Empress Dowager Zhang’s disposition had been impetuous and unyielding in her youth. She was never willing to be left behind. She studied literary and martial arts and spent all her free time in company with spiritual stones, striving to develop her spiritual sense, never taking part in the dull poetry gatherings and flower festivals of Jinping’s noble young ladies. She had left her mediocre older brother in the dust, dreaming that one day she too could wear the blue clothes.

But in that class, though the Zhang family spared no effort in the struggle, in the end they obtained only one spot in the quota for selection cards. It would truly have been a waste to give it to a daughter without any special talents; better to use her for a marriage alliance with another family, to widen the pathway for future generations.

When people were trampled by irresistible powers, they often had two types of reactions: either they would raise their weak mantis arms in indignation and resist, even if it meant dying under the trundling wheels; or they would climb into the carriage trampling them, grit their teeth and carve themselves into a totem to leave behind, then pledge their life to safeguarding that totem—to getting justice for all they had been forced to accept and all they had suffered.

The strong-minded Empress Dowager Zhang belonged to the latter type.

When the Grand Selection Year passed, she had a fit of crying, waved goodbye to her high-spirited youth, and entered into an engagement with Zhou Kun, who had just sent off his last loved one.

At the time, Emperor Taiming had not yet become a scheming old lunatic. His family had buried the older brother he had depended on, the immortal mountains had snatched away the sister who had been his companion since childhood, his mother was in the ground, his father was on the memorial altar. He was alone, angry, and confused. As if grasping at a life-saving straw, he mistakenly set all his hopes on his first wife.

And the two of them had gone through a period of extremely sincere feelings. When passion was at its headiest, they had even thought they could be a pair forever.

Sadly, they hadn't chanced upon good times.

At the time, with Rosy Cloud Peak unexpectedly gaining a master, Xuanyin's thirty-six inner sect peaks were nearly all taken. All the sect's families were as tightly wound as could be. Each Grand Selection class was a silent fight at close quarters; it had also influenced the state of affairs at court. The Li and Zhang contingent were aggressive, the Zhao and Lin clans wouldn't budge, and Zhou Kun was naturally iron-willed and resolute. The internal strife in the inner sect and in the mortal world grew fiercer and fiercer. Empress Dowager Zhang was caught in the middle, wavering between her husband and her family. The hostility between emperor and empress grew stronger and stronger.

By the time Zhou Kun deliberately provoked a disaster, bringing the conflict between the Li and Zhao clans to the forefront in the mortal world, husband and wife were hardly on speaking terms. The harem was full of blooming flowers; the "happy news" of one pregnancy after another was announced. She reached the end of her endurance. All kinds of tactics had been unsuccessful. She nearly set aside her pride and went to him to ask for a reconciliation.

But fate makes fools of people. Just then, the "sky" above the Li family's heads in the inner sect fell.

The power of the once flourishing Li clan fell like a mountain. For all its future generations, those related by marriage, and close friends—countless people who had formerly been “superior”—the path to immortality was forever severed.

Empress Dowager Zhang’s family was tied up in it. At the final juncture, she chose to be the Zhang family’s daughter, not Great Wan’s empress. She illicitly leaked information to her clan, having no idea that Zhou Kun was prepared. He personally shot down the messenger she had sent to her family at the gates of Guangyun Palace. Her family members were either put to death or sent into distant exile with no hope of return.

The power of the Li and Zhang bloodline in court had been practically pulled up by the roots. After this, the empress spent half her life in company with the oil lamps of the cold palace.

She was a person like a phoenix, who had longed to question heaven and earth. She had come together with Zhou Kun because of family and nation, and she had come to this dead end because of family and nation. She had never paid any attention to the irrelevant trifles in the harem. Zhou Kun had always thought that apart from Lady Lin, she hadn’t even had a clear look at any of the consorts or concubines. She didn’t have such small-minded thoughts.

No one knew that her first time seeing Lady Xi, she had been scorched into a panic by Xi Ziyi's beauty. Learning that Lady Xi was related to Cui Ji, she had immediately awarded her favorite pearls and hairpins from when she had been a girl to her servants.

Out of jealousy, Empress Dowager Zhang had even committed the single pointless "folly" of her life—she had placed a "bewitchment" she had coincidentally obtained in her youth onto a palace maid named Xiao Song, whom that country girl Lady Xi had brought into the palace.

The bewitchment was normally useless, and Empress Dowager Zhang felt it was beneath her to use this little trick to harm others. Even if a master had come along, they wouldn't have noticed anything wrong with that palace maid. Only on the night of the full moon could she activate it. On every full moon night, holding the corresponding "dreaming pearl," she could see some of the daily trifles happening in Yuying Palace through the maid's dreams.

She had only...wanted to see whether he really would be enchanted by that beauty.

After placing the bewitchment, she instantly regretted it, feeling that it was conduct unworthy of her position. That was just when her family was toppled. She had no time to attend to children or relationships. In a flash, she had forgotten about that act of petty jealousy.

When she once again recalled it, everything had changed.

Living in the cold palace alone, in what mood did she sneak into Xiao Song's dreams? Hard to say. Perhaps she only wanted to compound her suffering. When one has nothing, suffering is also pleasure... But unexpectedly, from that insignificant vase Lady Xi, she discovered something tremendous.

It turned out that into every generation of the Zhou family was born an unknown possessor of natural spiritual bones, and this generation's natural spiritual bones had somehow chosen to reincarnate in Lady Xi's womb.

The palace maid Xiao Song was the most handy of Lady Xi's servants. In the years immediately after the third prince was born, she was the one who always looked after him. Through her, a pair of surprised and horrified eyes saw Zhou Ying, and glimpsed from that sinful boy a corner of the Zhou family's eight centuries of secrets.

As the Crown Prince Zhou Huan grew up, she at last used this incompetent son to contact the Li and Zhang families. There were still a few people around the edges of the southern mines who were relatives of the former Zhang family. As she cautiously observed Zhou Ying, she sent the information out, investigating along with her family the circumstances behind the Zhou family using the spiritual bones of their children as sacrifices. They pieced together an appalling truth... Then, in that year, all those with Ways of the Heart of common origin that could be traced back to the Dignitary of Code Li Fengshan received a “heavenly edict.”

Everyone was excited to the point of tears, thinking that heaven had at last opened its eyes and was prepared to set things to rights.

In that moment, Empress Dowager Zhang believed that she was carrying the weight of a sacred duty and heaven’s will on her shoulders.

Zhou Ying was fifteen years old then. He brought up wanting to leave the palace early to establish his own household. Empress Dowager Zhang didn’t know what he was up to. That fiend seemed to have reincarnated with the memories of some demon. He had always been strange. Looking at him too long was chilling. If he were allowed to leave Guangyun Palace, it would be hard to spy on him in the future.

So they determined to act that year. After long observation, they chose Liang Chen—a miserable wretch whose Way of the Heart had preceded his spiritual bones, who believed with all his heart that he was acting for the good of the nation and the people.

The heavenly edict said that the Southern Sage had sealed the Territory Map in the veins of the earth, which even Zhao Yin didn't know. Only a person who inherited an ancient demonic god's accompanying plant could reach into the Territory Map and become a living Territory Map rubbing, aid them in obtaining control over the Territory Map and take back the Xuanyin Mountains.

Those people had severed their path to immortality. Unless they struck at the roots, they would never be able to free themselves.

But the earthquake in the Resurrection Vortex alerted the Zhou family. Princess Anyang, Zhou Qing, took charge; the remaining agents planted in the southern mines were cleaned up. Something went wrong with that good-for-nothing Liang Chen; he didn't manage to digest the ancient demonic god's inheritance in eight years, and he was nearly killed by the hidden bones. In his haste, he revealed himself ahead of schedule, and everything immediately slid in an incalculable direction: the Impassable Sea scheme failed, Zhou Kun died, and then came the fall of the Zhao family...

Immortals and mortals alike seemed to have been caught in an accelerating vortex.

It turned out that while the stars could be deceived, destiny wasn't up to humans.

Now, it was all over.

Just then, two black-clothed people appeared out of nowhere like steam in the Empress Dowager's sleeping quarters and picked up the limp Zhou Huan. "Your Majesty, the Empress Dowager has ordered us to conduct you safely away from the palace."

"No, I... Mother..."

Empress Dowager Zhang's gaze was becoming dimmer and dimmer. She struggled to smile at her newly arrived family members. Idiot, the heavenly edict was forced to speak and then suddenly fell silent. It must be that Zhi Xiu has already received word. The game is as good as lost. The Territory Map and the dragon shadow reappeared under his nose; what happened in the past can no longer be hidden. If you let them find their footing, you won't survive.

"Mother! Moth..."

First it was sight, then hearing. She could no longer hear Zhou Huan's raucous voice, either. In a daze, Empress Dowager Zhang seemed to return to her girlhood, when her engagement had just been fixed. Zhou Kun, who had still been Crown Prince then, had snuck out of the palace to see her. When he was discovered by the master being kept by the Zhang family, he didn't hide; he openly offered up a letter. But when he bent his head, his ears were red.

The letter started out written as formally as a memorial to the throne, but further on, he called her "Yunying," and further still, there were fallen flowers from Jinping's four seasons folded into the letter paper... Where had they all gone?

Oh, yes.

Her hand dropped.

Forty years ago, they had turned to ashes in the cold palace's furnace.

CHAPTER 190 - A Life of Regret (2)

“Diehard supporters of the Li family, with the opportunity to come into contact with palace secrets, who may have unearthed the connection between Liang Chen and the Zhou family. Considering all that, they must actually belong to the Li family,” Xi Ping said.

There had in fact been a good number of concubines and consorts who had fallen due to their connection of the Li family, but they were all dead without issue—there were those who hadn’t had any children to begin with, and those whose children had been scared into early deaths by their mothers’ fates.

There was only Empress Dowager Zhang, who had spent the better part of her life in the cold palace, yet had strangely maintained her position. As soon as her son had inherited the throne, she had once again risen to prominence.

“Actually, now that I mention it, I’ve always wondered—why did the late emperor not kill her, out of all of them?”

Amid the wintry winds and fresh snow of Flying Jade Peak, Zhi Xiu had once again erected the little house that could easily be crushed by the weight of snow and set it beside the place where Xi Yue was resting.

The outer shell had been casually thrown together, and the inside was a mustard seed. Inside the mustard seed, there was neither time nor season. After all these years, there had been absolutely no change to the complete set of furnishings. The teapot even seemed to still be warm.

Xi Ping familiarly poked the dying fire a couple times, rooted around in the wooden cabinet next to the fire, and, as he'd expected, turned up a handful of elderly fourteen-year-old chestnuts. They were pretty fresh, so he buried the chestnuts in the sparking embers, then sat down on the ground to recite the lines of a brigand and traitor on stage.

“We’ve got the Xuanyin Mountains in our clutches, anyway, and there’s the Territory Map. If Lao Pang really can’t keep his subordinates in Heaven’s Design Pavilion under control, we can always prohibit spiritual energy throughout the country. So, if it were me, and I wanted to get the news out as quickly and directly as possible, I’d definitely contact the southern mines in the Land of Turmoil—who’ve they got in the southern mines from that group?”

Zhou Ying didn’t take issue with his manners. He stepped over his outstretched legs and answered, “Yao Ziming.”

Hearing this, Xi Ping frowned. “The empress’s little brother? Where’s their father, Lord Yao? Why isn’t he looking after them?”

No wonder.

When he was young, Xi Ping had heard all kinds of fantastic anecdotes about the grand scribe Lord Yao and had thought that there was something a little wrong with that long-faced old gentleman’s head, always thinking people were out to get him. Now, at his current age, he was finally learning that Lord Yao hadn’t been paranoid; there was method to what elders did—had the Zhang family not lost power, with Empress Yao’s background, she wouldn’t have been able to marry Zhou Huan even in her dreams.

Climbing to that “high branch” had in fact not been a stroke of good fortune for the Yao family. Had it been His Third Highness who had succeeded to the throne, with the Crown Prince deposed and unable to achieve his ambitions, that would have been one thing; failing that, these nominal in-laws were in reality a disgrace to the Zhang family. How could a person not quake with terror?

Not only would the old nobility not take them seriously, they were probably harboring hidden malice in their hearts.

And the Yao family sister and brother were actually still mixing with them. Truly, with their father gone, there was no one sensible left to mind them.

Xi Ping considered, then extended his hand to put together a Heavenly Question. A beam of spiritual energy formed into the two wild cursive words “run now” and sent them south... Whether he listened to it or not would depend on Yao Qi’s fortune.

Zhi Xiu’s consciousness swept through the Xuanyin Mountain Range. He confirmed that the Latent Cultivation Temple’s Su Zhun, Luo Qingshi, and other stewards had not been fatally injured; forced the established foundations affected by the “heavenly edict” into meditation, making them calm down; made arrangements for the disciples who hadn’t established foundations yet; repaired the main hall on the Principal Peak; then inquired about the status of the damage to Moon Plated Peak.

Only when he was finished with these trifles did he go inside. Right away, he saw his rebellious disciple’s undignified sprawl on the ground, and the corner of his eye twitched faintly—Zhi Xiu was normally quite casual himself, but however you looked at it, there was still an outsider and guest present. Passing by Xi Ping, he calmly gave him a kick. “Serve tea.”

Xi Ping didn’t budge. “Shifu, our tea leaves are from the previous reign. They’ve nearly developed intelligence. It would be cruel to drink them.”

Zhi Xiu: "..."

You sure can talk.

"There's plenty of Flying Jade Peak's 'magic frozen dew' to go around. Anyone who's thirsty can just go out and scoop up a ladleful. Why should I serve tea? It's a needless formality invented by fools to keep from being embarrassed when they have nothing to say to each other after the pleasantries have been exchanged, a way to give both the host and the guest a chance to work out what to talk about next. Who actually cares about drinking tea?" Idly, Xi Ping said, "Your Highness Prince Zhuang, can a cultivator of the way of clarity feel embarrassed?"

Call him "san-ge," Zhou Ying would nod calmly; call him "Your Highness Prince Zhuang," there also seemed to be no particular reaction from him.

Zhou Ying glanced at Xi Ping, ignored the faint provocation in his words, and, turning to Zhi Xiu, said, "What are your instructions, General Zhi?"

"I wouldn't presume to instruct you," Zhi Xiu said politely. "It is only that I cultivate the way of the sword and am unlearned in many areas. I inspected Jinping earlier and saw that the Empress Dowager has committed suicide.

Guangyun Palace is in disarray, and someone has used some secret means that have made me unable to determine His Majesty's location.”

“Let the palace be in disarray. There is no need for you to be concerned about the people's welfare, General Zhi.” Zhou Ying knew what he was worried about. “The influence of the noble families has crumbled in recent years. The six ministries have been restructured, the Ministry of Works divided up into ever smaller components. Public roadways, mining affairs, the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragons, the canals, industry and commerce all have their own systems. They have no need to request instructions from Jinping in every detail. As long as there is a sufficient supply of spiritual stones, the various Kaiming Departments will look after internal affairs. They are up to dealing with matters for some time. If there are individual large matters that are hard to resolve, Xuanyin Mountain can simply go around Guangyun Palace and transmit orders to the Kaiming Department and Heaven's Design Pavilion. Rest assured, there won't be many such issues.”

Xi Ping interjected: “Though it makes no difference whether he's there or not...are we really going to let him run off like this?”

Zhou Ying nodded. “He is only a mortal, and no matter what, his surname is still Zhou. With the Empress Dowager dead, at most the Li family remnants will let him live. They won't make much of him. Even heaven will leave a gleam of hope for survival. Indiscriminate killing is inauspicious."

"Your Highness," said Xi Ping, "would you care to have a go at translating that into human speech?"

Zhi Xiu felt that his manner was becoming more and more disgraceful. "Shiyong."

Xi Ping made a thoroughly insincere gesture of sewing his mouth shut.

Zhou Ying extended a hand, which turned into mist that dispersed invisibly and intangibly in the air. Before anyone could take a close look, with a wave of his long sleeve, the hand was once again restored whole and unharmed to its original position. "This is the power that comes with my spiritual bones. Any part of my body can turn into mist and disappear. I hardly used it before, so few people will be on guard against it. I had an audience with the emperor before going to the spiritual mountains and left one of my hairs on His Majesty's person. Given Zhou Huan's character, the mastermind behind all of this must be Empress Dowager Zhang. If we capture him, it would hardly be suitable to punish him. It would be better to be lenient, use him to scope out the movements of the Li family remnants."

Zhou Ying was perhaps the only weirdo cultivator in the world who would ride in a car to go the two steps between Prince Zhuang Manor and the Yongning Marquis Manor. Even Xi Ping often forgot that he could fly a sword and had his own power. Curiously, he said, “A hair? Where did you put it? Won’t it fall off? Won’t they take it off him?”

“I don’t suppose so,” Zhou Ying said rather cautiously after considering it. “It would be normal for them to change his clothes while on the run, but it isn’t very likely that they would shave his head—I planted that hair in His Majesty’s own scalp.”

Xi Ping: “...”

Zhi Xiu: “...”

Neither the shed skin who understood only the sword nor his disciple who understood everything but the sword had ever heard the likes of this. They were both rendered speechless.

Xi Ping said, “No wonder Zhuoming was always longing for you, san-ge. If you hadn’t entered the way of clarity, perhaps you could have founded your own ‘way of saving the bald.’”

“Xi Shiyong!” said Zhi Xiu.

Xi Ping put on a proper smile. “It’s not like cultivators of the way of clarity get angry. San-ge isn’t about to sink to my level, right?”

He wanted to see where the limits of “feeling neither joy nor anger” lay.

Zhi Xiu sighed and pretended not to notice the delicate hostility between the two brothers. He only asked, “Have you known all along, Your Highness?”

“I guessed some of it,” Zhou Ying said. “The Li clan has been Great Wan’s foremost family since ancient times, a many-legged insect whose legs would outlive the death of the body. What’s more, the Xuanyin Mountains being a place that insists on keeping face, they kept the majority of their peak masters. They didn’t kill them all off. I knew that the family had always been waiting for an opportunity to stage their comeback, but I didn’t know that they had been acting under the direction of the ‘heavenly edicts’ of the Ways of the Heart of common origin since Li Fengshan’s death—had the Unbound Furnace not burned the star stones at the bottom of the Sea of Stars, I’m afraid I wouldn’t even be able to speak the words ‘Ways of the Heart of common origin’ now.”

With Zhi Xiu’s cultivation level, he could see the demon eyes hidden in his eyes. “But there are still many things you cannot say.”

“Yes, those that have yet to be tracked back to the source,” Zhou Ying said with a nod, not seeming at all in a rush. “Until the law has been broken, the seal cannot be removed.”

Zhi Xiu scrutinized him briefly, then suddenly said, “Your Highness, a cultivator’s vital power will ordinarily mature as their spiritual bones mature, be inseparable from the cultivator’s background and experiences. But once they accept another’s Way of the Heart upon establishing a foundation—especially a Way of the Heart that differs rather significantly from their own personality—the vital power they had during the open-eyed stage will fade as their cultivation progresses, and their vital weapon will also change to match their predecessor’s.”

Xi Ping, who was taking chestnuts out of the fire, froze. A chestnut covered in sparks burned a hole in the cuff of his sleeve.

Zhi Xiu said, “But from what you say, your vital power has not only not faded, it has instead become stronger than before you established a foundation.”

Zhou Ying nodded. “That is correct.”

Zhi Xiu said gravely, “Your Highness’s method of cultivating the way of clarity is very special.”

“I am acting according to my inclinations, letting nature take its course,” said Zhou Ying.

Zhi Xiu was silent for a moment, then said with a bitter smile, “In the present chaos, only a cultivator of the way of clarity can follow his inclinations. Since the information has already leaked, sooner or later it will spread throughout the four nations. What will come will come. Disorder is everywhere on the southern continent. Everyone has their own difficulties. We can let that go. What I am most concerned about now is Northern Li. Luckily, Northern Li has been unwilling to mix with the southern continent for many years. Even if the news reaches them, they will most likely only look on at first. They won’t necessarily react quickly.”

Splitting the continent in two along the Slumbering Dragon Sea and the Hong River, the area of the northern and southern halves of the continent was in fact about equal, but the southern continent was shared by four nations, while the northern continent had only the nation of Northern Li.

The southern half of Northern Li was mainly composed of plains and grasslands. There were mountains to the northwest, separating it from the boundless unpeopled snowfields. The Tianze River came from the snow-capped mountains; its lower reaches split into two big tributaries—the Hong and Xia Rivers. Northern Li was spacious and sparsely populated. The hard and barren earth was farmed with horses' hooves. The herdsmen at the feet of the Beijue Mountains still lived without a fixed residence according to ancient traditions.

The northerners only maintained a basic trade with the south, exchanging furs and crude farming products for cheap provisions and worthless manufactured goods. Kunlun's ninefold sword was unmatched under heaven. The inner sect and the outer sect, the latter called the Night Revenants, were made up of ninety percent sword cultivators. Even the evil cultivators were all specialty domestic products—common cultivators from outside didn't dare to enter at will without first getting in contact with someone to receive them. Moreover, sword cultivators' reliance on medicines and tools was low to begin with. The resources the spiritual mountains themselves produced were sufficient. They wouldn't go all the way to Southern Shu to buy them. Spiritual stones from the north rarely flowed outward.

In the centuries since Moon Plated Gold had come down to the mortal world, every nation had been turned on its head amidst the foul smoke: Southern Wan's workers had openly rebelled, the Kaiming Department had squeezed its way into the immortal sect, and now they had even misplaced their emperor; in Western Chu, stifled by the might of the Xiang family, all kinds of local despots had their own “offerings,” and, as soon as the Xiang family weakened, they had immediately shown their teeth and talons and prepared to pounce; even Southern Shu had accepted transnational Cloud Soaring Flood Dragons and toilet bulletins, thinking that everything of Wan manufacture was high quality, gradually growing more open-minded...even if the direction their minds opened in was a little oblique.

Only Northern Li had been unmoved from beginning to end. The common people lived lives of unchanging poverty at the feet of the Kunlun Mountains, not daring to think of what they had and did not have.

“Shifu, you’re thinking of allying with Northern Li, keeping them from meddling in the southern continent’s affairs.” Xi Ping left off his temper and frowned. “They’re very xenophobic there. I went there with some people a few times and couldn’t find a place to put down roots.”

Generally speaking, in a spacious and sparsely populated place, people occasionally coming across living creatures from other places would be very interested, so the people of Northern Li were famed for their forthright hospitality toward guests.

But “guests” were still “guests.” The Li people generally had broad foreheads and faces, and large builds; they could be told apart from southerners at a glance. Their language was also different. The Chu, Shu, and Wan languages all borrowed vocabulary from each other. Between Chu and Wan, there was even no need for translation; you could communicate by guesswork. But the Li language was a completely different matter. Without devoting several years of study to it, you wouldn't be able to understand that cackling.

Zhou Ying, however, interjected, "I actually have a connection. I've always been in contact, not with Kunlun, but with the Beijue Mountains' Blind Wolf King."

"The Perplexing Sword?" said Zhi Xiu.

Zhou Ying said, "The Blind Wolf King only left the Kunlun Mountains because his sword aura was incompatible. Though he is counted as an evil cultivator, his relationship to Kunlun's orthodoxy is nowhere near the mutual intolerance of orthodox and evil in other nations. His position has practically always been semi-public. If you trust me, General Zhi, I can take a trip, stay in contact through the reincarnation wood."

Xi Ping froze. "Huh? Me?"

Zhou Ying said, "There is a past friendship between the Blind Wolf King and the Marquis of Yongning. A branch of the Luwu use the Marquis as an intermediary. You wouldn't have understood it when you were younger, and the Marquis wouldn't have had time to bring it up with you. Since you can go back now, why do you not dare to stay a while at the Marquis Manor?"

Xi Ping's expression changed several times. Finally, with a smile that was asking for a beating, he said, "Well, isn't it the same as you not daring to go through the Marquis Manor's gates for five years back then?"

As before, Zhou Ying wasn't angered. He only nodded to him, seeming to imply "since you understand, I won't say any more." He looked away and said to Zhi Xiu, "The Kunlun Mountains are known as the most ancient spiritual mountains on earth, and Kunlun's sword cultivators have always considered themselves to be the descendants of the founder of the cultivation world. In fact, I would like to see what there is in the most ancient place. General Zhi, it will not be hard for me to persuade Northern Li to look on with folded arms; sword cultivators rarely regard other ways as worthwhile, and for the most part scorn to take part in this sort of fight—but there is one thing. During this period, you must not touch the southern mines in the Land of Turmoil."

Zhi Xiu frowned.

"Spiritual stones are the lifeblood of spiritual mountains. The southern mines are shared among the four nations. Northern Li has no border with the Land of Turmoil. They have always been sensitive about the southern mines,” Zhou Ying said. “I know you are preoccupied with the Land of Turmoil, but over two centuries have already passed. A little while longer won’t matter. Once you touch the southern mines, Kunlun’s Wanshuang will come south. You are not the world’s only shed skin sword cultivator.”

Zhi Xiu seemed to be squeezing something in his sleeve. After a long time, he sighed softly and said, “Thank you for the warning. I understand the priorities.”

The two of them had a brief deliberation. Without Xi Ping’s troublesome interruptions, it was very efficient—after all, the two of them weren’t well acquainted, and they didn’t especially like each other. There was nothing for them to chat about.

Zhou Ying then stood and bid farewell. At the door, as though he had sensed something, his consciousness probed the mustard seed he carried and saw that after a long silence, the box of notes that he had destroyed over half of had suddenly “come back to life” and spat out a new note for him. On it was written: If Xi Shiyong is impertinent, beat him.

Zhou Ying paused and assessed the situation briefly in light of this note: calling his older brother’s full name at the bottom of the Sea of Stars, mocking him for being unable to feel embarrassed and not speaking in words humans could understand, as well as planning out a “way of saving the bald” for him...

So he came to a conclusion: Xi Shiyong had been extremely rude.

Xi Ping, who was seeing him out, saw him come to a halt and thought he had recalled something, so he leaned sloppily against the doorframe. “What other instructions does Your Highness have? I can convey them.”

Zhou Ying glanced at him: his posture was very vulgar.

Therefore, he pointed at him.

Xi Ping said, “Me? What about...”

Before he could finish, a talisman hit him straight in the chest. Though Xi Ping was a major boundary above him, he had simply never expected this to happen. He took half a step back under the force of that blow, tripped over the threshold, and sat down on the ground.

Zhou Ying very objectively asserted the reasoning behind his attack: “You have been impertinent.”

Having said this, he nodded courteously, turned into mist, and disappeared.

CHAPTER 191 - A Life of Regret (3)

Xi Ping seemed to have broken his tailbone. He sat there blankly, not getting up for ages.

Zhou Ying was gone. As far as the eye could see, Flying Jade Peak was an unbroken field of white, without so much as a single footprint. In a single breath, you could breathe in three thousand freezing flowers; even his lungs were cold.

Truly lonely.

This was what Xi Ping thought as he sat on the threshold.

But at the same time, he could clearly sense the calm of the hidden bones:
Human events converge and dissipate. They are only a temporary clamor. Loneliness is the eternal norm of the universe. Mortals cling to life and fear death. Starting at birth, they are controlled and driven by all kinds of desires; wanting without having is bitter, and wanting and having is still bitter. Why be blinded by that uproar?

When he looked again at the boundless snowy mountain through these eyes, he instead felt carefree and happy, forgetting self and the world. Xi Ping knew that if he meditated now, there would be gains to his frame of mind.

But he didn't move. He only sat there single-mindedly pondering—there was a rather eccentric talisman he was thinking of; how did you draw it now?

First he slapped the ground. A somewhat awkward talisman raised the snow on the ground to the height of a person. It went wrong somewhere. The spiritual energy overflowed and scattered. The snow fell back.

“That doesn't seem right...” Xi Ping pressed on the center of his brow, scrutinized the talisman carefully, then tried changing a few places.

A breeze flitted by. The thick snow congealed into a snowman, his features and form identical to the living Zhou Ying. His whole body flashed with spiritual light.

Xi Ping gave a laugh. Before the snowman could find his footing, Xi Ping grabbed a clump of snow, jumped up, and threw it at the snowman. “I'll show you impertinent!”

The snow Zhou Ying stumbled when he was hit. But something else had gone wrong with a certain ascended spirit “master”'s talisman. When the snowman was attacked, not only did the talisman not disperse, it even drove the snowman to retaliate!

A snowball the size of a head flew straight at him. Xi Ping swore and dodged. The snowball hit General Zhi's little cottage so hard that it shook a few times.

Out of consideration for the fact that he would want to be alone, Zhi Xiu hadn't meant to disturb him. When he heard some noise, he only took it for Xi Ping venting his emotions. But the noise became more and more off. When he went out to look, he was astonished.

Flying Jade Peak had never been so lively: as if a market were being held on the slope, it was densely covered in moving, running snow people. Chunks of ice and snowballs flew everywhere in a chaotic battle. The snow people were separated into an unknown number of camps, hurling ice and snow at each other and sending each other flying head over heels. Hardly any of them had all their limbs intact. Even after losing their heads, they still battled ferociously.

The snow that had been untouched by signs of human life had been stamped full of potholes by the dismembered snow people. The prime culprit, a certain individual named Xi, had found a cape to block snow and rain somewhere and put it on. He was riding a sword, observing the battle from midair, occasionally jumping up and down to dodge several groups of besiegers. His hair was covered in ice. Seeming to think this still wasn't lively enough, he pursed his lips to whistle. Another dozen snow people formed from the snow and changed into the courtesans who had once contended with each other for beauty beside the Lingyang River. They began to sing and dance to boost morale.

There were few people on Flying Jade Peak, and there was a new shed skin. Since the mountain seal had been opened, it had drawn quite a few auspicious animals who didn't mind the cold to hide there for the sake of quiet. Now, the auspicious animals were all in midair, the "quiet" of the war on this mountain rendering them unable to land. When they saw Zhi Xiu, they began to curse and scold in chorus, accusing him of not keeping his evil disciple under control.

At his age, this was Zhi Xiu's first time being besieged and scolded by a flock of birds. Wishing he could find a hole to crawl into, he cupped his hands toward the auspicious animals in apology. "I am ashamed, I..."

Before he could finish, a tactless snowball came flying straight at him.

Naturally the snowball couldn't get him. It broke apart before it got close. Zhi Xiu took a deep breath and steadied his expression, then raised his head and "genially" asked, "Shiyong, what are you doing?"

Xi Ping answered, "Don't you think Flying Jade Peak is too quiet? We've just opened the mountain seal. I'm adding some ambience."

A vein jumped on Zhi Xiu's temple. "Don't you think this ambience is a little too grand... Xi Shiyong!"

The beautiful women made of snow who were going around boosting morale suddenly turned toward Zhi Xiu in a body. A dozen snowballs came flying toward him from all directions. Zhi Xiu's figure flashed, and he was elsewhere. The next moment, he landed right behind Xi Ping.

Xi Ping was no longer the little wretch he had once picked up one-handed in the Blissful Village. He had become a big wretch who had torn open the Impassable Sea, blown up the Sea of Stars, and caused havoc in the South Sea—he was unusually rich in experience when it came to being hunted. Without so much as turning his head, he switched places with a reincarnation wood tree that had just sprouted from the snow, sending a snow person flying with a headbutt. "Heh-heh."

Zhi Xiu snapped his fingers and sent a chestnut shell flying. It easily pierced through the spiritual energy shielding Xi Ping and headed straight toward his forehead. Seeing that he couldn't dodge it, Xi Ping once again disappeared, then burrowed out from another snowdrift.

Zhi Xiu: "..."

He had to give him a seeing to today!

Zhi Xiu rolled up his sleeves. He casually snatched an ice club from the hands of one of the snow people on Flying Jade Peak to use as a sword. “This will give me a chance to see how your cultivation is progressing—”

Lin Chi and Wen Fei had gotten Rosy Cloud Peak and Moon Plated Peak settled down. Supposing that the teacher and disciple on Flying Jade Peak ought to have finished any private discussions they needed to have, they had met up and gone over together.

The two of them didn't talk much on the way there. They were both somewhat weighed down: concerning what had gone wrong with the strange star stones on the bottom of the Sea of Stars and why they could pollute the spiritual senses of cultivators with Ways of the Heart of common origin, that mystifying way of clarity cultivator had in the end explained nothing. Inside the Unbound Furnace, Lin Chi had been pushed out by Xi Ping before he could see anything clearly. Though he didn't know the reason, whenever Lin Chi recalled that moment, his heart would palpitate out of nowhere...as if he'd had a narrow escape.

How long could the Xuanyin Mountains' situation be concealed? The inner sect wasn't much of a problem, but what would the outer sects scattered throughout the nine provinces think? And what about the other four nations?

In a hundred years, when the spiritual mountains collapsed and their people and gods all vanished, would they receive posthumous calumny or posthumous praise?

The power structure of the Xuanyin Mountains had basically collapsed. The new shed skin had no choice but to become a pillar holding up the heavens on his own, and he was hardly over two centuries old. He didn't have the backing of a family with hundreds upon thousands of years of history behind him. He was isolated and without help.

Wen Fei waved his fan, saying to Lin Chi, If I were Zhi Jingzhai, I'd pack it in and flee into the night.

Lin Chi had no need to imagine himself in Zhi Xiu's place. His fellow clan members currently locked up in the Yuntian Palace were already making him want to shut himself up.

The two of them exchanged looks, both fretting on Zhi Xiu's behalf. Facing the wintry wind, they walked into Flying Jade Peak and were met by a beam of sword energy.

Wen Fei: "..."

Lin Chi: "..."

Was this how Flying Jade Peak treated its guests?

The sword energy was faint, dispersing as soon as it touched someone. All the snow on the mountain and in the valley seemed to be boiling. The sky was clear, but there was a blizzard on the ground. From above, at first you couldn't clearly see what had happened.

Wen Fei craned his head and tapped on the ribs of his fan. Is there a rat infestation on Flying Jade Peak? I have rat poison...

Before the writing could finish popping up in midair, the northwest wind blew a headless snow person into the sky.

Wen Fei was wondering where this cunning talisman had come from and was just about to go take a closer look when he saw that snow person get out a cannon made of snow and loose a shell toward his chest.

Another beam of sword energy flew over to break up the offending snow person. Zhi Xiu's weary voice came from the middle of the mountain:

“Please wait, gentlemen, my peak is suffering a... Xi Shiyong, what a disgrace!”

Wen Fei fanned the snow: I think our worries were superfluous.

Lin Chi stayed far away, sorrowfully thinking, Indeed, having an unprecedented and inimitable brilliant disciple like this is equal to having a whole island of spiritual beasts. You won't be isolated at all. What do those clan members of mine locked up in Yuntian Palace amount to? Put together, they aren't as vexing as that guy.

Wen Fei said, Why don't we try again later? Lin-shixiong, why don't you come over for a visit to my place first?

Lin Chi, who had put up with Xi Ping for eight years while General Zhi was in seclusion, ran away with him without demur.

Xi Ping scurried like a frightened rat. While the snow people on the ground had been made by him, when the disparity in cultivation level was too great, a talisman's master could also change. The snow people seemed to know who was in charge on this mountain. They had defected in favor of the shed skin's aura, stopped their civil war, and set about encircling and intercepting Xi Ping. In no time, he had plowed through all the frost and snow that had accumulated on Flying Jade Peak for over a decade. Finally, there was a rumble...

Xi Ping and the avalanche on the north slope fell off the cliff together.

But times had changed. Fourteen years ago he had still needed his shifu to fish him up. This time, never mind the mere north slope, if Flying Jade Peak itself fell, it couldn't have crushed him to death.

So Xi Ping relaxed his limbs and tumbled down the cliff along with the boulders and accumulated snow. Amid the chaos and the noise, he laughed—not only was he unwilling to quietly “forget self and the world,” he also had to drag the shed skin sword cultivator who had spent centuries in solitary contemplation down to his own level.

“A handful of damn bones...” He fell straight into the valley, making a big hole. His ascended spirit's spiritual bones, forged in a heavenly tribulation, were entirely uninjured, only slightly shaken. Xi Ping felt the collision of his joints almost with pleasure. Nothing was left of his earlier feeling of being on the point of “enlightenment.” “You think I need you to teach me how to live? ...ow!”

A chestnut at last struck his forehead head-on. Xi Ping had been sitting up halfway. Now he was knocked down and flipped over to face upward.

So he simply lay on the ground, not getting up. “Shifu, you don’t love me anymore.”

“That was for Xi Yue.” Zhi Xiu, tidy as could be, stood firmly beside him. There wasn’t a trace of ice on him. “Scoundrel.”

“It was a stopgap measure. That brat is stubborn as a pig.” Xi Ping reached a hand out of the hole to make Zhi Xiu pull him up. “Shifu, look after the Marquis Manor for me while I pay a visit to Tao County to deal with that red-eyed evil cultivator. When I get back, I’ll send them to the South Sea Hidden Realm... Hey, what’s that you’re wearing?”

He had suddenly discovered that an archery thumb ring had appeared on Zhi Xiu’s thumb. It wasn’t an immortal tool, wasn’t even made of Moon Plated Gold. It was so archaic it seemed to have been dug up out of a tomb. All the patterns engraved on it had rusted away, leaving only indistinct traces... Xi Ping had never seen Zhi Xiu wearing this thing.

“An old thing.” Zhi Xiu pulled him and said nothing else about it, only sighed and said, “Prince Zhuang, Xi Yue...and your parents. You’re really going to sever all your family ties, be alone in the world?”

“Not at all,” Xi Ping said with an almost careless smile. “Affections hinge on their origin, not their focus. They originate with me, so as long as I’m alive, they still exist. Anyway, I’m not all that alone. Don’t I still have you, shifu?”

Xi Ping agreed, swept the ice and dust off himself with spiritual energy, then turned and put on a mask—while by now his identity was probably known to everyone who ought to know, it was still embarrassing going to see Zhao Qindan, so he was planning a conspicuous cover-up at first—then passed through the reincarnation wood and left.

Xi Ping’s aura disappeared in the blink of an eye from Great Wan territory. The spiritual mountains could no longer trace him. Zhi Xiu stood alone beside the reincarnation wood tree growing there for a while, gently stroking the ring on his thumb—it wasn’t his size; it was plainly a size up, hanging loose.

“What elder would hide in a paradise and leave you out in the open?”

Once again, he glanced south and tucked the thumb wearing the ring into his palm.

The Zhang family...along with the overwhelming majority of Great Wan's influential families outside the four great families, had all believed that if their family only produced an ascended spirit peak master, the family's descendants would from then on have a foundation in the spiritual mountains; they could be confident in receiving a selection card, and entering the inner sect would no longer be unattainable for the talented ones. Even someone as reclusive as Lin Chi, while he didn't have a single direct disciple, still had a whole bunch of disciples "of record" on Moon Plated Peak whose names he had never recorded in his memory.

Only Flying Jade Peak had none of this.

Zhi Xiu was his parents' youngest son, born late to them, with two older brothers and one older sister. His eldest brother was sixteen years older than him, practically halfway to a father. He had been a lot like Xi Ping in his youth, also growing up pampered and doted on by his family in myriad ways, thinking everyone should love him...though there were still somewhat more rules in a military family, and he hadn't dared to overstep the bounds of propriety like that brat.

The third year after he had gone to the Xuanyin Mountains, his parents had died one after the other. The ninth year, his older sister, who had moved far away after marrying, had died of illness. After fourteen years, his second older brother had retired to the country, moving his whole family back to their ancestral residence in Hongyin. A few of his siblings' children went into the military, though they had no real chances to distinguish themselves; they worked at it smoothly until old age. One had been a rather successful scholar and had become a provincial magistrate in Ning'an. Beyond that, he didn't know any of them... None of them had vied for Xuanyin's selection cards under his banner; they wouldn't even mention being related to Zhi Xiu in front of outsiders. They settled down wherever their official appointments took them, indifferent to their clan and surname.

By the time Zhi Xiu became an ascended spirit and opened Flying Jade Peak, the later generations of his family had scattered all over the place, all with their own lives to live, making him think that he would be disturbing them if he so much as gave them an extra look.

When Zhi Xiu had first entered the immortal mountains, Zhang Jue had placed hardly any restraints on him. He could always leave the mountains and return to Jinping to celebrate the New Year. He had been the one to arrange funerals for his relatives one after another...all except his da-ge, who had raised him.

During the Wan-He War, after the siege of Jinping, Zhi Xiu had been severely injured and remained in the capital, and the one to take his place leading troops south to retake lost territory had been his da-ge, who had rushed back from the northern border.

Da-ge had pursued the remaining stragglers of the Southern He army, fighting all the way into Southern He territory. When he requested instructions from Jinping, Emperor Renzong ordered them to go straight to Southern He's capital to demand justice from the Yang clan. But on the way, they encountered Lancang's mad sect leader escaping imprisonment; the mortals were drawn in, and of the Wan army and the He people alike, hardly anyone survived.

To this day, his da-ge had only a cenotaph.

Centuries later, Zhi Xiu had at last returned to the Land of Turmoil. Following his tie of blood, he had found a relic his brother had carried with him.

The strange thing was, this thumb ring, which his brother had never been without while with the army, hadn't ended up in the place where he was said to have died in battle. Instead, it had been not far from the feet of the Lancang Mountains...at the location of a break in a vein of the earth.

In order to calm Northern Li, he still couldn't touch the southern mines at the moment. He understood that without needing Zhou Ying to tell him.

But...he had picked up a profound injustice from that thumb ring.

The southern mines—Great Wan's encampment.

Yao Qi returned hurriedly to his lodgings, keeping his head down. His colleagues saw nothing out of the ordinary. He was always like this. In order to avoid greeting people and making small talk, the emperor's little brother-in-law used his spiritual sense to the utmost, detouring whenever he sensed an acquaintance in the distance. He would rather walk an extra eight li than exchange some empty pleasantries face-to-face.

He closed the door and locked it. Talismans against being overheard or spied on appeared on the door and window. Then he took a deep breath and took two things from his clothes.

One was a downgraded white jade proximal. His father had grit his teeth and doled out a colossal sum to have someone buy it when he had succeeded in opening his spiritual eyes and received his transfer order to go to the southern mines. He could use it to correspond with his family. After his father passed away, the other proximal had come into his half-sister's hands. His big sister had a different mother from him and ordinarily had nothing to say to him. Only at the Mid-Autumn Festival and New Year would they exchange brief messages and ask after each other's wellbeing.

Now, the proximal was covered in writing. Yao Qi knew each word individually, but put together, they were simply about to cook his brain. His big sister's letter said: There was going to be a comeback. The rebels were going to be wiped out. They needed spiritual stones, so the resources in the southern mines were of utmost importance. Fortunately, the majority of people in the southern mines were noble scions. They wouldn't just stand by and watch as Zhi Xiu pulled the wool over everyone's eyes at home. They would be sure to help Yao Qi. She wanted him to calm everyone's minds as soon as possible, stabilize the southern mines, and wait for someone to come meet him.

The other thing, meanwhile, was a Heavenly Question from the Xuanyin Mountains, with only two words written on it in strange yet familiar handwriting, telling him to run now.

CHAPTER 192 - A Life of Regret (4)

Yao Qi remembered Xi Ping's handwriting. Though over a decade had passed, he still recognized it after a moment's blankness.

For one thing, Xi Shiyong's handwriting was sloppy and arrogant, ugly in a very distinctive way. And also...apart from the Latent Cultivation Temple, no other place would have forced Yao Qi to live with another person in a single compound, seeing him whether he wanted to or not.

His associations with his colleagues were indifferent. Everyone just got along on the surface. If he didn't go out of his way to make friends with others, of course they wouldn't deliver themselves to his doorstep.

Sad to say, in Yao Qi's whole life, the only peers he had closely associated with were the two classmates who had shared the Qiu courtyard with him back at the Latent Cultivation Temple—and one of them was a regular visitor in his nightmares, his number of appearances second only to Luo Qingshi.

His own sister had explained the whole sequence of events to him without regard for importance, mapped out a detailed plan of action for him, as if afraid that an idiot like him would misunderstand something and ruin things, while his “nightmare” had written two pithy words.

Yao Qi took a deep breath, yet again rejoicing that a half-immortal body couldn't get diarrhea.

He leaned against the door, closed his eyes and muttered irresolutely, then suddenly straightened up, quickly swept the things he usually used into his mustard seed, stuck a stealth talisman onto himself, snuck outside, and made straight for his only friend—the other classmate who had lived with him in the Qiu courtyard at the Latent Cultivation Temple, Chang Jun.

The year he had entered the Latent Cultivation Temple, Yao Qi had been only sixteen, just over the line for the Grand Selection's age requirement, still a confused and timid half-grown child. Now over a decade had passed; he had at least reached the age of thirty. Though he hadn't improved, at any rate his wits had slowly all grown in.

The Land of Turmoil was a single mountain occupied by four nations, with those great evil cultivators, the Three Heroes of Turmoil, next to them, eyeing them menacingly. The circumstances were unusually complicated. Never mind downgraded immortal tools; ordinary immortal tools that hadn't undergone special encryption could easily be spied on. When conducting business, the southern mines' cultivators took care to use special communication tools or Heavenly Questions as a precaution against being targeted by evil cultivators while transporting spiritual stones.

When the cultivators used their own communication devices to contact their families, they weren't permitted to pepper in a single sentence that could reveal the situation at the mines. The personal letters of all the nations' mines were practically semi-public; they could only be sent after undergoing inspection. In other words, the moment Empress Yao's letter had come to Yao Qi's hands, Great Wan's mines, the surrounding friendly neighbors who were constantly spying, and the malignant evil cultivators hidden in the shadows had all known about it.

It was easy for Empress Yao to say that the mines were full of noble scions, that they would never permit rebels against the spiritual mountains to hold Xuanyin; but why hadn't she thought—when had Great Wan's “noble scions” ever belonged to the same family? And what about the other nations, and those three ascended spirit evil cultivators who had nearly seized the Lancang Mountains? In such a complicated situation, if he, Yao Qi, could figure out how to operate, would he still be doing odd jobs in the southern mines?

His sole remaining blood relation in the world hadn't asked him once in fourteen years how he was doing in the southern mines, whether the work was hard. Now, with a single letter, she had turned this little half-immortal with his meager cultivation into a public target. If he didn't run, what was he waiting for?

Xi Shiyong was the son of the “enemy,” arrogant and bossy; he hadn’t made the slightest positive impression.

But the Heavenly Question he had sent contained only a hasty warning and didn’t mention any request... In his whole life, Yao Qi had encountered too little friendship and too many requests.

“A-jie,” Yao Qi thought, “if only you’d gone through the motions, put down one sentence telling me to be careful, look after myself if things went wrong.”

Just one sentence.

Yao Qi had never been resolute. Just this once, he came to a prompt decision. While others were still digesting the information, struggling to confirm its source and veracity, two little half-immortals from the southern mines—Yao Qi and Chang Jun—furtively snuck out of the mining area, taking advantage of their familiarity with the terrain.

In Tao County, a person walked out of the reincarnation wood tree growing in Zhao Qindan’s little courtyard.

“Senior Tai Sui.”

Xi Ping: "..."

Under his mask, he sucked in a breath. He couldn't answer, but he couldn't not answer—thanks to that damn baldy of a Heartless Lotus, now that the incident in Jinping had gotten out, of the thousands of masks plastered to him, only a single layer of garlic skin remained; it would tear as soon as it was poked. It would all depend on when Zhao Qindan had time to collect the news.

He'd spent eight years pretending to be her elder, putting on the bearing of an enigmatic uncle and making her call him by a respectful form of address. He'd listened to Zhao Qindan mention "that classmate of mine who blew up half the Latent Cultivation Temple" several times while maintaining an air of propriety... Too awkward. How was he going to talk to her after this?

In her place, had he been Zhao Qindan, he would have spent a year cursing himself in the toilet bulletins.

Thus it is said that in human interactions, one must treat others with sincerity. Those who wear masks will sooner or later be exposed to public ridicule.

Fortunately, Yu Chang came to his rescue.

Yu Chang put down his teacup and said with a fake smile, “Grand Duke Tai Sui, we met so briefly in the South Sea, I didn’t even get a chance to say hello. Hope you’ve been well.”

Xi Ping put himself between Zhao Qindan and Yu Chang and made an obscure gesture toward her behind his back. Then, smiling, he said, “Quite well, thanks to you.”

Zhao Qindan understood and remained calm. At the same time, she couldn’t resist taking another look at Tai Sui—Tai Sui was very strange today, not as reserved as usual. Even his voice was slightly higher by half a key. Spiritual image masks were ineffective in Tao County, so every time he appeared, he would be scrupulously made up. But today, he had only casually stuck a mass-produced mask over his face...the kind of fox mask children wore for the Lantern Festival.

It was as if he were drunk.

Hearing the words “thanks to you,” Yu Chang’s eyes became even redder. “You borrowed something from me before, Grand Duke, and said in the South Sea that you would return it. I wonder if you meant what you said?”

Xi Ping readily consented: “Yes!”

Then he plopped down without any apparent intention of taking out the Discard the False and Keep the True book. Yu Chang stared in dismay for ages at the repulsive fox mask. His mild and refined smile nearly faltered. Finally, at the end of his endurance, he said, “So where is my vital weapon?”

Xi Ping grabbed a handful of melon seeds. “I said last time I was going to return it. I didn’t say when I was going to return it. Yu Chang-xiong, wasn’t there something you wanted from me? Why don’t we have a nice chat first and see. Maybe you’ll agree to lend me the book for a little while longer.”

Yu Chang: “...”

With his eyes that seemed to be stained with pigeon’s blood, this great evil cultivator glared at him for a long moment, then said with emphasis, “I never would have thought that that gentleman’s teachings could have produced an incongruous ‘genius’ like you, Tai Sui-xiong.”

Zhao Qindan, listening in, thought to herself, “That gentleman? Which of Xuanyin’s inner sect elders? Why does this evil cultivator know Tai Sui’s lineage?”

“To my shame,” Xi Ping said magnanimously, smiling, “I am altogether a self-made genius when it comes to the way of shamelessness.”

Yu Chang did not enjoy talking with him and simply stopped trying to probe. He said directly, “First you spoiled the emergence of the hidden realm in the South Sea, enticed the Heartless Lotus into attacking Jinping, and openly took control of the Xuanyin Mountains. You were playing an excellent game. You should have been able to take your time, but because there are too many traitors among the Wan, the information has already leaked out so soon. Even I know of it. Tai Sui, what are you planning to do?”

The great evil cultivator judged others by his own standard. Xi Ping didn’t dispute with him, only calmly said, “Would you like to instruct me?”

“Xuanwu is currently Sanyue’s sole shed skin. You don’t need me to tell you how strong his cultivation is—in Sanyue, no one but Xiang Rong could hold him back. He was previously expelled by Sanyue with a serious injury he was unable to heal from, his boundary fallen, such that we could still contend with him. But once Sanyue legitimizes him again, it’ll take hardly any time for it to repair his damaged essence. And once he has the immortals under his control, Sanyue will return to what it was before, standing alone and impregnable. Nothing good will happen to the local despots who have cropped up in recent years thanks to the Xiang family losing its influence. Therefore, we are preparing a final thrust. While Xuanwu has yet to be fully admitted by Sanyue and the Central and West Peaks are still deadlocked, we will rebel—this is our only chance.”

“Who’s this ‘we’?” said Xi Ping.

Yu Chang quietly met his eyes. After a brief silence, he said, “We offerings, who act against our own hearts, who are kept by the powerful and ordered around like dogs. We who cannot be free.”

Xi Ping said, “You want to secretly remove the spiritual image brands, join the various local despots in rising in rebellion, and then, once you’ve beaten Xuanwu, turn around and bite your masters.”

“A breeze does not last out the morning, a rain shower does not last out the day. Why should those good-for-nothings be the sky above our heads generation after generation?” Yu Chang said softly. “Shouldn’t the person sitting in the lofty immortal palace on Sanyue’s Principal Peak change? What about your honored teacher...”

The upturned corners of Xi Ping’s cheerfully smiling mouth flattened out under his fox mask. “Watch what you say, Yu-xiong. If you mention my shizun again, I’m afraid your vital weapon won’t be long for this world.”

Yu Chang accordingly took the conversation in a different direction.

“Though you control the Xuanyin Mountains and have dominion over the precious territory of Southern Wan, in a hundred years, when there are no more spiritual mountains, what will happen? I can sign a blood covenant—not with you, with the shed skin master; with him a major boundary above me, as far as the blood covenant is concerned, the interpretation of its clauses won’t be up to me. I won’t even be able to find loopholes. Afterward, the nations of Chu and Wan will become eternal allies, mutually advance without invading each other, the spiritual stone resources of the Sanyue Immortal Mountains to be shared between the two nations. When Xuanyin has dissipated, the two nations can even combine into one. Then there will be a blessed land with favorable terrain and climate, and also spiritual mountains. There will be no difficulty in uniting the whole southern continent.”

Xi Ping squeezed open a melon seed shell with a crack. “Wake up, buddy, it’s not dark yet.”

“Then let’s not talk about anything that far out.” Yu Chang smiled amiably. “Under the current circumstances, apart from working with me, do you have any better options?”

Xi Ping met his eyes through the mask. The two of them were like two demons who were always plotting against each other, well-matched, with a tacit understanding. Haggling, they rapidly hashed out all the details.

In the Land of Turmoil—

Chang Jun was also a misfit who hadn't made anything of himself. Apart from liking to pick up information, he also liked playing around with wicked little toys. Living in the southern mines, where birds didn't come to shit, he didn't let a single trend go by. Whatever novelty came into vogue, he would get himself one. Right now, he had a steam carriage in his possession.

Neither of them dared to fly a sword. They drove north in Chang Jun's steam carriage.

Chang Jun asked, "Ziming, what are your plans?"

Yao Qi answered without hesitation: "Go to the Xuanyin Mountains."

Chang Jun looked at him in the car's little mirror. "To see Shiyong? You probably won't be able to. The inner sect is strictly..."

Yao Qi stared unblinkingly up ahead, rather unskillfully pronouncing his decision: "We'll return to the Latent Cultivation Temple, see Elder Su and Luo-shixiong."

Just before they had left the mountains, Su Zhun had said that if he found himself at a loss out there, he could return to the Latent Cultivation Temple. The Latent Cultivation Temple was the starting point of every cultivator in Great Wan. If you had nowhere to go, you could go back there... He had only said it to him, as if at that moment he had seen his bewildering future.

Luo-shixiong... Luo-shixiong had said he didn't have the makings of a cultivator. He had been absolutely right.

Chang Jun hesitated for a moment. "Leaving Luo-shixiong aside for the moment, I've heard gossip that says Elder Su is good friends with General Zhi... It doesn't make a difference to me, my family is small fry, we just have a few ancestors who did odd jobs at the Latent Cultivation Temple. We have no business picking sides in a fight. But you—after all, your sister..."

"Married into a big family," Yao Qi said softly. "But my—our surname isn't Zhang, and it isn't Zhou."

With his background, had he been mortal, his family probably could have arranged a pretty nice wife for him, but in the immortal sect, there couldn't be a female cultivator who would marry down to his level. He would have no progeny. The surname "Yao" wouldn't be passed on.

He was only an inferior tool casually laid out by the big families to be used at need and written off.

Yao Qi smiled, not knowing what he was feeling. “Actually, what do they have to do with me?”

Chang Jun sighed. “Hold on tight.”

There were no roads in the Land of Turmoil. The ground was covered in mud pits. As soon as it rained, it became dotted with holes like the sky with stars. The steam carriage suddenly accelerated, limping as it leapt and sprang, spouting steam as though it were choking.

All of a sudden, while the car was caught and sent flying by a big stone, there was a flash of spiritual light, and the car became fixed in midair.

Only when the car wouldn't land were the spiritual senses of the two half-immortals touched... It was already too late.

Seven or eight black figures surged out from the surroundings, tightly surrounding the steam carriage caught in midair. All of them were established foundations or above—all were evil cultivators.

Yao Qi and Chang Jun were like two lambs being watched by a vicious beast. They didn't dare to move a muscle.

A black-clothed evil cultivator stepped forward and tugged on the steam carriage's door. Not understanding its basic principles, he used brute force to pull the door off, then smiled at the two people inside it. "Where are you going, lords? My master requests the pleasure of your company."

As he spoke, he crooked a finger. Yao Qi's proximal flew out. The letters that had previously been erased flashed one by one on the downgraded immortal tool, until the evil cultivator came to the last one. "Hey, there's a letter here Lord Yao hasn't answered yet."

Yao Qi's handwriting appeared automatically on the proximal, subserviently agreeing to all the empress's requests.

Then two black-clothed men left the ranks and each stuck something onto his face. Their figures and features slowly twisted, changing into Yao Qi and Chang Jun's appearances. Even their established foundation cultivation was suppressed.

The Luwu had been running riot for a decade. Their hateful "spiritual image masks" had long since spread throughout the continent. The spiritual image masks made by Lin Chi himself could deceive an ascended spirit's, or even more powerful, eyes. Others couldn't imitate them, but it wasn't hard to take advantage and go fishing in muddy waters.

Soon after, having left the southern mines without anyone knowing, "Yao Qi" and "Chang Jun" returned without anyone knowing.

Yu Chang had spent the whole day tangling with Tai Sui. The two of them had traded insights and banter in a verbal contest of strength that had exhausted body and mind. When he left Tao County, Yu Chang simply looked a little worn out.

As soon as he walked out of the spiritual energy prohibition, he received a message on an immortal tool—a certain "collaborator" from the Land of Turmoil said: "We have infiltrated the southern mines."

"Eternal allies..." Yu Chang gave a cold laugh and extinguished the spiritual light on the immortal tool. His spiritual sense noticed the Qilin Guardsmen patrolling outside Tao County approaching, so he unhurriedly melted into a shadow.

Tai Sui, Xi Ping—

After events in the South Sea, Yu Chang's hatred for this person had nearly surpassed what he had felt for Yu Family Bend. He would fight him to the death.

Tai Sui was crafty, but he was only an ascended spirit, after all. Without the shed skin sword cultivator behind him, what was he?

And for that shed skin sword cultivator of the Xuanyin Mountains who had quelled its thirty-six peaks upon coming into the world, the only threat was Northern Li. Zhi Xiu must have thought of that and already sent someone to Northern Li for peace talks.

It wouldn't be hard at all to make their talks fall apart. All they had to do was muddy the waters in the southern mines.

As if giving himself up as a lost cause, Xi Ping tossed aside his senior's bearing and sat with one leg crossed over the other in the little house, eating all the peanuts and melon seeds Zhao Qindan had prepared for her young students. Then, under the gaze of the amazed young mistress, he patted crumbs off himself as though nothing were the matter. "Play it, let's have a listen."

So Zhao Qindan opened a stone bench and took a bizarre-looking machine from its fat belly. She fiddled with it briefly, and the machine began to spin with a creak-creak. Yu Chang's voice came from it.

A breeze does not last out the morning, a rain shower does not last out the day. Why should those good-for-nothings be the sky above our heads generation after generation...

Zhao Qindan listened for a while. “It’s even clearer than I expected—what is it, Tai Sui, do you think this person is untrustworthy?”

“He’s very trustworthy,” Xi Ping said. “There’s a one hundred percent chance he’s planning to use me, then kill me. Alas...an ill-fated relationship of mine.”

Zhao Qindan: “...”

He must be drunk!

“Use it when I tell you to.” Xi Ping smiled at the horrified young mistress, then in a flash passed through the reincarnation wood and returned to Flying Jade Peak.

As soon as he came out of the tree, before he had found his footing, he froze—Xi Yue had woken up. He had just walked out of the mustard seed to meet him face-to-face across the disaster of the snow on the ground.

Xi Ping planted his feet firmly in the ground to keep himself from stepping right back into the reincarnation wood.

The two of them looked at each other blankly. Xi Yue's somewhat confused gaze suddenly focused, and with a flash, he flitted over beside Xi Ping.

Having just established a foundation, his half-puppet body hadn't yet had time to adjust, and what was more, Xi Ping, knowing his own skills to be poor, had only made a core array for him, leaving the rest undone. Xi Yue couldn't quite control his spiritual energy and nearly crashed into the reincarnation wood tree.

Xi Ping shook out his sleeves and brought them together. Rime-frosted branches extended from the reincarnation wood tree, sending ice flying as they caught Xi Yue.

“Da-ge,” Xi Yue asked urgently, struggling free of the branches somewhat clumsily and sticking out half his body, “how are things at home? Heaven's Design Pavilion suddenly...”

But the man under the tree froze. With a complicated and unreadable expression, he tilted his head back to look at Xi Yue in the tree.

Only when the ice Xi Yue had dislodged in his struggle fell on his face did the corners of Xi Ping's eyes move slightly, as if he had just come back to his senses. The tree branches relaxed and put Xi Yue down. As though nothing were the matter, Xi Ping said, smiling, "Still asleep? Don't you see that I'm here? What can be wrong?"

Apart from the memories at the moment the eliminate the past had been performed being blurry, there would be nothing wrong with what was in Xi Yue's head. For him, the Marquis Manor was still the home that had taken in an unrelated half-puppet like him as an adopted son, his parents were still his fondest memories of the human world, and his alarm over what had happened in Dangui Lane had yet to disperse.

It was only that while other people all had loves and hates attached to them, had flesh and blood in his mind, Xi Ping alone had turned into a faded portrait. Xi Yue recognized him when he saw him and could recall past events when they were mentioned. It was just that he would no longer automatically appear in Xi Yue's heart, wouldn't move his emotions.

"Shifu came back." Xi Ping tapped the frost off him at a distance and briefly explained what had happened. Then he added, "Your injuries were too grave. The core array was broken. We caught a worm master to question, and he said that you had to establish a foundation, so shifu gave you his Way of the Heart. Don't forget to thank him when you see him."

Xi Yue at last came back to his senses and remembered that the person in front of him was the Marquis Manor's legitimate Viscount. Just now, he had been anxious, and this detail actually hadn't come to mind. He was a little embarrassed. Moving his arms and legs unfamiliarly, he respectfully stood with his hands together and said, "I will."

When your older brother admonished you, you had to listen deferentially to his instructions.

Suddenly, a hand fell on his head. Xi Yue dodged automatically, leaving that hand hanging in midair.

This was a beautiful hand. The evil cultivator who had wanted to snatch his body had admired it tremendously. Now, on the snow-capped mountain, the ice and snow had frozen it to a chilly ashen pallor, like a dull marble carving. For some reason, when Xi Yue saw that hand hanging emptily in the air, there was a blunt ache in his heart for no reason—as if the sense of pain had been damaged at the skin there; there was pain deep down, which he could feel, but he couldn't tell concretely where it was coming from.

While he was at a loss, he was grabbed by the back of the head and dragged over.

“Huh, you dare to dodge?” Xi Ping wasn’t at all disappointed. He pushed his head down hard. “Is your head a tiger’s ass? It can’t be touched?”

Xi Yue: “...”

“You stay on Flying Jade Peak for now, finish altering your arrays and practice the sword. Shifu isn’t very good at teaching. When he’s explaining proper things, it’s always a little bit here, a little bit there, without tying it all together. You can ignore him. Flying Jade Peak is covered with his leftover sword cuts. At the established foundation level, if you can comprehend one of them, you’ll be able to climb up a minor boundary. I won’t have time to look after you for now, so work hard, you hear?”

At this point, Xi Ping seemed unable to restrain himself from glancing downward, seeming to be mocking himself—how strange that he would be instructing someone else to work hard.

With Xi Ping’s arm around his neck, Xi Yue moved stiffly as he was dragged. Because he was a half-puppet, he very rarely got close to people; this was extremely awkward. But when your older brother was admonishing you, you just had to put up with it.

“The life of a sword cultivator is a hard one, but once you’ve learned it, you’ll be good in a fight. Look at how impressive shifu is. Presiding at Flying Jade Peak, he can imprison anyone he wants to. All the birds on the mountain don’t dare to land...” Before he could finish, Xi Ping nimbly cast Xi Yue aside and dodged a jet of spiritual wind Zhi Xiu had sent toward him. He burrowed into another reincarnation wood tree, leaving behind these words: “Come to me if you have any problems, you know how to contact me, don’t worry, I’ll look after Mom and Dad!”

Zhi Xiu had seen him bump into Xi Yue head-on and hadn’t meant to show himself...until his rebellious disciple had started spreading rumors about him in broad daylight.

Xi Yue stumbled after that last push and instinctively reached out to stop Xi Ping. But both a shed skin’s blast and an ascended spirit’s movements were too quick for him. The half-puppet who wasn’t yet accustomed to his established foundation body only came up with a handful of wind. He looked down at his hand in confusion, as if he couldn’t understand where that gesture had come from.

After using a few words to “fish up” his shifu, who had been playing dead, to come and take responsibility for Xi Yue, Xi Ping finally relaxed and sent a sliver of consciousness to the Land of Turmoil—he had succeeded in sticking a disguised tree under the Emperor of the East's window, and never mind freeloading off his spiritual energy every day, he also eavesdropped.

He hadn't expected the Emperor of the East to turn on his allies at the bottom of the South Sea and be sent running by A-Xiang's gunshot. His vital weapon, the Emperor of the East Halberd, had cracked a little while going up against Xuanwu, and after that blow, it was said that he had suffered serious damage to his cultivation. The structure of the "Three Heroes of Turmoil" was immediately broken. Right now, the Emperor of the East had gone to hide out and had only moved over his spiritual stones, immortal tools, and other such crucial objects, and all the major and minor evil cultivators under his command had also made themselves scarce. The reincarnation wood tree had been left in the abandoned little courtyard.

The domain of the Queen Mother of the West and Lord Guang'an wasn't so easy to infiltrate, and the reincarnation wood trees around the southern mines had all been wiped out long ago. His field of vision was too limited... Annoying.

Xi Ping casually sent Wei Chengxiang a letter, then took a deep breath and went in his true body to the rear garden of the Marquis Manor.

On returning home from Southern Shu, before he could finish absorbing the changes to Jinping, he had learned that san-ge had entered the way of clarity and had charged into the spiritual mountains in the heat of the moment. The next time he returned, the whole of Jinping City had been pried up and put back anew.

Before, rather than saying he had brought his shifu home, it would be more accurate to say he had snuck into the Marquis Manor under the guise of “entertaining shifu.” Everyone in the manor had been going in nervous circles around the shed skin sword cultivator, so no one had noticed that he was at a loss.

Over a decade had passed. He had no idea what face to put on in front of his parents. He was worried that his mom and dad would notice how he had changed, and he was also afraid that the rapid passage of time had left him unchanged.

Xi Ping came to the reincarnation wood tree but didn't dare to leave it at first. He only furtively looked out.

The Marquis Manor didn't know that Xi Yue had been injured. They only thought Heaven's Design Pavilion had official business. Seeing General Zhi leave, they had once again gone from chaotic tension to sluggishness, returning to normal.

In the garden Xi Ping had spent half the night laying out, the Marquis was performing the Five Animal Exercises,⁹⁹ and Madam Cui had taken up a corner of the garden and was drawing something by the light of the setting sun. She was getting on in years. Her hand shook, and her eyesight wasn't so good anymore, either. She was wearing reading glasses, and her technique was no longer so meticulous.

In the drawing, large swathes of colorful freehand brushwork sketched out the plants in the garden. The Marquis wasn't in it—the Marquis's beauty had faded with age, and passion had cooled, as well. He had been removed by Madam Cui from the category of "beautiful scenery." She was even annoyed that the rotten old man was so tactless as to block her line of sight entirely. Before the Marquis had finished a full set of Five Animal Exercises, he had been ousted and made to change places several times by his wife.

"So who's handsome, that eldest son of yours?" In front of juniors, the Marquis was solemn and reticent, but in front of his wife, he didn't dare to revolt. He shuffled aside slowly, quietly muttering in dissatisfaction, "He's plainly ordinary, he only looks something like me. That brat comes and goes without a word. He's getting more and more disgraceful... Oh, right, send someone to deliver a box of spiritual stones to Heaven's Design Pavilion. I hope Xiao Yue won't be away for several days again. General Commander Pang really knows how to take advantage of well-behaved people."

Madam Cui agreed, gave the order to a servant, then said, “Advancement is a good thing. Do you think everyone’s like you, doing nothing but lazing around all day? I really got taken in when I married you. Move over, you’re blocking my osmanthus flowers again.”

“Back when you married me, I didn’t say I was planning on any civil or military accomplishments...”

Xi Ping felt the freezing of the hidden bones. They seemed to be telling him, There is no more place for you here, why disturb this calm?

Just then, he saw Madam Cui draw a few strokes on her paper. A person appeared amid the gorgeous gathering of flowers. This was a child running around holding a ball, with a flower on his head, blissfully frolicking through the garden.

Only one child had frolicked in this garden...

Xi Ping stared at that drawing for a long moment, suddenly thinking that he was being ridiculous—perhaps he had spent too long wearing masks and was unused to being bare-faced; he had actually been caught up wondering which face to use to come home.

No matter what face he put on, he was still that wretched child dripping pee and mud.

Xi Ping didn't hesitate again. He strode into the courtyard, not concealing his movements at all, scaring off the bees, butterflies, and birds filling the garden.

He saw the Marquis stop dragging his feet, his bearing abruptly turning solemn, and couldn't help laughing. He quietly reached out to put his hands in front of Madam Cui's reading glasses. "Immortal lady, guess who?"

Madam Cui was startled and even dropped her brush. She blurted out, "Hey, Xiaobao, you rotten..."

Halfway through, she thought she'd slipped up and called the wrong name again and cut herself off out of habit. After a moment's pause, she finally turned her head, a little slow to catch up.

"Wrong." Xi Ping snapped his fingers. The child in the drawing began to move at the sound. With a flash of spiritual light, he flew out of the picture and landed on the ground, turning into a living, breathing little boy.

The little boy turned his head and pulled a face at the deadly serious Marquis. He rushed away howling like a steam donkey, then bumped right into Xi Ping and turned into fragmentary light, which ran along his arm to congeal at his fingertips and turn into a folding fan. Xi Ping covered his face with the “Peerless Beauty” written on the fan in large writing and said, laughing, “I’m a painted immortal.”

In Jinping City, not waiting to be announced, Pang Jian charged into the Kaiming Department’s headquarters. “Where’s Bai Ling? Where have you gone to pass yourself off as funeral money? Get out here, quick, quick! What’s going on? Zhou Huan has been missing for a whole day, what are we going to do about Guangyun Palace? What am I supposed to say to the courtiers? Should the Zhang family arrange a funeral? Who’s going to stand in as emperor? ...Good heavens, don’t tell me it’s that aggravating demon boss of yours, or else I’m asking General Zhi to let me resign my post!”

Bai Ling commanded the whole nation’s Kaiming Cultivators. With Zhou Ying gone, he had to make up his mind about everything himself. He was also hard-pressed. Hearing Pang Jian, he had just come out to meet him when he heard someone answer, “No need, General Commander Pang, I will not undertake government affairs in Jinping.”

Bai Ling went rigid. He twisted his head and saw that a patch of mist had at some point floated over to the gate of the Kaiming Department. Like a photograph developing, it slowly congealed into a person... Though they had been separated for only a few days, he felt that he hadn't seen him in half a lifetime.

Pang Jian had never seen a power like this. He instinctively put a hand on his talisman gun, until he got a clear look at the newcomer. "Zhou Ying? What's this power of yours...? Where did you come from?"

Bai Ling shook, then quickly lowered his head to hide his expression. "My lord."

"Heaven's Design Pavilion and the Kaiming Department together can handle government affairs. Follow the old system in everything. If there is something you do not know how to handle, you can send word directly to the Xuanyin Mountains. I need to take a trip to Northern Li."

This tone was still his familiar tone, but the half-demon was extremely sensitive to the fluctuations in human emotions. As soon as he saw him, Bai Ling perceived at once that he was different from before.

But there was an outsider present, so Bai Ling forced down the silt clogging his chest. "Yes, my lord, I'll go prepare..."

"No need," Zhou Ying said, taking a mustard seed from his sleeve, which he gave to Bai Ling. "The Kaiming and Luwu's spiritual seals are all inside.

