't receive this so-called 'heavenly edict'?"

Do you perhaps never do your daily lessons, hardworking senior that you are?

Wen Fei somehow understood his implication and waved his fan rapidly. He thought, You're the sword god's disciple, and you only know two moves. You're always running around copying others' powers like an evil cultivator. How can you have the face to scold others?

“No,” said Lin Chi, also putting in a word through his reincarnation wood amulet, “having your spiritual sense ‘pricked’ is very painful. You would feel it even if you weren’t meditating.”

So Xi Ping silently asked Lin Chi, “Did the ‘heavenly edict’ issue some kind of riddle that can be interpreted any way you like?”

“Not at all,” said Lin Chi hesitantly. “In my opinion, it only told the facts. The Lis seem to have been bewitched.”

No...it wasn’t that the Lis had been bewitched. Xi Ping’s eyes flashed faintly. A guess appeared in his mind: if it was only a matter of different interpretations, they wouldn’t have been so certain from the get-go. It was likely that the “heavenly edicts” they had seen had had different contents.

Why?

Didn’t everyone have the same heavens above their heads?

Xi Ping had traveled extensively through black markets everywhere. He was unusually sensitive toward subtle currents among people. Now, as soon as he swept the scene, from a few words spoken by the Xuanyin peak masters among whom internal strife was conventional, he was able to faintly distinguish the camps—those with the same surname or belonging to the same faction weren't necessarily together, and those with different surnames certainly weren't together. Wen Fei, the "spy" mixed in among them, immediately became like a louse on a bald man's head, exceedingly obvious.

But, after all, Wen Fei was an old fox who had been general commander of Heaven's Design Pavilion. Keeping his composure perfectly, he subtly shifted over a few steps, calmly moving to the fringes of the scene. "This grouping today is different from before..."

A thought struck Xi Ping; he had faintly touched something. "How is it different?"

Wen Fei said, "The big families are more fragmented than usual."

The Zhaos were confined, their circumstances unknown. The Lis were all fairly worked up. But the Lin and Zhou clans, which stuck together most of the time, had ceased to cooperate. Apart from family interests, what else would separate Xuanyin's peak masters...?

In a flash, the two of them simultaneously worked it out and spoke almost in unison in the reincarnation wood.

Xi Ping said, "Are they grouped according to Ways of the Heart?"

Wen Fei said, “Ways of the Heart of common origin!”

By “Ways of the Heart of common origin,” what was meant was that—regardless of whom the Ways of the Heart had been inherited from, whether they had been passed on from a living shifu or refined from a dead person’s vital weapon—they could be traced back up to the same ancestor. In distinguished families, apart from the direct disciples accepted by the family’s masters, the clan would accumulate high-quality Ways of the Heart belonging to deceased masters to provide an alternative for talented inner sect disciples whose temperaments were truly unsuited. Therefore, not all the cultivators of a single family line had Ways of the Heart of common origin.

Why was Wen Fei the only one who hadn’t received the “heavenly edict”?

Because as a direct descendant of the Lin family, Lin Chi’s Way of the Heart had been inherited from his shifu, while Wen Fei, a feral walker in the mortal world, had fumbled around and found his own.

The difference between them was one dead shifu!

Zhang Jue had also said earlier that he hadn’t heard any “heavenly edict.” That was because, as the Southern Sage’s direct disciple, the Dignitary of Fate Elder had also fumbled around for his own Way of the Heart in ancient days.

So this so-called “heavenly edict” was the cultivators’ Ways of the Heart prodding their spiritual senses!

Xi Ping felt that since he had come to the Xuanyin Mountains today, his goosebumps hadn’t subsided—what the hell were these Ways of the Heart that all these immortals had on their spirits, tied to their very lives?

Meanwhile, Zhou Ying, not seeing anything with the demon eyes, frowned as he pondered briefly. He got out the heart demon seed and tossed it right into the pile of star stones.

There was a “silent” bang in the depths of the Sea of Stars.

“Silent” meant that others didn’t hear it; the “bang” struck Zhou Ying’s ears directly. If he hadn’t first taken a pill, he probably would have been knocked unconscious.

When the heart demon seed fell into the pile of star stones, it was as if it had blown a hole. On all the star stones larger than the size of a fist, countless human faces flashed. The larger the stone, the more faces there were.

The faces on the same stone, regardless of whether they were male or female, whether their countenances were youthful or showed signs of age, no matter how vast the difference in the outlines of their features, were all extremely similar...as if the same ghost had put on different skins. In unison, they were pouring their “ways” into Zhou Ying’s ears.

The larger the star stone, the louder the voices.

This was like simultaneously “debating” with thousands upon thousands of people. Had it not been a cultivator of the way of clarity standing there, the debate would have reduced his Way of the Heart to smithereens.

But not for nothing was the “way of clarity” the legendary origin of the three thousand paths of the Great Way. Zhou Ying stood his ground, treating it like the croaking of frogs.

As these star stones squabbled, they hurriedly rolled away on their own, avoiding the heart demon seed. The thick layer of stones was broken up by the demon seed, revealing the smooth, mirror-like surface of the ground below; it was dozens of li in area.

The demon eyes fell onto that “mirror” and saw an enormous human figure appear on it, as crystal-clear as a living person. His eyes opened, and his gaze shot at Zhou Ying like lightning. Tears of blood immediately fell from Zhou Ying's eyes.

This turned out to be an unimaginably large star stone, growing in the Xuanyin Mountains like a tumor.

Zhou Ying didn't avert his gaze. He kept his eyes fixed on the human figure in the "mirror." He recognized this as the Dignitary of Code Li Fengshan.

As one of the Xuanyin Mountains' four elders, his picture sometimes appeared in the ancient texts. Because he had betrayed the spiritual mountains, he had been sealed by the other three elders working together into "seclusion to death." When the demon eyes had swept over all the Xuanyin Mountains, they had even been able to see Zhi Xiu, but they hadn't seen Li Fengshan. It was said that he had already shown signs of nearing the end of his lifespan over forty years ago. Reckoning it, he must just have given out in recent years.

When their Way of the Heart shattered, a person would die immediately. But if a person died for a different reason, the Way of the Heart would remain.

For Xuanyin's orthodox cultivators, the essence they took from the immortal mountains would return to the immortal mountains after their deaths, and the Ways of the Heart they left behind would be absorbed by star stones. Ways of the Heart of common origin would converge, stick together, and grow.

Since the spiritual mountains had formed, few shed skins had died naturally of old age. The Dignitary of Rule and the Dignitary of Rites had both died from their Ways of the Heart shattering. In their lineages, the Ways of the Heart of common origin had all been left behind by disciples after they died, with ascended spirit cultivation at most.

Only the Dignitary of Code Li Fengshan had been embedded in the Xuanyin Mountains as a shed skin.

The Xuanyin Mountains' Sea of Stars, which observed fate—did it really only observe?

Or had it been controlling the puppets' Ways of the Heart to strengthen the waves all along?

Now that the Xuanyin Mountains had been ruined, the Ways of the Heart could at last hold themselves back no longer. They had lost patience with imperceptible influence and openly deployed the “heavenly edict.”

Zhou Ying wiped the bloodstains from the corners of his eyes. “A misstep.”

Meanwhile, Xi Ping's heart skipped: if it was the Ways of the Heart sending the "heavenly edict," then it wouldn't only have been the inner sect peak masters who had heard it—the Ways of the Heart of outer sect established foundations practically all came from the inner sect!

Crap.

CHAPTER 183 - Tomb of the Sage (9)

Heaven's Design Pavilion had ten branches in nine provinces. Each branch had established foundations. If it really was as Xi Ping guessed, the fact that the Xuanyin Mountains were soon to bite the dust would have spread throughout Great Wan's nine provinces by now.

He was trapped in the Xuanyin Mountains, and his shifu had gone to the Land of Turmoil!

If Xi Ping had at first been afraid that Zhou Ying would get dragged into this and hoped that he had already escaped from the Xuanyin Mountains, now he simply wanted to burn incense and pray to the heavens to let san-ge have left in time so he could get word out.

But just then, out of the corner of his eye, Xi Ping glimpsed the Dignitary of Fate suddenly turn his head toward the Sea of Stars. Leaving the endlessly arguing peaks masters and the "great evil cultivator" behind on Moon Plated Peak, he turned tail and ran.

In the Sea of Stars, Zhou Ying knew that he had made too much noise pushing aside the star stones. He had been discovered.

He didn't panic; he was only surprised that a person who had grown up listening to the voices of demons in the Impassable Sea could still be so ignorant. Since entering the way of clarity, every little new discovery had overturned everything he knew; every step had to be reconsidered.

The master of the Sea of Stars was about to return. Zhou Ying stood where he was, unmoving, upending all his previous suppositions, rapidly drawing conclusions about the current circumstances.

Then he took a nearly forgotten piece of reincarnation wood from his mustard seed and contacted Xi Ping: "Hold off Zhang Jue for me."

When his voice struck Xi Ping's ears without warning, Xi Ping nearly fell into a stupor. Only then did he realize what Zhou Ying had said: this "master" whose cultivation wasn't very high, after getting a preview of some of the designs of heaven, had not only not left this dangerous place, he had instead dashed straight toward the forbidden territory of the Sea of Stars!

Xi Ping had gone numb, and he suspected that his own true identity was the father of the heavens—apart from an unfilial son, what in the world could contradict all his wishes like this?

Before, san-ge had been all "Don't you dare" and "You need a leash" at every turn, can't do this and can't do that either, as if he were a troublesome walking disaster. Yet after entering the way of clarity, the first words he said to him were, “Hold off Zhang Jue for me.”

Xi Ping didn’t know whether he ought to cry or laugh... It turned out that san-ge’s appraisal of his abilities was so high.

And Zhang Jue had already reached the Sea of Stars, as if he had appeared there out of thin air.

Zhou Ying immediately wiped away all his thoughts and changed into mist, becoming one with the “fates” swirling all around.

Zhang Jue knew without thinking that it was him. Apart from Zhou Ying, the Xuanyin Mountains hadn’t produced anyone else with such a bizarre power. But Zhou Ying had entered the way of clarity; why would he suddenly trespass into the Sea of Stars? What had gone wrong with Duanrui’s Way of the Heart?

Reasonably speaking, however mysterious the power of an early stage established foundation, it still wouldn’t be able to deceive the eyes and ears of a shed skin. Zhang Jue only needed to extend his consciousness and pick through those “stars” to turn up that Zhou brat at once.

But that would mean breaking the rules, violating his oath.

Zhou Ying was above him, watching him, neither anxious nor self-satisfied, his clarity unstained. He seemed to be interrogating him: Today it seems that “there is a reason for everything.” If you break the rule and open your eyes, you will be able to examine everything in detail. Everything will have its reason. A “rule” is like a line drawn in the sand. Once you step over it, it becomes meaningless. High elder, a thousand years of cultivation—what will you do?

The two of them reached a temporary deadlock.

This brief pause was already plenty of time for Xi Ping on Moon Plated Peak to come up with a countermeasure.

“Peak Master Wen, help me out,” he said to Wen Fei through the reincarnation wood. “Say something aloud for me!”

After Wen Fei had heard out his request, he was strangely silent for a moment. “How many graves did Zhi Jingzhai have to dig up behind our backs to end up with you?”

Then all the ascended spirits saw Wen Fei, who had seemed nonexistent, suddenly flash his fan and fan large writing into the air as though setting off fireworks: Stop arguing. A matter of such importance must naturally be settled by the Sea of Stars. Don’t you see that the elder has gone? Hurry up and follow!

Having said this, “setting an example,” he flew toward the Sea of Stars.

The peaks masters who had all been talking at once in a huddle finally noticed that the Dignitary of Fate Elder, who had been hanging in midair, was gone. Xi Ping took the opportunity to add a bewildering tactic and went after Wen Fei.

Even an ascended spirit peak master could not go into the Sea of Stars without being summoned, and Wen Fei’s wave of the fan had made all of them think they had missed the Dignitary of Fate’s summons. Seeing that even the evil cultivator Xi Ping had run off, what more was there to hesitate over? Therefore, they went in pursuit like a swarm of bees.

The Dignitary of Fate rarely called people down into the Sea of Stars. If he absolutely had to call them, he would make preparations ahead of time. First he would lay down an array to stabilize the Sea of Stars, to keep the disciples from getting tangled up in “destiny” connected to them.

But everything was happening too quickly now. He didn’t have time for any preparations.

While the Dignitary of Fate Elder was facing the difficult interrogation Zhou Ying had put before him, the two co-conspirators Xi Ping and Wen Fei, yanking and prodding, herded the masters of the thirty-six peaks into the Sea of Stars like mindless oxen.

The ascended spirits made much bigger “ripples” descending into the Sea of Stars than Zhou Ying. Each ascended spirit was a “colossus.” They had lived for centuries or even a millennium, had countless disciples under them whether direct or of record, and could be tied back to the fortunes of their families. These big families held either resources or some form of power. With a single cough, one of them could change the fates of countless ordinary people—it could be said that these people were the fate of the whole nation of Great Wan.

By the time the peak masters came to their senses, it was already too late. As soon as they touched the edges of the Sea of Stars, all the countless ties linked to them came to surround them, “swallowing” these completely unguarded people. When a person falls into a tangled skein, the more they struggle, the deeper they’ll be ensnared. These stars brought with them a windstorm; they collided with each other frantically. Even if you didn’t struggle, you would still be pulled in. The whole Sea of Stars turned as chaotic as a pot of porridge, with star stones rolling everywhere.

Someone thought that this still wasn’t enough. The music of the Tai Sui Qin soon sounded, playing a confounding tune learned from some evil cultivator. Hearing the music, the peak masters and the Sea of Stars, already turned upside down, nearly went to pieces.

Zhang Jue had no more attention to spare for Zhou Ying. He hurried off to settle the turbulent Sea of Stars.

At the same time, Xi Ping landed.

Before jumping down, Wen Fei had furtively given him a dose of “return to unity powder.” If this wasn’t the by-product of some failed elixir, then it had been made by this malicious stutterer with the intention of harming people. After taking it, all your senses would be firmly sealed, turning you into a block of stone. Never mind the stars filling the sky, if someone came up and stabbed you to death, you’d have no idea how you had died.

“That’s not true,” Wen Fei corrected him, speaking through the reincarnation wood directly to his consciousness. “When you’re about to die, your spiritual sense will let you know.”

Xi Ping said, “...That’s nice of it.”

Lin Chi put in a word: “Have you left your vital qin outside? What will you do now?”

“I don’t have my vital qin on me. That qin was a copy. It’ll lure Old Man Zhang away,” Xi Ping said. “San-ge, look and see how far the three of us are from dying. Are there any missing arms or legs?”