This time, I'll go by myself.”

As if he had been struck by lightning, Bai Ling actually no longer cared that Pang Jian was there. All the blood abruptly left his face.

After just the brief span of time this conversation had taken, the Kaiming Department's affairs, numerous and jumbled as snowflakes, would no longer wait for him.

“Mr. Bai, Guzhou's spiritual stone supplies are in a critical state!”

“The border inscriptions in Yuzhou have been damaged, many Western Chu evil cultivators are trying to cross the border, Heaven's Design Pavilion doesn't have any established foundations who can repair the inscriptions...”

“The Train Department has sent a representative to ask whether they can run the trains domestically. Passenger transport is one thing, but the seasonal freight can't wait.”

“Notice of a flood!”

“The Ministry of Works...”

“Mr. Bai...”

Bai Ling's ears roared. Twenty-some years ago, he had been only a half-demon orphan who had escaped to the human world. He'd had nowhere to go but to Zhou Ying. Since when had he become so deeply wrapped up by the mundane dust?

"The Kaiming Department cannot spare you," he heard Zhou Ying say amid the clamor.

Bai Ling turned his head abruptly and found that during the time his attention had been called away by his subordinates, Zhou Ying had already turned back into mist.

Where others couldn't see, a small box shot out a slip of paper. Zhou Ying scanned it, then fulfilled the past Zhou Ying's wishes: "You've always managed the Kaiming and the Luwu very well. It is your achievement, so you can settle down here. They're all relying on you...Xiao Bai."

The speaker had dispersed before his words did. Pang Jian looked up. With his established foundation barrier dispelling eyes, he still could hardly see where Zhou Ying had gone.

A Luwu far off in the area of the Beijue Mountains received word and flew away on a sword to report to the person in charge of this branch.

Shortly thereafter, an exquisite visiting card brimming with Southern Wan style flew on a frosty wind into a cave dwelling in the Beijue Mountains and landed in front of a curly-haired man who was meditating.

Three days later, all of Western Chu's counties dispatched troops, and, in the name of "destroying evil," attacked the Sanyue Mountains. For the first time, the "spiritual image brand offerings" hidden in the depths of the great and wealthy families appeared in public.

In Southern Shu, Lingyun's inner sect dispatched an ascended spirit to put down the Miah rebels in the Three Islands. The legendary next life spiritual fish of Ancestor Tianbo appeared out of nowhere, bringing Wangge Luobao. All the panicked spiritual beasts on the Three Islands bent their heads to the sound of a flute.

Wei Chengxiang silently returned to the Land of Turmoil.

CHAPTER 194 - A Life of Regret (6)

The rain of the Land of Turmoil had washed the sky white.

The nation of He had been at the southeastern extremity of the southern continent, at its far end even further south than Shu's Three Islands, to the north sharing a border with Great Wan. The eastern part of Wan had no mountains to block the wind, so every autumn and winter, the cold wind from the northern continent came south without impediment, meeting the damp and warm sea breezes head-on, bringing several months of wind and rain to the Southern He Peninsula, with hurricanes rolling one after another over the ocean.

Before, while there had been a great deal of rain, there would rarely be instances of people and animals fleeing before a hurricane, as happened on Shu's Southern Islands. This was because the Lancang Mountain Range stood at the center of the peninsula like a stabilizing force. Whether the hurricane came from the East Sea or the South Sea, as soon as its edge touched the immortal mountains' great mountain array, it would be bounced away automatically. This was where the name "Lancang," green waves, came from.

While the great mountain array had now vanished, the gentle ridges still blocked the wind on either side. But the fertile earth at the feet of the mountains was covered in mutated weeds.

Grains could no longer be planted here. After the veins of the earth had been severed, the animals had degenerated and the plants had withered. Only a few lucky mutated species had survived and spread rapidly where they had no natural predators. Ninety percent of the mutated plants were poisonous. On their own turf, where their roots were intricately interwoven, not a single blade of foreign grass could live.

For the local Turmoilers, the only thing that amounted to a “crop” was a shrub called the “bramblefruit.” The fruit it produced was about the size of an apricot. It was bitter and bland, and it made your mouth swell when you ate too much of it. But it was easy to grow and filled your stomach. When people couldn’t find work, they had to rely on it to survive. Anywhere the Turmoilers congregated, they would plant large bramblefruit forests nearby.

Even reincarnation wood, a tree that could easily put down roots in a crack in a wall or next to water, became a “delicate flower” in this place. If you left off caring for it for a moment, it would be strangled by poisonous insects and parasitic vines. If it hadn’t been a master’s accompanying plant, it would have gone extinct long ago. It had only become plentiful in recent years. The Turmoilers liked reincarnation wood, viewing it as a sacred tree. When they saw one, they would protect it, pouring insecticide in a ring outside the tree to get rid of insects.

As the gradually congregating Turmoilers gained a means of survival, they stopped eating the bodies of their loved ones and began making “offerings” of these cherished bodies to the sacred tree—plants and animals were poisonous, so naturally people’s bodies were as well. The Turmoilers’ corpses buried beneath the trees would attract the persistent parasitic plants to “eat” the bodies first, which would kill off the rootless parasites.

All living things competed for survival in this abyss of suffering.

Here, every reincarnation wood tree growing in the wild was a grave marker...for more than one person.

Right now, a number of Turmoilers were holding a “funeral”: they buried the body beneath the tree, with two people to fill in the grave and the rest standing in a circle around the tree, holding hands and singing a funeral dirge, solemn and pious.

When the body’s head was still exposed, without warning, the weather throughout the Southern He Peninsula changed.

Innumerable bolts of lightning came down from the sky, scattering throughout the wilderness of the Land of Turmoil. One bolt struck that tree with relentless accuracy. The reincarnation wood tree was instantly burned away. The Turmoilers surrounding the tree were all sent flying by the lightning strike. They landed in a scattered mess on the ground and didn't move again.

Before the lightning had dispersed, two figures wearing rain cloaks came down. Without a single look at the Turmoilers who had been struck by the lightning, they put down a talisman, destroying the remaining roots of the tree as well.

Then, from the withered roots, a red light spread down and around like ripples. Flame-colored vines appeared. When they touched earth, they began burrowing into it like leeches. These thin, flame-red vines were extremely swift. In the blink of an eye, they had covered everything in a hundred li radius. Where they passed, even the Land of Turmoil's native mutated plants withered and died.

The remaining grass roots, seeds, and insect eggs underground were all lapped clean by these monstrous vines.

This vine was called "wildfire." It was a forbidden technique of the way of medicine making, used specifically for clearing spiritual fields. Once the wildfire vine entered the earth, it would snatch away the vitality of all the living things in the soil. It could help "clear the field" before planting finicky medicinal herbs, completely destroying any seeds that had been blown in by the wind. Where it had passed, not a blade of grass would remain, like a wildfire on a prairie. This was how it got its name.

In the space of a few breaths, as far as the eye could reach, all the grass withered, and the leaves on the trees also began to change color. In less than a day, this would become a wasteland akin to a desert. Nothing could grow anymore.

When news of the unforeseen events in Southern Wan had gotten out, the southern mines had descended into chaos. But never mind the surging undercurrents between various powers; what practically everyone reached a consensus on right away was: as a matter of vital urgency, they had to wipe out reincarnation wood.

With the Lancang Mountains as the center, the Land of Turmoil had been split up into four pieces. Among the four nations, Chu, Shu, and Li had no common border with Southern He, and Great Wan, which did share a border, had the encampment at the very south of the Southern He Peninsula, cut off from their native soil by the three other nations' encampments. In other words, absent special circumstances, another country's sovereign territory would stand between the four nations' masters and their own encampments in the southern mines. Once the other nations upgraded their defensive inscriptions and activated their great arrays to create interference, it would be hard for anyone to control the southern mines remotely from within their own borders.

The “special circumstances” were reincarnation wood.

Starting from the ascended spirit boundary, an accompanying plant could swap places with its master’s body at any time. No matter what obstruction there was in between, it couldn’t block his gaze.

Zhi Xiu was no problem. A tree from a snow-capped mountain wasn’t so easy to grow in a land of pestilence. And he had come in a hurry. He had just reached the Land of Turmoil when he had been called back by Dwarf Luo’s complaint. He hadn’t had time to get set up. The trouble was that tenacious crooked-necked tree, the reincarnation wood.

It shamelessly grew everywhere, not the least selective about water and soil. And as soon as Xi Ping noticed that people were getting rid of his accompanying plant here, it would be the matter of a moment for him to pass through a tree and arrive. So if they wanted to wipe out these trees, the four nations had to strike simultaneously while his attention was held by Great Wan’s domestic affairs, deal a single conclusive blow, quickly clear the fields and the land, not letting a single sapling escape.

The cultivators of the four nations' encampments in the southern mines came out practically in full force. At the same time, they stood at battle-readiness, setting up all their immortal tools for monitoring fluctuations in spiritual energy. If they failed, as soon as the ascended spirit set foot in the Land of Turmoil, they would be able to sense his movements.

When the thunder passed, countless consciousnesses nervously observed the spiritual energy fluctuations in the surroundings. After the span of a whole incense stick, when the scorched scent of the lightning-struck earth had already been washed away by the rain and the wildfire vines had spread throughout the Land of Turmoil, the cultivators from each nation's mine encampment finally relaxed.

"It's done. Even if someone with unfathomable designs scatters seeds, no tree will grow in earth that's been fully occupied by the wildfire vine." When the cultivator who had placed the talisman spoke, a genuine Jinping accent came from his mouth. He glanced beneath the charred tree, then averted his gaze in disgust. "Trees that grow on corpses... This truly is an evil cultivator."

His companion sighed and said, "It's a lucky thing these monstrous Turmoilers have buried so many bodies under each tree. You just have to do a sweep with a filth-removing talisman, and it's obvious at a glance where these evil trees are. How else were we supposed to ferret out the evil cultivator's 'eyes' without missing a single one in a desolate wilderness like this? We wouldn't have had time if we'd only used the wildfire.”

“The next step is to lock down the coasts, protect the southern mines. In our mines, those with the highest cultivation are still only early stage established foundations. I hear that back home, practically all the seniors of established foundation level or above have been imprisoned by that traitor to the spiritual mountains. You and I are only open-eyed cultivators, and we have the spiritual stone mines at our backs... With traitors on the inside and evil cultivators on the outside, what are we supposed to do?”

“The head supervisor has already gone to Northern Li's encampment to request aid. A great personage has come there from the mountains to oversee the situation. With her there, unless Zhi Xiu wants to fall out with Northern Li, he certainly won't dare to touch the southern mines lightly. Northern Li has three great shed skin sword cultivators, twelve ascended spirits, and it has the Wanshuang Sword's Sword Slave bearing the ancestor of all swords. No one on earth would dare to be Kunlun's enemy.”

“This is a great tribulation for the Xuanyin Mountains. Sheltering with Northern Li is a necessary but temporary measure. Suffering some losses after the fact is unavoidable. The southern mines are the greatest source of spiritual stones apart from the spiritual mountains. Now that the Xuanyin Mountains have come to grief, we must safeguard the southern mines. Once we make it through this crucial moment and get rid of the traitor, with so many capable seniors in the inner sect, there will be new shed skins.”

“It must be so. Like it was in the beginning at Xuanyin—four great shed skin elders, thirty-six peak masters, unrivaled under the heavens, better than those snow-dwelling...”

“Ah! This awful weather. The rain is like a steamer. It’s nearly cooked me.”

Fretting over great national affairs, the two of them didn’t so much as glance at the bodies of the Turmoilers all over the ground. They left on their swords.

A moment later came the sound of jumbled footsteps. A number of Turmoilers who looked like they were still children ran over and immediately saw the charred reincarnation wood and the bodies. They spent a long moment staring blankly at the disorder, then began thumping their chests, stamping their feet, and wailing.

While they were crying their hearts out, the rain pouring down on their heads suddenly stopped for a time. The children raised their heads and saw a piece of thin gauze descend from the sky. It floated down slowly and covered the bodies when it landed. Then a sumptuous carriage drawn by flying horses passed through the air. It didn't stop.

Jade horses, a gilded carriage—this was the legendary equipage of the Queen Mother of the West.

All the Turmoilers had heard that this lady was a descendant of Southern He's ancient imperial family, attended on by the few remaining people of He—not the Turmoilers, who had turned into monsters, but true and mighty humans.

She was the only hope for restoring the nation of He. Perhaps only when she succeeded would Southern He return to what it had been two hundred years ago. They wouldn't live to see it, but there was probably some hope for posterity.

But where was their hope?

In the carriage, a hand blocked the Queen Mother of the West's gaze as she peered outward. She sighed and squeezed Lord Guang'an's wrist. "I'm all right... The people of Northern Wan have gone too far."

“With matters having reached this stage, there is no point in continuing to look. The Turmoilers cannot change back into humans,” Lord Guang’an said. “We have planted our seeds. Our nation is separated from Northern Li by Wan. As long as those two countries are at each other’s throats, they will have no more time to attend to the Lancang Mountains. We have already signed an alliance contract with Yu Chang. Western Chu will stand with us, and we will be able to cut off travel routes through the South Sea, so Southern Shu will be unable to reach us. Only if we take back the spiritual mountains and find a way to restore the veins of the earth will we be able to cure the poison in this earth. There will be many generations afterward.”

Those engaged in great affairs hurried by, going to arrange for their “many generations afterward.” Only a few Turmoiler youths remained standing blankly in the wasteland, looking at the gauze sheet bestowed by the merciful lady, not even able to cry.

When the jade horses and gilded carriage disappeared beyond the horizon, there suddenly came a sound of bells ringing from behind them. The Turmoiler youths turned their heads and saw a mule with a patchy coat pulling a worn-out cart, coming slowly out of the curtain of rain. The driver was a tall and skinny “fellow,” weathered by wind and frost that even the driving rain couldn’t wash away. On the cart was a big box over half the height of a person. Even the edges of the words “Silver Tray Lottery” on the box were blurred—this was Wei Chengxiang.

The Silver Tray Lottery was the favorite dream of every child who had grown up in the Land of Turmoil. If you came upon it once, you could have a year of good luck. You only needed a small stone to play it once, and inside there was good food and fun toys, even life-saving medicines. All wishes could be granted.

Furtively saving up pretty stones to compete with each other was the only experience the children here had of childhood.

For the Turmoiler youths, seeing her was like seeing a family member. Crying out inarticulately, they surrounded her, howling like wounded wild beasts.

Sadly, the fantasy only went so far. It couldn't bring the dead back to life.

Wei Chengxiang patted each of them on the head, took out tools, and led the youths in burying the dead, as usual taking one stone from each of them. The small case in the Silver Tray Lottery spouted thin steam and began to revolve as though it were in need of repair. This time, the machinery produced supplies—a reincarnation wood amulet...and a map.

“Can you read a map?” Wei Chengxiang said very slowly in the Southern He language. “Go here, your own people will be there to look after you, I’ve already told them. If you run into danger, use the amulet to call for help. Your people are nearby, they’ll come rescue you when they hear... Hurry up.”

The Turmoiler youths crowded around her for a long time, then put the things away and reluctantly left. After going a long way, they turned back and saw that a fog lamp had been hung from the Silver Tray Lottery cart. The cart and the person were no longer clearly visible; only the milky white light saw them off.

Wei Chengxiang withdrew under her bamboo hat, slowly drank half a pot of cold wine in the heavy rain, used spiritual energy to string the little stones she had just collected together and hung them from the charred reincarnation wood tree. She sent word to Xi Ping: “The four nations have joined forces in the Land of Turmoil to enforce martial law over the whole area while using over a thousand lightning talismans to clear away the reincarnation wood.”

There was no need for her to say this. When the reincarnation wood trees in the Land of Turmoil were blasted, Xi Ping had immediately sensed it.

He fed the cat he had just taken in and placed it in the courtyard, then looked at the Marquis Manor uneasily. He seemed a little care-laden. He passed through the reincarnation wood to Flying Jade Peak.

“Nothing strange about that. Now that they know the reincarnation wood is like me being there in person, it would be suspicious if they didn’t clear it away,” Xi Ping said. “That said, they ought to know that I can go over there by getting someone to toss out a seed. Striking the trees down is no use. What else did they do?”

Wei Chengxiang threw a reincarnation wood seed on the ground. This seed that ought to have started growing as soon as it got a chance seemed to dry up in the wind the moment it touched the earth. “They’ve planted wildfire vines in the Land of Turmoil.”

Xi Ping froze, then blurted out a question: “What scope? Will it affect the bramblefruit?”

Of course he knew what wildfire vines were. At his most incensed, he didn’t bother reading about any talismans or arrays that weren’t forbidden arts.

It was strictly forbidden to use wildfire vines in the countryside, because they would get out of control as soon as they spread. While it wasn’t hard to get rid of the vines, you had to use a special array to wipe out all of them. If only a single root remained, it would soon rise from the ashes to set the prairie ablaze once again. Where the wildfire had crept, the poison in the soil and waterways couldn't be fully removed for forty-nine days. During this period, even plants growing in a flowerpot, not “in touch with the earth,” would be entirely done for when they were touched by the local rain.

Wei Chengxiang didn't respond for quite a while. After a long moment, she finally said, “No scope. It must have spread throughout the whole Southern He Peninsula by now.”

Xi Ping: “...”

What the hell! Just so they could burn him, they couldn't even leave people some grass roots or tree bark to gnaw on? Without plants, wouldn't the Land of Turmoil become a complete deathtrap?

“Gather everyone up as much as possible, don't leave anyone alone,” Xi Ping said quickly. Scattered Turmoilers, finding nothing to eat, would return to eating people after three days of hunger. “I'll think of something for rations. Use the amulets as a medium, move some through the Law Breaker. I know the coastline has been sealed, but they can't have that many people, there'll have to be gaps. If it really won't work...if it really won't work, then divide the ones you can count on and the weak and elderly into batches and send them to the South Sea Hidden Realm...”

Wei Chengxiang, leaning against the mule-drawn cart, interrupted him:

“I’m in Great Wan’s encampment now. I’ve followed the Queen Mother of the West and Lord Guang’an all this way. They’re rushing to the southern mines. They’ve changed their contact signals. I’m not sure who they’re taking precautions against—it might be me... After all, the legendary ‘Tai Sui’ has suddenly turned out to belong to the spiritual mountains’ orthodoxy.” Wei Chengxiang paused, then said, “The jade horses and gilded carriage didn’t land just now.”

The lady wanted to restore her country, but she didn’t want the Turmoilers. After all, in her mind, the citizens of Southern He shouldn’t be like the Turmoilers.

However good the South Sea Hidden Realm was, it was still a place of hiding, not seeing the light of day. The Southern He Peninsula was their native soil. Their country had been partitioned by foreigners and turned into a battlefield where immortals and demons grappled for resources. The former master was putting in painstaking efforts, but she already viewed them all as dead.

“I can try,” Wei Chengxiang said with a bitter laugh. “I might send a group of the weak and elderly, but the rest won’t necessarily be willing to go.”

The wintry wind of Flying Jade Peak dashed against Xi Ping, making his temples ache. “The South Sea Hidden Realm has a set of spiritual mountains at least, it’s not like being banished to some penal colony, right? One or two might not be willing to go...”

The Marquis had just categorically refused to move the Marquis Manor to the South Sea Hidden Realm. The old man was extremely obstinate, and he hadn’t given a reason, only brushed him off with “a falling leaf must return to its roots,” and then it was as if the crack between his lips had sealed up.

Xi Ping had reasoned with him in every possible way without success. He was used to being rude and had blurted out, “No matter where you’re buried, you still won’t cultivate into an earth immortal,” then been knocked aside with a teacup lid by the Marquis, whose mustache quivered; he was just preparing to commit the high treason of forcibly transplanting the “old tree” when he was reduced to submission by a few light words from Madam Cui.

Madam Cui’s current unhurried manner of speaking was very like his old grandmother’s. She said, “We can go into that place, but you can’t, and we would have to talk through a plant. When we missed you, we’d have to go to no end of trouble to get someone to take us out to have a look at you. As for you, you'd only be able to kowtow every year on Qingming out here, and we'd have no way of knowing whether you'd done it for real—how is that any different from being interred in the ancestral tombs? We two old things will be going to see our ancestors in a few years, anyway, so why take this unnecessary step? Xiaobao, once we're gone, you'll have no family left. Why are you in such a rush?"

Madam Cui was the master of the house. Under normal circumstances, she didn't lightly display her prowess. With a few words, she cut her unfilial son down to size and sent him fleeing, grief-stricken, back to Flying Jade Peak.

Now that Zhou Huan had disappeared and the Li and Zhang families had defected en masse, Zhi Xiu, along with Lin Chi, Wen Fei, and other such people, were combing through the domestic situation in Great Wan, deliberating what to do in the future. Xi Ping listened outside the cottage for a while. It made his head ache, so he didn't go inside. He sat on the courtyard wall which always seemed in danger of collapse, watching Xi Yue meditating in the snow to comprehend the sword heart.

Suddenly, a piece of information from the north came through the reincarnation wood.

Zhou Ying concisely and comprehensively said, “Wanshuang’s Sword Slave has gone south. Once again I warn General Zhi, Zhaoting must not face Wanshuang.”

“Then Northern Li had better not strike the first blow,” Xi Ping muttered. “The Queen Mother of the West and Guang’an are prudent people. To be making a beeline toward the southern mines now, they must have support. That bastard Yu Chang is colluding with them...”

The Land of Turmoil also contained the missing Emperor of the East. Given Xi Ping’s understanding of that conjunctivitis-sufferer, he wouldn’t only be carrying on with one side.

In Southern Shu, the Miah and Xiuyi clans had entirely fallen out. Wangge Luobao didn’t have the South Sea Hidden Realm and would have to find other resources. There was a one hundred percent chance he would set his sights on the southern mines. That barren place was something else... Would shifu really be able to restrain himself and watch while they all fought over the southern mines right in front of his eyes?

Xi Ping’s brow furrowed. He hesitated briefly, then sent another Heavenly Question to Yao Qi to tell the southern mines to look out for evil cultivators —Yao Qi seemed not to have listened to him last time; he hadn’t responded to the Heavenly Question. But he still had to warn him... It might do some good.

The Heavenly Question flew away with a snap of his fingers. Xi Ping stretched anxiously and leaned back. Before he had finished flexing his shoulders, the Heavenly Question he'd just sent flew back and vanished before his eyes—it couldn't find its recipient.

Right now, the real Yao Qi and Chang Jun were locked up in a tiny underground prison. All their possessions had been removed—not even the few little jade stamps hidden in Chang Jun's belt had been passed over.

They were both half-immortals, without essences. For drawing talismans and using powers, they relied entirely on spiritual stones. Had they been elsewhere, in a pressing situation, if they really had no spiritual stones, they could have made do with draining spiritual energy from the surroundings, but there was nothing to drain in the Land of Turmoil.

There were inscriptions and arrays all around. They couldn't understand them, but their tense spiritual senses were clearly telling them that they were being watched.

The evil cultivators who had caught them were all established foundations. They really couldn't have escaped even if they'd had wings.

CHAPTER 195 - A Life of Regret (7)

Yao Qi had a miraculous brain. It was a pity he hadn't gone into playwriting.

Back at the Latent Cultivation Temple, if Xi Ping so much as gave him an extra look, he could automatically plot out over a hundred twists in his mind: if Xi Shiyong was glancing at him for no reason, he must be planning to make mischief; Prince Zhuang's evil forces would seize on that incident for their own ends. When the fox demon Imperial Consort's fox demon prince son had the power, he would usurp the throne and take over, and then wouldn't the Crown Prince, along with the Yao family, be decimated?

With the decimation of one's family near at hand, no one could be calm and breezy. That Yao Qi had only been scared into some bouts of diarrhea could simply be described as showing great heroic spirit.

This time, Yao Qi and Chang Jun had seen with their own eyes how those evil cultivators had put on spiritual image masks and taken on their own appearances. Even without Ziming-xiong's "prophetic" mind, you could deduce that those evil cultivators definitely wanted to use their identities to sneak into the southern mines.

They were both perfectly well aware of what their own colleagues' cultivation levels were. They certainly wouldn't be able to tell. Wouldn't those evil cultivators be like vipers in a mouse hole?

Moreover, all of this had been caused by the two of them running away from the southern mines!

Chang Jun clutched his head, feeling that his neck could hardly support the uproar of his thoughts. In his head there was now the suffering at the southern mines, images of the colleagues he usually drank and chatted with dying wrongful deaths, and now himself being condemned, implicating all of his relations...

“No, Hongzheng-xiong,” Yao Qi pointed out when he had listened to his long-winded babbling, “I don't think the two of us are going to be condemned.”

Chang Jun looked up at him, full of hope, waiting to hear his brilliant escape plan.

“The two of us are probably going to die here,” said Yao Qi.

Chang Jun: “...”

Ziming-xiong had in fact not been body-snatched.

Looking gloomy, Yao Qi comforted him. “I’m used to this kind of thing. It’s nothing.”

Wanting to cry, Chang Jun thought, You’ve even gotten used to being at death’s door.

Yao Qi sat curled up and hopeless in a corner as if he had bowed out of the struggle and was waiting for fate to trample over him. Staring at the inscriptions on the wall, he said, “I’ve spent all my life feeling uneasy, thinking again and again that I was about to die. It’s just come true now... Back at the Latent Cultivation Temple, Luo-shixiong wanted to kill me every day. It was only because of the sect rules that he held back and didn’t do it.”

Chang Jun said numbly, “Luo-shixiong wasn’t that murderous...”

“And there was what’s-his-name,” said Yao Qi, “he left too soon and didn’t get a chance to kill me.”

Chang Jun froze.

The slight unilateral “grudge” that had once existed between the Xi and Yao families had become a joke as the two respective princes had each found his place.

Concerning the hidden bones, the Latent Cultivation Temple’s stewards hadn’t explained the ins and outs to them in any great detail, but they still dimly knew that Xi Ping had done many things against his own will then. With age, the slight youthful conflict had gone. While Yao Qi didn’t often mention Xi Ping, when he did occasionally bring him up, he calmly said his name instead of using a label of childish hostility like “what’s-his-name.”

Why had he brought this up again? Had he been scared out of his wits?

Automatically, Chang Jun looked in the direction Yao Qi was looking and found that Yao Qi’s grim gaze was focused on nothing other than an inconspicuous inscription in an out-of-the-way place.

A fireproofing inscription routinely used by established foundations.

Back when Xi Ping had still been a mortal, in order to keep the evil cultivator from snatching his body, he had ordered the half-puppet who lived with him to steal an activating inscription from the fireproofing inscriptions at the Yanhai Building and use a tinderbox to ignite it—in order to keep other ignorant people from imitating him, the Latent Cultivation

Temple's official report had omitted this detail; only those who had been in the Qiu courtyard at the time knew.

“I really did quite dislike him... I can't say clearly now whether it was my family's influence, or whether I just plain couldn't stand his mannerisms. I've thought sometimes, he and I actually have similar backgrounds, but he became the Flying Jade Peak's only disciple in the inner sect. As for me, I'm hardly worthy of being among the dregs at the southern mines. I don't even qualify to travel with the spiritual stone convoys. Are people really so different?” Yao Qi slowly turned his head and said to Chang Jun, “I've always wondered, if I were in his place, would I have dared to do what he did?”

“Yao Ziming?” The Latent Cultivation Temple's Luo Qingshi listlessly raised his cat's eyes.

Luo Qingshi had first been knocked silly by the steam donkey and then besieged by a gang of established foundations. He had been carried back to the Latent Cultivation Temple. Though he had taken elixirs now, he was still having difficulty sitting upright. He was leaning against two straw children, exerting all his willpower to receive his guest, making him look even more displeased—especially when he'd found out that the uninvited guest Xi Ping was already an ascended spirit.

Luo Qingshi was doubting everything he knew: could it be that the reason his cultivation had stagnated was that he wasn't wicked enough?

The Latent Cultivation Temple was at the edge of the Xuanyin Mountains, only a couple of steps away for an ascended spirit. As soon as Xi Ping had found that he had lost contact with Yao Qi, he had immediately run out to the outer sect—the Latent Cultivation Temple had the outer sect disciples' name tokens.

Xi Ping thought he couldn't remember him, so he said, "Personal name 'Qi,' from the class of the twenty-eighth year of Tai..."

Luo Qingshi waved a hand impatiently. His feeble drawl was even lengthier than usual. "Cut the crap, I know who Yao Ziming is. He was single-handedly responsible for fertilizing the spiritual fields out back for a whole year."

Xi Ping: "..."

Then Luo Qingshi took a key from his mustard seed and tossed it toward the door. When the key fell, a building comparable in height to the Qiankun Tower rose steeply from the ground.

“The name token store. All the outer sects are there,” Luo Qingshi said indifferently. “Call whoever you’re looking for yourself. If you can’t get him, he might be dead.”

Xi Ping cautiously asked, “Might be?”

Luo Qingshi raised his eyebrows. “It also might be because you’re useless.”

Xi Ping really did seem to have matured. He didn’t get angry at all. He said mildly, “I understand. The disciple name token is imprinted with the disciple’s own spiritual image and connected to his feelings. What you mean, Luo-shixiong, is that if Ziming-xiong himself really doesn’t want to see me, his name token will also be in a hurry to avoid me.”

Luo Qingshi rolled his eyes heavenward.

“No wonder you’re having me call it, Luo-shixiong. It turns out that you aren’t being unhelpful. You’re worried that Ziming’s name token won’t dare to come out... What’s to be done? I’m not that close to him, either.”

As he spoke, Xi Ping walked up in front of the outer sect disciple name token store and touched it, seeming a little fretful.

Luo Qingshi watched, waiting for him to make a fool of himself. Sneering, he said, “Let’s have a look at the methods of an ‘inner sect master’...”

The veins on the back of Xi Ping’s hand suddenly stood out. That consciousness far more concentrated than those of ascended spirits of similar grade came pelting down right onto the tower. This could be described as “the strength of one overcoming the skill of ten.” The several-zhang-high tower was instantly pressed down to only three chi high. It trembled beneath the “great evil cultivators”’s hand; had it had legs, it would have knelt.

Xi Ping gently tapped on the forehead of the auspicious animal on top of the tower and said mildly, “Yao Qi, Yao Ziming, born in the twelfth year of Taiming, entered the Latent Cultivation Temple in the twenty-eighth year. Is his name token here?”

No sooner had he spoken than the tower itself hastily spat out a name token, not caring whether the name token itself was willing or not. Then it returned to the key without demur and scrambled back to Luo Qingshi.

Luo Qingshi: “...”

Xi Ping bent down and picked up Yao Qi’s name token, which was trying to flee after the key. Seeing that the name token had abundant spiritual energy and was even quite vigorous, he knew that Yao Qi himself was also doing just fine. He relaxed, then casually smiled at Luo Qingshi. “Fortunately I have plenty of brute strength—and also, Luo-shixiong, according to Xuanyin’s rules of precedence, you ought to be calling me ‘shishu.’ But it’s all right, I’m not particular, we can each say what we like.”

When Su Zhun heard the news and rushed over to Chengjing Hall, he saw Luo Qingshi, who hadn’t even been able to sit upright for long periods before, fly up red-faced from anger on his sword and even roar powerfully, “Xi Shiyong, you’ve let power go to your head!”

Su Zhun turned pale with fright when he saw the situation. “Luo-shixiong, take it easy and give your wounds time to heal, haste makes waste, you mustn’t take medicine too strong for you to handle!”

Luo Qingshi flew into a rage. “You’re the one who’s been taking medicine!”

Xi Ping stepped lightly onto the needlepoint top of a slender bamboo tree, like a leaf moving on its own. He “dutifully” saluted Su Zhun. “Elder Su, my shizun sends his regards and asks after your health.”

“I’m pretty well, and grateful for his concern,” Su Zhun said falteringly, hand pressed to his chest. “I suppose your shifu has quite a few white hairs now?”

“He’s in fine health. Set your mind at ease, Luo-shixiong hasn’t taken any harmful medicine, he was just so overwhelmed with joy at seeing me that a miracle took place.”

A talisman flew toward him. Luo Qingshi said, “That’s—bull—shit!”

An established foundation talisman was like being tickled. Xi Ping didn’t even turn his head. He waved his hand, and the talisman stopped in midair and warped. Xi Ping collected the spiritual energy from the talisman like coiling string. As soon as he touched it, he knew that Luo Qingshi’s wounds weren’t serious. He was only exhausted from draining his essence, and there was a knot in his heart puzzling him; his Way of the Heart wasn’t very steady.

“I’ll show you some more accurate talismans!”

“Hey, come down here and talk it out, gentlemen! Have a heart, come back to earth, sit down... Luo-shixiong, think of your health!”

Xi Ping ran all around the courtyard taking Luo Qingshi for a stroll, clearing out his essence. Seeing the gloom on Luo Qingshi's face dispersed by vigor, he at last abruptly restrained his mischievous grin.

He landed in front of Chengjing Hall and saluted Luo Qingshi almost solemnly. He said, "I've seen quite a few sages over the years. Sages know everything under heaven, and each of them indeed has their own way. Only their ways are different, like fleeting clouds to me. Among the immortal mountains, of those who have passed on teachings to me and dispelled my doubts, there have only been two and half people..."

Luo Qingshi, panting, heard these last words and thought this rude brat was once again playing dirty. He was just about to get worked up.

Xi Ping realized what he had said and quickly backtracked: "You're one, my shizun is another, and there's another senior who, because I was born too late, I was unable to meet in life, so I can only count her as a half."

Luo Qingshi finally realized that he was actually in total earnest. He was slightly stunned.

Xi Ping shook Yao Qi's name token. "As I see it, half of the Xuanyin Mountains' dignity is held up by you, Luo-shixiong."

Then he saluted and asked to be excused. When he was just about to leave, he heard Luo Qingshi call him back. “I’ve heard that the ‘way of death’ has no Way of the Heart. Is that true?”

Because of the unique method of the hidden bones and being crushed to dust, the immortal mountains usually called Yuan Hui’s ungovernable way the way of death.

Xi Ping laughed, silently acknowledging it.

Luo Qingshi was silent for a moment, then suddenly said, “Then you are very fortunate... Ah, the heart is a servant to circumstance...”

Xi Ping gazed at him briefly—on learning that Luo Qingshi had openly rebelled against the “heavenly edict” from his Way of the Heart and sent Zhi Xiu a message, Xi Ping had known that his Way of the Heart must be even more contrary to his nature than Princess Duanrui’s. A person of the orthodox way rebelling against his Way of the Heart was just like Yu Chang rebelling against his spiritual image brand, a terrifying mortal combat held in silence.

So Xi Ping didn’t pick up the topic he had raised with his “you are very fortunate.” He glanced north. “Sooner or later, the day will come when the shackles will be destroyed. Take care of yourself, Luo-shixiong. Wait and see.”

He vanished where he stood, then sent Zhou Ying a message: “In the current battle, a struggle over the southern mines is unavoidable—our country’s mines have already been infiltrated by evil cultivators, and the other countries’ mines aren’t necessarily clean, either. That Sword Slave or whatever is a stranger in a stranger land. It’ll be hard for her to avoid getting caught up in things. If shed skin sword cultivators come to blows, won’t that harm heaven’s order? It would be better for them to be in the open while we stay in the shadows. If someone sows discord, we’ll pretend to have a falling out, lure out all the evil cultivator forces in the Land of Turmoil. How does that sound?”

Zhou Ying responded very quickly: “Which side has struck so quickly?”

Xi Ping considered. “I think it must be the Queen Mother of the West. Her name is Yang Wan, a former inner sect disciple of Lancang, an ascended spirit medicine cultivator and descendant of Southern He’s imperial family.”

Yao Qi hadn’t received the second Heavenly Question; there were two explanations for this: either the Heavenly Question he had received before had been discovered, and the southern mines had requested a master to come and block Heavenly Questions; or he himself had been locked up.

The likelihood of the former wasn't great.

Yao Ziming had been narrow-minded when he was young, and there was no saying whether he had improved now that he was older, but while he might be timid, he had always been highly wary of others. Just on that point, it was impossible that he had no ideas of his own. Even if he hadn't trusted the anonymous Heavenly Question, he still wouldn't have been so stupid as to tell others about it. The Heavenly Question was the Xuanyin Mountains' most highly encrypted communication immortal tool. As long as Yao Qi wasn't stupid enough to show it off himself, it would be very hard for others to become aware of it.

As for the latter...

When Empress Dowager Zhang had ordered Empress Yao to send Yao Qi a letter through a downgraded immortal tool, it had been like making an announcement to the southern mines. She knew that no matter what the state of the fight among the four big families, at this moment crucial to the survival of the immortal mountains, everyone's standpoints would be unanimous. The southern mines' people wouldn't have attacked Yao Qi.

Then there was only one possibility: Yao Qi had trusted him, hadn't listened to his sister, and had run off, not expecting to be possessed by the god of misfortune and captured along the way.

Had those who caught him been people from the other immortal mountains, they ought to have notified Southern Wan's mines—there were Luwu around the mines who were disguised as traveling merchants, always mingling in that area, and they had yet to hear of the mines “losing” anyone.

So most likely it had been a force of evil cultivators that had captured Yao Qi and sent one of their own to pass themselves off as him to sneak into the mines. Had Yao Qi fallen into Wangge Luobao, Yu Chang, or the Emperor of the East's hands, he would be dead. Those three, the dregs of society, were each more ruthless than the next. If they had caught a young half-immortal disciple, they would certainly have brought out the works—soul-searching and silencing.

Only Yang Wan, who had come from an orthodox sect, would hold back, avoid indiscriminate slaughter.

Xi Ping had hung around the Land of Turmoil for eight years. While he hadn't had direct contact with the Queen Mother of the West, A-Xiang had been with her all along. And the Emperor of the East had always been furtively keeping an eye on the Queen Mother of the West's every move—was there anyone on earth who could understand a person better than an ex-husband driven by bitter hatred?

In fact, there was: the vulgar sapling who had been eavesdropping outside the windows of both the ex-husband and the concerned party.

If it was Yang Wan...

Xi Ping said, "What a sword cultivator fears most is an untraceable poison miasma. My guess is that that will be the Queen Mother of the West's first move. San-ge, convey that to Northern Li as a show of our good faith in working together. If my guess is wrong...then we'll give you to Northern Li as collateral. With your talents, if you spend a few years herding sheep in the Beijue Mountains, you're certain to bring the Kunlun Mountains tumbling down."

Zhou Ying ignored him. He picked up a cup of tea being warmed on a specially-made heater to warm his hands.

Right now, the Land of Turmoil was unbearably stuffy, Great Wan's Jinping was going from the end of summer to the beginning to autumn, and in the Beijue Mountains, the hoary winds had already begun to blow.

Flying Jade Peak was also a snow-capped mountain, but that kind of cold was nothing to a cultivator. It would only chill their flesh a little. With spiritual energy to protect them, it wouldn't feel unpleasant. But the north wind blowing from the unpeopled Beijue Mountains seemed to want to freeze your very essence. Cultivators below an ascended spirit would freeze to death overnight if they hadn't brought a special warming immortal tool.

In precise Northern Li language, Zhou Ying unblushingly bragged to the Crown Prince Snow Wolf in front of him, "The Land of Turmoil is Demon Country, with three great ascended spirits and hundreds upon thousands of evil cultivators under them, including those who cleaned out the Lancang Sect's secret arts in Qiu Sha's hidden realm. Some are in collusion with Chu and Shu. They will be hard to guard against. Apart from the Luwu, no one can get a handle on these people's movements."

The Crown Prince Snow Wolf—the Blind Wolf King's heir—hesitantly scrutinized this young man... Southern Wan's Prince Zhuang of the First Rank, an "infant" who had only set foot in the cultivation world a few years ago.

"As far as I know, your esteemed nation's Luwu are only a group of open-eyed cultivators from common backgrounds. They were established less than twenty years ago." From top to bottom, the only part of the Crown Prince Snow Wolf that curled was his hair. His words were as straight as a cudgel. “The waters are muddy in Demon Country. After two hundred years, the four nations’ mining encampments still do not dare to say they have ‘cleared the water.’ Do not boast.”

There was one good thing about the way of clarity, and that was that it would show no weaknesses under the scrutiny of an ascended spirit sword cultivator showing off his talents—never mind his gaze; even if the Snow Wolf really had pulled his sword, Zhou Ying would still have been as unmoved as a mountain, carrying his magic trick of getting something for nothing through to the end.

He unhurriedly drank a few mouthfuls of crude tea, scalded the warmth back into his lungs, then calmly said, “Beware of poison miasma—that is our show of good faith. Future information won’t come free. Take me to see the Blind Wolf King, and recommend me to the Kunlun Mountains.”

CHAPTER 196 - A Life of Regret (8)

The Luwu's roots in the Land of Turmoil were indeed not deep enough. A very practical reason for this was not enough money.

The Kaiming and the Luwu's expenditures had always been very tight. The Luwu went around cheating and swindling on the black market, and, for the sake of their cover identities, had also purchased quite a few legitimate properties and businesses. Putting these two sides together, they could just make do and call the books balanced.

But expenses in the Land of Turmoil couldn't be compared to those in other places.

When mortals went to the Land of Turmoil, it would damage their health over time, so while they couldn't cultivate, they would still provide themselves with spiritual stones to maintain their health. Cultivators—especially open-eyed cultivators without an essence—had even more sensitive constitutions. The cost in spiritual stones for the Luwu's operations in the Land of Turmoil was tenfold and more what it was elsewhere.

Even in Southern Wan, where the price of spiritual stones had been dropping steadily in recent years, the market price of one liang of ordinary white spirits was still nearly a thousand liang of silver. However massively profitable business in the Land of Turmoil might be, it still wasn't enough for tenfold spiritual stone consumption, and the most remunerative snow wine business was against Zhou Ying's taboo; they couldn't touch it.

Furthermore evil cultivators "going it alone" were rare here. Even Wei Chengxiang, a lone wolf who had never acknowledged herself to be an evil cultivator, had been compelled to follow the local customs and join the Queen Mother of the West. The evil cultivator gangs were extremely close-knit. The situation in Wild Fox Country, where each side only did business without inquiring into each other's background, was simply unimaginable here.

Thus far, the Luwu who had been planted there years ago could only operate around the mines, buying and selling supplies, making themselves familiar fixtures in all the mining areas.

The Territory Map melting into the veins of the earth and the Ways of the Heart of common origin making mischief had happened in a single night. It had been too sudden. No one had been prepared.

Now that the battlefield had suddenly moved to the Southern He Peninsula and the reincarnation wood had been destroyed, there were no eyes on the Three Heroes of Turmoil...

Xi Ping sighed. Given his understanding of Zhou Ying, the tone san-ge was currently taking with Northern Li was certain to be “The Luwu already have the whole of the Southern He Peninsula in their grasp, nothing has happened that I did not foresee.”

Looking at Zhou Ying, he seemed to be the sort of steady person who schemed before acting, who was always looking three steps ahead, keeping himself hidden behind the scenes...but in fact, that was completely a false front. Xi Ping had always thought that in san-ge’s bones lay a latent daredevil tendency. When others called something “reliable,” they’d have to be seventy or eighty percent sure, but with him, if “reliable” could have meant fifty percent certainty, Bai Ling would have gone to burn incense in gratitude. Had he not been born into the Zhou family, the profession of gambling addict might have been tailor-made for him.

But they had let him go, and they couldn’t haul him back. What else was there to do? He’d just have to do his best to lie and swindle, cover for him.

Xi Ping suddenly realized that, since losing the burden of one of them being an “older brother,” the “troublemaking” and “covering” roles in their relationship had been reversed.

“Not for nothing is the way of clarity the start of the three thousand paths of the Great Way. Very useful,” he thought. “If I’d known it was like this, I’d have gone for it, too.”

Xi Ping felt very conscious of the passage of time, so he “suited his image to his sentiments,” changing to a sedate posture—sitting cross-legged on his sword, he flew back to Flying Jade Peak.

That night, after being constantly on the move for several days, Wei Chengxiang’s consciousness entered the Law Breaker space in Tao County. Zhao Qindan had already prepared a batch of supplies and was waiting for her.

“The Luwu stored these in Tao County. Take them to meet the emergency for now.” Zhao Qindan filled up her empty wine pot. “If it’s not enough, I’ll think of something else. Let me know if you’re short on anything. Those are Senior Tai Sui’s orders.”

“We need the coal used by the factories. If they start fighting, they won’t care whether the Turmoilers live or die. They might have to move underground, and the ventilation machines burn coal. Also, medicine—poisonous insects and pestilence grow easily there. An epidemic is likely to break out when a large number of people are gathered together.” Wei Chengxiang chugged a mouthful of wine. Sighing, she said, “Finally I’ve warmed up.”

Curiously, Zhao Qindan said, “Is it cold enough on the Southern He Peninsula to freeze you?”

Wei Chengxiang felt cold at heart. She had grown up stumbling along after her grandfather, without a mother. She had an instinctive yearning toward adult women. The Queen Mother of the West was both powerful and gentle, reliable yet never arbitrary. All the people of the former Southern He were willing to lay down their lives for her. Wei Chengxiang had thought that if the goddess who blessed the common people in folklore and plays had had a human face, she would have looked like the Queen Mother of the West.

Wei Chengxiang had sometimes even imagined that if the Queen Mother of the West restored her nation, it would be a wonderful place. Chief Li and the others might be able to go home.

But it turned out that they didn’t travel the same path.

She didn’t explain it to Zhao Qindan, only smiled with some self-mockery, then casually changed the subject. “Why are you still saying ‘Senior Tai Sui’?”

While tailing the Queen Mother of the West, Wei Chengxiang had heard her fill of gossip concerning the shocking battle in Jinping. When it came to whatever peak's disciple or whatever Marquis's son, she couldn't really tell these Jinping bighats apart, but there was one thing she had understood from people's shocked accounts: just as she had faintly guessed, this "senior master" was no "senior" at all.

He was probably the same age as Zhao Qindan. They might even have been classmates at the Latent Cultivation Temple.

No wonder that brat who always talked a cartload of nonsense became unusually silent and "dignified" every time he saw Zhao Qindan, and kept his voice down.

The daffodil had spent fourteen years refusing to bloom, pretending to be a bulb of garlic, to the point that he had become a garlic spirit!

Western Chu was unstable, Zhao Qindan had too much to do; she hadn't had time to fill up on gossip, so she asked in confusion, "Oh? What should I be saying?"

Wei Chengxiang looked at her tenderly. "Come, I'll give you the details. Don't be angry when you hear. This Tai Sui, he's..."

A total bastard.

Before she could finish speaking, she was interrupted by a long series of coughs, as if someone had just eaten a whole feather duster and was coughing it up.

A certain man who had spent over a decade taking advantage of others entered the Law Breaker with his consciousness, still wearing a fox mask over his face.

Zhao Qindan politely greeted him: “Senior.”

Wei Chengxiang said nothing, looking with a false smile at the mask on his face, which looked like a last-ditch effort.

Wei Chengxiang took the medicine, but she didn’t thank him. She kept looking at him with that false smile.

Xi Ping took one look and saw that it was no good counting on her to keep silent out of respect for the favors he had done her, so he submitted himself to the situation. In front of Zhao Qindan, he looked like nothing was the matter, squarely maintaining his senior master bearing. Privately, through the reincarnation wood amulet Wei Chengxiang carried, he got straight to the point and said, “Aunt, I was wrong.”

Wei Chengxiang choked on a mouthful of wine. This garlic spirit was truly no ordinary human!

The most amazing thing was, Xi Ping’s two faces were completely different. Outwardly, he was still saying in deadly earnest, “Slow down. How many Turmoilers have you taken in over there? How many are unwilling to leave?”

Bearing dignified, tone sedate, just as if he hadn’t been the one calling her “aunt” just now!

Wei Chengxiang didn’t have his acting range. She coughed until she was red in the face.

“Don’t rush.” The young mistress who had been left in the dark patted her anxiously on the back. “We haven’t finished removing the spiritual image brands from Yu Chang's subordinates yet. If it comes down to it, we can extort another payment from him. Heaven always leaves a way out."

Xi Ping solemnly chimed, "Yes, that is true."

"Ahem..." Wei Chengxiang couldn't look at him. "I-I've filled up a dozen villages. The underground city previously used to shelter from disasters has been opened up. I figure it can hold some tens of thousands of people. People have been streaming in to take shelter these last few days."

As she spoke, her voice turned gloomy. "The newcomers don't know the ins and outs, and I've asked all those who were with me before. It's about what I figured. There aren't many who are willing to leave their native soil for the South Sea Hidden Realm, less than one in ten. Some are afraid of traveling over the ocean, some are unwilling... Actually, if this hadn't happened, they wouldn't have been this opposed. The Turmoilers are born deficient. They do indeed lack intellect. But they don't lack souls. They have feelings, and they understand grief and anger."

"If they won't go then they won't go." Xi Ping's voice cooled. "The Southern He Peninsula is their territory to begin with. With random nobodies all coming to fight over it, they ought to have a say."

Saying so, he took something out and offered it to Wei Chengxiang. “Find this thing’s master.”

Zhao Qindan recognized it at a glance. “Yao Ziming’s disciple name token?”

“Yes. I believe he’s fallen into the hands of the Queen Mother of the West. When the name token approaches him, there will be a special reaction. When you find him, you’ll have found where the Queen Mother of the West and her people are hiding,” Xi Ping said. “It ought to be within the scope of Great Wan’s mining area.”

The Land of Turmoil was different from other places. With the veins of the earth severed, outside of the mining areas, there was practically no spiritual energy. If someone had no spiritual stone resources, you could outwait them to death. So all sides wanted to go on the offensive. Whoever first took control of the spiritual stone mines’ resources would occupy an invincible position.

Right now, the only cards Xi Ping held were the Luwu and the Turmoilers. Taking part in a competition like this would be self-destruction. Great Wan would have to be the first to “bow out.”

“An ant can’t shake a tree, and a mantis can’t stop a carriage. Fortunately, there are many kinds of insects in the world,” Xi Ping said. “In this game, we’ll be the fleas biting the wild beasts. Remember, we only have a chance because they don’t see the Turmoilers as people, so we must act in total secrecy, or else the small villages we’ve spent so many years building up will take them only a single talisman to destroy.”

In Great Wan’s southern mines, as usual, “Yao Qi” carried out his daily assignment: patrolling and inspecting the mines’ safety equipment and lighting.

The new Moon Plated Gold could save a large quantity of spiritual stones. Many of the machines in the southern mines had been changed to the New Gold. This new equipment was very easy for a cultivator to inspect. One sweep with your consciousness, and you would know at a glance whether the machine was in good condition or not. There was no need to carefully study a lot of arrays. If a cultivator who did this kind of trifling work wasn’t purposeful, their cultivation would never advance; there was absolutely no future in it.

Only someone like Yao Qi, who had no backing, would be assigned this kind of work.

Today's "Yao Qi" dawdled even more than usual. Seeming extremely lonely, he touched practically every machine. When he met a colleague on the way, he only nodded hastily, deliberately avoiding their gaze—no one took notice; he was always like this.

From a distance, "Yao Qi" exchanged looks with "Chang Jun."

The machines that didn't stop for a moment spat out snow-white steam, which fell on a miner getting off work. This miner felt out of nowhere that he had something in his eyes and carelessly rubbed them. The invisible miasma had silently stuck to him.

The spiritual stone mines were under strict surveillance. When they got off work, all the miners had to go to the supervisor on duty that day to be "searched," in order to prevent smuggling. This miner walked into the inspection array as usual. There was no reaction from the array. The frosty-faced supervising cultivator next to the array nodded at the miner, indicating that he could go. The miner respectfully bowed to the Exalted, who naturally didn't return the salute.

When the two of them passed by each other, the mine supervisor's nose, bearing his spiritual sense, acutely smelled the odor of sweat coming off the miner. He couldn't resist frowning. He covered his nose and mouth with his hand.

The miasma infecting the miner floated toward him on the breeze.

A miasma that the Queen Mother of the West had personally fabricated wouldn't necessarily have been noticed by an ascended spirit cultivator of the same grade as her, never mind the cultivators at the southern mines with their meager cultivation.

The miasma in the steam was carried all over by the miners coming and going through the spiritual stone mines and infected the cultivators. The miasma put down roots as soon as it came upon a living person. It unnoticeably extracted weak spiritual energy from their bodies, strengthening, passing quickly from person to person.

Each mining area contained scattered traveling merchants and cultivators passing information to each other. The miasma quickly spread outward from Great Wan's mining area.

The mine envoy of Northern Li's mining area hastily walked into the mine office. Mine envoy was the foremost position in the mine's hierarchy. The guard at the gate gave him an orderly salute. He had come to his own domain, but he didn't go inside, only deferentially saluted at the door. "Lord Sword Slave."

A person answered him in the Li language from inside: “Yeah, come in.”

This was a somewhat strange female voice.

The Li language was pronounced far back in the throat, making their voices sound deeper than those of people from other places, but this person’s voice was a little unnaturally high, as if there was a reed in her throat.

The mine envoy cautiously inspected his hair and clothing, then walked in demurely.

Inside the room, there sat...a “mountain.”

The people of Northern Li lived in company with wind and snow. They were usually tall and sturdy. This mine envoy himself was a powerful and robust man with thick hair and beard, but the person sitting in the room was even taller than he was standing. The arms hanging down at her sides were as thick as the mine envoy’s thighs. The veins were exposed on hands so big that they could squeeze a person’s whole head when spread. There were innumerable sword cuts on the palms.

This “giant”’s broad shoulders had to be over three chi wide, but on them was set a normal-sized human head. Her face was covered in scars, with raised flesh around each scar, cutting her features into ribbons. On her back was a heavy sword with only its hilt exposed.

All the warmth in the surroundings had been sucked away by that sword. It was plainly the most sultry season on the Southern He Peninsula, yet inside the room it was cold enough to make you shiver.

The mine envoy only took a hasty glance, then didn't dare to look again—that was Kunlun's Wanshuang Sword, the chief of the world's three famous swords, the wisest and most ancient of weapons.

With his cultivation level, his spirit was already aching from a single glimpse. If he stared at it, he might lose his mind.

After Kunlun's founder, the Sword Ancestor, had "ascended," Wanshuang would take no other master. Only the Sword Ancestor's sword-bearing half-puppet could pick it up. Once the sword-bearing half-puppet had gone in their former master's wake, Wanshuang had been forced to seal itself.

Without Wanshuang, there was always a link missing in Kunlun's great mountain array, which the shed skin masters had to take turns making up with their essence so they could resist the frigid cold coming from the northwest. The sword cultivators of later generations came in waves, but not even the shed skin elders, the Sect Leader included, could do anything with Wanshuang. That ancient sword was exceptionally disdainful, unwilling to yield to any common fool.

Until a ruthless person appeared.

This individual blazed a new trail. Using the core array of the Sword Ancestor's sword-bearing half-puppet as a model, she refined her own near-ascended spirit sword cultivator body into a half-puppet body. This was unheard of. It shook the whole Kunlun Sect. And she really did manage to survive. Since then, she had become the successor to Wanshuang, calling herself the Sword Slave.

Everyone in Kunlun was respectful to her on the surface. Behind her back, they all feared her—anyone this ruthless was somewhat inhuman.

The mine envoy was scared stiff every time he spoke to her. Almost holding his breath, he said, "Lord, I just saw off the representatives from Southern Wan. Just as the person from Xuanyin said, an evil cultivator's miasma was on them. It seems that power really has changed within Xuanyin. The southern mines believe themselves to be the orthodox ones, and Zhi Xiu, who has occupied the Xuanyin Mountains, isn't ready to deal with them. The new and the old groups are both roping us in."

The Sword Slave didn't so much as look up. "They're seeking shelter."

The mine envoy lowered his head. “Yes.”

“I came south because I wanted to have a look at this supposed two-hundred-year-old shed skin Sword of the South... Ah, before I could come across the sword, the man has given us a peace offering. It’s true that there are no sword cultivators in the south.” It took the Sword Slave some effort to talk. Her words came out one at a time. “Notify the Blind Wolf King not to mingle with them. We’re not missing these good-for-nothings’ support. Tell that ‘Porridge’ or ‘Soup’¹⁰⁰ or whatever his name is to scram. If the Wan can’t hold on to their mines, then let’s take them. Who’d say no to more spiritual stones?”

CHAPTER 197 - A Life of Regret (9)

The Blind Wolf King seemed to be neither old nor blind. He didn't even look much like a person from Li. Large patches of shadow cut across his lean face. His flat wrist wasn't even as wide around as a person's grasp. Its protruding tendons and bones were connected to a bloodless hand. He was nearly buried in his thick fox-fur robe.

Amid Northern Li's crowd of big, strong-featured faces, with him sitting across from Zhou Ying, you couldn't say which of them was frailer. They looked rather like two sickly sprouts that had climbed out of the same salt lick.

Zhou Ying had grown up in Guangyun Palace. Each and every one of his movements was cultured and regulated. Sitting there, he still had some backbone. But this Blind Wolf King was like a noodle that had been soaked overnight and was coiled up all limp and moldering. He could hardly keep his eyes open. "Who are you to Xi Zhengde? You look rather alike... Not the eyes, though."

"His nephew," Zhou Ying answered.

"Oh, no wonder," the Blind Wolf King mumbled indistinctly, as if he had just drunk snow wine, then languorously said, "That little devil. He sure knows how to live. He's had a pretty peaceful time these last few years. He only used up that sword attack I gave him just now, when Jinping got turned upside down. Who did he stick with it?"

"Western Chu's Heartless Lotus," said Zhou Ying.

The Blind Wolf King froze, his eyes instantly opening. He stuck a slender neck out of his fox-fur robe. "Who? That eyelash-batting monster from Western Chu?"

Seeing Zhou Ying nod, the Blind Wolf King suddenly laughed loudly. His naturally thin willow leaf brows were more precise than if they had been plucked, but the outlines of his features were very deep. His appearance lay somewhere between effeminate and sinister. But this laugh was very bold. "Your Xuanyin Mountains' shed skins and ascended spirits are as thick on the ground as dumplings boiling in a pot, you've got those Heaven's Design—Earth's Chickens—whatever running around all over the place...and in the end, none of them caught that baldy. Instead, he got stabbed by a sword attack I passed off to a mortal to protect himself with eight hundred years ago?"

Zhou Ying cupped his hands. "I have not yet expressed my thanks, Wolf King."

“No need for thanks.” The Wolf King waved a hand. “I’m not sure I’d be able to catch the Heartless Lotus myself—good for Xi Zhengde! Ah, none of these whelps I have here are up to the mark. If he’d stayed here to be my disciple, how could that good-for-nothing have gotten to be the Snow Wolf?”

The Crown Prince Snow Wolf next to them kept his head down. His expression couldn’t be seen clearly.

The Blind Wolf King didn’t give him so much as a glance. He suddenly seemed to become a little interested in Zhou Ying. He shuffled fluffily toward him. “Little devil, since you’re Xi Zhengde’s nephew, is your spiritual sense strong?”

Zhou Ying raised his eyes slightly. The faintly discernible heart demon seed in his eyes showed a trace of itself. “It’s acceptable.”

The Blind Wolf King met his eyes and immediately leaned back. “What the hell have you put into your eyes?!”

Zhou Ying smiled without answering.

The Blind Wolf King suddenly remembered something. “Wait a moment, what did they just say your name was? I seem to recall Xi Zhengde’s nephew is...”

The Crown Prince Snow Wolf deferentially prompted, “Southern Wan’s Prince Zhuang, Zhou Ying.”

Having heard this, the Blind Wolf King slowly sat up straight, staring thoughtfully at Zhou Ying. “You’re that pestilential paramount spiritual sense from Southern Wan. I know what you’re here for, then.”

Zhou Ying sat upright across from him and composedly poured himself a cup of tea.

“Tradition has it...that the Sword Ancestor was the first person in the world to form a heart and enter a way, and the Kunlun Mountains are the first spiritual mountains, the origin of all mountains. The divine tool of the mountains, the Ceaseless Mirror, can resolve all doubts,” the Blind Wolf King said. “You’ve come for the Ceaseless Mirror.”

Zhou Ying said, “The Wolf King is wise.”

The Blind Wolf King waved a hand. “Won’t do. Give it up, kid. Do you think the Ceaseless Mirror is a dressing mirror at the door to an inn, that they’ll let anyone come and look in it? No one knows where it’s hidden. The Sect Leader, the High Priest, and Wanshuang’s Sword Slave all have to cooperate to obtain it. Why would they show it to you? Anyway, with your measly cultivation, the light reflecting off the divine mirror would chop you into mincemeat—stay with me for a few days, then head on back, I'll get someone to take you.”

Zhou Ying's expression didn't waver a hair. “Events are determined by human effort.”

“When the Kunlun Mountains first formed, the old Heartless Lotus from Western Chu was also always coming over to harp on it and getting beaten back time after time. What's the matter with all you paramount spiritual sense types? If you're tired of living, go get yourselves some drugs. Don't go looking for trouble.” The Blind Wolf King rolled his eyes. “Never mind the Ceaseless Mirror, you won't even get into Kunlun's inner sect. The Sword Slave has gone to the southern mines. That freak only knows how to kill people. She never gets up to any schemes, overt or covert. If you can't meet her in battle, you're not worthy of speaking to her. Forget those ‘Three Shoes of Turmoil’ or whatever, she doesn't give a damn about them, and she wouldn't condescend to ally with you people. If Southern Wan can't hold on to their mines, she'll be happy to take over.”

Having heard this, Zhou Ying nodded. “Thank you for your guidance, Wolf King.”

“...What?” said the Blind Wolf King. “What guidance?”

At Xi Ping’s end, Wei Chengxiang, having carried off Yao Qi’s disciple name token, had just turned up a slight trace—a Turmoiler who came seeking refuge had seen Yao Qi and Chang Jun fleeing in a steam carriage. When he’d set out from the southern mines, Yao Qi had certainly wanted to run back to Wan. His starting point and ending point were obvious. Following the Turmoiler’s clue, Wei Chengxiang and her team quickly found the steam carriage abandoned in the rain.

Searching the car, she turned up a pocket watch that had been broken when it fell. On it was a rather fashionable little compass needle. Masters who flew through the sky and burrowed into the earth in this backwater had no interest in a mortal trick like this: the compass needle was pointing in the wrong direction.

Wei Chengxiang squeezed her dice and cast them; they came up all-of-a-kind. She immediately went in pursuit, holding the disciple name token.

Xi Ping had just instructed her to be careful when he heard a message from Zhou Ying: “Wanshuang’s Sword Slave refuses peace talks. She believes that while she is overseeing Northern Li’s mining area, she needs no allies. Kunlun won’t see me, either.”

Xi Ping frowned. "So we can't get through this way."

As he kept an eye out in Wei Chengxiang's direction, he quickly calculated: Northern Li was quite strong; it wouldn't be susceptible to trickery and deceit. It seemed they would have to temporarily avoid its spearhead...

Zhou Ying interrupted his train of thought: "What I mean is, you just have to make her need us."

"...San-ge," said Xi Ping, "you've only been gone a few days, why has your accent changed already? Say that again, I didn't hear it clearly. What?"

Zhou Ying patiently said, "If a shed skin wants to conceal her whereabouts, the major and minor evil cultivators of the Land of Turmoil won't necessarily notice her. The Three Heroes of Turmoil may well not know yet that Wanshuang has come south. With the methods available to them, they might well not be worth mentioning in front of a shed skin sword cultivator. Give them a hand from the shadows. Don't let the Northern Li people stay above it all, or else we'll have no bargaining chips here. We'll have no way to continue talks."

Xi Ping numbly said, "I, right now, am in the Xuanyin Mountains. I can't plant a single reincarnation wood tree. The Land of Turmoil is out of my reach. All I have at my disposal are half-immortal Luwu and not at all immortal Turmoilers—and you want me to plot against a shed skin...sword cultivator, and it has to be done in secret, without revealing myself, because afterward we're going to use this as a bargaining chip to trick them into working with us?"

"Right," said Zhou Ying.

"Your Highness," Xi Ping said softly, "why don't you stay where you are and herd some sheep? Don't come back."

Last time in the Xuanyin Mountains, as soon as he'd opened his mouth, it had been to tell him to "hold off Zhang Jue," as if it were that easy, and this time, he was casually telling him to "plot against a shed skin sword cultivator"! Did he think Xi Ping was the Southern Sage reincarnated, capable of punching full moon sages and kicking shed skins, working miracles on command, ready to answer every plea?!

If the Zhou family had known about this earlier, they wouldn't have bothered raising demons in the Impassable Sea. They'd only have needed to raise one Xi Ping! Feed him anything at all, he'd be grown up in twenty to thirty years—save time and money!

"Stop talking crap, it can't be done. Do it yourself if you're able." Xi Ping decided not to indulge his misapprehension. In a tone of finality, he said, "If we can't protect the southern mines, we'll let them go, whoever wants 'em can have 'em. I won't be short on spiritual stones in the near future, I don't give a rat's ass. I only care about my people. Since this Northern Li sword cultivator is so powerful, we'll just let her kill off the whole crowd of evil cultivators. She can kill them, and we'll plug the leaks. A whale sinking to the depths creates enough resources for everything to live on for quite a while. When I've cleaned up Western Chu and Southern Shu, we'll see about..."

Apropos of nothing, Zhou Ying said, "In the Wan-He War, the master of Flying Jade Peak's older brother General Zhi Yi received orders to pursue the surviving Southern He forces. He died in the line of duty and was buried in Southern He. Did you know that?"

Xi Ping froze.

"The way the history books tell it, 'The mad Sect Leader of Lancang escaped captivity and came to blows with a group of masters, which involved passing Wan soldiers and Southern He mortals.' As for what the reality was, you'd be best off asking about it obliquely," Zhou Ying advised mildly. "The Sword Slave going south probably means that Northern Li is getting greedy. They want to take advantage of the disorder among the other three nations to take the southern mines all to themselves. When the Wanshuang Sword is planted in the Lancang Mountains, I don't know what will happen... Perhaps it will turn Lancang into a miniature Kunlun, completely alter the topography of the Southern He Peninsula. I'm afraid that will be the last straw for your honored teacher. He won't accept it."

Xi Ping returned to Flying Jade Peak in one step, just in time to see Wen Fei and Lin Chi going off each to his own work. After seeing them off at the gate, Zhi Xiu instructed Xi Yue to go practice swordsmanship out back.

While Xi Ping was off running around all over the world and not on Flying Jade Peak, Xi Yue was always automatically looking for him, but when he saw him, for some reason, he always wanted to avoid him, so he bowed to him from a distance and swiftly flew away on his sword.

Zhi Xiu beckoned. "Come here, Shiyong, tell me what's happening in the southern mines now. Has there been any word from His Highness Prince Zhuang?"

Xi Ping lied automatically: "Oh, they've wiped out the accompanying trees over in the south, but I have other eyes. I've managed to plant agents beside the Three Heroes of Turmoil. My san-ge has reached the Beijue Mountains and seen the Blind Wolf King. Everything is going smoothly. We control the Xuanyin Mountains at home and have eyes all over the southern mines. Aren't we doing better than the mine supervisors down there, spending all their time on tenterhooks? Northern Li knows whom to heed, set your mind at ease.”

Zhi Xiu sensed that there was something untrue about what he had said, but Northern Li and the Southern He Peninsula were both outside the country; they were beyond his amateur fortunetelling skill level, and there were ascended spirit masters involved, each with their own tricks. He only felt that the stars were in such disorder that he couldn't see them clearly, so he said, bluffing, “Do you think I'm blind? Tell the truth.”

Xi Ping was a practiced hand at bluffing; how could he be taken in? So he collapsed weakly against the little cottage and covered his face with his hands, his eyes spinning quickly behind them. He wailed convincingly, “I didn't want to upset you... To put an end to the accompanying trees, that bunch of rotten bastards planted wildfire, I've been stressed to death trying to get enough provisions and supplies to the Turmoilers, it's awful!”

This was actually somewhat believable. Zhi Xiu patted him on the head. “Why didn't you say so? I'll have Pang Jian and Bai Ling help you transport some from inside Wan. If it really comes down to it, you can send them away in batches to your South Sea Hidden Realm... Great Wan can take them, too. Kunlun's sword cultivators won't make trouble for mortals.”

Xi Ping felt something on Zhi Xiu's hand rubbing against his head. He looked up between his fingers and saw that archery ring on his hand.

When he had casually asked about it last time, shifu hadn't picked up the subject. Tying it in what Zhou Ying had just told him...

Xi Ping rolled over and sat up. Contrary to Zhou Ying's instructions, he didn't try asking obliquely. He said straightforwardly, "I haven't seen that thumb ring before, and it's the wrong size. My san-ge says your older brother died in service to the country during the Wan-He War. Shifu, was that thumb ring his?"

Zhi Xiu, startled by his candor, drew his hand back.

Xi Ping said, "I thought it was strange when I saw it that day. Aren't all archery rings made of rustproof Moon Plated Gold? Moon Plated Gold hadn't become popular yet back then, right?"

Zhi Xiu slowly twisted that overly loose thumb ring. "Yes... As young as you are, you actually know when Moon Plated Gold became popular?"

"I do," said Xi Ping. "Great Wan's first gold smelting furnace is in Suling. The year you went to the mountains, shifu, Moon Plated Gold came to the mortal world. Shifu, did you pick it up that night you went to the Land of Turmoil?”

“Do not be indecorous in word or deed”—that was what the Wan people said. Attempts and evasions were both subtle; if you avoided a question, the other person would know not to bother you about it again.

Zhi Xiu was briefly rendered speechless by his open prying. Exasperated, he said, “How clever of you.”

Xi Ping was indifferent, overbearing in his reliance on being favored. “Dear shifu, why would I be tactful? When I want to know something, I just ask.”

Zhi Xiu was silent for a moment. “A close personal possession left behind by a deceased blood relative will always have some reaction.”

Old items that stayed with a person over the years, like a pendant or a personal sword, would pick up their owner’s aura. A cultivator only had to be familiar enough with that person’s aura to locate it with their spiritual sense with ease.

And at Zhi Xiu’s cultivation level, as soon as he touched that thumb ring, he would have known what had happened to the ring’s owner shortly before his death.

Xi Ping said, “They say that it was because he was caught up in a battle among cultivators.”

“When troops go abroad, they have to carry a ‘spirit scouter,’” Zhi Xiu said softly. “You’ve never led troops, you may not know what a ‘spirit scouter’ is. It’s a special kind of immortal tool that can be used by mortals—because it doesn’t need to be activated with spiritual energy, you only need to hold it and know how to read it. It is extremely sensitive to fluctuations in spiritual energy. If there are strong cultivators in the area, the spirit scouter will warn them so they can avoid them... This thumb ring, I found it at a place where one of Southern He’s veins of the earth was severed. Go get me a pot of wine.”

Xi Ping swiftly went inside. He saw that the little cottage was covered in papers. There were blueprints for tools, inscriptions he couldn’t understand, sketches of arrays, as well as carelessly scribbled down notes, a bunch of plans for restructuring the Kaiming Department and Heaven’s Design Pavilion, for allocating spiritual stones... All kinds of matters, big and small. And weighing down the pile was an automatic abacus.

The three peak masters who had just been in here must have been working themselves to death.

“He didn’t do it,” Zhi Xiu said. “When the Lancang Sect Leader discovered that the Lancang Mountains were ‘pilfering heaven’s order’ from the mortal world due to the spiritual stone deficit, having no alternative, he only sealed a portion of the veins of the earth, to prevent the spiritual mountains from draining the mortal world dry. At the time, while trying to think up a way to replenish Lancang’s spiritual stones, he also wanted to convey the spiritual energy back to the country. The spiritual stones weren’t replenished. Instead, because the Sect Leader fell into obsession, he lost his mind and provoked the war between the two nations. But he did in fact find a means of conveying spiritual energy back to the mortal world.”

Xi Ping had a faint guess.

Zhi Xiu nodded. “That’s right. It was that spirit-conducting gold you and Lin-shixiong have been cooking up on the sly.”

After Hui Xiangjun’s death, the Unbound Furnace had remained in Southern He. Though the Eternal Flame had been taken away by Qiu Sha, Southern He had been the forebears of the way of toolmaking since antiquity. They had plenty of superb toolmaking master. With Hui Xiangjun's genius before them, they had by some means made something very similar to spirit-conducting gold.