Wen Fei said, “Who are you talking to?”

No sooner had he spoken than he heard Zhou Ying’s voice in the reincarnation wood: “Zhang Jue alone will not be able to suppress the storm raised by all the peak masters. He’s too busy to attend to anything else. You three are already at the bottom of the Sea of Stars. You’re relatively safe at present.”

Wen Fei: “...”

These two evil brats really were related!

“Your Highness Prince Zhuang,” said Lin Chi, “what are you doing at the bottom of the Sea of Stars?”

Zhou Ying answered unhurriedly amid the windstorm: “Investigating the origin of the ‘heavenly edict’ you received.”

“What is it?”

“You must have guessed most of it,” said Zhou Ying.

Lin Chi paled. Wen Fei and Xi Ping simultaneously opened their mouths, then simultaneously closed them—to begin with, they had been able to say the terms “Ways of the Heart” and “Ways of the Heart of common origin” as they liked; but now that they had a definite answer, it was as if something had placed a silencing talisman on them. They couldn’t say a word.

Lin Chi was anxious. He thought, Fortunately I have the Unbound Furnace to keep me aware.

Wen Fei thought, So inheriting a Way of the Heart comes with this kind of danger.

Xi Ping took a glance inward at his own spirit. What the hell was a Way of the Heart?

Zhou Ying looked on, not speaking—he couldn’t say anything, and even if he could, no one would have believed him.

These three were already uncommonly clear-headed. They could transcend the prison holding the vast majority of people on earth. Yet this close to the truth, they were still limited by their hearts and only saw the danger others were in.

“My cultivation is low,” Zhou Ying said. “Please lend me a hand. Do not let the ‘ghosts’ here haunt the human world.”

Wen Fei immediately asked, “So what do we do about the information that has already reached Heaven’s Design Pavilion?”

“I figure Lao Pang also can’t hear the ‘heavenly edict,’ but there were many others with him at the time.” Xi Ping spoke in a very optimistic tone to keep up morale. “These people know the inside story. When they hear the ‘heavenly edict,’ they’ll probably realize that something’s not right. Telling Lao Pang will amount to the same thing as telling my shifu. I’ve thought about it carefully, and I don’t think it should be a big problem. He’s much more reliable than we are. Don’t worry.”

The walkers in the mortal world who had buried Jinghua Village had by now returned to Jinping.

The Kaiming Department could repair the residences of mortals, but they couldn’t repair the Azure Dragon Towers. The former locations of the seven towers were empty.

The Azure Dragon Towers had existed for the purpose of stabilizing the Dragon Vein. They would no longer be needed. All Pang Jian could do was cancel the routine night shift and send his disoriented subordinates back to the head office to rest. At night, a number of established foundations woke with a start from meditation one after another; those who hadn't been meditating also felt their spiritual senses quake. Each person's first reaction was to charge out to find General Commander Pang. As soon as they went out, they bumped into their colleagues, then ran into Pang Jian, who had just returned from Guangyun Palace.

Pang Jian had escorted the remains of the fourth prince Zhou Xi back to the palace. Over a decade ago, he had personally taken this young man to the Latent Cultivation Temple; now he had personally sent him off.

In the enormous Guangyun Palace, his insane father was dead and gone, and his anxious older brother was so frightened he had no attention to spare to lament. He had only gone through the motions of mourning, then pulled Pang Jian aside and repeatedly asked him to confirm Guangyun Palace's safety. Only his white-haired old mother was so overwhelmed with grief for him that she wished she were dead. How would she wear away her twilight years?

He had been a prince born to the imperial consort of the Lin clan in Great Wan's Jinping. Among his contemporaries, no one had managed a better reincarnation than Zhou Xi; he might have been called the favorite of the heavens. Yet even he had noiselessly died young on the boundless immortal path like this... What would become of all other living creatures?

Pang Jian had walked in the mortal world for over a hundred years. Though he had seen his fill of life and death, his heart was still heavy. He failed to notice his colleagues' unease—the streets were full of uneasy Kaiming Cultivators; with one of General Zhi's accompanying plants growing in the courtyard of the Kaiming Department's headquarters, many people walked with unnatural stiffness going in and out.

A number of established foundations were about to speak at once, but when their gazes met in midair, they all fell silent without prearrangement. Each with a different expression, they waited for someone else to speak.

“Why are you all hanging around outside in the middle of the night? Can't calm down to meditate?” Pang Jian said without so much as looking up.

“Daily lessons are also rest. When you encounter a major event, it's much easier than closing your eyes and forcing yourself to sleep. You could say it's the greatest benefit of cultivation. Be content with your lot, everyone.”

Someone tentatively said, “General commander...are there any instructions?”

Pang Jian thought that he meant instructions from the palace and the court. He thought, Instructions my ass, they're practically hugging my leg and begging for milk over there. Zhou Ying must be the one who's adopted.

He didn't respond, only waved a hand somewhat wearily and returned to the general commander's residence.

Behind Pang Jian, the blue-clotheser established foundations exchanged veiled looks. Their initial panic had calmed, and they had sensed something uncommon: this generation of walkers in the mortal world had virtually all grown up listening to stories of General Zhi, but...the heavenly edict had given a warning directly to the cultivators' spiritual senses, branding Zhi Xiu as a traitor to the cultivation world.

This was the heavens above them.

Someone spoke first: "It seems that everyone above the established foundation boundary has received it."

"But General Zhi..."

"Didn't you understand General Commander Pang? Stay dumb and say nothing. Anyway, we are under pressure from a shed skin. It isn't surprising that we can't tell our fellow cultivators the truth."

Some walkers in the mortal world exchanged some ambiguous sentences. Suddenly, someone sighed quietly. “We’ve worked hard to cultivate for so many years, given up so much...”

The blue-clothesers followed this person’s gaze to look at Wang Run—the walker in the mortal world who had just laid his wife and children to rest in Jinghua Village.

“Who would willingly accept that the immortal path has been severed?”

Just then, some established foundations who hadn’t been down in the Territory Map came rushing outside, heading toward Jinping City.

“Are they...acting without approval?”

“On the surface, General Commander Pang has always been a staunch supporter of Flying Jade Peak...”

Meanwhile, Xi Yue, who had received orders to watch the house, was exchanging a blank look with the little kitten—he already had the array needed for a half-puppet to establish a foundation prepared. He only needed Xi Ping to guide him. He could accomplish the rest himself.

But that person was like this every time. From the Latent Cultivation Temple to the Resurrection Vortex, he would always toss him aside at the critical moment. All his years of pursuit and questing seemed to have been meaningless. He would always be like the kitten, only fit to be a little toy whose company could relieve boredom.

He had become a cultivator because of Xi Ping. It was ironic that after all these years, only in the Kaiming Department and Heaven's Design Pavilion did he have the feeling of being useful.

Just then, Xi Yue received a summons from a colleague, notifying him to go out on patrol.

Patrols and standing duty at the towers were Heaven's Design Pavilion's routine business. The losses among the cultivators had yet to be counted, but they must have been grievous. It was only to be expected that they would be shorthanded. Xi Yue restrained his emotions and didn't overthink it; he quickly put away his reincarnation wood, changed into his blue robe, and went to report to the general office.

As soon as he left Dangui Lane, he saw a number of colleagues coming toward him. Xi Yue went over, entirely unguarded. "How are we splitting the areas?"

“You’re going to the Lingyang...let me take a look.” One of his colleagues seemed not to remember clearly. He took out a roll of paper and went through it.

Xi Yue reached out a hand to take it. “Give it to me...ugh!”

Under cover of the roll of paper, his colleague had attacked him without warning.

A spirit-severing awl stabbed directly into the array core just below Xi Yue’s navel—this was the critical point of his arrays, know only to those closest to him; every half-puppet’s was different. Had they not faced mortal danger together, a person certainly wouldn’t know this vital secret.

Xi Yue’s pupils contracted. His half-puppet body couldn’t move.

At the same time, another person formed a search talisman and aimed it at Xi Yue.

Xi Yue’s mustard seed, the reincarnation wood amulet, and the seeds in his pocket all fell out. The established foundation blue-clothesers burned the amulet and the seeds to ashes, simultaneously sealing Xi Yue’s mouth.

A blue-clotheser met his appalled gaze and unconsciously looked away. He softly said, "Forgive me. The heavenly edict has been issued, we cannot disobey. Xi-xiong..."

"Don't waste words. Someone might be listening. This kind of thing cannot get out." Another blue-clotheser stepped forward and, seeming very friendly, hooked an arm around Xi Yue's shoulders and half-pushed, half-pulled him away. He whispered to Xi Yue, "You're only a half-immortal, and you're only an adopted son. This doesn't have anything to do with. Even if the immortal mountains hold you accountable after the fact, we'll do our best to protect you."

A half-puppet's body was abnormal. Xi Yue's field of vision was far wider than an ordinary person's. Out of the corner of his eye, he saw some blue-clothesers heading toward the Yongning Marquis Manor. His eyes nearly burst from their sockets.

For "important locations" like Dangui Lane and Guangyun Palace, though the majority of the repair work had been done by the Kaiming Department, there had been walkers in the mortal world taking part.

Heaven's Design Pavilion knew that the Marquis Manor hadn't yet had time to put down a new array.

Xi Yue struggled against the talisman, forcing breath out of his throat:
“Aren’t you...scared of...General Zhi...and...”

“We are scared. We’ve heard that people with accompanying plants can use them to instantly cross vast distances. We would all be dead at the least touch. The waters of the Yongning Marquis Manor are very deep. It could even block the great evil cultivator who invaded the city. We all saw that array and that sword aura.”

“Then how can...you...dare...”

The gaze of the blue-clothed walker in the mortal world was extremely upright and honorable. He looked straight into Xi Yue’s eyes. “When the Territory Map fell, we did not receive the heavenly edict immediately. It is clear to see how powerful a shed skin evil cultivator is—he can even hoodwink heaven and earth. Since the heavenly edict could now be issued, it shows that now is the best opportunity. A rapid response is our vocation—little friend, don’t you remember? We walk in the mortal world, uphold the will of heaven above, protect the common people below, do not cravenly cling to life, do not fear death.”

Xi Yue remembered that the reason he had stayed in Heaven’s Design Pavilion with Pang Jian at the very beginning was because of the drive that had been passed down through Heaven's Design Pavilion for a thousand years.

“This is our way. Even if we should be killed by those of the evil way, even if our enemy is the person we looked up to in our youth...” That blue-clotheser said. “Heaven helps Great Wan. Do not worry, we will not carelessly harm mortal lives.”

There were people who had spent a century protecting this city day in and day, risking their lives, upholding the morality they believed in.

Xi Yue felt that it was extremely absurd.

CHAPTER 184 - Tomb of the Sage (10)

A rattling suddenly came from the half-puppet's body, like the gears of a marionette's joints stuck in the wrong position. Xi Yue began to "twist." A talisman raised sparks on his colleague.

That established foundation blue-clotheser gave a groan of pain as he was pushed several zhang away. A corner of his protective armor even broke. The mustard seed he had confiscated from Xi Yue also flew back into its owner's hand. The blue-clotheser raised his head in mingled surprise and fright. He saw that Xi Yue had yanked the spirit-severing awl from his body. There was a small silver knife clamped in his hand, still dripping blood.

"You're crazy!"

The spirit-severing awl only temporarily cut off the array that moved spiritual energy through a half-puppet's body. It had been stuck into the "puppet" part of his body. Apart from being unable to move, Xi Yue wouldn't be harmed in any other way, and it didn't hurt. It would only have to be removed afterward for him to recover.

But just now, he had used a downgraded immortal tool that had come out of nowhere to slit open his own core array. The clothes around his torso were shredded by the spiritual energy gushing out. Thread after thread of racing, out-of-control spiritual light flickered over Xi Yue's face. The delicate features that had been repaired after he had opened his spiritual eyes began to twist.

A half-puppet's ability to move relied entirely on their core array. This was his second heart. Now that it had been blown up like this with spiritual energy, there would be no way to repair it. When the remaining spiritual energy in his body had been consumed, he would...

"I said we wouldn't harm mortal lives, what are you doing?!"

Xi Yue was accustomed to being mute. When it came to the crux, he would forget to speak. He responded mentally: He told me to watch the house.

He summoned back his mustard seed and took out a piece of reincarnation wood hidden inside it.

The established foundation blue-clotheser was horrified. He threw himself forward to snatch it. The amulet was thrown far away.

Xi Yue had only had time to send word and hadn't yet heard a response. His black irises, larger than normal, became clouded by a layer of deathliness, but his eyes were still fixed unwaveringly on that amulet, his blood-covered hand laboriously reaching out.

The blue-clotheser smashed the amulet with a flick of the fingers, but when he turned his head, his eyes were red.

“Xi Yue! Xi Yue!”

Fruitlessly, the blue-clotheser turned up a handful of white spirits and tried shoving them into Xi Yue’s mouth and wound. “Eat these...hurry up...then you can get up and repair yourself, I...if it’s no good I’ll take you to the general commander...”

Xi Yue ignored him. Whether spasming or struggling, he slipped from his one-time colleague’s arms.

“Xi Yue! Have you been bewildered by evil, lost your mind?”

In this city, on this path, sorrow and hatred fed each other. Every person, on beholding another person holding fast, would think that they had lost their mind.

And Xi Ping was still trapped at the bottom of the Sea of Stars.

Zhou Ying saw the misty stars gather around to collide with him and frowned slightly. Xi Ping had taken the return to unity powder. He wouldn’t have felt it even if he had been knocked flat on his back. But his heart skipped out of nowhere. Immediately, he quietly asked Zhou Ying, “What’s wrong?”

Before Zhou Ying could answer, Lin Chi suddenly frowned and brandished the Unbound Furnace.

The special “seventh sense” of the way of toolmaking connected a person’s consciousness to a toolmaking furnace in order to reflect themselves. Lin Chi kindled the Unbound Furnace, and his expression finally eased.

“Master Lin?” said Xi Ping.

“S-sorry.” Lin Chi panted for breath. “The urge to kill just surged up in my mind out of nowhere...”

Both Xi Ping and Wen Fei were astonished—Master Lin, a well-behaved person who had locked himself up on a mountain for eight centuries, who would use a suppression talisman in the direst of circumstances, could actually feel such a thing as an “urge to kill.”

“Although...” said Wen Fei, “I would like to ask if I might, Lin-shixiong, how were you planning on killing us?”

“Don’t joke,” Lin Chi said feebly. “It was a feeling like the most important thing I had in the world was about to be destroyed. The impulse was almost impossible to restrain...”

Fortunately, at the moment of imminent peril, he had remembered that his “most important thing in the world” was already gone.

“Damn it,” said Xi Ping.

The walking corpse Ways of the Heart at the bottom of the Sea of Stars didn’t care whether they were bringing chaos to Great Wan for the sake of their own survival. One after another, they were sending “heavenly edicts” to juniors bearing Ways of the Heart of common origin. Now that they knew they had been exposed, what would happen?

If even Lin Chi could be affected...

In Jinping, the established foundation blue-clotheser who had already picked up Xi Yue and resolved to go find Pang Jian stopped in his tracks.

In all the branches of Heaven’s Design Pavilion, a thought appeared in the minds of all the elite established foundations, as if they had been possessed: If you sever the veins of the earth, won’t the Xuanyin Mountains’ immortal energy be kept from dispersing? Just like Southern He before. The southern mines have yet to be hollowed out after two hundred years. The spiritual energy there is as dense as in the Lancang Mountains of the past.

At the same time, the ascended spirit peak masters entangled in stars in the Sea of Stars stopped struggling simultaneously. As if they had all suddenly made breakthroughs in the way of clarity and no longer cared about anything, their consciousnesses turned with full concentration onto Xi Ping and the others hiding at the bottom of the Sea of Stars.

In that moment, each peak master's mind was crammed full of one thought:
These scoundrels want to destroy my foundations.

Even the Latent Cultivation Temple was in chaos.

Su Zhun and all the stewards were only outer sect half-immortals. None of them had received any edict, whether heavenly or earthly. They only watched in confusion as the established foundations went from restless and uneasy to increasingly obsessed.

“The mountains are sealed—the mountains are sealed—the Xuanyin Mountains have been sealed, everyone please remain calm—” A crowd of straw children walked everywhere with amplifying talismans stuck to them, spreading a steward's voice all over, but no one listened to him.

“Elder Su, the Talent Cultivation Temple is the boundary between mortal and immortal. Isn’t there any way to contact the outside world?”

“The Xuanyin Mountains have been sealed, and the Latent Cultivation Temple is also within the scope of the great mountain array,” Su Zhun said falteringly. “Don’t you think I’m frantic? Don’t you think I want to contact the outside world...?”

“This is urgent, Elder Su, a matter of life and death. We must leave the mountains at once, return to Heaven’s Design Pavilion, and think of a way to sever all the veins of the earth!”

Su Zhun’s expression was unwavering, but inwardly he gasped, exchanging a look of surprise and bewilderment with his subordinate half-immortal steward Yang Anli. He thought, Have you all gone crazy?

There were still young disciples who hadn’t yet opened their spiritual eyes in the temple. Su Zhun shot Yang Anli a veiled look. Yang Anli took his meaning at once and loudly said, “Mortals sometimes mistakenly wander into the Latent Cultivation Temple at the boundary of the great mountain array. Perhaps there is an exit. Let me take you there to look!”

When he said “come with me,” a crowd of Heaven’s Design Pavilion established foundations who had come to advance their cultivation hurried to follow. He led them far away from the residences of the mortal disciples.

Su Zhun breathed out heavily, then turned straight back to Chengjing Hall. But as soon as he opened the door, he saw that an “uninvited guest” had appeared in Chengjing Hall—Luo Qingshi, holding a teacup with both hands, sat in a chair with his feet dangling.

A pair of narrow, upturned eyes looked at Su Zhun through the enshrouding steam.

Su Zhun’s heart gave a jump. Yes—the Latent Cultivation Temple also had a resident established foundation!

Then came the flash of a talisman. Luo Qingshi had already placed talismans against eavesdropping on all sides. In a drawling voice, he said, “Elder Su, how dishonest.”

Su Zhun forced a smile. “What are you talking about? Luo-shixiong...”

“The Latent Cultivation Temple falls within the purview of the great mountain array, but we aren’t unable to contact the outside world when the Xuanyin Mountains are sealed—these quacking ducks from the outer sects weren’t here before. The only ones who came were mortal idiots who hadn’t opened their spiritual eyes. Though the temple has a formal order forbidding the disciples from contacting the outside world during the cultivation period, out of fear that these kids who haven't yet cut their ties to the mortal world, not making it in time to attend a family wedding or funeral, would take it too hard and hang themselves, we leave them a passageway. As a last resort, we can break the rules and allow a mortal to return to the human world by that way." Luo Qingshi's voice was kept very low. "There's no way? That's only enough to fool outsiders."

Su Zhun's expression didn't change, but his heart sank. "Ah, I overlooked that in my haste..."

"Don't be hasty, take a break," Luo Qingshi interrupted him and extended a hand. "Give me the inscription key to the secret passageway."

The star stones concealed at the bottom of the Sea of Stars were faced with imminent danger, so they resisted with all they had.

Wen Fei and Lin Chi simultaneously struck in the direction Zhou Ying indicated, but an invisible hard shell seemed to have coated the outsides of these star stones. Leaving Lin Chi aside for the moment, even Wen Fei's full strength attack bounced off.

At the same time, the largest star stone, like a leech, began burrowing into the ground. The small star stones plastered themselves tightly to it. The star stones that had originally somewhat repelled each other were sticking together.

Zhang Jue sensed that something was wrong. The Dignitary of Fate Elder seemed to be being pulled by three forces at once: he himself understood that these ascended spirit peak masters who had accidentally gotten trapped in the Sea of Stars couldn't all have fought free so easily, and there had to be some strangeness to this; at the same time, dimly, the part of him that belonged to the spiritual mountains was also split in two; there seemed to be a weak voice in the depths of the mountains that persisted in saying that the spiritual mountains held the common people above all, even if that meant withering away themselves. But there was a more intense emotion shaking his mind like the tolling of a bell, ordering him to quell rebellion and punish evildoers.

In that moment, a fierce impulse surged up in his heart. He wanted to tear off his blindfold and look into the depths of the Sea of Stars and the spiritual mountains.

During the Dignitary of Fate's brief pause, the peak masters had already escaped the shackles of the Sea of Stars and were heading toward Xi Ping and the others.

Xi Ping used the Discard the False and Keep the True book to copy the rain of swords one of the Li peak masters had used earlier and tossed it out blindly—having taken the return to unity powder had now become a disadvantage.

Lin Chi quickly followed suit, tossing out an immortal tool like an oilpaper umbrella. That umbrella flew up into the air and grew in size a hundredfold. Its ribs turned out to be made of the newest spirit-conducting gold. They automatically absorbed the spiritual mountains' spiritual energy to turn into a protective screen, instantly shielding all of them.

Lin Chi said, "Your Highness, what can we do?"

Wen Fei was dumbfounded. "My goodness, what kind of thing sure to throw everything under the heavens into an uproar has Moon Plated Peak made now?!"

Xi Ping decisively turned over his palm. The Eternal Flame flew into the Unbound Furnace like a shooting star.

The Unbound Furnace had refined Xiuluo and Zhaoting; it had cooked Sanyue's shed skin sect leader—Xiuluo had been incomplete, keeping Xiang Zhao from inheriting the Way of the Heart in the divine sword; Zhaoting had fallen a step behind, unable to keep up with the too long stride of its master's Way of the Heart; Sanyue's sect leader had had a wild notion and wanted to refine his own Way of the Heart into the form of the Black Emperor's... In sum, during Hui Xiangjun's life and after her death, her Unbound Furnace seemed always to have had some unspeakable connection to Ways of the Heart. Maybe it would be able to refine these rotten impervious stones.

“If we let them get away, never mind us, they'll kill all of Great Wan. Dig them up and burn them!”

Lin Chi had yet to develop other varieties of spirit-conducting gold. Currently, it could only conduct spiritual energy; it wasn't indestructible. The peak masters' powers, fit to topple mountains and raise seas, were smashing against the umbrella's canopy. The umbrella's ribs were about to warp, and the canopy was also hanging on by a thread.

Guided by Zhou Ying's eyes and ears, the three great ascended spirits pooled their strength to pry up the largest star stone.

Wen Fei couldn't feel anything else, but he felt that his essence had nearly been drained dry. “How can it be...so heavy!”

“An ascended spirit's spiritual bones weigh several hundred jin, so how heavy would a shed skin's Way of the Heart be?” Lin Chi had after all been cultivating the longest. He might not be able to fight, but his essence was more abundant than the other two's. "As heavy as a mountain?"

"Why is the spiritual energy in the Sea of Stars so sparse?" said Xi Ping. "I can't catch my breath."

"The spirit-conducting gold has split off the flow of spiritual energy." Zhou Ying was directing the three ascended spirits in their manual labor and acting as eyes and ears from the sidelines, participating only by speaking. No matter how dangerous the situation became, it didn't affect him. As he spoke, he was methodically drawing an array around the three ascended spirits who couldn't see. "Wait a moment."

Wen Fei had known countless people, but he had never met an established foundation with such an "original approach." Hearing that "wait a moment," he instantly had an ominous premonition. "What are you doing now? Don't..."

Before he could finish, Zhang Jue landed.

In the end, the Dignitary of Fate hadn't torn the blindfold off his face. He had chosen to obey the will of the spiritual mountains.

As soon as a shed skin arrived, the big umbrella full of holes couldn't hold out any longer. It broke instantly. Zhou Ying chose his time precisely. He set down the final stroke of the array.

This was an unusual spirit-gathering array. Within the array was embedded an inscription that had never been seen in the land of the living—it came from the demon host's altar in the Impassable Sea.

The whole Xuanyin Mountain Range formed a resonance with the inscription in that array. The spiritual energy formed a tornado, bursting into the Sea of Stars as easily as crushing dry weeds.

This blow was truly too fierce. All the ascended spirits and Zhang Jue were knocked aside.

Xi Ping and the other two couldn't see anything, but they could feel the coursing spiritual energy trying to flip the tops of their skulls. It smashed right into their meridians.

If any one of them had taken a spirit-protecting pill and had had meridians that were just slightly more fragile, they would have been smashed to death by that blow!

Wen Fei howled. “Zhou whoever-you-are, you asshole, don’t you know that two of us are famously weak medicine and toolmaking cultivators, and the other is an ascended spirit baby who hasn’t even wiped the drool off his face?!”

Zhou Ying was very calm: Lin Chi was an eight-century-old great ascended spirit whose cultivation was much higher than it appeared; Wen Fei had spent a hundred years in Heaven’s Design Pavilion, and later, for the sake of revenge, had gone into countless dangerous hidden realms, surviving on a knife’s edge; Xi Ping went without saying—he had the undying bones. When he had become an ascended spirit, a heavenly tribulation doing its level best to kill him hadn’t managed it. This was nothing.

Xi Ping had the sensation that every bit of his meridians had broken, but torment to his flesh and bones could alleviate his emotions.

Anger briefly overwhelmed the pain of separation. “Zhou Ying, just you wait!”

“Sure,” said Zhou Ying. “The fire.”

This time, for the Sea of Stars, it was no longer its flesh being gouged; it was an amputation. Each and every star seemed to be screaming in pain. That huge star stone had been “dug” right out.

At Xi Ping's thought, the Unbound Furnace, which was only the height of a person, suddenly seemed to take on the vastness of the universe. It drew that enormous star stone right in.

The countless little star stones of varying size followed soon after.

Xi Ping, who had put reincarnation wood into the Unbound Furnace ahead of time, and Lin Chi, who was a toolmaking cultivator, simultaneously stuck their consciousnesses in.

As soon as the star stones entered, Xi Ping and Lin Chi were simultaneously shocked: the human faces that Zhou Ying had forced out with the heart demon seed, which could only be perceived by a paramount spiritual sense looking through the demon eyes, now emerged with perfect clarity in the fire.

Without so much as thinking about it, Xi Ping's first reaction was to push Lin Chi's consciousness out while he was off his guard—he had remembered Lin Zongyi, whose Way of the Heart had been shattered in the Territory Map.

The Ways of the Heart of all the deceased masters of the Xuanyin Mountains seemed to be here, which naturally included Lin Chi's shifu. Xi

Ping had a peculiar intuition that if he let Lin Chi come face to face with his shifu, the master of Moon Plated Peak would be no more!

As soon as these Ways of the Heart fell into the true fire of the Unbound Furnace, they were like wax that had fallen into an ironworks. It was even hard to catch a glimpse of any of the faces... Then he saw that at the edges of the Eternal Flame that was dissolving the star stones, there was a blurry light, extending boundlessly, seeming to connect to some place.

This seemed to be something he wasn't supposed to see. Xi Ping only took one glance, and his consciousness stung as though it had been pricked like a pincushion.

All of a sudden, his point of view became very peculiar—it was as if he were standing in front of a reincarnation wood tree, and the reincarnation wood tree had a sliver of his consciousness in it, through which he was looking out at himself.

As if looking into a mirror, he saw “himself” right in front of him.

Amid the Eternal Flame, that countenance that couldn't have been more familiar became slightly translucent. Beneath the flesh, the skeleton was faintly visible.

Because of Zhou Ying's rude drawing of spiritual energy just now, Xi Ping's whole body hurt like hell, and the anger on his face had yet to vanish...but his faintly visible bones were smiling.

How could bones...smile?

CHAPTER 185 - Tomb of the Sage (11)

Xi Ping's eyes were momentarily dazzled by the firelight. When he looked again, the skeleton's jaws had returned to a normal arc. Through the flesh, they were peacefully looking back at Xi Ping himself. They seemed to be saying, This is how your bones look. Don't be paranoid.

But Xi Ping was chilled to the marrow. He hadn't jumped into the Unbound Furnace himself. It was only his consciousness that had gone in.

A consciousness was formless. Only in certain places, like the Unbound Furnace and the inside of the Law Breaker, would it give itself a concrete form for ease of communication—it was like a projection.

Since it was a projection, why would it have a complete skeleton?

With a thought, Xi Ping dispersed the human form projected by his consciousness. The human figure vanished, but the skeleton lagged half a step behind, laid bare. Then it caught up and tried to run off as well.

All of Xi Ping's hair stood on end like flagpoles. "Stop!"

The raging Eternal Flame inside the Unbound Furnace surrounded that skeleton, just like when it had swallowed the star stones. At the same time,

Xi Ping understood how Lin Chi had felt earlier—reasonably, he wanted to burn the skeleton, but his spiritual sense was shouting its lungs out in defiance and warning, telling him to run away, as if lightning heavier than that of the ascended spirit heavenly tribulation was about to fall upon his head.

Xi Ping braced himself and ignored it. He thought, Trying to pick up their tricks to fool your own dad...

Before this thought could flit through his mind, the pain of being burned by raging fire engulfed his whole body. Xi Ping's vision went black. The Eternal Flame inside the furnace nearly went out from having no one to maintain it.

Zhou Ying's calm voice came to his ears: "First burn the star stones. There will be plenty of time later for self-immolation."

Self-immolation...