Xi Ping's eyes abruptly opened wide. "I've always said that ordinary Moon Plated Gold wouldn't make for such a big deficit. So the real reason for the Lancang Mountains' spiritual stone deficit was that they were researching spirit-conducting gold on the sly!"

His thoughts moved rapidly: once you knew the secrets of the spiritual mountains, much of the fog of history suddenly dispersed.

Apart from Zhi Xiu, every shed skin accepted by the spiritual mountains was controlled by the spiritual mountains. Why had the Lancang Sect Leader been so susceptible to the heart demon seed back then? Could it be that a mortal like Renzong had also been able to plant the heart demon seed inside the divine tool of the Lancang Mountains?

Xi Ping snapped his fingers. A history book with a copious covering of dust jumped into his hand from a corner of the cottage and automatically opened to the page concerning the Wan-He War. A minute series of cause and effect was recorded there—among the emissaries that had been sent on a diplomatic mission to Great Wan at the time, there had been an established foundation from Lancang's inner sect.

If they had inherited a Way of the Heart and could receive “heavenly edicts,” any established foundation could become the puppet of some group of Ways of the Heart of common origin from the spiritual mountains... In other words, the Lancang Spiritual Mountains had likely “dispatched” someone to bring that heart demon seed back!

Because the heretical Sect Leader had betrayed the will of the spiritual mountains.

No wonder that though the Sect Leader had been the only one in the Lancang Mountains to lose his mind, the whole sect, from top to bottom, seemed to have had a psychological break; none of them had tried talking him down—invading Southern Wan to plunder spiritual stones had been the spiritual mountains’ intention.

“Though Lancang’s Sect Leader had come to an impasse, he maintained a thread of clarity to the end and thought of a way to return spiritual energy to the mortal world,” Zhi Xiu said. “I can understand what he was thinking then—with the four nations invading, their nation would certainly be destroyed, and the Lancang Sect would be wiped out. It would be better to dissolve the immortal mountains into the veins of the earth, give them back to the common people...like what is happening with the Xuanyin Mountains now. The common people would be fine as long as they could live and work in peace and contentment. They wouldn’t necessarily care who was in power. Had they succeeded then, there would have been no southern mines.”

CHAPTER 198 - A Life of Regret (10)

Evidently, they hadn't succeeded.

Zhi Xiu took off the old thumb ring. The thumb ring flashed with spiritual light in his hand. Then an image appeared above the antiquated metal and came striding toward Xi Ping. This human figure was too lifelike. Xi Ping leaned back automatically, then distinguished that this was an armed and armored man, wearing that archery ring on his thumb.

This person's features somewhat resembled Zhi Xiu's, but his temperament was vastly different: there was a stern wrinkle between his brows; his lips, thin as a thread, were turned slightly down at the corners; his gaze was like a knife, so one did not dare to look directly at him.

He seemed to be in the midst of a heavy rain. The rainwater dripped from his armor.

"This is my older brother." Zhi Xiu sat upright where he was and calmly gave his junior an introduction across a distance of over two centuries.

Out of nowhere, Xi Ping's heart skipped.

He saw that this armored general's brow was tightly furrowed as he watched his soldiers push forward a captive.

Xi Ping recognized that captive at a glance and blurted out, "That looks like Southern He's last emperor, Yang Zou."

The first time he had gone with Pang Jian to the Land of Turmoil, they had ended up by mistake in an underground palace and seen a statue of Yang Zou kneeling in penitence. The people of He were indeed skilled craftsmen; the stone statue could be matched to the real person at a glance.

General Zhi Yi had captured the enemy nation's emperor!

Xi Ping made a last-moment effort, quickly scanning through the history book he had on hand. He found no record concerning this. It only said "Zou died in the midst of battle."

This obsessively ambitious last emperor was around thirty, tall and broad, with wide shoulders and a narrow waist. He looked like a military officer. Under his thick brows was a pair of imperious eyes. There was a distinctive tempo to his step, graceful and confident, as if he were still the master of Southern He looking down on all under heaven, inspecting his own domain. A soldier escorting him couldn't stand the sight of this and gave him a shove.

He stumbled, then adjusted within three steps. Fallen into these dire straits, he was having no difficulty maintaining his strength of character.

There was no sound in the image. The soldier escorting the prisoner of war quickly said something.

Xi Ping was still struggling to read his lips when two soldiers came forward and tore apart this emperor's lapels.

Across a distance of two centuries, Xi Ping had an illusion of the smell of blood hitting him in the face—on this last emperor's chest was a palm-length wound, the flesh around it blackened and necrotic; on it, a talisman had been drawn in blood. Something had been sewn into the wound, pushing the flesh there slightly outward. This must have been discovered when he was searched.

No one knew what kind of evil art this was. A number of soldiers holding immortal tool "spirit scouters" trotted over and surrounded Yang Zou in full battle readiness, scanning him up and down. After working at it for ages, it seemed that they hadn't made any sense of it.

The last emperor stood with his chest and back exposed in the rain, letting them surround him and inspect his body. After briefly observing with no trace of shame on his face, he said, "General Zhi, this is only an ordinary sealing talisman. An open-eyed cultivator can use it. It seems there are no cultivators among your forces.”

Yang Zou was speaking in the Wan language. Because he was a foreigner, he spoke slowly, and his articulation was so precise it was a little exaggerated. Lip reading his speech took only one look. When he had spoken, he stuck his hand right into his wound and pulled the flesh apart as though it were clothing.

All the soldiers surrounding him looked alarmed and scolded loudly. Scorching light was coming from his wound. A piece of the sun seemed to have been sealed there, bloody and brilliant. The mortals could no longer open their eyes, but Xi Ping saw that what he had pulled out of the wound was a coil of gold wire. Its texture was extremely similar to Lin Chi's newly made spirit-conducting gold. “So that's...”

“There are special miniature inscriptions inlaid in the gold wire that can naturally blend into the veins of the earth and conduct spiritual energy from a place where it is dense to a place where it is sparse,” Zhi Xiu explained to Xi Ping as he watched Yang Zou's lips moving in the image. “Lancang's situation was somewhat similar to Sanyue's, with the imperial Yang family having a great deal of power in the Lancang Mountains, but unlike in Sanyue, it did not hold sole power. The Sect Leader and many toolmaking masters in venerated positions weren't surnamed Yang. Under those circumstances, internal strife was unavoidable. At the time, all the Yang cultivators, guarding He's Emperor Xiaohuai, broke the siege, hoping that they could later stage a restoration. So His Majesty sewed the spirit-conducting gold wire into his own body, concealing it with his mortal aura, and secretly smuggled it out."

Xi Ping took note of his shifu's respectful address. "Why was the emperor being so furtive...? Oh, I get it."

At the time, the vast majority of the Lancang Mountains' cultivators—at least among the cultivators of the Yang family—were being controlled by the will of the mountains. They wanted to retake the spiritual mountains, not "break up the spiritual mountains' fortune."

And this Emperor Xiaohuai was an oddity. As a mortal in these circumstances, he had refused to be his family's obedient puppet. He had used the Yangs' protection to escape and had even used his own body to transport spirit-conducting gold wire.

"But his luck was poor. After direct encounters with several waves of cultivators, when he was captured by my da-ge, he only had his mortal personal guards beside him. The Yang family wouldn't search him, but our troops did. They felt it at once," Zhi Xiu said. "As for whether it was ultimately that his luck was poor or that something unseen was struggling in its death throes, that can no longer be verified.”

Xi Ping saw the last emperor who had died over two centuries ago suddenly raise his head and aim a strange and mocking look at the sky.

“Shifu, I think he actually felt it then—the so-called ‘Will of Heaven.’”

Zhi Xiu nodded. “The final outcome of a state, whether tragic or glad, is written with the flesh and blood of its sovereign.”

In the image, Yang Zou pulled together his lapels, bowed to General Zhi Yi, straightened up, then didn’t move again.

A soldier next to him fearfully touched him. Yang Zou’s tall body came crashing down. Only after the eye-searing spirit-conducting gold wire was removed did everyone see that in order to hide the gold wire, he had simply broken his ribs and dug out a big chunk of his heart and lungs. He had been living off the spiritual energy that the gold wire was carrying through his meridians and veins.

Looking at it, Xi Ping felt his own heart and lungs contract.

Recalling the insane Renzong, and Emperor Taiming, Zhou Kun, whom one didn't know what judgment to make of, and adding in this Emperor Xiaohuai of Southern He... They were all weak, short-lived mortals, but their actions could scare the "immortals" who moved the wind and rain to tears. It was clear to see that ruthlessness didn't depend on cultivation!

"He gave that thing to High General Zhi because there were no cultivators among the troops?"

Zhi Yi had been over the age of forty at the time. He wasn't a wet-behind-the-ears hothead. Of course he understood that in attacking Southern He, the four nations were blowing the Wan-He war out of proportion in a plot to seize the Lancang Spiritual Mountains. At the time, the Lancang Spiritual Mountains had already "pilfered heaven's order" from the mortal world. During their pursuit, they had seen barren earth all around, marshes running wild, worm masters come to take advantage of the trouble as plentiful as carrion-eating vultures, the cawing of crows falling incessantly on the ears.

The least complicated choice that General Zhi Yi could have made would have been to report this thing to the court and the immortal mountains, stay where he was and await orders... He was only a mortal who worked for a salary. In the eyes of the sect, he was no different from the Latent Cultivation Temple's straw children. These were the people of an enemy nation, anyway; whether the Way of the Heaven or the imperial edict was virtuous or sinful was nothing to do with a person like him, who was there to obey orders. The most adroit method, meanwhile, would have been to temporarily conceal it and delay his report. Yang Zou couldn't be the only person in Southern He secretly transporting spirit-conducting gold wire. If others succeeded, he could be said to have saved the common people here at very little cost in effort to himself; his conscience could rest easy. If they failed entirely, it wouldn't be too late for him to make good his delay—a mortal wouldn't have seen this kind of unbelievable immortal tool before; it was understandable that he would be slow to react; at most he could be said to have been careless in his work, not a major fault.

But Xi Ping had already guessed it—after hesitating for a long time, this man who had brought up his shifu had chosen the stupidest path. When he had received the spirit-conducting gold wire and the torn flesh of the enemy nation's last emperor, he had been not far from one of Southern He's veins of the earth that had been temporarily sealed. He determined to take some trusted subordinates to travel there through the night and quietly disperse the spirit-conducting gold wire into the vein of the earth.

Before General Zhi Yi set out, he said something to one of his personal guards. Surprisingly, Xi Ping understood it.

What he had said was: “I don’t know what condition Jingzhai’s wounds are in. There hasn’t been a letter from home today. I’ll treat it as collecting good karma for him.”

The general left and didn’t come back again.

Xi Ping’s heart jumped. He automatically snapped his fingers and produced a qin note, wanting to interrupt the image from the thumb ring. There was a twang, but Zhi Xiu pinched the qin note. The remaining sound fell from high to low, then was eliminated at his fingertips along with the spiritual energy it carried.

“Watch,” Zhi Xiu said to him. “It is already a matter of history. Whether you watch it or not, it still happened. Do not deceive yourself.”

The thumb ring had recorded intact the final period of its owner’s life: the mortals thought themselves to be acting undetected, but they were under the gaze of the “Way of Heaven,” and those frightened spiritual mountains were like a bloodsucking jiangshi, preferring to be split up rather than be destroyed like this.

In the image, spiritual energy and sword energy flew wildly. Xi Ping’s eyes were dazzled. He saw talismans that were clearly of Chu make, wintry cold sword light, and amid the sword light, the flitting figures of enormous beasts... There were even Wan maneuvers mixed in.

The image abruptly vanished. The spiritual light dispersed from the thumb ring, and it fell tottering back into Zhi Xiu's palm. "They did not deliberately kill mortals. It was only that when they learned of it, they didn't know how many 'lunatics' had smuggled out this gold wire. After a negotiation among the masters from the four nations, they determined to join hands to sever Lancang's veins of the earth, keep the spiritual energy within the spiritual mountains forever. Because of his presumptuous actions, my da-ge just happened to be there—it isn't false that he accidentally got involved."

Xi Ping's heart slowly sank. "Shifu..."

"I am weak and vile. Only now have I dared to look directly at the Land of Turmoil, seek out my older brother's relic, and learn the truth. Even when you asked me just now, my first thought was still to avoid it and not speak of it." Zhi Xiu very candidly waved a hand toward him. "Timidity is sometimes even more dangerous than arrogance. You have the heart of a newborn babe, open and forthright. That's good. Don't be like your shifu."

"But to shift some of the blame, when the Ways of the Heart of common origin hadn't yet revealed themselves on a large scale, the Sea of Stars would have automatically obscured my vision. Even if I had obtained this thumb ring, I still wouldn't have been able to see so clearly." Zhi Xiu glanced at Xi Ping. "I suppose that while my older brother was unable to save the Southern He Peninsula, due to his sacrifice, the karmic reward still came to me...and allowed me not to bungle matters due to timidity, and by a series of coincidences, to reach this day."

Had it not been for Xi Ping, perhaps he would have ignorantly cultivated on Flying Jade Peak, cultivated for centuries or millennia according to the prescribed routine, become a shed skin as was only to be rationally expected and taken his place as a sage, in the future also become a stone complicit in the spiritual mountains' villainy... Wouldn't that have been a sad waste?

From the Xuanyin Mountains, a shed skin's consciousness could just cover the whole territory of Great Wan. Zhi Xiu inspected the border inscriptions. He scooped a handful of chestnuts out of the fire and gave them to Xi Ping. "If you have nothing else to ask, Cui Jui's cousin, come and take up your old profession. Help me do some accounts—none of the cultivators above an established foundation can be trusted, Great Wan's internal defenses have been emptied out. I've asked Lin-shixiong to alter the spirit-conducting gold as soon as possible. But that thing's destructive force is too strong, and it automatically pilfers heaven's order. If we are to give it to low-level cultivators or mortals to use as 'downgraded immortal tools,' we must add all kinds of restrictions. Come and count up for me, how many spiritual stones will it take...”

As Zhi Xiu spoke, he recalled something else. “With turbulence in the southern mines, Northern Li ought to be sending an inner sect master to oversee things. Since His Highness Prince Zhuang is in contact with Kunlun, does he know who their representative is?”

From the identity of the representative Northern Li had sent, Li’s plans for the southern mines would be evident.

“Yes,” said his “open and forthright” disciple who had the “heart of a newborn babe,” not missing a beat. “An ascended spirit sword cultivator, called...Cheng something?”

There weren’t many famous sword cultivation masters in the world. One hand might not be enough to count them, but you wouldn’t need more than two. Moreover, this “Cheng” wasn’t a common surname. As soon as Zhi Xiu heard, he knew who this was. “Kunlun’s Cheng Yu.”

Xi Ping’s expression didn’t waver. “Right, him.”

Northern Li was always locked up. He’d had little contact with Kunlun’s people. The only one he remembered was the sword cultivator who had exchanged greetings with Lin Chi during the siege on Qiu Sha in Wild Fox Country, so he had casually taken him out to use as a shield.

“That’s all right. I’ve heard he is very talented, and of steady temperament and good character. He isn’t unreasonable.” Zhi Xiu nodded. “When I’ve handled matters within Great Wan, I’ll go pay a visit.”

“Sure, then I’ll have a chat with him first.” When he lied, Xi Ping was never afraid of being seen through. After his answer, he turned around and said to Zhou Ying through the reincarnation wood, “San-ge, stay in the Beijue Mountains for a few days, wait for Kunlun to invite you.”

CHAPTER 199 - A Life of Regret (11)

Chang Jun was muttering all kinds of frightening outcomes, pacing back and forth like a trapped beast, his hands shaking fretfully.

Yao Qi, meanwhile, seemed to be in a daze, staring “blankly” at him—he had to stare, because Chang Jun’s seemingly random hand movements were “tapped sweet notes.”

The Yao family’s discipline was too strict. Yao Qi had never gone out fooling around when he was young. He had forced himself to memorize the “sweet notes” because, after learning that Xi Ping had used them to transmit information, his persecution complex had acted up, and he had worried that someone would use this technique against him one day. Strange to say, secret signals used for mischief were extremely easy to learn. He muddled through and then suddenly picked them up, himself not knowing when he had learned them. But if you wanted to study them properly, as a language of code, it would have been even harder to memorize than Detailed Account of Meridians.

Yao Qi wasn’t all that familiar with sweet notes. He was trying to stare a hole into Chang Jun’s hands.

Chang Jun, tapping out sweet notes, asked, “Are you ready?”

Yao Qi miserably knocked his head against the wall, indicating that they were all set.

Chang Jun said, “We can’t put it off any longer. It has to be tonight.”

After getting the idea to blow up an inscription to escape, the two of them had rummaged through their brains to fish out and recall the basic knowledge concerning inscriptions that Luo Qingshi had taught them fourteen years ago—inscriptions were profound, and the Latent Cultivation Temple was only the place where mortals opened their spiritual eyes; originally he hadn’t taught inscriptions, but thanks to Xi Shiyong’s blessing, the provisional disciples who came after him had inexplicably acquired an additional class, giving the mighty Luo Qingshi and the disciples yet another opportunity for mutual torment.

Finally, according to the Land of Turmoil’s monsoon climate, the two of them had calculated that blowing up the inscription at midnight ought to create the least harm. It wasn’t hard to reckon the time, since those evil cultivators had disdained to so much as lay hands on mortal objects and had left them everything in the nature of pocket watches. But the two of them had already missed two midnights because they had gotten cold feet.

Chang Jun said, "It's almost time. We're on our last legs. If we can't do it now, then we really won't be able to do anything ever again!"

When he was finished tapping out these sweet notes, without waiting for Yao Qi to respond, he exhaled and plopped down next to him. "How could Shiyong be so decisive back then?"

Yao Qi pursed his lips and shamefacedly lowered his head. "Perhaps that's the difference between mediocrity and genius."

Chang Jun didn't bother tapping out sweet notes. He opened his mouth and said, "Come to think of it, if I die like this, there'll be nothing about me worth recording apart from my dates of birth and death... Ziming-xiong, what do we amount to?"

For some reason, these words seemed to stab Yao Qi to the heart. "What do we amount to?" echoed repeatedly in his mind.

Yao Qi suddenly remembered the Latent Cultivation Temple's Su-shixiong. On the last day, when he had seen them off, he had gone through them one by one giving instructions and encouragement. When it was his turn, as the last disciple in line, Su-shixiong had perhaps truly been unable to think of any good points, so he hadn't given him any false praise but had only said to him, "Ziming, the Xuanyin Mountains have one Grand Selection class every ten years. From each generation, in all of Great Wan, only twenty or thirty people are chosen. Having come here, you are already the best of the best. You must do right by yourself.”

You must do right by yourself...

The Turmoilers scattered throughout the wilderness seemed to be making a futile effort to find food in the gaps between the wildfire, occasionally letting out shrieks that only they themselves could understand.

The meaning was “no clues.”

Wei Chengxiang, receiving their secret signals, took out Yao Qi’s disciple name token and glanced at it. She didn’t dare to use her own half-immortal level talismans and was wearing a set of “invisible snake scale armor” that Xi Ping had turned up, her hidden figure mixed in among the Turmoilers.

“The Queen Mother of the West’s hidden realm must be a relic of Lancang. It’s too powerful,” Wei Chengxiang said to Xi Ping. “There’s no reaction from the disciple name token. I don’t know whether it’s because the hidden realm is blocking it, or because we’re looking in the wrong place. What do we do? Listen, nephew, when the name token’s owner—this Yao Qi—gets close to his own name token, will there be any particular reaction?”

Xi Ping was silent for a moment, then, enduring humiliation for the sake of his objective, he answered, “Supposedly. Outer sect disciples only take back their name tokens when they’re transferred or return to the Latent Cultivation Temple to advance their cultivation. The thing’s supposed to come with a warning system and be able to make a person bear in mind their position or something. I’ve never felt it, anyway. I figure it’s only a sense of ritual, don’t rely too heavily on it.”

Wei Chengxiang thought, What kind of useless flummery is all this? The Xuanyin Mountains are made of nothing but unnecessary formalities. She was just about to say something when her spiritual sense was suddenly touched. She raised her head abruptly and saw something come out of nothing amid the obviously empty and deserted wasteland, splashing out a bit of spiritual energy. The weather on the Southern He Peninsula was so humid that the air was about to start dripping, but a cluster of sparks had flown out of there!

A thread of Xi Ping’s consciousness was inside the reincarnation wood amulet hanging around her neck. He froze abruptly, past events suddenly reappearing before his eyes.

“That’s no power... Someone’s ignited an inscription.”

Though they had made all possible preparations, the result of igniting the fireproofing inscription was outside of Yao Qi and Chang Jun's expectations: this inscription didn't make anywhere near as much of a commotion as when Xi Ping had blown up the Qiu courtyard. It only blew open the cell the two of them were imprisoned in. Before the sparks could break through the ascended spirit hidden realm, they were knocked back.

But the harm to them was enormous. They were both simultaneously sent flying.

Yao Qi's vision darkened. He had the impression of shattering on impact. For a moment, he became confused in his daze; his unremarkable life even began to flash before his eyes.

The sounds of angry cursing and jumbled footsteps came much faster than his hearing could recover. Before Yao Qi could come back to his senses, he felt a constriction around himself. He had been bound by a spirit-binding talisman!

The evil cultivators under the Queen Mother of the West's command had reacted extremely fast, swiftly coming to take care of them.

Yao Qi was lifted off the ground. There was a roaring in his ears. Someone dealt him a heavy blow, knocking his murky mind awake.

This was it. They had failed completely!

Yao Qi knew that evil cultivators often put their hidden realms in remote and deserted places, and those without an inscription key couldn't even find the entrance. The explosion that had just nearly jolted him to bits had not only not gotten out, it had also angered the evil cultivators here!

Yao Qi struggled to open his eyes and saw Chang Jun also being dragged like a dead dog, blood flowing from the orifices of his face; it was unclear whether he was dead or alive.

The evil cultivators tossed them into the same place, and they didn't lock them up again. Instead, they surrounded them murderously, talking over each other in the ancient Southern He language. They seemed to be debating whether to kill these two Wan dogs. One of them lost his patience halfway through his sentence, pulled his sword, and slashed at Chang Jun's leg.

All the blood in Yao Qi's heart froze into ice: no!

Just as his eyes were about to burst from their sockets, all of a sudden, the whole hidden realm shook violently. The evil cultivators went silent and raised their heads in alarm to look around.

The invisible inscriptions in the air above the hidden realm lit up one after another. Next, there was an alarm whistle and the sound of tearing silk. With each tear, an inscription disappeared. Aggressive talismans burst in.

They'd been discovered! A master was attacking the hidden realm!

The Turmoilers who had just been searching in the wilderness had vanished like voles. Wei Chengxiang, recovering from her shock, had withdrawn two li away. She landed at the foot of a withered reincarnation wood tree and stumbled for half a step before finding her footing.

She swiftly let loose her consciousness and scanned the surroundings, saw that it was relatively safe, then reached into a hole in the reincarnation wood tree and twisted.

There was a creak as gears and bearings began to revolve. A boulder at the foot of the tree moved aside, revealing a concealed mechanical door.

Wei Chengxiang took out the qiankun pouch she had just used to scoop up the Turmoilers and shook it out; one after another, the Turmoilers who had been protected inside the immortal tool ran out of the pouch, and then, without needing her to instruct them, filed into the mechanical door under the tree, going underground. A thread of steam emerged, perfectly blending in with the water vapor on the ground.

Only then did the spiritual wind raised by cultivators fighting at close quarters surge their way. As if verifying something, Wei Chengxiang touched the intact stealth armor she was wearing. “Damn it, who’s that? They came so fast!”

When Yao Qi and Chang Jun had desperately set off a few fleeting sparks, Xi Ping had confirmed the location where the Queen Mother of the West’s hidden realm was concealed. Making a prompt decision, he'd had Wei Chengxiang ignite a signal flare specially used by Great Wan’s southern mines.

While these things were specially provided for use by the mine supervisors, when it came down to it, they were made by the Xuanyin Mountains. Xi Ping could get his hands on as many as he wanted.

The signal flares were divided into different grades. The one Wei Chengxiang had set off was an “emergency” flare, visible throughout the whole Great Wan mining area. After tossing it, she had immediately fled without hesitation. But despite this decisiveness, she had a thrilling close encounter with a group of black-clothed people... Fortunately, the Queen Mother of the West's hidden realm had captured their attention, and the immortal tool from Moon Plated Peak was reliable.

Without further ado, the black-clothed people began wildly hammering at the Queen Mother of the West's hidden realm. There was no lack of established foundation masters among them.

Wei Chengxiang couldn't quite catch her breath in the sudden spiritual wind blowing her way. "Are they from the Mining Office? No, never mind the Mining Office, not even Heaven's Design Pavilion would necessarily be able to react this rapidly."

"Well, of course," Xi Ping said. "Apart from the bitter ex-husband, who else could it be?"

Wei Chengxiang: "..."

She'd forgotten that detail.

"While all the nations are in turmoil, the situation is in constant flux; it's hard to be sure of anything. If anything happens to one of the other nations' Mining Offices, they can bring inner sect masters in at any time. Only Great Wan effectively has no inner sect now," Xi Ping said. "People go for soft targets. Even thinking with his toe, the Emperor of the East could have guessed that the Queen Mother of the West and her people would move their hidden realm to Great Wan's encampment. Out of twelve shichen in a day, he spends ten and a half of them sticking pins into a doll of the Queen Mother of the West. If he had been following that as his way, he might have become a full moon sage by now. He understands Yang Wan better than you do."

"What a guy." Tightly wrapped in the stealth armor, Wei Chengxiang returned to the vicinity of the Queen Mother of the West's hidden realm. "You men truly have a breadth of mind that never disappoints."

"What are you talking about? You can't tar us all with the same brush. Look at me—I'm very broad-minded." In order to demonstrate his "breadth of mind," Xi Ping cast aside his face and sat on it. "Aunt—look out for the Emperor of the East. The stealth armor won't hide you from an ascended spirit's eyes. Change to a Luwu mask."

No sooner had he spoken than Wei Chengxiang saw the Emperor of the East Halberd descend from the sky, leaving a tear in the hidden realm.

The Queen Mother of the West and Lord Guang'an weren't there. As the sole ascended spirit present, the Emperor of the East steamrolled over everyone else.

While the two sides were locked in battle, Wei Chengxiang pressed the spiritual image mask onto herself, changing her appearance to match the black-clothed people and removing the armor. She mixed in with the Emperor of the East's people. The Emperor of the East's self-satisfied laughter sounded above her head. "That woman and her little boy toy have some nice stuff! You can keep whatever you take!"

The Emperor of the East's subordinates were true evil cultivators who were in the Land of Turmoil year in and year out—of the type of the former Exonerators. These types established foundations just for the sake of running amok. They didn't care about cultivating their hearts; when their Ways of the Heart backlashed against them, they lost their minds and died. They had no bottom line. Hearing these words, their eyes glowed blue with avarice. As if they had taken a strengthening tonic, they strove against each other to be the first to charge in.

With the hidden realm broken, there was no more obstruction between Yao Qi and his name token. The name token immediately warmed up slightly.

Xi Ping instructed, "Half-immortal, act within your capabilities. Don't show off."

Wei Chengxiang said, "Cut the crap."

She made a dash following the name token's directions. When she spoke, it was in a deep masculine voice: "Over here!"

The black-clothed people running around like headless flies thought that she had found some great treasure and instinctively followed her. The evil cultivators guarding Yao Qi and Chang Jun saw a large-scale attack and were forced to join battle.

An established foundation cultivator in front of her stabbed at Wei Chengxiang with his sword. Wei Chengxiang ducked under the sword, leaving him to the black-clothed person behind her, and rolled into the thicket next to her. The thicket and the stealth armor concealed her. She went into and out of the armor. When she rolled back out, she had already used the spiritual image mask to turn herself into the person who had just tried to cut her down.

Yao Qi and Chang Jun had already recovered by this point, escaping death by the skin of their teeth...though they hadn't escaped altogether. They were fearfully looking at each other in dismay.

When cultivators fought, naturally there was spiritual energy scattered everywhere. There was spiritual energy for them to use now!

Chang Jun was the first to come to his senses. He breathed deeply from the diaphragm and used spiritual energy to burst the cords binding him. When he had just freed his legs, he saw an “evil cultivator” running toward him.

Chang Jun turned pale with fright, wriggling on the ground like a big caterpillar. In his flurry, the top of his head banged against Yao Qi’s nose. The magic iron-head attack nearly brought Yao Qi to tears.

“Don’t cry, stop struggling!” Wei Chengxiang, who was always fighting evil cultivators, tossed out talismans with a swiftness comparable to Pang Jian’s in the past. Two silencing and paralyzing talismans fell on the two of them. She held her fingers together like a knife and cut apart the spirit-binding cords on the two of them, then tossed Luwu masks, reincarnation wood amulets, and Yao Qi’s disciple name token toward them all together. With a snap of her fingers, she undid her own talismans. “Don’t just sit there!”

Yao Qi and Chang Jun both had civilian posts at the southern mines and were unaccustomed to using Luwu masks. In this emergency, their brains overheated, and they both took on the appearance of Wei Chengxiang’s current disguise. The three of them stared at each other like triplets.

Wei Chengxiang: “...”

Was it possible that among the criteria orthodox sects used to pick their disciples, one was “stupid enough”? This had also been Zhao Qindan’s style when she had first defected... So how had that Tai Sui, who was always pulling evil tricks, managed to get in?

“It shames me to say,” said Xi Ping, “that my respected teacher, moved by my kindness and sincerity, recommended me.”

Yao Qi and Chang Jun reacted half a beat late. They used the Luwu masks to change into different evil cultivators who had been guarding them and followed Wei Chengxiang outside the ring of battle. When they had just gone around the cell where they had originally been imprisoned, they saw two of the Queen Mother of the West’s people running over in a panic. From a distance, they called in the Southern He language, “Sneak attack, think of a way to notify Her Highness...”

Then the two evil cultivators’ voices abruptly came to a halt as they stared at Yao Qi and Chang Jun in shock—by coincidence, these two evil cultivators were precisely the “templates” Yao Qi and Chang Jun had used.

Wei Chengxiang’s vision darkened: amazing.

Not waiting for them to speak, she jumped out of the circle of the two pairs of “twins” to demonstrate her innocence and cautiously called the nickname of one of the two evil cultivators: “Ergui, what’s going on with you guys?!”

She had been a visiting courtier serving under the Queen Mother of the West. Though she had made no close friendships, there were still many people she recognized. As soon as she called the name, the evil cultivators immediately tacitly acknowledged her as one of them.

The original evil cultivator was beside himself with rage. “Spies! Get them!”

Yao Qi and Chang Jun had been dizzy to begin with. Adding in that they couldn’t speak ancient He, their expressions as they stood there were already giving them away.

Wei Chengxiang quickly joined the evil cultivators, then pulled her sword on the two “brilliant products” of the Latent Cultivation Temple.

Outwardly boiling with rage, she said, “How bold!”

Her words were dramatic, but her feet were half a beat slow. When the two evil cultivators had charged forward, she struck like lightning, bringing them down from behind. Then she smoothly cut their fingers open and smeared them over a reincarnation wood amulet. Xi Ping effortlessly snatched away their consciousness—ultimately, Wei Chengxiang couldn’t bring herself to kill the Queen Mother of the West’s people; this was safest.

She took everything off the two evil cultivators and put their senseless bodies into her qiankun pouch.

Only then did Chang Jun force out the words, “Might I be permitted to ask, Your Excellency...”

Wei Chengxiang smiled. “A Luwu. I’m nobody.”

Yao Qi: “...”

This person turned out to be a commoner, a Kaiming Cultivator whose spiritual eyes had just opened. What kind of “best of the best” were they? Su-shixiong had lied to him!

Wei Chengxiang skillfully hid to observe the battle, taking the two useless clubs with her. “Coming this aggressively to ransack the place, the Emperor of the East must know that the Queen Mother of the West and Lord Guang’an aren’t here?”

“Ah,” said Xi Ping. “Yu Chang is wavering between the Three Heroes of Turmoil, and the Emperor of the East can’t be colluding with only Yu Chang. He must also be in contact with Wangge Luobao.”

Wei Chengxiang said, "...So they're all secretly grouped in pairs, fine, I got it. The Emperor of the East must be thinking of a way to cut the Queen Mother of the West off in the southern mines—listen, is it really a good idea to make Yang Wan be the first to be eliminated from this game? The rest are even worse."

"Yang Wan won't be eliminated," Xi Ping said slowly in a strange tone.
"There's something I want to verify—"

CHAPTER 200 - A Life of Regret (12)

Wei Chengxiang concealed herself snugly in the stealth armor and kindly provided stealth talismans for the two who would draw the wrong talisman when they got excited. After doing all this, she still hadn't heard a follow-up from Tai Sui. "Verify what? Why did you stop talking? Are you out of oil?"

"Have you heard of Wanshuang's Sword Slave from Kunlun?" Xi Ping said unhurriedly then. "I have it on reliable information that she's currently next door in Northern Li's mining area. I want to verify whether something can restrain her."

Hearing this, Wei Chengxiang pondered carefully for a moment, then advised, "Why don't you go over there and hang yourself at her doorstep, see if you can extort her to death?"

Xi Ping: "..."

He seemed to have learned the meaning of the phrase "the scenery is the same but the people have changed." Over a decade had passed, and the Land of Turmoil still couldn't grow a single shoot of wheat, but the cute little girl who'd believe anything you said to her had "changed" into this.

Wei Chengxiang said, “The Sword Slave is the extant pinnacle of the way of the sword. With Wanshuang, even Kunlun’s Sect Leader gives way to her somewhat. Are you planning to invite your esteemed teacher here? Let’s not talk about whether he’d be able to defeat her after having just become a shed skin. Right now, Great Wan is relying entirely on one Zhaoting. It’s no joke. And he isn’t going to cast aside the whole domestic situation and run over to duel Wanshuang just for the sake of a little patch of land like the southern mines, is he?”

“Do you remember the Law Breaker?” Xi Ping said. “Once the Law Breaker’s rule—its axiom—is fixed, it can carry off dozens of ascended spirits all at once, and even Xuanwu had to poke holes in his mask when he came inside. Sometimes, cultivation isn’t all that important. That time in Tao County, when Qiu Sha and that whole crowd of masters were having their earthshaking battle, in the end, it was a ‘half-immortal who would die at a single prod,’ a ‘little pretty boy who only knows one ascended spirit talisman,’ and a temporarily paralyzed wise man who took control of the situation.”

“Please put on some clothes, immortal.” Wei Chengxiang didn’t understand. “Wait...what? Where are you going to get another Law Breaker?”

“Someone once told me that the spiritual mountains are big Law Breakers. That might be true. We’ll see.”

In order to protect themselves, the Lancang Spiritual Mountains had forsaken their native soil and people and lingered on at death’s door until today. What were they thinking now? If the jiangshi-like Ways of the Heart were still buried under the Lancang Mountains, they might very well take this opportunity to choose Yang Wan...without her knowing about it.

Wanshuang’s Sword Slave didn’t take the southern continent seriously and thought she could cut a swath through all monsters and demons, but could she handle “fate”?

“Someone is cursing me. I figure it must be Yu Chang.” Xi Ping’s spiritual sense was giving him a faint signal. “Ah, I hope that four-hundred-plus-year-old bachelor from Western Chu will learn something from this campaign. Since time immemorial, when caught between a married couple, who can come to a good end apart from their son?”

Yu Chang had wanted to be the hidden hand behind the scenes, not expecting that hand to get stuck full of thorns. He was currently paying his respects to each of Tai Sui’s and the Emperor of the East’s ancestors in succession.

After Western Chu's Xuanwu had met the crowd of orthodox cultivators advocating for having him branded as a rebel, he courteously fought a battle with them.

Naturally, the "orthodox cultivators" were inspirational in their devotion to righteousness when provoking the enemy into battle with their curses, but when it came to blows, they were scared enough to wet their pants. When it had looked like the spiritual mountains were about to change hands, of Sanyue's three great Principal Peaks, the Central and West Peaks had simultaneously displayed their prowess in a moment of crisis—with Xiang Ning's corpse dissolved, his Way of the Heart had returned to the spiritual mountains, joining the ranks of the ghosts. The Silver Moon was pulled over. Its stabbing gaze was full of enmity as it looked upon Xuanwu.

Xuanwu was only a shed skin whose grave injuries had yet to heal. He didn't dare to act as a tassel on a divine tool of the mountains, and now there was no more Heartless Lotus for him to use. All he could do was stay his hand and temporarily retreat to the East Peak, standing alongside the other two peaks and vying for the right to control over the Silver Moon. According to Yu Chang's eyes in Dongheng City, the Silver Moon hanging in the sky was currently like the hand of a watch, revolving back and forth among the three mountain tops.

Sanyue's traditions had always been iron-handed might and lax government, never looking down. The ascended spirit masters were all currently engaged in a tug-of-war over the moon. No one had attention to spare for the mortal world. Their outer sect, the Qilin Guard, had for the most part relied on spending money and taking elixirs to get their positions. They were either the children of some bully somewhere or nobles from Dongheng. The former had already revolted along with their families, and the latter, after losing support from the inner sect, were running around like headless flies in a state of anxiety.

All the bullies were falling over each other to stake a claim. In the whole Sanyue Spiritual Mountain Range, apart from the three great Principal Peaks, which no one dared to approach, practically everything had been snatched up by them. These arrogant local thugs had at their disposal the "offerings" their families had spent over a thousand years accumulating, all masters past the established foundation boundary. Dealing with the imposters in Sanyue's inner sect took them no more effort than blowing away dust.

But these offerings had suffered from spiritual image brands. They were like evil spirits kept by their masters. If they only had the chance, they were sure to turn on them.

While Yu Chang had been in the Slumbering Dragon Sea, he hadn't lost contact with the circle of offerings within Western Chu. While he helped these offerings deal with their brands, he had also imperceptibly influenced them with the "grit projections." It could be said that all the powerful offerings in Western Chu now were under his control. Once he could secretly remove their brands, Yu Chang would be the most powerful and influential person in the whole country, and he would be perfectly concealed in the shadows as he sat and waited for the Xiang family and Xuanwu to destroy each other.

The plan was seamless. But there were always unexpected rotten branches popping up to make trouble.

The spiritual image brands could only be removed every day precisely at noon. In fact, with the concentration of Tai Sui's consciousness, even if he brought in the whole country's offerings all at once, he would still be able to control the papermen. But that slick bastard's excuse was that he had been injured while fighting the Territory Map. If it wasn't his head that hurt, it was his ass. Every day, he only returned to Tao County briefly, accepted two or three people if he was happy, or even only one person if he was in a bad mood, deliberately extending the battlefield!

Yu Chang had slipped up. He hadn't specified in the blood contract when the brands were to be removed.

That had been all right to begin with. Tai Sui wouldn't go back on his word about removing the brands. There was no benefit to him in those local despots who used spiritual image brands to control these masters gaining power. Yu Chang had kept calm about it at first. But he very soon discovered that that Tai Sui brat had given them rope to hang themselves with—once he slowed down, there had to be an order of priority among the offerings. Once there was an order of priority, there was disparity; they immediately split into many different levels.

All the offerings had been tormented by the spiritual image brands for over a century. No one had suffered less than anyone else. Having made it past establishing their foundations, no one was more cowardly than anyone else. Those who first had the opportunity to remove their spiritual brands were naturally a cut above the rest. Cries of discontentment could be heard everywhere about the delay. Before great matters had begun to move, these brothers had shown faint signs of falling out. Every day, they annoyed Yu Chang into a terrible state. And perhaps it was his mistake, but it seemed that the offerings whose consciousnesses had come in contact with Tai Sui, once their brands were gone, had become far less susceptible to the influence of the “grit projections.”

Yu Chang had just been preparing to get out his trump card ahead of time, give Tai Sui his punishment, when the Land of Turmoil escaped his control...because of a cuckold.

The chief offering had his sights set on the Sanyue Mountains. He had no interest in the Southern He Peninsula, a garbage heap that the four nations had spent over two centuries vandalizing. He had been acting purely to muddy the waters and arrange a deathtrap there for foreign powers that could endanger him—primarily a certain individual surnamed “Tai.”

Making contact with Yang Wan hadn’t been hard. That woman might have been the only evil cultivator in the world who still considered herself to be orthodox. After all this time, she had heard of the trouble in Southern Shu’s Lingyun Mountains and had worked things out. She knew that in a momentary slip, she had nearly let herself become a knife for that evil Wangge Luobao to use to harm his country and bring calamity to its people. Naturally she understood the “secret troubles” that had led to Yu Chang’s last-moment defection. She had quite a good opinion of him.

She disdained to associate with the hardly human evil cultivators of the Land of Turmoil. Her eyes and ears in the Land of Turmoil had never been as keen as the Emperor of the East’s. And Yu Chang had perfectly made up for her shortcoming: Western Chu’s mining area, an outer sect far from the capital, had long ago been secretly taken over by him. The two sides had readily accorded.

At the same time, to guard against the Queen Mother of the West standing alone and getting out of control, Yu Chang had prepared another move: he had colluded with the Emperor of the East.

Before the Queen Mother of the West had released her miasma, he had turned around and notified the Emperor of the East and given him the antidote, hoping that the Emperor of the East could ready the million evil cultivators at his command and make the battle in the southern mines an even more interesting spectacle.

But with such a great opportunity, heaps of spiritual stones and mines right in front of him, the Emperor of the East was actually resisting the temptation, not plotting to take them. Like a fly chasing a fart, the only thing on his mind was his ex-wife!

When Yu Chang learned that the Emperor of the East had somehow found his way to the Queen Mother of the West's den and immediately attacked, he was simply stupefied: the four nations' spiritual mountains were still waiting to wipe out the evil cultivators, and the evil cultivators themselves had broken out in internal strife before they could get to it.

There were thousands of poems in the world about abandoned wives, and tens of thousands of verses about resentful wives, all of them unable to match up to the thrill of a single cry from the Emperor of the East as he came out of nowhere. What a great husband!

Yu Chang's intuition said that the course of events wasn't right and immediately sent a warning to his people in Western Chu's mining area, but it was already too late—

The fireworks display Wei Chengxiang had put on when impersonating Yao Qi and Chang Jun had carried no small force. It had blown all the snakes and rats hidden in the southern mines out all at once.

Since the Zhou family's schemes had been revealed, there had been no one like Zhou Qing at the southern mines, able to oversee the situation openly and in secret. The seniors who'd had brands stamped on them had died or sunk into the sea. Those who came after them were all trembling with fear, wanting not to win merit but to avoid fault and just get by. Seeing the "emergency" flare in the sky, the "brilliant" mine supervisors collectively froze, having no idea what to do. The evil cultivators who had infiltrated the southern mines, however, were as perceptive as could be.

As soon as they saw the flare, the fake Yao Qi and fake Chang Jun knew that it had come from the direction of their lair. They thought to themselves that something drastic must have taken place to let those two little half-immortals escape.

Fortunately, they had already released the miasma. Without needing to consult, the two of them left the southern mines by night in perfect silent accord, heading toward the place they had arranged ahead of time with Her Highness.

And behind them, in a puddle along a street in Southern Wan's mines, a pair of yellowish brown eyes emerged. A little water snake no thicker than an earthworm watched the direction the two of them went in.

The information the snake saw flew over the sea and landed in the hands of a beast-taming Miah cultivator.

Right now, Wangge Luobao was standing on a waking dragon's back, playing the flute. The next life spiritual fish, flickering in and out of sight, circled him, and behind him was a great number of spiritual ships. The waking dragon stuck to the surface of the water. This whole area of the sea seemed to be covered in a layer of moonlight, protecting the boats and ships that the Miah were using talismans to propel.

The Miah cultivators were singing softly in chorus to the flute music. Their song was full of grief and anger—the flute player was false, but the singers were true.

Of the Miah who hadn't escaped from Southern Shu's main peninsula, over thirty thousand had died, male and female, young and old—the enraged Xiuyi hadn't let any of them go. The Three Islands were now also held by the aggressive Xiuyi cultivators. Fortunately, Wangge Luobao had appeared. They had fled their native land and were on their way to seek out new resources and take back what was theirs.

The seething Miah cultivators were now hardly more than a hundred li from the Southern He Peninsula. Like starving carrion-eating vultures, they had their eyes on the corpse of Southern He.

“Clan leader, our eyes in Southern Wan's mining area have confirmed it, the Queen Mother of the West and Lord Guang'an must be hiding in Western Chu's mining area.”

“Western Chu's Yu Chang...” Wangge Luobao put down his flute. “What does the Emperor of the East say?”

“The Emperor of the East has some skill. He has already found the Queen Mother of the West's den. He says that Yu Chang really is worthy of his red-eyed little face—as expected, he's a wretch trying to score a meal at both ends, and only we are true allies. Western Chu's mining area, where the Queen Mother of the West and her people are hidden, isn't far from the Xiuyi's spiritual beast farm. The Emperor of the East is asking us to help him hold up those two ascended spirits, and afterward we'll split the resources in the Queen Mother of the West's Hidden Realm. The blood covenant signed by one party has already been sent over." The Miah cultivator suppressed his greedy excitement, presenting the blood covenant sent by the Emperor of the East.

Wangge Luobao took a glance at it but didn't accept it.

"Yu Chang certainly won't want to see the Three Heroes of Turmoil exhaust themselves in an internal struggle before they can provoke a disturbance. He's sure to think of some way to protect the Queen Mother of the West. If we go ashore now, we'll be exposing ourselves too early. We'd make ourselves into targets for the Xiuyi and the Chu," Wangge Luobao said softly. "The Emperor of the East is only using us to exhaust the Queen Mother of the West and Yu Chang. When we've pretty much all died off, naturally there will be no one to split resources with... What is it with these easterners always taking other people for idiots?"

The greed on the Miah cultivator's face was wiped off his face by this bucket of cold water. Ashen-faced, he said, "These sly easterners go too far!"

Wangge Luobao waved a hand, indicating for him to keep calm. He slowly stroked the flute's fingerholes. "Don't worry. We'll leave it up to the immortal mountains' orthodox cultivators to punish evil."

As soon as the Emperor of the East touched the hidden realm, Lord Guang'an and the Queen Mother of the West immediately perceived it.

The two of them had scattered poison miasma in Great Wan's mining area and hidden in Western Chu's mining area, which was in reality controlled by Yu Chang—Chu's mining area was to the north of Wan's mining area, very close, a place they could control the whole situation from; at the same time, if the miasma was discovered by a master when it spread to Northern Li's encampment, the chaotic Southern Wan mining area could block the first wave of searchers and give them room to escape.

The two of them had even buried another kind of miasma in Western Chu's mining area that they hadn't set off, in case Yu Chang betrayed them at the last moment.

Who would have thought that it would be their own backyard, which they had thought was absolutely safe, that caught fire first?

Just as the two of them were planning to withdraw to the Wan mining area and rescue their home, a huge gold-armored zheng somehow came over from the Shu mining area's spiritual beast pasture to the north.

The Shu were always letting gold-armored zheng graze in the canal, but each country's mining area's borders had inscriptions. Spiritual beasts wouldn't approach the borders. But this gold-armored zheng had somehow gone crazy and simply charged the border between the two countries' mining areas. It was disemboweled by the triggered border inscriptions. Dragging along all its internal organs, it rammed right into Western Chu's mining area.

The Chu guards and mine cultivators were startled by the huge falling corpse. Before they could come forward to investigate it, the gold-armored zheng's corpses exploded into a pile of bits. The bloody mist was scattered everywhere by the Land of Turmoil's strong wind.

“Careful! There's...”

The Chu cultivator couldn't finish getting his warning out. It was as if he had melted. In the blink of an eye, he had rotted into a pool of corpse water—with the border inscriptions as a barrier, even if all the spiritual beasts in Southern Shu's mining area turned into big bags of poison, at most they could have killed a few border guards. It wouldn't have created such a big disturbance.

But what that gold-armored zheng carried wasn't miasma, but a talisman to activate miasma. It had activated the poison that the Queen Mother of the West and Lord Guang'an had buried as insurance against Yu Chang.

The intensity of an ascended spirit medicine cultivator's miasma could paralyze all of the Chu mines within a few breaths. The Queen Mother of the West had intended to use it to keep herself from being trapped by the Chu.

The dense fog exploded instantly. The Queen Mother of the West was caught off guard, her own miasma getting out of hand in the place where she was hidden.

Curing poison was always slower than doing the poisoning, and the wind just happened to be blowing from the west.

Everyone involved in this was too clever. Each person had prepared a trap, hollowing out the earth.

A firecracker had been cast and was scattering in all directions. It would remain to be seen who would be the first to be buried.

The rolling miasma was taken to the eastern side of the Northern Li mining area in a flash by the evil wind from the sea, touching Northern Li's border inscriptions.

A terrifying consciousness immediately locked onto them.

Lord Guang'an felt his spine turn cold. He backhandedly clapped a suit of protective armor onto the Queen Mother of the West and pushed her away.
“Go!”

CHAPTER 201 - A Life of Regret (13)

The Chu had been taken down by the Queen Mother of the West's own miasma. Yu Chang wouldn't have had time to rescue her even if he had wanted to.

A beam of sword energy like the wrath of heaven smashed the border inscriptions of both Chu and Li encampments, tore right through the immovable miasma fog, and in a flash surged up in front of Lord Guang'an. Like a piece of paper in a hurricane, this ascended spirit sword cultivator who had laid siege to Xuanwu in the South Sea was held down by that sword energy, unable to resist. In an instant, he was gone.

The Queen Mother of the West's dismay hadn't even had time to appear on her face!

But the sword energy had yet to stop. Going in the direction the west wind was blowing from, it split apart the whole Chu mining area at once and surged toward the South Sea.

Though Wangge Luobao was caught off guard, his reaction was extremely swift. In a flash, he blew a sharp whistle inaudible to the human ear. The ships on the water were tightly wrapped in spiritual energy and sank into the sea. All the waking dragons underwater flew out, swapping places with the ships.

The dreamlike sacred beasts let out frightened wails, but they couldn't disobey a beast tamer's command. They shielded the ships with their bodies. The sword energy fell in the South Sea with a boom, cutting a "wound" ten li long in the sea. The seawater on either side took a long time to fall. The blood of the waking dragons dyed that sea trench a dense, milky white.

Even Wei Chengxiang and the others hidden in Southern Wan's mining area felt it. The Emperor of the East gripped the incessantly buzzing Emperor of the East Halberd in terror. All the established foundations and half-immortals locked in battle on the ground momentarily forgot to breathe.

Xi Ping was far away in the Xuanyin Mountains, but that sword energy seeped from the reincarnation wood amulets in the hands of each Turmoiler and each Luwu, sweeping out in front of him. He immediately pulled his consciousness out and leaned back. He practically had the illusion of having his throat cut by the sword light.

Oh no. The shard of Zhaoting was still in his spirit!

In his desperation, Xi Ping's first reaction was to make a shield of his consciousness, acting as a firm barrier between the two famous swords of the north and south, taking on all the sword energy from Wanshuang without letting a thread leak out.

His consciousness was nearly cut open by the sword energy. He took a breath, and his back was already soaked. There was a chill on his face—a cut on his left cheek ran all the way down to the corner of his mouth. In the blink of an eye, the cut was healed by the formidable restorative powers of an ascended spirit.

This was...the extant pinnacle of the way of the sword.

Upon making an appearance, she had cleared away all the interwoven schemes and intrigues on the continent!

The whole of the Southern He Peninsula trembled in the midst of that attack. Before the major and minor evil cultivators could come to their senses, in the miasma-congested dense fog of Western Chu, a mountain of a “person” slowly walked out, half a head taller than even the steam cars in the Chu mines.

The half-puppets on the southern continent primarily used Moon Plated Gold and wood to make up for shortcomings in the human body; the lighter the material, the better. Xi Yue had been lighter than a wool blanket when he was little, so a mortal young man could pick him up one-handed and run all over the mountain with him.

But this Sword Slave from Northern Li was extremely heavy. The ground trembled beneath her feet. Each step carried the distinctive trill of a sharp blade slicing the air. The inscriptions on the ground in the Chu mines were like water, breaking apart where she stepped and “rippling” outward in all directions. In the blink of an eye, the better part of the Chu mining area’s defenses had crumbled!

The better part of her body was a heap of ghastly pale bone jade, with metal varying in hue and texture exposed at the joints. At a glance, the metal looked like a random pile of scraps, but from every bit of it came a harsh energy. If you stared at it casually, it would pierce your eye and unsettle your spiritual sense—it was said that the iron in the Sword Slave’s body wasn’t mundane iron, but the shards of a hundred and eight sword cultivators’ vital swords. She was like a walking sword crypt.

This was what Xi Ping saw through the reincarnation wood amulet of a Luwu in Chu’s mining area.

This Luwu was pretending to be a traveling merchant. He had fallen under the tables and chairs along with the other travelers and put a poison repelling pill from Rosy Cloud Peak in his mouth. Though it wasn't the right antidote, it could still ameliorate the effects. The Queen Mother of the West's strong poison hadn't taken him down, but the sword energy that the Sword Slave brought with her as she passed nailed him firmly in place. Xi Ping distinctly sensed that the half-immortal Luwu didn't breathe for a long moment.

The moment he saw that person...that sword-wielding puppet, Xi Ping understood why the Sword Slave didn't take the southern continent seriously, and why san-ge had said that Great Wan couldn't oppose Northern Li under any circumstances—they would have no chance at all.

And apart from her, Northern Li had three other shed skin sword cultivators and a dozen ascended spirits!

Xi Ping wiped the blood off his face. A thread of his consciousness curled up in the Luwu's palm, which was covered in cold sweat. He began giving earnest consideration to A-Xiang's suggestion of going to hang himself at the Sword Slave's doorstep.

Where the Sword Slave passed through Chu's mines, gas lamps exploded, train tracks snapped, burning boilers and passing cars were soundlessly extinguished, their casings slowly cracking open—she seemed to hate all of these machines. “Evil cultivators are openly hiding in Chu. It seems that Western Chu's mining area has escaped the Sanyue Mountains' control. The death penalty may be dealt.”

As she spoke, she had already arrived in front of the Queen Mother of the West. In her face overgrown with rifts, a pair of eyes like inanimate objects looked down, fixing on the Queen Mother of the West's face.

The Queen Mother of the West seemed to have been frozen. The Sword Slave coldly said, “Yang clan remnant, I hear that you people recently joined hands and nearly brought down the Lingyun Mountains. Do you think that all orthodox cultivators of the immortal mountains are worthless wretches like those Shu cowherds?”

Yang Wan was trembling. As hot sweat steamed off her, it actually turned to frost in the sultry heat of the Southern He Peninsula, coating all her finery.

“Toying with diabolical inventions to the point of forfeiting your nation's blessings.” The Sword Slave snorted quietly. “Is your Lancang Sect worthy of being called the ‘sword sect’?”

No sooner had she spoken than the protective armor the Queen Mother of the West wore abruptly cracked open. Xi Ping's field of vision suddenly cleared—the spiritual energy stirred up by that protective immortal tool that was of at least ascended spirit grade practically turned into a hurricane, blowing the roofs off all the buildings in the area!

When the gale had passed, the miasma that had been covered up hit the Sword Slave right in the face at extremely close range. The part of it that fell on the ground corroded it, making a hole. The Queen Mother of the West got on a sword and was about to leave.

But the Sword Slave shifted her heels slightly. Unflinchingly, she raised a hand and grabbed the deadly miasma.

The Sword Slave's protective spiritual energy was at least as thick as Xi Tai Sui's face; even Jinping's city wall couldn't quite compete. The Queen Mother of the West's miasma, which could make all the fish in the East Sea go belly up, was powerless against her. Yang Wan's feet had just left the ground on her sword when the sword snapped. She tumbled to the ground along with her sword—for ten li around Wanshuang, no sword dared to fly.

Even through the reincarnation wood, Xi Ping felt that overbearing sword aura. Comparing it to Zhaoting, which he had with him and which didn't even give him a headache when it beat him, he couldn't say who was being insulted by putting the names of the swords of the north and south together.

The richly attired Queen Mother of the West landed miserably and “melted” where she was without making a sound.

When the seven great ascended spirit evil cultivators had besieged Xuanwu in the South Sea, Wangge Luobao had obviously not used his full strength; his depths were unknown. The Emperor of the East had an unorthodox background and the most contemptible tricks. Zhuoming and Yu Chang were both schemers full of guile. The Snow Wolf and Lord Guang’an were two great sword cultivators, one with a soft sword, one with a firm one, equally matched. They were at their strongest directly facing the enemy. But the Queen Mother of the West basically hadn’t attacked. A medicine cultivator only seemed capable of playing an auxiliary role against an enemy. She had always been under the protection of her loyal sword cultivator.

Only now did Xi Ping learn why the Emperor of the East said that Lord Guang’an was her kept little boy toy—facing a powerful foe, the Queen Mother of the West was exceedingly calm. The craftiness of her methods actually exceeded Lord Guang’an’s. The poison miasma blended into the wind, the water...even into the light. It was everywhere, getting in by every opening. Xi Ping’s vision suddenly blurred. He realized with a start that it included a poison that could numb the consciousness.

He quickly put a mind calming pill under his tongue. In just this brief span of time, without him noticing it, the better part of Xi Ping's protective spiritual energy had dispersed. The wintry wind of Flying Jade Peak chilled him to the marrow. He turned his head and sneezed. He hadn't sneezed in over a decade; he wasn't used to it anymore. He accidentally bit his tongue, even bringing tears to his eyes.

It turned out that Wen Fei's fighting skills weren't the exception.

And yet the ways of medicine and toolmaking had always been discussed on equal terms in the cultivation world! If this wasn't a misunderstanding, then the toolmaking cultivators must have been surreptitiously talking themselves up!

The Sword Slave's protective spiritual energy was quickly being nibbled away in bits and snatched away in chunks. That monster made of stone and iron didn't move a muscle. She stood calmly amid the pernicious fog. The fog was like the acid in a factory, quickly scouring away her invisible "armor." As soon as it found a crack, that miasma seemed to come alive and "prick" at her.

Just then, sword aura that made it hard to catch your breath burst from the Sword Slave. Xi Ping didn't even get a clear look. He only heard a woman give an extremely brief scream.

The churning point of the sword stirred the surrounding fog like a turbine, forcing out a faint human figure inside it. The Sword Slave didn't even touch the Wanshuang Sword. She reached out and wrung the Queen Mother of the West's slender neck.

In a daze, Xi Ping seemed to hear the sound of her neck snapping. All he could see was a vague, ornately-dressed, wide-sleeved outline in the fog. Then there was a sound like tearing silk. His heart gave a fierce jump. That woman's body disintegrated in the Sword Slave's hand, her precious pearl and jade ornaments shattering all over the ground!

But soon after, he realized that he hadn't sensed the spiritual energy fluctuation of an ascended spirit's demise.

Xi Ping threw caution to the wind, taking his life in his hands to go meddle. Avoiding the sword energy, he released his consciousness within a narrow range. The miasma nearly soaked his spirit. He saw some bits of rag bearing sword cuts fall to the ground. It was a substitute that had been torn to pieces by the Sword Slave!

The real Yang Wan's figure flashed quickly. She was just about to escape under cover of the fog. The Sword Slave gave an angry shout and formed a sword seal with both hands. A gust of sword wind flew from her palms. Her puppet body was extremely heavy, but she was as agile as lightning in motion, even more rapid in her pursuit than the sword wind.

Yang Wan was entirely enveloped in a heinous murderous will. At last, she was out of tricks. Panic appeared on her face. The Sword Slave was just about to disappear from the reincarnation wood amulet's field of vision. As Xi Ping coughed, he rapidly sought his next vantage point...

Just then, the Sword Slave's enormous body went rigid. The blow she had aimed at Yang Wan went astray!

Even Yang Wan was stunned.

Xi Ping's eyes lit up. Without further ado, his consciousness rushed to the reincarnation wood amulet under the Beijue Mountains. Giving no explanation, he simply snatched away Zhou Ying's consciousness as he was drinking tea with the Blind Wolf King—there was no need to bother with empty formalities with a cultivator of the way of clarity.

“San-ge, cough-cough...lend me your eyes, look at the Sword Slave!”

Zhou Ying saw through the miasma at a glance. The demon eyes gazed upon the Sword Slave's body. The Sword Slave's protective spiritual energy was evidently in perfect condition, yet each and every joint made from the shard of a sword was infected with poisonous miasma.

With a thought, Xi Ping used a talisman to weave a big net inside the reincarnation wood, snugly shielding Zhou Ying's consciousness, blocking the miasma. He felt the poison invading his lungs and coughed so hard he couldn't catch his breath. Yet there was the excitement of wishing to see the world in chaos in his voice: "She...she's been infected, hasn't she?"

The power that had been hidden in the shadows all along, without anyone knowing about it, had struck.

Zhou Ying said, "With something other than what you're infected with."

"Obviously, I know that. How did she get infected? Even if Yang Wan had simply torn open her protective spiritual energy and poured in her poison, it still wouldn't have had this effect."

In the cultivation world, poison wasn't a dirty trick. It was a method of doing battle.

If you just put poison into food or drink, no one would be poisoned. It had to be made into a miasma. And making a poisonous miasma was a great test to one's cultivation. Generally speaking, an ordinary cultivator's miasma could only take down a cultivator at their own level or below. Those who could poison someone above their grade were all masters. And so-called going “above their grade” only meant taking one small step forward—like a near-established foundation killing an established foundation. In a single step, you couldn’t do the splits right up to the sky.

It was said that Kunlun’s Sword Slave had already wielded Wanshuang in excess of two centuries, even longer than the master of Zhaoting, the new Sword of the South, had been cultivating at all. And the Queen Mother of the West had only become an ascended spirit after Qiu Sha had pierced the sky. Her cultivation level was about the same as Xi Ping’s!

Zhou Ying observed briefly, then slowly said, “The Sword Slave is a half-puppet.”

Xi Ping’s ears were already starting to ring, but after a moment’s blankness, he immediately caught on: the Sword Slave was too terrifying, which had made him forget for a moment that, strictly speaking, she was the same as Xi Yue.

All cultivators starting from the established foundation level had an essence. The higher their cultivation, the thicker their essence.

As an ascended spirit fighting with a cultivator of the same level, after exhausting his essence, he had needed Bai Ling to feed him spiritual stones transferred from all over the country. But shed skins were different. Zhi Xiu didn't need to take spiritual stones when he went out. He was practically half a spiritual mountain himself. That was why there was so much damage when a shed skin's essence was exhausted or they passed away.

But the Sword Slave wasn't a cultivator. She had to eat spiritual stones.

“She's eaten spiritual stones from the Lancang Mountains!”

The Sword Slave only felt indescribable sluggishness coming from each and every one of her joints. Her spiritual energy actually went out of control. The confused Queen Mother of the West suddenly seemed to hear something. She abruptly turned her head to glance at the Lancang Mountains, dim amid the fog.

In this brief moment, the Sword Slave had already forcibly suppressed the miasma that had contaminated her whole body. She slashed at the Queen Mother of the West. The west wind suddenly changed direction, pushed all the miasma in the sky toward the Sword Slave. The sharp sword only cut off part of the hem of Yang Wan's skirt—she had escaped!

The Emperor of the East sensed something. Without a word, he vanished, abandoning all his crowd of henchmen where they were.

Wei Chengxiang heard Xi Ping's hoarse voice: "Poison-repelling pills, take as many as you have, quick!"

No sooner had he spoken than the Queen Mother of the West's entire hidden realm moved as though it had grown legs, carrying away all the cultivators inside it. An ominous poison mist emerged from the inscriptions on the ground, turning the black-clothed people coveting the hidden realm's resources into the hidden realm's resources themselves.

"Bring a drop of blood into the Law Breaker and give it to me." When Wei Chengxiang had finished getting the blood with a struggle, he pulled the three people's consciousnesses into the Law Breaker all at once to take shelter temporarily. He didn't have time to give too many instructions. He hurriedly ran off with that drop of blood to Rosy Cloud Peak—poison-repelling pills that weren't the right formula could only delay the effects of the poison. To cure it, they would have to rely on Wen Fei.

Zhao Qindan happened to be in the Law Breaker space, helping Tai Sui prepare things for a fresh round of brand removals. She turned her head and saw to her surprise the three people who had dropped in. "A-Xiang, are you... Chang-shixiong? Yao-shixiong?"

At the same time, Zhou Ying's consciousness was delivered back to the Beijue Mountains in perfect condition by Xi Ping. When he opened his eyes, he saw the Blind Wolf King craning his neck to look at him. "This is my first time seeing an established foundation cultivator who didn't establish his epilepsy away. Listen, little devil, what's the matter with you, having a fit just like that?"

Zhou Ying politely pulled back his hand and stood. "Wolf King, there is a letter from Kunlun."

CHAPTER 202 - A Life of Regret (14)

“Peak Master Wen—”

When Xi Ping reached Rosy Cloud Peak, the miasma was already choking his throat and lungs. He could no longer speak. This cry had come from Xi Yue, who had seen him nearly fall off his sword on Flying Jade Peak and had kindly escorted him here.

Wen Fei took one glance at Xi Ping’s face, utterly bloodless as a fierce ghost’s, and was so scared he even dropped his fan. “Wh...where h-have you been...h-haunting?”

Xi Ping staggered and stuffed his blood along with that of Wei Chengxiang and the others into Wen Fei’s hands. He mouthed, “Find a cure.”

Having said this, he ignored Wen Fei stammering over every word to say, “Don’t die on my doorstep,” closed his eyes, and collapsed.

Next to him, Xi Yue was startled. He held him up and saw that his chest had stopped rising and falling. He looked at Wen Fei in agitation. “Peak Master, he...”

Wen Fei calmly picked up his fan and waved his hand, using the fan to say, An ascended spirit doesn't give up the ghost this quietly. His consciousness has just departed.

Xi Yue thought that this sounded like a very serious symptom. He quickly asked, “Why would his consciousness depart?”

Wen Fei was perplexed. How else is he supposed to make trouble?

Xi Yue: “...”

He had thought that Xi Ping had been injured by the poisonous miasma, that he was urgently seeking help from Rosy Cloud Peak, so weak that he couldn't even maintain the presence of mind to speak a single sentence; but it turned out that he had run over, peeled off his damaged skin sack, tossed it to the “tailor,” and gone back out to cause mayhem without even taking the time to give detailed instructions.

He was so busy!

Xi Yue came to his senses, and exasperation welled up in him. This feeling of being dejected and short of breath was inexplicably familiar, making him freeze in spite of himself.

He was nowhere near old enough to be having memory problems. Watching Xi Ping lying there motionless, Xi Yue suddenly remembered that this person seemed to have frightened people with quite a few wretched actions of this nature before. But strangely, these things seemed to be buried deep in the corners of his memory, like long and redundant texts memorized and recited in childhood. Though he remembered them all when he was prompted, he normally wouldn't remember them.

Frowning, Xi Yue pressed a hand to his chest—even now, he had only recalled the events. No matter what, he couldn't remember how he had felt at the time. He had evidently experienced them, but it seemed as though he hadn't been present.

Moreover...he and this nominal older brother had gone through so many things together. Why would he feel like such a stranger?

Xi Ping had no time to attend to anything else right now. He sank his consciousness into the reincarnation wood, rushing to wrap up this chaotic situation, his will firm despite his failing frame.

On the Southern He Peninsula, all the Turmoilers furtively holding reincarnation wood amulets received “Tai Sui”'s signal to “take action.”

The Sword Slave was after all one of the extant ultimate masters. After briefly cycling her energy, she broke through the poisonous miasma twined around her. She was in an incandescent rage. Ignoring all the nations' borders, her tyrannical consciousness covered the whole of the Southern He Peninsula.

There was no trace of the Queen Mother of the West. There seemed to be some peculiar link between her and Lord Guang'an. As soon as she escaped, Lord Guang'an, who had been pounded into the earth by a beam of Wanshuang's sword energy, had also disappeared. And these two evil cultivators' hidden realm, concealed in Great Wan's mining area, had relocated unnoticed, leaving behind only some corpses and marks of a fight between cultivators.

In Western Chu's mining area, there was dead silence.

Yang Wan's hiding place had been located at the heart of the Chu mines. The most important parts of each nation's spiritual stone mines were heavily guarded, and she had not only been able to enter, but had also been able to comfortably set up housekeeping; obviously she had been invited. That Yang clan survivor had deep ties to the Chu!

On the Chu-Shu border, the blood of the gold-armored zheng had yet to dry. It was that animal that had triggered the poisonous miasma.

A master like the Sword Slave, who looked down upon all creation, had long been accustomed to being the focus of everyone's attention as soon as she appeared. She frequently considered events from only two angles—"Is this person trying to get on my good side?" or "Is this person trying to counter me?" Therefore, she believed as a matter of course that the Queen Mother of the West had activated the miasma in order to escape from her. It hadn't entered her mind that this was a muddled internal conflict brought about by mutual wariness among the evil cultivators. The workers in Shu's mining area's spiritual beast farm were all Turmoilers. At Xi Ping's request, the Turmoilers had now deliberately herded all the large spiritual beasts far away from the Chu-Shu border, leaving behind only a crowd of snakes and rats and such, which peered sneakily in the direction of the Chu mines, perfectly "substantiating" the Sword Slave's conjecture: the Yang clan survivor was also colluding with the Shu.

As for Wan's mining area, which was teeming with worthless wretches—the miasma that passed from person to person had come from the Wan mining area to begin with, and Yang Wan had hidden her den in it. It went without saying that there was something fishy going on there.

Finally, she turned her gaze upon Northern Li's mining area. A bloody light emerged in her asymmetrical eyes.

The Sword Slave absolutely refused to believe that a mere early stage ascended spirit medicine cultivator could create a miasma that would poison her. While she didn't understand these underhanded tricks, at her level, she could sense that what she had been infected with was something different from the miasma spread throughout the surroundings. In other words, the poison that had infected her had been planted ahead of time "in her own home"—even Li's territory contained Yang Wan's moles!

And just then, where the Sword Slave's consciousness was located, a peculiar scene took place.

The Turmoilers that could be seen everywhere, whether doing hard labor in the mines or wandering through the wilderness...all suddenly stood in place, motionless. Though they clearly hadn't discussed it ahead of time, they raised their heads simultaneously, looked in a certain direction, and recited something while bowing. The kneeling homage looked like it was being performed by puppets on strings, the movements done in perfect unison, as if they had all been possessed by ghosts!

The Turmoilers couldn't speak clearly. No one understood their "bestial language." Because their intellects were incomplete, there wasn't even a way to soul-search them. But there was one term that appeared repeatedly in the mumbling that sounded like a call to draw the soul from one's body. This term was "Your Highness" in the ancient He language!

Had the Sword Slave not been made of iron and stone, she would have broken out in gooseflesh by now. Her figure flashed as she suddenly flitted in the direction those Turmoilers were bowing. At her cultivation level, it took only the space of a few breaths for her to reach the mountaintop. To her horror, she found that those Turmoilers were bowing in the direction of the Principal Peak of the former Lancang Sword Sect—the place where its long-vanished divine tool, the Lovebird Sword Array, had hung!

After the Lancang Sword Sect had been destroyed, the four nations had deliberately obliterated the traces of those traitors to the cultivation world. Even the juniors in the mines now didn't know which mountain had been Lancang's Principal Peak. How did these short-lived Turmoilers know?

The Sword Slave's heart went cold. Looking at the southern mines again, she thought that the waters here were deep indeed, the situation knotty and deep-rooted. The ascended spirit Yang clan survivor was only the tip of the iceberg. At her back there seemed to be an abyss gazing at her. Even her own people couldn't be trusted.

On the southern continent, Xuanyin was under threat, and Sanyue and Lingyun couldn't control their rebels. All powers would have their eyes fixed on the resources of the southern mines, so the Sect Leader and the High Priest had sent her to oversee matters. Apart from the new Sword of the South being able to raise her interest slightly, the Sword Slave hadn't taken any of it seriously to begin with. She had even been planning to take advantage of the chaos to simply swallow the Lancang Spiritual Mountains in one gulp... Now it seemed that the Sword of the South, tied up with domestic trifles, was the least of her problems.