Hearing his choice of words, Xi Ping's heart jumped. Then he stood there watching as that skeleton patted sparks off itself in an attitude that couldn't have been more familiar. The skeleton's teeth chattered slightly. He heard his own voice say, "Well, who did you think I was? Of course I'm you..."

I'm you...I'm you...

When the skeleton was through “talking,” it smiled again, then disappeared before his eyes. Xi Ping’s consciousness’s field of vision returned to normal. Had the scorching pain not still been there, everything that had happened just now would have seemed like an illusion.

The Eternal Flame once again surged toward the star stones. The faces in the star stones convulsed with fear. They hurled abuse toward him.

Xi Ping turned a deaf ear to it. His numb consciousness stood by observing, but his heart was full of a Zhuoming-like instinct to pluck out his hair, carve out his flesh, pick out his bones.

When he had first joined Flying Jade Peak, shizun had asked him what he liked, and Xi Ping had responded that he liked eating, drinking, and making merry. He didn’t especially want to be immortal. In his heart, he still wanted to go home.

But now he realized with a start that it seemed he hadn’t craved the feeling of home again. He hadn’t gotten drunk. Since his true body had left the Impassable Sea, he hadn’t slept, either.

Before, when he had followed Cui Ji’s merchant caravan this way and that, it had been so he could play around wherever they went. Now he went all over to “play” so he could set up spies and plant agents. When he made a friend, he first had to consider the person’s position and decide what identity to use; he still liked “beauty,” but any natural lovely notions he might have had when he encountered a beautiful person had long been obliterated. It was as if he dimly knew that he was no longer connected to worldly desires.

Over the last decade and a half, he had changed completely. He no longer seemed human.

And the most frightening thing was that, in front of others, he would still pretend that he was flesh and blood—to cheer up shifu and Xi Yue, he had deliberately checked the Marquis Manor for new things, “ransacking” the rear courtyard had turned up a steam carriage he had no actual interest in and raced to bring it up and harp on it.

This wasn’t Xi Ping’s first time entering the Unbound Furnace. Here, through Zhuoming’s eyes, he had seen cultivators becoming less and less human the higher their cultivation became; and through Hui Xiangjun’s eyes, he had seen the absurdity and might of Ways of the Heart. He had cursed the spiritual mountains for their indifference, mocked the sages for their ignorance, had laughed at himself for the wrong road he had taken. He seemed to understand all the reasoning perfectly.

But just like everyone was always saying “the heart is a servant to circumstance,” “longing is like an ulcer on the bone,” it was all only a slightly sentimental metaphor.

Even just now, when he had discovered the “ghosts” at the bottom of the Sea of Stars, he had still celebrated that he had no Way of the Heart.

Now, he had at last seen himself: a ghost tied to the hidden bones, fooling himself and others, laboring under the mistaken belief that he still belonged to the land of the living.

“San-ge, let me ask you something. Tell me the truth.” Xi Ping struggled to keep his voice calm. Softly, he said, “Have you heard of Yuan Hui? Do you know how he died?”

“I’ve heard of him. I know.” Zhou Ying’s voice came through the buy-one-get-one reincarnation wood. In the midst of the storm, the established foundation who had turned into mist had been blown who knew where, but his voice was still very steady. “There is no need to ask me. I can’t say, and you can’t listen. But since you have asked, it means you have already understood.”

Xi Ping had in fact understood.

Those who complied with the guidance of elders and inherited a Way of the Heart would follow the path of their predecessors. Under the guidance of the star stones hidden in the shadows, they would cultivate assiduously, accumulate spiritual energy and nourish their Way of the Heart, and ultimately become a part of some star stone at the bottom of the Sea of Stars.

Those with their own obsessions, their own Ways of the Heart, would go through all manner of events and tribulations, be pruned by the spiritual mountains at every step, and finally have an “enlightenment” that would change them into a form the spiritual mountains could accept, transform them into a new star stone to sink into the Sea of Stars, coming by a different path to the same end as the first type of person.

For over a thousand years, this was how the spiritual mountains had operated.

It turned out that the spiritual mountains that had determined the form of the landscape, the national boundaries, and the climate were the remains left behind by the full moon sages. The scope covered by the spiritual mountains was the universe that a full moon sage could construct with their Way of the Heart. All the “heavenly commandments” that seemed incontrovertible were manmade.

Later generations had been born into the manmade world and had racked their brains to question “heaven and earth,” climbing up the framework built by the sages; whether “orthodox” or “evil,” they were all in perfect order.

Only the possessors of paramount spiritual senses, who seemed insane, could sporadically sense the human world beyond the bounds.

They weren’t insane. It was everyone else who was blind.

“San-ge,” Xi Ping said softly amid the raging fire, “have you seen the real sun and moon, the real stars? Do they not follow the paths of human fate, not turn red or green because some mountain fell or some person died? Lightning is just a fart let out by the clouds before rain, not doing its interminable best to strike some poor fool... I’ve always thought it was strange. When you pass through the clouds on a sword, they’re only water vapor blown around by the wind. How could they move so fast when it comes to striking people?”

“I’ve been standing too low. I haven’t seen them clearly,” Zhou Ying said.
“Perhaps.”

“Don’t be in a rush. If you saw everything clearly, Princess Duanrui’s Way of the Heart would explode.” Xi Ping mumbled incoherently, “I can’t tell others, and even if I said it, at most they'd just sigh and say 'How right you are,' think that my analogy made sense. It's said that stone tape ghosts don't think they're dead—unless like me...like Lin Zongyi, they see their own 'way,' and that spells their doom... I shouldn't have called Lin Zongyi a good-for-nothing."

Zhou Ying said, "The soul vanishes when a person dies. Nothing survives. Ghosts are only comforting nonsense made up by the ignorant masses who fear death."

"Not entirely," Xi Ping said, coming back to himself. "Haven't ignorant cultivators who fear death cultivated themselves into ghosts?"

Just like the sages could never use their Ways of the Heart to build a true world restored to its original condition, the future generations operating within the framework and order of the spiritual mountains could never assemble a complete world of the sages. Each generation was worse than the one before—the sages had distorted the Will of Heaven and were then in turn distorted by future generations. Now, the Ways of the Heart accumulated at the feet of the spiritual mountains had polluted the origins of the spiritual mountains. The power of the spiritual mountains had waned, letting rebels like him break ground and sprout.

And they, thinking they had seen through the banality of the old order, were in fact only walking the old path of the five sages. When one day one of them “succeeded” and their Way of the Heart became consummate and fell to earth, washing “heaven and earth” clean once more, becoming the new spiritual mountains, then they would understand the truth about those who had gone before.

The only difference was that some were controlled by others’ voices, and some were consumed by their own creations.

The one who had taken fifty steps in the wrong direction shouldn’t laugh at the one who had taken a hundred steps.

“Guess what, san-ge.” Xi Ping laughed aloud. Suddenly, the unilateral barrier between him and Zhou Ying also unilaterally disappeared. No matter how Zhou Ying reacted, he could once again comfortably talk nonsense just like before. “I brought a set of burial robes with me back when I left Flying Jade Peak. Aren’t I smart? Too bad I never got to wear them. I lost them back in your old home. You can make it up to me when you have time.”

He had once again scored the winning prize. Others were controlled by a Way of the Heart and would only learn of it on the point of death.

He was controlled by an eccentric set of lousy bones and could never “succeed”; he was also in no danger of a shattered Way of the Heart. He could become aware in advance.

But why must living creatures be controlled by these hearts?

Where had the first Way of the Heart in the world come from? What kind of evil thing had it been?

Using every bit of his strength, Luo Qingshi had managed to get into the Latent Cultivation Temple’s secret passage leading to the outside world.

He had initiated a dozen classes of disciples. His basic skills were strong. As the Latent Cultivation Temple’s sole established foundation steward, he was normally also responsible for all of the Latent Cultivation Temple’s inscription defenses. He could be described as proficient in talismans, arrays, and inscriptions. But now, as though he had been half-paralyzed, he was staggering as he walked. He had the inscription key in his hands, but he couldn’t get it to match up. Over and over, he nearly touched the secret passage’s defense net.

As if his Way of the Heart knew that he was going to betray it and was trying by every means possible to obstruct him.

“We were in the same class, Su-shixiong. Do you still remember...what I used to look like?”

That year, the “promising young person” among the four great families belonged to the Zhao family. Perhaps the Zhao family had never been very good at rearing its children. As soon as that Zhao clan direct descendant entered the sect, he was enticed into violating the sect rules through the machinations of other families. A month after opening its gates, the Latent Cultivation Temple had expelled four provisional disciples. The situation could be described as unprecedented. Among the remaining disciples from the big families, there hadn’t been a single presentable one, not even if you went easy on them, so two sons of civil officials who had been chosen to make up the numbers had gotten ahead, one named Su Zhun and one named Luo Qingshi. They were the twin stars of that class of provisional disciples.

Su Zhun had a kind and gentle disposition and was thorough in all matters. Luo Qingshi was haughty and boastful, above it all. The two of them had been at odds since entering the sect and opened their spiritual eyes practically on the same day.

The thirty-six peak masters had probably thought it would be too humiliating and had all said openly that they would be accepting no inner sect disciples that year. The only opportunity to enter the inner sect was to take the established foundation steward in charge of the Latent Cultivation Temple at the time as your shifu—first you would go into the inner sect for some years, and after establishing a foundation, you would have to come to the Later Cultivation Temple and take over the role.

Luo Qingshi needed to fill that spot, because at the time, Wen Fei had not yet become an ascended spirit, and Rosy Cloud Peak, which would regularly supply elixirs to the outside world in the future, was still uninhabited.

Outside the Xuanyin Mountains, even for members of the four great families, elixirs could only be obtained by getting a favor from someone going to the inner sect. Luo Qingshi didn't have the connections, and his mother was seriously ill. The medicines of the mortal world were no use. He could only come into contact with Xuanyin's scarce medicine cultivators by entering the inner sect himself.

When Su Zhun had learned of this, he had gone to report to Heaven's Design Pavilion without demur, giving up that "road to heaven" in favor of his classmate.

As he had wished, Luo Qingshi entered the inner sect and easily obtained medicine from the medicine cultivator shijie, prolonging his mother's lifespan for twenty years. He had thought his virtuous achievements complete, not expecting that his nightmare had just begun. The reason his shifu had accepted him was that he was already showing signs of decline. He had only a few years left to live comfortably, and he was in a hurry to find a successor.

Only then did Luo Qingshi learn that in order to take over the Latent Cultivation Temple, he had to inherit his shifu's Way of the Heart, which was dedicated to giving instruction and dispelling doubts.

But Luo Qingshi's temperament was reclusive and disagreeable. Everyone was an idiot to him. He was extremely impatient when it came to dealing with people. He was incompatible with his shifu's Way of the Heart. Had he been the scion of a noble family, his elders would naturally have brought a spare Way of the Heart from storage that would accord with him, but Luo Qingshi wasn't. He had been accepted into the inner sect for the purpose of filling this position. He had no choice.

When Princess Duanrui had entered the way of clarity, though she had also been forced into it, at any rate she had received a Way of the Heart of utmost attainments, left by an ancient master. Luo Qingshi's shifu himself, however, had merely stopped at the middle established foundation stage. Even in the outer sects, his was a useless Way of the Heart that no one would have wanted.

Perhaps for some, it had been the "foot being cut to fit the shoe," but for him, it had been unwillingly hacking off all his limbs and being shoved into a jar.

Receiving this Way of the Heart had been exceedingly difficult for Luo Qingshi. Over and over, he had nearly died of it. Only after close to fifty years of struggle had he finally managed to survive amid terrifying alarms. A Way of the Heart could leave marks on the body, and he was the only person in the Xuanyin Mountains with a “foundation-establishing wound”—a full-grown man, he had taken on the ridiculous appearance of a child.

A mortal couldn't wait fifty years for him. In the end, he had been unable to see his mother one last time.

His only consolation was that the old lady had lived past seventy and died naturally in old age. She had endured no hardships. He heard that when Southern He had invaded Jinping, she had just happened to be in the Southern Sage Temple burning incense for her son far away in the immortal mountains. When she encountered Southern He cavalry outside the city, the Southern Sage hadn't answered; it was the young general left behind to protect Jinping who had saved her life.

Where no one knew about it, Luo Qingshi noted down that debt.

“You have to look after yourself, Su-shixiong. If you’re found out, you must not resist for my sake. Be adaptable, avoid those established foundations.” The former classmate who had been his hostile opponent—and who now looked like a twelve-year-old child—said to the white-haired, withered old man, “If you die, there will be no one left to remember my original appearance.”

Luo Qingshi forced his way into the secret passage. He had meant to fly his sword, but his internal energy was in chaos; he couldn’t fly steadily. He grit his teeth and from his mustard seed took a two-wheeled “steam donkey”—a downgraded immortal tool he had confiscated from a wildly audacious wealthy disciple some years ago. He stuck a white spirit into the donkey’s mouth. Before he could sit properly, the “donkey” howled and spurted out a mass of steam, taking to its heels and charging forward.

All toolmaking cultivators were insane!

Only by stretching his feet nearly to the point of cramping his tendons could Luo Qingshi just reach the pedals. Calling out “whoa” did no good. Unable to get the hang of it, he ran into the wall several times. Finally, “leaping onto roofs and vaulting over walls,” he charged out into the human world.

Naturally, as a traitor sneaking out of the Xuanyin Mountains, he was noticed by the stones at the bottom of the Sea of Stars. The established foundation cultivators in the Latent Cultivation Temple and Heaven's Design Pavilion's established foundations left to watch over Jingzhou were simultaneously "notified" by their Ways of the Heart.

Luo Qingshi had been prepared. As soon as he charged out, he was about to send his already drafted Heavenly Question, not expecting that it was already too late. Before it could take shape, the Heavenly Question was dispersed by a talisman.

At the same time, the established foundations from the Latent Cultivation Temple also caught up, surrounding the stupid downgraded donkey that had already burned through the spiritual stone.

"Luo-shixiong," the leading established foundation blue-clotheser said, "I truly never thought that even the Latent Cultivation Temple would betray the spiritual mountains."

"Su Mingyi, you'd better not have been stubborn about this, old man," Luo Qingshi thought.

He closed his eyes. Then, glaring with those eyes that regularly appeared in every disciple's nightmares, he laughed coldly. "Good-for-nothings. I taught every last one of you. Do you really think you've made something of yourselves?"

“Enough chatter, get him!”

Luo Qingshi hated his Way of the Heart, and he had never sincerely liked the provisional disciples who had been consigned to his care. He and class after class had mutually tormented each other in the Qiankun Tower. All of them were children of important people; many of them hadn't experienced as much humiliation in their whole lives as they had in one year at the hands of this dwarf. Now they finally had a chance to wreak their vengeance.

New grievances upon old resentments, a righteous cause and a private score—the situation was tenuous; the two sides immediately came to blows.

Luo Qingshi's internal energy was in such disorder he thought his Way of the Heart was about to shatter. Though he was simultaneously besieged by eight Heaven's Design Pavilion established foundations, he wasn't overcome at once. It was clear that he hadn't been entirely wrong in constantly saying “good-for-nothings” for over a century.

Luo Qingshi waved his sleeve. A dazzling talisman sent three established foundations of the same level as him flying at once. But the next moment, he found that his essence had been emptied out.

This place was still at the feet of the Xuanyin Mountains. The spiritual energy was abundant. A cultivator in fact didn't need spiritual stones to replenish their essence. But all his meridians had sealed themselves automatically; external spiritual energy couldn't enter!

“A Way of the Heart...a fine Way of the Heart.” Luo Qingshi suddenly laughed. “Interesting.”

All of a sudden, he recklessly tore through the circle of blue-clothesers and used the very last of his strength to send six Heavenly Questions in a row. A blue-clotheser stabbed a sword through his shoulder, which wasn't even as thick as the width of a palm, nailing him to the ground.

“Luo Qingshi, you are unworthy of being a teacher—”

Luo Qingshi's vision swam again and again. At these words, an even more bitterly sarcastic sneer appeared on his face. “I never even...”

Before the words could leave his mouth, the six Heavenly Questions were all intercepted. The point of a sword had appeared before him.

But just then, Luo Qingshi's disorderly internal energy suddenly calmed. His sealed meridians unexpectedly reopened. In a flash, with no time to consider, Luo Qingshi hastily sent out a talisman to knock the sword aside—the Ways of the Heart controlling the established foundations had been lapped up by the Unbound Furnace!

Almost at the same time, the eight Heaven's Design Pavilion blue-clothesers seemed to fall into a daze. Luo Qingshi seized the opportunity to snap off the sword stuck into his shoulder. With a blood-stained hand, he sent off a seventh Heavenly Question.

The spiritual energy that was once again flowing through his body swept up the Heavenly Question with excessive force. The established foundation nearest to him didn't have time to react!

The Heavenly Question instantly passed over vast distances and landed in the wilderness of the Land of Turmoil.

The next moment, Zhi Xiu appeared right in the back garden of the Marquis Manor.

CHAPTER 186 - Tomb of the Sage (12)

When a shed skin appeared, there was practically no need for him to do anything. Where his consciousness swept, the established foundation cultivators were instantly rendered immobile. Inside and outside the Yongning Marquis Manor, all the established foundations who had been incited and then plunged into confusion by the destruction of the undead Ways of the Heart were held where they were by Zhi Xiu.

In a flash, he landed in Dangui Lane.

The established foundation blue-clotheser who had just put down Xi Yue went weak at the knees and knelt with a thump.

Zhi Xiu didn't attend to him. He flew forward to sever the random bursts of spiritual energy coming from Xi Yue. Seeing that the half-puppet could no longer speak, he reached out a hand to summon a snow-white tree branch and smeared Xi Yue's blood on it. "Your core array has been destroyed. I don't understand earworm half-puppet techniques. Tell me what to do."

Just then, a piece of paper carried by a wild wind hurried toward them—the great battle of the masters had ended, but the Kaiming Department's "great battle" had just begun. The Kaiming Cultivators everywhere had to set about repairing the fields, factories, and houses that had been damaged by the Territory Map's troublemaking, and they had to restore the river embankment and provide disaster relief. Bai Ling had originally thought that with Xi Ping to oversee Jinping, he could leave it to him and go coordinate elsewhere. But before the night was out, when he had just reached Suling, he'd heard that there had been yet another incident.

When Bai Ling landed, he took only one glance at Xi Yue, then sucked in a breath and turned to go. "I'll go get in contact with the Luwu and have them grab the worm master Bu Zhichou in Tao County."

Seeing them, Xi Yue seemed to know that the Marquis Manor was safe and sound. He smiled. The blood on the tree bark quickly twisted into a word: "Ge..."

Zhi Xiu froze. All of a sudden, he thought that encountering Xi Ping may not have been good for Xi Yue. Xi Ping had spent the first half of his life in perfect contentment, whereas the half-puppet practically hadn't had a chance to be human. It could sometimes be very hard for the two of them to understand each other...unlike the half-demon and half-human who had escaped the Impassable Sea together and could rely on each other absolutely.

A drop of warmth was enough for Xi Yue to spend half a lifetime digesting, making him overexert himself to repay it.

For this child, the Yongning Marquis Manor was a bowl of potent elixir fed to a person too sickly to handle it...he might end up giving his life in exchange.

“I’ll take you to see him,” Zhi Xiu said gently. His consciousness had already swept toward the Xuanyin Mountains. The thirty-five peaks that had been sealed by Zhang Jue sensed something; they were trembling.

He sent out three beams of sword energy that connected to the snow shuffler growing in the rear garden, securing the four corners of the Yongning Marquis Manor. He nodded to the dumbfounded Pang Jian, who had rushed over. “I’ll leave this to you and Bai Ling.”

Having said this, he picked up Xi Yue and vanished into thin air.

Right now, at the bottom of the Xuanyin Mountains’ Sea of Stars, the blaze of the Unbound Furnace had reached its pinnacle. At last, it swallowed that final star stone, which was as big as a mountain.

Xi Ping controlled the Unbound Furnace alone, no longer speaking to Zhou Ying, all his focus given over to that tumor-like star stone.

When the Eternal Flame burned away a bit of that stone, he learned some information from it.

During Xuanyin's internal strife, the Dignitary of Code Li Fengshan had shown signs of decline. His consciousness had been sealed by the Xuanyin Mountains' three other elders, and he had made it through another decade or so before dying.

To make a mean comparison, these high elders were like the wheels of a steam carriage. Emperor Taiming and his son had punctured Zhao Yin with a big awl; the explosion had been heard all over. For Li Fengshan, however, it was more like the air had slowly been let out of him by numerous slender needles; he had deflated soundlessly.

After death, his body had "ascended," turning into spiritual energy; probably only sages of the elders' level could have felt it. Then his shed skin Way of the Heart had slowly sunk into the Sea of Stars.

The Li clan was the most well-established of Southern Wan's big families; Li Fengshan had been senior even to Zhao Yin. Before they had frittered it all away, their clan's prosperity had been in no way inferior to that of the Zhao clan. The shed skin's Way of the Heart had dropped like a whale falling into the depths. The Ways of the Heart of common origin had immediately gathered to cling to it. Thus had the first Way of the Heart that could disrupt the will of the spiritual mountains been produced amid the Xuanyin Mountain Range.

Xi Ping carefully delved into that star stone and saw that this “malignant tumor” had even disturbed the distribution of spiritual energy throughout the country—on the inner sect peaks under the Li clan’s jurisdiction and in places where clan members congregated in the mortal world, the spiritual energy concentrations were nearly ten percent higher than elsewhere.

Their power in court had collapsed utterly, but they had used the exceptional advantages of their ancestral inheritance to build factories wildly and rake in money. While admittedly the civil unrest during the twenty-ninth year of Taiming had been caused by Zhou Ying’s meddling, traces of activity by Li family members also appeared.

And Li Fengshan dying and ascending had happened precisely in the year that Zhou Ying had escaped and Liang Chen had fallen to the demons.

No wonder. While the Sea of Stars couldn’t light the Impassable Abyss, when the half-skeleton of hidden bones had emerged and hidden in Jinping, the Sea of Stars still ought to have given warning. Reasonably speaking, it shouldn’t have waited until eight years had passed and Liang Chen was plotting to seize Jinping’s Dragon Vein to react.

At this point, the power that could hoodwink a spiritual image brand, give Liang Chen the spirit-protecting pill, and lure him down into the Impassable Sea seemed on the point of being revealed—

Just then, the surge of spiritual energy Zhou Ying had drawn came to an end.

The fire in the Unbound Furnace had burned the Xuanyin Mountains clean. Half of the interference in Zhang Jue's mind instantly disappeared. In surprise and bewilderment, he realized what Xi Ping and the others had been burning.

But the ascended spirit peak masters were unlike the established foundations, who had first been driven crazy and out of control by the “heavenly edict,” then been at a loss when the “heavenly edict” had suddenly been removed. When one's cultivation reached the ascended spirit level, the Way of the Heart became impregnably firm. Rather than saying their minds had been influenced by the “heavenly edict,” it would be more accurate to say that the “heavenly edict” had only revealed the truth. They had already “joined ways” with the stones underground.

Now the dead stones underground had been burned, but the “living stones” remained.

The three ascended spirit “stone blocks” who had lost their senses suddenly heard Zhou Ying speak through the reincarnation wood: “Gentlemen, who still has protective immortal tools?”

“What’s a protective immortal tool?” said Wen Fei.

“I was in a rush and didn’t bring enough. I packed some for Shiyong.”

“I can’t right now, they’re in the mustard seed, feel around and use whatever you like!” Xi Ping needed to concentrate. “What’s wrong?”

“The spiritual wind has disappeared, and the ascended spirit peak masters are coming toward you,” Zhou Ying said indifferently. “I can’t reach you. My cultivation is too low, and that wind just now blew me too far away.”

Xi Ping: “...”

What a great brother! How had Bai Ling managed not to murder his superior after all these years? That half-demon da-ge must be the one really cultivating the way of clarity.

Meanwhile, Zhi Xiu had already passed through the snow shufflers on Flying Jade Peak.

The Xuanyin Mountains' seal was like paper. As soon as he arrived, it immediately fragmented along with the flying snow filling the air.

Zhi Xiu first flew up to the sealed immortal palace at the summit of Flying Jade Peak. A spirit ice pearl flew out at his summons and turned into a big sphere larger than a person when it landed. Zhi Xiu placed Xi Yue inside it to keep his spirit from being extinguished. Then there was no time to say anything. He turned and flew toward the Sea of Stars.

The Sea of Stars was one chaotic battle. Apart from the Lin family members, who still had some recollection that they should protect Lin Chi, the other peak masters, without hesitation, were hurling all kinds of talismans toward the three ascended spirits who had lost their senses.

Wen Fei wasn't a tidy person. He normally stuffed elixirs into his mustard seed at random. Anyway, with his cultivation level and sense of smell, there was no way he could get the wrong one. Now that he couldn't see or smell and was pretty much grabbing blind, this unreliable medicine cultivator absolutely couldn't remember what was what.

With Xi Ping, it was even more of the same. He had no idea what was in the mustard seed Lin Chi had given him, and there was no time to discuss it now. He had no alternative; he pulled back his focus from where it was sunk into the Eternal Flame and rummaged through the mustard seed.

The two of them didn't talk it over; they struck simultaneously, one scattering medicine at random, the other tossing things at random.

Zhou Ying opened his mouth but didn't have time to say anything. So he swallowed his words, appraised the situation, and felt that no matter what, his mouth couldn't be faster than these two's hands. Therefore, he simply stopped giving pointers and quickly withdrew from the Sea of Stars.

A large portion of the things Lin Chi had given Xi Ping were experiments with spirit-conducting gold, all deadly weapons—ascended spirit grade. Immortal tools made of spirit-conducting gold automatically absorbed spiritual energy. They only had to be switched on; there was no need for a cultivator to activate them with spiritual energy. Xi Ping could neither see nor feel. How could he know what kind of metal any of these things were made of? So he recklessly activated all of them with spiritual energy. “Go fuck yourselves, you stupid leashed dogs!”

An ascended spirit's force striking ascended spirit grade spirit-conducting gold weapons was simply overkill. Before they could confront the enemy, he himself had blown up nearly half the immortal tools. Adding in the other peak masters either actively attacking or passively defending...the spiritual energy boiling in the valley of the Sea of Stars was comparable to the essences of a thousand ascended spirit masters being ignited all at once!

Even Zhang Jue's blindfold fell. "Stop!"

Amid the fierce quaking of the valley of the Sea of Stars, there was a sudden whizz. Among the pile of immortal tools Xi Ping had tossed out, there turned out to have been a bundle of fireworks reinforced with spirit-conducting gold. Lin Chi had been inspired to make this when he remembered the great fireworks on Flying Jade Peak that had once brought down the north slope with two spiritual stones.

He had only been making it for fun and had accidentally put it in the mustard seed... Cultivators' lifespans were too long; the shortest span of time they ever contemplated was a decade. Lin Chi had casually made enough for ten years.

There was a bang. Perhaps even the Bell of Tribulation went deaf. All of Great Wan could see the enormous fireworks rising into the sky, carrying Wen Fei's medicinal powders that may have been for anything at all.

It was like the folk tale about the imperial court of the thirty-three heavens descending to the mortal world. The newly risen sun in the east faded amid the bright colors as if its fires had been put out. After the colors passed, there came a big cluster of silver flowers, as if all the eternal spring brocade that had been in the world many years ago had burst into bloom at once.

Wen Fei's medicinal powders floated throughout the mountains. The flowers and grasses that had been revolving systematically through the seasons forgot the date and grew wildly. Vegetation crept everywhere, like monsters. A gigantic colorful mushroom broke through the roof of the lofty main hall of the Principal Peak. The white mourning streamers tangled with its mycelia.

This brightly-colored mushroom grew all the way up to the mouth of the divine image of the Southern Sage before half of it was charred by a bolt of lightning that could take this no longer; it let off an unusual fragrance of cooking. Each of the disciples who accidentally breathed it into their lungs took on a dazed expression, plunged into some unknown illusion.

The auspicious animals didn't know to hold their breaths and breathed in a different kind of medicinal powder. Whether blue luan or white deer, immortal crane or spirit fox, all of them opened their mouths and barked like dogs.

In over a thousand years, there had never been such an uproar on the Xuanyin Mountains' solemn and silent Principal Peak.

Amid these huge explosions like illusions, there were also now and then mixed in some ascended spirits who had been thrown up into the sky by the spiritual wind. The flustered ascended spirit peak masters tried using talismans and immortal tools to stabilize themselves, but all the powers they used required spiritual energy and stimulated the spirit-conducting gold in the fireworks a degree further. The fireworks climbed step by step up the sky, so dazzling they startled the whole of the southern continent, like celebrations for a hundred new years all squeezed together!

In the midst of this auspicious and jubilant atmosphere, the Sea of Stars was lifted in its entirety into the sky.

Innumerable stars representing “fate” were set loose at once, like an immense prank.

Luo Qingshi lay face up on the ground. The fireworks lit up his bloody, pitiful form. A smile of pleasure appeared on his cynical doll’s face.