The Sword Slave's expression became grim. She blew a long whistle into the sky, sending a message back to the Kunlun Mountains.

She wasn't the only one to see the Turmoilers behaving strangely. Before Yu Chang in Western Chu and Wangge Luobao in the sea could recover from the aftereffects of Wanshuang, they learned that the Queen Mother of the West had escaped safely, as if by miracle.

While the two of them didn't have the same aims, the same thought appeared in their minds without prearrangement: that woman hadn't shown her hand during the battle in the South Sea; it turned out that she had been hiding such depths!

All clever people knew to be flexible, and evil cultivators in a turbulent world had waists more pliant than the dancing girls beside the Lingyang River. Wanshuang's Sword Slave was an enemy who could never be converted into a friend, but the Queen Mother of the West perhaps wouldn't object to some more allies.

Even Yang Wan herself was shaken.

When the Sword Slave's attack had gone astray, her consciousness and the spiritual sense attached to her physical senses had been seized by a "heavenly edict." No one could describe what her emotions had been at that moment—after two hundred years, the scar-riddled spiritual mountains of her homeland had protected her. They had spoken to her.

Guang'an's essence had been pierced by Wanshuang, his meridians shattered. She had only brought him out through the special marriage contract between the two of them. He was now lying unconscious in her carriage. Yang Wan had fled all on her own. Just as she was beginning to suspect that the voice of the spiritual mountains had been her own illusion caused by Wanshuang's attack, she saw a miracle before her eyes—tens of thousands of Turmoilers prostrating themselves in the direction of Lancang's Principal Peak. They evidently couldn't speak, yet they were struggling to recite her name in Southern He's ancient language.

In that instant, Yang Wan made her decision. She grabbed a handful of barren earth and piously kissed it—she believed that the soul of her native land, which had suffered its fill of devastation, still remained, and she was the chosen one of heaven.

Xi Ping, having cooked up a god so effectively that no one had the slightest doubt, still felt that there was something missing, so he transmitted the Queen Mother of the West's likeness to the Turmoilers. Skilled hands may have been the natural gift of the people of Southern He. In hardly any time, the Turmoilers' deformed claws had carved lifelike wooden statues.

“Right, just like that. Stone and clay images are good, too. From now on, make them whenever you can. Try to spread the statues throughout the mining areas. Bow to them when you see them,” Xi Ping said. “By the grace of heaven, we'll all be Her Ladyship's people from now on!”

In this way, all living creatures in the Land of Turmoil—including even birds, beasts, insects, and fish—had come “under suspicion” of being the Queen Mother of the West's people. The Sword Slave couldn't cleave a hundred million ants to death with one blow. She was alone and unaided. All she could do was abandon her posturing and retreat to the northern border of the Southern He Peninsula and cooperate with the Xuanyin Mountains' upstart.

They both belonged to the immortal mountains' orthodoxy and ought to be as close as twins. Wouldn't it be nice if Zhaoting and Wanshuang could fight the demons hand in hand? Why insist on a fight to the death?

If this Yang clan survivor turned out to be like the last emperor Yang Zou and wanted to “disperse” the Lancang Spiritual Mountains, then that really would be...

Just wonderful.

“The Sword Slave has been poisoned? No... Her!” The Beijue Mountains’ Blind Wolf King was so shocked that he stretched out his two scrawny arms and mimed the shape of a block. “She’s made of iron, carved of stone. Is she even capable of being poisoned?”

“It seems she is,” said Zhou Ying, in accordance with the facts.

The Blind Wolf King, pinching the letter that had just come from the Kunlun Mountains between two fingers, looked at him with the same marveling gaze, feeling that the way of clarity was a wonder. “Not bad there, kid. No wonder the Xuanyin Mountains have changed hands. How did you people do it?”

“I’m no expert in the way of medicine and poison,” Zhou Ying said, lying through his teeth. “The word from the Southern He Peninsula is that the birds and beasts all stop to bow when they see the Queen Mother of the West. Presumably she really has been chosen by fate and has means we know not.”

The Blind Wolf King slowly settled into his heap of fox-fur robe and narrowed his eyes, looking at Zhou Ying. “The High Priest has agreed to see you. The southern continent has a foul atmosphere. I’ve heard that people even shut themselves up in metal cages and ride around in the streets. Kunlun does in fact need a reliable ally, and the Sword of the South is a decent choice, but you had better not get any ideas.”

Zhou Ying looked at him candidly, his gaze as limpid as a mountain spring...except that in the spring was a demon seed.

“If you hadn’t already established a foundation, you could have studied under me. What a pity.” The Blind Wolf King clicked his tongue and waved a hand. “Wu Lingxiao is proud and arrogant. She’s fallen flat on her face this time.”

Having said this, he picked up a small wine pot, executed a “winding” stretch, and noodled away...not noticing that he had accidentally used the Sword Slave’s real name.

Zhou Ying looked thoughtfully at his retreating figure. When he raised his head, he met the gaze of the Crown Prince Snow Wolf, then nodded courteously to the Crown Prince Snow Wolf.

The Snow Wolf pretended not to see. He coldly lowered his gaze and went chasing after the Blind Wolf King like his shadow.

Zhi Xiu had been at the border to begin with. On receiving Wen Fei's message, he had passed through a snow shuffler on Flying Jade Peak in a blink. He was just about to go to Rosy Cloud Peak to see his encumbrance of a disciple, reported to be "so badly poisoned he had turned into a withered eggplant," when all of a sudden his consciousness noticed a drop of blood.

Xi Ping had been cut by Wanshuang's sword energy when it had leaked from the reincarnation wood. He had been busy looking for a place to get a closer view, so he had casually wiped the blood off, not noticing that it had stained the small table.

Zhi Xiu frowned. His spiritual sense moved faintly. He reached out to touch the bloodstain. After a moment, he turned and ran. "Little whelp!"

Before Xi Ping could give Lin Chi a full description of that special spirit-conducting gold that could reconnect veins of the earth, the tail end of his words changed key into a scream.

The corner of Lin Chi's eye twitched, his delicate features twisting into a peculiar expression that lay between "Revenge at last" and "I can't bear to watch.”

Wen Fei said, “Deal—with—it.”

Using the poisoned blood, Wen Fei had first created an antidote for the three half-immortals who hadn’t been heavily poisoned, then gone to concentrate on dispatching the miasma Xi Ping had contracted.

According to this wicked stutterer, Xi Ping had picked up a dozen different kinds of poison. Taking antidotes for them all might have been enough to burst his guts, and refining the medicine would have been too time-consuming. It was better to “go to the source.”

It was only then that Xi Ping learned that “the strength of one can defeat the skill of ten” also applied to the way of medicine making. Wen Fei didn’t even look at what kind of poisons the Queen Mother of the West had used. He simply dismantled the miasma she had made with brute force, scattered the poisons, and left Xi Ping to digest them himself.

Wen Fei shot a beam of essence into his meridians. It was as if a crash of rhinoceroses with cannons strapped to their backs were charging madly through Xi Ping’s bones, exploding when they hit an acupoint. Xi Ping seemed to become the sky over the Sea of Stars the other night, several hundred fireworks exploding simultaneously in his body, making him want to get up and turn cartwheels.

The Queen Mother of the West hadn't managed to poison him to death, but he was going to be nearly beaten to death by Wen Fei.

“Ah... Do all you medicine cultivators smash rocks against your chests...? Hss, Wen Fei! How many patients have you killed with your cures... ah! Fuck!”

In the end, the Master of Moon Plated Peak found his conscience and feebly put in from the sidelines, “Wen-shixiong, can...can you just tear open a miasma in a living person's body like this?”

Of course you can't. Wen Fei's fan, hanging in midair, fanned a breeze toward him, writing in small, stylish running-standard script.¹⁰¹ Otherwise, would I have needed to stay at the Latent Cultivation Temple for three years back then? It would break a person's meridians.

Lin Chi said, “Huh?”

Wen Fei wrote, But he's unbreakable, isn't he? And we haven't got three years.

Xi Ping: “...”

This stutterer was abusing the power of his office for personal revenge!

Before the rictus of pain could recede from his face, a sly smile appeared at the corners of his twitching eyes. He was just about to make a scene when a loud shout came from outside Rosy Cloud Peak: “Xi Shiyong!”

“Shifu!” Seeing that his solid mountain of support was on the way, Xi Ping’s spine stiffened. He got ready to lodge his complaint. “Peak Master Wen is...”

Then he saw Zhi Xiu stride in with his face as grim as deep water. “Explain this to me. Cheng Yu is an ascended spirit. Where would he get shed skin sword energy?”

Xi Ping: “...”

His mountain of support had collapsed and was about to crush him!

While Rosy Cloud Peak was in utter disarray, Zhou Ying left the Beijue Mountains, heading toward the Kunlun Mountains. The Snow Wolf had been ordered to see him out. As he watched that frail established foundation’s figure vanish amid the heavy snow, the look in the Snow Wolf’s eyes grew grim. A concealed communication immortal tool emerged in the palm of his hand.

CHAPTER 203 - A Life of Regret (15)

The thing in the Snow Wolf's palm was called a Linked Heart. Like Xuanyin's Heavenly Question, the Linked Heart was Kunlun's most heavily encrypted communication immortal tool. Not even the Blind Wolf King had better think of spying on it—it was for the exclusive use of the inner sect.

The Snow Wolf had obtained it when he had just become an ascended spirit.

Since he was little, people had told him that the way of the sword was impartial.

This way didn't rely on external objects. Unlike the medicine and toolmaking ways, it didn't require a large quantity of material resources and at least as much financial wherewithal as luck. And unlike other ways, it wasn't so dependent on spiritual sense and natural talent; neither a first-class spiritual sense that gave you twice the results for half the effort, nor the innate spiritual bones that would put you half a step from an established foundation as soon as you opened your spiritual eyes would give you an edge over anyone else. It didn't even rely on a person's physical condition—Zhi Xiu's martial skills had been thoroughly mediocre. Opening your spiritual eyes cleansed your vigor and strengthened your marrow. As long as you didn't get an eye-opening wound bad enough to leave you missing a limb, the slight differences among mortals would all be evened out.

This was a way for those who were best at tolerating loneliness, at hardening their hearts and tempering themselves, at being staunch.

So when Kunlun selected its disciples, it was much more fair than the southern continent, where you could get in on surname alone.

Every year, the immortal mountains would pick a group of children around ten years old and lock them up in the outer sect Disciple Hall to focus on training. They were tested once a month. The standards for elimination were harsh. Between entering the sect and opening their spiritual eyes, ninety percent or more would wash out. Those who succeeded in opening their spiritual eyes would still be faced with a once-in-fifteen-years contest, where one of a hundred would be chosen to enter the inner sect. The rest would go to the outer sect called the Night Revenants.

But spiritual mountains were spiritual mountains. No matter how fair, as long as the Disciple Hall wasn't so large that it could contain all the young students of the sword on the northern continent, this road to heaven requiring a bitter trek had nothing to do with the common people.

The Snow Wolf was one of the people who had been shut out. He had fallen just one step short.

He had been born into an official's family and had held sword since the moment he could walk. He was the eldest son, the one destined to enter the crucible cast of iron that was the Disciple Hall and shoulder his family's great expectations. Any willfulness or pampering would have damaged him. His father had never smiled at him, as if he was never good enough. His mother's love was all for his younger siblings, as if the warmth of affection would have melted the sword heart he had yet to find.

There were two things that the Snow Wolf hated most in his life. One was a high courtyard wall, and the other was the sword.

Since he was three years old, he would get up in the morning to practice swordsmanship, then study in the afternoon. He hadn't known a single day of idleness. Apart from making offerings to ancestors at their graves, he couldn't go out. There were stringent rules for what he could eat and drink. He was nearly ten years old when he ate candy for the first time—it was a mass-produced malt sugar candy that glued your mouth together and had a bitter aftertaste. The very last of his family's guards to be dismissed had given it to him, just before leaving.

The year he was to formally enter the Disciple Hall, there was a rupture among Northern Li's military families, caused by Moon Plated Gold. The progressive party was utterly routed. His whole family suffered. His father was stripped of his rank and banished into the wilderness. His mother committed suicide. The Snow Wolf no longer needed to study the sword.

His childhood had been more austere than the harsh winter of the Beijue Mountains. He had become experienced in loneliness.

A large enough forest contains all kinds of birds. There are people in the world whose love turns to hate, and there are also freaks like the Snow Wolf, whose hatred had turned to love. From that day forward, the sword became the Snow Wolf's first obsession.

In Northern Li, if you couldn't follow the orthodox way of the sword, all you could do was go to the Beijue Mountains to seek asylum with the Blind Wolf King.

The Blind Wolf King had originally belonged to Kunlun's orthodoxy. He had already been an ascended spirit when he had rebelled against Kunlun. It was said that he had rather good connections in Kunlun's inner sect. Kunlun had turned a blind eye and only ordered him never to leave the area of the Beijue Mountains. It amounted to a disguised exile.

The Beijue Mountains guarded the Beijue Pass. They were the extreme boundary, beyond which humans could not live. Past the Beijue Mountains, even a master's essence could freeze in the unpeopled northern plains. Cultivators all had to rely on external objects to keep warm there. Mortals couldn't get near.

The Snow Wolf came up with a "masterstroke." He spent ten years getting a Lingchi Lantern off the black market. This thing had initially been an implement of torture. You couldn't use it unless you bore an enmity built upon the extermination of your family and the desecration of your ancestral tombs. Using a person's flesh and blood as kindling, it could burn for a month without dying. Even the evil cultivator who had sold him the Lingchi Lantern had been on the point of speaking, advising him, "Burning another means burning yourself. Think it over. It isn't worth it."

The Snow Wolf had run up to Beijue with the Lingchi Lantern and lit himself on fire. Heaven had been merciful, allowing him to walk clothed in flames yet, on the point of death, come to the Beijue Pass before he burned up and find the legendary Blind Wolf King.

One of the Blind Wolf King's followers put out his fire, went to marvel at him, and told him, "The Perplexing Sword will not accept anyone without at least a first-class spiritual sense."

The Snow Wolf couldn't speak his despair—his throat had been burned useless long ago. He scraped the ground with his head, dropping blackened bits all over the snow and letting the sword he carried fall.

The snakelike Wolf King strolled over then, hands tucked into his sleeves. He had smelled something from afar and thought that someone had burned a roast lamb. He came over, yawning, ready to curse them out and, as soon as he looked down, saw the family emblem on the Snow Wolf's sword.

It sounded like a joke when you said it. The Snow Wolf had suffered untold hardships and finally been burned to charcoal, and it had been his family background that had allowed him to become an “evil cultivator.”

Because his spiritual sense was inadequate, the Wolf King didn't accept him as a direct disciple. He was only a disciple of record.

This rule was unheard of: none of the extant masters of the way of the sword had ever been said to have a strong spiritual sense. For one thing, a first-class spiritual sense appeared in less than one in ten thousand people. You could only come upon it by chance. And furthermore, too “spiritual” a person often couldn't put in the rote work. As far as the way of the sword was concerned, a first-class spiritual sense wasn't a good thing.

The Wolf King held him in contempt and couldn't even be bothered to come up with a convincing reason.

The Snow Wolf couldn't get over it. After continuing to practice swordsmanship, "make the Wolf King acknowledge me" became his next obsession.

He took everything the Wolf King said to heart. He was like his shadow and also like his dog. Apart from waiting on the Wolf King, he spent all the rest of his time cultivating. Others in this awful place would become unbearably cold if they put down their cold-repelling immortal tools for a moment; only he would grit his teeth and go into the depths of the Beijue Mountains, bare his back and use the harsh cold to temper himself. Several times his essence almost froze, and he nearly died out there.

After two hundred years, following close upon Qiu Sha's heels, he broke the heavenly commandment that "evil cultivators cannot be ascended spirits" and bore the punishment of heavenly lightning. Even the inner sect had begun to look upon him with interest.

Everyone called him "Crown Prince Snow Wolf" and thought he was the Wolf King's successor. But the Wolf King to this day wouldn't let him call him "shifu."

The Snow Wolf had perfectly demonstrated that the way of the sword had nothing to do with spiritual sense. He had wanted to show the Wolf King. But the Wolf King wouldn't even open his eyes—that old fool had spent decades hung up on some mortal in the south, had casually said “what a pity” to a Southern Wan established foundation with inferior cultivation who had lived a life of ease, as if anyone at all could inherit the Perplexing Sword, it was only he who was unworthy.

Since he held him in such contempt...

No sooner had Zhou Ying left than the Snow Wolf sent a Linked Heart: The Wan were involved in the Sword Slave's poisoning. Wan's envoy Zhou Ying means ill. He is looking for an opportunity to pry into the immortal mountains' Ceaseless Mirror. The Blind Wolf King frequently gives tacit consent for Southern Wan's Luxu to operate at the feet of the Beijue Mountains. I suspect him of collaborating with the enemy.

Soon after, an answer came to the Linked Heart: Understood. A position remains open in Posuo Palace.

In Kunlun, each ascended spirit master had a small hidden realm in the immortal mountains belonging exclusively to them. These were called sword manors. Inside were precious swords and rarities, all the spiritual stone resources one could need, as well as eighteen lower-level cultivators assigned to act as retainers; you could establish a lineage and accept disciples.

Posuo Palace had been the Blind Wolf King's sword manor before he had defected from the sect.

The Snow Wolf took a deep breath. The corners of his eyes twisted slightly.

He had finally accepted the situation. When he stood so high, why should he continue to be an "evil cultivator"?

Kunlun—the Kunlun Mountain Range—was to the north of Northern Li's capital Yanning, like a white-haired giant, blocking the wind out of the utter north like a protective screen. Every year, from the start of spring to the first snowfall, an endless stream of people travelled from far and wide to make obeisance at the feet of the immortal mountains; from the nobles of Yanning to commoners, all kinds of people came in great numbers.

Now, the harsh winter was almost here. The pilgrims had already left. From top to bottom, the Kunlun Mountains had become cold and cheerless. In the Sect Leader's residence on the Principal Peak, the main hall carved of ice had over a zhang of snow covering it, but inside it was as warm as a late spring day in Jinping. Four sword cultivators dressed for fighting flew in bearing a sedan.

On the sedan sat an old man, his hair and beard white, collapsed into a heap, the sort of old man it seemed a matter of urgency to get measured for his burial robes.

He wore a special cape with extravagant first-class inscriptions sparkling on it, keeping him warm in the wintry wind. Spiritual energy hardly paused within his body. Any cultivator would have seen that this old man was only a half-immortal whose lifespan was nearing its end.

This puny half-immortal was trespassing in the Sect Leader's immortal palace, not even descending from his sedan when he came in.

But one of the three shed skin sword cultivators in the world—Zhi Xiu had become the fourth upon becoming a shed skin—the Kunlun Sect Leader, who was foremost under heaven, trotted forward to welcome him, personally helping that old half-immortal who already couldn't move very well off his sedan. Respectfully, he said, "High Priest."

Eighty percent of Kunlun's cultivators were sword cultivators. They didn't have as many useless twists and turns as Xuanyin; normally, whoever had the strongest fist was entitled to speak, and if it really came to a dispute, they would hold to their traditions. Routine business was handled through discussions among the Sect Leader and the two other shed skin sword cultivators; the Sword Slave's ideas were to be taken into account if she disagreed...but luckily that sword lunatic didn't have all that many ideas.

But above the Sect Leader was a special individual.

Kunlun's High Priest only spoke when major events transpired. As soon as the venerable old fellow made a pronouncement, the three men and one puppet who, working together, could have cut down the five great spiritual mountains, had to shut their mouths and obey.

No one would have thought that this supreme High Priest was no master of the way of the sword, that he was so aged that he practically couldn't walk anymore.

Kunlun's Sect Leader was the direct disciple of the Wanshuang Sword Ancestor. Like the other spiritual mountains' shed skins, he was over a thousand years old. Yet he held himself to be a junior before a half-immortal whose lifespan wouldn't exceed two centuries, his bearing almost obsequious. He helped the High Priest sit down on a small couch. "These are all trifles. Wan's envoy is only an established foundation junior. How could he disturb the High Priest?"

The High Priest slowly said, "The master of the Luwu, with a gang of half-immortal peasants under him, in less than twenty years has stirred up trouble that has brought turmoil to the southern continent. This junior is more than he appears.”

The Sect Leader was rather disapproving of this. He thought that a wretched place like the southern continent wouldn't be calm even if there was no one to stir up trouble. But since the High Priest had said so, he couldn't very well refute it, so he didn't respond.

The High Priest continued: “I hear that the Sword Slave was the target of a conspiracy. That she was poisoned.”

“Yes,” Kunlun's Sect Leader said, “this is also incomprehensible to me. Even disregarding her cultivation level, the Sword Slave bears Wanshuang and ought to be impervious to all evils, and aside from that, she is a half-puppet. How could she be poisoned?”

The High Priest narrowed his clouded eyes and glanced at one of the sword cultivators who had been carrying his sedan. That sword cultivator immediately stepped forward and handed a Linked Heart to the Sect Leader. This was the Snow Wolf's secret letter.

“The Beijue Mountains' Xie Chu?” The Sect Leader frowned. “All these years, it has only been on account of his shifu's reputation, as well as the Sword Slave... How could he be so heedless of right and wrong?”

“I do not believe Xie Chu would deliberately injure the Sword Slave.” The High Priest waved a hand, and a map of the northern and southern continents flew out of his sleeve. “At the outset, in the siege upon the Late-Autumn Red in Western Chu, we lost quite a few juniors. Cheng Yu and the others who returned gave a detailed report and mentioned that inside the Law Breaker at the time, a large quantity of reincarnation wood was growing wild. The local ignorant masses called it ‘Tai Sui.’ This ‘Tai Sui’ didn’t show his face at the time, but there was something fishy in the breaking of the Law Breaker. Not long after, spiritual energy was suddenly prohibited in Tao County, turning it into a place where cultivators dared not tread. Then Sanyue’s Xiang Rong passed away, Xuanwu fled, and Western Chu thus sank into chaos.”

As he spoke, he pointed to Southern Shu. “At the time of the Dragon Boat Festival, there was trouble in the Lingyun Mountains. We all know the inside story. The Miah evil cultivators wanted to seize the immortal mountains’ spiritual energy. They failed to obtain the South Sea Hidden Realm when it was just within reach, but the Lingyun Mountains still lost half of their spiritual energy then. Spiritual energy wouldn’t vanish into thin air. Where did it go?”

The Sect Leader said, “It is said that this Tai Sui is a disciple of the Xuanyin Mountains who has just become an ascended spirit. He was born in Jinping and studied under Zhi Xiu... Not long after he returned to Southern Wan, on top of everything else, there was a change of power in Xuanyin.”

“An ascended spirit less than fifty years old.” The High Priest looked up at the Sect Leader. “You have wielded power in Kunlun for so many years—have you ever heard the like? As far as I know, the evil god ‘Tai Sui’ has been spoken of among the common people much longer than that little devil has been alive. Then there is the Land of Turmoil. The abandoned people of the Land of Turmoil have no intellects, yet they like only reincarnation wood. Could it really only be because that tree is both common and not poisonous?”

The Sect Leader frowned. “Do you mean, High Priest, that the evil cultivator called the Queen Mother of the West in the Land of Turmoil and this so-called ‘Tai Sui’ are both only cover-ups? Behind them, there must be...”

“An abyss that can draw in all five great spiritual mountains,” the High Priest said gravely. “Since the Wan envoy is coming, we will not let him leave. Search his soul yourself.”

Kunlun’s Sect Leader hesitated briefly. “If I soul-search an established foundation, he is certain to die. Even in a war between two nations, they won’t kill each other’s envoys, and we are currently engaged in peace talks with Southern Wan on the surface... High Priest, the situation in the southern mines is currently unclear. If we rashly kill Wan's envoy, will we be alerting the enemy in advance?"

The High Priest said, "The Wan won't know."

The Sect Leader froze.

The abyss that could "draw in all five great spiritual mountains" was running around being hacked at by Zhaoting.

Xi Ping fled like a frightened rat. His ability to run was hampered by his injuries from the poison, which had yet to heal. He couldn't dodge, so he simply tossed his "corpse" away; he closed his eyes and absconded into the Law Breaker—at any rate, no matter what, the mighty Sword of the South wouldn't descend to whipping a corpse.

The upshot was, as soon as he stepped into the Law Breaker, he regretted it. What the hell, why was the young mistress still here?

Chang Jun was gesticulating and hopping with Yao Qi next to him woodenly agreeing from time to time. Zhao Qindan was sitting across from the two of them. They must have finished recognizing each other and had now moved on to reminiscing about former times!

Xi Ping was just in time to hear Chang Jun say, “Ziming-xiong only found out when he received a letter from the inner sect...”

He turned and was about to run for it.

Wei Chengxiang had deep ties to the reincarnation wood. As soon as he came in, she noticed it. Eager to make trouble, she called to him, “Are you back, Tai Sui?”

In a flash, Xi Ping quickly plastered a spiritual image mask over his face and narrowly managed to put up his elevated senior act in time.

Zhao Qindan, hearing this, stood up, called “Senior Tai Sui,” then made introductions: “This is the master of this place that I was just telling you two about, the Luwu’s Tai Sui.”

Xi Ping hadn’t seen Yao Qi and Chang Jun for over a decade. Though a cultivator’s outward appearance wouldn’t change, seeing them again, they seemed as unfamiliar as though he had last seen them in a past life. So, judging others by his own standards, he presumed that the two of them wouldn’t necessarily recognize his voice. He immediately calmed down. On the one hand, he silently implored Wei Chengxiang: “Grandma, spare me.”

On the other hand, he “calmly” waved a hand to Zhao Qindan. Treasuring words like gold, he said, “Well done.”

He had no sooner spoken than he saw Yao Qi, who had had his head down, abruptly raise his eyes and stare at him in shock.

What...was he looking at?

Xi Ping met his eyes and suddenly had an ominous premonition.

Then he heard Zhao Qindan ask, “Yao-shixiong, what did the letter from the inner sect say?”

“The letter told Ziming-xiong to run away,” said Chang Jun. “You know the letter writer, too, it’s the guy who lived in the Qiu courtyard with us back then. Ziming recognized his handwriting at a glance. Otherwise, we wouldn’t have gone so quickly...”

Xi Ping’s mind roared. He stared at Yao Qi in disbelief—his letter had been anonymous and had comprised two words in all, hasty and illegible. After fourteen years, how had Yao Ziming been able to recognize his handwriting “at a glance”?

That kid didn’t have presumptuous designs on him, did he?

Wait, if he could even recognize his handwriting at a glance, then his figure and voice...

Wei Chengxiang grabbed a handful of melon seeds and, calm amid the chaos, crossed one leg over the other as she sat by and watched the atmosphere inside the Law Breaker's space suddenly congeal. Tai Sui and Yao Qi were staring at each other as if they had turned into two statues.

A moment later, without a word, Xi Ping put down the antidote and vanished right where he stood, resolutely going back to the Xuanyin Mountains to take his beating.

But Zhi Xiu didn't hit him. He was holding a Heavenly Question and frowning.

Xi Ping silently climbed to his feet. He had meant to pretend that he wasn't there, but he heard Zhi Xiu all of a sudden ask seriously, "Didn't His Highness Prince Zhuang say he would use reincarnation wood to stay in contact? Why would he suddenly send a Heavenly Question?"

CHAPTER 204 - A Life of Regret (16)

Zhou Ying's Heavenly Question was very routine. It was a report on his rate of progress. It said that the peace talks had been successful and, with the Beijue Mountains' recommendation, he had now already arrived at the feet of the Kunlun Mountains and was waiting.

"I know the peace talks were successful. How could they have been anything else, when he was even willing to risk me..." Xi Ping muttered, reading that Heavenly Question over and over several times.

Currently, they were only hoping that Northern Li wouldn't take advantage of the situation to profit from their misfortune. After all, they knew very well where they stood. Apart from one Zhaoting and one semi-stutterer, Southern Wan really had no presentable fighting force right now. Even if the great weapon of the spirit-conducting gold was to spread among the Kaiming Cultivators, it still needed time.

If they could only fool the Sword Slave and make Kunlun willing to see Zhou Ying, Xi Ping thought that the trip to Northern Li would be no problem. After all, they didn't have any extravagant demands. Never mind that their envoy was Zhou Ying; even if it had been Lin Chi in his place, he still probably wouldn't have been able to mess it up.

The reasons Zhou Ying hadn't used the Heavenly Question were, first, that he wasn't very well-acquainted with Zhi Xiu and there was some mutual repugnance between them, so communication would have involved wasted words; and second, he had probably calculated, rightly, that if Xi Ping threw a temper tantrum and quit in disgust, he would be able to go around Zhi Xiu and use him as a threat...

So san-ge had even correctly predicted that after Xi Ping's success, he would make a careless slip and be found out by his shifu? What was he doing considering such meaningless trifles? Did he have nothing better to do? He'd entered the way of clarity and everything—did he still have a vulgar interest in seeing others come to grief?

Xi Ping had practically been raised by Zhou Ying. The tacit understanding between them had long ago become a part of their lives. But now, with the way of clarity between them, Xi Ping felt that the one manipulating him from the other end knew better than ever how to do it, but he could never quite get hold of san-ge's thoughts.

For sending a superfluous Heavenly Question like this, the only explanation seemed to be that he was "sending it for someone else's benefit"—but... whose?

Though the Heavenly Question was an external object and slightly inferior to reincarnation wood as far as secrecy went, it was still part of Xuanyin's image and its insider information; it wasn't like Yao Qi's sister's downgraded immortal tool, which announced everything far and wide. Moreover, the recipient was a shed skin sword cultivator. Even if someone was powerful enough to pry, it was impossible that Zhi Xiu wouldn't notice at his end.

Xi Ping's heart, which had settled down because he had stirred up the situation in the southern mines, once again came up to his throat. He tried using reincarnation wood to contact Zhou Ying.

There was no answer. Zhou Ying wasn't carrying his reincarnation wood amulet. Xi Ping turned around and asked Bai Ling to contact Northern Li's Luwu; the Luwu responded that everything was proceeding smoothly, the general idea of their reports no different from the summary in the Heavenly Question.

What the hell was san-ge doing...?

The northern continent and the southern continent were like two different worlds. Past Yanning, all the plants became withered. In the off-white wasteland, craggy and zigzagging paths were laid with greenish stones. Now and then, beasts of burden as skinny as rakes passed over them, pulling huddled people. The crack of the whip and the sound of the wind were equally distant.

The residences were for the most part short and thickly encased in mud. From a distance, they looked roly-poly. There were axes mottled with rust atop towering stacks of firewood and straw; only in the vicinity of the capital could rising steam be seen, scattered and rare—the previous generation of Northern Li's people still remembered those who had died unjustly in the battle over Moon Plated Gold. Though later Northern Li hadn't prohibited buying and selling Moon Plated Gold goods from abroad, and more recently had permitted factories of the new Moon Plated Gold that didn't burn up spiritual stones, the fear still remained in the bones of several generations.

But the loftiness of the palaces far exceeded the imaginations of southerners; it was as if they wished to challenge the mountains and the wasteland. At a glance, you couldn't see to the top of the main hall of Kunlun's Principal Peak. On its enormous stone pillars were carved the heads of twelve beasts, their beards and hair flaring in anger, roaring as they met the wintry northwest wind. Even the rabbit head had tusks taller than a man.

The snowstorm around the Principal Peak was blowing so hard you couldn't open your eyes. The sounds of swords clashing fell incessantly on the ear. With Zhou Ying's cultivation level, he couldn't quite keep steady flying his sword. While the sword cultivator guiding him didn't show it, he was inwardly somewhat disdainful of pretty boy cultivators from the southern continent who never trained their bodies. So, half-pityingly, he took a small pill bottle from his mustard seed and passed it to him. "The weather of the northern continent is different from the south. This is a 'warming pill' that the Kunlun Mountains specially prepare for guests from abroad. Will you take it, envoy of Wan?"

"Thank you." Perhaps Zhou Ying was too trusting of Kunlun; he accepted the bottle and didn't so much as inspect it. He tipped out a pill and swallowed it right away. "If you had taken any longer to give it to me, fellow cultivator, I might have had to make a brazen request."

The sword cultivator quickly said, "The warming pill cannot be dissolved all at once. Take care not to scald your internal organs."

There was no need for him to give this instruction. Zhou Ying was digesting the warming pill with great restraint. His stagnating spiritual energy began to flow at an even rate. He smiled at the sword cultivator guiding him. Once the great mountain array had inspected his token, the two of them landed on Kunlun's Principal Peak one after the other.

The Kunlun Mountains' Principal Peak had a commanding view. With a cultivator's eyesight, you could pierce the clouds, the snow and wind, and see north of the Kunlun Mountain Range. Like the Beijue Mountains, beyond the Kunlun Mountains, there was also a no-man's-land.

“Beyond the Kunlun Mountains is utter north. I suppose there's no such desolate place on the southern continent. There's nothing there save ice and snow.” The sword cultivator guiding him continued, “I've heard that you came from the Beijue Mountains? We're a little better off here than the Blind Wolf King. We have some hill to the north to block the wind. It isn't as cold as the Beijue Mountains.”

Zhou Ying averted his gaze, dropping his eyes and shielding his pupils, which gradually shrank back to a normal size—he hadn't seen the “ice and snow” and “hills” that the sword cultivator had spoken of. It was plainly broad daylight, but to his eyes, in the lands of the utter north beyond the Kunlun Mountains, there was solid blackness. Only in the immediate area of the Kunlun Mountains was it slightly lit up by the daylight from where they stood.

The impression was as if...as if it were the dead of night, the time when nothing was stirring, and the world of the Kunlun Mountains was a house with its lights on.

Zhou Ying's gaze continued to scan the whole of the Kunlun Mountains. As the Blind Wolf King had said, he didn't see the Ceaseless Mirror.

Divine tools of the mountains like the Bell of Tribulation and the Cauldron of Nine Dragons were normally invisible, too, but they were always present. The divine tool of the mountains and the great mountain array coordinated with each other at a distance; shed skins and paramount spiritual senses could both see them. But of Kunlun's legendary divine tool, the Ceaseless Mirror, there wasn't a trace. The Kunlun Mountains' great mountain array was more savage than even the frosty wind. There was an unspeakable deathliness about the silent spiritual mountains.

"We're here. Please enter." The sword cultivator guide led Zhou Ying to the main hall. The lofty palace doors opened to either side. A warm breeze blew against their faces. A layer of rime instantly formed on Zhou Ying's eyelashes.

His guide would go no further. Head lowered and eyes averted, he stepped aside. Zhou Ying walked in.

Just then, a faint pain came from his chest. The warming pill Zhou Ying had taken earlier had been fully consumed. When swallowing the pill, unnoticed, he had put a reincarnation wood seed into it.

Now, the seed that had been lying dormant in the harsh cold was aroused by the spiritual energy of the warming pill. Under Zhou Ying's deliberate guidance, it took root in his flesh and blood.

Xi Ping, who was constantly probing north, sensed it immediately. “San-ge, where are you...where the hell is this? It’s so dark. Where have you tossed this reincarnation wood tree? Why can I hear water, and that pounding?”

Zhou Ying said, “That is my blood flowing and my heart beating.”

“What?” said Xi Ping. “What the hell have you...”

“Shh,” Zhou Ying interrupted him. “Don’t distract me. Watch closely.”

Having said this, concealed beneath his skin, he turned a part of his organs and the reincarnation wood sprout that had taken root in his chest into mist. Xi Ping’s field of vision instantly filled with bloody mist. His scalp went numb, and his chest began to hurt in sympathy—in the future, apart from planting hairs on people, it would be for the best if san-ge didn’t use his incomprehensible power much; it was too horrifying to watch.

Though the reincarnation wood sapling that had taken root in Zhou Ying’s chest had also dissolved into mist, because it had fused with his flesh and blood, fantastically, it was still alive.

So that when Zhou Ying walked into the lofty main hall, Xi Ping obtained a new point of view and met a pair of clouded old eyes.

The height of this point of view was approximately san-ge's height.

Xi Ping immediately deduced that he was currently sharing Zhou Ying's senses.

Sadly, this kind of "sharing" was only the reincarnation wood that had been turned to mist being attached to Zhou Ying's senses and being able to look where he looked. The two of them each still had his own perceptions. He couldn't use this as an opportunity to take a peek into the world as seen by the eyes of a paramount spiritual sense.

In fact, the effect of this was no different than Zhou Ying carrying a piece of reincarnation wood with him. It was only that attached to a person, his field of vision was a little wider and more flexible.

Xi Ping became even more puzzled: what kind of superfluous strangeness was this? Was san-ge actually afraid that the Li would search him and seize the reincarnation wood amulet by force?

Just then, he saw Zhou Ying salute the old man who looked ready to be buried. In the Li language, he called out, "High Priest."

Xi Ping was startled. “What?”

Of course he had seen that this old man was only a half-immortal with one foot already in the grave. “What kind of peculiar hobby does Kunlun’s High Priest have? Why would he use such a shabby puppet to...”

Aloud, Zhou Ying was readily exchanging pleasantries with the High Priest. Meanwhile, splitting his attention, he used his consciousness to answer, “No, this is the man himself.”

“Kunlun’s High Priest is always an open-eyed cultivator,” Zhou Ying said. “You can understand this as a particular lineage of the Kunlun Mountains, and you can also believe that Kunlun’s High Priest has only been one person since antiquity. When each successive High Priest nears the end of his lifespan, a batch of infants will be prepared in advance, I’m not sure according to what criteria, and taken to be raised in the Kunlun Mountains. These infants’ consciousnesses are blocked using a secret art, and they are placed into an array to receive nourishment, until their bodies finish growing and their spiritual eyes open. Then Kunlun’s divine weapon, the Ceaseless Mirror, will appear, and choose the most suitable among them to be the next priest—when the old priest passes away, the new priest inherits all the memories of the previous one and continues to wield the foremost power under heaven.”

Hearing this, Xi Ping broke out in gooseflesh. He blurted out, “Isn’t that body-snatching? No...wait, body-snatching also takes a certain cultivation level. A half-immortal can’t snatch someone’s body.”

Zhou Ying didn’t respond.

Just then, Bai Ling sent him a message asking whether he had gotten in contact with Zhou Ying.

“I have,” Xi Ping answered hastily, “the situation is a little strange, I’ll tell you in a little while...”

“Viscount,” Bai Ling suddenly said in a grave voice, “I think I never told you that my lord came to see me before he left.”

Xi Ping was left behind. He blankly asked, “Huh? What?”

“He came to tell me that he was going to Northern Li as an envoy and to entrust the Kaiming and the Luwu to me.”

Running the Kaiming Department was no easy task. Zhou Ying held the official seals of both the Kaiming and the Luwu; naturally he had to hand over the power and responsibility before undertaking a long journey... though it was a little excessively grand for him to go to Jinping in person.

Then Bai Ling continued, "...He called me by my nickname."

Xi Ping—in his true body in the Xuanyin Mountains—abruptly stood up.

A chill went up his spine.

Yes, and san-ge had hit him with a talisman on Flying Jade Peak.

Xi Ping wouldn't be so optimistic as to think that this meant that Zhou Ying's own heart was resisting his Way of the Heart. That Way of the Heart of clarity belonged to Princess Duanrui. The distance between their two levels was like the distance from Jinping to Yanning. Never mind resisting, Zhou Ying probably hadn't even fully accepted it yet.

Stepping back further, even if he really was resisting, he would use any gains he made with knife-edge precision. He wouldn't waste them on these trifles.

So...there was only one possible reason for him to do these things clearly out of keeping with the way of clarity: before entering that way, he had left instructions for himself.

Chiding him and bidding farewell to Bai Ling had both been arranged ahead of time... Before entering the way of clarity, under what circumstances would san-ge have gone out of his way to bid Bai Ling farewell?

“Shiyong?” Zhi Xiu put a hand on his shoulder. “Focus. What’s wrong?”

The sword cultivators of Northern Li’s Kunlun were unmatched in fighting prowess; they weren’t experts in plots and connivances. Xi Ping hadn’t been concerned about Zhou Ying to begin with. After all, all the people the two of them working together had tricked to their deaths before Zhou Ying had entered the way of clarity could have lined up from Jinping to Ning’an. And after entering the way of clarity, he had been even more unfeeling, capable of using anyone...

Capable of using anyone!

A thought suddenly streaked through Xi Ping’s mind: Including himself!

“Shifu, I have to go to Northern Li, I...”

CHAPTER 205 - A Life of Regret (17)

“You can’t come here now.” Zhou Ying seemed to know what he was thinking. “Listen carefully, don’t get distracted.”

Xi Ping could swap places with reincarnation wood, but there was no living reincarnation wood in the north of Northern Li—unless it was enabled and protected with spiritual energy, like on Flying Jade Peak, naturally-growing reincarnation wood had nowhere near the requisite tolerance for cold.

And the sapling inside Zhou Ying had been “dissolved” by him; there really was no one who understood this power of his. No one knew what would happen if Xi Ping rashly swapped places with that sapling.

There was a droning as the main hall’s doors slowly closed, interrupting Zhou Ying and the High Priest’s insipid small talk.

Northern Li’s frightening High Priest, leaning on a cane, slowly got to his feet. His aged and hollow voice echoed in the main hall. “We people of the northern continent don’t like to shilly-shally when we talk. You aren’t the first possessor of a paramount spiritual sense to come seeking Kunlun’s Ceaseless Mirror, Your Highness Prince Zhuang of Great Wan.”

Xi Ping very rarely went to Northern Li, so he could only speak enough of the Li language to get by, a sloppy and incompetent affair. Amid the overlapping echoes, he was pricking up his ears, struggling to distinguish what was being said, and of all things, “Ceaseless Mirror” was a rare specialized term in the Li language. Xi Ping didn’t understand it.

Possessor of a paramount spiritual sense coming for what in the hell...? As expected, this had been premeditated!

As a fellow possessor of a spiritual sense, Western Chu’s Zhuoming over there spent all day killing people if he wasn’t getting revenge, and if he really had nothing else to do, he could play around pulling out his hair—a full and simple schedule. Why did the one who had fallen to them have to be more perilous than the Bell of Tribulation?

No, the ineffectual Bell of Tribulation might as well be Zhou Ying’s grandson! One slip, and he could provoke a major event; when he got up to killing and maiming, he made no distinction between himself and the enemy.

“It seems that the Wolf King has a traitor in his ranks,” said the Bell of Tribulation’s grandpa, putting on a fake smile copied from Yu Chang’s face. “I came as an envoy to Northern Li under orders from the immortal mountains. If possible, from a selfish desire, I would like to pay my respects to the legendary Ceaseless Mirror—if I have violated a taboo of the Kunlun Mountains, I ask the High Priest to take into consideration the brevity of my time spent cultivating. The ignorant cannot be held responsible.”

The High Priest’s brows crouched over his eye sockets. “You do not appear ignorant to me, Your Highness. Rather, you appear to feel secure in the strength of your position.”

Zhou Ying then said, “High Priest, the nations of Li and Wan, one north and one south, have been friendly neighbors for generations. For food and textiles, metals and building materials, we have always given Yanning the most favorable prices. If I were to come quaking and trembling to a friend’s house, wouldn’t it mean I doubted the master’s moral character? The Lingyun Mountains have taken a severe blow to their vitality through the schemes of evil cultivators. Because the positions of Sanyue’s shed skins have fallen vacant, tyrants throughout the country are drooling over its immortal mountains. The Land of Turmoil goes without saying—if everything were going smoothly there, I suppose you would not have found time in your busy schedule to see me, High Priest. In a tumultuous world filled with such dangers, what reason can there be for our two nations not to go forward hand in hand?”

“That is a question I must put to your nation,” the High Priest said gravely.

“What means have you used to cause the southern continent to sink into such pandemonium that you could even poison Wanshuang's Sword Slave? Your Highness Prince Zhuang, once and for all, who is behind you?"

Xi Ping wasn't sure that he had understood this last part correctly: behind... what? Had this mystical-looking High Priest seen through the little tricks he had played in the Land of Turmoil and not been taken in or what? Damned Northern Li language!

Zhou Ying, seeming impervious, said, "I am afraid I do not understand you, High Priest."

"The power behind you." The High Priest beat his cane heavily against the ground again and again, the tempo becoming more and more urgent.

"Don't make up stories about that new shed skin sword cultivator and his disciple who isn't even as big as a sesame seed. The five great spiritual mountains have punished evil and put down demons for over a thousand years. Through many generations and many disasters, they have kept hundreds of millions of common people safe and sound. And in a mere couple of centuries, they have one after another fallen beyond redemption! The person behind you—all of you—is truly skilled. What, will they still not come out to face me?"

His voice became louder as he spoke. He seemed to be shouting the last words at someone else through Zhou Ying. Had Xi Ping not been the “disciple who isn’t even as big as a sesame seed” that he had spoken off, he practically would have thought that the High Priest had seen him.

Xi Ping tied together his earlier speech with his later speech and finally worked out what the old man was saying. He discovered to his shock that before anyone else could come along and lie to him, this old fellow had imagined for himself some vast and powerful force that could equal the spiritual mountains; he thought that this was a big game board filled with conspiracies!

And this included his own contribution in the form of deliberately mystifying to scare the Sword Slave...

Wait!

Other people didn’t know the true nature of the spiritual mountains and Ways of the Heart, but san-ge knew. Given his degree of understanding of Xi Ping, it was likely that when he had used his shifu to threaten him, he had already guessed what he would do!

Zhou Ying smiled. Not only did he not dodge the question, he talked back directly: “High Priest, I am an envoy, not a criminal under interrogation.”

“Envoy of Wan, do you think that Kunlun would not dare to harm you?”

As expected, Northern Li's High Priest became enraged. His voice became even lower, a little hard to distinguish to Xi Ping's hearing—Xi Ping suspected this was another thing that damned way of clarity cultivator had done on purpose!

When the Luwu were infiltrating neighboring countries, Zhou Ying took a very free hand in ordering him around, as though he was planning to extract from him all the spiritual stones he had once given him as pocket change. Chu went without saying; he would order him to lay a trade route whenever anything in Southern Shu wasn't going smoothly, and urge him to go to the Land of Turmoil to make up for the Luwu's shortcomings...but he had very rarely sent him on errand to Northern Li, so that it was a struggle for him to even understand the language, and there was no chance he would compete with him for the opportunity to go to Northern Li as an envoy!

“I think,” said Zhou Ying slowly, seeming to tacitly acknowledge that the High Priest's delusions were true, “that while you do not know the details concerning my backing, rashly injuring me could easily alert your enemy in advance. It would be unwise.”

As Xi Ping cursed him, he turned around and contacted Bai Ling: “You have the Luwu’s official seal. Get in contact with the Luwu who went with san-ge to the feet of the Beijue Mountains. Starting now, they aren’t to listen to Prince Zhuang’s orders. They will obey centralized deployments from the Kaiming Department’s general headquarters.”

Bai Ling only hesitated for the time it took to blink, then decisively defected in Xi Ping’s favor. “I hear and obey.”

As long as Bai Ling gave him the authority, Xi Ping could contact the Luwu directly, so as soon as Bai Ling gave the nod, he immediately sent a message to the Luwu who had traveled with Zhou Ying: “Luwu brothers, I need to trouble you to run a slight risk and plant some reincarnation wood trees for me, the closer to the Kunlun Mountains, the better.”

There was no “wildfire” at the feet of the Kunlun Mountains; anyone could spur a tree to grow!

Meanwhile, in Kunlun’s main hall, as soon as Zhou Ying spoke those almost provocative words, the High Priest broke out in cold laughter.

There was a low shout in the main hall: “Do not be arrogant, little brat!”

Once again, Xi Ping sensed shed skin level sword aura at a distance. “San-ge!”

No sooner had he spoken than Zhou Ying was frozen in place by chilly sword aura.

But the way of clarity was without sorrow or joy, without worry, and naturally without fear, also. Beneath the frightening aura that could make an ascended spirit master go rigid, Zhou Ying immediately turned entirely to mist.

Xi Ping’s point of view was compelled to change as he did so. Far away in the Xuanyin Mountains, he no longer had any sense of where was reincarnation wood and where was Zhou Ying!

The next moment, an aggressive talisman came right toward them. Zhou Ying, like sediment separated out from the waste water of the factories, was forced to congeal anew into a human form and fell to the ground.

He rolled aside without so much as thinking about it. Xi Ping’s point of view quickly shrank once again. He found that during this dispersing and fusing, Zhou Ying had turned the reincarnation wood tree that he had quickened with his flesh and blood into a part of his body. Xi Ping found to his surprise and bewilderment that he could simultaneously see Kunlun's main hall... and Zhou Ying's spirit.

The clarity Way of the Heart that had come from Princess Duanrui was suspended on the spiritual foundation, like the sun. All the flashes of enlightenment that had gathered in that Way of the Heart over eight centuries tried to drill into Xi Ping's ears all at once in sequence.

Fortunately, while Xi Ping's cultivation was a little shallow, the concentration of his consciousness belonged to a genuine article ascended spirit. He focused and warded off this external noise.

Before he could work out what was happening in front of him, he heard Zhou Ying say "angrily," "My disciple name token is still in the Xuanyin Mountains. Kunlun has lured me to its Principal Peak under the guise of peace talks. If you brazenly harm an envoy of Great Wan, aren't you afraid..."

He wasn't permitted to finish his sentence. The next moment, ice-cold and irresistible sword energy came slicing right toward Zhou Ying's spirit.

A soul-searching!

Princess Duanrui's indestructible Way of the Heart of clarity met the sword energy of a shed skin's soul-searching. Xi Ping's eyes nearly burst from their sockets. “Luwu!”

Was it so hard to plant a tree?

But just then, he realized that the Luwu hadn't responded to him!

Bai Ling was far away in Jinping now and didn't know what had happened, but he dimly sensed something. “Viscount, could I ask you to use reincarnation wood to try getting in contact? Northern Li's Luwu have suddenly fallen out of contact all at once!”

Xi Ping's pupils contracted sharply.

Meanwhile, the Luwu who had been left behind around the Beijue Mountains and those who had gone with Zhou Ying to the feet of the Kunlun Mountains all stopped moving. It was as if they were meditating. Their expressions were calm, their eyes half closed. A light like a spiritual snake seemed to be flashing in their eyes.

The Beijue Mountains' Blind Wolf King had his head propped on his hand. In his palm, he held sword energy like a tangled skein.

The Perplexing Sword, soft and treacherous, incompatible with Kunlun's way of the sword.

Its sword energy could take form, and it could also be formless. Those infected with the Perplexing Sword would fall into perplexity; even masters like the Heartless Lotus Zhuoming would be infected. For low-level cultivators, it was even easier for this sword energy to invade their consciousnesses and spirits without them noticing, allowing them to be led by the wielder of the sword.

Before leaving, Zhou Ying had asked him for a beam of sword energy.

Xi Zhengde was a mortal. In order to activate the Perplexing Sword, he needed to prepare an array in advance. But Zhou Ying was a genuine article established foundation cultivator, and the Luwu with him obeyed him. They wouldn't take any precautions!

Even Princess Duanrui hadn't become a shed skin while living, never mind that her Way of the Heart was now with an established foundation whose cultivation may as well have been nonexistent.

At the tip of the soul-searching blade, that Way of the Heart trembled and began to disintegrate.

On the mauled spirit, something once again began to flow. Zhou Ying's consciousness, close enough to touch, was like an open book.

Beneath the might of a shed skin, Xi Ping couldn't move at all, but he could see innumerable images flashing by—the wet moss in Jinping's lanes, the cold and cheerless Guangyun Palace, the snow wine's mist like fragrant miasma, the Marquis Manor where flowers seemed to bloom in all seasons, the kitten, the rather distant Marquis of Yongning, the small child always wiping saliva all over his sleeve and the paperman following him like his shadow...

At the deepest, deepest place, there was a warm hand belonging to an old woman. Xi Ping could clearly sense a longing that did not belong to him. He wanted to hold that hand again.

But the person performing the soul-searching had no patience for watching these dull trifles and quickly passed by them.

Anyone who had spent time among evil cultivators understood soul-searchings. The consciousness of a half-immortal or mortal would simply dissipate under a soul-searching. Starting at the established foundation level, the Way of the Heart would shatter first, and the consciousness would die before it could dissipate due to the shattering of the Way of the Heart.

Xi Ping had vainly hoped in his blind optimism that one day he would be sure to find a way to remove the fetters of Ways of the Heart, be sure to thoroughly remove that hateful Way of the Heart of clarity...

His optimism had turned to sorrow. Now all he wanted was to beg Princess Duanrui, if she could hear him, to freeze san-ge back into a heartless demon.

With a crisp sound like glass, the world's purest Way of the Heart of clarity shattered.

In that moment, Xi Ping fought free of the fetters of the shed skin master performing the soul-searching. Blood flowed from the eyes of his true body. His consciousness was on the verge of going mad, becoming a demon.

The next moment, a weak light flashed before his eyes. Xi Ping's vision blurred. There seemed to be countless prisms before his eyes, reflecting his face. His consciousness landed inside something. In a tone he seemed not to have heard in half a lifetime, a familiar voice said, "I knew you would have to come here. You're an ascended spirit and everything, why can't your will be a little firmer?"

Xi Ping quickly turned his head in the direction of that voice, but before he could get a clear look at the speaker, he was flicked on the forehead.

“Inadequate instruction is the result of the teacher’s laxness. Your honored teacher...tsk, there’s no helping it. After all, he has so many cares to attend to.” The person who had flicked him on the forehead had followed it up by badmouthing Zhi Xiu, then making it worse by trying to soften the blow. “All right, I guess I haven’t loved you for nothing. Focus. This is a heart demon seed. Do you really want to lose your mind?”

CHAPTER 206 - A Life of Regret (18)

Xi Ping's mind was a blank. As if dreaming, he called out "san-ge," not knowing whether he had made a sound.

Illusions flashed before his eyes. He dimly heard running water on the bank of the Lingyang River twenty years ago. He forgot where he was.

Zhou Ying flicked his sleeve. Something seemed to knock the top of Xi Ping's skull open and pour in a ladle of cold water. It chilled him from the top of his head to his tailbone.

The illusions lingering around him dispersed, and he got a clear look at the person in front of him, as well as the surroundings—on the mirrored plane closest to him, a bald acquaintance was just tangled up yet again in the endless cycle of his fate, single-minded, not taking a single glance outward.

Xi Ping gave a start. He had no time to think of anything else. He hauled back his scattered intellect. "Is it the one that the late emperor fished up from the Impassable Sea? Can it stop a shed skin?"

"Of course it can't. Didn't you personally kill the heart demon itself?" Zhou Ying raised his eyebrows. "Why haven't you woken up yet?"

Xi Ping said, “Wha...”

There was a whistling like a hurricane. The shed skin consciousness performing the soul-searching knocked aside the shattered Way of the Heart of clarity, rooted out Zhou Ying’s wavering spirit, and pressed directly forward.

Xi Ping abruptly turned his head. He saw that this so-called “heart demon seed,” which sounded quite mystical, was in fact just a layer of glass as thin as a cicada’s wing!

That heart demon at the bottom of the Impassable Sea had been blown up by a half-immortal’s spirit collapsing when he established his foundation. How much better could a heart demon seed do? A shed skin could destroy it utterly with a single deep breath.

They were like two small insects hiding in a paper lantern amid strong winds and heavy rain. The heart demon seed was a barrier scarcely better than nothing; it couldn’t shield them. Xi Ping nearly felt the sword energy pressing against the center of his brow. He couldn’t open his eyes.

He didn’t know whether the heart demon seed had already broken. He instinctively leapt forward to shield Zhou Ying, transparent qin strings flashing at his fingertips, like a mantis prepared to hold back a chariot, desperate and awkward.

But the anticipated pain of being hacked to pieces didn't fall on him. The countless mirrors of the heart demon seed reflected the sword light, and all its dim and clouded "mirrored planes" cleared, countless scenes flashing over them: Zhou Ying sending the Heavenly Question back to Xuanyin, Zhou Ying starting to collude with the Blind Wolf King over a decade ago, the Luwu lying low in Northern Li...

Xi Ping's back was as rigid as a coffin. He unconsciously held his breath.

The images reflected on the facets of the heart demon seed must have been a projection Zhou Ying's consciousness had left behind before entering. Right now, the shed skin master performing the soul-searching was like someone who had just walked into a dark place with limited light sources. He had seen the images in the mirrors and, at a distance, had been deceived on first glance.

But the images in the mirrors were certainly different from his true consciousness. Once this person noticed that something was wrong, he would immediately be able to catch the two of them.

Xi Ping quickly asked, “San-ge, did you use the way of clarity to collect this thing? What kind of powers do you get from a heart demon seed?”

Zhou Ying said, “For this heart demon seed, I am like the heart demon itself.”

After hearing this “crazy talk,” Xi Ping’s head began to ache—the heart demon itself had been a good-for-nothing that got by on its mouth; it was only good for being fodder at the bottom of the Impassable Sea.

What was the good of being like that thing?!

He struggled, still holding on to a thread of faith in the fact that “san-ge is reliable.” “Then can you control what the mirrors on the heart demon seed reflect? Can you think of a way to concoct some false ‘memories’ to fool this person with?”

“I can concoct something, but it would be impossible to fool him,” Zhou Ying said, his voice still even. “My guess is that the shed skin performing the soul-searching is likely to be Kunlun’s Sect Leader. It will take him only a breath to finish flipping through my whole life. At your cultivation level, you can only just barely keep up with the images. A mere established foundation like me can’t concoct fast enough to keep up with his flipping. It’s all right as long as he’s flipping through for himself, but if I step in to meddle, he’ll notice at once that something isn't right. Do you think death isn't coming fast enough? Stop trying to be clever."

Xi Ping fell apart. "Has your brain been addled by not being able to think up sarcastic things to say while you were inside the way of clarity? Do you have an escape plan or not?!"

"Don't get excited." Zhou Ying frowned as he spoke. "Why are you so impertinent now?"

Xi Ping: "..."

His consciousness was special. Even if it broke, he wouldn't necessarily die. But that scoundrel Zhou Ying hadn't slipped away, and his Way of the Heart had already shattered. He didn't know how many more breaths his body could hold out for. All he had left was this bit of consciousness!

"I kneel before you, brother dear. You subduing the heart demon seed after establishing a foundation was a recent event, he'll turn that segment up right away, and then what will be left for us to..."

But just then, on the heart demon seed's mirrors, the scene of Zhi Xiu and Zhou Ying discussing the diplomatic mission to Northern Li suddenly flashed.

Xi Ping's spiritual sense was currently tensed to the utmost. As soon as he glanced over, he saw what was wrong with that picture: when they had been discussing the journey to Northern Li, there had been only three people present in the little cottage on Flying Jade Peak; even Xi Yue had been resting next door. But now, in the heart demon seed's mirrors, while there were only the three of them inside the small room, on the ground there were human shadows belonging to far more than three people.

Even more bizarre, while the other images had flashed by and vanished, when the person performing the soul-searching flipped to this scene that was like something out of a ghost story, the speed suddenly slowed.

Xi Ping's heart was in his throat. He didn't know what was happening. He shot a questioning glance at Zhou Ying.

"Don't look at me, I'm not doing it. I told you, I can't keep up with the speed of a soul-searching shed skin and don't dare to play tricks at random under his nose."

"So what's..."

"Legend has it that the heart demon seed has nine thousand facets, in which anything with a mind can see itself reflected," Zhou Ying said softly.

“Naturally they can also reflect this soul-searching master.”

No sooner had he spoken than Xi Ping heard a soft crack. He thought that something had broken, and his heart nearly stopped. But when he raised his head, he found that a mist had appeared over the heart demon seed, which had originally been thinner than a sheet of paper. That mist seemed to be quietly absorbing the soul-searching shed skin’s spiritual energy, letting out minute crackling sounds like freezing ice. The heart demon seed’s shell was actually thickening bit by bit. The oppressive might of the shed skin sword cultivator, which sent prickles up your spine, instantly lightened a good deal.

At the same time, as the soul-searcher “examined,” the images projected on the heart demon seed’s outward facets became more and more lively.

Xi Ping was dazed. He almost thought that all the people in the mirror were real people. He could even sense each person’s cultivation level and aura.

And that image was a projection of the soul-searcher’s consciousness. The more detailed it was, the further he had been taken in, and the more spiritual energy the heart demon seed had absorbed from him, making its outer wall sturdier as well. In hardly any time, the oppressive might that had nearly broken Xi Ping’s spine had almost entirely been cut off by the heart demon seed, their “paper lantern” turning into an impregnable fastness... It was like a metaphor: the further you probed, the further you were from the truth.

Xi Ping was dumbfounded: that worked?

With all the real memories belonging to Zhou Ying that had just shown up on the heart demon seed, the soul-searcher had only flipped through them without taking a close look. He had only picked out this one, which had been tampered with.

“No matter how true the truth is, what a person believes will always be what they wish to believe.” Zhou Ying audaciously reached out to tap on the outer shell of the heart demon seed. The soul-searching master outside had absolutely no idea. “I can’t trick him, but he can trick himself.”

On the heart demon seed’s facets, the surplus shadows beside Zhi Xiu and Zhou Ying caught the soul-searcher’s notice and became even clearer; among them was one Xi Ping’s couldn’t fail to recognize—you couldn’t find a second cultivator who was that bald and legless. That was Zhuoming.

The soul-searcher thought that Zhuoming was working with them.

Xi Ping was briefly stunned. When he tried to appraise the battle to defend Jinping from the point of view of an outsider, he found that this matter really didn't bear close examination: Zhuoming had traveled vast distances to entice the Sanyue Mountains and Xiang Ning to throw themselves against Xuanyin's Territory Map; Xiang Ning had been written off as soon as he was used, Sanyue had sunk into chaos, but Zhi Xiu had taken the opportunity to throw off the spiritual mountains' fetters and break through the shed skin barrier; also, two of Xuanyin's three High Elders had died in the battle, leaving only the Dignitary of Fate, who was least adept at fighting...as well as Zhi Xiu's shifu. The millennia-old spiritual mountains, unassailable as a fortified city, had changed hands overnight.

Zhuoming, who had played a major role in this, really did seem to have been working with them. It made perfect sense!

Continuing along this train of thought, a large part of the reason that the Xuanyin Mountains had tolerated the birth of the Luwu was that Qiu Sha had suddenly towered into view. And Sanyue losing its new full moon sage and waning from its full splendor also seemed inextricably linked to Hui Xiangjun's tampered-with Unbound Furnace...

In a case of "great minds thinking alike," the soul-searcher had obviously had the same thought as Xi Ping. The other shadows in the image took on Qiu Sha and Hui Xiangjun's appearances.

Reincarnation Wood, Heartless Lotus, Eternal Spring Brocade, Late-Autumn Red, Snow Shuffler... Inside that tiny cottage, ancient demonic gods from antiquity to the present were assembled. The mysterious powers that had once been throttled and put down by the spiritual mountains had once again ganged up to conspire to topple the spiritual mountains.

And in the subconscious of this soul-searching master, these ancient demonic gods' manner of existing was very particular—they were all in shadows. In that image, even the living Zhi Xiu and Xi Ping were sitting with their backs to the light, their faces indistinct.

Great Wan's Territory Map...and even the South Sea Hidden Realm—both just happened to be the shadows of spiritual mountains.

Xi Ping thought: He doesn't think that the Territory Map and the South Sea Hidden Realm are what's behind us "evil garden cultivators"?

As soon as this thought flashed by, he saw the outlines of a dragon and the next life spiritual fish added to the complex shadows in the little cottage. Evidently, the soul-searcher did think so.

Next, this huge fabricated conspiracy, like a Way of the Heart, became a framework to perfectly explain all the things Xi Ping had more or less understood in recent years.

In the images flashing on the heart demon seed, Zhou Ying's real memories became vaguer and vaguer, while that heart demon seed, once again like a Way of the Heart constantly being refined, developed a shell that grew ever sturdier and thicker.

Suddenly, the soul-searcher seemed to notice something. The images on the heart demon seed's shell, which had been unusually limpid, blurred. Without warning, the focus of the images on its facets fell on Zhou Ying, whose role had been minimized.

Next, the heart demon seed quaked, and Zhou Ying's real memories were turned up once again. The heart demon seed's outer shell cracked open layer by layer. The shed skin sword cultivator's oppressive might once again pierced through the heart demon seed's shell.

All the hairs on the back of Xi Ping's neck stood up. "What now?"

"A shed skin's spiritual sense is connected to the spiritual mountains," Zhou Ying said. "It seems that the Kunlun Mountains can't stand by and watch anymore."

The soul-searcher had evidently noticed something was off about Zhou Ying. His speed in flipping through his memories slowed considerably. He “saw” Zhou Ying fly toward the Principal Peak after receiving Princess Duanrui’s Way of the Heart...

It was on the Principal Peak that Zhou Ying had taken the heart demon seed. And once the heart demon seed was seen, all the hallucinations would fade. It would be like a glass sphere.

Oh no!

Xi Ping backed up, guarding Zhou Ying. “Coming to someone else’s den to swindle them, what were you thinking... What are you doing?”

Zhou Ying had reached past his shoulder to press his hand against the heart demon seed. An image was suddenly inserted into a corner of the heart demon seed’s shell: the Beijue Mountains’ Blind Wolf King receiving a letter from the south and tearing it open in front of Zhou Ying.

With Zhou Ying’s cultivation level, if he did too much, he would certainly be overreaching himself. Therefore, he only pushed this segment of memory into a very out-of-the-way place and let it flash by, so quickly that even Xi Ping didn’t see it clearly.

But an unbelievable thing once again took place. The soul-searcher who was just about to turn up the heart demon seed caught that image that flickered by like lightning and seemed all of a sudden to lose interest in Zhou Ying. The image that had been out at the edges was pushed into the center of all the facets on the heart demon seed.

Xi Ping's gaze immediately fell on the letter in the Blind Wolf King's hand. There was oppressive sword energy on that letter, its might even more fulsome than that of the soul-searching shed skin.

“That's...”

“A letter sent to the Blind Wolf King by the Sword Slave,” Zhou Ying said. “That's real. I didn't see the contents of the letter, but I figure it's most likely scolding him for blindly messing around in affairs between our two nations...but Kunlun's Sect Leader might not think that. The word is that the Blind Wolf King and the Sword Slave were once shixiong and shimei, studying under the same teacher—and the matter of the Sword Slave being poisoned in the southern mines is so suspicious.”

Before he had finished speaking, the soul-searcher stopped paying attention to a mere established foundation like Zhou Ying. The “shadow conspiracy” in the little cottage on Flying Jade Peak was once again turned up.

This time, apart from the baldy, the tower, and the beauty, there was another shadow among them—in the corner, merging with the cottage's ceiling beams because her physique was too large, only a slight edge of the shadow showing... It was the hilt of a big sword.

It looked like Wanshuang!

Violent light instantly exploded inside the heart demon seed. A tiny seal...in the shape of a sword flew out through that soul-searching consciousness.

Before Xi Ping could ask what this meant, he and Zhou Ying simultaneously heard voices from outside.

An unfamiliar man—this must have been the soul-searching shed skin master—said to the High Priest, “Wu Lingxiao. It’s her, just as I thought.”

The High Priest sighed. “The Sword Slave... Alas, the Sword Slave. As expected, she and Xie Chu still harbor resentment over what happened in the past.”

Xi Ping turned his head to look at Zhou Ying in astonishment, unable at first to keep up with this shed skin master’s thoughts: did this gentleman suspect that the Kunlun Mountains had a mole, that that mole was the Sword Slave herself, and that she had faked her own poisoning?

Not even the brush that had written in the toilet bulletins of unseemly relations between Zhuoming and Xuanwu belonged to a mind this broad!

Zhou Ying laughed and stuck up a finger toward him: Shh—

Then the unfamiliar man who had performed the soul-searching continued, “The spiritual mountains were created to punish evil and suppress demons. Our nation has an ancient saying—there is a shadow beneath the light; bliss gives rise to danger. Xuanyin has that overweeningly ambitious Territory Map, Southern Shu has an abyss at the bottom of the sea, Western Chu’s danger lies among its many mountains, and it seems that Kunlun’s ‘shadow’ is among the spiritual mountains themselves... No wonder that though we inherited our shizun’s Way of the Heart and reached the shed skin boundary, we were all refused and turned out by Wanshuang.”

The Sect Leader and the elders had quested bitterly along the way of the sword, yet they had never been able to draw Wanshuang from its sheath. They had stood by and watched as the foremost sword under heaven fell into the hands of a nobody, a puny junior. This was no different than their shizun the Sword Ancestor reaching out from a thousand years ago to slap them in the face.

Such that a mighty thousand-year-old shed skin was now kept in check by a brassy, ugly woman.

Could it be that they were no match for that Sword Slave?

That was impossible.

So there could only be one explanation: Wanshuang had betrayed its master.

“This is a shed skin’s heart demon. The heart demon seed has already been planted,” Zhou Ying said. “This is what the Dignitary of Rule Elder Lin taught me. Fun, isn’t it?”

“Lin... What did he teach you?”

“While it is true that shed skins are puppets of the spiritual mountains, these puppets’ humanity will sometimes struggle free of the ‘heavenly ordinances’ of the spiritual mountains, for good or ill,” Zhou Ying said “as long as the thought is strong enough—look. I’ve won my bet.”

All of Xi Ping’s thirty-two teeth began to itch at once. For a moment, he knew why Xi Yue liked biting people. “Are you crazy?!”

Before Zhou Ying could scold him, Xi Ping quickly said, “The Luwu losing contact, was that your doing? Undo it, let me come over there, hurry!”

When the Way of the Heart shattered, the body would die. Fortunately there was the heart demon seed to temporarily protect Zhou Ying's consciousness. Xi Ping didn't especially understand the heart demon seed, but he sensed that Zhou Ying's condition now was the same as Liang Chen's when he had taken the spirit-protecting pill.

If that was the case, there ought to still be time to take him back to the Xuanyin Mountains and ask shifu to think of something. If there was really nothing else for it, they would have to find a freshly dead body for his consciousness to snatch.

Though that would mean severing the immortal path, and his lifespan would also...

Zhou Ying was watching him in amusement. "What, becoming an ascended spirit right under a full moon sage's nose wasn't enough for you? You want to steal a corpse out from under the swords of three great shed skins, too? That's some skill you've..."

Hearing the words "steal a corpse," Xi Ping exploded. "You're talking nonsense again!"

Zhou Ying suddenly reached out and patted him on the head, as if he were still eight years old. Then from outside came the Kunlun Sect Leader's voice: "High Priest, the demons are running rampant, and the Sword Slave holds Wanshuang. Wanshuang is connected to Kunlun's great array. It would be easy to slip up and shake the foundations of the spiritual mountains. We cannot alert her too soon. This Wan envoy is already dead. I froze his consciousness just now, to guard against it dissipating and being noticed by Xuanyin. You said that you had a way. What must we do now?"

The High Priest beckoned. Zhou Ying's body floated up.

"It's no matter," he said. "All we need to do is break the connection between him and the disciple name token in the Xuanyin Mountains. We will only announce that the Wan envoy is staying as a guest of Kunlun—since we are to have peace talks, Xuanyin can leave a hostage here. There is nothing Zhi Xiu can say about it."

Xi Ping's first reaction was that this ought to be impossible. If Kunlun could sever the connection of a Xuanyin disciple's name token, they could have seized the Xuanyin Mountains long ago.

"With your cultivation level, coming to Kunlun would be offering yourself to the slaughter. What, are you going to ask your shifu to come be my backup?" Zhou Ying said, smiling. "I couldn't stand the shame. The heart demon seed has been planted in the Kunlun Mountains, and you know the whole story. Go on, my destination has arrived.”

“Your...”

Before Xi Ping could finish speaking, his consciousness was irresistibly pulled away—his consciousness was relying on the reincarnation wood sapling that Zhou Ying had planted inside himself. That sapling had been enabled by spiritual energy, and Zhou Ying had removed the spiritual energy!

He heard Kunlun’s Sect Leader say, “You mean...there?”

What?

Once again, he said that specialized term that Xi Ping didn’t understand.

Xi Ping had never before regretted not having made an intensive study of the Northern Li language.

“He’s talking about the Ceaseless Mirror, the Kunlun Mountains’ divine tool.” Zhou Ying’s figure was already gone. Only his consciousness spoke into Xi Ping’s ear. “The foundation of the first spiritual mountains in the world, the place each possessor of a paramount spiritual sense spends his life wanting to have a look at. I won't die. Look after Bai Ling for me..."

"San-ge!" said Xi Ping.

"Xiaobao, we will meet beyond the bounds."

CHAPTER 207 - A Life of Regret (19)

“Th-th-this has nothing to do with me!”

Xi Ping had collapsed without warning, his out-flung consciousness refusing to be called back no matter what. A sword cultivator only knew how to kill, not how to heal. Zhi Xiu didn't know what to do. All he could do was call over Wen Fei.

When Peak Master Wen came, before he could even take a close look, he saw tears of blood suddenly start to flow from Xi Ping's eyes. Wen Fei was so scared that he snatched his hand back as if he had touched a hot iron, as panicked as a young wife who had knocked over a vase left out deliberately by a ruffian working a scam.

Zhi Xiu sensed the sword shard concealed in Xi Ping's spirit trembling incessantly. Cracks suddenly appeared on that spirit. He quickly reached out to put a hand on the center of Xi Ping's brow. Just then, Xi Ping abruptly opened his eyes.

Flying Jade Peak's ice-cold spiritual energy rushed toward him in a body, nearly forming a vortex around him. Everything next to Xi Ping was knocked aside. Wen Fei waved his fan, picked up Xi Yue, and hid at the door. Zhi Xiu, afraid of hurting Xi Ping, took half a step back, not daring to touch him.

The surge of spiritual energy broke his hair crown. With a crisp crack, the jade crown fell to the ground. His spirit healed. Xi Ping sat up. When he moved, the caked blood in his eyes fell along with his hair.

He covered his eyes with his hands. For a long moment, he didn't make a sound.

There was no need to check Zhou Ying's disciple name token. Right now, there was a high-level "bone-sharing" talisman floating in his spirit, brought back by his consciousness. This could let him share in a portion of the vital power the person who had drawn the talisman—through this talisman, he could easily locate the hair san-ge had planted on Zhou Huan; it had already reached Northern Li's capital city Yanning.

The flames of war were everywhere on the southern continent. It was perfectly reasonable for Great Wan's exiled nobility to choose to go north. Kunlun, for its part, believed that the Xuanyin Mountains had been occupied by demons and would need to secretly unite with the old noble families. Zhou Huan, a game piece buried in advance, was perfectly suited to being a "plant"...but that wasn't the important part.

The important part was that a dead person's aura would dissipate. When a person was dead, some talismans would indeed have residual power, but the bone-sharing talisman, which was so closely bound up with the one who had drawn it, would certainly lose effect.

A dead person couldn't share his bones!

The Ceaseless Mirror was the most mysterious of the five great divine tools of the mountains. Since the spiritual mountains had formed, it had practically never appeared. There were vanishingly few records. Xi Ping didn't know why it could overpower the Xuanyin Mountains and sever a person's connection to a name token linked to his life, and he wasn't planning on getting to the bottom of why it could allow a person whose Way of the Heart had shattered and whose body had been destroyed to leave behind an intact bone-sharing talisman.

He wiped away the blood on his eyelashes. He would rather trust san-ge.

Supposing that the Ceaseless Mirror was the origin of the spiritual mountains, supposing that through it one really could reach the so-called "place beyond the bounds"...

Wen Fei met his still bloodshot eyes and hung back by the door, not daring to enter. Standing on tiptoe, he tossed a bottle of mind calming pills to Zhi

Xiu. “Y-y-you give it to him.”

Then he nervously held his fan up in front of himself, saying, Do you still recognize us? Who am I?

Xi Ping said, “...You’re that quack from next door whose ancestral tombs have just been dug up.”

They saw that he hadn’t lost his mind and wasn’t going to bite anyone; they heaved a collective sigh of relief.

“What happened?” Zhi Xiu asked. “Did your consciousness just go to Kunlun? What happened to His Highness Prince Zhuang? Is he well?”

“He’s been taken hostage by Northern Li,” Xi Ping said, clenching his teeth. “The Xuanyin Mountains aren’t so well off, we don’t have the money to ransom him, so let him stay there for now. He’s poison, Kunlun will regret it sooner or later. Right now, I want to find out what history the Blind Wolf King and the Sword Slave have.”

The heart demon seed had already been planted on the Kunlun Sect Leader’s Way of the Heart, and it pointed directly at the Sword Slave. Something would have to happen soon... Reasonably speaking, the Sword Slave was far below those ancient shed skins in generational ranking, and the sturdiness of a shed skin sword cultivator's Way of the Heart was something that an outsider was incapable of imagining. Being jealous of a junior, to the point of leaving an opening for a heart demon to slip in, was altogether too petty.

Zhi Xiu and Wen Fei exchanged a look. Wen Fei became serious and waved his fan toward Xi Ping. The north has little contact with us, and you joined the sect late. Before refining herself into a puppet, Wanshuang's Sword Slave was a nobody. I don't know much about her. But I did see Xie Chu once...I mean that so-called "Blind Wolf King."

Meanwhile, the Luwu on the northern continent were gradually breaking free of the Perplexing Sword. They woke and looked around themselves in confusion.

The sword energy that had done them no injury returned unnoticed to its master's hand.

When the Snow Wolf entered the room, the knickknacks the Wan envoy had brought were spread out all over the small couch at the Blind Wolf King's feet—an exquisite desk clock, a tinderbox, a quicksilver mirror, a flying goose machine, and so on.

On the Blind Wolf King's nose were a pair of glasses, with their thin chain of new Moon Plated Gold hanging around his neck. He was just staring blankly at a ball of sword energy like a tangled skein.

The Snow Wolf saw at a glance that this sword energy came from the Perplexing Sword. He instantly stopped in his tracks in dread.

Then he calmed himself and thought, The old fool is content with his lot ruling over the feet of the Beijue Mountains. If he's not drinking or hibernating, then he's wandering around the Beijue Pass staring blankly at the snow. I haven't seen him practice the sword once in all these years. His cultivation hasn't advanced. We're both ascended spirits now. What's so scary about the Perplexing Sword?

Remembering that Linked Heart promising him Posuo Palace, the Snow Wolf came to the sudden realization that he was already qualified to stand on a level with the Blind Wolf King. He felt an involuntary surge of emotion. He believed himself to be a person unmoved by honor or disgrace, so after a few breaths, he restrained himself and determined to play up earnestly to the last shred of cover. He paid his respects to the Blind Wolf King, a grasshopper at the end of autumn. "You wanted to see me?"

The Perplexing Sword's energy was like the silk spat up by spring silkworms, spinning as it twined around the Blind Wolf King's fingertips.

On being addressed, the old Wolf King raised his eyelids and looked at the ice all over the Snow Wolf. “Have you been hard at work in the snow again?”

The Snow Wolf responded, “Oh, no, I picked it up outside. The weather is strange today. It was fine in the morning, but earlier a gale came out of nowhere, and it started snowing like mad.”

The Blind Wolf King cocked an ear to listen to the shrill north wind. He muttered, “The wind from the Beiyuan Plains has come so early this year. I’m afraid it’s going to be another bad winter.”

With harsh winter coming early, the farmers who relied on the weather to eat had once again ended up in trouble because the heavens had turned on them. The beasts of burden had it as hard as the people. Who knew how they would get through the winter?

“Now that the Wan envoy has come, I hope that Kunlun’s divine swordsmen, apart from thinking of the southern mines and the struggle between the righteous and the evil, can also remember that the people need to eat,” the Blind Wolf King said slowly, “and not forget to ask for some provisions from the south.”

The Snow Wolf rather critically thought, And you're still worried about the people and the nation? That's really all you need. I figure the Wan envoy is already cold by now.

But what he said was, "Quite right. What instructions did you have for me?"

"Oh, a trifle." The Blind Wolf King dispersed the sword energy in his palm. "Send the Lord Sword Slave a letter for me. It's nearly the anniversary of our shizun's death. I don't know whether she'll be able to make it back in time this year. Remind her to burn some paper for him if she can't."

The Snow Wolf took a quick glance at him and agreed unreservedly. Seeing that he had nothing else to say, he respectfully withdrew.

The Blind Wolf King's gaze passed through the glasses, watching the Snow Wolf's retreating figure with an ambiguous look. He knew that every word of the letter he sent the Sword Slave would appear on a desk in Kunlun's inner sect.

He gave a grim, soundless laugh, drew his fox-fur robe tighter around himself, picked up a pot of wine, and in a flash blended with the heavy snow, arriving at the Beijue Pass in an instant—this was the end of the Beijue Mountains.

The accumulated snow was already thicker than the height of a person. Only a straw pavilion stood out, floating on the ice. The fierce gale that could have swept cattle and sheep away couldn't budge the pavilion's thatch. Evidently, this was an immortal tool.

The Blind Wolf King landed in the pavilion. He waved his sleeve, and an earthenware pot on a small stone table inside the pavilion filled with clean snowmelt. He put a blue jade under the stone table, and soon, the water in the earthenware pot began to boil. Warm, enshrouding steam filled the small pavilion. It seemed to have nothing to do with the whistling snowy wind outside.

This was the Blind Wolf King's Snow Observation Pavilion. It burned one blue jade per day; he was the only one who came here—low-level cultivators wouldn't approach the Beijue Pass without reason, and the Snow Wolf was busy climbing up to heaven. He turned his nose up at this “indulgence,” spuriously cultured and expensive besides.

The Blind Wolf King took off his fox-fur robe and tossed it aside. He brewed tea and cast his gaze onto the vast and unpeopled Beiyuan Plains.

North of the Beijue Mountains was a vast expanse of no-man's-land, a place of utter cold that could freeze even a cultivator's essence.

Outside the Beijue Mountains was a great array left behind by the Sword Ancestor, which shielded the continent from the fatal cold. That was a place where only a master near the full moon boundary could reach. It was hard for even Kunlun's great sword cultivators to approach. The great array had had no one to repair it for a long time, and the north had been growing colder year by year. There had been nothing Kunlun could do. They had had to patch it up with an array to block the wind and snow at the Beiyuan Pass and spend a large quantity of spiritual stones here every year, but the results were hardly better than nothing.

It was said that this was the most difficult time in Northern Li's history. Unnumbered people froze or starved to death. This continued until a rare talent refused to inherit Kunlun's ninefold sword and established a sword heart for the sake of the people, creating his own "Heart Sword," which did not rely on external objects, using his body as a sword and his consciousness as its cutting edge. Without the Sword Ancestor's cultivation level, his physical body couldn't go to the edge of Beijue's great array, but a sword cultivator cultivating the Heart Sword could use his consciousness to penetrate the utter cold and reach the Beijue Array to repair the Sword Ancestor's relic—this genius who had suddenly emerged had been the Second Elder of the Kunlun Mountains.

But sending your consciousness to travel beyond the Beijue Mountains was extremely dangerous. It was said that the place that could freeze your essence would make your consciousness hallucinate; the least slip, and it would never return. Over two hundred years ago, while patrolling the Beijue Array, the Second Elder had disappeared, body and mind, at the Beijue Pass.

Not long after that, Xie Chu, the sole disciple to inherit his Heart Sword, was expelled from his sect for questioning Kunlun's ninefold sword, violating the sect's rules, and fighting fellow sect members.

Kunlun's treatment of rebels and evil cultivators alike had always been utterly merciless, but the Heart Sword was unique, and Xie Chu was its only inheritor. If there was no one who could repair the Beijue Array, Kunlun would once again have to pile up a "wall" of spiritual stones to block the wind. That would be far more costly than supporting a rebellious ascended spirit. Kunlun could do the math on this, so, on the pretext of fellow sect members interceding on his behalf, they had only banished Xie Chu to the Beijue Mountains, ordering him to tend to the Beijue Array.

Since then, he had wandered between righteousness and evil. He had given himself a pseudonym, the Blind Man. Because each time his consciousness left by the Beiyuan Pass, it would have to find the way back facing near certain death, he changed the name of the Heart Sword to "Perplexing."

The people of Northern Li worshiped wolves and honored him as the Wolf King.

Right now, outside the Beijue Pass was chaos and darkness, the blizzard tying sky and earth together, the frigid wind like a gluttonous wild beast, roaring as it tried to charge through the pass.

The Snow Wolf had been right. Even in the place of utmost cold, a blizzard still wouldn't strike entirely without warning. There was something strange about this frosty wind.

The Blind Wolf King's consciousness pierced through the frigid wind and landed amid the vast wasteland—the Beijue Array had been subject to major repairs only forty-some years ago. He had remained here for forty-nine days and nearly perished. Reasonably speaking, there shouldn't have been a problem this soon.

The ancient inscriptions that the Sword Ancestor had left behind were like ice sculptures carved at the end of the wasteland. Every extra moment you stayed here added to the danger. The Blind Wolf King didn't dare to linger. His consciousness flitted quickly over the Beijue Array.

Just then, he heard tapping coming from the depths of the Beijue Array.

The Blind Wolf King concentrated to the utmost and determined that this wasn't the sound of the gale hurling around chunks of ice and stone.

Holding his breath, he listened for a long moment. His consciousness abruptly returned to his true body. He fished up the flying goose codebook from his fox-fur robe and quickly compared the knocking he had just heard against the code written in it, translating it into Wan writing.

My... Way... of... the... Heart... has... broken...

The Blind Wolf King's pupils contracted slightly. The fierce winds of the Beiyuan Plains struck the little cottage with a rumble; half of the blue jade supporting the immortal tool turned grey in an instant.

He was afraid he had misunderstood the Wan language and quickly found a Li-Wan dictionary to carefully consult it and make certain. He saw that the following code read: My body is dead. I have entered the Ceaseless Mirror. If you are receiving this message, then you and I have guessed rightly.

The Blind Wolf King's hand holding down the codebook trembled slightly. He took out a name token—as the envoy of Great Wan's Xuanyin Mountains, Zhou Ying, in order to prove his identity to low-level cultivators when crossing the border, had brought along one of his own disciple name tokens.

The characters “Zhou Ying” on the name token were flashing brilliantly, indicating that the name token’s owner was unharmed and in good health; everything was normal.

A person whose body had died and been sent into the Ceaseless Mirror—why would his name token be unscathed? Could this divine tool of the mountains that no one had seen conceal a person’s death?

And why would a message from a “dead man” appear in the unpeopled Beiyuan Plains?

Or rather, what was the connection between the Ceaseless Mirror and the Beiyuan Plains?

In the Xuanyin Mountains, Zhi Xiu asked, “You’ve seen him? When you pursued that evil cultivator to the Cangye Plains?”

Wen Fei nodded. He was the ascended spirit sword cultivator that Kunlun sent to clean up. If it hadn’t been for him, we might all have frozen under a snowdrift in Northern Li and turned into fertilizer. It’s said that he was the direct disciple of Kunlun’s Second Elder, originally an inner sect master with boundless future prospects... Oh, the people of Northern Li don’t care for all these convoluted titles. That crowd of warriors all talk with their swords. Apart from the extremely mysterious High Priest, the best fighter is the Sect

Leader, and after him comes the Second Elder and so on according to strength. This Second Elder was younger than all the other shed skins. He wasn't even born in time to study under the Sword Ancestor. And he didn't cultivate Kunlun's ninefold sword. If he weren't gone, it's hard to say who the Sect Leader would be now.

“He passed away?” Zhi Xiu was somewhat taken aback. “I don't think I've heard of a master sword cultivator passing away in recent years...”

Wen Fei shook his head. It doesn't count as passing away. There were no unusual phenomena in the heavens, and we in fact didn't hear of anything here. Kunlun announced that he had “gone into seclusion.” This seclusion has gone on for over two hundred years, since before you entered the sect. I feel that this seclusion is of the same nature as Li Fengshan and Xiang Rong's. I'm not sure what went wrong, but his seclusion turned into a permanent one. Otherwise, how could he not have come out to say something when something as major as his head disciple betraying Kunlun took place? When you were half-dead and caught on the shed skin threshold, you were still always coming out to wipe your Flying Jade Peak ancestor's ass for him.

Zhi Xiu had been prepared in advance; he flicked his fingers, knocking aside the spiritual energy his rebellious disciple had sent flying toward Wen Fei's fan. “Impudent.”

Then he turned around and gave Wen Fei a look, frowning. With a sigh, he said, “How old are you?”

Wen Fei waved his hand indifferently. As for that Sword Slave, I don't know anything for sure—aren't there Luwu in the Beijue Mountains? Why don't you get in contact with them and ask around?

Xi Ping was just about to say something when suddenly, his spiritual sense moved slightly. He immediately turned his gaze onto Jinping.

In the Yongning Marquis Manor, the Marquis, who was writing out large characters, froze. A thread of light like silk flew out from the center of his brow and struck the wall of the study. Before he could get a clear look at it, Xi Ping had already returned to the Marquis Manor through the reincarnation wood. The sound of a string, like tearing silk, broke off contact between the Marquis and that light.

The shadow on the wall cried out in oddly-accented Wan language: “Wait!”

The Marquis abruptly stood up. “Shiyong, do not be rude!”

CHAPTER 208 - A Life of Regret (20)

The shadow spread out feebly on the wall. A big shining white furball appeared. Xi Ping couldn't tell at a glance whether it was a dog or a bear.

He saw the furball shake. A skinny face like a Chu person's emerged from the pile of fur, with a pair of glasses that wouldn't fog up no matter what sitting on its nose.

The head looked around the Marquis's study as if it had just cultivated a human form for itself and had never seen anything before. On this "expedition to the big city," it examined the desk lamp, the desk clock, and the pot of hot water as though they were novelties, then finally met Xi Ping's eyes.

As soon as they looked at each other, each guessed the other's identity—that furball wasn't a dog, and it wasn't a bear, either; it was an old grim-toothed wolf of the north.

"The Blind Wolf King?" said Xi Ping.

"Tai Sui?" said the head.

“You flatter me.” Xi Ping rolled a qin string at his fingertips. “What, didn’t His Highness Prince Zhuang tell you how to safely get in contact with me?”

After beginning to cultivate, he had spent less than half a year on Flying Jade Peak. Before he’d had time to work out the rules and etiquette, he had been kicked straight into the Impassable Sea by the cultivation world. Since then, he had grown lawlessly in lawless places. Adding in his nature and the influence of the ungovernable way, he had an arrogant air of scorn for everything around him. On first sight of him, outsiders’ first thought was always of “Tai Sui,” not some rule-abiding disciple of an immortal sect.

“I do in fact have a piece of reincarnation wood. It’s only that there just happened to be some remnants of the Perplexing Sword’s energy I gifted many years ago that had yet to dissipate. Since I was going to contact Jinping, I wanted to look in on my old friend while I was at it.” In order to demonstrate his good faith, the Blind Wolf King was speaking clumsily in the Wan language. He vaguely probed, “I didn’t expect that Tai Sui would come so fast. It seems that Jinping City is indeed Your Excellency’s territory. The Chu fell against a worthy opponent here.”

From the speed of his reaction, it could be perceived that Great Wan’s domestic situation was busy but not chaotic; it probably wasn’t anywhere near as desperate as outsiders imagined.

“Naturally,” Xi Ping said, deflecting. “Since the Blind Wolf King has honored us with his presence, if I had come late, wouldn’t I have been snubbing our distinguished guest?”

Xi Ping had never shown this aspect of himself in front of his family. By the time the Marquis of Yongning came to his senses, these two gentlemen had already exchanged several rounds of incisive remarks.

The Marquis took a deep breath. He felt that this was no time to be reasonable. He interrupted to pull the rug right out from under their feet: “Exalted, there is a reincarnation wood tree right under my study window. He can get here from the immortal mountains more easily than from the garden—also, this is my son.”

The Blind Wolf King: “...”

Xi Ping: “...”

Tai Sui’s identity was no longer a secret: the Sword of the South’s only direct disciple, the son of...some marquis or other of Great Wan’s Jinping—the Blind Wolf King was careless and had only remembered that much. He couldn’t even speak the Wan language smoothly. Not everyone would necessarily know the era and the emperor of a neighboring country, so who could be expected to remember how many marquises or monkeys or orangutans there were in Jinping?

The old fellow suspected that his Wan language was so bad that he had misunderstood. "Your what?"

Xi Ping spoke almost at the same as him, his voice lowering considerably: "Dad."

The Marquis unhurriedly saluted. "My son is ill-mannered, an embarrassment in front of the Exalted. In the recent turmoil in Jinping, it was owing to your Perplexing Sword that my whole family's safety was secured. I have not yet expressed my gratitude."

Xi Ping only now remembered that such a thing had happened. You had to give way to someone who had done you a favor. All he could do was shut his mouth sullenly.

The Blind Wolf King stared so hard that his eyes nearly burst out from behind his glasses. He was so shocked that he broke into Northern Li language. "Him? Your son? Isn't that... Well, did that talisman I gave you back then work out? How is the child's spiritual sense?"

Xi Ping was feeling very bewildered by the strange turn this dialogue had taken. Then he heard the Marquis answer with a trace of a smile, “A little better than third-class. Thank you, Exalted.”

As far as the cultivation world went, only a first-class spiritual sense was a natural talent; everyone who didn't meet that criterion was ordinary, without much difference between the slightly quicker and the slightly slower, so there was no need to deliberately separate them; they were generally termed second-class. Below ordinary people were the disabled, born with lacking wits, those for whom a soul-searching wouldn't turn anything up; these were called “third-class.”

Translating the Marquis's words into plain language, he had just proudly and gratefully told an outsider, “My son is a little better than an idiot.”

If Xi Ping hadn't been hiding under the “Tai Sui” mask year in and year out, having developed the skills not to let his emotions show on his face, he wouldn't have been able to keep his expression intact.

“Hahaha.” When this Blind Wolf King who looked like a little pretty boy laughed, he actually did rather show the distinctive characteristics of the people of Northern Li. It was as if there was a trumpet in his chest. “Sadly, with my cultivation level, I could only give you a seal that worked up to a point. I suppose this is your only son and heir... Sit down, let's talk, sit. Alas, a mortal's lifespan is brief. Just the blink of an eye, and you've aged so much. You would have been much better off if you had stayed to cultivate the Perplexing Sword with me in the Beijue Mountains."

Having said this, on his end, he plopped down into his nest of furs and very familiarly crossed one leg over the other. Pointing at Xi Ping with the "I held you when you were a baby" attitude of an uncle, he said, "Nice kid! An ascended spirit before you're fifty, and the southern continent is about to go to pieces from all your messing around! What an achievement! Be sure to pass along my respects to your shifu... That unreliable Zhou Ying, he didn't make it clear, either. If I'd known you were part of the family, I wouldn't have bothered with all of this, I'd have just planted a tree and called you over here to have a drink with me. Wouldn't that have been nice?"

Xi Ping: "..."

Senior, aren't you being a little overly familiar?

The Marquis of Yongning, seeing his son's completely lost foolish look, said, "Our family has always been small. You know that."

Xi Ping nodded a little woodenly: Jinping was his family's ancestral home, but apart from Zhou Ying, all the cousins he had played with as a child were from his mother's side. The only close relative on his father's side was his aunt, who had gone into the palace when she was young. This was in fact quite strange.

As the capital city of Great Wan, Jinping was precious land that very rarely experienced natural disasters. The locals lived fairly well. While the Xi family wasn't illustrious, they had never been destitute. Their ancestors had passed down some farmland, and generation after generation would turn out scholars; occasionally, someone might get lucky and even snag a position as a petty bureaucrat. A family like this, while they wouldn't necessarily spread to the four corners of the nation in a few generations, at least wouldn't be nearly childless... Xi Ping had always thought that this was down to their family's unhappy fates as beauties.

“It's because there is an illness in our bloodline that makes it difficult to have children.” The Marquis raised his head to look at the family tree on top of the bookcase. “In your grandfather's generation, there were four brothers to begin with. Two of them died while still in their swaddling clothes. Then there was another one who you'd be calling your fourth grand-uncle if he were alive. He was deranged from a young age. You always felt that he could see things others couldn't. When he spoke, what came out was nonsense that no one understood. He got to thirteen or fourteen, then jumped into a well and died.”

Xi Ping had a faint impression of having heard about this when he was little, but he hadn't taken it to heart. Now he froze, feeling that this manner of lunacy sounded like an unusual spiritual sense.

Indeed, the Marquis went on, sighing, "Practically every generation of our family has had such a person. Your grandfather lived to be nearly fifty, and he brought up your aunt. Seeing that she was lively and healthy when she was young, like a normal person, the family thought that the illness in their bloodline had weakened, not expecting that it would manifest again in His Third Highness."

Indeed, they were speaking of the paramount spiritual sense, which made survival difficult!

Then Xi Ping suddenly caught up. The Marquis had only said his aunt was a "normal person"; he hadn't mentioned himself!

The Blind Wolf King casually interjected: "Your father is very fortunate, being a little beneath those lunatics. He barely falls into the category of a superior first-class spiritual sense."

"I do well enough during the day. Apart from being a little sensitive to small noises and disturbances, there's nothing inconvenient. Only when I was young, I often had palpitations from fear in my sleep, which left me with slight heart disease.” The Marquis looked at Xi Ping, for once not so sternly, and softly said, “I wasn’t planning to get married. I hadn’t counted on meeting your mother. She knew perfectly well what my situation was, but she was still willing to throw off her family and fortune to marry me. There is no way to repay that favor... But because of me, we didn’t have children for several years after our marriage. She didn’t say anything, but she regretted it. She often went to pray for children at the Southern Sage Temple.”

The Blind Wolf King, laughing, said, “As if he would help!”

“Of course it did no good,” the Marquis said. “I was young and impetuous then. I decided to go to the black market and try my luck, see if there was any way to seal off my bloodline.”

Xi Ping suspected that something had gone wrong with his ears. “You went where?”

Nine out of ten evil cultivators were short on money. Many people would in fact take on work from mortals for a high price—but for one thing, the price was extremely high, and for another, you needed to find connections. If you just went to the black market and tried your luck, if it was good, you might come across a Wei Chengxiang, and if it was bad, you might run into someone like Wild Fox Country’s Snake King.

He felt that his family's inheritance wasn't a paramount spiritual sense, it was extreme daring... No wonder they had nearly all died without issue!

“A family like ours, while we couldn't reach to the immortal sect above, we would always attract some monsters from below. Our forebears had had dealings with evil cultivators.” The Marquis sighed, saying, “I exchanged a protective immortal tool handed down from my ancestors for information, and they instructed me to go to the Beijue Mountains to ask His Highness the Wolf King.”

At this point, the Blind Wolf King dinned, “They were telling you to find a disciple of the Beijue Mountains, but you, you misunderstood and just ran off to the feet of the Beijue Mountains.”

Xi Ping could no longer feel surprise. “...How could you find the Beijue Mountains without cultivation?”

“A path I left behind.” The Blind Wolf King blinked at him. “The Beijue Mountains have a secret passage built of talismans that mortals can also pass through. Only a person with a high enough spiritual sense and good enough luck can come upon it... I've always wanted to take someone with a high enough spiritual sense as my successor. I placed that hidden realm back when I took up residence in the Beijue Mountains to use to filter disciples.

But it turns out that people with high enough spiritual senses are so rare that no one found that door in centuries. As time went on, I forgot all about it.”

Xi Ping: “...”

If the Crown Prince Snow Wolf found out about this, he would probably be mad as a gourd. The Beijue Mountains, which he had only reached by the skin of his teeth, nearly burning himself to ashes, turned out to have another entryway!

“I suppose I owe you my life,” the Blind Wolf King said, sighing. “For certain reasons, my consciousness was nearly lost at the Beijue Pass then. If not for the fire you started in the pavilion, I’d have frozen there forty-odd years ago.”

The Marquis said, “I only unintentionally lent a hand, while the talisman you personally conferred upon me sealed my bloodline and allowed me and my wife to live normally for many years and have offspring. I cannot thank you enough.”

“Don’t mention it, you’re making me regret it—think of the fate that brought us together. You’d have been much better off as my disciple, you good-for-nothing. All you can think about is a wife and kids.” The Blind

Wolf King waved a hand. “Since I’m already here, it’s pretty good to look in on an old friend, and now I can rest easy. I hear my sword attack cut down the Heartless Lotus, so I suppose it must have been just about used up. I’ll make a long story short. I just sent my shimei a letter, and I figure that idiot spy working for me has already copied it and passed it on to the Kunlun Mountains—I suppose you know who my accomplished shimei is?”

The Sword Slave—Wu Lingxiao—was right now standing on the border between Li and Chu’s southern mine areas. She had received the letter that the Snow Wolf had penned in the Blind Wolf King’s stead. No expression could be seen on her ravine-crossed face. Whenever she received Linked Hearts from the inner sect or official documents and letters, she always destroyed them once she was finished reading, but this time, after a slight pause, she put that letter away.

The two Northern Li sword cultivators following her exchanged a veiled look, then heard a bone-chilling clank as Kunlun’s Wanshuang left its scabbard and sliced at Chu’s border inscriptions.

It was as if the ground had been slit open. The hum of the sharp sword bounced around throughout the whole of the Lancang Mountain Range. The spiritual energy on the inscriptions all flowed away like steam. Even the Northern Li cultivators were silent as cicadas in winter.

“It seems that all the friendly nations of the southern continent can no longer spare the attention to control the southern mines, such that evil cultivators are running amok here,” the Sword Slave said slowly, holding up Wanshuang. “That being the case, I will temporarily assume control over the Lancang Mountains in their stead.”

Having said this, she waved a hand. Armed and armored Northern Li cultivators and soldiers poured into the other nations’ mining areas.

“Among the cultivators of the Shu and Chu mines, many are suspected of colluding with evil cultivators. They must not leave the camps at the mining areas. They will all be kept for later interrogation. Southern Wan’s mining area has disobeyed the Xuanyin Mountains. Tie them all up and send them back to Zhi Xiu as a token of our good will to buy their information. I want to dismember that Yang clan survivor.” The Sword Slave gave instructions without so much as turning her head. “Starting now, I am in charge on the Southern He Peninsula... Stop all those steam engines, their noise is annoying me to death!”

The Kunlun Mountains had never acknowledged that the Second Elder was dead. It was only her shixiong Xie Chu who, for reasons unknown, persisted in believing that shifu was gone. But he knew how strained her relationship with shifu had been at the time. He never mentioned shifu to her in private... The Sword Slave had grown up with her shixiong. She knew that this was the Blind Wolf King subtly warning her.

Her interaction with the evil cultivators was hard to explain, and Kunlun had grown suspicious of her; he was telling her to watch her step.

The Sword Slave appreciated his kind intentions, but she didn't take the warning seriously. With the Wanshuang Sword in hand, they were welcome to suspect her; anyone who objected to her could come for a fight.

CHAPTER 209 - A Life of Regret (21)

The lead story of toilet bulletins from every nation and every organization suddenly became this shocking news: “Northern Li sends troops to the southern mines, occupies Southern He Peninsula.” Every toilet bulletin sent a “scribe”—the writers who penned the articles—to risk themselves hitching rides with merchant ships going to Southern He to get firsthand information.

There was endless gossip.

“Wanshuang has cut through every nation’s border inscriptions, one strike for each border, and those inscriptions that even masters can’t get through evaporated faster than steam.”

“If Wanshuang can cut through the border inscriptions in the southern mines, then aren’t the ones on the continent also...”

“It’s over, it’s over.” Some elderly people started seizing the opportunity to make alarmist statements to demonstrate the profundity of their experience. “The northerners are going to go south, just look, it’s the same as back in Renzong’s time, there’s going to be a war!”

“The weather is cold and the earth is frozen on the northern continent. The northerners all eat raw flesh like savages. I’ve heard that in their capital city of Yanning, it’s common for people to be beaten to death if there’s a disagreement in the street. Once the sun sets, no one without self-defense skills dares to go out. Bandits break down doors in the middle of the night, and when food is scarce, they’ll eat anything they can catch! They’ll even eat humans!”

“They’re all barbarians, it’s common for fathers and sons or brothers to share wives!”

“Th-that... My word, are they beasts?”

Unless matters rose again to the pitch of the Wan-He War, reasonably speaking, a struggle between immortal sects wouldn’t make it into the mortal world’s “current events” toilet bulletins—for one thing, mortals wouldn’t understand, and for another, they were afraid of casually bringing up the names of the Exalted and accidentally violating some taboo.

But this time, events in the Southern He Peninsula turned out to be a falling stone that raised a thousand ripples.

It wasn’t that the common people had nothing better to do than worry about a “deserted” place like the Land of Turmoil. It was that the Sword Slave cutting through the border inscriptions then giving the order to destroy all Moon Plated Gold products had frightened them.

There was a toilet bulletin called the Tao World Record whose scribe had taken a picture of the Northern Li people destroying steam engines, just one picture—it was said that afterward the scribe's camera and flying goose machine had been crushed by the northern barbarians, and it was unknown whether the scribe was dead or alive. That day's Tao World Record sold out three extra print runs. Everyone in all the nations who could read Western Chu writing was trying to get their hands on a copy.

All kinds of rumors flew around, making a tremendous clamor. There were even people saying that Northern Li, after a serious outflow of money in recent years, was jealous of the southern continent's prosperity and wanted to ban Moon Plated Gold again—there were rumors that Moon Plated Gold ought originally to have come to the mortal world eight centuries ago, and it had been the Northern Li people who had hindered that plan, as well as forcing Xuanyin to lock up the Golden Hand.

The wealthy were on tenterhooks: looked at this way, if Northern Li really did invade, all their immovable factories and industrial properties would come to grief. For the poor, it went without saying; their farmland was long gone. Many factories, trains, and ships settled their accounts daily. Workers were living hand to mouth. If war came, they would be finished.

The Tao World Record seemed determined to shock the world. Following on the heels of that precious photograph, it came out with an article that once again jabbed people in the spot they were most concerned about: the well-known scribe “Sir Xu” wrote copiously and fluently for over ten thousand words concerning the mysterious northern continent’s centuries-long struggle over Moon Plated Gold.

Moon Plated Gold had come from the immortal sects. It had always spread “from the top down.” Long before old Moon Plated Gold gold smelters had formally appeared, the immortal sects had already shed a great deal of blood on this account.

The southern continent had had the Wan-He War. Far away on the upper reaches of the Tianze River, the northern continent’s disturbance hadn’t been so large, yet in degree of cruelty, it had perhaps even exceeded it—Northern Li’s struggle between progressive and conservative parties concerning Moon Plated Gold had extended for several years.

Yanning’s progressive party at the time, perhaps for their own ambitions and ideals, perhaps because they had seen enough of barren earth and fellow countrymen who looked like starved corpses, had asked for change. Kunlun, however, had split internally into two groups on this account: the conservative party opposed to Moon Plated Gold naturally opposed it on the basis of spiritual stones, while Kunlun's inner sect also had inextricable ties to Yanning's nobles, and another portion of its people decided to stand with their families.

The people of the north were savage and combative in their hearts. With the attitude of Kunlun's masters ambivalent, the battle between the progressive and conservative parties escalated rapidly. At first it had only been open dispute and veiled strife at court, but starting from the assassination of Prince Jialuo, the second prince at the time, it quickly became tainted with blood. After that, the "flames of war" spread to the immortal mountains.

The two parties created a hopeless situation, which at last was resolved with a final word from Kunlun's Second Elder—when news came of the outbreak of the Wan-He War, the Second Elder publicly said, "Moon Plated Gold is inauspicious."

The Second Elder didn't have the longest record among the elders, but his position among Kunlun's shed skins was the most unique. There was a rumor that said even the Sect Leader yielded to him somewhat. With his airy sentence, the progressive party, which had had the firm upper hand, was uprooted overnight.

The attitude among the Night Revenants altered greatly. They tacitly acquiesced to Yanning's conservative party mobilizing the imperial guards to storm the capital and place on the throne a new emperor who killed his own father and brothers. Many of the progressive party's nobles, caught unawares, simply died in the fighting.

In this battle, the streets of Northern Li's capital were covered in blood. The stench took months to disperse. History called it the Dark of the New Moon Incident.

Apart from the Second Elder who had wrought such a great change with a single sentence, the article also mentioned another great personage: Wanshuang's Sword Slave.

The scribe Sir Xu, whether to avoid violating a taboo or as a show of respect, did not mention the Sword Slave's full name and only used her title—she was the daughter of the old Prince Pingyang; after being selected to enter the inner sect, the title of Princess Changji had been conferred upon her. She was the Second Elder's sole other direct disciple.

It was said that this princess had been outstanding while still in the Disciple Hall. Before reaching her fifteenth birthday, she had opened her spiritual eyes, beating out a whole crowd of fellow disciples who were senior to her and stronger than her.

Other ways might have moments of enlightenment through happenstance, but there were no shortcuts for sword cultivators. Everything came of hard work, day after day. Princess Changji was a natural genius. She established a foundation at thirty, unprecedented and unrivaled in the way of the sword, such that the Second Elder couldn't bear to make her give up Kunlun's ninefold sword. It was said that by the time she was in her sixties, this frightening genius of the way of the sword had already reached the late established foundation stage. The Second Elder was holding back her progress only because he was afraid that her emotional state was unsteady and something would go wrong when she faced a heavenly tribulation.

And this genius who was unusually young for the cultivation world was also confronted with a problem for which the Kunlun Mountains had no precedent: her nearest blood relation in the mortal world was still living.

Princess Changji's twin brother had inherited their father's rank, becoming the new Prince Pingyang. Twins of mixed sex were much closer than an ordinary brother and sister would have been. While one of them had been rejected by the Disciple Hall and the other had become its legend, they had always been very close. For the New Year or on important days like Prince Pingyang's full decade birthdays, the sword-obsessed princess who was normally unmoved by anything would be certain to make an appearance in the mortal world, even if she happened to be in seclusion.

When he was sixty years old, Prince Pingyang suffered a serious illness. The princess, who had never liked meeting strangers, had on this account gone south to Shu to request medicine—apart from the Kunlun Mountains and Yanning City, Southern Shu unexpectedly became the third place she had been to in her life.

Prince Pingyang was no good at swordsmanship, but he was a cunning and crafty politician. Throughout his life, he performed countless great feats that were recorded in the annals of history, and he was hated bitterly by his political opponents.

Of this brother and sister, one didn't understand swordsmanship, and the other didn't understand subterfuge. Ordinarily, they each moved within their own unconnected spheres, without mutual interference. At any rate, the close ties that came from being born of the same womb couldn't be broken.

But fortune makes fools of people. This Prince Pingyang just happened to be one of the leaders of Yanning's progressive party.

On the night of the Dark of the New Moon Incident, the manor of Prince Pingyang, who was already past seventy, was broken into by enraged rebel troops. He was strung up with gashes cut into his neck and thighs and bled to death. Everyone at his manor was punished.

“On the one hand was her blood brother, and on the other was the shizun who had doted on her to no end since she had joined the sect. The tragedy of some geniuses lies in excessive concentration. Apart from what they love, they think that nothing else has anything to do with them. They forget that they are human—you and I are nothing but two-legged beasts, asking for nothing in this life but ‘power.’ Whether they concern scholarly research or swordsmanship, the three thousand paths of the Great Way are three thousand paths for the pursuit of power. Anyone who insists on lying to themselves and others, refusing to acknowledge this point, will come to a bad end.” At the bottom of the South Sea, Wangge Luobao sighed as he pointed to the toilet bulletin spread out on the table, saying, “It’s said that Wu Lingxiao nearly lost her mind. This probably explains why she hates Moon Plated Gold so much.”

Across from Wangge Luobao, the Queen Mother of the West raised a cup of tea and sipped it. “Come to mention it, she isn’t very old.”

Disregarding the sovereignty of the four nations, the Sword Slave had smashed the border inscriptions on the Southern He Peninsula. Her consciousness was no longer limited; it could embrace the whole of the Southern He Peninsula at a glance. It was no longer safe for the Queen Mother of the West to remain on land. All she could do was hold her nose and form a temporary alliance with Wangge Luobao and move her hidden realm to the South Sea as well.

There might be hundreds of thousands of mu of land within a hidden realm mustard seed, but the space it took up in reality could be boundlessly small—as long as you had enough spiritual stones to supply the space-collapsing arrays.

Right now, the Queen Mother of the West had moved her hidden realm, which could hold hundreds of people, into the mouth of the next life spiritual fish.

“That’s correct.” As they spoke, Yu Chang’s image appeared above a communication device on the table.

As soon as he appeared, Yu Chang affectionately greeted Wangge Luobao and the Queen Mother of the West, entirely ungrudging, as if the Queen Mother of the West enjoying his protection while scheming against him and Wangge Luobao secretly playing dirty and setting off the poisonous miasma had never happened.

“This ‘Sir Xu’ is no ordinary scribe. She’s a cultivator backed by a powerful individual. Her article ought to be reliable. She doesn’t write about what happened to the Sword Slave afterward. When I was hiding out in the Slumbering Dragon Sea, though, I had dealings with the northerners and heard some things.”

“Goodness, you’ve come just in time, Yu-xiong.” On seeing him, Wangge Luobao was even more affectionate. The two of them seemed to be brothers who had been separated for many years. “Please do go on, we must know ourselves and our enemy.”

“It seemed that this battle between new and old had come to an end, and the punishments of mortals wouldn’t spread to the immortals of the inner sect. Sadly, immortals also have emotions. While Kunlun’s inner sect prohibits fights among disciples, the conservative party’s suppression of the progressive party was evident. Wu Lingxiao’s plight also became extremely awkward. On account of her shifu, the progressive party were bitterly resentful toward her, and the conservative party knew her family’s standpoint and also treated her as an outsider. Wu Lingxiao was leading an extremely stifled life, so she left Kunlun’s inner sect, requesting to go into seclusion in the Disciple Hall... Before the rancor between teacher and disciple could be resolved, the Second Elder got in trouble in the Beijue Mountains.”

Yu Chang paused, then gave the two other evil cultivators a brief explanation of Kunlun’s Beijue Array. “It’s said that this Second Elder might have had a slight disagreement with the Sect Leader at the time and perhaps got distracted while repairing the Beijue Array and carelessly became trapped in it. He has not been found to this day, dead or alive.”

Wangge Luobao said, “Princess Changji was in an awkward situation to begin with. Once her shizun left, wouldn’t it have become even harder for her to find a place to shelter?”

“Yes.” Saying so, Yu Chang suddenly gave a faint sigh, then said with slight ridicule, smiling, “Kunlun is swamped with sword cultivators. Female cultivators are very rare. Though Wu Lingxiao had no reputation as a beauty, her appearance must have been dainty enough when she was human. She didn’t have an androgynous look. A woman like her had overpowered her peers...even her elders. Naturally there was as much idle gossip as you could ask for. When the Second Elder was there, they didn’t dare to raise their voices to say it, but once the elder left, naturally they couldn’t be held back.”

Women didn’t understand shit about the way of the sword. It was just that her fellow disciples had been too uncomfortable to fight her in earnest and had given way. That was how she had earned her false reputation in the Disciple Hall.

Her rapid progress—how could the direct disciple of the Second Elder not make rapid progress? A single pointer from the Second Elder would be enough for anyone to spend decades cudgeling their brains to comprehend.

As for why she should have been so fortunate as to not only enter the inner sect but even be able to take one step right to heaven, be accepted as the Second Elder's direct disciple... Well, who knew?

A woman always had a woman's "advantages," anyway. It was pointless for others to envy her or be jealous of her. They couldn't compare.

While Yu Chang was base and shameless, saying this kind of thing, regardless of whether the person he was speaking of was friend or foe, his manner was always somewhat restrained. After all, when he was young, he had personally thrown himself at the burning stake planted on all the women in the world.

The Queen Mother of the West's expression softened slightly. She asked, "Is that why she gave up her human body, preferring to transform herself into a half-puppet?"

"Kunlun's sword cultivators have had a tradition of holding competitions since ancient times. That year, the prize for the established foundation cultivator competition was a valuable whetstone—said to have been used by Western Chu's Hui Xiangjun when she repaired the famous sword Xiuluo. Once news got out, everyone's eyes turned red with desire," Yu Chang said.

“Wu Lingxiao was in fact remarkable. There was absolutely no doubt that she would take first place among her peers. She was conceited and arrogant to begin with, and adding in the ostracism she had faced from her fellow sect members at the time, perhaps she had some premeditated intention of getting revenge. In short, she practically humiliated her opponents when they fought, leaving no margin, provoking general outrage.

“Before the final round of the competition, thirteen of Kunlun’s sword cultivators who had suffered defeat at her hands banded together to waylay her. Wu Lingxiao knew very well that she couldn’t defeat them, but she still refused to dodge their attack and save herself, and said some nasty things. So the two sides came to blows, in violation of sect rules. Her fellow sect members had taken pointers from each other and attacked in earnest. By the time the sect was alerted, she had killed one of the thirteen sword cultivators laying siege to her and crippled six. Of those remaining, all had been wounded in the fighting. She herself was seriously injured. Her meridians were destroyed. She could go no further in the way of the sword.

“The casualties on both sides were quite disastrous. Kunlun at first wanted to smooth things over, but the dead cultivator’s teacher wouldn’t let it go and used his family connections to compel them. This was when the Second Elder’s other disciple—Wu Lingxiao’s shixiong Xie Chu—happened to return from his travels. The two of them cultivated different sword paths and had an age difference of several centuries. Adding in that men and women must not associate closely, I figure that they normally didn't have much to say to each other. Shortly after Wu Lingxiao entered the sect, her shixiong became an ascended spirit and left the Second Elder's tutelage. I haven't heard that they had an especially close relationship afterward... Otherwise, there wouldn't have been people bullying her like that. After all, she had plenty of fellow sect members. Weren't the ones who wanted to kill her also fellow sect members?

“In fact, the inner sect had hinted that everyone should patch it up to avoid trouble. But when Xie Chu heard what had happened, he didn't say a word. That very night, he ripped out and severed the meridians of the other twelve sword cultivators involved one by one, then went to find the dead cultivator's shifu and have a public debate match with him, in which his opponent's Way of the Heart was damaged. Had Kunlun's Third Elder not come and put a stop to it in time, there might well have been a death. Xie Chu defected from Kunlun then. I'm afraid you aren't familiar with the name 'Xie Chu,' but you must have heard of his nickname—the Beijue Mountains' Blind Wolf King.

“Think of Kunlun's Second Elder at the time. He was so high and mighty, and then in the space of a few brief years, he disappeared, one of his disciples departed, and the other fell to the brink of death. But Wu Lingxiao truly was a lunatic. She came up with a wild notion. She turned up a forbidden art somewhere and found an alternative path, turning herself into a sword-bearing half-puppet, not quite human and not quite monster—the most shocking thing was that Wanshuang, which no one had been able to take up for over a thousand years, actually accepted her. That was how she became the Sword Slave she is now.”

At this point, Yu Chang sighed slightly. “That is how ruthless this person is, arrogant to the point that none of her fellow sect members can stand her. It’s said that with Wanshuang in her hand, she doesn’t even pay attention to the Sect Leader’s edicts. Appeasement and schemes will both be ineffective against her.”

Wangge Luobao shook his head, his passionate and sinister eyes turning toward the Queen Mother of the West. “The Sanyue Mountains are still sealed. Chu is powerless. The Xiuyi of my nation have always bullied the weak while fearing the strong. They only dare to bark a little from a distance. They don’t even dare to dispatch a presentable ascended spirit. As for Southern Wan—as can be seen from Wanshuang’s differing policies toward the various nations, Kunlun must have reached some private agreement with Zhaoting. Your Highness, the road ahead of us might be said to be full of obstacles. Apart from you, there is no one on the southern continent who can control the Sword Slave.”

The Queen Mother of the West’s expression grew slightly grave.

CHAPTER 210 - A Life of Regret (22)

“I am only a junior who recently became an ascended spirit, and I am an unremarkable medicine cultivator.” The Queen Mother of the West used a slight verbal dodge. “With Guang’an gravely injured, I have no decent fighting force at my disposal. When my poisoning succeeded by a fluke last time, it still only held her up briefly, just enough for me to escape. Please instruct me, Fellow Cultivator Wangge, how ought I to handle the Sword Slave?”

Wangge Luobao had his eyes fixed unblinkingly on the Queen Mother of the West. His odd-colored irises seemed admiring and also enticing. He seemed to be looking at a waking dragon with magnificent scales. “Having inherited Wanshuang, the Sword Slave’s cultivation level is on a par with a shed skin’s, but there is an object of full moon grade.”

The Queen Mother of the West didn’t respond. Her shoulders and back were even more tense than usual.

Then a smile slowly emerged on Wangge Luobao’s face. “The Lancang Mountains’ former divine tool, the Lovebird Sword Array.”¹⁰²

“The Lovebird Sword Array disappeared, I saw it with my own eyes,” the Queen Mother of the West said gravely. “Even if it still existed, it is common knowledge that you must have shed skin cultivation at the very least in order to control a divine tool of the mountains. The Sanyue Mountains' Xiang Ning wasn't able to control the Silver Moon. So you think that I am superior to him? Fellow cultivator, what are these fanciful notions of yours?"

"As long as the spiritual mountains exist, their divine tool exists." Wangge Luobao leaned forward slightly, his protruding brow ridge and deep eye sockets forming a shadow. That shadow was dark, seeming to stain half his face. With a trace of temptation, he said, "When your Sect Leader went mad, the divine tool of the mountains went out of control. The four nations invaded together when it was at its weakest. That was why the Lovebird Sword Array vanished. Now Your Highness has received the heavenly edict and become the chosen one of the Lancang Mountains. The miracle has already taken place. The divine tool will appear."

The Queen Mother of the West's eyes wandered for a moment as she remembered something and became distracted. Wangge Luobao's hand, hidden in his wide sleeve, flicked gently. On the ground, the Queen Mother of the West's shadow moved slightly.

In the communication device, Yu Chang's red eyes flickered.

Wangge Luobao and Yu Chang, two villainous evil cultivators working hand in glove, quickly exchanged a look. Then the Southern Shu man went on painting beautiful fantasies in broad strokes, as if the three of them were already the masters of the spiritual mountains, dominating Southern He, ready to take affairs of state into their hands.

Wangge Luobao's buttocks were unusually heavy; once he showed up, he could sit for half the day.

Everyone understood that this Southern Shu man's face ought of have been drawn in the dictionary as an illustration for the term "conniving," but the way of beast-taming had its own mysterious properties: if you just spent some time with him, you would form a favorable impression of him, involuntarily set aside your mental defenses. Intellectually, the Queen Mother of the West knew that he was no good, but she couldn't help but have a feeling of friendliness when she saw him. All she could do was match wits with him while inwardly reminding herself over and over of the dirty things this southern barbarian had done. After half a day of this, she was starting to get a headache.

But she was alone and helpless. She couldn't leave the wretches in this rubbish heap.

Having managed to hold out until Wangge Luobao took his leave, the Queen Mother of the West—Yang Wan—breathed a sigh of relief; she was emotionally exhausted.

When she had seen the two great evil cultivators off, she began to meditate and circulate her energy.

As her spirit quieted, her consciousness spread. It wasn't long before the susurrating "heavenly edict" once again came to her ears. This wasn't a human voice—it sounded something like poor quality factory-made stiff brocade rubbing against itself—but Yang Wan understood it. This voice wasn't communicating with her ears or her mind. It was tapping on the Way of the Heart on her spirit, instructing her in cultivation.

Since the day she had escaped the Sword Slave, whenever she meditated, she could immediately hear the heavenly edict clearly. Many difficulties that she had previously been stuck on were cut apart as though meeting a knife edge. The enlightenment that she had previously sought through strenuous effort was like water that had washed away the top of her skull, almost too much pouring in for her to attend to. During this time, her cultivation had been taking great strides forward on an almost daily basis. It was only that...

As she focused, a path once again appeared before Yang Wan's eyes, too long to see its end at a glance.

She remembered the shape of this path. Each new group of disciples to enter the Lancang Mountains had to go to the Principal Peak to pay their respects to the sect's founders, the Gold and Jade Sages. In order to demonstrate sincerity, they had to walk up step by step. Even going quickly, it would still take two shichen.

As long as the spiritual mountains exist, their divine tool exists...

“The Lovebird Sword Array was suspended above the Principal Peak,” she said, tentatively questioning the heavenly edict, “so if I follow this path to the end, I’ll be able to find it, is that so?”

The heavenly edict did not respond, only faintly conveyed a sense of urgency, telling her to follow this path forward.

This was the decree of the Lancang Mountains, leading her to seek the divine tool that could contend against the world's foremost masters. She ought to have followed without hesitation. But perhaps her cultivation was too meager or her natural endowments too poor; each time Yang Wan set foot on this path, an unreasoning fear would emerge from the cracks in her bones.

She clenched her teeth and calmed herself, struggling to dispel her preoccupations and walk forward following the heavenly edict.

But as soon as she set foot on that path, all the events of her life appeared before her eyes like a swarm of bees: her humiliation at marrying the Emperor of the East for the sake of establishing a foothold in the Land of Turmoil; her resentment at watching the sages' spiritual mountains stuck full of vulgar street signs and boundary markers; her rage at her favorite maid being seized by evil cultivators on a rampage; then there was Guang'an... The nameless youth she had happened to save on a stormy night, the man who had desperately cultivated the sword, the shadow that had been with her for a century...

Lord Guang'an's delicate, silent face was impossible to get rid of. It seemed to be putting her to some test. When Yang Wan thought of him, she couldn't resist getting distracted. Her spiritual sense suddenly moved. That was when she found that her senses had been opened at some point. The sight and hearing of an ascended spirit were extremely acute. The sound of one guard saying to another a hundred meters away "It's time to change Lord Guang'an's dressings" instantly pricked her ears.

Yang Wan gave a start. The path of the spiritual mountains beneath her feet vanished once more, and her meditative state was interrupted. She fell into the mortal dust. She sat there blankly for a moment. She studied herself inwardly and found that her essence had once again concentrated considerably. There was quite a bit of progress. But in her heart she didn't feel the smallest bit of pleasure at having “made a gain.” Cold sweat had nearly soaked through the outermost layer of her gauze robes.

Almost simultaneously, far away in Western Chu, Yu Chang also opened his eyes.

During their conversation, Wangge Luobao had used his beast-taming methods to distract the Queen Mother of the West without her noticing it and seized the opportunity to place one of Yu Chang’s grit worm projection talismans in her shadow—apart from the Queen Mother of the West herself, no one could hear the so-called “divine edict” of the Lancang Mountains. The existence of such a thing relied entirely on a single person’s story. Two great evil cultivators weren’t so easily fooled; they had to get to the bottom of her situation.

The Queen Mother of the West wasn’t a low-level cultivator that he could manipulate at will, so Yu Chang, residing in her shadow, hadn’t dared to do anything rash. He had only quietly entered meditation with her.

Yu Chang reached out to knock on a communication device beside him that looked like a mirror. Wangge Luobao’s face quickly emerged. “Already? Yu-xiong, what happened?”

“Her meditation period was in fact much shorter than average for an ascended spirit. I couldn’t see very clearly,” Yu Chang said seriously. “There was a mysterious external force guiding her consciousness, I didn’t dare to get close. I think that the Queen Mother of the West probably isn’t making up the ‘heavenly edict.’ But...it’s a strange thing. It looked to me like during the latter half, she herself was constantly struggling to get free.”

What was this princess’ problem? She was like a small child with her head held down by a teacher being forced to study; as soon as the adult wasn’t looking, she tried to make a run for it.

Wasn’t she in a hurry to restore her nation? Was she planning to meet the New Year in the fish’s mouth?

But when Wangge Luobao heard this, his eyes lit up, and he broke into peculiar laughter.

Yu Chang felt that this southern barbarian’s laugh sounded like an owl’s; this bird was no good. But on the surface, he said as urbanely as before, “Wangge-xiong, would you care to instruct me?”

“This is a good thing,” Wangge Luobao said. “Yu-xiong, you have always been a free agent, so presumably you are not aware that among the spiritual mountains, there has always been a saying that ‘An ascended spirit’s body enters the high heavens, while a shed skin's soul enters the universe.' The masters of all the great sects, once they become shed skins, have a part of their consciousness fuse with the spiritual mountains. The Lancang Mountains have only recognized Her Highness the Queen Mother of the West. They must want her to perform the duties of other spiritual mountains' shed skins, but her cultivation is in the early ascended spirit stage, and her mental state is nowhere near the level of a shed skin's. It is normal for her to instinctively fear and reject it."

The person with an "orthodox" background believed that having a part of your consciousness fuse with the spiritual mountains was a good thing. This symbolized being "supreme" and "all-knowing." Yu Chang, however, was a "feral cultivator" who had been stamped with a spiritual image brand as a child. Hearing this explanation, a thought quickly flashed through his mind: Why does that sound like a spiritual image brand?

But in order to avoid seeming ignorant and making a fool of himself, he didn't show any unusual reaction. "I see, she must be getting stuck there, then. The ways of medicine and toolmaking have concentrated consciousnesses and meticulous thoughts. Their courage is always a little lacking."

Wangge Luobao's brows moved slightly. "At a time like this, her friends need to lend her a hand."

Yu Chang said, “You mean...”

“When she is in conflict with the heavenly edict, she will be at her most confused, her consciousness at its weakest. She will have no attention to spare to take precautions against your grit worm projections. Think of a way to give her a push forward each day.” Like a teacher who had taken an idiot for a student, Wangge Luobao patiently encouraged, “It doesn’t have to be much, just one step. Over time, small steps will accumulate into a thousand li. Sometimes, with just a bit of external strength, a person can step over their own obstacle. Once she fuses with the spiritual mountains, the divine tool will certainly reappear. The Silver Moon and the Cauldron of Nine Dragons aren’t at leisure to attend to anything but themselves, and the Bell of Tribulation... Ha, I think the Wan allying with the Li is only a temporary measure. My informers say that Southern Wan’s border inscriptions have just undergone a major renovation, and each Kaiming Department’s numbers have been increased to double or more. Zhi Xiu is only taking this opportunity to catch his breath. He might turn on them at any time. If Wu Lingxiao really does get chopped into mincemeat by the Lovebird Sword Array, they won’t do anything about it. When the time comes, the Lancang Mountains will be ours for the taking.”

For some reason, Yu Chang felt a little uncomfortable listening to him, so, with a kindly expression, he splashed cold water on him. “Wangge-xiong, don't be so optimistic. The Queen Mother of the West is right. In order to control a divine tool of the mountains, one's cultivation must at least be at the shed skin level—and it must be a shed skin master acknowledged by the spiritual mountains. She is an ascended spirit, and in the early stage. Isn't asking her to control the Lovebird Sword Array like forcing an infant to heft a cauldron?"

Wangge Luobao was proficient in the languages of all the nations, but under the influence of his Miah mother tongue, when he spoke quickly, his speech was slightly indistinct and elided. When he spoke quietly, his voice sounded soft and slick. "Why would we want her to 'control' the Lovebird Sword Array?"

Yu Chang froze.

Wangge Luobao, in his voice as soft as silk, said, "As long as the Lovebird Sword Array is released, it will wipe out the 'outsiders' on the Southern He Peninsula by itself. When that happens, while the Lovebird Sword Array is locked in a life and death struggle with Wu Lingxiao, you and I will seize the opportunity to come in with tools and just take the resources we need... Are you really thinking of sharing the Lancang Mountains with the Yang family? One mustn't be too greedy, Chief Offering Yu."

Yu Chang and Wangge Luobao both had slightly stronger cultivation than Yang Wan, so she was totally unaware that plans were being made for her behind her back.

When she recovered after her terrifying meditation, she briefly sat on her own, then stood up, changed clothes, and went to the courtyard where Lord Guang'an was resting.

The guards and attendants looking after Lord Guang'an had just changed his dressings. When they saw her, they saluted respectfully. Yang Wan nodded and dismissed a guard who was about to step forward to hold up a lantern for her.

For some reason, she seemed a little preoccupied. She accidentally left a strand of long hair hanging on a tree. Yang Wan was completely unaware of it. She only stood at the door of Lord Guang'an's room for a while. In the end, she didn't go in. She left in a hurry.

The "guard" holding the lantern kept himself to himself, like a mural on the wall. Only when she was far away did he squeeze a piece of reincarnation wood in his hand.

Xi Ping had the Luwu at his command. Toilet bulletins from all over were delivered to his desk at once.

The Tao World Record had begun the wanton dramatization of Northern Li's assault on the Southern He peninsula. Though it was a Chu publication, it was printed in Tao County, and the writer was Zhao Qindan.

Even he hadn't expected such a surge of publicity in the mortal world. That article had in fact mainly been written for Kunlun's benefit.

The heart demon seed had been planted, but Zhi Xiu said that as long as a sword cultivator's sword heart was steadfast enough, if he focused and introspected in time, he would actually be able to notice that there was something the matter with him. Xi Ping didn't know whether this was shizun judging others against his own standard—even having his brains turned to paste by an abacus wasn't enough to stop him making time to go to the north slope every day to practice the sword, regular as clockwork.

But Kunlun's Sect Leader was after all a thousand-year-old shed skin. He wasn't to be underestimated. So Xi Ping had decided to give the Sect Leader an occasional prod, so it wouldn't be so easy for him to focus his sword heart.

The day he had seen the Blind Wolf King, Xi Ping had roughly grasped the awkwardness of the Sword Slave's position in Kunlun, but there was still something he didn't understand: why the Kunlun Sect Leader's heart demon would settle on the Sword Slave.

Loathing her, fearing her, even suspecting her would all be normal, but reckoning it up, the Sword Slave was three centuries old at the outside, so for a thousand-year-old shed skin to develop a heart demon over her...such a shed skin would have to be rather too lacking in self-possession, something of Xiang Ning's ilk. Kunlun's Sect Leader surely wasn't so badly off.

The Blind Wolf King had mentioned two very thought-provoking points: the first was his belief that the Second Elder's "disappearance" was connected to the Ceaseless Mirror.

The flying goose messages sent by that crazy bastard Zhou Ying confirmed that this divine tool of the mountains that no one had ever seen had a hidden link to the no-man's-land of Beiyuan, and evidently it could easily sever the connection between a disciple of the Xuanyin Mountains and his name token, make a person disappear without anyone the wiser. The Second Elder had been missing for two centuries, and his vital lantern in the Kunlun inner sect was still doing just fine, very like Zhou Ying's current situation, with his body dead and his name token in perfect condition.

Second, the reason that the Second Elder, after repeatedly hesitating, had ultimately stood with the conservative party, had been Southern He's dilemma—the Second Elder had been the one primarily responsible for handling this matter for Northern Li.

While the old version of Moon Plated Gold hadn't been as earth-shaking as what Hui Xiangjun had made eight centuries ago, after all was said and done, it was sustained by spiritual stones. The Second Elder had said to his quick-witted head disciple, "While the innovations the progressive party describes are admittedly good, other nations are other nations, and Northern Li is Northern Li. One knows one's own family affairs. If that spiritual-stone-burning Moon Plated Gold comes to the mortal world, in the end, I'm afraid it will only warm the hands of the nobles in Yanning. Won't the common people turn into ashes beneath the fires of the gold smelting furnaces?"

And when later Southern He had turned on the other nations, when the four nations had gone to settle the accounts with Lancang, it had been the Second Elder who had originally gone south to take charge. It was only due to a sudden change in the condition of the Beijue Array that he had handed the Southern He business over to the Third Elder midway and temporarily gone back himself. He hadn't returned.

Comparing this against the clues Zhi Xiu had found in General Zhi Yi's relic, when the four nations had joined hands to sever Southern He's veins of the earth for the sake of spiritual stones, it had just happened to be right after the Second Elder had left...

Xi Ping had a faint guess. If it were true, then the Sword Slave might only be a projection of the Sect Leader's heart demon.

Wu Lingxiao's current conduct, in the eyes of the Sect Leader, would look like she was preparing to openly seize the southern mines, enough to trouble him so much that he wouldn't be able to meditate.

After setting the toilet bulletins aside, Xi Ping swiftly flipped through the secret reports submitted by the Kaiming Department—the first batch of spirit-conducting gold “upgraded immortal tools” had already been delivered to the borders. What had been sent out were improved versions of what Wei Chengxiang had used in the South Sea: they didn't waste as much spiritual stones, the sword energy and talismans they shot were all established foundation grade, and they could be used repeatedly; they could make up for Southern Wan's current shortage of established foundations... but they were costly.

Xi Ping was just musing on how to trick someone else out of some spiritual stones to bring back when he heard Chang Jun's voice coming from the reincarnation wood: “Shiyong, Shiyong, guess what, the Queen Mother of the West and Lord Guang'an are on the outs!”

Wei Chengxiang had to look after the Turmoilers, who had nothing to eat or drink, so Yao Qi and Chang Jun had volunteered to remain in the Queen Mother of the West's hidden realm wearing spiritual image masks.

While Xi Ping knew the ins and outs about the Queen Mother of the West, to guard against the evil cultivators making fresh difficulties, he had still wanted to keep an eye on her.

After squandering over a decade in the southern mines, Chang Jun had at last found his "true calling." This person seemed to have come out of his mother's womb as a "busybody." When his initial confusion and fear had passed, he had taken to it like a fish to water, spending every day cautiously and conscientiously looking around with his little eyes fixed on all kinds of slight clues.

Xi Ping's train of thought had been interrupted. He said in exasperation, "Didn't I tell you two to just keep an eye out for trouble and avoid getting close to the ascended spirit evil cultivators? Especially that conjunctivitis sufferer with his 'grit projections.' Luwu masks aren't that secure. Listen, Hongzheng-xiong, how can you still be so full of curiosity at your age?"

Chang Jun chuckled. "When all this is over, seeing as we're classmates, can you use some pull to get me into the Luwu?"

Xi Ping perfunctorily said, “My word doesn’t carry weight. For that, you have to ask Lord Bai...”

Chang Jun said, “Oh, right, I hear Zhao-shijie is drafting a ‘Faithful Account of the Deceits of Evil Gods,’ recording cases from antiquity to the present of evil cultivators duping people by passing themselves off as authority figures and causing disaster throughout the lands. She says she wants it to stand as a warning to later generations. She promised to let me read the draft...”

Xi Ping didn’t hesitate. “The Luwu are an outer sect, too, no different from the southern mines. It doesn’t amount to much. Register with the Kaiming Department, train for half a year, and you’re all set! Get on with it, what’s going on with the Queen Mother of the West and Lord Guang’an? Who’s stepping out? I’m so eager to find out!”

“What are you thinking? Lord Guang’an was seriously injured by the Sword Slave. His meridians were all ruptured. Do you think he’s stepping anywhere? Right after the Queen Mother of the West returned, she was always clinging to his hand, so worried she forgot her department. But it’s been only a few days, and it looks to me like her manner has suddenly cooled. She just came around and didn’t even go inside.”

Another voice interrupted from the reincarnation wood. Yao Qi briefly said, “The two evil cultivators from Chu and Shu have just been here.”

“Oh?” said Xi Ping.

At first he couldn't work out what the connection between these two things was. It couldn't be, he thought, that those two shameless wretches Yu Chang and Wangge Luobao, for the sake of getting close to the Queen Mother of the West, were planning to sow discord by offering their own services as bedfellows?

They were both all-powerful great evil cultivators, surely they wouldn't have to resort to that...

Suddenly, for some reason, Xi Ping's spiritual sense moved slightly. He had a faint, rather ominous premonition.

CHAPTER 211 - A Life of Regret (23)

This was no ordinary spiritual sense perturbation.

Actually, a cultivator's spiritual sense was always being touched by the outside world. The higher one's cultivation level, the more one would be aware of—for example, next door in the Latent Cultivation Temple, the mighty instructor Luo Qingshi cursed him by name three meals a day, rain or shine—but those who persistently brought down curses on his head were too numerous; for Xi Ping, this was all “background noise” that he could easily ignore.

But just now, that had been different. It had been weak and remote, as if something were gently dragging his heart down. It was fleeting, so quick it seemed to have been an illusion. Xi Ping couldn't grasp it.

Just then, in his spirit, the bone-sharing talisman Zhou Ying had left him with showed signs of movement.

Unskillfully, Xi Ping concentrated. Through the bone-sharing talisman, he sensed that Zhou Huan, carrying the strand of hair his brother had planted on him, had reached a place brimming with spiritual energy.

Zhou Huan had first lost the mother who had been his backbone and then been forced into exile, turning in the blink of an eye from the sovereign of a nation to a stray dog. The drop was truly too great. When he had first reached Yanning, the climate had disagreed with him, and he had fallen seriously ill. Xi Ping had been afraid for a time that he would die. Fortunately, the cultivation world had elixirs and medicinal herbs that could preserve a person's life. Zhou Huan had recovered only after nearly a month of nursing, then had gone north to the Kunlun Mountains.

Before immortals, Zhou Huan had no place to speak. He was trotted out, bewildered, only an "item" worn by the Li and Zhang families, amounting to a white cloth these people were wearing in mourning for their native land.

Through the black hair planted on "White Cloth Zhou," Xi Ping heard Kunlun's Third Elder, who was receiving them in secret, constantly sighing and wringing his hands, on one hand recalling his friendship with Li Fengshan, on the other hand commenting in strong terms about demons bringing chaos to the world. After they had gone back and forth for several rounds, the Third Elder swore up and down that Northern Li would not stand by and watch as their good neighbor fell into the hands of evil cultivators.

The “evil cultivator” silently pricked up his ears on Zhou Huan’s head and heard the Third Elder say, “‘Zhaoting’ holds all of Great Wan’s veins of the earth in his hands, and he has locked up many of my fellow cultivators from the thirty-six peaks in the Xuanyin Mountains. He is holding the entire country hostage. We cannot harm the common people. In order to avoid doing more harm than good in our attack, we must contend with them for now.”

Great Wan’s fugitive cultivators were moved to tears. In unison, they exclaimed in admiration of the Third Elder, finding in him a soulmate as far as “concern for the nation and the people” went.

The Third Elder said, “If we can lure him into leaving the Xuanyin Mountains, we will have no further reservations. Even if Wanshuang will not leave its sheath, I am willing to petition the Sect Leader and go see that so-called ‘Sword of the South’ for myself.”

“And just who do you think you are?” Xi Ping thought derisively.

At the same time, he was a little curious to know what Kunlun was planning to use to lure his shizun away.

Then he heard one of the Wan cultivators obediently ask that question for him.

The Third Elder said, “The Xuanyin Mountains’ spiritual energy is draining away. They will not hold out for more than a century. ‘Zhaoting’ will undoubtedly covet the southern mines. It is only because he fears Kunlun’s Wanshuang that he temporarily does not dare to act rashly. That is why he has hypocritically sent an envoy to sue for peace. By my reckoning, in another seven days, it will be the anniversary of the day that the Sect Leader of Southern He’s Lancang Sect died and Lancang’s great mountain array and Lovebird Sword Array vanished. The Lancang survivor has always held this as a day of disgrace for her vanquished nation. She is certain to act on that day. The Lord Sword-bearer will pretend to be incapable of defeating her and ask for help from her nearest ‘ally.’ Zhaoting will not be able to sit tight. We have already placed an impregnable net in the Land of Turmoil. If he so much as sets foot there, he won’t be able to escape.”

Overhearing this plot that exceeded his imagination, Xi Ping’s first reaction was: What kind of idiocy is this? Do you think everyone is like you?

Then he mulled it over briefly and noticed something else not quite right: the commemoration day for Southern He’s destruction happened every year. It had been happening for over two centuries, and he had never heard of there being any particular ceremony to celebrate it. How could Kunlun’s old man be so sure that the evil cultivators would do something on that day?

Also, didn't their Sect Leader suspect Wu Lingxiao of betraying them?

Why was this plan still treating her as one of their own, making her "pretend to be incapable of defeating" a foe? With the Sword Slave's bull-headed character, if Kunlun really did order her to play dead and be "incapable of defeating" a few ascended spirits for the sake of trapping Zhi Xiu, she might very well cut down the official sent to deliver the order on the spot, then send a written challenge to war directly to the Xuanyin Mountains.