Cracks came from the cliffs on both sides of the Sea of Stars. The ancient spiritual mountains couldn’t sustain this kind of stimulation. The cliffs were about to collapse. At the moment of peril, ice-cold sword energy appeared out of nowhere, freezing the mist permeating the valley. Then upright birch trees quickly put down roots and sprouted from the cracked stone of the mountains, forcibly mending the cracks. In the blink of an eye, they had woven a big net, holding up the tottering cliffs.

The layer of protective spiritual energy around Zhi Xiu was too strong. The glittering medicinal powder couldn't get near him. When he saw these dregs of nameless poisons, the corners of his eyes twitched. He clenched his teeth and shouted toward the valley: "Xi Shiyong!"

A mist flew his way. Zhou Ying practically "rolled" out of the mist. He stumbled a long way in midair before finding his footing, but because he wasn't at all embarrassed, this didn't seem awkward.

Once he had his sword firmly under his feet, he saluted Zhi Xiu. "General Zhi, please descend to speak. He's gone deaf."

Zhi Xiu: "..."

The sword cultivator's consciousness instantly enveloped the mess of the Sea of Stars. He pushed all the ascended spirits who had been sent flying back to the ground. The wildly leaping spirit-conducting gold was swept aside by a single blow. Next, he borrowed a blizzard from Flying Jade Peak and washed away Wen Fei's bizarre medicinal powders.

The ice and snow met heat and melted. All the vapor rose and formed clouds. A moment later, a strong rain fell, scouring the mess of the Sea of Stars.

The inscriptions and arrays inside and outside the Sea of Stars were so tattered there was nothing left of them. The “stars” were washed into gullies by the rain. The star stones that had accumulated over thousands of years had been committed to the fires of the Eternal Flame. Only that faded little prayer mat in the depths of the valley had unexpectedly survived amid this storm.

Zhang Jue at last opened his eyes. He didn't come to his senses until Zhi Xiu landed beside him.

The corners of Zhang Jue's mouth twitched. Before Zhi Xiu could speak, he floated down into the valley, picked up the little prayer mat, patted the dust off it, then turned and headed off without a word to the Hall of Reflection on Errors beneath the Principal Peak—this was the place where Li Fengshan had once been locked up.

The Sea of Stars was empty, the paths of the stars in the sky had gone astray; the general trend of events was like a flood that had burst the banks.

But for some reason, the Dignitary of Fate's step was somewhat lighter than before.

Only embers remained in the Unbound Furnace. The ascended spirit peak masters lay higgledy-piggledy throughout the valley, making a certain established foundation escaping entirely unscathed seem even stranger. Zhi Xiu raised his hand to remove the authority of the mutinous peak masters and placed immortal-binding talismans on them, imprisoning them in Yuntian Palace.

Finally, he turned up Xi Ping at the bottom of the valley.

No matter what, Zhi Xiu couldn't work out what the hell Wen Fei had fed him. All he could do was send a beam of sword energy directly into his essence, like he had rinsed the Sea of Stars, forcing the remaining return to unity powder clean out of his body.

The senses that had been suppressed by the return to unity powder repaid him twice over. Xi Ping's arms and legs began to cramp. He curled into a ball.

Zhi Xiu grabbed his wrist to check his pulse and was just searching all over himself for pain relieving and healing pills that would work on an ascended spirit when he heard that Xi Ping was actually laughing intermittently. His laughter seemed a little off. Zhi Xiu frowned, then saw the veins in Xi Ping's neck and forehead stand out.

Xi Ping forced his convulsing meridians apart and rolled over onto his back to let the downpour fall onto his face.

“Shifu...” he said faintly, “I’ve risen from the dead.”

Zhi Xiu was silent for a moment, then let go of his wrist. “Come with me.”

A moment later, Xi Ping, as though exhausted, was leaning against the spirit ice pearl holding Xi Yue. His body heat couldn’t warm the pearl; instead, the pearl froze the rainwater soaking him.

Tao County’s Luwu had received the order and had already carried the worm master Bu Zhichou back in a sack, pressing the worm master’s blood onto reincarnation wood by force. Xi Ping had no time to thank them. He caught Bu Zhichou’s consciousness.

“This...this is Xuan-xuanyin?!”

Xi Ping could sense this dishonest worm master’s consciousnesses revolving wildly, eagerly trying to have a look around, so he aggressively shoved him back. “No nonsense. Take a look at him and I’ll let you live.”

“Hey, hey.” Bu Zhichou clicked his tongue feelingly. “I’ve been saying the arrangements in Tao County are far-reaching, and wouldn’t you know it, Tai Sui isn’t some unknown evil...hss! Spare me, senior... Th-there-there-there’s nothing to look at here, he stabbed through his own core array, who’s going to be all right after gouging out his own heart? If he didn't have a half-immortal's cultivation, he'd already... Ow, senior, I wasn't finished, there's a way, there's a way. Just keep his spirit from dispersing and have him establish a foundation. It'll just take some spiritual stones...but you're orthodox immortals of the spiritual mountains, you must have plenty of spiritual stones..."

As Bu Zhichou spoke, he snuck a look through the reincarnation wood to examine the true countenance of the Tai Sui in front of him, but he saw that when he was finished speaking, this mysterious ascended spirit with his dazzling features suddenly looked distraught.

"No way," Bu Zhichou thought. "He can't bear to spend the trifling sum of spiritual stones for establishing a foundation? Seems this half-puppet is useless."

The next moment, the worm master's vision dimmed. He knew nothing more.

Xi Ping pressed a hand against the spirit ice pearl and closed his eyes. The cold of the spirit ice pearl turned his fingertips bright red.

Xi Yue laboriously raised his hand, as though trying to reach him, but also as if trying to get him to take his hand off the ice.

“Shifu.” Xi Ping couldn’t bear to look at him. He abruptly turned away.

“Your disciple has a presumptuous request. Please take Xi Yue as your disciple, whether direct or of record...pass on your way so he can establish a foundation.”

Xi Yue’s hand fell.

CHAPTER 187 - Tomb of the Sage (13)

Zhi Xiu didn't speak aloud, only said privately to Xi Ping through the shard of Zhaoting in his spirit, "A half-puppet establishing a foundation is different from a teacher conveying a way to a disciple. The earworm half-puppet technique is used to rear tools and slaves. While those worm masters want half-puppets to be useful, they are also afraid that they will break free of their control if their cultivation is too high, so a half-puppet is unable to cultivate independently. When remaking his arrays while establishing a foundation, there must be someone there to temporarily stabilize his spirit. I know that you have no Way of the Heart, but with your cultivation level, a sliver of consciousness will be more than enough for him to use."

After a pause, Zhi Xiu continued: "My way is ordinary and unremarkable. It is merely unfashionable because the southern continent values literary achievements over martial ones. There are plenty of sword cultivators in the north. It isn't that I'm jealous of it. It's only that I think you ought to ask Xi Yue what he wants."

"It would indeed cost me no effort," Xi Ping said softly. "But what would happen to him after he established a foundation?"

A human establishing a foundation rebuilt their meridians. A half-puppet would virtually have to rebuild their whole body. During this period, the half-puppet's spirit would rely entirely on their master, involuntarily accept the master's "way" and wishes without question to become a handier tool—what would Xi Yue get from him?

Xi Ping had come face-to-face with the hidden bones in the Unbound Furnace. After he had left it, as if the bones had "dropped the act," they were no longer deliberately hiding themselves. Right now, as he spoke to Zhi Xiu, he could clearly sense the existence of the hidden bones.

They were on his consciousness, taking strength from him, keeping him from dying, constantly nibbling away at his scant remaining warmth.

And all of this, Xi Ping was unable to tell anyone. Even if he found a way to say it, others would never truly understand—apart from those of the "way of death," which had no Way of the Heart, the day others truly understood would be the day their Ways of the Heart shattered.

The only person left that he could communicate with was Zhou Ying. Fortunately, san-ge could no longer suffer.

He had hoped that Xi Yue could live on like Zhao Qindan, without establishing a foundation. Before learning the secret of Ways of the Heart, he had already made his plans. When the arrays to protect against spiritual beasts had been fully constructed in the South Sea Hidden Realm and the environment became a little safer, he would send Xi Yue there with their parents, keeping the evil cultivators from always aiming at his weak spot in Jinping.

But fortune made fools of people. Just as he had been looking at himself in the Unbound Furnace, Xi Yue had been pushed onto this wrong road...so he would at least find him the most dependable guide. No matter how dark the road ahead, shifu would lead him.

One waking ghost in the world was enough. Why should he drag someone else down? Only the bald Heartless Lotus did that kind of thing.

“My way does not stem from my own heart,” Xi Ping said aloud, letting Xi Yue behind him hear. “I’ve heard that the person who founded it was extremely reclusive and spent all his life wandering, alone, with no burial when he finally died... Elder Lin was right. This way is inauspicious. Even I don’t acknowledge it—how could I pass it on to another?”

Zhi Xiu froze. He had actually forgotten about this detail—when others obtained a Way of the Heart, it would fix their disposition. No matter how bad a fit it had been before, as long as they survived establishing a foundation, they would have accepted and acknowledged it. Only the ungovernable way, which seemed to want to be “ungovernable” up to the hilt, was different, deliberately choosing a person who refused it, imparting nothing but the hidden bones, creating a freak who had reached the ascended spirit stage and was still unwilling to accept the way he cultivated.

“Yue-bao’er, this wouldn’t be giving you a cold or a cough, it would be a fatal...”

Out of nowhere, Zhi Xiu’s heart jumped. He couldn’t resist interrupting him. “Xi Shiyong, how old are you? Mind your mouth!”

Xi Ping lowered his eyes. For once, he didn’t put his usual armor of frivolity on display.

Calmly menacing, he spoke practically, each word distinct: “If my ‘Way of the Heart’ were in front of me, I would shred it to bits without giving it a chance to cry for help.”

As he spoke, he looked far into the sky. Zhou Ying’s figure was faintly visible in the mist—Zhi Xiu had withdrawn the authority of a whole bunch of peak masters, so nearly all of the Xuanyin Mountains’ peaks were wide open. Floating in the air, Zhou Ying could see the whole Xuanyin Mountain Range at a glance, watch the truth emerge as the dust settled. When he met Xi Ping’s eyes, he nodded, then indifferently looked away.

Xi Ping smiled at him, then turned and half-knelt. Through the ice pearl, he patted Xi Yue on the head. “I can give you anything else, but not that. Achieve enlightenment through the sword heart, and in the future you’ll have sharper teeth to bite me with.

“Where do I start altering the core array for a half-puppet to establish a foundation? Give me a plan.” Xi Ping poked Bu Zhichou awake in the reincarnation wood. He felt an ice-cold idea as the hidden bones gently brushed his consciousness: Extract the information through a soul-searching

This was a very mystical sensation. When a human brain was active, thousands upon thousands of odds and ends flashed through it every moment. Apart from a very small portion that would pass through conscious evaluation to be accepted or rejected, the vast majority of the noise only flew by, overlooked before you had a chance to notice it. But now, Xi Ping could see clearly which small ripples in the flood of his thoughts had emerged from the hidden bones.

Xi Ping briefly scrutinized that thought, decided to keep it in reserve, then said to Bu Zhichou, “Will you do it of your own accord, or should I soul-search you?”

Bu Zhichou: “...”

This immortal had a very striking appearance. How come he sounded so much like an evil cultivator?

The worm master cautiously asked, “Immortal, do you know how to alter a half-puppet’s arrays...? This isn’t something I can just talk you through. If you are unfamiliar with the procedures for...”

“Me, unfamiliar with the procedures for creating puppets?” Xi Ping interrupted him. “Do you know how I rooted out your den in Yu Family Bend at the start, when the two of us had never met before?”

Bu Zhichou was petrified. “I have not yet requested guidance on this subject.”

“Worm masters uphold the principle of ‘only do good, do not look out for future prospects.’ They only take ‘living ghosts’ and do not harm intact humans. So all you have to do is get others to help you turn ‘intact humans’ into ‘living ghosts’ and pretend you don’t know, and you think that means you haven’t violated the rules of your profession. There are evil cultivators who specialize in selling living ghosts. They deliberately choose places with many newborns to pilfer heaven’s order, not for the sake of their own cultivation, but to create deformed children to sell to you people...”

Bu Zhichou immediately felt the gaze of the shed skin god next to them sweep toward him, cold as ice. Through the reincarnation wood, he still felt chilled to the marrow, as if he had been stabbed. He hurried to give a flat denial: “Th-th-that never happened!”

Xi Ping said, “Once, in exchange for a piece of information from you, a person gave you a group of living ghosts in excellent condition. You were beside yourself with delight and went into seclusion for one month, three days, and four shichen, made twelve half-puppets of exceptional quality in a row, saved up the whole set, and named them after the twelve animals of the zodiac. This was in Yu Family Bend. Do you want me to give you the particulars of all twelve of those people? The first was a little girl around three years old, extremely short, but very loud when she cried. You didn’t like the noise, so you first cut out her tongue and chose ‘Mute Rat’ for her puppet name. When you made her into a puppet, the proportion of earworm wood to Moon Plated Gold you used was one to six. You welded in eight hundred purple lightning rat spiritual beast tendons so the half-puppet would be flexible...”

Bu Zhichou had had no idea that when he had gone into seclusion on his own turf to create half-puppets, there had been a pair of eyes beside him, always watching. In spite of himself, he felt bone-deep dread. He wondered to himself what kind of hobby would cause a mighty ascended spirit immortal to hide in the dark spying on a minor worm master at work—an orthodox immortal who thought spying on this kind of thing was worthwhile had to be crazy.

“Immortal, Exalted, your powers are truly vast, your eyes and ears embrace the universe. It is I who have been blind.”

“Mr. Bu Zhichou, I spent several years watching you create half-puppets. Even an idiot would have picked up the procedures for making puppets, such as they are.”

And he hadn't just watched. When his scattered consciousness had been trapped in Wild Fox Country, it had often been dragged away by the little “living ghosts” in next door Yu Family Bend, and he had been on the receiving end of the procedures for making puppets along with them countless times; he remembered it even more clearly than the swordsmanship taught by his shifu, who couldn't stand to beat him. Even an ordinary worm master might not have been as well-versed in the techniques as him.

While Xi Ping was unearthing what had taken place in Wild Fox Country, the hidden bones were “icing” his hot anger: There are too many vile people who deserve death in this world. The weak attracting disaster when they are not free to act is heaven's law. It is meaningless to wallow in the loves and hates of these nobodies. Why take them out to chew over? When you can look with disdain upon all under heaven, all under heaven naturally becomes well-ordered and equitable.

Xi Ping couldn't help wanting to laugh. He discovered that the reason he had been able to focus entirely on seizing all kinds of opportunities for study over the years was perhaps not because his will was firm, but through the aid of this stabilizing force in his consciousness. He himself was a rich kid who loved leisure and hated work and had such a short temper that he would even hold a grudge over being scratched by a cat.