An exiled Wan cultivator asked the Third Elder, "How do you know that the evil cultivators will act, elder?"

"I will not conceal from you, fellow cultivator," the Third Elder said, "that we also have an ally from another nation, an orthodox cultivator who, like you, has been forced to leave his native soil. He has given us a guarantee that he will facilitate this matter. The Li family has concealed considerable forces in the southern mines over the years. If we join forces and act with one heart, we are certain to prevail in defeating evil and defending the Way, returning the world to purity."

The group of Wan cultivators exchanged looks. From the consideration that they had no bargaining chips, they offered up all the agents they had left in the Land of Turmoil.

Xi Ping split his attention, listening in and recording while thinking, An “orthodox cultivator” forced to leave his native soil who knows the Queen Mother of the West’s movements like the back of his hand. He can’t possibly be talking about that purebred evil cultivator Yu Chang.

He narrowed his eyes. “Wangge Luobao.”

There had been a schism between Southern Shu’s two clans, the Miah had revolted against Lingyun, and Wangge Luobao was the Miah’s savior, as well as a former Dragon Subduing Knight. If you insisted on calling him an “orthodox cultivator” who had been forced to leave his native soil, it didn’t seem entirely unfeasible.

Wangge Luobao had always mingled ambiguously with people like Yu Chang and the Emperor of the East, not doing anything major, so Xi Ping had automatically viewed them as all of a kind. If not for Zhou Huan’s hair, he never would have thought that this Shu cultivator who secretly had a foot on eight different boats would also be colluding with Northern Li.

That person was like the legendary next life spiritual fish. You knew full well that he existed, but he could always make sure he was overlooked at the critical moment.

Wait!

Xi Ping had suddenly realized that among all the evil cultivators who had made names for themselves to this day, Wangge Luobao was the only one he wasn't very familiar with. The one and only contact between them—and even that one-sided—had been the invitation to the South Sea Hidden Realm.

It was clear that the lunatic tone for that sloppy plan had been set by Zhuoming.

A thought appeared in Xi Ping's mind: if not for Zhuoming, Wangge Luobao wouldn't necessarily have invited him.

He had been spending the vast majority of his time “in seclusion” in the Land of Turmoil, splitting his attention eight different ways, occasionally running the Luwu's errands for san-ge. He hadn't actually had any time to be a social butterfly among the forces of evil. But the Luwu were drinking straws that had taken root in the black markets of all the nations. Apart from those who had personal grudges against him, the overwhelming majority of known evil cultivators had had some dealings with him.

The sole exception was this Lingyun rebel who went around everywhere seducing everyone and repeatedly selling himself... It might have been a bit self-aggrandizing, but Xi Ping thought that Wangge Luobao seemed to have been deliberately avoiding him.

As a mixed-blood Dragon Subduing Knight who had shown himself to be a singular talent among his fellows, he ought to have been a person that both the Xiuyi and the Miah couldn't stand, but he had risen above the rest and become Southern Shu's sole ascended spirit outside of the spiritual mountains. As soon as he appeared, he had cut the Lingyun Spiritual Mountains down to half their size and led the Miah clan's leader and its two elders to their deaths, swallowing what they had accumulated over many years in a single gulp. And that was nothing; after all, looking throughout the northern and southern continents, masters of the way of "digging pits and burying people in them" existed in some number. But he had turned around and recovered the whole Miah clan, making the Three Islands—from the common people to the cultivators—all worship him as a god.

It was very easy to pry apart the conjunctivitis sufferer and his band of die-hards; Xi Ping and Zhao Qindan between them had already pulled it off... While lately he had persisted in fooling himself and her, playing dead and not daring to go talk to the young mistress, always beseeching his Grandma Wei to pass on messages for him, it hadn't held up their business.

The Queen Mother of the West had personally opened a back door for him; Yao Qi and Chang Jun were keeping an eye on her. And the Emperor of the East's lackeys were plentiful, it wasn't hard to find them if you put in some time.

Only Wangge Luobao and the Miah clan were like sealed drums. An outsider could find no crack to get in.

Xi Ping looked and scanned the history book on his desk. In seven days...

When he paid attention to Wangge Luobao, Xi Ping had a sudden sensation of being unable to sit still, urging him to go investigate Wangge Luobao's plans at once.

He had faced countless frightening enemies in his life, but whether it was the full moon sage or the divine sword Wanshuang, his intuition had never given him such a strong warning.

“Queru.” Through the reincarnation wood, Xi Ping sent a message to Li Manlong in the South Sea Hidden Realm. “You haven't checked in with an all's well yet today. Has there been any change?”

After discovering the Ways of the Heart of common origin lying silent in the spiritual mountains, when Xi Ping had finished being run off his feet dealing with Great Wan's domestic affairs, what he had been most concerned about had been the South Sea Hidden Realm.

After all, what the South Sea Hidden Realm contained were also "spiritual mountains."

He had almost wanted to move Chief Li and the others to Tao County there and then.

Once Wangge Luobao found out that a crack had opened in the South Sea Hidden Realm, the Miah half-immortals under his command would be able to get in and seize the hidden realm. It was Southern Shu territory. Xi Ping's reach wasn't long enough, no matter what.

But the Turmoilers couldn't bear to leave.

Chief Li had said, "This so-called heavenly edict can come in the blink of an eye. If the spiritual mountains in the hidden realm really could communicate with Wangge Luobao, the Miah cultivators would have been here long ago. Why would they give us time to react? My people have only just managed to build a home for themselves, and in a few months, little Hope will be born... Tai Sui, however good Tao County may be, it is a human place."

Xi Ping had nothing to say to that—in the eyes of the world, the Turmoilers in fact didn't really count as human. Even with the toilet bulletins, people's deep-rooted notions weren't about to change overnight.

Most importantly, he couldn't enter the South Sea Hidden Realm; he couldn't force the Turmoilers who had gone there to pack their bags and go.

Xi Ping was helpless. All he could do was make them report with an all's well every day and ask the Southern Shu Luwu who hadn't withdrawn to keep a constant eye on the situation in Shu.

But very soon, he had realized that what Li Manlong said made sense. Since the Xuanyin Mountains speaking and his fireworks blowing up the Sea of Stars, nearly a month had passed, and all the Xiuyi and Miah had done was kill each other. No one had gone to the depths of the South Sea...and Wangge Luobao, who was said to have inherited Ancestor Tianbo's Way of the Heart, had been loitering in the vicinity of Southern He with no idea that the South Sea Hidden Realm he had worked so hard to pursue had opened a crack.

This was very delicate.

The spiritual mountains of all the nations had begun secretly taking part in human wars through their heavenly edicts. Reasonably speaking, since Wangge Luobao, who had inherited Ancestor Tianbo's Way of the Heart, could summon forth the South Sea Hidden Realm using that Way of the Heart, he ought also to be receiving the spiritual mountains' "heavenly edicts"...so why weren't the hidden realm's spiritual mountains paying attention to him?

This Wangge Luobao, who was so mysterious it made Xi Ping's blood run cold—what Way of the Heart had he actually inherited?

Was the crack in the South Sea Hidden really a coincidence?

Why had that ascended spirit sword aura knocked open precisely a passage that would only permit those below an established foundation to pass? Was there some peculiar law of conversion at work here, or...did the spiritual mountains in the South Sea Hidden Realm only accept people "without a Way of the Heart"?

Just then, a ray of light came flying from Rosy Cloud Peak like a shooting star and landed in the snow with a bang, knocking out a string of big, gaudy writing, like implanting a set of big gold teeth in the snowy mountain; it interrupted Xi Ping's train of thought.

Wen Fei wrote: Tai Sui, when can you provide the silk dragon hearts?!

Heaven's Design Pavilion had a group of elites who were as remarkably talented as Pang Jian, who had happened to run into unique turns of fortune in life and had been able to refine Ways of the Heart for themselves. Facing the current instability, while "upgraded immortal tools" had already been sent out in secret, ultimately, external objects still couldn't match up to genuine established foundation cultivators. With Pang Jian's tacit consent, this group of elites had been writing to request the immortal mountains to release established foundation pills.

Here in Southern Wan, while the key figures all knew that inherited Ways of the Heart of common origin were no good, they still didn't know that they themselves had already fallen into the trap. Xi Ping, the only one who didn't fear his Way of the Heart shattering, was destined to find the truth difficult to proclaim, while the only person in the world who could discuss these matters with him...had gone on a long journey.

Xi Ping had already been fretful. When he thought of Zhou Ying, it increased his despondency. He was extremely unhappy and not in the mood to respond by sending a message back, so he walked out the door, plastered a talisman to his throat, and shouted in the direction of Rosy Cloud Peak: "There aren't any! The Territory Map nearly drove the silk dragons to extinction! It's hardly been a month! Do you think silk dragons breed like maggots?"

His voice raised echoes. All of Flying Jade Peak quivered to the shout of like maggots...maggots... until the snow massed on the north slope was on the verge of collapse.

A tree branch flew from the snow shuffler at the cottage door, coming toward Xi Ping's forehead like a sword.

A human voice came from the snow-white tree trunk: "Not only have I not taught you swordsmanship over the last decade and more, it seems I also haven't taught you that you—can't—make—a—racket—on—a—snowy—mountain!"

Xi Ping had no time to dodge. The tree branch left a red mark on his forehead. He leaned backward quickly and scurried off like a frightened rat.

At the same time, he livened up again and thought to himself, Right, silk dragon hearts are in short supply now, especially in places where they haven't realized the danger of Ways of the Heart of common origin yet. Their price has gone sky high on the black market. Only Northern Li hasn't made a peep. I suppose they must have hooked up with Lao Wang from Southern Shu's Three Islands, the source of spiritual beasts.

Silk dragons were rare on the outside, but there were plenty of spiritual beasts in the South Sea Hidden Realm. Before, he hadn't dared to let Li Manlong and the others get near spiritual beasts, but lately he had sent over a batch of spirit-conducting gold weapons, making it much easier for the Turmoilers to deal with spiritual beasts. The silk dragon itself wasn't a ferocious spiritual beast, anyway, and the Turmoilers had been occupied in rearing spiritual beasts. They were familiar with their habits.

They could scare up a batch of silk dragon hearts from the South Sea Hidden Realm and hand them over to Wei Chengxiang to sell off, pretending that they had come out of the Southern He peninsula. They would earn spiritual stones, and the supply of silk dragon hearts would be imputed to Wangge Luobao. Teach him to lurk!

But before he could say anything, in the South Sea Hidden Realm, Li Manlong sent a reply through the reincarnation wood: "All's well today. It's only that my people probed deep into the mountains and discovered an unusual situation, which held them up for a while. I was just about to tell you, Tai Sui."

Xi Ping said, "You're exploring the spiritual mountains? I wanted to ask a favor to do with that. What unusual situation? You first."

"Before, when Miss Zhao was transferring silk dragon hearts from the black market, she practically talked her mouth raw. We were helpless spectators, powerless to help. So we were thinking that these things are rare on the market and can't be quickly restocked, and Tai Sui was sure to need some later, so we had better prepare some for you ahead of time.”

Xi Ping raised his eyebrows, thinking, Queru is wonderful, always ready with whatever you need.

But Li Manlong said, “But we searched for nearly a month, in all the places silk dragons could dwell—Tai Sui, there are no silk dragons in this hidden realm.”

Xi Ping froze, letting the tree branch chasing him hit him full in the back. He fell face first into a snowdrift.

In the South Sea Hidden Realm, which was like a twin to the Lingyun Mountains, all kinds of living things existed, including the extinct eternal spring brocade...with the sole exception of one species of spiritual beast?

CHAPTER 212 - A Life of Regret (24)

Apart from the established foundation pill, there was no other method for establishing a foundation recorded in the ancient texts. The history of using silk dragon hearts to create established foundation pills was far more ancient than the sages who had ascended and left the mortal dust; naturally it was also more ancient than all the extant spiritual mountains.

Silk dragons were only valuable because they grew slowly and had been overhunted. This species of spiritual beast didn't actually have strict requirements for its environment. While they liked dampness and warmth, as long as there wasn't thick ice, an adult silk dragon could maintain its body temperature and survive using its heart, which was like a spiritual energy pump; it would only stop growing. They weren't picky eaters, either. They could eat small marine animals as well as aquatic plants. They were much easier to rear than gluttonous and vicious beasts like gold-armored zhengs.

Li Manlong hefted a newly-arrived upgraded immortal tool and pressed a button on it. The surrounding spiritual energy was absorbed by the spirit-conducting gold. It let off a faint greenish light that could shine through the water's surface and strike the heart of the lake.

At the bottom of this forest lake grew a dense layer of a strange aquatic plant. When touched by the light, the slim, graceful plants moved on their own, beginning to dance in large swaths. Filaments like hair reached out from their crowns, scrabbled around in a panic in the water, then retreated back among the plants.

“This is ‘three-day dream,’” Li Manlong said distinctly with his bothersome throat. “According to legend, one plant can extend the lifespan of a mortal on their deathbed for three days. Though it can’t save their life, for those three days, the dying person can be without pain or illness, even recover their youth, and die with dignity. Tai Sui, I’ve only read of this kind of plant in a scroll fragment in the spiritual beast farm. It’s said that in ancient times, the favorite food of wild silk dragons was the leaves of three-day dream. When they died and their corpses sank, the silk dragon hearts could cause a large number of three-day dream seeds to sprout. Wherever there was three-day dream, there would be silk dragons. Later, this symbiotic relationship was broken off by humans. Large quantities of three-day dream were eaten by silk dragons, but it couldn’t obtain silk dragon hearts, so it gradually went extinct.”

Xi Ping asked, “But without silk dragon hearts, won’t three-day dream not sprout?”

Li Manlong said, “We dug up some seeds and took them back to the village. We found that as long as you spread a layer of green ore powder at the roots of the plant, it will sprout—it seems to be different from the records. Though the scroll fragment I read was only the leisure reading of the low-level cultivators on the spiritual beast farm. We do not know its level of precision.”

Xi Ping shook his head. “It isn’t likely that the record was incorrect.”

It wasn’t that he had faith in the Shu’s academic standards, it was that “the dragons and plants lived in symbiosis,” “the symbiotic relationship was severed by humans,” “the delicate and precious aquatic plant went extinct” all hung together. Supposing that three-day dream could also be grown with spiritual stones outside the hidden realm, then it would be impossible for a good thing like this, which could prolong life as well as feed silk dragons, not to have been preserved. The wealthy might have planted their fish ponds full of the stuff.

Outside the hidden realm, silk dragons bred by humans had led to the extinction of three-day dream; inside the hidden realm, the silk dragons had disappeared, leaving only a large quantity of three-day dream... Neither of these conditions was natural.

In other words, it was likely that the South Sea Hidden Realm was like Tao County enveloped by the Law Breaker, with certain man-made rules—for example, you couldn't be an established foundation.

Or rather...you couldn't have a Way of the Heart.

The person who had formulated the rules had only rejected the silk dragons, and had even tampered with the attributes of other plants and animals that had “predation symbiosis” relationships with silk dragons!

Xi Ping was silent for a long while. “Let me ask you again, Queru, are you sure you don't want to take temporary refuge in Tao County? Don't you think that this place...that this place seems like a manmade glazed ball? Isn't it frightening to live inside it?”

There seemed to be goosebumps even in his voice, but Li Manlong laughed—he had heard recently that this mysterious Tai Sui of the Luwu was actually a young man, not even as old as an ordinary mortal senior.

For some reason, Li Manlong hadn't had any sense of disillusionment as at the collapse of a divine figure. Instead, he had felt somewhat more affectionate: lately, he was always remembering how Tai Sui's voice in the reincarnation wood had sounded, mixed in among the inarticulate Turmoilers, learning Southern He songs along with them.

“Tai Sui,” Li Manlong said slowly, “isn’t Tao County’s spiritual energy prohibition illusion also manmade?”

Xi Ping froze, then heard this old man who had tasted all the sludge in the world say, “So when you leave Tao County, leave the hidden realm, does that mean you are no longer inside an illusion woven by some person or another?”

“Humans live by creating illusions and rules.” Wangge Luobao had noticed Yu Chang’s hesitation. He smiled. “If you don’t fuse with the spiritual mountains, you still fuse with something else—aren’t people’s perceptions of what is right and proper, of correct order and tradition, all the same thing? Otherwise, why can a civil servant without the strength to truss a chicken kill a person just by writing out a verdict? Spiritual stones at least have some use, but you can’t eat or drink gold, silver, or copper coins, so why can having them make you want for nothing?”

Yu Chang smiled and didn’t argue back verbally. He thought, You can live eating shit just as well as eating food, so why don’t you eat shit?

He detested all things that made him think of spiritual image brands.

Wangge Luobao was like a well-trained dog. When he tilted his head, he could sniff out what another person was thinking. He nodded amiably and said, “My mistake. In fact, there’s some wishful thinking on our parts in this. How about this, we’ll come at it indirectly, ask the Queen Mother of the West her views—see whether she chooses to yield to her instincts, or whether she wants to step forward in spite of heaven.”

“How are you planning to ask?” Yu Chang asked coolly. “Say, ‘We planted grit projections in your shadow and spied on you while you were meditating, and we have a tiny piece of advice from a clear-headed outside observer’s point of view to give you’? Listen, Wangge-xiong, do you want to eat poison miasma buns for breakfast tomorrow?”

Wangge Luobao said, smiling, “Why would we need to say it ourselves?”

Yao Qi was quite fortunate. The guard he was impersonating with the Luwu mask was quite similar to him, the timid and taciturn type that wanted nothing better than to go unseen. And it turned out that the Queen Mother of the West liked quiet, and this type of person, who was like a shadow, suited her tastes, so Yao Qi stood guard outside the Queen Mother of the West’s courtyard every day, closer than Chang Jun.

Though the great evil cultivators wouldn’t let a guard overhear their secret conferences, being around them day and night, you could still pick up many things.

But Ziming-xiong had really never had much luck in his whole life. Today, for example, his horoscope probably said, “It is inadvisable to arrive early.”

Yao Qi relieved a colleague at his post one ke early. As soon as he had taken up his position, he ran up against Wangge Luobao, who had been paying his customary visit, on his way out. This Shu master was ardent and courteous, never haughty in the way other ascended spirits were. All of the Queen Mother of the West’s guards liked saying a few words to him. Only Yao Qi felt the hair on the back of his neck stand up when he saw this Xiuyi-Miah mixed blood man. With his spine as upright as a flagpole in his back, he stiffly joined his colleague in respectfully seeing the guest out. Perhaps because Yao Qi’s posture as he moved the arm and leg on each side in unison was too distinctive, Wangge Luobao gave him an extra look.

His affable smile raised gooseflesh on Yao Qi’s back. His chin jabbed against his chest. He didn’t notice that after Wangge Luobao left, his shadow and the shadow of the other guard standing at the gate both began to ripple slightly at the edges, like water.

As soon as Wangge Luobao left, the Queen Mother of the West’s gates and doors all closed automatically. Dealing with a great evil cultivator was undoubtedly emotionally exhausting. Every time she had seen him, she would meditate to cycle her energy; in this respect, Yao Qi was profoundly sympathetic.

But the time she spent meditating had been growing shorter and shorter, and when she finished, there would be a somewhat unstable overflow of spiritual energy—normally only young disciples just starting out meditating who accidentally fell asleep would produce this kind of spiritual energy fluctuation when they woke with a start.

At the Queen Mother of the West's cultivation level, reasonably speaking, this shouldn't happen. What kind of difficulty had she encountered?

Yao Qi thought, I suppose that the "heavenly edict" isn't so easy to receive. She bears the heavy responsibility of restoring the nation, and her every step is met with obstacles. Cultivation is swimming against the current to begin with.

As soon as this thought flashed by, Yao Qi froze. He smacked himself on the forehead. "What am I thinking?"

Yu Chang had just tried implanting an idea in the heads of this pair of little guards, and one of them had nearly struggled free of the grit projection. In spite of himself, he was rather taken aback. His gaze fell on Yao Qi.

Was there anything unusual about this kid?

A person enveloped by the grit projection would, without knowing it, have thoughts that did not belong to them implanted by their shadows, and say all their thoughts aloud for the evil cultivator inside their shadow to hear.

Yu Chang immediately poured a thought into Yao Qi's head: As an ascended spirit, she wants to obtain the authority of the spiritual mountains that only shed skins can approach elsewhere. It must be a torment to her. Without some of the bravery of being "without self," she wouldn't be able to take it.

Before this thought could settle, Yao Qi gave another start. What kind of nonsense am I thinking? he thought.

Yao Qi was certain to unconsciously think in the Wan language. Fortunately, neither he nor Chang Jun was proficient in the Southern He language; guessing and groping, they could manage to understand it, but it was asking too much of them to expect them to speak it fluently. This had forced Moon Plated Peak to make special improvements to the Luwu masks it had given them—while they wore them, no matter what language these two fakes spoke in, others would understand what they said and automatically hear it in their own language and accent.

There were only two issues: if Yao Qi was speaking the Wan language, then his listener had to coincidentally also understand the Wan language. Also, each language had different meanings attached to its words, and wording that couldn't be perfectly matched would sound strangely out of sync. So while wearing this kind of Luwu mask, it was best to speak as little as possible.

Had the person using the grit projection now been from Southern He, they would have noticed something strange about Yao Qi's unconscious speech within a few sentences. Fortunately, Yu Chang was from Chu and had lived at the Wan-Chu border. He was far more familiar with the Wan language than the Southern He language, which was close to being dead. Not only did he not hear a problem, he actually thought that this Southern He man spoke more clearly than the others.

Yu Chang was astonished. With a bit of probing, he learned that this was only a little half-immortal, the kind that hadn't even finished rinsing his spiritual bones. He was just about to investigate more closely when he saw another Southern He person run over. Perhaps afraid of disturbing the Queen Mother of the West's meditation, the newcomer didn't speak, only gestured from a distance at the strange little guard, seeming to be telling him to go somewhere.

Yu Chang wasn't in the South Sea himself. He had to rely on Wangge Luobao to place his grit projection talismans for him and couldn't freely control them. Once this little guard left, today's talisman would have been wasted. Yu Chang made a quick decision. He stopped inspecting this little half immortal whose name he didn't know. Relying on his own higher cultivation, he forcibly snatched the minds of Yao Qi and the other guard on duty—they were only half-immortals; afterward, they would have some memory loss at most. They wouldn't necessarily be able to find the remnants of his talisman.

The gazes of the pair of guards standing at the Queen Mother of the West's gate stagnated simultaneously. They turned into the grit projection's marionettes.

Yao Qi stiffly waved his hand, sending off his colleague, then said, "I've heard that shed skins accord with the Way. According with the Way means that a part of you belongs to the universe and the spiritual mountains. You are no longer merely a commonplace person. Since Her Highness has been granted a heavenly edict, will she accord with the Way in advance?"

The other marionette's consciousness was also being suppressed by Yu Chang. With his mouth, Yu Chang answered himself, "I don't know. My cultivation is low, I can't imagine it. But when I think about it carefully, it's very frightening. Wouldn't the spiritual mountains be controlling 'me'?"

Yang Wan meanwhile had hit her usual stumbling block during her daily lessons and was once again dragged back from the road to heaven by fear, and her senses, which had automatically opened at some point, had heard every word of the private conversation between the guards outside her gate.

“It’s called ‘according with the Way.’ What do you mean by being controlled by the spiritual mountains? I am a cultivator of the orthodox Way. What I want is to comprehend the inheritance of the spiritual mountains.”

“Comprehension is one thing...but if you accord with the Way, afterward, everything you think and feel, will it come from your own heart, or from the spiritual mountains?”

Yang Wan’s heart jumped. What these two guards were saying struck precisely at her mood as she had meditated.

“If you ‘accord with the Way’ naturally, your cultivation level and boundary must be extremely high, so your own heart will be the heart of the spiritual mountains. What difference does it make where anything comes from? It’s only that Her Highness has just become an ascended spirit, and her boundary is still far from according with the Way. I’m afraid the spiritual mountains have given her a heavier burden than she can bear and spoiled things in their haste.”

“Won’t it be cutting the foot to fit the shoe, then? Alas, I’m afraid Her Highness will have a hard time making it through this. I’ve been watching her periods of meditation get shorter day by day.”

Yang Wan automatically glanced at the clock hanging on the wall and found that from when she had begun to meditate to when she had woken with a start, not even the time it takes to drink a cup of tea had passed.

Then she heard her usually reticent guard sigh. “I’ve heard that our Lancang Mountains used to have the Lovebird Sword Array left behind by the Two Sages. Our Sect Leader went astray in his cultivation, and the Lovebird Sword Array was forced to dissipate by the four other nations’ shed skin masters working together. If a new person who had accorded with the Way came along, I suppose that the Lovebird Sword Array could reappear in the human world... Alas, the anniversary of our national crisis is nearly here.”

Just then, there came the sound of urgent footsteps. Another one of their people came along and pulled away one of the guards, as if he needed his help with something. The Queen Mother of the West was very lenient in her rule. It was all right as long as her sentries weren’t so neglectful as to both run off. As a bereaved people in exile, rather than being like master and servant, they were more like family.

The dialogue had come to an abrupt halt. Yang Wan was dazed for a long moment, then suddenly understood what the barrier she couldn't get past was. She walked to the window, the look in her eyes growing steadfast.

At the same time, the grit projection in Yao Qi's shadow abruptly dispersed.

Yao Qi gave a cry. His temples ached fiercely. Holding his head, he squatted down—Chang Jun had been the one to drag him away.

Though they were all half-immortals, Wei Chengxiang was a seasoned adventurer who had cut a bloody streak through a heap of evil cultivators, while Yao Qi and Chang Jun were hothouse flowers.

If it hadn't been impossible for Wei Chengxiang to be in two places at once, Xi Ping really wouldn't have felt comfortable leaving the two of them to squat beside the great evil cultivators, so he had stipulated that they report their safety in the reincarnation wood every half shichen, in case they encountered any unexpected danger.

Chang Jun held up Yao Qi, letting Xi Ping pull Yao Qi's consciousness into the Law Breaker's space and send it back—inside the Law Breaker, all cultivation techniques attached to the consciousness could be rinsed off.

“It was as if your consciousness had been paralyzed. You just wouldn’t answer.” Chang Jun’s voice trembled slightly. “Was...was it the grit projection?”

Yao Qi panted for breath. His back was covered in cold sweat. The two of them found a deserted spot and took out a tiny upgraded immortal tool to block the scanning consciousnesses of any masters.

Then Yao Qi took a small trumpet from his clothes—this was a mortal recording device. He pressed the replay button.

His talking to himself, as well as his dialogue with his colleague, played back perfectly.

On Flying Jade Peak, Xi Ping abruptly sat up straight.

The Lancang Mountains’ divine tool? Why would Yu Chang mention that?

CHAPTER 213 - A Life of Regret (25)

Yu Chang had borrowed the mouths of the two guards to sow doubts under the Queen Mother of the West's window; the half-comprehending tone had been played quite accurately—Xi Ping figured that the conjunctivitis sufferer had been playing to his strengths; he himself only half understood. The chief offering couldn't have been doing this out of having nothing to do, just to relieve the Queen Mother of the West's boredom.

The Queen Mother of the West had suddenly turned cold toward Lord Guang'an. This symptom sounded like the Dignitary of Fate Elder with only the Sea of Stars in his heart.

Yao Qi had said that her meditation periods were becoming shorter and shorter. Tying in Yu Chang's "debate" with himself, it was likely that the Queen Mother of the West had encountered the same predicament shifu had while becoming a shed skin.

But a "near-shed skin" and an "early stage ascended spirit" couldn't be discussed in the same breath.

The former, if he obeyed heaven, would naturally become part of the "Way of Heaven"; even if he was determined to resist heaven, he would still have a fighting chance. The magnificent spectacle of Zhi Xiu grappling with the

“the spiritual mountains’ Way of Heaven” was still fresh in Xi Ping’s memory.

The latter... The Queen Mother of the West’s circumstances were easy to imagine. Her cultivation level was about the same as Xi Ping’s. Perhaps she was even worse off; after all, Xi Ping had no Way of the Heart and had used the flame of the sole “sage” that he acknowledged to see these so-called “Ways of the Heart,” while the Queen Mother of the West was full of longing to return to Lancang’s “orthodoxy.”

Xi Ping had had a wild thought and pushed the Queen Mother of the West to the forefront as a scapegoat in order to divert the Sword Slave’s notice. Who would have thought that the Queen Mother of the West, a hero who “would start to pant if you told her she was fat,” rather than just finding a place to hide temporarily, had really decided to become the “goat”!

“What kind of dumb luck have I...no, have we wandered into? Ziming-xiong, another time, let’s find a temple and pray together, all right?”

Yao Qi, numb, politely declined. “If the Southern Sage really could work miracles, he’d use divine lightning from the nine heavens to hammer out a ‘Song of the Phoenix’ on the tops of our skulls.”

Chang Jun had yet to notice that events had taken a grave turn. Hearing this news, he was so excited that he seemed ready to contribute to a toilet bulletin. “So she’s going to become the first person in the world to ‘accord with the Way’ as an ascended spirit? Can the legendary vanished divine tool of the mountains really return to the human world through her...?”

Goodness gracious, what talents emerge in every generation! Shiyong, if the Lovebird Sword Array and the Sword Slave face each other head on, who would you bet on?”

“It would be for the best if the two of them got together and died in a pit. Don’t talk about things like you understand them!” Xi Ping said irritably.

“Do you still remember the rule that the Bell of Tribulation can’t pass beyond the Latent Cultivation Temple?”

Yao Qi and Chang Jun froze.

In all these years, the Bell of Tribulation had only left the mountains once, and the place it had gone to was the Resurrection Vortex in the East Sea, a place mortals would never approach.

It was unknown whether the legend that “Each toll of the Bell of Tribulation will be followed by three years of drought” was true or false, but Tao County had only barely been restored with a hundred thousand white spirits after the Silver Moon had shone on it—and at the time the Silver Moon had been under the control of Xuanwu in his prime, its impact dampened practically to the minimum.

The Queen Mother of the West might not be able to reach Xuanwu's cultivation level in another thousand years of cultivating. Moreover, Qiu Sha had been only an ascended spirit; a single sweep of the Silver Moon had destroyed her. A powerful shed skin master could contend against a divine tool of the mountains.

If the Lancang Mountains' divine tool reappeared in the mortal world, it was up for debate whether it would be able to overcome the Sword Slave, who bore Wanshuang, but at any rate the Queen Mother of the West certainly wouldn't be able to control it.

“When that whatever-it-is sword array disappeared, it wasn't necessarily scared to death by the alliance of the four nations. It may very well have been that their crazy Sect Leader was afraid that the divine tool would go out of control, so he 'took it away' with him.” Xi Ping waved a hand, wiping away the “why” written all over Chang Jun's face. “Anyway, what kind of wastrel is Yang Wan, anyway? If she really does get her hands on Lancang's divine tool of the mountains and lets it flash and bang over the Southern He Peninsula for one ke, never mind the animals and plants, there won't even be a single wildfire root left underground. She...”

At this point, Xi Ping's words came to an abrupt halt, because he had suddenly remembered that Lancang's veins of the earth had already been severed.

On the whole Southern He Peninsula, there were "no more people" to begin with. The survivors of the former nation of He were all on the South Sea. How could the Turmoilers count as people? All that remained were the shameless unwanted guests from the various nations. If they died, it would be just what they deserved.

Whether the Lovebird Sword Array did or didn't go out of control was no problem at all for the Queen Mother of the West.

Xi Ping looked fretfully at the calendar block. Since he had overheard Northern Li's reception of Zhou Huan, over a day had passed... Less than six days remained until the "memorial day of national humiliation" that the evil cultivators had spoken off.

Chang Jun waited a long time without hearing Xi Ping continue. "Shiyong, why did you say...that it might have been their late Sect Leader who got rid of the divine tool of the mountains?"

"When Lancang's Sect Leader sent troops north, he was under the influence of a heart demon seed." Xi Ping paused, then briefly told the story hidden beneath the historical record. “Until his death, he maintained a thread of lucidity. He wanted to place a special kind of spirit-conducting gold into the veins of the earth to make the spiritual mountains return spiritual energy to the human world... He didn’t succeed. There were too many people who wanted spiritual stones. So all the people of Southern He turned into Turmoilers. Who would have thought that two centuries later, even being Turmoilers would become a tricky proposition.”

“Then what do we do?” Yao Qi was the first to come to his senses. His first thought was of the mortal miners and minor tradespeople in the southern mines. “Since we’ve already formed an alliance with Northern Li, why don’t we tell ‘Wanshuang’ about this? Perhaps she will be willing to avoid the fight temporarily.”

“That won’t necessarily work. Leaving aside that an unsociable and self-important person like the Sword Slave won’t necessarily be willing to avoid battle, even if she were willing, it might not be possible—she’s Kunlun’s envoy. If she hands the southern mines over to the evil cultivators, won’t she be disgraced on her return? How will she account for herself to her sect?” Chang Jun rejected Yao Qi’s proposal and came up with a lousy idea himself. “But couldn’t we exchange this information for some people? Have her help find a suitable place for the innocent miners and Turmoilers...”

“The miners are all right, but the Turmoilers... I might as well stick a note on my forehead telling her that when the Turmoilers paid obeisance to the Queen Mother of the West, it was my doing,” Xi Ping said with a sigh.

“Stop talking nonsense. You two focus on eavesdropping! I’ll say it again, listening for signs of disturbance is enough for us, don’t get near the evil cultivators again—Yao Ziming, what’s your problem? You’re so dedicated to your job of guard in an evil cultivator’s den that you even showed up early for your shift! It’s not like the Queen Mother of the West is Rooster Luo.”

Yao Qi, an iron-willed, heroic man who had maintained the Luwu mask in the face of a great evil cultivator’s grit projection, on hearing the words “Rooster Luo,” was so scared that his little face turned ghastly pale.

“How...how can you dare...”

“I even dared to tell him to call me shishu to his face. You still can’t get over this shadow from your childhood, huh?” Through the reincarnation wood, Xi Ping swiftly sent messages to Wei Chengxiang and the Blind Wolf King. “I’ll have the Blind Wolf King send a personal letter and go myself to see Wanshuang and have a try... I figure there’s not much chance. A-Xiang will plan for the worst outcome, immediately think of a way to get people out. Six days. There’s still time...”

At this point, he paused, then said seriously, “I was joking just now. We were fortunate to have you here, Ziming-xiong. If not for you, I don’t know how far behind our information would have lagged. We really wouldn't have had a chance then. Ziming, when you two come back safe, I'll come pay a visit to express my gratitude."

Yao Qi's ghastly pale face turned bright red in the blink of an eye, like one of the stop-and-go lights for cars in Jinping's streets.

Fortunately Xi Ping wasn't in the mood to tease him now.

Pang Jian, patrolling Great Wan's borders, was the first to receive the warning Xi Ping sent via Heavenly Question, telling him that the danger on the Wan-He border had escalated. Therefore, Pang Jian transferred all the forces Heaven's Design Pavilion still had available to Great Wan's southern border.

The Grand Canal passed through the border inscriptions, surging like an artery. Since Northern Li had dispatched troops, the bustle of steamships at the canal's southernmost port, "Port Lookback," had vanished. The water dragons disappeared, the fragrant jade scent had vanished. Countless snow wine merchants crowded anxiously into the little post station on the port's wharf, coming to inquire about the situation every day.

Holding a stealth talisman between his fingers, Pang Jian landed at the southern border's Heaven's Design Pavilion branch. When he walked in, spiritual energy smacked him right in the face.

The space expanded by mustard seeds was packed full of spiritual stones and “upgraded immortal tools,” among them a shocking row of ascended spirit grade ones; if they were fired with enough spiritual stones to burn, they were sufficient to briefly hold up even an ordinary shed skin. These dangerous objects that had at one time nearly blown the Xuanyin Mountains sky high were snugly sealed under five locks. They required Xuanyin’s inner sect, Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s headquarters, the Kaiming Department’s head office, the local Kaiming Department, and the local government yamen to open the locking inscriptions simultaneously. Their operating manual was even thicker than the Four Books and Five Classics all stacked together. It was said that Moon Plated Peak was still working around the clock to come out with a revised second edition.

Pang Jian glanced in the direction of the southern mines. The Barrier Dispelling Bow in his femur was shaking slightly. The little girl who had buried her bone in his body a hundred years ago seemed to be crying for those spiritual stone miners who had left their homes for the sake of making a little more money.

“Don’t be scared, don’t be scared...” Through his outer robe, Pang Jian gently tapped his own leg, silently comforting the girl who would never grow up. He turned his head and saluted to the big, snow-white tree in the courtyard, then provided another talisman to lower temperature and reduce dampness for the tree that ought to have been growing in the cold heights. “Look, what’s this? General Zhi is here, too. Didn’t you love to hear stories about him when you were little? When you see this tree, it’s like you’re seeing General Zhi. The Kaiming Department’s gege and jiebies have named it ‘moonlight frost’...”

Bai Ling, who had been overseeing Guangyun Palace, had already received word through the reincarnation wood. He turned around and ordered the Luwu in the Land of Turmoil to make ready to withdraw at any time.

“Viscount,” the taciturn half-demon exhorted, “with His Highness away, please be sure to think things through carefully.”

“You’ve said it,” Xi Ping said with a bitter laugh. “He says ‘we’ll meet beyond the bounds,’ then goes off without even taking any luggage, leaving me to provide for the family and drag them all over the four seas and five continents. I suppose the way of clarity’s ultimate attack is dodging responsibility?”

“His Highness never carries his own luggage,” said Bai Ling.

“Right, and he never walks by himself, never combs his own hair or dresses himself—I’ve always wondered, with you out on Kaiming Department business, how did he manage not to get into better habits during those five years at the Latent Cultivation Temple?”

“There were paperman puppets to wait on him,” said Bai Ling. “Otherwise, he and the cat would have starved to death together in the immortal mountains.”

Xi Ping: “...”

The two of them shared a brief mutual silence, then simultaneously laughed aloud.

“You’ve spoiled him!” said Xi Ping.

“Yes,” said Bai Ling, “I admit that I am to blame... Also, Viscount.”

“Yeah.”

“I have a rather bad feeling. You must be careful.”

Whether the half-demon’s feeling was accurate, Xi Ping couldn’t say, but hearing this warning of Bai Ling’s, something flitted through his mind that he couldn’t catch.

Dimly, Xi Ping sensed that he had overlooked something important. But after thinking it over backward and forward several times, he still couldn't find and fill the vacancy. All he could do was temporarily set it aside and go bid farewell to shifu.

Xi Yue was practicing swordsmanship.

A half-puppet's method of practicing swordsmanship was different from a human's. When a human studied swordsmanship, they needed to imitate, then comprehend, then at last make it their own before they could have a full grasp of the technique. Even if they inherited their shifu's sword heart, when the way of the sword was passed down from person to person, it couldn't remain completely identical.

But for a half-puppet, it was much more mechanical. Except on Flying Jade Peak, there was likely no half-puppet in the world with the right to address a sword cultivator as "shifu." "Sword-bearing puppets" were always attendants and slaves. For a half-puppet, practicing swordsmanship meant working hard to understand the sword aura, then altering their own arrays apart from the core array, making every effort to come as close as possible to the "master's" sword technique. If they only worked hard enough, a half-puppet's rate of progress would be faster than a human's...except that they could never surpass their "master."

When Xi Ping landed on the rear of the mountain, Xi Yue's beam of sword energy, like a rainbow, raised the accumulated snow and whizzed as it flitted through the valley. This was precisely the first sword move that Xi Ping had learned.

When the icy clang of metal and hard frozen stone collided, there was an effect as if the mountain were being used as a qin.

Zhi Xiu, directing him from the sidelines, raised his eyebrows slightly—Xi Yue put in all and more than all his effort and could learn anything else just fine, but with this move, perhaps because he had seen Xi Ping use it so many times, little Xi Yue was always going “off-key.” Rather than say this was his sword aura, it would be more correct to say that it belonged to his rebellious disciple. Though the form was similar, perhaps because that rotten disciple had only known this one move for a very long time, there was a wave of “I’ll die if I can’t beat you to death” running through it... When Xi Yue performed it, there was an indescribable sense of staking everything on a single throw about it.

Xi Yue put away his sword, seeming to have noticed something himself. He automatically glanced at Xi Ping.

Xi Ping applauded supportively. “Good! You’re as good at receiving enlightenment as I was when I was little.”

Zhi Xiu said, "Have some shame. Come here."

Xi Ping patted Xi Yue on the head in passing, instructed him to "work hard on your swordsmanship," then flew up to the sword platform with shifu.

"This time, you pick for yourself." Zhi Xiu pointed at the various deep and shallow sword marks on the sword platform. "With the present state of your meridians, you'll be able to store at most three beams of my sword energy. But shed skin sword energy will empty out your essence, and you'll only just be able to sustain one move at a time. You might not be able to stand up after using it. Unless it's a matter of absolute necessity, be cautious."

"Understood." Xi Ping had plenty of experience where this was concerned. He went around the sword platform picking and choosing. "But while the sword energy will be gone once I use it, afterward, I can learn the moves!"

He'd have a handful of "Anger Shifu to Death" moves.

"Afterward, you'll misinterpret the moves." Zhi Xiu sighed helplessly. "It ought to be me going to see Wanshuang..."

"Kunlun and Wangge Luobao have hooked up and are targeting you and the Sword Slave." Xi Ping made a mark next to a sword cut he liked. "If you go, won't you be running straight into their arms?"

"Even with the Blind Wolf King to mediate, you still can't be willful and reckless. Wanshuang isn't one of the Xuanyin elders, to tolerate your impertinence and rudeness."

"You can set your mind at ease about that," Xi Ping promised seriously. Before Zhi Xiu could nod, he added, "It's not worthwhile for Wanshuang to sink to my level."

Zhi Xiu: "..."

Fair enough.

"Lin-shixiong hasn't yet found a way to imitate Lancang's spirit-conducting gold that could connect to the veins of the earth. If possible, stop by the Lancang Mountains on your way to see if there are any traces of it," Zhi Xiu continued. "Also, if it is indeed as you have guessed, and the Lovebird Sword Array was dispersed by Lancang's Sect Leader, perhaps there will be something you can use against it in the Lancang Mountains."

As Zhi Xiu spoke, he glanced in the direction of the Bell of Tribulation—in fact, the Bell of Tribulation hadn't acknowledged him, but the Xuanyin Mountains and the Territory Map had already merged. The divine tool of the mountains had had to surrender to the Territory Map. It was tightly imprisoned on the Principal Peak, waiting to wear away along with the spiritual mountains.

But now he thought more and more that letting this thing be might cause disaster.

As they spoke, Xi Ping had already chosen two sword moves. He was going south to the Land of Turmoil to rescue people, not to do battle, so the sword auras he had chosen both inclined toward “defense” and “protection,” so honest and mild they didn’t seem like choices he would make.

“The way of the sword most values defense through offense,” Zhi Xiu warned him. “Don’t only pick that type.”

Xi Ping hopped off the sword platform. “Shifu, there’s a sword move I want to learn.”

A night passed, and Xi Ping, like a force-fed duck, managed to carry away three beams of sword energy that were very burdensome for an ascended spirit. Carrying a letter the Blind Wolf King had written in his own hand, he passed through the reincarnation wood directly to the Wan-He border, said hello to Pang Jian, then silently set foot on the Southern He Peninsula.

At the same time, Wei Chengxiang was working around the clock to count and sort people and goods. There was no time to go to Tao County or the South Sea Hidden Realm; in case things went wrong, they would have to temporarily take to the sea.

CHAPTER 214 - A Life of Regret (26)

“The evil cultivators are in the South Sea. When you take to the sea, do your best to head for the shore of the East Sea, don’t approach the west,” Xi Ping said in a message to Wei Chengxiang. “Those beast-taming Shu have too many aquatic spiritual beasts. Your field of vision will be limited in the sea. Except as a matter of absolute necessity, don’t go into the water. Keep an eye out for information from Hongzheng and Ziming.”

“To tell you the truth, we can just run off ourselves if we hear a stirring. Our so-called ‘goods’ are only old grain stocks,” Wei Chengxiang said with a somewhat bitter laugh. “In such a tumultuous world, everyone is busy striving for power. Who has the free time to fool around killing a dog by the road? We’ll be jumping barefoot into the water. If we run into those great personages head on, it’ll be a loss for them to so much as give us a second look. Apart from you, no one would take us seriously.”

“Stop grumbling, it’ll be your luck if the great personages pay no more attention to you than to a fart. Are you all right on your own?”

“Dandan is helping me purchase old ships, and the mustard seeds for storage are ones I laid in years ago. They should be enough for storing mortal articles. If it really won’t do, we can turn to the black market and think of something. These low-level open-eyed grade storage mustard seeds aren't expensive. Each village has a visionary in charge. Everyone is being very cooperative."

In the underground of the Southern He Peninsula, the deformed descendants of master craftsmen had dug out passageways leading in all directions, connected to the inhabited villages on the surface. Underground, they stored provisions and exchanged information; a set of leaders had even emerged naturally, called "undoubting visionaries" in the He language.

The only point of similarity among the "undoubting visionaries" was their age.

The usual lifespan of the Turmoilers was around twenty years; their intellects were generally weak. A longer lifespan meant that they had been born stronger and healthier, and their intelligence was greater as well. Virtually all the parents of these "extraordinarily gifted" people had done hard labor in the mining areas and had scrounged some amount of nourishment from spiritual energy. If they were lucky and encountered no natural or man-made disasters, they could often live past forty.

A mortal who lived past forty became free of doubt; a forty-year-old Turmoiler had sampled all the world's bitterness and became an "undoubting visionary"—for example, Li Manlong.

The immortals could easily spend decades or centuries in seclusion. Except when they had nearly reached the end of their lifespans, the passage of time had absolutely no meaning for them. A hundred years passed in the blink of an eye. Their expressions and temperaments might as well have been welded in place; there wasn't the slightest alteration to them. Their Ways of the Heart were even more immobile.

But the lives of the Turmoilers were reckoned by the day, by the shichen. The visionaries frantically exchanged all their extra time for knowledge. After several generations rising to pick up from the ones who had gone before, they even had an unsteady, limping tradition; they had preserved Southern He's language and craftsmanship techniques intact. So when Wei Chengxiang and Xi Ping had brought them under protection, knowledge had spread like sparks from one village after another.

Each Turmoiler habitation had its "visionary." The visionaries used reincarnation wood amulets to communicate.

Wei Chengxiang tallied the goods and numbers of people they reported then sent the information out through the reincarnation wood, and under the organization of individual visionaries, they systematically moved house.

An unprecedented mass migration was brewing in silence.

“We can provide for ourselves, you look after yourself, ‘flying goose relay station.’ All our communications rely on you. Don’t drink, don’t go looking for fights. If you get disconnected, none of us will be able to get in touch with the rest.” After joking with him, Wei Chengxiang added, “Oh, right, what are we doing about the miners?”

“Don’t you worry about it, I’m going to ask Wanshuang. On the off chance it goes well, perhaps you won’t even have to take to the sea and will be able to evacuate via the canal directly.” Xi Ping paused, then said, “This relay station has already relocated to Northern Li’s mining area.”

“What?” Wei Chengxiang was startled. Remembering that earthshaking Wanshuang leaving its sheath, she gave a firm shudder. “Her? She...doesn’t seem very good-natured.”

“At worst I’ll hang myself at her doorstep, shame her with my death.” Xi Ping stood up, smiled at the Northern Li cultivator scrutinizing him warily, and followed the messenger beckoning him into the Sword Slave’s living quarters.

Xi Ping had lived in luxury since birth. He had never missed a meal. On the southern continent, his height was enough to make him stand above the crowd—even mixed in among the northerners, who were each the height of a tower, he still surpassed the average height; but now he had to tilt his head back to look at the Sword Slave sitting in front of him.

The suffocating force that came from her hit you right in the face. Everyone who came into her tent felt themselves become a chi shorter out of nowhere, nearly pressed into a crack.

But Xi Ping could see that the Sword Slave wasn't deliberately frightening him. She was dressed in casual clothes, without armor, and Wanshuang was propped up in a corner. Her manner was relaxed. For her, this probably counted as amiable.

It was the Sword Slave who was taken aback when she saw Xi Ping. "Wow, an ascended spirit?"

Xi Ping: "..."

What had the Blind Wolf King said to her?

The Sword Slave muttered, "The Blind Wolf King said you're the son of a little friend he made among the mortals, that you've come here to rescue some people... Who's your dad?"

"Southern Wan's Marquis of Yongning," said Xi Ping.

The Sword Slave clearly hadn't heard of him. She casually asked, "Marquis of which reign?"

"...The current one," said Xi Ping.

The Sword Slave froze slightly, then at last remembered. She sat up straight. Her face couldn't produce ordinary expressions; it looked fierce in joy and sorrow alike. Xi Ping distinctly felt the weight of her gaze. "So you're that... that whatchamacallit?"

Wu Lingxiao was supremely haughty. When going south to the Southern He Peninsula, she had half-heartedly learned about the "important figures" of the southern continent just before leaving, and after hearing about them had felt that apart from Zhi Xiu, all the other good-for-nothings were a waste of her time. She'd had a general idea that there was a survivor of the Yang clan in the Land of Turmoil, but as for what she looked like, she could work that out once she was done beating her up. She knew that the Chu and the Shu each had a lead evil cultivator; the southern barbarians' names were too long, she hadn't remembered them, and she hadn't taken any of these clowns seriously... Then there was another one; she hadn't been able to work out whether he counted as one of Xuanyin's or an evil cultivator. There were open questions about several things being connected to him or not. The most noteworthy point about this person, apart from being Zhi

Xiu's first disciple, was "becoming an ascended spirit after less than ten years of cultivation."

The Sword Slave had thought that this rumor was nonsense; even a reincarnated pile of dog shit couldn't have that kind of dumb luck. She had automatically classed him with freaks that had some inhuman blood.

But it turned out that this person was actually a completely standard cultivator.

Xi Ping said respectfully, "I belong to Xuanyin Mountain's Flying..."

The Sword Slave said, "You're that disciple of Zhi Xiu's who grows rotten firewood!"

The northern and southern continents had different climates. The Li couldn't tell apart the many plant species of the south, so many of them had no corresponding names in the Li language. The ones that were good for timber were generally known as "southern wood," and the rest were all called "rotten firewood."

Xi Ping: "..."

He believed now that the Sword Slave was the Blind Wolf King's very own shimei.

The Sword Slave seemed to have come upon a cat or dog that could recite doggerel rhymes; she suddenly developed a slight interest in him. Because she didn't think of Xi Ping as a person, she became increasingly loose-tongued, asking without any sense of propriety how he had cheated his way into becoming an ascended spirit.

Had it been a respectable cultivator in his place, this interrogation alone would have caused him infinite shame. Luckily, Xi Ping wasn't actually a respectable cultivator. Not only did he not think being an ascended spirit was anything to be proud of, he was even quite pleased to grumble about his tale of woe. Tilting back his head made his neck too sore, so he simply abandoned politeness and found a chair with a backrest to lean his head against, thoroughly practicing his Li language on the Sword Slave.

The Sword Slave listened with keen pleasure to her heart's content, and then, still having something on her mind, delivered her brilliant opinion: "The Sword of the South is done for. If he coddles his disciples like this, he'll never have a qualified successor."

Xi Ping waved a hand carelessly. "Since antiquity to the present, what virtuous sage hasn't been 'unprecedented and unfollowed'? The blue dragon births a chimera, the phoenix births a peacock, and the weasel's son is a rat. Why talk of 'successors'?"

The Sword Slave froze. Since she had abandoned her human body, people had either trembled with fear before her or been vigilant and restrained. Low level cultivators didn't dare to look her directly in the face. No one had ever said anything like this.

"Little devil, you're actually pretty fun." A creaking laugh came from her throat. "The Blind Wolf King said you came to see me because you want to rescue some people. Who? Go on, tell. Apart from that Yang, I'll let you through with anyone for his sake."

Xi Ping uncrossed his legs. "Senior, I have a presumptuous request to make. Could you permit a flotilla of steamships to enter the peninsula?"

The Sword Slave looked him over with narrowed eyes; she didn't immediately erupt into fury, only calmly said, "Don't you think that...you're a little too bold?"

In the corner, Wanshuang shook gently. The Sword Slave, who had been listening to his storytelling with her head propped on her hand, abruptly raised her eyelids. In an instant, silent and formless yet seemingly omnipresent, sword energy was flying past him. A tearing sound came from Xi Ping's snow-white collar as a hole half a cun long ripped open, right up against the artery on the side of his neck.

Xi Ping was unmoved. "I'm all right. Heaven is jealous of heroes. Too many shed skins have hunted me. Senior, I would like you to issue an order, under whatever pretext you like, expelling the miners and merchants in the Southern He Peninsula—all extraneous personnel. I will ask a number of brave trading companies to unite and send in a flotilla of ships to transport them away as quickly as possible. Ordinary fishing boats don't have the necessary speed and capacity. Please make this exception, senior."

As Xi Ping spoke, he took out another letter written in the Blind Wolf King's own hand and presented it to the Sword Slave with both hands spread. "Then we will discuss what is written in this letter."

The Sword Slave raised a hand to summon that letter into her hold. She read it quickly, then didn't respond for a long time. Wanshuang's hum became more noticeable.

Then she gave a "ha"; it was as if a reed in her throat had been blown. The Blind Wolf King's letter broke apart at her fingertips. "Is that so? That's new... No wonder those little Turmoiler monsters were bowing in the direction of Lancang's Principal Peak."

Xi Ping: "..."

Actually, that was another matter.

He gave a dry cough. "Senior, this business..."

The Sword Slave once again roughly and discourteously interrupted him. "Fine, I understand. Send your boats, I'll give you three days at most. After three days, I won't permit a single smoke-belching thing to disturb people's sight and hearing. Make them stay quiet when they come, no horns, or I'll flatten them on the spot. I'll be waiting here to see whether the Lancang Mountains will allow a mere ascended spirit to control them—I haven't had a chance to see Lancang's Lovebird Sword Array yet."

Before Xi Ping had come, the Blind Wolf King had given him some pointers: "She's willing to see you to oblige me. Since she's obliged, she won't lightly quibble with a junior. When you see her, say your bit. If she agrees, she'll do it, and if she doesn't agree, don't nag her... If she were the sort to listen to other people's advice, she wouldn't be where she is today."

But after restraining himself for a long moment, he still couldn't manage to hold back. He blurted out, "Senior, if the spiritual mountains' divine tool really does emerge, it'll be of full moon grade."

The Sword Slave said, “Obviously. So what?”

Xi Ping tactfully said, “Senior, if you’re confident of being able to handle a full moon divine tool, then do you have a way to keep that divine tool from emerging? After all, the Southern He Peninsula is already completely devastated.”

Bewildered, the Sword Slave said, “Haven’t I agreed to let you get the people out? What do you care about the place? Could this damn place get any worse?”

Xi Ping had nothing to say to this.

“I’m a stranger in a strange land. Those evil cultivators are having a good time fleeing here and there. If they want a fight, isn’t that for the best?” The Sword Slave coldly said, “I’d like to see what a full moon divine tool without a master can do. What kind of sneaking things are buried under these Lancang Mountains? You’ve brought the news, now go help the needy, don’t get involved in what doesn’t concern you. In the future, I’ll have to come pay a visit to your honored teacher, see whether Zhaoting is worthy of having fame equal to Wanshuang’s.”

Kind words couldn’t persuade someone who was determined to die. It was enough if she remembered his petition.

Anyway, his shifu wasn't interested in a single stone from the southern mines, and Kunlun's calculations were doomed to go astray. It was currently unsuitable for Xuanyin to go to war. If others lost their heads fighting, it wouldn't get in his way. Wu Lingxiao was right. As long as he could get the people out in time, this damn place really couldn't get any worse. Maybe when the Lovebird Sword Array appeared, all things would wither, and they could get rid of those hateful wildfire vines in the earth. There was no knowing whether it might be a case of no making without breaking.

So Xi Ping stopped fooling around and stood up. "If the Lovebird Sword Array really does appear, could you do your best to keep the battlefield small, senior, to avoid harming innocents?"

"Fusspot. Piss off."

Xi Ping nodded and lowered his voice. "Then I'll give you another piece of news, senior, for free—the day before yesterday, Kunlun's Third Elder, at the Sect Leader's instigation, saw the remnants of Xuanyin Mountain's Li and Zhang families. I used special means to overhear some information from that gathering. Kunlun is in contact with Southern Shu's Miah traitor Wangge Luobao. I'm afraid some people won't be coming to your aid."

The Sword Slave abruptly froze.

Her face was half bright and half drowned in the shadow cast by a lantern, making her look even more horrifying. After a long time, she finally nodded at Xi Ping. “Understood.”

Xi Ping didn't say anything more; he took his leave and went. At the same time, he contacted Wei Chengxiang: “The Sword Slave is more good-natured than imagined. She's agreed to expel the mortals on the Southern He Peninsula and permit merchant steamships to travel on the canal. I sent people to say a word to all the major trading companies. The profit-motivated ones certainly won't waste their very last chance to collect snow wine, and those moving their own people will also want to take the opportunity to earn some money. The nations' navies will also come in an orderly fashion to collect their own nationals. When the news gets out, they'll flock over. Take advantage of the commotion and leave—the Luwu's ships have ‘upgraded’ mustard seeds stowed at the bottoms of their holds. With spiritual stones to support them, a single ship can hold a hundred thousand people. If it really comes to... Those living inland and on the west coast will travel by canal, those in remote locations on the East Sea coast will take shelter in the East Sea without having to go far. Is three days enough?”

“Plenty...” Wei Chengxiang said. “Will this activity alert the evil cultivators?”

“It’s no problem, the Emperor of the East is behind more than half the snow wine trade,” Xi Ping said. “When the Queen Mother of the West escaped the Sword Slave, he sniffed out that something was wrong. He wants to move and doesn’t dare to show his head. He won’t let this opportunity go by. This time we’ll use him as a shield.”

Wei Chengxiang unconsciously rolled her dice in her palm. “Why did it go so smoothly? Young master, I don’t suppose you prostituted yourself?”

Xi Ping was utterly shameless. On hearing these words, he gave a gusty and complicated sigh and said in an affected voice, “It’s a hard life out there, and we must bow to circumstances beyond our control. Why must you bring up such a painful sore spot? How dreadfully uncivil...”

Wei Chengxiang dropped the reincarnation wood amulet into her mustard seed.

The Sword Slave was never slow in action. She immediately issued a completely unreasonable expulsion order—ever since she had occupied the southern mines, the various obstinate and unreasonable prohibitions had been too numerous to count; everyone was used to it.

Then Pang Jian received a message from Xi Ping and tentatively sent the first merchant ship, which had already been waiting, out onto the water. The steamship, even faster than in the past, braved the winds and battled the waves and reached Southern Wan's mining area that same night, picked up the traveling merchants and miners who were quickest to react, and simultaneously carried away a large quantity of rock snow.

Once the signal went out, steamships of all sizes vied to be the first. The trading companies that had dealings in the Land of Turmoil were all used to running risks. There were even some people, supposing that the canal would be jammed, who audaciously circled around by the South Sea, instantly cutting Wangge Luobao and his folk off from the Southern He Peninsula.

The Miah cultivator responsible for keeping watch on the Southern He Peninsula didn't know what had happened. He reported it nervously to Wangge Luobao at once, but Wangge Luobao put down the leaf flute he was holding, and a peculiar smile appeared on his face.

Wangge Luobao stuck up a finger toward him. “The fish is on the hook.”

CHAPTER 215 - A Life of Regret (27)

Inside the next life spiritual fish's big mouth, the seawater sucked in by the big fish formed a small puddle, containing quite a few small fish and crustaceans that had been swept up.

When Wangge Luobao had spoken, he picked up a miniature fishing rod lying beside him. The fishing line on the rod was made of concentrated spiritual energy. With a flick of his wrist, he pulled a leaping and frisking fish from the small puddle. As soon as the little fish left the water, the puddle began to move as the next life spiritual fish slowly swallowed it up. The "shrewd" living creatures that had been unwilling to take the bait landed in its stomach, all unawares, about to share in the fate of this enormous body that had lived for over a thousand years.

"We can't say right now whether it's fortunate or unfortunate." Wangge Luobao held the little fish in both hands, considering, then tossed it to his clansman. "Take it out and set it free. Gluttonous dumb fish have dumb luck."

The Miah all had superstition in their bones; they believed firmly that all living things had souls. Cautiously taking the little fish that had survived the disaster, the Miah cultivator said, "Clan leader, there are gold edges to this fish's scales, like the golden arrows of the sea god. It must be a lucky omen, a sign that the sea god will bless us and let everything go smoothly, right?"

Wangge Luobao gave him a profoundly meaningful smile. "Well, of course. We Miah have always been the favorites of the gods. Run along."

Southern Shu's Three Islands were far from the continent, and they were the origin of the vast majority of medicinal herbs and spiritual beasts. The people there could pick up some straw and throw together a shack to keep from freezing, head into the mountain forest and pluck anything at random to eat their fill.

From the pampering of this environment blessed by heaven had come the stupid Miah clan.

The majority of Miah didn't consider progress, never took the long view, treated not considering progress as glory, even believed that their clansmen who had gone to make a living on the main peninsula were aliens who didn't know their place.

But as generation after generation of Moon Plated Gold had upgraded, the narrow strait between the southern continent and Shu's Three Islands seemed to have been blown ever wider by the steam. The Miah, unable to keep up with the times, were excluded everywhere on the outside; many people had been forced to return and had indignantly denounced the corruption and decadence of the “outside,” so the stagnant and isolationist trends of thought on the Three Islands had become increasingly intense. The Miah preferred to hole up on Southern Shu’s Three Islands, stick together keeping their eyes shut and their ears plugged, waiting for the gods they had created to reward them for their piety and purity.

And what had come to them were the misfortunes of being expelled and enslaved.

Wangge Luobao had heard the exhausted blubbing of many elderly Miah. They said, Clan Leader, can it be wrong to believe that “All living things have souls, and man ought to live in harmony with heaven and earth”? Are we really supposed to be like those greedy Wan and Chu barbarians, hustling all day, belching smoke and polluting the waters?

He generally didn’t answer, only gently listened to these old infants’ bawling, and when they had cried themselves out, said some nonsense along the lines of “This is a test,” stuffed a pacifier into their mouths and sent them on their way.

In fact, the ignorant masses could never grasp the critical point. It didn’t matter one bit what you believed in. Even if you believed that “Eating shit will give you immortality,” as long as you had the power to influence the five nations, extol these words repeatedly, thousands upon thousands of times, there would be scholars renowned for erudition conducting textual research, writing books, and establishing canons for the sake of this legendary wad of “divine shit,” and experts and masters of all factions falling over each other seeking it.

Hadn't the spiritual mountains and the Great Way all developed like this?

In the Queen Mother of the West's hidden realm, Yang Wan had been in seclusion for a day and a night.

Before, she had plainly woken with a start as soon as she began to meditate, but all of a sudden it was as if she had found the main thread. Yao Qi was closest; he could clearly sense that the spiritual energy in the large quantity of spiritual stones stored in the hidden realm was all flowing toward the Queen Mother of the West's meditation chamber, growing increasingly urgent.

Ziming-xiong couldn't resist silently expressing his doubts to his classmate through the reincarnation wood: “Why can she make such quick progress after just a bit of advice from someone else? Is this enlightenment?”

So when he had been at the Latent Cultivation Temple, having eight enlightenments a day in his determination to better himself and make Luo

Qingshi see him in a new light, why had he still not succeeded?

Could this really be the difference between him and an ascended spirit master?

Xi Ping was traveling in stealth along the canal, personally overseeing the first group of Turmoilers safely boarding a Luwu ship. With the support of an upgraded immortal tool, while tens of thousands of people boarded the ship, its waterline didn't move a sliver. The frothy surface of the water stilled where it had been quietly parted amid the disorder.

Hearing Yao Qi's description, his thoughts worked.

“Enlightenment,” in fact, was something like a firework streaking through the night sky; while it glimmered, heaven and earth were crystal clear, but when it had ceased to glimmer, it was still quite dark. After all, it was hard for people to control themselves. If they wanted to soar up to the sky all at once, they couldn't keep themselves from lazy dawdling, and if they wanted to become wholly absorbed in something, they couldn't keep their thoughts from wandering; otherwise, there would be no mediocrities left on earth.

Who didn't want to be outstanding?

The ascended spirit boundary wasn't sufficient to “accord with the Way.” To force yourself to go on was to hover on the edge of becoming obsessed and losing your mind. It would become difficult to move forward. It wasn't enough just to be firmly resolved.

Xi Ping considered, then contacted another person through the reincarnation wood. "Yu Chang-xiong?"

No answer.

Xi Ping grossly called across the distance, "Hey, Yu Chang, I've been busy with stuff at home, I haven't had time for you. I've come to settle my debt. How about we meet tomorrow at noon in Tao County and I'll remove some more brands for you?"

Still no answer.

Because Xi Ping had deliberately dragged his feet, a large number of evil cultivators within Chu waiting to have their spiritual image brands removed had nearly lost their minds. Every time Yu Chang saw him, all the curses he wanted to hurl at him were written in his bright red eyes.

The one who owed the debt called the shots; all along, it had been Xi Ping keeping him in suspense. Never before had Yu Chang not answered when he had voluntarily reached out.

Xi Ping sighed. “As I thought—Ziming-xiong, do you know where the difference between you and the Queen Mother of the West lies?”

“Oh?” said Yao Qi.

“A great teacher—what a pity that a genius like the chief offering was forced by the state of the world onto a wrong path and to this day remains mixed up among a heap of evil cultivators, acting as accomplice to the villains,” Xi Ping said. “If the Latent Cultivation Temple had him, it would have turned into a ‘Seven-Day Half-Immortal Crash Course’ by now. There would have been no need for Dissatisfied Luo and the provisional disciples to spend so many years in mutual torment. Gentlemen, who will help me out?”

Yao Qi and Chang Jun thought he had more important business. They quickly got worked up.

“What is it?”

“Tell us.”

Xi Ping said, “Tell Zhao...er, Zhao-shijie to reckon up what proportion of Western Chu’s common offerings have had their spiritual image brands removed. If the pan’s hot enough, it’s time to drop them in and start stir-frying.”

Yao Qi and Chang Jun: "...”

When Zhao Qindan received word from the two human-shaped mouthpieces, she gave a peculiar laugh. Tao County was separated from the Land of Turmoil by the sea, yet her laugh still struck terror into Chang Jun’s heart. He suspected that tomorrow the Tao World Record would publish an article—discussing muteness as the result of wickedness: the riddle of Tai Sui losing his voice.

Yu Chang had in fact sensed that there was a message coming through the reincarnation wood, but he wasn’t at leisure to divide his attention right now.

He was hidden in the Queen Mother of the West’s shadow, bearing witness as she was eaten alive.

The grit projections could only be used undetectably when bullying low-level cultivators, or when one spent several years influencing imperceptibly by degrees. In the short-term, they weren’t of any great use against a master of the same grade. At most they could distract the person; they had to be paired with other means for a stealth attack.

If he were discovered using this method against an ally, it would mean an immediate falling out. Therefore, Yu Chang didn't dare to casually butt in, and he hadn't hoped to hear her speak her innermost thoughts. At first, he had only used the grit projection talisman to curl up in the Queen Mother of the West's shadow, observing the changes to her aura in echo of the spiritual mountains far away on the Southern He Peninsula, the connection intermittent.

As Yang Wan's consciousness had sunk deeper and deeper, her state had become increasingly wavering, such that starting from the latter half of last night, without Yu Chang applying any pressure, Yang Wan, under the weak influence of the grit projection, had actually begun automatically speaking aloud the thoughts that passed through her consciousness.

Hearing it had brought Yu Chang's heart up to his throat. Most of what she said was disconnected ravings, completely incomprehensible; he had been afraid she would wake up.

Just as he had been on the point of dispelling the grit projection talisman and running away, the Queen Mother of the West had suddenly pronounced, ice-cold and crystal-clear, the phrase "for the cause of righteousness."

Across mountains and seas, through the grit projection, these words made Yu Chang shudder. They had absolutely no connection to the Queen Mother of the West's previous empty ramblings. It was as if there was a trumpet in her brain that from time to time stole away her voice.

Was this the legendary "heavenly edict"?

This was nothing like what Yu Chang had imagined, an earnestly good and guiding heavenly edict that would lead a person to sudden enlightenment. This voice seemed to have absolutely no undulation, and there wasn't a trace of emotion in it; it didn't even seem to be a human voice...it was like an old jiangshi pounding on the casket in a folktale!

But it seemed that human nature was indelible. When the "heavenly edict" fell, it aroused the Queen Mother of the West's struggles.

The indistinct, incomprehensible ravings she had been speaking before abruptly came clear. Two hundred years of the struggles of this princess of a vanquished nation were all revealed before Yu Chang's eyes.

The beloved daughter of heaven, her county and her sect had been overthrown overnight. From the high clouds, she had tumbled down to an abyss of misery. There was no way that the righteous cause of her country could be the only thing in her heart...and the Wan-He War hadn't been her fault, but by some mysterious series of coincidences, the consequences had been hers to bear as the survivor. Yu Chang heard her clearly articulate, “Why must it be this way?” several times.

Aside from panic and helplessness, there was also Yang Wan’s hatred and resentment, aimed in part at the Lancang Sect.

Countless times she had wanted to abandon her people, change her name, leave the stifling Land of Turmoil.

But what chilled Yu Chang to the bone was that her struggles and complaints would now and then be followed by an ice-cold “for the cause of righteousness,” or “a hundred generations of Lancang depend on you alone.”

Pulled in two directions, the Queen Mother of the West several times nearly woke from meditation again.

The surrounding spiritual energy was in disorder. From the grit projection, Yu Chang sensed her willpower, on the point of collapse, and at last recalled what he had come here to do. Quickly, he carefully activated a slight “grit projection.”

Each time the Queen Mother of the West's jumbled babble became vehement, Yu Chang promptly said something like "There's no turning back," or "You're the only one the Lancang Mountains have left," or "All your people are looking to you" into her ear through her shadow, pushing the wavering scales slightly onward.

The Queen Mother of the West's thoughts of resistance were several times broken off promptly by the grit projection; after a difficult night of back-and-forth, they finally lost the high ground. The frequency with which that heavenly edict came out of her mouth became higher and higher... Yu Chang listened from the shadow as the Queen Mother of the West chanted "for the cause of righteousness" again and again, an expression clearly not her own appearing on her features, as if she had been possessed by a ghost.

All of a sudden, she twisted that face, high and stern as an ancient divinity's, and sorrowfully cried out "Guang'an," clutching in a panic at her very last trace of connection to the mundane world.

Not far, as if he had sensed it, the unconscious Lord Guang'an's finger twitched.

The utterly unscrupulous red-eyed great evil cultivator abruptly shut his mouth. Yu Chang couldn't quite bring himself to go on.

What is this heavenly edict? he thought. Do those who accord with the way actually become gods, or do they become ghosts who help the force that had devoured them do it to others?

“Fellow Cultivator Wangge!” Yu Chang decisively withdrew the grit projection. “Do you know...”

“Senior Yu, we have a problem! We’ve been exposed!”

Western Chu was the birthplace of the toilet bulletins. It had been the malicious Luwu who had once launched the first issue in Dongheng.

Various forces had soon discovered that this thing couldn’t be prohibited, so they had all followed suit. The Tao World Record had even appeared only at a rather late stage.

Apart from serious commentary on important news, the toilet bulletins also contained quite a lot of vulgar gossip...the sorts of things everyone loved to see and hear, used to attract eyeballs. These ornamental miscellanies also needed specialized reporters to write them. Ultimately, literate people formed the minority among common people, and not all educated people would lay aside their self-respect to engage in these unprincipled writings to eke out a living. Because of this, good “gossip scribes” were always in great demand. All the toilet bulletins tried to snatch them from each other.

Zhao Qindan took her money directly from the Luwu. Her financial resources were ample. She had many gossip scribes snatched from other toilet bulletins in her employ.

Among them was no lack of spies watching Tao County.