“I curse when I'm in pain and complain when I'm angry,” he thought, withstanding the calm of the hidden bones. “I'll even go publicize it in the toilet bulletins so the whole world knows about it.”

Why should it be heaven's law that the weak attract disaster?

Because everyone is busy standing up under the weight of the Great Way to heaven and has no time to attend to other things?

Zhi Xiu immediately noticed something and looked at Xi Ping—this was the first time Xi Ping had ever uncovered a sliver of the years he had been missing, which seemed to be under a dense fog, once again revealing willful and capricious flesh and blood.

Xi Ping reached out a hand to cover Xi Yue's eyes. "I can't give you a Way of the Heart, but I can rebuild your array. I'm not abandoning you, don't worry. I know."

Xi Yue thought, What do you know...?

But a half-immortal half-puppet had no latitude to struggle when faced with an ascended spirit. Xi Ping took him out of the ice pearl and easily sealed all his meridians. "Shifu!"

Zhi Xiu sighed silently. His sword aura landed on the spirit between Xi Yue's brows like gentle snow.

"No, I don't want..."

Xi Yue began to struggle. Out of nowhere, he found the strength to clutch at Xi Ping's sleeve. If Xi Ping had been like other people, cultivating an orthodox "Great Way" that could be traced, and had abandoned him because he thought his natural endowments were poor, he could have let it go. The peak master and Commander Pang were both reliable people. It was all the same if he walked another path; all roads would ultimately reach the same end.

But perhaps because at the very start of this path through the cultivation world, the two of them had been joined by a dragon-taming chain, while Xi Yue had never understood what way Xi Ping cultivated, he had always had a powerful intuition—Xi Ping would part ways with everyone. If he missed his chance today, no one would ever have another chance to stay with him to the very end.

Today, he had to catch up even if he died.

The half-puppet body with its destroyed core array actually gathered a weak spiritual wind. Xi Yue frenziedly resisted the sword aura trying to sweep into his consciousness. All his features were tearing—

Zhi Xiu couldn't resist saying, "Shiyong, you can't force..."

Xi Ping formed a hand seal that no orthodox immortal would ever have seen and placed a talisman on Xi Yue's brow.

Bu Zhichou couldn't resist sucking in a breath. "Eliminate the past!"

This was an evil art particular to worm masters, used specifically to handle half-puppets who changed hands and masters. Without impacting a half-puppet's memories, it could erase all the attachments and sentiments contained in those memories that were connected to the original owner.

How could he know even this?!

Xi Yue felt every single trifle that had had happened since he had met Xi Ping well up in his heart: the unexpected encounter in the Blissful Village, the confused fear; the mutual dependance in the Latent Cultivation Temple and the first time he had had a name; the brief happy days on Flying Jade Peak, traveling together to Demon Country...the reunion after their long separation, his wild joy when he had heard that person's voice again.

All those things were still there, but the emotions that accompanied the memories were being erased.

Xi Yue stared into Xi Ping's eyes. The hand clutching his sleeve began to tremble. It became weaker and weaker, looser and looser...

Finally, the half-puppet's consciousness was swept up by the sword heart of a shed skin.

Zhi Xiu hadn't handed everything over like Duanrui. This sword cultivator's sword heart was one he had refined for himself bit by bit out of nothing, so he could restrain himself and give Xi Yue a few insights from his early years, let him slowly digest them. All the same, this was still a Way of the Heart that came from a shed skin. Xi Yue was immediately submerged in that vast sword aura, sinking in and falling unconscious to the outside world.

Dimly, he could still feel that the hands wielding the knife were skillful and steady, even knowing what places to avoid, not letting him suffer. The rudiments of a new core array quickly took shape.

Xi Ping had cut off the last little tail trailing after him.

Meanwhile, the four nations of the southern continent at last came back to their senses after the Xuanyin Mountains' earthshaking fireworks display—

CHAPTER 188 - Tomb of the Sage (Final)

Southern Wan's Kaiming Department had been busy to the point of swooning, but apart from the capital city of Jinping, the vast majority of areas had yet to be restored. Medical halls and clinics were all crammed with people who had been injured in the earthquakes. Fortunately the weather on the southern continent had yet to turn cold; it was still feasible to throw together a little shack outside and make do for a night.

The Kaiming Departments rushing around everywhere had no established foundation cultivators. All their information lagged a step behind. They finished watching the fireworks display along with their countrymen, who had been the first to come help. They looked at each other helplessly.

In the city outskirts in Suling, a worker clearing the road with a big hoist truck stuck his head out and asked, "Exalted, it isn't the New Year, what are the immortal mountains celebrating with those fireworks?"

"Um...well..." The Kaiming Cultivator he had asked was himself hardly erudite. After a long moment, he finally squeezed out, "An escape from calamity will be followed by prosperity?"

Bai Ling had been in Suling during the small hours of the morning, and the Kaiming Cultivator who had spoken had followed him around to convey his orders. This casual bit of nonsense was mistakenly taken for something that Bai Ling, who had left suddenly, had said, and so it passed quickly from mouth to mouth.

“An escape from calamity will be followed by prosperity” spread throughout the country via the flying goose...until the Kaiming Department received official correspondence from the Heaven’s Design Pavilion head office in the capital, requesting their assistance in arresting the Heaven’s Design Pavilion established foundation masters who had “absconded without leave.”

Across the river, Western Chu had also been disturbed by the fireworks. The Silver Moon flickered, its silver light dragged out into a comet’s tail by the two mountain peaks. The divine image of the Black Emperor on the Principal Peak seemed to suddenly split apart—this was the result of the silent struggle between the two full moon Ways of the Heart beneath the mountains.

The Xuanyin Mountains were ruled by four big families, and each family had a number of chains of Ways of the Heart of common origin within it, none of them willing to piss in the same pot. Even when they turned into stone, each group still stuck together, ignoring the rest.

Sanyue was different. Sanyue’s “mainstream” was the way that their founder, the Black Emperor, had passed down. Up to and including former sect leader Xiang Rong, eighty percent of the Xiang family belonged to that group, while those from other families each had their own way, forming no trends.

It was just that in Xiang Rong's era, "passing down a way" had had a rather different meaning from what it had come to mean for later generations. It was Zhao Yin of the Xuanyin Mountains who had started the practice of picking up a predecessor's Way of the Heart whole without thinking about it. Before that, a permissive teacher like the Southern Sage would allow his disciples to fumble around for themselves, only giving occasional hints, while a strict tyrant like the Black Emperor would inculcate his disciples with his own way, leading his direct disciples to have Ways of the Heart that formed a continuous line from his; but, because each individual's disposition and comprehension was different, however continuous the line, there would still be slight deviations. That was why, when Xiang Rong had wanted to become a full moon sage, he had needed to use the Unbound Furnace to "correct" his Way of the Heart.

But while the Unbound Furnace without its furnace flame could alter the form, it couldn't get rid of a person's selfish desires: when Xiang Rong had been a full moon sage, while he had been as dignified as the Black Emperor's reincarnation, there had still been a knot in his heart that could never be smoothed out because of the disobedient Xuanwu.

Xuanwu was his brother, a “duplicate” inextricably linked to him, a stain and a disgrace that he couldn’t erase.

Xiang Rong had been hard at work running the Sanyue Mountains for over a thousand years. It didn’t matter to him whose hands it fell into, even if it was the utterly useless Xiang Ning—the only person it couldn’t be was Xuanwu.

Two full moon Ways of the Heart, which had been precisely identical to begin with, now found themselves at odds over a man who couldn’t show his face. Now, as if they had been stimulated by the activity in the Xuanyin Mountains, all the Xiang family members with Ways of the Heart of common origin were being pushed and pulled by two ideas: one side was saying that Xuanwu was an evil cultivator who could not be tolerated by heaven’s law; the other side was saying that the Sanyue Mountains were rudderless, and the foundation of the spiritual mountains was of greater importance.

An ascended spirit might just about manage to steady their mind, but an established foundation—particularly those cultivators who had established foundations by relying on elixirs and their wives—couldn’t very well stand up to questioning to begin with. Each and every one was torn this way and that in bizarre ways; the middle and lower levels of the West Peak turned into a disaster area.

At the manor of the “third-rate imperial grandson” where Xu Rucheng and his colleagues were concealed, several mutually contradictory orders arrived early in the morning: now they wanted them to seal the doors and windows and let no one in or out, now they said they wanted them to temporarily withdraw from the Sanyue Mountains and get in touch with family in the mortal world as soon as possible to prepare for war. They didn’t know whether they were supposed to move or not.

The Silver Moon was like a pendulum that needed its spring tightened, wavering between the East and Central Peaks.

Xu Rucheng was in the courtyard, watching with his head raised. He heard a young maid come running in a panic to report that the imperial grandson had fainted yet again and to ask her ladyship what to do.

“Her ladyship,” without so much as batting an eyelash, perfunctorily said, “Oh, then give him some medicine.”

Because of the Luwu’s secret machinations, after eight years, the third-rate imperial grandson was still a mortal. He had gone from a youthful chronic invalid sprout to a middle-aged chronic invalid...barrel, and he had picked up a “wife-fearing disease”—it wasn’t that he was afraid of being under his wife’s thumb; it was that as soon as he saw his wife, he would act like he had seen a ghost; his calf muscles would start twitching from three zhang away. Saying a few words could make him pass out on the spot. At first it was only his own wife he had feared; later the scope had increased—his scalp would go numb whenever he saw a woman.

But there was nothing to be done. Over the years, Yu Family Bend had declined, Prince Qing Manor had lost power, and the third-rate imperial grandson had been increasingly excluded in the inner sect, relying entirely on the support of his wife. Having developed such a shameful problem, he didn't dare to make it public. In recent years, his health had been constantly deteriorating; soon he would kick the bucket. Xu Rucheng and his colleagues had initially been discussing whether they would be able to find another equally suitable identity for infiltrating the Sanyue Mountains once they became "widows."

Though under the circumstances, it looked like their anxiety had been superfluous; the Sanyue Mountains might not outlive the third-rate imperial grandson.

While Sanyue's spiritual energy had been draining away year by year, for the impoverished Kaiming Cultivators, it was still notably plentiful. Apart from Xu Rucheng, who no longer had a family to worry about, the other Luwu would periodically be relieved of duty so they could rest and visit family. When they came back, all of them said that being in the Sanyue Mountains for one year, you advanced faster than through ten years of diligent cultivation in the human world. Even a punching bag like the third-rate grandson could live in luxury, immune to winter cold and summer heat. This assignment, which had once been absurd and dangerous, had turned into a “cushy job” that all their colleagues envied.

Xu Rucheng suddenly thought, So this is what it means to be “noble.”

But the nobles who usually passed judgment on the world were all as jumpy as startled cats and dogs; how were they superior to commoners?

All of a sudden, all the birds in Sanyue’s valleys rose in alarm. The inscriptions at the boundaries of the great mountain array lit up like the tide coming in. Everyone’s spiritual senses pushed them to turn their heads to look east—at this critical moment, Xuanwu had returned to the Sanyue Mountains.

The great mountain array also seemed to be subject to a tug of war between two forces. As if it had a faulty connection, it was flickering on and off. The Silver Moon swept truculently toward Xuanwu. The fatal moonlight broke off midway, only snapping Xuanwu’s hairband. His head of white hair and his white clothes fluttered in the fierce wind. There seemed to be blood staining his hems and his paper mask.

Xuanwu spoke. His voice reverberated throughout the Sanyue Mountains. “All you rebels! You have sealed Dongheng City and locked the emperor’s quarters under the guise of protecting him. This is treason. You wish to depose the emperor and enthrone another. This is a conspiracy against the state!”

Xu Rucheng’s ears rang from his speech. He quickly shot his colleagues a look. The information was immediately transmitted to all the Luwu in Tao County. At the same time, the North Xia Waterborne Troops who nominally had jurisdiction over Tao County also received orders, saying that their former superior the Marquis of Qulong was conspiring against the state and ordering them to temporarily place themselves under the charge of the Qilin Guard outside of Tao County, remain where they were, and obey orders.

Zhao Qindan was doing two things at once. With a cartridge clip between her teeth, she was examining a hand cannon while glancing over complicated accounts, calculating how much goods and materials they would need once Tao County came under siege.

Just then, there was a noise from the gate of her small, secluded house. The newcomer very elegantly knocked three times, neither soft nor loud.

Zhao Qindan froze—all the Luwu contacted her through the reincarnation wood and very rarely came to knock at her door. The female students from the neighborhood were very familiar with her, sometimes even coming in without asking; when they knocked, it didn't sound like this.

She had been born with a first-class spiritual sense and was unusually sensitive. She grasped the hand cannon. When she opened the gate, she saw the red-eyed Yu Chang standing there.

Though she knew perfectly well that in Tao County, where the use of spiritual energy was prohibited, there was no difference between an ascended spirit and a mortal, her spine still tensed inadvertently.

In Southern Shu—

Lin Chi's fireworks had nearly been pushed up to the moon and stars by the ascended spirit peak masters. Across the South Sea, there were even some places in Southern Shu where they were visible.

For some reason, as if these fireworks were sentient, they could provoke different emotions in different people: they had made the people of Wan stupidly happy and made Western Chu restless, and they ignited the long-suppressed grief and indignation of the ancient clan of Southern Shu.

The Miah owner of a butcher's shop had been huddled deferentially in a corner, allowing the Xiuyi government officer to close down the little shop his whole family's survival relied on. When the fireworks suddenly snatched away the dawn light, the hired thugs and the beasts of burden alike were stunned. One of the Xiuyi officers had gotten a stiff neck from sleeping the night before; he watched with his neck twisted for a long moment. When he came back to his senses, he nearly pulled a muscle in his shoulder. Lowering his head, he saw the shop owner's little Miah cur imitating his crooked-necked stance.

This Miah child was just at the age to start growing permanent teeth. He didn't understand anything. When he was discovered, he stuck out his tongue, wanting to cutely show his gap-toothed smile like he usually did with adults. He was immediately picked up by the Xiuyi officer, who out of nowhere was enraged, and flung heavily against the wall.

The grey-eyed boy didn't even have time to scream. His head twisted, and he stopped moving. His aproned father still held a boning knife.

The butcher shop's owner stood there blankly for a long time. Then he gave a sudden roar and threw himself at that Xiuyi officer.

Once the first drop of blood had fallen in the conflict between the two clans, it couldn't be taken back.

The Miah on Southern Shu's peninsula lacked manpower and resources. Ultimately, their sparks of resistance couldn't connect to form a fire and set the fields ablaze. Instead, they only enraged the Xiuyi.

Starting from a small town eighty li from the imperial capital of Zhaoye, an indiscriminate hunt aimed at the Miah began.

Like the fireworks exploding in the distance, the unprecedented massacre quickly engulfed the whole of the Southern Shu peninsula, then spread to the Three Islands.

The Miah cultivators, unable to find Wangge Luobao, were scattered throughout the South Sea like headless flies. They contacted their families by a variety of means. Learning of the grievous news, they immediately rushed back from all points.

The Miah cultivators killed the first group of officers sent to the Three Islands by the court. The bloody conflict among the mortals was formally escalated to the immortal sect. The Xiuyi peace faction and the Miah officials, which had been striving all along to maintain the bond between the two clans, were powerless to turn back the tide of events.

Heartrending beast-controlling whistles reverberated throughout the South Sea. The two clans' Dragon Subduing Knights thoroughly fell out. The smell of blood billowed in the spiritual energy in the sky over the strait. And the originator of all of this—Wangge Luobao—was in the mouth of the next life spiritual fish, whistling a tune and quietly watching.

He was of mixed Xiuyi and Miah blood and seemed to have picked up the best blessings of both clans, both tall and beautiful. Now, watching half of his people slaughtering the other half, Wangge Luobao, unmoved, leaned his head against his hand, still waiting for the opportune moment to appear—when the fight between the cultivators on both sides became incandescent, Lingyun's inner sect sent even stronger individuals, and the Miah were at their most despairing, that would be the moment for the “savior” to appear.

Otherwise, a person of mixed blood couldn't make the old farts on the Miah's Three Islands hold their tongues.

In the hidden realm deep at the bottom of the South Sea, the spiritual beasts seemed to have sensed something. They faced north and let out sad cries.

In the hidden realm, the arrays to protect against incursion by spiritual beasts and lookout posts were basically complete. Today had been too unusual. Wei Chengxiang couldn't rest, so she was personally standing guard at a sentry post, uneasily turning over the Silver Tray Lottery's dice with her fingertips. Zhao Qindan, toilet bulletins from all over, the Land of Turmoil... All kinds of information flew at her like snowflakes.

Suddenly, a piece of news from the Land of Turmoil made Wei Chengxiang's gaze pause. She quickly snatched up her reincarnation wood to contact Tai Sui. There was no answer from Xi Ping at the moment, so she turned to Zhao Qindan.

“Dandan, I have a piece of news here, coming from the Land of Turmoil, source unknown...”

Zhao Qindan had no attention to spare to answer. She heard Yu Chang say, “Xuanwu has just returned. As soon as he landed, he went into battle with the ascended spirits of the Central Peak who belong to other families. The Xiang clan has currently split into two parties, one standing with Xuanwu, the other advocating the position that Xuanwu is an evil cultivator, and that expelling evil should be put before internal affairs. Right now, the three groups are locked in battle. The beacons have been lit. All the heads of household are summoning their offerings. The offerings are burdened with spiritual image brands, they can't delay long. Will Tai Sui agree or not? I would like a definite answer.”

Zhao Qindan thought, How would I know? Therefore, as she fobbed him off and passed on responsibility, she furtively responded to Wei Chengxiang through the reincarnation wood: “The Land of Turmoil? What is it?”

Wei Chengxiang and Yu Chang’s voices came simultaneously to her ears—

Wei Chengxiang said, “They’re saying the Xuanyin Mountains are dying. General Zhi has hushed it up and is planning to cut the other spiritual mountains down with them.”

Yu Chang, smiling brightly, said, “Also, we just received word: the Xuanyin Mountains have been taken over by traitors. Within a century at most, their spiritual energy will disperse throughout the veins of the earth. When that time comes, the Xuanyin Mountains will no longer exist.”

His scarlet eyes were fixed on Zhao Qindan’s shocked gaze. “I wonder whether Tai Sui knows of this.”

Xi Ping was turning a deaf ear to the chatter of the Luwu everywhere. Completely focused, he finished Xi Yue’s new core. Then the array knife shattered, and the spiritual energy of Flying Jade Peak, carrying frost and snow, all surged toward Xi Yue.

In this vast spiritual wind, an ascended spirit could still remain motionless as a mountain. Xi Ping reached out to “clutch” the wind. A talisman flashed in his palm, immediately pinching the ferocious spiritual wind down to a trickle. The gale was warmed to nearly human body temperature as it passed through his palm and flowed sluggishly into Xi Yue’s injured meridians. When cold and heat met, mist rose around the two of them.

A full incense stick of time later, the foundation was established; sword energy formed in Xi Yue and tore through the mist with a whistle, surging toward the horizon.

Xi Ping reached out a hand to block it. When he moved, the water droplets hanging from his long brows and eyelashes fell. He clicked his tongue and took out a mustard seed that became a small house when it touched the ground, then put Xi Yue into it. “Watch where you’re shooting that. That’s all I’m capable of. The core array is complete. For the rest, he can go into seclusion to improve it when he wakes up.”

Zhi Xiu looked at him, frowning, and spoke with rare severity: “Don’t you deserve a beating?”

“Heh, that little whelp is still far from being able to beat me.” Xi Ping casually wiped his face, cocked an ear to listen briefly, then, rejoicing at others’ misfortunes, said, “Don’t mention that. Guess what, shifu? The good doesn't get past the gate, but the bad goes a thousand li—we may not have decades to a century anymore. Prepare to go to war.”

When Zhi Xiu had received Luo Qingshi's message, he had known that this matter couldn't be covered up. Therefore, he had already abandoned his illusions. “Someone has committed treason so soon? Who? Do you have any idea?”

“I saw some things when I was stewing Li Fengshan in the Unbound Furnace. I was interrupted by those blundering fools, but I can hazard a guess...” Xi Ping stood up and patted the snow off himself, then shouted into the sky: “San-ge, come down to the mortal world! My shizun requests the pleasure of your company!”

Zhi Xiu: “...”

Zhou Ying glanced toward the snow-capped mountain, then heard that jerk running his mouth again: “Yet another emperor in revolt! What's the matter with your family traditions? It's a disgrace! Just go ahead and switch to your mother's surname already!”

CHAPTER 189 - A Life of Regret (1)

Though the immortal sect had been turned upside down, the effects had yet to reach the mortal of Great Wan.

Apart from some burned plants, Guangyun Palace was already as good as new, but Emperor Jiahe, Zhou Huan, kept feeling that the bed beneath him was shaking. After Pang Jian had left, he had woken with a start twice, pursued by one confused dream after another. Now it was the cold eyes of his father, struck dead by heavenly lightning, and now it was his fourth younger brother Zhou Xi's bloodless face.

In this confusion, Zhou Xi's face changed into his own. He felt that he was like a corpse, lying all alone in a coffin. His imperial robes were embroidered with black dragons, identical to the dragon shadow that had nearly swallowed Jinping whole.

When the fireworks from the Xuanyin Mountains suddenly rose into the sky, Zhou Huan, on waking with a start, cried out "Father!" and sat up, cold sweat soaking his inner robe. When he was finished watching the "show," he found himself huddled at the foot of the bed like a nervous bird.

There came the sound of urgent footsteps. Zhou Huan came back to his senses, and nameless anger rose in his heart. He threw his jade pillow at the eunuch who came in at a trot. “It is forbidden to run in Zihuan Palace, haven’t you learned the rules?!”

A corner of the jade pillow broke off when it hit the ground. The eunuch fell to his knees in the doorway with a thud. “Y-your Majesty, come look, quickly!”

The court assembly was canceled that day. Accompanied by the rising sun, Zhou Huan’s wide sleeves raised a wind as he walked.

He seemed to want to run headlong, but the fastest part of his body was from the neck up. He gave off the powerlessness and obsolescence of something that had been left behind by the passage of time.

Emperor Jiahe had ascended the throne fourteen years ago. Among mortals, he was in fact no longer young. Had he been one of the herb gatherers of Western Chu, he might have reincarnated twice if he’d been in a hurry. But for a noble who had never missed a dose of low-grade elixirs, the early forties were the good days, when one had grown to full maturity and could begin to make waves. He had rather rushed ahead into elderliness.

Zhou Huan’s belly was substantial, but his cheeks were so sunken in they looked emaciated. He had once had the serene eyes peculiar to the Zhou family—turned neither up nor down, the inner and outer corners of the eyes practically on a level, of moderate size. But now it seemed they could no longer hold themselves up; his eyeballs protruded more and more, making his eyes larger and larger, and the outer corners had begun to droop. The countenance that had been kindly in his youth had become pathetic. His eyelids, so thin they were translucent, couldn't shield his panicked gaze.

He burst almost disheveled into Changming Palace—the residence of the Empress Dowager.

There was deathly silence in Changming Palace. Eunuchs knelt everywhere. Sweat flowed at the temples of the imperial physicians bustling in and out. Empress Yao, who had arrived a step ahead of him, didn't even dare to raise her head.

The phoenix head that automatically watered the plants in the courtyard activated just then. Under the horrified gazes of the young palace maids, the gears unscrewed the stopper and sprayed water all over the emperor as he charged in.

Ice-cold droplets fell on Zhou Huan's face. He ignored them. Eyes fixed straight ahead, he rushed through slender rainbows into the empress dowager's sleeping quarters. He saw an emaciated hand hanging down beneath a heavy screen, with inauspicious purple-black on the nails.

Zhou Huan shook. For a moment, he nearly lost consciousness. Many people stepped forward to hold him up all at once and call out nonsense like “May His Majesty’s health be preserved.” Empress Yao only cried.

Zhou Huan flung off the eunuchs, gathered all his scant courage, and haltingly walked in. He saw Empress Dowager Zhang with her eyes wide open, her chest heaving violently, like a combustion cylinder about to explode.

His legs went weak, and he went to his knees beside the bed.

Fourteen years ago, when Zhou Huan had fearfully ascended the throne, he had legitimately welcomed back his mother, who had spent the better part of her life in the cold palace.

Everyone said he was kind and benevolent, that he had ushered in a prosperous period of goodness and peace, sweeping away the chronic diseases of prior regimes. Only Zhou Huan himself was perfectly well aware that it was his renowned tyrant of a father who had swept away the chronic diseases. The new policies had been left to him ready-made by his predecessor, who had been unable to realize them. Since succeeding to the throne, from the major issues of disaster relief and road repairs to the minor ones of the imperial household's expenses, he had never made a single decision of his own.

“Mother, Mother...” This “orphan” of over forty helplessly clutched at her sleeve. “Mother...what have you done? I don't understand, what's wrong...?”

Empress Dowager Zhang had suffered a “sudden acute illness” early in the morning—no one dared to say she had been poisoned, having consumed a poisonous gas made by a master. It was very valuable. It couldn't be detected by the spiritual sense of a cultivator below an ascended spirit. If a mortal breathed in a single drop, all remedies would be useless. The imperial physicians were all bustling for nothing.

No one could have access to such a thing without having once belonged to a big family.

“Out...everyone out...”

Empress Yao made out what she was muttering and quickly stood to dismiss all the attendants. On tip-toe, she returned to kneel at Zhou Huan's feet. Through sobs, she whispered, “Mother...Mother ordered me to send a letter to Ziming in the southern mines, I...I sent it according to her orders, and when I looked back, she had...”

The empress's younger brother by a concubine, Yao Qi, had spent a whole year tormenting and being tormented by Luo Qingshi in the Latent Cultivation Temple, each leaving the other with unending trauma—one's Way of the Heart had nearly exploded from anger, and the other to this day felt ill whenever he saw a boy of similar stature to Luo Qingshi. Yao Qi had opened his spiritual eyes in the final days before the Latent Cultivation Temple was about to shut its gates. After leaving the mountains, he had gone to do odd jobs in the southern mines.

In recent years, Zhou Huan's relationship with Empress Yao had been very distant. Looking at that woman, who had all the backbone of a lump of dough, he felt like he was looking into a mirror, despising her more the more he saw her. The empress was out of favor, and she made no waves. She spent all her time in Changming Palace joining Empress Dowager Zhang in her vegetarian meals, rarely having contact with outsiders. Hearing that she had sent a letter to the southern mines, an ominous premonition rose out of nowhere in Zhou Huan's heart. "What did the letter say? Show me!"

Empress Yao, trembling, presented the downgraded immortal tool she had used to contact Yao Qi. Zhou Huan snatched it away and read it rapidly. He went numb all over.

A shed skin had rebelled against the spiritual mountains...the end of the Xuanyin Mountains was near...less than a hundred years...immediately make an inventory of reserves in the southern mines...

The big clock in Changming Palace reached the hour just then and made a lengthy tolling, striking the ears like a death knell. Zhou Huan abruptly came back to his senses. His face ashen pale, he said with a forced smile, "This...this... Mother, this can't... How could you just send this kind of..."

Then he quickly leapt up and slapped Empress Yao, knocking her to the ground. "Stupid bitch! Whether it's true or not, how could you send vitally important information like this through a mass-produced downgraded immortal tool?! It's no different from printing it in a toilet bulletin and announcing it to the whole world! Are you trying to kill us?!"

Empress Yao's sharp cry made the people waiting outside think the empress dowager had passed. With a rustling, they all knelt.

Glance sweeping over the empress dowager's derisive eyes and purple lips, Zhou Huan suddenly realized something: this was wrong. Empress Yao might not understand, but his mother belonged to a noble family. How could she not know about the taboos of downgraded immortal tools? And why had she taken poison?

All these years, his mother had been in contact with the silent Li clan. They had occasionally had instructions for him, but they had never told him the whole story.

“Have you...done this on purpose?”

Empress Dowager Zhang could no longer speak. Zhou Huan crawled to her bedside, tears and snot falling, and shook her hand forcefully. “Mother, have you gone mad? What the hell were you thinking? What am I supposed to do? What will I...”

Holding up her spasming eyelids, Empress Dowager Zhang laboriously focused on Zhou Huan’s blurred form. She simply couldn’t tell the sounds of these two wailing “Mother” apart; they were truly a perfect match.

“How strange,” she thought, “this is actually mine and Zhou Kun’s son. What went wrong?”

The roots of the Zhang family weren’t as deep as those of the four big clans, but its descendants had worked hard; many able officials had come out of it, and they had intermarried with Xuanyin’s Li clan for hundreds of years, tying them inextricably together. Before, practically every generation had had a direct descendant receive a selection card. There were thirteen members of the Zhang family in the inner sect, the one with the highest cultivation among them already a near-ascended spirit, merely a step away from becoming a peak master. Once they stepped over that pass, the Zhang family could say it had “immortal roots.”

And in Heaven’s Design Pavilion and the southern mines, the family’s members were innumerable. During each New Year celebration, the family would open up a small hall where blue-clothed “divinities” would descend from the sky.