Zhao Qindan, alias “Sir Xu,” came out of the Tao World Record’s secret warehouse holding a stack of drafts that blocked her line of sight.

Over the last few days, everyone at the toilet bulletin had been working like crazy. In the bulletin’s general office, there were virtually no two-legged creatures with both feet on the ground at the same time. In a single moment of carelessness, she bumped into someone, and the odds and ends in her arms dropped all over the ground. A big crowd of people was jammed there, some muttering “sorry” and helping her pick them up, some standing on tiptoe and straining to squeeze out through the stack of papers while crying “excuse me.” In the chaos, a set of keys dropped by Sir Xu were picked up. In Tao County, where spiritual energy was prohibited, the half-immortal who had lost her spiritual sense seemed not to notice it at all.

So that same day, the secret warehouse of the Tao World Record, which only the Luwu and the editor-in-chief could enter, was quietly opened, and one “critical” thing was circulated—precisely the recordings of the secret talks Yu Chang had with Tai Sui every time he came to Tao County.

The interference and noise hadn’t even been cleaned up.

The tape immediately came to the hands of all the local forces mustering troops for an armed rebellion. It was simply a bolt from the blue.

These were spiritual image brands, a stamp you weren’t born with but would take with you when you died!

The heads of these local forces were all half-immortals laden down with trifling affairs who didn’t cultivate at all and had only opened their spiritual eyes in order to prolong their lifespans and preserve their youth. All their fighting capacity and confidence came from the “offerings” their families had kept for generations.

It turned out that Yu Chang, who had broken free of his spiritual image brand, wasn’t a solitary exception. There really was such a thing as a technique for removing spiritual image brands!

You needed only to look at Yu Family Bend to know what would come of the evil spirits slipping their leashes. The heads of Western Chu’s various local forces were all so scared their souls left their bodies and only then remembered to check the conditions of the spiritual image brands of the offerings at their command. Checking in secret wasn't a big deal, but they were astonished to find that nearly forty percent of the evil spirits they had domesticated had already freed themselves, and moreover, virtually all of these were chief offerings with high cultivation.

Even the expression "fit to burst their livers and galls" couldn't describe the fear felt by the masters of the spiritual image brands. The cowardly ones might have lost control over their excretions on the spot.

Fear aroused the desire to kill. Right away, the masters of the spiritual image brands gave an absolute order to the offerings who had yet to remove their brands—kill.

There was no way to refuse a spiritual image brand. The offerings who hadn't yet had time to remove their spiritual image brands locked the gates and were compelled to attack the brothers who had formerly shared in their misery...and perhaps some among them weren't all that "compelled." Ever since there had come to be an order of precedence and a division of rank for removing the spiritual image brands, the offerings who had been put at the back of the line by Yu Chang had felt the imbalance.

The offerings who had already recovered their freedom could no longer sense their masters' condition through the spiritual image brands. They were taken unawares; they had no idea that they had been exposed. When they were suddenly attacked, they thought that it was their own people's jealousy and hatred that had turned against them, that they had been sold out by traitors within their own organization. While irately striking back, they began to implicate each other.

The game board Yu Chang had spent eight years setting out in Western Chu was overturned by a single tape. Before the Sanyue Mountains could fall, his own people had started fighting...and the fight was evenly matched, likely to end in mutual destruction!

Yu Chang immediately had no more time for any Queen Mothers of the West or North. Wangge Luobao saw his face turn green, extraordinarily festive paired with his red eyes. He let out a long string of curses in the Chu language and hurriedly broke off communications.

Wangge Luobao wasn't in the least surprised. Through the eyes of the next life spiritual fish, he looked up in the direction of the Southern He Peninsula.

Tai Sui...

This well-informed, preternaturally crafty holder of the "undying bones" was as agile as expected. As soon as he stepped in, he had lit Yu Chang's backyard on fire.

Though this time he had burned the wrong person.

Meanwhile, the Emperor of the East, mixed in among the merchant ships carrying a large quantity of snow wine and withdrawing out to sea, kept cautiously sweeping the surroundings with his consciousness. His spiritual sense was suddenly touched by something. His gaze swept out to sea as fast as lightning. A beam of spiritual energy fell into the water and caught a little fish whose scales seemed inlaid with gold at the edges.

There was a hole in the fish's mouth. It had been fished up and then set free again. There was a familiar aura about the wound in the fish's mouth—

When the Emperor of the East had invaded the Queen Mother of the West's hidden realm, he had naturally left a spiritual energy mark behind while fleeing in confusion so he could regroup and come back stronger in the future. The upshot was that when the mark had gone into the South Sea, something had blocked it. Right now, the critical thing was running for his life, and the Emperor of the East wasn't in the mood to investigate. Who would have thought that, as though it were fate, he would run into the aura of the Queen Mother of the West's hidden realm here.

The Emperor of the East was just about to extend his hand to summon the Emperor of the East Halberd when his eyes suddenly spun, and he thought to himself: That woman is very sly. What if it's a trap?

But when it came to giving it up, there was no way he would be willing to do that, so the Emperor of the East raised a hand and placed a talisman on that fish. He ordered his subordinates to leave that area of sea with all haste.

Who didn't know how to let someone else take a loss in their stead?

The little fish, released back into the water by him, stiffly bent backward. Then, fast as a shark, it swam through the waves, strangely backtracking the way it had come.

The Miah cultivator on patrol held in his mouth a talisman that let him breathe in the water. Treading on the head of the invisible next life spiritual fish, he kept watch while hidden at the bottom of the sea. He saw at a glance the peculiar behavior of the little fish he had set free earlier and instinctively reached out to catch it.

The next moment, golden light flashed over the fish, just like the golden arrows of the sea god—it pierced through that established foundation Miah.

Established foundation grade essence exploded in the South Sea, impacting a number of innocent merchant ships. This commotion wasn't a small one. From the Southern He Peninsula, Xi Ping and the Sword Slave's consciousnesses swept over simultaneously!

CHAPTER 216 - A Life of Regret (28)

The might of the Sword Slave swept right over, trapping in place the next life spiritual fish that could disappear as soon as it entered the water.

What was happening? Xi Ping froze at first, but he was well aware of the principle that “Those who enjoy watching the fun too much can easily end up unlucky.” What did he care what was going on? What was he doing watching other people fight? Run!

He quickly sent a warning to the Luwu and ordered everyone not to detour to the South Sea, to stay as far as possible from the Southern He Peninsula’s west coast—the South Sea coast, that was.

Just then, Chang Jun and Yao Qi spoke almost simultaneously.

Chang Jun said, “I think Lord Guang’an has woken up.”

Yao Qi said, “Strange, the spiritual energy around the Queen Mother of the West’s meditation chamber has suddenly gone wild.”

“Because the wicked ghost luring the Queen Mother of the West toward the spiritual mountains has caught his pants on fire,” Xi Ping quickly said. “You two, stop watching the tearjerker, get away from the ascended spirits at once. Take out the protective immortal tools I gave you before—use the ascended spirit grade ones, Wanshuang’s about to...”

No sooner had he spoken than Wanshuang was already there!

All the seawater in the area was locked in place by the Sword Slave’s sword energy, but perhaps she was too robust; she still didn’t see the next life spiritual fish, said in legend to be caught on the border between life and death.

Though the next life spiritual fish counted as large among fish, it still wasn’t large to the magnitude of a steamship. It was big at the head and small at the tail. Opening its mouth to the widest, it could in fact hold a few people at most. That the Miah cultivators and the Queen Mother of the West and her people could live as completely separate neighbors relied on mustard seed hidden realms that could collapse to be extremely small. The scope of an established foundation cultivator’s essence exploding was much larger than the fish.

But the sword energy locking the seawater in place had already permeated the fish’s body. The mustard seeds inside the fish’s mouth trembled, like one little world after another, on the point of collapse.

Everyone inside the mustard seed hidden realm was panicked and at a loss, yet they couldn't find their backbone—Yang Wan was trapped, unable to move forward or back.

With a shed skin approaching, her spiritual sense was about to explode; there was no retreat. But having lost the grit projection, no matter what, it was almost impossible for her to take another step forward!

The matchlessly domineering ancient sword of Kunlun raised huge waves in the South Sea, bringing misfortune to the merchant teams that had turned to the South Sea route from fear of traffic on the canal. These huge steamships were like withered leaves, nearly thrown into the air by the sword thrust that hit like a flood dragon entering the water. The ships that had yet to leave port were pushed into a heap; fire broke out in places.

“Help—”

Xi Ping, who had remained on land, casually pulled a sword from the mustard seed he carried and soared up into the sky riding it with the Tai Sui Qin floating in front of him.

Where the sound of the qin passed, the ships on the South Sea, big and small, were enveloped in an invisible membrane. The sparks that had just shot out were pushed back and extinguished, and the ships that were about to collide were separated, gently bouncing apart.

Xi Ping had meant to fly a little higher to get a clearer view, but the sword at his feet wasn't very attentive to his commands; it stopped at a certain height and wouldn't move. But the Sword Slave, from dozens of li away, gave him a strange look.

Xi Ping looked down and only then discovered that the sword he had hastily summoned just now had been Zhaoting. He nearly split his sides laughing: It's been nearly fifteen years, Master Zhaoting, thank you ever so much! He'd even become an ascended spirit, and he had been the one to go to Sanyue to steal the furnace that had reforged Zhaoting. How had the prohibition on flying too high once put down on the north slope not yet been lifted?

He was just about to switch to an ordinary sword that wouldn't get in his way when Wei Chengxiang sent him a message: "I think this time it's the Emperor of the East."

The Emperor of the East's subordinates were a bunch of evildoers with no bottom line; their loyalties lay with whoever benefited them. Wei Chengxiang had drifted through the Land of Turmoil year in and year out, so she had a number of not overly reliable informants at her disposal. She hurriedly said, “The Emperor of the East’s people are on the South Sea. Originally they were mixed in among the mortal merchant teams. I heard that one ke ago, word suddenly came down from above, ordering them to leave this area of the sea with all possible haste. It couldn’t be a coincidence. The Emperor of the East must have done something.”

Xi Ping’s consciousness swept toward the South Sea again. He conjectured that the Emperor of the East must have used some means to discover the Queen Mother of the West’s hiding place. That old geezer’s “die of frustration if he wasn’t stirring shit up” problem had flared up again, and he had deliberately attracted Wanshuang’s notice, planning to use a borrowed sword to kill his target.

Soon, Xi Ping locked onto a small clutch of ships that stuck out—he had just disseminated talismans with his qin music, covering half the South Sea. Even the Dragon King’s shrimp soldiers and crab generals in the water must have gained extra shells; only on that team of ships fleeing at full speed was there no trace of protective talismans.

And at the speed they were going, the ships had even forgotten to belch steam.

These ships weren’t propelled by steam engines; they were propelled by spiritual stones!

“You’re right,” said Xi Ping, “I see them.”

Wei Chengxiang said, “Are you going after them?”

Of course not—he was shielding the alarmed mortals, keeping the battle of the immortals from mistakenly injuring the ants. Though the Sword Slave had made no move against him, that was after all the foremost sword in the world. He could hardly withstand even a glancing blow. Being in two places at once was impossible.

With a thought, Xi Ping threw out an immortal tool snatched from Lin Chi, which landed precisely in front of the Emperor of the East’s ships. The seawater immediately congealed into countless watery ropes, which tied themselves into a big net, catching the Emperor of the East and his people “in a single net”: “With all this excitement, don’t be in such haste to leave, sir!”

An ascended spirit immortal tool could of course be torn open by the Emperor of the East Halberd, which was of the same grade, but it was another question whether the Emperor of the East would be willing to show himself in front of the Sword Slave...and if he didn’t dare, what would his subordinate low-level cultivators, currently wishing they could sprout wings and fly away, be thinking?

In a flash, a number of great “evil cultivators” had gone a round of mutual trickery and even turned a corner.

Wei Chengxiang cried out an approving “well done” to him. “When enemies meet on a narrow path, the low-life wins.”

Xi Ping said, “Oh, why don’t you piss off already!”

While these great masters coming and going in the heights had wrestled themselves into a heap, under the all-enveloping spiritual energy screen of the Tai Sui Qin, Wei Chengxiang seized the opportunity to audaciously toss out a string of talismans and sweep the Turmoilers right onto the Luwu ships.

Xi Ping didn’t stop playing. At the same time, alarm bells were ringing in his mind.

In a single move, he had driven away Yu Chang, then pinned down the Emperor of the East. Ordinarily, his tail would have been sticking up by now, but instead, he had no leisure to feel complacent.

Something’s wrong, he thought. This can’t be an unexpected development.

The next life spiritual fish, which the Cauldron of Nine Dragons and Xuanwu back then and Kunlun's Sword Slave now had been unable to grab—how could a measly Emperor of the East catch a trace of it? He supposed it couldn't be because there was a dark pall upon his brow and he was an expert in courting death.

The only explanation was that someone had deliberately let that idiot find it.

Who? What were they playing at?

Didn't Kunlun and the Li-Zhang remnants want to lure his shifu into a trap in Southern He? Wasn't it a little too early to strike now?

Could it be that they had finally discovered that they couldn't defeat Wu Lingxiao no matter what and had decided to simply kill themselves and take a bunch of mortals with them?

If he had been on his own, with Xi Ping's impetuous temper, regardless of anything else, he would have activated the reincarnation wood seeds Yao Qi and Chang Jun carried and gone over in person to investigate.

But right now, he was "Tai Sui."

Amid the murderous aura of Wanshuang that blotted out the sky and covered the earth, relying on the fact that Zhaoting could reliably catch him, Xi Ping laboriously used talismans to weave a hasty protection array over the Southern He Peninsula. The only lucky thing was that he had brought enough spiritual stones this time.

Wangge Luobao gently stroked the inner wall of the next life spiritual fish's mouth. In his nose lingered the smell of age and decay coming from the fish's belly. "Truly a pity. I was born too late. Your lifespan has nearly run out."

Vibrant and unrestrained echoes came from the fish's belly, rising and falling, a little like a whale's song.

The next life spiritual fish's answer to him was brimful of sorrow.

The gentle smile on Wangge Luobao's face disappeared. His odd-colored eyes set into his ice-cold mixed-blood countenance made him look like a statue of an evil god. "It was the ancestor who chose this road. I am only his chosen successor."

The Sword Slave didn't have the patience to go fishing in the sea. Out of the corner of her eye, she glimpsed the evil cultivators Xi Ping had trapped. She reached out and scooped, simply snatching up an evil cultivator.

An established foundation evil cultivator on the Emperor of the East's ship felt dizzy. Before he could work anything out, he was already dozens of li away. His essence was instantly pierced by sword energy, and he hadn't even realized that he was dying, looking blankly around himself.

On the boundless South Sea, a strangely-shaped big fish finally attracted his line of sight. That fish had a pair of clouded, sorrowful eyes. Looking into them made a person want to cry, overwhelmed in the crush of all their life's regrets.

The evil cultivator whose hands were stained with blood couldn't help crying. He was cold and scared. He felt the sea wind blow through his body. His flesh was as flimsy as paper, blending with the sea wind.

His last thought was: Oh, so there's a hole in me.

The dying could see the next life spiritual fish.

The Sword Slave tossed the useless corpse into the water and, following that good-for-nothing's line of sight, she slashed at the next life spiritual fish with a beam of sword energy. "Mystifying trickery!"

A lament fit to break your heart reverberated throughout the South Sea. On land, in the sea, all the beasts both spiritual and mundane, so long as they could produce sound, began to wail in unison.

In the Heaven's Design Pavilion branch on the Wan-He border, Pang Jian, tense because the border inscriptions had been aroused by a large quantity of spiritual energy, suddenly noticed something. He raised his head and found to his astonishment that the karma beast avatars on the mural were standing up one after another, facing south. The karma beasts were vigorous, always glaring, with faces that naturally looked like they were fuming with rage. Pang Jian had never before seen such obvious grief in those enormous eyes.

The instant Wanshuang fell, Wangge Luobao had already unfurled the protective immortal device in his hands. At the same time, he pried open a mustard seed with absolutely no hesitation.

Waking dragons, gold-armored zhengs, flood dragons, silk dragons... Innumerable spiritual beasts exploded from inside it, layer upon layer of them shielding him, against their own instincts willingly meeting Wanshuang's blade, dying in his stead.

Wangge Luobao didn't so much as blink. He swiftly rolled up another mustard seed containing Miah cultivators and instantly disappeared.

Only the Queen Mother of the West's hidden realm remained, exposed and unprotected beneath the Sword Slave's sword. Its inscriptions were destroyed by the sword energy, and layer after layer of the mustard seed's edges were worn. The mustard seed hidden realm, which had only taken up a fist-sized space, was forced to expand to hundreds of mu, abruptly floating up on the South Sea.

Yao Qi and Chang Jun had made their preparations when Xi Ping had warned them. They had shifted to the inscription border. After the world turned upside down, they came right to the edge of the hidden realm. The two of them wrapped protective immortal tools around themselves and jumped into the water.

The instant they entered the water, both of them were stunned.

“Shiyong!” Chang Jun's voice had changed pitch. “What the hell did Wanshuang just slash?”

Xi Ping said, “What?”

Yao Qi said, “The water's changed into...”

There was nothing else.

When the mysterious next life spiritual fish crashed into Wanshuang, the fish's body went to pieces and scattered in the sea. But there was no blood.

It turned all the surrounding seawater into semi-transparent mist, lifting the Queen Mother of the West's hidden realm and swiftly rising. Before Yao Qi could finish his sentence, he was swallowed up by the mist. Instantly, all his senses cut off. He couldn't even hear the voice through the reincarnation wood anymore. Unspeakable cold crept up his spine.

Around him was boundless darkness. A beam of weak light swept over him. The faces of all his family and friends flashed before his eyes, approaching then passing. He glimpsed his hometown of Jinping, and its bustle turned to ashes in the blink of an eye. Clamoring voices that flooded his ears came and went. Yao Qi instinctively reached out to make a grab but came up empty. He could only watch as all activity left him behind.

No one instructed him, but Yao Qi knew—this was life and death.

Humans were transient, and the dust of the mundane world was transient for them.

Humans came from nothing, were awakened for an instant by illusion, then returned to endless nothingness.

Amid illusion, all things were inconstant.

In the corpse of the next life spiritual fish, all human thoughts turned to dust.

When her single blow fell, the Sword Slave already sensed that something was wrong. She quickly retreated, watching the mist rising over the South Sea in bewilderment.

The Queen Mother of the West, wrapped in mist, also seemed to enter a crevice between life and death. The voice of the “heavenly edict” in her ears abruptly increased tenfold. The marriage contract that bound her wavered on the point of collapse.

Just then, the door of the meditation chamber was broken open. Lord Guang’an charged in, staggering. His legs went weak, and he fell to his knees on the ground.

He panted for breath sharply, the veins on his head and face standing out. He crawled toward the Queen Mother of the West. “A-Wan...”

He came from Chu, the child of a spiritual stone miner. There was a tiny minority of people who devoted their attention more fully to anything they did and regularly drew spiritual energy into themselves unconsciously. Even with no one to guide them, living year in and year out in such surroundings, they could open their spiritual eyes through unexpected chance—compared to those in Western Chu who faked and flattered to force their way into the inner sect and remained mortal all their lives, it was hard to say who was more unfortunate...after all, not every miner who opened his spiritual eyes was like Pang Jian, with a conscience-stricken Liang Chen behind him, willing to busy himself to get him vouched for by the inner sect.

How his spiritual eyes had opened, the honest and timid family of miners couldn't say. Despotic superiors and fawning subordinates were common practice in the Chu mines. They had immediately charged his family with the serious crime of "stealing spiritual stones," with the punishment of execution for the whole family.

At the time, Yang Wan had been increasingly unable to bear the Emperor of the East. She had just begun to arrange her forces in secret; she was short on people. While she was at it, she had picked up this teenage boy who counted as a half-immortal and taken him to her newly-established hidden realm. At first, she hadn't shown him her true face. She had disguised herself as a plain, ordinary woman, saying that she was a servant acting on behalf of her master. To save trouble, she had picked herself the ugly-sounding alias of "Wan-niang."

She wasn't the Queen Mother of the West, wasn't the Emperor of the East's wife, wasn't a princess, wasn't surnamed Yang.

“A-Wan...”

Guang'an was the only thing in this whole world that belonged to A-Wan.

Amid the whistling sea wind, he grabbed Yang Wan's hand.

The sword cultivator's palm was covered in calluses. In an instant, it nearly yanked the Queen Mother of the West's consciousness out of meditation. The mist surrounding the two of them abruptly withdrew slightly.

Those clasped hands seemed to form a resonance with the Lancang Mountains—the founders of the Lancang Sword Sect had also been husband and wife, together called the Gold and Jade Sages. The “Gold Sage” was a sword cultivator, and the “Jade Sage” was one of the toolmaking cultivators that had been most numerous on the Southern He Peninsula.

Perfect harmony, walking hand-in-hand, immortal lovers... In a daze, Yang Wan couldn't distinguish whether she was the Queen Mother of the West or the Jade Sage. A faint smile appeared on her lips.

Lord Guang'an's expression relaxed slightly. He was about to continue waking her when he heard a roar. Aggressive spiritual energy came right at him. The heavily injured Lord Guang'an was thrown aside without making a sound.

This spiritual energy like a hurricane came from the southern mines. The Lancang Mountains were quivering violently. Countless plants grew from the immortal mountains; strange and splendid flowers bloomed. The wildfire vines that had despotically occupied the Southern He Peninsula fled like scared rats.

Dense clouds gathered over Lancang's Principal Peak. An enormous thundercloud, like a vortex, hung in midair. Something flashed in and out of view.

The Sword Slave frowned. She forgot about the strange mist and hacked at the Queen Mother of the West's hidden realm.

But the sword energy was knocked astray by brutal spiritual wind.

Right now, Xi Ping was simply trapped on the Southern He Peninsula. At his feet there were mortals everywhere. He didn't dare to budge.

“Ziming, Hongzheng!”

There was no answer from the two of them.

Xi Ping felt his vertebrae and ribs pounded like a big drum by Wanshuang's sword wind flying by, constantly split open and constantly repaired by the hidden bones, making teeth-aching creaks.

The ice-cold sword aura seemed to want to invade the cracks in his bones, but it was blocked by Zhi Xiu's three beams of sword energy stored inside him. The swords of the north and south crossed through him. Xi Ping's bones broke even faster.

The Sword Slave... What kind of monster was she?

How could the major boundary between shed skin and ascended spirit make such a big difference? In pain, Xi Ping came to a decision. If he made it through this and returned to Flying Jade Peak, he would definitely work hard!

When this thought quickly streaked by, a light suddenly came on in Xi Ping's head. He captured a thought that had been hanging around in his mind.

Wait, he'd remembered!

Shed skin masters—except for the kind like Xiang Ning, only there to make up the numbers—might not be able to overwhelm an especially remarkable near-shed skin, but overwhelming an early stage ascended spirit...or even a middle stage ascended spirit certainly wouldn't be a problem.

Xuanwu in his prime had been able to contend against a full moon master for half a night; even when his essence had been damaged and his boundary had fallen, he had still been able to send seven great ascended spirits scampering in the South Sea. It was hard to say whether Xuanwu's cultivation surpassed that of Lin Zongyi, Wu Lingxiao, and others like them, but it was certainly stronger than Zhang Jue and Zhao Yin's. When he had come down from the mountains in person to arrest Qiu Sha, why had he brought a murder weapon like the Silver Moon?

Couldn't he have crushed Qiu Sha with one finger after she had lost the Law Breaker and the Riverward?

Wangge Luobao had already sunk to the bottom of the sea. He waved away the waking dragon corpse still wound around him and sent a message to Kunlun: There's been an unexpected development.

From his expression, nothing seemed to have been “unexpected.”

Wangge Luobao paused, then wrote: We didn't lure in Zhi Xiu. I'm afraid Wu Lingxiao has met the Lancang Mountains in battle ahead of schedule. Our plan has already been exposed. What should we do?

After sending this, he calmly restrained his aura and found a place to sit amid the spiritual beast corpses. He considered, took a piece of reincarnation wood from his clothes, and boldly spilled his blood on it.

“I've heard a great deal about you, Tai Sui.”

CHAPTER 217 - A Life of Regret (29)

Xi Ping was a prodigy who could spend a whole night wagging his tongue on the strength of two liang of wine, but at the crucial moment, he knew how to come to blows directly without wasting a single droplet of spit.

As soon as he heard Wangge Luobao's Miah-accented Wan language, Xi Ping smacked a lotus seal copied from Zhuoming at his consciousness through the reincarnation wood.

The Xiuyi-Miah mixed blood man had been prepared. He parried that amateur lotus seal easily. "Not even a hello? Are all young people so short-tempered these days?"

No sooner had he spoken than the reincarnation wood in his hand seemed to turn into a vortex, trying to suck in his consciousness.

But Wangge Luobao was no lightweight established foundation or half-immortal. Trying to wrest away the consciousness of a cultivator of the same grade as you was comparable to trying to haul around a person of about your own build; it would only work if the other party was willing.

A number of flute notes came from the other end of the reincarnation wood, interrupting the consciousness-sucking vortex in the reincarnation wood and crashing against Xi Ping's ears.

The flute music of the beast-taming way wasn't jarring to the ear; hearing it only made a person feel longing—not a specific longing, just a sudden surge of emotion.

Xi Ping had had practically no dealings with beast-taming cultivators. As soon as he got distracted, a number of beams of sword energy wildly splashing out from the sea broke his talismans and crashed into the canal.

In his hurry, he only had time to toss out a handful of papermen to block the sword energy. The papermen with his consciousness attached to them were obliterated along with the images of swords. It was as if something had given his brains a forceful stir. His vision darkened. He sent a message nearly a hundred li away: “Senior Wanshuang, what did you promise me?!”

The Sword Slave ignored him. With her sword energy sent rebounding by the Lancang Mountains, she glanced somewhat uncertainly at the corpse of the next life spiritual fish.

The mist that the big fish's corpse had turned into had already swallowed up everything around it. This thing was more ancient than even the spiritual mountains. After Ancestor Tianbo had left the mundane dust behind, the next life spiritual fish had vanished from the mortal world. Not even Lingyun had records of it; it had seemed to be a myth. With the Sword Slave's cultivation level, though her inborn spiritual sense was only average, she could still easily distinguish whether something before her eyes was a threat. Not only did she not sense danger from that mist, she dimly had the impression that some fortuitous opportunity was hidden inside it.

But fortuitous opportunity or no, she didn't care. The way of the sword didn't take shortcuts, and it wasn't subject to temptation.

Wanshuang pointed straight at that strange mist. The Sword Slave hacked at the Queen Mother of the West's hidden realm, which had nearly been buried inside it—it was said that Zhaoting had cut through the clouds of tribulation; was it possible that she couldn't cleave apart a mist?

But the matchlessly sharp sword wind couldn't blow the mist apart. When Wanshuang landed in the mist, its blade seemed to melt inside it. The Sword Slave's consciousness sank; before she could struggle her way free, she and her sword had been sucked in by the strange mist!

The eyesight and consciousness of an ascended spirit could see this scene over a hundred li away. Xi Ping's pupils contracted abruptly—his powerful weapon was gone!

Though from his point of view, as a weapon, Wanshuang was a double-edged sword. At the same time as he lost a thigh to cling to, the pressure on him was also greatly reduced. Matters were divided by gravity and urgency; Xi Ping had no time to consider the causes. He swiftly tossed a handful of lotus seals at Wangge Luobao to keep him from making trouble; then talismans fell on the canal as though they were free.

It was as if he had turned all the water in the Grand Canal into a factory conveyor belt; it flowed north against the current.

Just then, a whistle came from the South Sea. With Wanshuang's sword energy gone, the Emperor of the East had dared to come back out of his shell!

The Emperor of the East Halberd forced apart the big net in the water. The evil cultivator's snow wine ships fled in all directions. With his halberd in hand and new grievances added to old hatreds, the Emperor of the East drew countless bolts of lightning without restraint, striking at Xi Ping and the canal.

At the same time, clear and melodious flute music floated over the South Sea. From the portion of the canal belonging to the Shu mining area, countless red-eyed carnivorous spiritual beasts suddenly emerged.

Xi Ping was besieged by two great evil cultivators...and one of them he had himself insisted on keeping around with his meddling!

The longer this dragged on, the worse it would get for him.

“Luwu—”

On the steamships on the canal, Luwu made up to look like boatmen and merchants emerged. Talismans fell like rain on the maddened spiritual beasts.

Xi Ping held up Zhaoting and shot out the first beam of sword energy that Zhi Xiu had given him.

On Flying Jade Peak, Zhi Xiu, just about to say something to Lin Chi, felt a sudden lurch in his heart.

Hadn't the information said that the evil cultivators were planning to move on the anniversary of the destruction of Southern He? Why had they started several days in advance? What had gone wrong?

That blow whistled as it knocked apart the lightning drawn by the Emperor of the East, but the sword energy didn't pause. Before the malicious smile on the Emperor of the East's face could fully form, the dreadful sword wind had already reached him. The evil cultivator chief who had run rampant throughout the Land of Turmoil for centuries was instantly swallowed by the sword light. Not one of the evil cultivator's ships that had fled into the distance managed to get away. They were all enveloped by Zhaoting's light.

The South Sea was clear.

Zhaoting had killed the Emperor of the East with the swiftness of a falcon swooping after a bolting hare, but Xi Ping was hardly any better off—with his cultivation level, using Zhaoting was too much of a strain.

When he fell out of the sky, the better part of his tendons, bones, and meridians had snapped.

“Ouch,” Wangge Luobao lamented in his stead, knowing that he couldn't speak now, “that hurts.”

Xi Ping blacked out briefly. Nothing remained in his mind but profanity.

“While the undying bones are admittedly mystical, you still have to be able to bear it,” Wangge Luobao said, sighing. “There aren't many who could maintain their reason when crushed to dust. I couldn't. I acknowledge my inferiority. But you're being overhasty. The highlight still lies ahead.”

The whole of the Southern He Peninsula seemed to applaud him. A bolt of lightning struck Lancang's Principal Peak. The enormous sword array seemed to have nearly taken shape.

Xi Ping reached the only hand he could still move into his mustard seed and groped around at random, not caring whether he came up with whitespirits or blue jade. His shattered bones repaired themselves almost violently, slashing his flesh. Xi Ping had no attention to spare for it—what the hell was so special about that dead fish? He had already driven away the troublemaking Yu Chang, why was the Queen Mother of the West...

“The next life spiritual fish is the messenger between life and death,” Wangge Luobao said softly. “Cut it apart, and you can open the Gate of Life and Death. Through that mist, the consciousnesses of the living can temporarily be projected onto their predecessors who have died in this area, attach themselves to predecessors who have some relationship to them, or some inheritance in common, some karmic connection, or some chance similarity... How many living people in the world have a chance to truly ‘learn a lesson from the mistakes of one’s predecessor’ like this? No need to worry about your people. This is an incredibly rare opportunity. If a person of great understanding goes through it, they might even find their Way of the Heart.”

Xi Ping: “...”

As he'd thought, Yao Qi and Chang Jun had long ago been discovered by this bastard. Here he'd been wondering how Ziming-xiong could have gotten "lucky" enough to be chosen by the grit projection!

"As for Her Highness the Princess, I'm afraid she has seen the Two Sages now."

Xi Ping knew Lancang's history. It had once had the Gold Sage and the Jade Sage, the Two Sages. These were the founders of the Lancang Mountains, a divine couple. The Gold Sage had also been a sword cultivator, and the Jade Sage had also been a Yang.

His meridians were struggling to absorb shifu's sword aura. It hurt so much that he gave way to wild thoughts in spite of himself: Could it be that you only had to get hold of a sword cultivator husband to attain the personal instruction of the Gold and Jade Sages through that dead fish? Were the single unworthy of inheriting the Lancang Mountains? If he'd known that, he wouldn't have killed the Emperor of the East. He'd have left the three of them to fight it out in the sages' grave...

"At the soaring heights of the cultivation world, a person is no longer themselves. Of what significance are husbands and wives?" Biting his words off strangely, Wangge Luobao laughed. "The Sanyue Mountains' fallen Xiang Rong was of the same lineage as his shifu the Black Emperor, and he had used the Unbound Furnace to refine himself until he resembled him so closely, yet their two Ways of the Heart are still tearing the Silver Moon in two. Never mind a sword cultivator and a toolmaker.

“One range of spiritual mountains can have only one full moon sage. The Ways of the Heart of this loving husband and wife gradually grew apart. The Gold Sage was a sword cultivator, and a husband. From either perspective, he thought himself superior and believed as a matter of course that he ought to be the master of the Lancang Mountains. He wanted to kill his wife.”

Xi Ping: “...”

Couldn't they have just broken up? Why go so far?

“A husband and wife who fall out due to incompatible Ways of the Heart can never rest until one or the other is dead,” Wangge Luobao said. “After all, that's the bedfellow who knows all your weaknesses. Besides which, that Gold Sage...well. I've heard that there are sword cultivators for whom the man makes the sword, like the Sword Ancestor, like your honored teacher. Wanshuang and Zhaoting were both mundane iron to begin with and became renowned as their masters did. There are others, however, for whom the sword makes the man, like the famous sword Xiuluo, which let Western Chu's Xiang Zhao squat on the title of Sword of the South for so many years. Unfortunately, the Gold Sage was the latter. He had attained divinity relying solely on the famous sword forged by the hand of that toolmaking master, the Jade Sage. How could a mighty full moon sage have such a shortcoming?

“But the women of Southern He...”

Wangge Luobao spoke the Wan language with a particular clinging quality at the ends of his syllables, as though he were about to break into song. All of a sudden, Xi Ping remembered how long, long ago, when he had still been a clueless brat, he had played dumb and made Jiangli so angry that she had shooed him out of the House of Overflowing Splendor.

Back then, she had played a Southern He tune upstairs.

The women of He were as passionate as summer flowers, but if their love was unrequited, or they were betrayed, they would kill.

“It turned out that the Jade Sage had been prepared. Before he could strike, she turned the attack on him. Let me tell you a secret, Tai Sui. The Lovebird Sword Array was made by the Jade Sage herself, and one of the materials she used was a rarity, the only one of its kind...” Wangge Luobao laughed. “The Gold Sage.”

Yang Wan could no longer tell who she was, couldn't distinguish Lord Guang'an and the Gold Sage. The next life spiritual fish had joined the souls of the living and the dead. The sage's love, no shallower than her own, mingled with her longing for the mundane world. After love came nothingness, only a sky filled with ridiculous ashes.

She felt herself dropped into a boundless frozen wasteland. The Gold Sage and Guang'an both became muddled.

When a person came to the extreme limit of heaven, all their close kin left them; all they had for company was their Way of the Heart.

In that moment, it was as if the Lancang Mountains had come back to life. On the whole Southern He Peninsula, everyone temporarily lost their senses.

Spiritual energy intolerable to the body of an ascended spirit poured directly into the top of the Queen Mother of the West's skull. The marriage contract between the two of them broke apart.

Lord Guang'an suddenly found the strength to throw himself at her.

Everyone was on the border between life and death, their gazes drawn by the far shore of the Wangchuan. Only he still had but one person in his eyes; he had even defied the influence of the next life spiritual fish.

Vast spiritual energy pierced ruthlessly through his chest. With the body of this sword cultivator as sacrifice, the flood of spiritual energy crashing against the Queen Mother of the West slowed until she could manage to channel it into herself.

The Queen Mother of the West's essence increased dramatically, and her cultivation jumped a small level up. A beam of sword light lit the Southern He Peninsula. The Lovebird Sword Array reappeared in the human world. Lancang had a master!

She suddenly opened her eyes. The medicine cultivator's grief-laden eyes with their faint trace of fragility were icy and serene, like the "heavenly edict" repeatedly sounding in her mind. Lord Guang'an's body fell with a crash. At the last, his fingers moved slightly toward the hem of her skirt.

He hadn't found A-Wan's eyes.

This was the Lovebird Sword Array; one person had to become material for it.

A thousand years ago it had been a man who had broken faith; a thousand years later, it was an infatuated sap... In fact, it was all the same.

Love was more terrible than a poisonous miasma, more cruel than a sword. Its mortality rate was one hundred percent.

The instant the Lovebird Sword Array appeared, Xi Ping's spine, which had just repaired itself, seemed to snap under pressure—he became the first objective of that divine tool of the mountains.

Xi Ping had seen the Bell of Tribulation, had seen the Silver Moon, and had seen the Cauldron of Nine Dragons, but those divine tools had either not been aimed at him, or they had been used up. This was his first time being the target of a divine tool of the mountains.

He finally knew why Xuanwu had brought the Silver Moon to kill Qiu Sha.

The moment the sword light pointed at him, Xi Ping's connection to the reincarnation wood was severed.

The divine tools could cut off the accompanying plants of evildoers like him, leaving their consciousnesses with nowhere to run.

And he also finally knew why, when the mysterious next life spiritual fish had such an ingenious use, Wangge Luobao had insisted on the superfluous gesture of making Yu Chang fool around with his grit projection.

Because in these desperate straits, only Yu Chang could have turned traitor and saved him—he was the only person in the world who could remove spiritual image brands, and his deal with Yu Chang wasn't yet concluded.

But in order to keep Yu Chang from manipulating the Queen Mother of the West, he had single-handedly triggered internal strife among Western Chu's warlords, sent away Last Straw Yu!

Wangge Luobao sighed, looking at the reincarnation wood in his hands, which no longer glowed. His expression was regretful.

Zhi Xiu's older brother was buried on the Southern He Peninsula.

Yu Chang and Kunlun alike had hoped that Zhaoting and Wanshuang would fight each other to a standstill. If only Zhi Xiu fell into the trap in the southern mines, the precious territory of Southern Wan would be up for grabs.

Having built a temporary peace with the Sword Slave after great struggle, that preternaturally clever Grand Duke Tai Sui certainly wouldn't let his shifu come south.

After receiving word, Tai Sui was certain to come himself, because he would think that the Sword Slave had no reason to make trouble for a junior like him, and had no reason not to let him leave with the mortals under his protection.

And as soon as the merchant ships to pick up those people moved, even without spies, Wangge Luobao could tell that Tai Sui had reached the Southern He Peninsula.

From beginning to end, none of this had been played out for Zhi Xiu's benefit. What was so scary about the Sword of the South? It wasn't like he was the only sword cultivator in the world.

The Lovebird Sword Array had been waiting to bury the successor to the ungovernable way.

"A pity we couldn't chat." Wangge Luobao stroked the reincarnation wood. "Tai Sui, it's very lonely. All the paramount spiritual senses have passed away. Once you're dead, I'll have no one in the world to talk to—ancestor, when you schemed to kill Yuan Hui back then, I suppose you were also quite sad?"

“Raise the casket, hang two mats,” he began to croon softly in a slightly foreign accent. A waking dragon emerged from the bottom of the sea to carry him. “Shelter it fully seven days...”

CHAPTER 218 - A Life of Regret (30)

There were too many souls of the dead in this awful place.

After the next life mist had diffused from the corpse of the big fish, Chang Jun, who had jumped into the sea, bore the brunt, becoming the first person to be swallowed by the mist.

Yao Qi, not far away, saw countless shades instantly attach themselves to him. There were common people, and there were low level cultivators in miserable plights; the majority of them were ants who had fled during the war two hundred years ago and had died on the way when some part of the fighting had touched them. The faces, frightened or blank, were projected one after another onto Chang Jun's face, like the images on a revolving lantern; it was like the stories about being possessed by ghosts!

Yao Qi was a step behind him, still climbing over the edge of the hidden realm. His first instinct was to run ashore. He watched in bewilderment as Chang Jun, his consciousness hopelessly tangled with the dead, cried out on behalf of tens of thousands of ghosts: "Help...help..."

Then something seemed to yank at his feet, and Chang Jun sank into the water.

By the time Yao Qi recovered his senses, he had already thrown himself forward to catch his classmate and friend's arm. The outcome was that he couldn't pull him back but was instead dragged into the sea with him. His ears filled with the flow of water. A phantom passed through Yao Qi's body. He was dazed, having the sudden feeling that he had eaten fertilizer. He grew a full palm-width taller and more, so tall he felt a little dizzy... Fortunately, he then went down on one knee.

Yao Qi heard himself pronounce a string of rapid words in the Southern He language. Steeped in the next life spiritual fish's mist, he was in a stupor, but because it was truly a struggle to speak the Southern He Language, he accidentally bit his tongue and, like a miracle, his head cleared.

"I've also been possessed by a ghost!" he thought fearfully. "Hongzheng! Shiyong! Where are..."

Just then, he heard what the ghost that had "possessed" him was saying: "... that Lancang has reached this present pass is my fault. Not with a hundred deaths could I atone. But the people are innocent. The spiritual mountains no longer recognize me as Sect Leader, and the Lovebird Sword Array is out of control. If it is permitted to go into battle against the masters of all the nations, how can the people of the He Peninsula survive? Fellow cultivator, I beg you!"

Yao Qi was stunned.

This was Lancang's Sect Leader?

To hear him talk, Shiyong had guessed right. It really had been their own Sect Leader who had caused the disappearance of the Lovebird Sword Array and the great mountain array!

Looking where the gaze of this thousand-fold condemned man from two centuries ago was pointed, Yao Qi raised his head and saw an even taller man with the typical appearance of the people of Li; but at his waist twined a very special soft sword.

As soon as the Sword Slave Wu Lingxiao landed amid the life and death mist of the next life spiritual fish, she noticed that her consciousness was being invaded by the mist. She seemed to be in another person's body, with many thoughts that didn't belong to her welling up in her mind.

The will of the foremost sword in the world wasn't to be carried away so easily. Wu Lingxiao couldn't figure out what was going on with this mist; she didn't act rashly, only tightened her hand on Wanshuang. Suddenly, she realized something was wrong. She looked down and saw to her surprise that Wanshuang had changed into an exceptionally familiar soft sword.

Shizun...

Next, a man with his hair loose down his back was on one knee before her. “Fellow cultivator, I beg you!”

Wu Lingxiao was stunned; then she recognized him. This was Lancang’s Sect Leader.

During the Wan-He War, she had just moved to the Disciple Hall and had heard a rough account of events in Southern He. It was said that this matter had originally been her shifu’s responsibility, but the Beijue Array had acted up at the last moment, and he had been replaced by the Third Elder, who had rushed south.

Hadn’t they said that shifu hadn’t had time to reach Southern He?

Then why was he on Lancang’s Principal Peak, speaking to its Sect Leader?

Just then, she saw the former great array of the Lancang Mountains begin to heave. Blood surged in the Sect Leader’s eyes. “The great mountain array has broken. Fellow cultivator, I can’t suppress the Lovebird Sword Array much longer. You have spent hundreds of years sealing Beiyuan’s north wind on behalf of the continent. I’ve heard that the Heart Sword is a good...”

This was when the four nations joined forces to attack the Lancang Mountains.

Wu Lingxiao worked it out: yes, her shifu was always repairing the Beijue Array. He was an expert in array techniques. He would have been a step ahead of the others in reaching Lancang's Principal Peak.

But...why had Kunlun hidden this portion of history? What honor was there in the four nations besieging the Lancang Mountains, ganging up on a single old lunatic who had lost his mind to an obsession? Why had the Third Elder found it worthwhile to compete for the credit?

Before the Lancang Sect Leader could finish speaking, there came a boom. The Lovebird Sword Array flickered in midair.

“Fellow Cultivator Heart Sword!”

In the next life mist, Wu Lingxiao, acting with Kunlun's Second Elder the Heart Sword, shifted the point of that sword, joining Lancang's Sect Leader in meeting the Lovebird Sword Array. Even with her present cultivation level, it was still appalling. The Heart Sword cut through the clouds of tribulation over the Lancang Mountains. Her shizun had been in his prime then; with a shed skin cultivation level, he was capable of curbing the divine tool of another nation's spiritual mountains. He turned to ask Lancang's

Sect Leader, “Hey, this is a full moon grade immortal tool, what are you planning...”

Looking through the eyes of the Second Elder in the past, Wu Lingxiao froze along with her shifu. They saw Lancang’s Sect Leader, that old lunatic, beneath the divine tool of the mountains, tear open his inner store of essence. “Thank you. Move aside.”

The self-destructing shed skin blocked the sword light of the divine tool of the mountains. Wu Lingxiao saw for a moment how something like a prism flew out from the center of the Lancang Sect Leader’s brow and hit the Lovebird Sword Array.

The Lancang Sect Leader had sealed the divine tool of the mountains with his own Way of the Heart, corroded by the heart demon seed!

Yao Qi, whose consciousness had unhappily ended up inside the Lancang Sect Leader, had been truly unfortunate. He felt himself crushed flat, embedded in the Lovebird Sword Array.

Meanwhile, outside the mist—

Xi Ping had never been good at focusing, but the moment the Lovebird Sword Array descended, all the distracting thoughts in his mind suddenly vanished. Everything around him slowed.

The spiritual wind of the Lancang Mountains suddenly gained direction. The simple equipment and arrays in the various nations' mining areas were swept up by the wild wind and utterly destroyed. On the ground, rows of inscriptions appeared automatically all of a sudden and spread in all directions like waves—this was the great array of the Lancang Mountains, lost for many years, appearing along with the Lovebird Sword Array.

When the inscriptions swept out, Xi Ping had no attention left to consider where the Sword Slave had been swept off to; he didn't think of Qiu Sha, who had been destroyed upon meeting the Silver Moon; he had no leisure to consider why Wangge Luobao, whose acquaintance he had hardly made, would scheme so resolutely to get rid of him...he didn't even have time to assess to what extent his meridians had recovered after being shattered by Zhaoting.

Beneath the light of the Lovebird Sword Array, which had lit up practically the whole Southern He Peninsula, all Xi Ping saw were the people looking up into the sky in panic.

Northern Li's mine envoy, the Luwu, the common cultivators scrabbling to survive in the cracks, the mortals, the Turmoilers.

Countless people.

There was no retreat. He couldn't die.

With a crack, Xi Ping's dislocated spine returned to its proper location, holding up his wound-riddled body.

Zhaoting...

The jaws, an unimportant location, were always the very last to be fully repaired. Xi Ping hadn't had time to get to them yet, so he couldn't speak. He only reached out for the Sword that Mended the Heavens, which had fallen not far from him.

The shard in his spirit responded to the sword. In that moment, Zhaoting, a divine shed skin sword he found it difficult even to hold, came in answer to his thought. It flew straight into his hand, which had only three fingers remaining.

From the shard in his spirit came shifu's voice. Xi Ping didn't even split off his attention to listen to what he was saying.

When shifu had passed along the sword energy to him, he had teased him, saying it was too tiring to stand guard for his rebellious disciple; he didn't even dare to breathe too loudly, since at the slightest sound, that disappointment would start looking this way and that.

Xi Ping had never accepted this—his spiritual sense was primarily attached to his hearing, anyway; it wasn't like he was deaf. Of course he would hear.

Now, however, he had at last understood the meaning of “turning a deaf ear” and “forgetting world and self.”

Sword light blazed high. The second of Zhi Xiu's attacks stored in his meridians flew out with a whistle from his hands with their incomplete fingers, meeting the Lovebird Sword Array head-on.

The effectiveness of the Sword that Mended the Heavens was at a discount in his hands, but fortunately, the Lovebird Sword Array had been sealed two hundred years ago by Lancang's Sect Leader. Now, without a shed skin master to act as its mainstay, it seemed ancient and slow.

A bit of the next life spiritual fish's mist was cleaned up by the sword wind. On the South Sea, Yang Wan shook. Her eyes cleared for an instant, and she saw Lord Guang'an. Blood flowed from all the apertures of her face.

The Lovebird Sword Array instantly stagnated.

But at the same time, Xi Ping was like a sandcastle on the shore amid the wind and rain. After sending out two shed skin sword attacks in a row, he seemed to dissolve entirely into dust in the sword light.

Wangge Luobao slowly wiped his beast-taming flute, trying out high and low notes.

When Qiu Sha had seen the Silver Moon, she had stood stock still and met her death. On the South Sea, upon seeing the Cauldron of Nine Dragons, everyone had scattered in all directions. This was the first ascended spirit in history to dare to point a sword at a divine tool of the mountains.

It truly filled one with admiration. A pity it wasn't any use.

The Sword Slave was trapped, and there were no accompanying plants on the Southern He Peninsula; even if Zhi Xiu immediately reached the Wan-He border, he would be too late to bury his disciple.

The courage of an ant trying to shake a tree.

Yang Wan meanwhile seemed to have fallen into a nightmare she couldn't wake up from. She was trapped within her spirit, not one of her movements free.

Lord Guang'an's corpse hung in the depths of her pupils. She stared at that unmoving person, a frail sliver of her consciousness struggling wildly in her spirit. She herself tore a rift in the Way of the Heart on her spirit.

No, I'm...

I'm...

The next moment, the inexorable mind of the Lancang Spiritual Mountains swallowed her up. Yang Wan's consciousness let out the most mournful shriek.

The stagnating Lovebird Sword Array concentrated its sword energy with a rumble. Xi Ping, who could no longer feel his body, couldn't manage to put himself together no matter what to use the third sword attack.

But just then, three bursts of gunfire flew into the sky like shooting stars, precisely hitting the Lovebird Sword Array.

Wangge Luobao instantly raised his head: ascended spirit grade!

What was this?

Apart from Tai Sui, there could be no other ascended spirit on the Southern He Peninsula!

Wei Chengxiang dropped out of midair, creating a deep pit in the ground where her knees hit.

She was only a half-immortal. She had been unable to move a muscle under the Lovebird Sword Array, until Xi Ping had blocked it with Zhi Xiu's sword.

Xi Ping had brought three sword attacks from Flying Jade Peak. The first two had been of the defense and shielding type. His second attack had won a moment's breathing room for all the people frozen beneath the sword light.

In that moment, Wei Chengxiang had seen the Lovebird Sword Array.

The reincarnation wood's connection had severed. She didn't know whether Xi Ping was dead or alive. She couldn't contact the Luwu or the Turmoilers.

But no one who could survive in the Land of Turmoil would cry until they had seen the coffin.

In a flash, Wei Chengxiang took from her mustard seed the upgraded immortal tool Xi Ping had given her to protect herself with—a cannon over four chi long; instead of cannonballs, what it had inside it were three ascended spirit grade talismans.

In a last ditch effort, Wei Chengxiang emptied the cannon all at once.

Wangge Luobao ordered the waking dragon to swim further away. He frowned. “Fighting with their backs to the wall.”

Though Zhaoting’s effectiveness was at a discount in Xi Ping’s hands, it was still a shed skin sword. If even a shed skin sword’s wind couldn’t force the Lovebird Sword Array to retreat, what could an upgraded immortal tool that was at best of ascended spirit grade do?

Those three shots that could overturn mountains and shift seas were only enough to make the Lovebird Sword Array momentarily indisposed.

The sword array paused slightly. Its sword light blazed more and more fiercely. Wei Chengxiang almost had the impression that her eyes were being stabbed.

But then, before she could despair, an earthshaking rumble reverberated over the canal.

Wei Chengxiang's three breakthrough shots hadn't managed to harm a single one of the Lovebird Sword Array's hairs, but they seemed to have been a signal.

On the steamships, on land, the Luwu brought out the upgraded immortal tools they had brought along!

They had brought ten ascended spirit grade ones in all, and each person had an established foundation grade one.

Unable to contact each other, the Luwu acted with perfect coordination, firing on the Lovebird Sword Array almost simultaneously.

Fierce light exploded over the Southern He Peninsula, shoving the Lovebird Sword Array up into the sky.

The spiritual wind on the Southern He Peninsula was like knives, sweeping into the sea, stirring up countless vortexes of varying size.

The Eternal Flame had not seen the light of day in eight hundred years. On the first public appearance of spirit-conducting gold, manmade tools flagrantly matched themselves against a divine tool of the mountains.

Aside from the people of Wan, there was universal shock.

CHAPTER 219 - A Life of Regret (31)

While the Southern He Peninsula was large, apart from the Lancang Mountains, there was no other high ground. Therefore, the Heaven's Design Pavilion branch on the Wan-He border had a full view of the clash between the upgraded immortal tools and the Lovebird Sword Array.

But they only knew that their own upgraded immortal tools had “sent up fireworks”; they didn't know concretely what had happened. The eyesight of an established foundation cultivator couldn't reach that far, and it couldn't see the divine tool of the mountains wrapped in fierce light and raging wind. Right now, Pang Jian, guarding the border, was completely in the dark. He only felt wave after wave of violent spiritual energy slamming against the border inscriptions—from north to south, the southern peninsula spanned nearly ten thousand li; even after passing through the better part of the Land of Turmoil, the spiritual energy waves were still so strong when they hit the border—how big must the mess be?!

Pang Jian pinched the piece of reincarnation wood that had dropped the ball at the crucial moment. It had recently been sent to him by the Kaiming Department's head office; they had said it was secure and efficient. The upshot was that it seemed to be dead now. Pang Jian spilled blood on it, drew talismans, poured in spiritual energy; none of it was of any use... After reaching the end of his endurance, he even spat on it.

Ptui. He had actually believed that Xi Shiyong could be reliable!

And beside him there was a foolish blue-clothed half-immortal with his head tipped back, standing there marveling, “It’s...a miracle...”

Pang Jian slapped his subordinate on the back of the head. “Some damn miracle!”

Who—or what—could cause so many ascended spirit grade upgraded immortal tools to fire simultaneously?

If it wasn’t Wanshuang, then it was the Lancang Mountains’ divine tool.

At present, the spirit-conducting efficiency of spirit-conducting gold could reach sixty to seventy percent of a cultivator’s meridians. In comparison to true immortal tools and masters, a portion of the spiritual stones would still be wasted—and what was more, no matter how ample the Luwu’s preparations, they had still gone in ships; they hadn’t brought the Xuanyin Mountains with them. Their opponent, meanwhile, had the southern mines...in other words, the former Lancang Spiritual Mountains.

Pang Jian did swift mental calculations. How many rounds of fire could the Luwu hold out for?

Most critically, there were still so many mortals on the peninsula who hadn't evacuated. Why hadn't Xi Shiyong prevented the Luwu from staking everything on a single throw like this?

Was he...still alive?

Pang Jian broke out in cold sweat and quickly formed Heavenly Questions to send flying to the Xuanyin Mountains and the Kaiming Department's head office.

Was Xi Shiyong—Tai Sui—dead or not? Wangge Luobao also wanted to know.

The passing of an ascended spirit would indeed make as much noise as the collapse of a mountain, but compared to the present circumstances, it wouldn't have been worth a mention.

Wangge Luobao narrowed his eyes. Never mind approaching the peninsula, the spiritual wind dashed against him so hard that he could hardly stay in place.

He'd known that the genius on Moon Plated Peak would be doing what he could to make up for the "drought of high level cultivators"; besides, as big as Southern Wan was, though the upgraded immortal tools were a close-kept secret, it would have been impossible for a single word not to leak out.

But no one had expected these so-called “upgraded immortal tools” to debut in such a startling fashion.

Wangge Luobao’s throat was a little dry and his pupils had yet to recover from shrinking rapidly. The Luwu let off a second wave of firepower, and he suddenly cried out, “Oh!”

Compared to the first earth-shattering wave, the might of the second wave seemed to be considerably reduced, discounted by around twenty to thirty percent. The reaction of the Lovebird Sword Array verified his observations—this time, the divine tool of the mountains that had nearly been blown sky-high before didn’t move a sliver. It even bore down slightly.

Wangge Luobao worked out the crux at once: spiritual stones.

The Wan’s mysterious magic weapons also needed spiritual stones. The spiritual stones they had brought with them wouldn’t stretch far enough to match the Lancang Mountains!

“Ha!” Wangge Luobao at once sent separate messages to Kunlun, Yu Chang, and even the Sanyue and Lingyun Mountains—for the latter, he didn't have means of contact and simply sent unencrypted notes flying to the nearest post stations to spread far and wide.

“How could I be alone in witnessing such a spectacle? I must invite my fellow cultivators from the various nations to have a look how the Xuanyin Mountains do without the stamina of cultivators who had established foundations... Hss, strange. Why is this evil wind so strong?”

To the east of the Southern He Peninsula was the East Sea, and to the west was the South Sea. Of them, the South Sea side was connected to the nations of Chu and Shu on the continent, and there were Southern Shu's Three Islands on the sea. There was a lot of land to block the wind and waves. The waters had always been calmer than in the spacious and empty East Sea.

But now, a southeasterly wind had come out of nowhere on the East Sea and was blowing directly westward, along with the spiritual wind off the peninsula. The ships in the South Sea all turned into scraps of paper swirling in a gale. If not for the fact that the protective talismans Xi Ping had placed on the mortal merchant ships earlier hadn't yet fully dissipated, many people would have become dead souls on the sea.

Even the waking dragon could hardly withstand the enormous waves. It wrapped around Wangge Luobao and rolled westward.

Wangge Luobao's easy smile dimmed somewhat. His spiritual sense moved slightly. Suddenly, he had the sense that something was about to go out of control.

Also being blown around by the wind was the dying but not yet dead Xi Ping.

There was no ascended spirit on earth whose body could sustain two shed skin sword attacks within such a short span of time—not even if they were discounted.

Xi Ping's skin sack had gone entirely to pieces, almost like back at the bottom of the Impassable Sea, when his bones had been crushed and scattered to the wind.

Fortunately, there was no “shizu”¹⁰³ here to trick his consciousness into a star stone. Also fortunately, he had blown himself up instead of being smashed up by the Lovebird Sword Array. His sword attack had won Wei Chengxiang time to react, and the upgraded immortal tools of the half-immortals had shielded him from the Lovebird Sword Array's pursuit and attack, preserving his consciousness, which for him was the most crucial thing.

But the wretched thing was that his consciousness couldn't form new bones at once.

Even with the hidden bones, a consciousness was still very weak. Without a body or the reincarnation wood, which was similar to a body, a cultivator's consciousness was like a ghost in a folk legend; its farts wouldn't even smell. This time he had really shattered too cleanly, like an ascended spirit foretaste of "escaping the mortal dust"... Even when he had been repeatedly struck by lightning in the Sanyue Mountains, he'd still had half of a charred body to take refuge in!

He felt as if he had turned into a puff of air, his dispersed viewpoint making him dizzy. In his daze, he even had a marvelous notion: if he flew any higher, wouldn't he condense into clouds along with the water vapor, turn into rain, and "sprinkle his tears" upon the South Sea?

Goodness, he was even more poetic than the Blissful Village in Jinping's southern outskirts, where thousands of beauties had been buried!

Xi Ping, so "poetic" he was rendered unconscious by it, was swirled out onto the water and bumped into a fierce wind off the sea, which rolled his hardly coherent consciousness into a cylinder. The hidden bones immediately seized the opportunity to rebuild his body with spiritual energy. When they had just formed a rough outline, the fierce wind crashed against an islet, and Xi Ping broke to pieces once again—this really was hovering between life and death in the literal sense. Xi Ping gave a start amid his daze, woken by pain.

The third wave of fire from the Luwu's upgraded immortal tools surged up to the clouds, exploding in his ears.

Xi Ping was the Luwu's main planner. How could he not know how things stood with his own people? At a single glance, he knew that the Luwu's spiritual stones wouldn't hold out much longer.

While everyone had yet to recover from the shock of the upgraded immortal tools, he took advantage of the wild wind blowing him toward the South Sea and made a prompt decision, leaping toward the "life and death mist" on the surface: there was no time for him to slowly grow a body; supposing there was anyone here who could still put up a fight against the Lovebird Sword Array, it could only be the Sword Slave!

As soon as his consciousness, light as air, landed in that peculiar mist, Xi Ping heard countless voices ringing in his ears. His consciousness seemed once again to have turned into a river, trying to hold the struggling watery ghosts of all those who had died in the vicinity since the time Pangu had cleaved apart heaven and earth to the present.

But Xi Ping breathed a sigh of relief. So this was what “the meeting between life and death” meant. He could relax now.

He was different from the others. Xi Ping had only too much experience with his consciousness fluttering around, being unable to find himself—when his body had been trapped in the Impassable Sea, his weak consciousness stranded outside had drifted through countless people living and dead. Now, innumerable thoughts flitted through his mind, but he concentrated and skillfully distinguished which thoughts were his and which were external.

He seemed to have turned into the canal, ignoring the swirling silt and garbage in the water, making his own way downstream. Soon he found the Sword Slave.

Xi Ping had never been so grateful for the Sword Slave’s conspicuous size!

“Senior, wake up!” Xi Ping’s consciousness contracted. Borrowing the spiritual energy inside the Queen Mother of the West’s hidden realm, it grew a finger bone and abruptly poked at the center of the Sword Slave’s forehead.

The center of the forehead was the seat of the spirit, the most sensitive spot; reasonably speaking, she ought to wake up!

But Xi Ping had underestimated the hardness of a shed skin grade half-puppet body. The weak finger bone which could hardly gather spiritual energy couldn't arouse Wanshuang's vigilance. The Sword Slave stood there unaware, letting him poke, and the finger bone Xi Ping had worked so hard to grow snapped!

Xi Ping: "..."

Another roar. The Luwu's fourth wave of firepower had been shot.

The sound was obviously even weaker. Xi Ping glanced out of the corner of his eye and saw that there were only established foundation grade upgraded immortal tools in that barrage; he knew at once that those colossal ascended spirit grade things had used up all the spiritual stones on the Luwu's ships.

The ascended spirit grade ones could bear up, but beneath the divine tool of the mountains, established foundations were nothing. Facing the upgraded immortal tools whose tempo had become disordered, the Lovebird Sword Array pressed down like a heavenly tribulation upon the ants on the Southern He Peninsula who had dared irreverence.

In a moment of desperation, Xi Ping's broken finger gathered weak spiritual energy and exerted a force that should have been beyond it. He actually succeeded in using his incomplete limb to pull out Yu Chang's Discard the False and Keep the True book and used the lowest grade power replicated in it—the discounted version of the grit projection. He burrowed into the Sword Slave's enormous shadow.

The grit projection was either the user's true body hiding inside another's shadow or a grit projection talisman activated at long range; even Yu Chang himself hadn't tried out this method. After all, apart from Xi Ping, anyone whose consciousness left their body would fundamentally be near death.

Moreover, while each person had their own shadow, they overlapped when they fell on the ground or the surface of the sea; the shadow at the Sword Slave's feet belonged to more than one person.

And this was the boundary between life and death.

The special place, the special technique, and the special consciousness all came together. Xi Ping's vision blurred, and a marvelous change occurred to his point of view: he saw a tall, broad man, unfamiliar to him, with a soft sword very much like the Blind Wolf King's wrapped around his waist. Behind him was a half-transparent Sword Slave.

Xi Ping was astonished. He could find people whose consciousnesses were stuck to those from the far side of the Wangchuan River, and he could see what they were experiencing now from a spectator's point of view.

The Sword Slave seemed to be in a daze, following along closely like a balloon. She was looking into the sky along with the man's stunned gaze—Xi Ping also looked in that direction, just in time to see a man self-destruct his own essence and use his Way of the Heart to attack the Lovebird Sword Array.

Xi Ping didn't consider which period of history this was. If he'd had eyes, no doubt he would have used the hands he had spared no effort to grow to rub them thoroughly: he had seen another half-transparent person stuck to the Way of the Heart attacking the Lovebird Sword Array—Yao Qi!

Then, like a stamp, Ziming-xiong pressed against the hilt of the Lovebird Sword Array's main sword with a bam!

The place where the Sword Slave had fallen into the mist just happened to be not far from Yao Qi. Their two shadows must have overlapped.

Taking advantage of the way his consciousness could spread and change form, Xi Ping flew in pursuit of Yao Qi. His dispersed consciousness congealed into a hand. A qin string with both ends melting into nothingness jumped out beneath the bones, and he played a shrill note into Yao Qi's ear.

Yao Qi had originally maintained a thread of clarity because of his lack of skill with the foreign language. He was immediately awakened by the music.

Xi Ping heard Yao Qi, stuck face downward to the sword hilt, give a cry of happy surprise: “Shiyong!”

The qin strings held by the bone hand multiplied. Xi Ping played qin sweet notes: What's happening?

Yao Qi said, “I don’t know. I seem to be possessing Lancang’s Sect Leader!”

The Sect Leader had rammed his Way of the Heart against the Lovebird Sword Array, embedding it in the hilt of the main sword; most likely it had yet to break!

And meanwhile, news of the upgraded immortal tools exploded like sudden thunder throughout the northern and southern continents. Kunlun’s High Priest instantly looked alarmed. The Sect Leader muttered briefly to himself. “Call the Third Elder. Have him bring some people and come south with me.”

In the Sanyue Mountains, the Silver Moon, which had been vacillating among the Principal Peaks, abruptly sank toward the East Peak. In the Lingyun Mountains, the Nine Dragons were uneasy. Yu Chang, desperately putting out fires, suddenly looked across the sea toward the Southern He Peninsula.

On the Wan-He border, a beam of light flew out of the moonlight frost tree in the courtyard of the Heaven's Design Pavilion branch, so fast that even the karma beast on the wall didn't have time to blink. A person had already landed at the courtyard gate—Zhi Xiu had walked out of his accompanying plant in a single step.

CHAPTER 220 - A Life of Regret (32)

Zhi Xiu's flashing figure paused at the gate, as if he were forcing his steps to slow. He turned and said gently to Pang Jian and the others, "No need for formalities. Thank you all for your hard work guarding the border. When the mortal merchant ships come, as long as it's safe, permit them to pass. I will trouble the Kaiming Department to make arrangements for them."

Pang Jian said "Yes," then carefully asked, "General Zhi, Shiyong..."

"He's still alive," Zhi Xiu interrupted.

His voice suddenly lowered, as if he weren't answering Pang Jian but talking to himself: "Still alive... Don't worry, this time I'm not too late."

Hearing that the source of his voice wasn't right, Pang Jian raised his head again and found that Zhi Xiu had gone into the distance. At the gate there remained only a karma beast hidden in the wall.

When it wasn't doing anything else, the karma beast would run around on Heaven's Design Pavilion's perimeter wall. It wasn't unusual for it to come out to see a shed skin, but Pang Jian's gaze froze—he saw to his astonishment that the karma beast had its head bowed, its forepaws folded in a kneeling posture, watching Zhi Xiu's departure as a vassal watches a ruler.

The karma beast had kept the walkers in the mortal world company for over a thousand years and had always been very friendly toward its own people...not counting some individuals universally hated by dogs and cats. In front of those it was familiar with, it was as playful and affectionate as a big cat or dog. But the sacred beast had a sacred beast's arrogance; Pang Jian had never seen the karma beast pay obeisance so solemnly to anyone.

What had happened?

Zhi Xiu didn't so much as look at the border inscriptions that had been disturbed by his crossing. He flew toward the Lancang Mountains.

The third sword attack Xi Ping had asked him for before leaving hadn't been on the sword platform. Instead, it had been the sword attack he had carved into the snow when he had faced the heavenly might while stuck at the shed skin boundary.

This request was very strange. Normally, what a sword cultivator collected in sword form anthologies or taught to their disciples were only "complete sword forms," also called "standard sword forms," the quintessence that the sword cultivator had repeatedly honed and extracted. But sword moves weren't petrified; they were subject to all manner of changes in the heat of battle. Sometimes, making a rapid response, though an attack had originated from a certain standard sword form, when it was used to meet a real emergency it would be altogether different, only assuming a bit of the standard sword form's sword aura.

Simply put, the standard sword attacks were the origin, and a sword mark left elsewhere was only a temporary manifestation.

“All the standard sword forms of my sword moves are on the sword platform.” Zhi Xiu suspected that he had been wasting spit by instructing him. “Was your mind wandering again while I was teaching you about swordsmanship? You've forgotten what a 'standard sword form' is, too, haven't you?”

“It's not that bad, shifu,” said Xi Ping. “You may have made a total mess of teaching me Detailed Account of Meridians, but you should still have a bit of confidence in yourself...”

His shizun rewarded him with a snowball and a Still stuck on Detailed Account of Meridians, are you?

So Xi Ping sloppily rolled up his sleeves and let the introductory text that had caused teacher and disciple to quarrel off the hook. Grinning, he said,

“What would I need so many sword attacks for? My cultivation is only so strong. If it really gets to the point of using two sword attacks, I’ll already be stone cold. I won’t have a use for the third one anyway. Give it to me as a lucky charm.”

This was only an incomplete sword form, the outcome of being forced into a hopeless predicament. There was little in it for posterity to learn from. Even though Xi Ping had picked it up by cheating, it would still be very hard for him to grasp intact sword aura from it.

But Xi Ping had said that when it came to the sword, as long as he knew enough to get by, it was fine; it wasn’t like he earned his keep as a fighter.

What he wanted was the tenacity and courage of a lone and stubborn person beneath a canopy, still believing in a last gleam of hope at the end of the road.

With the appearance of spirit-conducting gold, spiritual stones were no longer “unusable by mortals”; the insurmountable chasm between mortal and immortal was about to be filled by a mighty flood. Beneath the mansion of the cultivation world, which had stood high and mighty for thousands of years, the foundations were being dug up.

Wen Fei landed at the summit of Moon Plated Peak and went straight to find the shovel-maker.

The storms outside seemed to have nothing to do with Lin Chi. All his focus was on the Unbound Furnace in front of him. He hadn't moved for days. Wen Fei walked briskly toward him, took out his fan, and waved it in front of Master Lin's face: I think Jingzhai just went to see the Dignitary of Fate Elder, and then his aura vanished from the Xuanyin Mountains. I hear that in the south... Look at the state of things, Lin-shixiong! How can you still be staring at the furnace?

Lin Chi's gaze didn't budge from the Unbound Furnace. "General Zhi tasked me with making something, and I haven't figured it out yet... The turbulence is on the Southern He Peninsula, not in Great Wan. If I wasn't staring at the furnace, what else would I be doing?"

Wen Fei reconsidered; that was fair. It seemed that there was no shed skin to oversee Great Wan, but in fact every accompanying tree was like Zhi Xiu himself. He could appear in any place at any time. No one knew right now how many upgraded immortal tools Great Wan had ready domestically, and the Xuanyin Mountains would soon be done for, so there were no ill-gotten gains to be squeezed out; they were just like the cottage on Flying Jade Peak—shabby and safe. It was the Southern He Peninsula, where not a single blade of grass grew and no one could move freely, that had become the contested location.

Wen Fei craned his neck to look. You're still mulling over that what's-it...that thing that can channel the spiritual mountains' spiritual energy into the mortal world like the Territory Map?

Before the words had finished popping up on the fan, there was a crisp sound. Spiritual light spread from the Unbound Furnace. Ordinarily, this was a sign that a treasure was being brought into being inside a toolmaking furnace. Wen Fei's eyes lit up, but he saw Lin Chi sigh and withdraw his consciousness from the furnace. He raised his hand and caught a short length of richly colored spirit-conducting gold.

Wei Fei said, Nice!

“What's nice about it? It's a failure.” Lin Chi shook his head despondently. “Spiritual energy is conducted more or less the same way other things are conducted. It basically all goes from high to low, from dense to sparse. Ordinarily, spiritual energy would naturally flow from where it was highly concentrated to where it was scarce...”

Wen Fei said, Wouldn't that precisely mean flowing from the spiritual mountains to the veins of the earth?

“I said ordinarily. The spiritual mountains are an exception—the accrual and dispersal of spiritual energy in the spiritual mountains is limited. It’s like a heavenly rule, outside of human control. I...I only have an ascended spirit’s cultivation. I can’t get around it.” As Lin Chi spoke, he started giving up on himself again. “But after the Jade Sage left, Lancang had no other shed skin toolmakers. Without having found the Eternal Flame, they made this thing two hundred years ago. I spent so many years on Moon Plated Peak holding my position without doing any work...”

Wen Fei quickly fanned him. Master Lin, Master Lin, do not be impatient, try this.

Saying so, he took out a small bottle. Everyone in Xuanyin’s inner and outer sects used pills produced by Rosy Cloud Peak. Lin Chi was depressed. He accepted the pill without even asking what it was and swallowed it, his attitude that of a person committing suicide by poison.

The pill slipped down his throat. Like a potent moisture expeller, it instantly dried up all of Lin Chi’s drippy emotions. He was faintly dazed, feeling that this slightly bitter pill was a little like a mind calming pill. First it stabilized his vacillating mood; then, inexpressible certainty welled up out of nowhere in his chest. It was as if he could do anything, go anywhere.

Wen Fei waved his fan in immense self-satisfaction: A new pill, I hadn’t named it yet. I’ve decided to call it the Ancestor Pill. Taking it makes you feel invincible. The inspiration comes from that brat Xi Shiyong. I've always felt that the two of you ought to borrow a little from each other's temperaments... Master Lin?

Lin Chi extended a hand, summoning a worn out history book. “Wait, I remember that General Zhi said that thing that could conduct spiritual energy from the spiritual mountains was something the Lancang Sect Leader obtained at the final juncture. If they hadn't been so hurried and hard-pressed then, they might well have succeeded. But at the time, of the Lancang Sword Sect's three great toolmaking masters, two had passed away and one had turned traitor...so who made that special spirit-conducting gold? The Sect Leader himself was a sword cultivator.”

On Sanyue's East Peak, Xuanwu's eyes suddenly opened. The white paper mask on his face went to pieces. Bright, clear moonlight illuminated his snow-white face, identical to Xiang Rong's.

Barefoot, his hair hanging loose down his back, he floated up from Sanyue's East Peak. The Silver Moon gave one final struggle and at last fell in behind him. The Sanyue Mountain Range's great array let out a sigh, and the murderous aura aimed at this so-called traitor to the spiritual mountains sank beneath the horizon like sunlight at dusk.

As if there were no one else around, Xuanwu walked directly into the main hall on Sanyue's Central Peak.

Within the space of a few steps, the silver moonlight had already repaired his damaged essence. The dirt and bloodstains on Xuanwu disappeared bit by bit beneath the moonlight. The oppressive might of a peak shed skin settled over the Sanyue Mountains.

He didn't carry out a slaughter, only fixed each hostile face in turn with his stare. Watching them kneel, unable to withstand the pressure, his deathly pale smile was as cold and treacherous as the Silver Moon.

A Linked Heart from Kunlun landed in his hand.

Southern Shu's Lingyun had also received a letter from Kunlun.

The Lingyun Mountains themselves were in a sorry state, and there was infighting between the two clans. They hadn't wanted to get mixed up in this, but the Xiuyi Sect Leader laid Wangge Luobao's note and Kunlun's secret letter out together, irresolutely read them three times over, and finally, like a punching bag, waved a hand and said with a sigh, "A letter written in the Kunlun Sect Leader's own hand... There is unrest in our nation, half of the Lingyun Mountains have collapsed, and the drained spiritual energy has yet to be traced. Our power on the southern continent is weak. When Kunlun summons us, we are not in a position to ignore it. Fair enough.

Everyone, please protect the great mountain array. Do not give the evil cultivators an opening to exploit. I... Alas.”

He looked miserable, like a young woman of good family being forced into prostitution. “I will go with the Cauldron of Nine Dragons.”

Receiving his Sect Leader’s urgent summons, Kunlun’s Third Elder actually felt rather disapproving—counting the Second Elder “in seclusion,” Kunlun had four shed skins in all. Now the Sword Slave was already in Southern He. Did the Sect Leader have any need to bring him along?

Kunlun’s shed skins all assembled on the Southern He Peninsula... Oh, he had heard that Linked Hearts had gone out to Sanyue and Lingyun from Kunlun’s heights. Such great fanfare, all for the sake of a few evil cultivators, some strange immortal tools...and Xuanyin’s little sword cultivator, who had just become a shed skin?

Was it worth it? It was giving Great Wan too much respect!

“Whether punishing evil or vanquishing demons, what need is there for my shixiong the Sect Leader to go in person? You can just leave this small matter to me.”

The Sect Leader didn't respond. After a long moment, he extended a hand to catch a Linked Heart that came flying from far away. After reading it through in a few glances, he crushed the paper and turned to say to the Third Elder, "Under the guise of patrolling the Beijue Array, Xie Chu has run off. It is suspected that he has gone beyond the Beijue Mountains."

When he heard the Blind Wolf King's name, it was as if the Third Elder had a toothache. His face spasmed involuntarily. "In the matter of Southern He, Second shidi did in fact have some disagreements and misunderstandings with us, such that we parted on bad terms. If not for his cultivation level, he wouldn't have ended up trapped in... But for that rebellious disciple of his to harbor a grudge against the sect because of this really is preposterous..."

The Third Elder's words came to an abrupt halt; he looked at the Sect Leader strangely—the moment he mentioned the Second Elder, an ominous bloody light seemed to have flashed through the Sect Leader's eyes, so fast it was as if he had imagined it.

"Sect Leader shixiong?"

It seemed that Kunlun's Sect Leader only then came back to himself. Somewhat sluggishly, he said, "Xie Chu is crafty. He has remained in contact with Wu Lingxiao all these years. If Wanshuang's Sword Slave has believed something she has heard, she won't necessarily be on our side. In the interest of prudence, the two of us will go together."

The Third Elder was just about to say something else when the Sect Leader waved a hand to interrupt him. "This is also the High Priest's intention."

Wangge Luobao's goals in this instance were first to get the southern mines and second to kill Tai Sui. Even he himself hadn't expected that his usual shit-stirring would deeply provoke the Sect Leader of far-away Kunlun. The world's preeminent masters were coming his way from all directions.

But the spiritual sense of a beast-taming cultivator, acute as the senses of the birds and beasts, was already telling him that the situation had gotten hopelessly out of hand.

Wangge Luobao took a glance at the South Sea, where the mist had somehow become even denser, and decisively sank to the bottom of the sea. Where the light didn't shine, a clamshell over a zhang high obediently opened and hid him inside itself.

He thought excitedly, Things are about to change.

Inside the next life mist, Yao Qi out of nowhere remembered an absurd rumor he had heard when he was young: they said that the Viscount of Yongning had dressed up in women's garb and been chosen as the Queen of Flowers.

Xi Ping's qin-playing fingers were unbelievably nimble—even though his skin hadn't yet had time to wrap up his bones.

Qin sweet notes flowed like drifting clouds from his incomplete fingers. Yao Qi, who didn't have a very strong grasp of sweet notes, had to concentrate with all his might to keep up.

Xi Ping said, The Lovebird Sword Array has already emerged, I don't think Yang Wan will survive. Millions of lives are in your hands now. Listen to what he's saying. He's the only person in the world who has ever sealed a divine tool of the mountains.

Yao Qi said in fright, "Listen...listen to whom?"

Xi Ping said, Lancang's Sect Leader! He has already been destroyed, but your consciousness is still stuck to his Way of the Heart. The Way of the Heart must have something to say.

Yao Qi said, "I hardly understand the Southern He language, I don't think I'll..."

Xi Ping's note came flying out: Meditate!

His consciousness was connected to Yao Qi through the grit projection, which in itself gave him a strong influence over the will of the person whom the technique was being used on, and Yao Qi's cultivation was far below his. Yao Qi obeyed in spite of himself. His senses sealed, and all his distracting thoughts were swept away by the single qin note; in the blink of an eye, he entered meditation.

Xi Ping had never seen anyone meditate like this—Ziming-xiong didn't seem to be meditating; he seemed to have been clubbed unconscious.

He froze where he was, then realized that this was an "ingenious use" of the grit projection; he was immediately inspired. By this time his hands had nearly grown back. Once again assembling a general outline of himself inside the next life spiritual fish's mist, Xi Ping withdrew back to the Sword Slave's side and unstintingly blended the spiritual energy he had just assembled into his playing, exploding it in the Sword Slave's ears.

The Sword Slave's consciousness shook violently. Her half-transparent figure suddenly fell backward, breaking free of that tall man. There was a faint red light in her frightening eyes. Her heavy footsteps fell on the ground, and sword energy spread from her in all directions, blowing up Xi Ping's human form until all that remained of him was one hand.

Xi Ping said, Wait, senior, listen to me!

How could the Sword Slave understand these Wan musical embellishments? She only saw a hand like something out of a ghost story plucking a few intermittently visible qin strings. “What manner of villainous ghoul dares to scheme against me? Show yourself!”

Xi Ping’s vital qin had remained in Tao County supporting the Law Breaker, and the qin he carried with him was copied with the Discard the False and Keep the True book. When it came within Wanshuang’s sword energy, it was immediately obliterated.

And just then, yet another round of fire from the Luwu, obviously enfeebled, not only failed to push the Lovebird Sword Array away one bit, but instead seemed to enrage the divine tool of the mountains.

Outside the Lancang Spiritual Mountains, the great mountain array, which had been constantly spreading outward since the Lovebird Sword Array had appeared, repaired itself and lit up the peninsula.

Like a puppet on strings, the Queen Mother of the West slowly rose from amid the next life spiritual fish’s mist. The mist she pushed aside dispersed slightly.

The form of the man in front of the Sword Slave blurred. She unconsciously reached out for him, but they passed through each other. She suddenly came back to her senses. With a shout, she broke free of the next life mist. Wanshuang had already left its sheath—

CHAPTER 221 - A Life of Regret (33)

Utterly cold sword energy instantly swallowed the Queen Mother of the West in one gulp. Yang Wan seemed to be annihilated amid the age-old dream of restoring her nation.

But the divine tool of the mountains had already manifested; it had repaired the great array and no longer cared for the ruinously rash ascended spirit puppet.

With no one to control it, the Lovebird Sword Array set itself in motion. The chilly light of the array's main sword pierced the clouds. The terrifying array seemed to be inlaid along the edges of the thunderclouds, revolving along with the ghastly pale lightning flashes, scorning the human world.

On land, in the sea, every living creature sensed the murderous aura that had nearly flattened Xi Ping just now.

Everyone below a shed skin was an ant.

Amid the silence, the most authentic ninefold sword of Kunlun penetrated the Queen Mother of the West and struck the middle of the Lovebird Sword Array.

The Lovebird Sword Array swayed.

Inside the mist just now, what had that been?

Hallucination? Imagination? Or some new poisonous miasma that lowly Yang survivor had come up with?

The Sword Slave didn't know, and the only person who could explain it to her now hadn't yet regrown a mouth.

Prior to Zhi Xiu, Kunlun's Second Elder had been the youngest person in the world to become a shed skin, a man who had forged a solitary way of the sword amid the ninefold sword of Kunlun. People had once said that he would perhaps one day equal the Sword Ancestor.

The Sword Slave had thought before that there was something wrong with her shixiong's head. Everyone else said that the Second Elder was only trapped inside the Beijue Array, temporarily unable to leave; certainly no serious harm could come to so awesome a master. It was only that loose-tongued Xie Chu who was always saying that shifu was dead, just as if shifu being dead had some benefit for him. Surely it should have been the other way around? Even if the Sect Leader and the High Priest themselves had said that shifu was in fact dead, as long as they had seen no body, his disciples ought never to lose faith in their shifu being alive.

This devout belief wasn't concerned with the truth, and it didn't need proof. This was filial piety. A junior shouldn't have other ideas.

Besides, could the omniscient High Priest and Sect Leader have made a mistake? Would they deliberately conceal news of shifu's death?

But now, standing on the sea, with the icy mist from the other side of the Wangchuan curling around her and chilling her whole body, a thought appeared in her mind: Supposing that...Xie Chu was right?

As a student of the sword, Wu Lingxiao had entered the Disciple Hall when she was ten years old and entered the inner sect before she was fifteen. She had spent practically all her life in Kunlun.

The Second Elder was self-effacing to the point of coming across a little simple and taciturn. He had few students. Large numbers of sword cultivators set their minds on him every year and tried to pull in all kinds of connections. At the time, he had probably finally lost his patience with being asked by the Sect Leader when he would take another disciple, so he had yielded and pointed at random, saying, "Well, then I guess I'll have the best of this batch of students from the Disciple Hall." The upshot was that he had ended up with a half-grown little girl.

Wu Lingxiao hadn't even reached marriageable age then. The girls of the northern continent all seemed to develop late. Teacher and disciple had looked at each other in dismay. She might never forget Shizun's expression then—there had almost been a bit of terror amid his blankness.

Such a small living creature, and a girl at that; she hadn't even reached her full height! How was he supposed to raise her? The Second Elder was afraid lest he make some mistake and kill her, or feed her wrong and stunt her growth. He treated her practically with the greatest care, leading to endless ridicule, like a clumsy old father.

She had thought for a time that apart from the brother she had come hand-in-hand out of the womb with, the best person she had ever met was Shifu.

But one sixty year cycle later, because of a single sentence from this best of Shifus, her brother had been hanged in his courtyard, dying discontented.

Then there was Kunlun.

Though the sect had injured her, it had also given her her achievements. Every person to come out of the Disciple Hall took pride in being a "Kunlun sword cultivator."

Two hundred years later, she suspected that shifu's unknown fate was connected to the sect.

She was a person who sought purity and perfection, who thought that a fast sword could cut through everything. Yet she seemed fated to be pursued eternally by interwoven loves and hates that couldn't be unknotted.

The Sword Slave fixed her eyes on the Lovebird Sword Array suspended above the Lancang Mountains.

Supposing that what she had just seen hadn't been an illusion, then the Lancang Sect Leader's Way of the Heart ought to still be embedded there. Even if she died, she had to pry open the Lovebird Sword Array and have a look.

Moving at the same time as her was Xi Ping.

He had broken and reformed, reformed and broken. Now he was perhaps even a little used to it. Indifferent to further attacks, he chased after her, the speed with which the hidden bones regrew his body becoming faster and faster.

At first, his consciousness had been blown a hundred li away from land, then fluttered around like a kite for ages before finally managing to grow back a few finger bones. Now, after being smacked to bits by the Sword Slave, in hardly any time, he already had his vague outlines. By the time he returned to the peninsula, where the greatest danger lay, Xi Ping's hands had completely grown back.

The moment he landed, a pair of long, slender legs suddenly extended from his formless consciousness, narrowly managing to hold him up. Within ten steps, his meridians had practically finished linking up, and he could even sense his essence. After this dispersal and reassembly, his essence had increased by ten percent over his previous boundary, reaching the middle ascended spirit stage. And the two sword attacks that had smashed him to dust had entered his bones; when he used them again, they would be entirely his own "Anger Shifu to Death" sword attacks; and because those two sword attacks had broken him from the inside out, the third and fourth "Anger Shifu to Death" sword forms would be far handier than the others.

Before Xi Ping could go streaking, he cloaked himself in a camouflaging robe with a talisman and with another talisman summoned back Zhaoting and his mustard seed.

Next, all the flying goose machines on the Luwu ships received word from Tai Sui: "Cease fire! Leave!"

The Luwu immediately put their scant remaining spiritual stones into their protective arrays. Under the double impetus of mechanical power and spiritual energy, the big steamships of new Moon Plated Gold surged through the Grand Canal that was seething with spray.

The other ships realized what was happening and quickly followed suit, fleeing in all directions.

Xi Ping struck the water with a beam of spiritual energy, which spread like a big net, pointing the way for the wildly darting merchant ships, preventing them from crashing against each other in their haste. Close-knit sword energy hung at low altitude, blocking the fatal attacks dropping out of the sky.

In the sky, the Sword Slave was waging war against the Lovebird Sword Array. When she attacked, the Sword Slave had always acted as though there were no one else around; the Lovebird Sword Array was the only thing that remained in her eyes. This was after all a full moon grade divine tool of the mountains. Sword light tore at her body, revealing the bone jade within, carved all over with arrays and inscriptions. The bone jade was riddled with scars, just like the devastated Southern He Peninsula.

On the ground, Xi Ping would have loved nothing better than to seize this opportunity to pick up the whole Southern He Peninsula, people and all, roll it up like a rug, and toss it out of the way.

The Sword Slave, that sword maniac, cared for nothing. She was determined to pierce the Lovebird Sword Array, trying to reach in and grab its main sword.

Inside the sword array, the main sword was located at the crux of the array. How could it be grabbed just like that? The Lovebird Sword Array's sword energy, which had just been scattered in all directions, all pointed at her, wanting to teach a lesson to this junior who had the audacity to pick a fight with a full moon grade divine weapon.

A loud rumble. Xi Ping went numb all over; for an instant, he even thought that he had been struck dead by that divine tool.

Then, his newly grown cervical vertebrae cracked back into place, and his own skin covered those bones that were always trying to teach him how to become a god. Xi Ping's features were restored. His senses returned. He quickly raised his head and saw the Sword Slave's huge body suspended in the Lovebird Sword Array's sword light like a mote of dust.

But the next moment, a beam of frost abruptly flew through the sword light that was even more dazzling than a gold-smelting furnace; it shot toward the Lovebird Sword Array like a flash of lightning, knocking the big swords around the sword array off their original trajectories!

The Sword Slave's figure reappeared. Her skin and flesh was all gone now, her naked puppet body revealed in the sword light.

She was a monster held together with bone jade, spiritual stones, and a small quantity of human bone. This body had altogether forsaken a human appearance and lived only for the sword. The hunched shoulders were unusually broad, the eyeballs had vacated. The empty eye sockets were also carved of bone jade. At the outset, perhaps to save herself trouble, she hadn't made herself the curving brow ridge and eye sockets of an ordinary person. There were only flat, functional circles there.

The sharp gaze shooting out from within was still fixed on the array's main sword.

Where Wanshuang passed, the frosty wind of the utter north seemed to blow over the blistering hot Southern He Peninsula. That sword puppet became especially excited when facing a powerful enemy. A battle aura that made you shiver spread in all directions. Instantly, the menacing Lovebird Sword Array actually showed faint signs of flinching.

Fair enough. The Lovebird Sword Array's main sword was made from the Gold Sage, who legend had it was only a coward who had become a god because of a sword.

Xi Ping suddenly remembered how, long ago, the ignorant Xi Yue had shown him a book, which had described "sword-bearing half-puppets"; it had said that they "could travel a thousand li in one day, know no weariness, go until the last gasp and fight the enemy without end."

He had only been a shallow youth then. He had taken one glance and been overwhelmed by ugliness, then impatiently driven Xi Yue off.

But now, witnessing the Sword Slave herself, he had finally discovered that judgments of beauty and ugliness were so much groundless and narrow-minded self-importance; what they revealed were only one's own desires and fears. For a person who frightened others, her ugliness was a great part of her.

The Sword Slave gave a bellow. Wanshuang once again slashed at the Lovebird Sword Array.

Xi Ping anticipated that this blow would be earthshaking. He was about to shove a fleet of ships into the South Sea when, in a flash, his spiritual sense suddenly gave him a warning. Out of the corner of his eye, Xi Ping glimpsed cold light rising over the sea to the west.

The sword array and Wanshuang were locked in close combat. In a moment of desperation, Xi Ping sent a handful of papermen flying into midair to block the sword energy leaking through. At the same time, it was as if a ghost out for vengeance had blown on the back of his neck. All the hairs there stood up one by one. Zhaoting trembled incessantly in his hand.

That was moonlight—not from the moon in the sky, but from the Silver Moon.

“Look out!”

Before his voice could pierce the grit flying through the air, Xuanwu had already glimpsed from a distance the half-immortal ships moving unusually fast on the peninsula and the South Sea.

He lifted his chin slightly and indifferently fixed a look on the Sword Slave tied up in battle with the Lovebird Sword Array. “Evil cultivator.”

As he spoke, the Silver Moon’s perilous light fell.

Oh no!

Just then, Zhaoting slipped out of Xi Ping's hand.

Xi Ping automatically made a grab and couldn't hold onto it.

He abruptly raised his head. A beam of utterly chill sword light was reflected in his eyes. It instantly spilled over the South Sea.

The seawater rose sharply. Where the sword light passed, countless icebergs rose out of nowhere and grotesquely reflected the Silver Moon's light.

But the icebergs weren't entirely transparent. Inside them were frozen sword cuts, one after another, like whirlpools, layer upon layer of them, destroying or cutting down the Silver Moon's light; not a sliver of it leaked onto the sea or the ground.

Xi Ping almost swayed.

Looking in the direction of Zhaoting's sword light, he saw a man dressed in a light grey scholar's robe come down from the clouds and salute Xuanwu from a distance. "Elder Xuanwu, the Xuanyin Mountains' southern mines are evacuating miners and citizens residing abroad. The cultivators on those ships are subordinates of the Kaiming Department, not evil cultivators. Please let them pass."

Xi Ping was at the estuary, with countless icebergs firmly separating him from Xuanwu.

Zhi Xiu landed lightly on the tip of an iceberg very close to him. He didn't turn his head. With the shard of Zhaoting, he could pinpoint Xi Ping's location. Behind his back, his hands tapped now and again on Zhaoting's sheath.

An ascended spirit like Xi Ping, inclined to attach his spiritual sense to his hearing, could if he so wished hear a little fish burp a hundred li away from the middle of a hurricane.

He could hear that shifu was tapping out tapped sweet notes—not the mismatched old edition from back at the Latent Cultivation Temple; he had actually learned the newest version. Leave here, don't worry about any of it.

Xi Ping closed his eyes. A sad and bitter helpless smile appeared on his face.

He was accustomed to making himself master of a situation. As soon as he saw this attitude, he understood what had happened.

When the upgraded immortal tools had unexpectedly made their appearance in Southern He, after the shock, Wangge Luobao must have given a push from behind, immediately transmitting the news all over the world.

Forget about everyone else—Kunlun's Sect Leader had a heart demon seed growing in his head and would certainly have wanted to bury the Sword Slave in Southern He and take back Wanshuang. On the other hand, because of the appearance of spirit-conducting gold in Southern He, he would also have told Lingyun and Sanyue to come with him.

And as Chu and Shu would see it, with all three of Kunlun's shed skins in Southern He, who wouldn't be afraid?

They had to come, of course, but Xuanwu and Lingyun's people were each sure to bring their divine tools—Xuanwu was already here; Lingyun and Kunlun were further away, so they were probably a step behind.

The Silver Moon, the Cauldron of Nine Dragons, and the Lovebird Sword Array would all be assembled here; adding in Kunlun and the Sword Slave on guard against each other, all these sides that each had their own axe to grind would be locked in a to-and-fro struggle, and they wouldn't yet dare to rush at Southern Wan's interior with its unplumbed depths.

But Zhi Xiu had come.

That crow's mouth of the Dignitary of Fate Elder's had spoken a prophecy—he would be censured by all.

Such an obvious thing—did he really not understand? Hadn't they agreed that he could under no circumstances get mixed up in the Southern He business?

If Tai Sui were so easy to kill, he'd have been crushed to dust by the spiritual mountains at the bottom of the sea eight hundred years ago! Zhi Xiu coming here was as superfluous as Zhaoting with its "fear of heights."

How could there be such a worrisome shifu in the world?

Zhi Xiu tapped on the sheath again: Do as you're told.

His rebellious disciple didn't move. Perhaps he didn't know those words.

Zhi Xiu took a deep breath. I'm already here, what else can I do? I can't beat them to begin with. Don't distract me.

As expected, these words jabbed Xi Ping in his weak spot. The next moment, Zhi Xiu sensed the shard of Zhaoting moving quickly from where it had been, landing under the cover of the icebergs on a ship that had fled far away... The aura he sensed was different than usual; it must be that the hidden bones hadn't entirely grown back yet.

Zhi Xiu's fingers trembled slightly as they stroked Zhaoting's sheath. He sighed to himself. Being crushed to dust at every step—why did he have to walk such a road?

Then he stopped worrying and raised his head to look at Xuanwu, not far from him.

This was Xuanwu's first time publicly revealing the face under his paper mask. He was followed by the silver-colored "moon," like Chang'e. White as the whitest snow, he hung in midair, looking Zhi Xiu up and down.

"Zhi...Jingzhai. Descendant of an illustrious family. Did not go through a proper disciple selection at the outset but entered Xuanyin's inner sect because an exception was made, taken as a direct disciple by one of Xuanyin's four highest managers—his only direct disciple. Progress from ascended spirit to shed skin has been unprecedented and unequalled in speed." With the slightly stiff accent peculiar to the Chu, he enunciated each word of the Wan language distinctly. "Who could hear this and not say that you are a perfect man?"

Zhi Xiu calmly said, “There is no such thing as a perfect man. Elder Xuanwu praises me too highly.”

“But heaven has already given you such tender praise—all of you,” Xuanwu said softly. “Yet Your Excellency was unable to appreciate the favor. You grew an evil tree in the spiritual mountains, insulted your teacher and besmirched your ancestors—”

No sooner had Xuanwu spoken than there came the sound of a crash. The enormous form of a moon appeared on the South Sea and melted all the icebergs in sight in the blink of an eye.

Right now, Wei Chengxiang was keeping an eye out in all directions. Running the risk of being chopped to mincemeat by the masters, she had expanded her consciousness to its widest amid the wind of knives and rain of swords, blazing a trail for the Luwu.

Two human figures suddenly landed in front of her, moving even faster than her consciousness.

Wei Chengxiang instinctively backed up three chi before getting a clear look at the newcomers. She froze. “You...”

In front of her were two little pretty boy Xi Pings, not wearing any kind of spiritual image mask—and one of them was even paler than the other.

The paler of the two pushed the other Xi Ping toward her. “A paperman, take him away for me.”

Wei Chengxiang said, “What?”

Papermen were only somewhat useful with a consciousness injected into them. Where was Xi Ping going to find the surplus strength to split his concentration?

Xi Ping reached out a hand to touch the paperman’s head, which turned transparent. Wei Chengxiang found to her astonishment that the paperman had a fragment of a spirit, with the shard of a sword suspended on it. “This is...”

“This is the most important part of me,” Xi Ping said seriously. “I’m handing it over to you. Take it away for me along with these people... A-Xiang, you’re the most reliable friend I’ve ever had.”

Before he had even finished speaking, he was gone, vanished into a shadow.

The bone-splitting talisman san-ge had left him with had given him a bit of surplus power, making him temporarily capable of cutting parts off himself.

Many thanks to the Lovebird Sword Array for smashing him up to the middle ascended spirit stage—he had put that cultivation level to use. He could now endure cutting off a tip of his spirit and sneak back to find his scoundrel shifu, still willful even at his age.

CHAPTER 222 - A Life of Regret (34)

A vital power was a thing inextricably linked to the “way” that a cultivator walked.

For a cultivator from the spiritual mountains’ orthodoxy, however useless that person might be, their power would still be honest and aboveboard. When they came to blows, there would be a grand spectacle of real weapons. Those belonging to unorthodox ways were different. With thanks to Yu Chang-xiong, that Discard the False and Keep the True book ought to have been called An All-inclusive Aid to Petty Pilfering instead; nothing could have been more useful in this instance.

Xi Ping handed over the paperman and the shard of Zhaoting to Wei Chengxiang to take away and passed through the shadows of ships and countless people, as collected as if he had just downed several jars of mind calming pills.

Even though his cultivation had jumped a grade, he still had no standing to get mixed up in a battle of shed skin and full moon grade—never mind a middle stage ascended spirit, with the fighting capabilities of those present, even an individually useless shed skin who showed up would have to stand aside.

This time, he had come to be a shadow hidden in the dark.

Xi Ping guessed that Xuanwu, first, didn't know about the rift between Kunlun and the Sword Slave, and, second, hadn't expected his shifu to come; otherwise, that White Hair wouldn't have come so early. There wasn't a pig-headed idiot in the world who would throw himself head-on at a sword cultivator's weapon.

Though that old codger was a master, second in Sanyue's standing only to Xiang Rong, and, objectively, his cultivation was certainly considerably higher than that of a sword cultivator who had just become a shed skin, Sanyue's superiority lay in talismans, arrays, and inscriptions. Of these, arrays and inscriptions both needed prior arrangement; it was very hard to deploy an array in the heat of battle facing a powerful opponent at an away game. And while talismans came in all kinds of flashy varieties, in front of a cultivator of the same grade, their destructive power would unavoidably be somewhat inferior. A close encounter with a sword cultivator, capable of overcoming the skill of ten with the strength of one, would put Xuanwu in a comparatively weak position; he would only be able to give play to between sixty and seventy percent of his cultivation.

It was only that Xuanwu had the Silver Moon, while Zhi Xiu still had to mind the mortals and low level cultivators who hadn't yet had time to evacuate.

Luckily, Xuanwu judged others against himself.

Dongheng's Sanyue had always thought that as long as the lofty immortal mountains were stable and capable of maintaining order, mortals would naturally find a means of subsistence. The orthodoxy of the immortal mountains did indeed care for the people, just as a farm protected the animals in its enclosures with utmost care; but it would have been absolutely preposterous for the farmers to die for their animals.

Xuanwu was using mortals to tie down Zhi Xiu, but from the bottom of his heart he didn't believe that there was anything very important about mortals, so he wasn't going to go out of his way to mete out heavy punishment against the merchant ships that were everywhere. He was going to keep within "proper limits," refrain from thoroughly enraging the sword cultivator in front of him, leave those worthless "hostages" alone and go at him with the Silver Moon.

Therefore, both of these shed skin masters wanted to stall: Zhi Xiu wanted to stall the Silver Moon, let his disciple get people away from the battlefield as much as possible; Xuanwu wanted to stall until Kunlun and Lingyun arrived.

The most ideal course of events would be to dispose of the Lovebird Sword Array before the others showed up, release the Sword Slave, and convince Wanshuang to join hands with Zhaoting to get rid of Xuanwu. This way, when the Kunlun sword cultivators came, Zhi Xiu and the Sword Slave could focus entirely on them.

With such a major commotion in another country, both shed skin sword cultivators from Kunlun were probably coming. Two against two—the Sword Slave and Zhi Xiu’s ages added together didn’t come to a scrap of the others’, and there were many aspects in which they would be unable to best them. Luckily, the Sect Leader was carrying the heart demon seed sange planted on him; there was still a chance.

Finally, there were the Lingyun Mountains.

All of their shed skins that might come were beast-taming cultivators, with mediocre fighting skills and their immortal mountains cut down by half. How much impact they had on the battle would hinge on other aspects.

Lingyun’s Sect Leader wasn’t like Xuanwu, who urgently wanted to prove something; he would probably be the least proactive in coming.

The way of beast-taming had its own methods. There were plenty of things on land and in the sea that could act as their spies. Xi Ping thought that if he were Lingyun's Sect Leader, sensing the commotion on the Southern He Peninsula, he certainly wouldn't rashly show his face. He would cautiously observe the battle from the sidelines and come out to deliver a fatal blow when it was mostly settled, win himself some sense of presence and right to speak...and if things went badly, he would simply run off and pretend he hadn't come—that would of course be for the best.

But Xi Ping didn't dare to rely on the cards dealt by fate.

Because the greater likelihood was: the half-immortal Yao Qi would have no way to communicate with the Lancang Sect Leader's Way of the Heart, the Sword Slave would be locked in a stalemate with the Lovebird Sword Array, Kunlun's two great sword cultivators would descend from the sky and take a stab at the Sword Slave's completely undefended back, getting rid of Wanshuang first of all. Once Zhaoting was suppressed by Kunlun's ninefold sword, Xuanwu and the Silver Moon's might would be far greater than the dribble it was now; when the time came, the Cauldron of Nine Dragons hiding in the shadows would be delighted to come add some finishing touches.

The shed skin masters of three mountains, the divine tools of three mountains; even the Southern Sage couldn't have escaped if he had come.

Apart from this, there was also an even more dangerous person here.

Wangge Luobao was hidden inside a clamshell on the seabed. He narrowed his eyes. The remnants of a beam of sword energy came to the seabed and scraped the clamshell. Cold sword aura seeped into the clamshell.

Spirit-conducting gold had emerged, and the three nations had reacted quickly, far surpassing his expectations. For the sake of a crowd of half-immortal bandits, they had dispatched so many divine tools. There must be some inside story here unknown to him.

He could leave that aside for now, quietly observe the changing situation from the sidelines, but...

Wangge Luobao reached out and lightly brushed a fingertip over the sword mark. A cut immediately opened on his finger.

He wiped away the blood. "Zhaoting has actually come."

This Sword of the South had just become a shed skin. If he hadn't lost his mind and gone thoroughly insane, he shouldn't have come in person to tread in the muddy waters here. But he had shown himself on such a grand scale, meeting the Silver Moon in battle upon first appearing. He was clearly drawing fire, and that could only be for the sake of...

Wangge Luobao slowly pressed on his temples, a pained expression finally appearing on his face. “It’s really no easy matter to get rid of you, Tai Sui.”

He was plainly only a “juvenile” ascended spirit, but with this successor, the undying bones were ten thousand times harder to deal with than when they had belonged to Yuan Hui, the original himself.

Where on earth had the ungovernable way dug up this successor?

Of course the undying bones weren’t without weak points. If other parts broke, they could be recreated, but if the hidden bones “died,” then it was all over. Yuan Hui’s hidden bones had been his own skeleton. When they were cut clean in half, he died.

But looking at all of this “Tai Sui”’s miracles in recent years, his hidden bones must be attached to his consciousness. Hidden bones attached his consciousness, added to the reincarnation wood, through which he could travel at will—the style of the undying bones had instantly gone from indomitable to weird and unknowable.

And as Wangge Luobao saw it, this was simply unbelievable.

At the moment of death and without a Way of the Heart, not to be engulfed by the pain and fear of death, to maintain a powerful will to live and remember his own origins—surely that must take a heart like iron and stone?

All right, it was one thing for his consciousness to become increasingly concentrated as his cultivation became higher, but Wangge Luobao couldn't understand how he had made it past the open-eyed boundary.

A mortal's consciousness was weaker than floating dust. How could a person reputed to be a young master who had grown up in Jinping have remained lucid under those circumstances?

Unless he was one of those one in a trillion pigheaded people. But those people were all firm and unyielding, their weak points very obvious; they couldn't very well be as slippery as this Tai Sui.

It had already been so hard to block Tai Sui's connection to his accompanying plant. If he let him escape from here, he would be his arch nemesis for life.

I can't let him leave here, Wangge Luobao thought.

Meanwhile, Xi Ping, like Wangge Luobao, was soaking in the South Sea, with the same thought running through his head: Where is that jerk hiding?

The shed skins clashed beneath daylight and sword light, and the two neither quite evil nor quite orthodox ascended spirits each sank into the shadows.

Under the circumstances, neither of them dared to send his consciousness out to sweep at random. Wangge Luobao considered and sliced open his palm, but the blood from the wound didn't flow down. The blood droplets floated up, sketching a miniature array.

This array was only the size of his palm, but it seemed to have emptied out the better half of his essence. All the color instantly drained from Wangge Luobao's face. He shook all over. Next, countless eyes appeared in the array, the compound eyes of insects, the vertical pupils of snakes, the cat eyes of big beasts, the lidless eyes of fish... Not one of them belonged to a human, anyway.

After a long moment, when he could hardly remain kneeling, the array fixed on the eyes of a seabird. The seabird's line of sight quickly slipped over a Luwu merchant ship; on its deck were Wei Chengxiang and two Tai Suis.

Wangge Luobao stopped that image and opened his eyes from behind the array. Staring fixedly at Xi Ping's mouth, he read the instructions he had given Wei Chengxiang.

“I’ve caught you by the tail... It turns out you’re still here courting death. Then I can relax.”

Wangge Luobao dispersed the array and took out his flute. A sound inaudible to human ears diffused from the seabed.

In the slightly murky water, a line of algae plastered itself unnoticed onto the hull of the steamship Wei Chengxiang was on. A small quantity followed the slashing spray, sticking to the deck and hold of the ship, keeping an eye on the paperman sitting blankly in the hold.

With his connection to the reincarnation wood severed, this paperman was probably Tai Sui’s only channel of communication with his Luwu lackeys.

As expected, shortly, the paperman stood up, movements not very coordinated, and walked over to the flying goose machine to send a message to Tao County.

Tao County’s Zhao Qindan received the note, and within the time it takes to drink a cup of tea had the outlines of a plan.

Not long after, the Tao World Record, just about to go to print, received a notice to insert a news item at the last moment. It couldn’t be added to the printer's block anymore, so they simply printed it on a single sheet, attaching it to the main paper as a freebie.

What is said was: Sanyue's Elder Xuanwu appeared in the South Sea along with the Silver Moon and was ambushed in a joint attack by Zhaoting and Wanshuang; signs point to disaster.

Zhaoting and Wanshuang hadn't joined forces yet, but that was nothing to worry about. Being a little early didn't count as lying. Though Xuanwu was still hale and hearty, that wouldn't hinder everyone from laying a curse on him.

Since the Tao World Record had first published the photo of Northern Li seizing the southern mines, then "carelessly" revealed the recording of Yu Chang, if they didn't have the eyes of the whole world, at least all of Western Chu was watching them.

Because of that recording, there had been infighting among the rebel warlords, and the connections Yu Chang had taken great pains to build up over the course of eight years had been nearly destroyed in an instant. And before Xuanwu had left, because the Silver Moon had recognized him as its master, the great array had been restored and the disordered spiritual energy of the Sanyue Mountains had suddenly stabilized. Dongheng City's sealed city gates opened. Inner sect cultivators turned out in full force, menacingly bringing down their attacks in all directions.

All the local warlords—including even Yu Chang—had thought despairingly that the game was as good as lost.

Now they were suddenly informed that Xuanwu had left the Sanyue Mountains with the Silver Moon, and there was a good chance that he would die out there!

This was a glimmer of hope appearing at the darkest hour, just like in a novel.

Sanyue had no shed skins apart from Xuanwu now. While the remaining ascended spirits had been forced by Xuanwu to work together, they clearly weren't of one mind. No wonder they were being so heavy handed about "putting down bandits"; it was all empty bluster.

There was no lack of middle stage established foundations or even near-ascended spirit masters among the chief offerings of the rebel warlords, and they were numerous.

So large a range of spiritual mountains, a source of spiritual stones that would endure throughout the ages, right before their eyes...

Greed and ecstasy brought the infighting among the offerings to a stop. Regardless of what came after, they would snatch now and discuss later. So from each side and all points, as if they had taken a strengthening potion, they swarmed like bees upon Sanyue's great array!

At the same time, Xu Rucheng and the other Luwu concealed on Sanyue's West Peak also received word from colleagues in Tao County. They quietly opened a door from the inside and led the way, helping things along.

The great mountain array was tightly linked to the divine tool of the mountains. As soon as there was turbulence in the Sanyue Mountain Range, the Silver Moon immediately became unstable.

Xuanwu instantly sensed the tumult back home and cursed silently—in fact, before coming here, he hadn't expected Zhi Xiu to appear in the South Sea.

Moreover, while other shed skins reached their positions by obeying the will of heaven, this Sword of the South had cut through the clouds of tribulation on the snow-capped mountain, tearing down a barrier. Like Qiu Sha before him, the first person to tear apart a “heavenly commandment” was far more doughty than the average early stage shed skin.

Xuanwu, who hadn't anticipated any of this, was actually finding himself flustered by this puny junior. Zhaoting suppressed the Silver Moon's light, and Xuanwu was pushed by the sky-blotting sword energy against the Lancang Mountains, smashing into the newly activated great mountain array.

The Lovebird Sword Array also trembled at this. The Sword Slave seized the opportunity to chop off three of the sword array's auxiliary swords. The irresistible Wanshuang aimed at the main sword.

The Lovebird Sword Array's main sword let out what was nearly a wail. Twenty percent of the inscriptions on the sword, which were impossible to look at directly, broke. Its sword light suddenly dimmed. The Sword Slave froze. There was a cloudy and dim "stone" embedded in the main sword, totally at odds with the aura of the whole sword array... Just as she had seen in the "illusion," it was the Lancang Sect Leader's Way of the Heart.

It was true. Before his death, her shifu really had reached the Lancang Mountains ahead of everyone else and with his own eyes witnessed Lancang's Sect Leader seal the divine tool of the mountains.

The Sect Leader and High Priest holding their tongues, her shixiong's unusual certainty and stubbornness, herself gouging out her flesh and picking out her bones, the unusual expression that had flickered over the Sect Leader's face the moment she had taken up Wanshuang, the veiled hints of Xie Chu and the ascended spirit little devil from Xuanyin...

The intense counterattack of the Lovebird Sword Array's main sword nearly scraped off the very last of her flesh and blood. The Sword Slave abruptly raised her head and fixed her eyes on the main sword, which was repairing itself. Wanshuang hit the whole Lancang Mountain Range like a thunderbolt.

Cuts several zhang deep fell one after another on the mountains.

How much filth were these millennia-old spiritual mountains sitting on top of?!

The full moon grade divine weapon was struck by the foremost sword in the world and retreated over and over in defeat. The auxiliary swords surrounding the sword array fell one by one.

This commotion made Zhi Xiu and Xuanwu both involuntarily divide their attention. Wangge Luobao's vision went dark—the spiritual beasts near the Lancang Mountains had been wiped out by the aftereffects of the sword wind. His “spies” were gone.

Tai Sui had used Western Chu's domestic turbulence to curb the Silver Moon, and here, as if it were part of a pattern, had taken advantage of the stalemate between the Lovebird Sword Array and the Sword Slave to damage Lancang's great mountain array!

Chief Offering Yu really was a big magical brick. In this chaos, he was being picked up and hurled by each side, back and forth, leaving a hole wherever he fell.

There had to be some hidden story behind the Sword Slave's wild attacks on the Lovebird Sword Array. Wangge Luobao's heart sank slightly. He had already guessed by now that there must be discord between Kunlun and the Sword Slave...and it wasn't what he had guessed—not at the level of an internal power struggle within the sect.

Looking at it now, it didn't seem impossible that Wanshuang and Zhaoting would join forces.

With a little thought, Wangge Luobao understood Xi Ping's line of thinking—Xuanwu was eager to prove to Sanyue that he was orthodox; he had advanced prematurely, creating a fatal time difference. Tai Sui wanted to clean up the scene as much as possible before the great swords of Northern Li's shed skins came. Once Wanshuang and Zhaoting joined forces, adding in an arrow shot from behind by the undying bones' successor, victory and defeat would be up in the air.

“You can't be allowed to have it your way.”

Wangge Luobao turned and looked at the mustard seed he carried with him—inside the mustard seed were the Miah cultivators he had scooped up when the next life spiritual fish had died.

Shut up inside the mustard seed, the Miah cultivators only remembered that when that suffocating sword slash had come their way, their clan leader had protected them without hesitation, and there had been no news of him since.

They didn't know what had happened outside. They were restless with anxiety when a person covered in blood suddenly fell into the mustard seed.

“Clan leader!”

The Miah cultivators turned pale with fright and threw themselves at him. Wangge Luobao opened his mouth to speak, but his lungs were pierced. He choked on his own blood and went to his knees. On his chest was a deep cut that went down to the bone.

The Miah cultivators knelt, their eyes brimming with tears.

“My essence has been used up, the Queen Mother of the West...cough...the Queen Mother of the West and Lord Guang’an are dead...” Wangge Luobao spoke in a low voice, as if “on his last gasp,” explaining the situation outside. He seemed to be dying. He clutched a Miah clansman’s sleeve tightly, “on the point of death,” and gave him his vital weapon—a beast-taming flute. “Take, take it... I...I’m sorry... Our kinsmen on the Three Islands are still hoping, our brothers dead in battle are still watching us...”

He “laboriously” held out until he had passed along everything that ought to be passed along—certainly nothing like a story in a novel, where a person would whimper for ages without spitting out the name of their killer—then finally “fainted dead away” in peace.

The stupid Miah clan members burst into tragic and moving tears, as if prematurely wailing over their clan leader’s death.

Because the mustard seed’s owner was “gravely injured,” the originally sealed mustard seed space could be entered and exited at will now. The Miah cultivators, whose feelings were collectively aroused, decided on the spot to leave a few people to take care of their clan leader while the rest would risk death to race to the Lancang Mountains and fetch spiritual stones.

An ascended spirit whose essence had been exhausted needed a large quantity of spiritual stones to be able to heal. Paying such a high price, they certainly couldn't return empty-handed.

Enormous spiritual beasts moved in single file along the seabed. The Miah cultivators dashing on without regard for their safety took their clan leader's vital weapon, charging toward the feet of the Lancang Spiritual Mountains.

In fact, the Cauldron of Nine Dragons could have controlled the situation at present, but Wangge Luobao understood Lingyun's Xiuyi coward; until Kunlun's sword cultivators had settled the big picture, he wouldn't show his face.

The Miah surging onto the shore would head for the place where the great mountain array was damaged and run right into Tai Sui, who was up to his little tricks. And among the skilled Miah that Wangge Luobao had brought with him, a very large portion came from Lingyun's Dragon Subduing Knights. The conflict and clash between the two clans had escalated at lightning speed. Many people's disciple name plates in Lingyun's outer sect had yet to be removed. Normally, with national borders in the way, it would be one thing, but if a Lingyun master was already nearby, if any of the people those name plates belonged to died, he would notice immediately.

Wangge Luobao was the god of the Miah, the root of Southern Shu's civil strife. Once the Cauldron of Nine Dragons caught a trace of him, it certainly couldn't bear to hole up. It would immediately be drawn to the feet of the Lancang Mountains.

That teacher and disciple pair from Flying Jade Peak really were devoted to each other, so...while being attacked from both sides by the Silver Moon and the Cauldron of Nine Dragons, could Zhaoting protect his frighteningly destructive disciple?

The Miah cultivators whose blood had gone to their heads reached the peninsula in an instant. They switched to amphibious spiritual beasts and continued their dash. No one noticed when one of the waking dragons that had carried them to shore gave an unnatural shake, then sank into the water in pursuit of a curled up shadow.

There was a distant voice inside the shadow. The waking dragon couldn't understand it, but for some reason, it worked out what it meant.

"You must return to your master," that voice urged. "Protect your master."

The bewildered spiritual beast wagged its tail, left its team, and dove toward the depths of the sea.

The grit projection couldn't overcome an ascended spirit beast-taming cultivator and give a spiritual beast reared by another direct orders to do something.

Fortunately, "return to your master" was itself an order that spiritual beasts frequently received.

CHAPTER 223 - A Life of Regret (35)

The waking dragon was one of Shu's Three Islands' sacred beasts, a king in the water, with a special internal spiritual energy pump that let it move freely back and forth between the deep sea and the shallows without being crushed by water pressure. When its body turned into a rainbow, it could move instantaneously.

In the blink of an eye, it was a hundred li away, diving right into an array formation deep in the sea.

This was an array formation full of the characteristic style of the Miah, large and concealed, like a huge beast-catching net. Apart from spiritual beasts reared by the Miah, nothing else could find this place.

The arrays were like transparent passageways in the water, which only manifested when spiritual beasts and cultivators passed through them. Countless arrays were floating there, overlapping, so it was impossible to see what was what—especially since that waking dragon didn't go right through the arrays but jumped from point to point, moving instantaneously... By the time a cultivator's spiritual sense was touched, it was already too late.

Before Xi Ping, who was in the waking dragon's shadow, could finish identifying the first array, his spine suddenly went cold. From the shadow, he shouted resolutely to the big animal, “Stop! Stop it!”

There was no “seeming” about it—this array formation really was a beast-catching net!

The waking dragon’s frantic long body was like an insect that had crashed headfirst into a spiderweb, then rolled around in it several times!

Next, the waking dragon turned into foam, and its shadow disappeared. Xi Ping, hidden in the spiritual beast’s shadow, was firmly trapped among the array formation pressing toward him from all sides. It was as if there were stones tied to his whole body; he was rapidly pulled to the bottom of the sea —

Not good. This was a trap!

In a moment of desperation, qin strings flew from Xi Ping’s hand, and a beam of sword energy shot out. But the instant his fingers touched the Tai Sui Qin, he knew he had made another mistake. The arrays enveloping him turned in a half-circle, like the constellations revolving, rebounding all the sword energy back at him.

Xi Ping narrowly managed to dodge, almost getting a lock of hair chopped off. An invisible array seized this moment to brand itself onto his fingers and instantly climbed all over his body. A white sheen like a pearl's appeared on Xi Ping's body. He went rigid, like a puppet fixed in amber, unable to move a muscle.

The spiritual threads of the array twined around every strand of his hair. The milky white radiance covering him lit up the dark sea depths, where even the fish and shrimp had vanished.

Just then, a large air bubble appeared in the seawater next to him. It refracted the white light that passed through it into all colors. The body of the waking dragon with its rich play of color took shape once again. From its giant python-like big head shot a rather cheerful gaze...a human gaze.

The waking dragon opened its mouth. Its long tongue nearly poked Xi Ping's face. It spoke in a human language: "Fellow Cultivator Tai Sui."

Xi Ping wanted to answer, but the arrays holding him flickered; even his tongue was immobilized.

"If I were you," said the waking dragon, unhurriedly circling him, "I would think carefully before using a borrowed power. After all, Yu Chang-xiong was also once my ally. We're all familiar with his methods."

Xi Ping: "..."

That Centipede Yu had a foot on eight different boats.

“Let’s both put our cards on the table. Even if you sincerely wanted to destroy the Lancang Mountains’ great array, you still wouldn’t have been unable to work out that I would be waiting on the sidelines. You wouldn’t have acted on such a grand scale, and you certainly wouldn’t have chosen to announce yourself in Western Chu. So it must have been...how do you say it in Wan? Oh, ‘giving someone a taste of his own medicine,’” Wangge Luobao said through the waking dragon. “All the clansmen I brought with me have at least established foundation level cultivation, and they’re indignant now. It wouldn’t be so easy to make them turn around. After all, the ‘grit projection’ is of reduced value in your hands. So I guessed that you wouldn’t use people. I’ve finally managed to invite you over.”

Xi Ping’s shortcomings were very obvious. He had no firm foundation in talismans, arrays, and inscriptions. His cultivation level had spurted up too quickly. Unlike others, he hadn’t experienced hundreds of years of accumulation and trial by fire. Though he was very skilled in petty pilfering techniques learned from black markets everywhere, how many ascended spirits could you meet on the black market in a few years? Encountering a cultivator of the same level or higher, he had only a few moves at his disposal. If his opponent set their mind on researching him, they would even be able to figure out what move he would use.

“You really are much harder to handle than Yuan Hui.” Having said this, Wangge Luobao saw Xi Ping’s expression change slightly. As if he could read minds, he laughed. “Don’t look at me like that. I was born less than three hundred years ago. I didn’t have the privilege of knowing that ancient demonic god even older than the spiritual mountains. It’s only that I inherited my sect founder’s Way of the Heart and understand a little more than others.”

As I thought, Xi Ping said to himself. It could have been said that he and Wangge Luobao had neither past resentments nor recent grievances between them. Though he had indeed disturbed his plans in the South Sea, looking at Wangge Luobao’s actions in the aftermath, he felt that this Miah-Xiuyi mixed blood man hadn’t actually been focused on the South Sea Hidden Realm at the time; instead, he had been focused on usurping authority over the Miah clan, provoking internal strife, and freeing himself of Zhuoming while he was at it.

The odd-eyed man had even set aside past grudges to team up with Yu the Great Hole-maker, who had changed sides right before the battle.

Wangge Luobao’s incessant scheming and determination to make trouble for him wasn’t aimed at Xi Ping himself but at the hidden bones he carried.

And to hear him talk, this targeting must have started in the time of Ancestor Tianbo.

Xi Ping quickly recalled the information the Luwu had obtained.

It was said that Wangge Luobao had inherited Ancestor Tianbo's Way of the Heart. This was very special—while the disciples of the founders of the other spiritual mountains, hindered by the prevailing ideological trends of their generation, hadn't directly accepted their shizuns' Ways of the Heart at face value, they had still practically all used them as reference. The Ways of the Heart of the full moon sages had all been inherited and preserved in greater or lesser part, whether directly or indirectly. Only Lingyun's Ancestor Tianbo had merely given instruction without passing on his way, keeping his Way of the Heart a closely guarded secret even from his direct disciples. On departing the mortal world, he had left behind a beast-taming flute bearing his Way of the Heart; no one who wasn't of mixed Xiuyi and Miah blood could approach it.

In the early years, Lingyun had selected quite a few people of mixed Xiuyi and Miah blood from noble families. No matter how strong their spiritual sense or how good their constitution, not one of them had been able to inherit Ancestor Tianbo's Way of the Heart. It was considered getting off easy if those mixed-blood disciples were disoriented and amnesiac upon waking up, spending the next year or so in a fog; in the most severe cases, they might explode on the spot. Bit by bit, people had stopped daring to touch it.

In modern times, there had been fewer and fewer mixed blood people among the noble families. If there happened to be one from time to time, they would most likely be an illegitimate child born to a mistress, not qualified to enter Lingyun's Grand Selection. Ancestor Tianbo's Way of the Heart had quietly guarded the Lingyun Mountains from beginning to end. In over a thousand years, Wangge Luobao was the first to get a glimpse of its reality.

Why was Ancestor Tianbo's Way of the Heart so picky? It couldn't be that it required its inheritor to have mismatched eyes, could it?

And why would they target the ungovernable way? Even if there had been a grudge back then, he had never heard of anyone's Way of the Heart passing along even a personal grudge from eighteen hundred years back.

Unless Tianbo's Way of the Heart was in conflict with the ungovernable way, in conflict to the point of being unable to live under the same sky.

But the ungovernable way had no Way of the Heart. It was the most solitary way in the world; with it, you couldn't even have a debate of Ways of the Heart. Its only special feature lay in the fact that no matter what truth a person beheld, there was still no Way of the Heart to shatter.

The waking dragon's big head drew close to him. As if afraid that his voice would get out, Wangge Luobao spoke into his ear as quietly as a mosquito. "For example, you and I both know that the three thousand paths of the Great Way are only a fantasy. We struggle bitterly seeking a Way of the Heart, then we rear it, refine it, and in the end serve up our body to it. When we are dead, our essence returns to the universe, but the Way of the Heart persists forever."

The corner of Xi Ping's eye twitched, his pupils suddenly growing large in the depths of the sea.

Wangge Luobao let out a sigh that was almost a moan. "I've finally... spoken it aloud."

These matters that heavenly commandments kept from being spoken couldn't be revealed to those who didn't know them. The words could only be spoken when both the speaker and the listener were well aware, and there were no third-party ears around.

As if he had seen a ghost, Xi Ping stared at the waking dragon in front of him.

When even the Southern Sage had birthed a heart demon, when the Dignitary of Rule High Elder's Way of the Heart had shattered as soon as he had taken a glance into the Territory Map, why had Wangge Luobao and Tianbo before him been all right?

Why was there someone who knew perfectly well what a Way of the Heart was but had still accepted one and established a foundation, had still jumped further in, could still make sense?

“Because even a monstrous lie has a creator, little Shiyong,” Wangge Luobao said, calling his courtesy name. “You freaks with your plants that reach beyond the bounds really are each annoying in your own way, but the rest of them are all at least influenced by their Ways of the Heart. All apart from you—the two of you.”

At this point, the seawater around them suddenly began to quiver. The mournful roars of dragons came toward them.

The Cauldron of Nine Dragons!

Wangge Luobao sighed. “If not for that, the two of us really would have been kindred spirits. What a pity, our next meeting...”

But just then, Xi Ping, frozen into a puppet by the array, suddenly spoke without opening his mouth: “So the reason you’ve been racking your brain scheming against me is because you want to shut me up? Tsk, that obnoxious southern barbarian showed up too quickly. You weren’t finished explaining yourself yet.”

The waking dragon abruptly drew back. A cloud of bloody mist exploded from the “Xi Ping” caught fast by the array, and he turned from pearl white to dead white—it had been a paperman wrapped in a layer of human skin!

The paperman had been “borrowed” by Xi Ping from Bai Ling. It was an established foundation power to begin with, only suitable for camouflage and fooling low level cultivators. At close range, an ascended spirit could even sniff out the difference between a flesh and blood body and one made of paper. So Xi Ping had had a fantastic idea. He had used the bone-sharing talisman from Zhou Ying to make a “slight improvement” to the paperman, peeling off a layer of his own flesh, blood, and skin to stick it onto the paperman.

Zhou Ying, who had only been willing to pluck out one of his hairs, had probably never imagined that his power could have such an “ingenious” use.

His investment in blood hadn’t been for nothing. Adding in that he had been repeatedly smashed apart by shed skin sword attacks, which had sent

Xi Ping's cultivation level leaping right up to the middle ascended spirit stage, the camouflage technique had been even easier to use. And Wangge Luobao was accustomed to acting from the shadows. He had laid out a big net in order to catch him. Detonating the array formation consumed a large quantity of spiritual energy, which had perfectly covered up the last of the paperman's slight flaws.

And aside from the paperman, the heartless lotus seal that Xi Ping had stolen from Zhuoming had also risen in power along with his cultivation.

The reason Wangge Luobao was always jabbering on, not letting Xi Ping talk, wasn't that he was afraid of being scolded; he wanted to prevent him from "speaking a lotus flower"—the heartless lotus's lotus seal could reach the consciousness through the senses. After establishing long-distance contact with Xi Ping, he could protect his other senses, but he couldn't stop his voice from coming to his ears.

The instant that Xi Ping's voice came from the paperman, the lotus seal struck Wangge Luobao's hearing at the same time as the voice!

Wangge Luobao wanted to withdraw his consciousness from the waking dragon at once.

This hit had been too direct. Adding in the rapid progress of Xi Ping's cultivation level within a short time, while he couldn't simply pull up a person's consciousness like Zhuoming himself, he could still keep Wangge Luobao from escaping at once.

Xi Ping said, "Hehe, big worm, our next meeting is indefinitely postponed."

He tore apart the skin and flesh on the spot and withdrew his consciousness, leaving behind only a wad of paper dissolved by seawater.

The might of the Cauldron of Nine Dragons instantly fixed on Wangge Luobao.

When the roar of the dragons came, Zhi Xiu's heart tightened—Lingyun's people had come!

However powerful a sword cultivator might be, he could hardly withstand two divine tools single-handed.

Instantly, Zhaoting was forced to produce all and more than all of its fighting force. Zhi Xiu, using himself as a shield, protected the thousands of people behind him, hacking at the Silver Moon and forcing it toward the deserted side of the Lancang Mountains.

The Silver Moon, which had had the rug pulled out from under it by the evil cultivators, seemed to be entirely inhibited by the sword light. The Lancang Mountains tottered on the point of collapse from the collision with the falling moon. The spiritual energy of the Lovebird Sword Array wavered. The Sword Slave brazenly reached out and grasped the main sword of the Lovebird Sword Array.

But the nine dragons with their gnashing teeth and flailing claws only appeared for a flash, and then, like dumplings thrown into the pot, went into the water along with Lingyun's Sect Leader—even the splash was quite restrained.

Xuanwu, who had thought rescue had come: "..."

Zhi Xiu, who had made ready to face an enemy from both sides: "..."

What was this senior from Southern Shu in such a hurry to go do?

The next moment, a blood-covered "human stick" emerged from the next life spiritual fish's mist. On his way, he scooped up the cultivators who had fallen into the sea, including Chang Jun, dealing each one a talisman to keep them from waking up and being scared to death by seeing a "living ghost."

Before his skin and flesh could grow back, this “blood person” dove right into Yao Qi’s shadow.

Now that Xi Ping had arranged an “assignment” for the Cauldron of Nine Dragons, Lingyun’s people temporarily wouldn’t come out to make trouble. Xuanwu was under control, the Lovebird Sword Array was being held down by the Sword Slave. The opportunity was too good to miss.

“Ziming!”

The instant the main sword was seized by the Sword Slave, the noise and din about to burst Yao Qi’s consciousness suddenly calmed. Yao Ziming, with no idea what time or day it was, opened his eyes in bewilderment and saw the Lancang Sect Leader in front of him.

This was an image floating above the clouded Way of the Heart. The old Sect Leader’s hair and beard were white, lines of age carved all over his face. Half the skin of his face seemed to have been charred black by a fire. His features were twisted, an ominous bloody light emanating from his eyeballs...but that tall figure was still as upright as a mountain range, the tears in his eyes dispersing the grimness and horror of the bloody light.

“S-senior?” said Yao Qi.

The Sect Leader didn't answer. He had been dead for two centuries.

The eyes of that image looked through Yao Qi and fell on the vast and desolate Southern He Peninsula. Like a recording, he began to recite some words that Yao Qi didn't understand.

Under the influence of the grit projection, Yao Qi involuntarily spoke aloud the words in his consciousness.

Xi Ping froze. That wasn't the Southern He language.

An ascended spirit could connect to heaven and earth—though Xi Ping didn't understand it, his spiritual sense told him what this was.

Inscriptions.

He had never known that the inscriptions said to bear "heaven's designs" could be recited aloud.

Xi Ping was perfectly well aware of his own worth in this situation. He came to a prompt decision and quickly clapped out a common half-immortal grade talisman. Yao Qi's voice soared, reverberating through the air over the whole Southern He Peninsula—all the people flying in the sky were shed skins, anyway; someone would have to understand.

But Zhi Xiu, the Sword Slave, Xuanwu, and even Lingyun's Sect Leader at the bottom of the sea froze simultaneously; all of these masters looked to some extent confused and taken aback.

But the constantly roiling Lovebird Sword Array and the Lancang Mountain Range stilled simultaneously.

Out of nowhere, that instant of dead silence reminded Xi Ping of when the Law Breaker's axiom had descended upon Tao County.

Wait—hadn't Qiu Sha said that the spiritual mountains...were a big Law Breaker?

CHAPTER 224 - A Life of Regret (36)

On Xuanyin's Moon Plated Peak, Lin Chi and Wen Fei stood around the Unbound Furnace and the still warm and toasty failed spirit-conducting gold, striving unsuccessfully to think things through.

Wen Fei considered and said to Lin Chi: Actually, I have a thought.

Lin Chi quickly said, "Instruct me, Wen-shixiong."

Wen Fei waved a hand. Well...I wouldn't dare, I'll just tell you for what it's worth. Just bear with me and listen, Lin-shixiong. I don't understand toolmaking, but I've been neighbors with a sword cultivator for a hundred years, so I understand something about sword cultivators. Our own sword god, regardless of cultivation level, certainly has a temper that's one in a million. You can count him as kind and gentle in disposition and refined in manner. But, look, when it comes to daily trifles, with a few extra sentences, you can always get him to meet you halfway, but the more he's up against a dangerous situation or a formidable opponent, the less willing he is to turn around. To break off their line of retreat in a hopeless situation and use the point of their sword as a glimmer of hope for survival—that's what sword cultivators like him rely on to cultivate their hearts.

"You mean that this sword cultivator Sect Leader of Lancang..."

Wen Fei said, He was also a sword cultivator. I've thought all along that instead of thinking up a way to make an immortal tool that would overcome the heavenly commandments of the spiritual mountains, under those circumstances, he might prefer to take aim at the "heavenly commandments" themselves.

Lin Chi was startled. "How could heavenly commandments break? Was he also planning to level the Lancang Spiritual Mountains?"

Wen Fei glanced at him. That's not necessarily impossible... Lin-shixiong, he wanted to give Lancang's spiritual energy back to the mortal world to begin with. The spiritual mountains aren't incapable of collapse. Aren't the Xuanyin Mountains already "melting" into the earth?

"But the Territory Map itself was left behind by the Southern Sage," Lin Chi said doubtfully, coming to his senses. "Perhaps this was just what the sage intended at the time. Otherwise, he wouldn't have sealed the Territory Map into the veins of the earth. We were only following the current, and still we only narrowly managed to survive. I certainly haven't heard that the Lancang Mountains' Gold and Jade Sages left behind anything of the kind. How...how could that be?"

Wen Fei waved his hand. That's right. He failed, didn't he? The Lancang Mountains became the southern mines, and the Southern He Peninsula turned into the Land of Turmoil.

“You mean that because he had become obsessed, the Lancang Sect Leader went completely insane then.” As if he had swallowed an ice cube, Lin Chi slowly said, “Returning the spiritual energy of the spiritual mountains to the human world might only have been a deranged delusion of his before he died?”

Wen Fei made no comment.

The two of them remained silent for a long time. Then Lin Chi suddenly said, “No. I don’t believe it.”

Wen Fei raised his eyebrows. You don’t believe he was insane?

“He was definitely insane, or he wouldn’t have done so many improper things,” Lin Chi said. “But I still think that if he had a thread of lucidity remaining, then it was his obsession with returning spiritual energy to the human world... Lancang was her sect.”

Meanwhile, Xi Ping was also thinking of Hui Xiangjun.

The Law Breaker that she had made was an immortal tool, powered by spiritual stones.

And the spiritual mountains...

The spiritual mountains also relied on the spiritual energy surging through the veins of the earth to control the landscape and the climate; it seemed that you could also say that they were driven by spiritual stones.

The Ways of the Heart of the sages were like the Law Breaker, which could look for spiritual stones to activate itself; they had amassed a whole country's spiritual stones into mountains. The sages had already left the mortal dust, but the human world was still like Tao County within the Law Breaker, operating under these heavenly commandments.

The Law Breaker, which could keep the Silver Moon outside its boundaries, warp space and time, and prohibit the use of spiritual energy, was certainly no mere toy that Hui Xiangjun had made after getting inspiration from the spiritual mountains. Behind it were very likely hidden the secrets of the workings of the spiritual mountains. And Lancang Mountain, which had been Hui Xiangjun's sect, had had the Unbound Furnace in its keeping for centuries after her death.

Xiang Rong with his headful of marvelous ideas had comprehended how to realize "ashes to ashes, dust to dust" after acquiring the Unbound Furnace. So what had Lancang's half-crazy Sect Leader comprehended?

Everything Yao Qi had seen and heard inside the next life mist was history.

In other words, before his death, Lancang's Sect Leader, witnessed by Kunlun's Second Elder, had rammed his Way of the Heart against the Lovebird Sword Array, and his remaining consciousness had recited this series of inscriptions. What did it mean? How should they be used?

Xi Ping had a sudden intense intuition that if he could work this out, then he would have grasped the crux of breaking through the canopy above their heads.

When speaking of inscriptions, everyone's first thought was of Sanyue. Xi Ping opened his half-regenerated eyelids and placed all his spiritual sense in his vision to sneak a bold peek at Xuanwu while he was being beaten down by Zhaoting, then swiftly ducked back into a shadow when Xuanwu's consciousness swept his way.

Just one look was enough to tell him that Sanyue's foremost inscription master also had no clue.

The Law Breaker was in the Tai Sui Qin, but spiritual energy was prohibited in Tao County; no one could get it.

If only he could go through the reincarnation wood...

Just then, a chill crept up Xi Ping's spine.

Oh no—the thought had hardly had time to flash by when the ice floes on the South Sea mingled with Zhaoting's sword energy all broke, the dispersing sword light almost blinding. The sea breeze turned into sharp blades. Pursuing Xi Ping's talisman, it pierced the next life spiritual fish's mist.

Xi Ping didn't have time to think much. He swept up the Queen Mother of the West's masterless mustard seed and dove into the depths of the sea without a look back, moving instantaneously seven or eight times in a row; he moved several zhang in a flash—when his paperman had been attached to the waking dragon's shadow, he'd had a sudden thought; adhering to the principle of “snatching every possible opportunity,” he tried using the Discard the False and Keep the True book to copy the waking dragon's power. Yu Chang himself had probably never done such a thing.

As he'd expected, since he was missing some body parts, bridging the gap between species didn't work very well. The waking dragon could fly a hundred li with a wave of its tail, while Xi Ping could only hop around within a radius of some dozen zhang with his strained copy, narrowly avoiding several beams of sword energy that nearly brushed against the center of his brow.

The voice floating over the Lancang Mountains suddenly broke off. Xi Ping's heart sank.

At the extreme of the fatal sword images, two people holding swords showed their true appearances. One of them was someone Xi Ping had seen before, Kunlun's Sect Leader.

The Kunlun sword cultivators had come faster than he had anticipated, and the cultivation level of this foremost Sect Leader in the world was higher than he had anticipated—the Sword Slave hadn't been able to dispel the next life mist at one stroke!

While the Lovebird Sword Array had temporarily stilled, it was still hanging in the air and could attack at any moment, and Xuanwu and the Silver Moon were still in perfect condition.

The most unfavorable situation had happened!

Shifu!

But Xi Ping quickly found that compared to his shizun, alone and helpless, his own situation was the dangerous one.

When Xuanwu had appeared, he had uttered some pretentious nonsense before attacking, but the Kunlun Sect Leader carrying a heart demon seed seemed to have been drugged. He didn't announce his home sect, and neither did he give a greeting. He raised his sword and slashed—what was more, he ignored the masters filling the sky and only took notice of Xi Ping in the sea!

Xi Ping: "..."

Why slash at him?

He had used a half-immortal grade talisman earlier for the sake of trickery. He was blending in inside the Queen Mother of the West's hidden realm, pretending to be a lackey of one of the great evil cultivators. It was a fact that in the eyes of certain people, half-immortals didn't even count as cultivators. With a crowd of masters gathered together, instead of deliberating national and international affairs, this one was going around all over the place stomping on ants—what kind of unique ideas were driving him?

Wasn't the Kunlun Sect Leader's heart demon aimed at the Sword Slave? What kind of provocation must he have received to flare up in a different direction?

In the sea, he covered his head and fled “like a frightened fish.” The fatal sword energy followed him like his shadow. He still had the final sword attack, but he was afraid of disturbing Zhi Xiu and didn’t dare to use it lightly. Xi Ping’s thoughts moved quickly: Kunlun’s Sect Leader wasn’t Wangge Luobao. With Zhaoting and Wanshuang right there, how could a mere ascended spirit like him merit such attention? Even if the old man had realized that the amplifying talisman earlier had been cast by him, his reaction still shouldn’t have been this outsized...

Wait!

A thought flashed by like lightning: Kunlun’s Sect Leader perhaps had no idea who he was, but he might have recognized those inscriptions that had stumped even Xuanwu!

At the Lancang Sect Leader’s death, Kunlun’s Second Elder had been next to him!

As his mind wandered for the space of a breath, Kunlun’s great sword split apart the South Sea. Since ancient times, it had been impossible to cut water with a sword, but this thousand-year-old shed skin sword cultivator had cleaved a precipice into the South Sea. There was nowhere for Xi Ping to hide.

Just then, another person on the scene moved.

The Sword Slave suddenly gave up on the Lovebird Sword Array, turning Wanshuang against her own Sect Leader.

“Wu Lingxiao!”

Ninefold Kunlun swords of the same origin clashed. The precipice made of seawater collapsed. Xi Ping didn't hesitate. Like a cunning fish himself, he ducked into a fish's shadow and dove into a patch of sea.

Above the Lancang Mountains now, the Lovebird Sword Array was suspended on high, and Wanshuang and the Sect Leader were engaged in a stand-off; Xuanwu was in as sorry a predicament as the Silver Moon, his ruthless gaze fixed on Zhaoting; in front of outsiders, Kunlun's Third Elder, holding back his astonishment and not cutting the ground out from under his shixiong's feet, stood behind the Sect Leader with his sword raised; Zhi Xiu put away Zhaoting and out of the corner of his eye shot a glance in the direction that the Kunlun Sect Leader's sword had been pointing earlier. He kept thinking that something was wrong and once again quietly sent out his consciousness, calming down only when he had checked on the location of the shard of Zhaoting.

“Interesting,” Xuanwu said gravely. “Evil cultivators are overthrowing the heavens, we are faced with formidable foes, and the Cauldron of Nine Dragons has sunk into the sea without a word, while the masters from Kunlun have gone ahead with a power struggle.”

The Third Elder also thought it was completely unreasonable. He shot a glance at the Sect Leader. Perhaps it was his mistake, but he thought that the bloody light in the Sect Leader’s eyes was becoming increasingly ghastly, so he stepped forward and spoke on the Sect Leader’s behalf: “Beneath the ninefold sword of Kunlun, all evil retreats. There is nothing to be anxious about. Please do not be impatient, Fellow Cultivator Xuanwu—Lingxiao, what are you doing?”

The Sword Slave was short-tempered and despised intriguing more than anything, but that didn’t mean she was stupid.

Cold light flitted over Wanshuang. She aimed her pitch-dark eye sockets at the Sect Leader and rasped in a voice like a crow’s: “And I would like to know, shibo, why did the Sect Leader want to break off those inscriptions?”

Xuanwu frowned, at last turning his eyes on Kunlun’s Sect Leader. Beneath the astonished gazes of the great shed skins of the era, Kunlun’s Sect Leader’s features twisted savagely. Xi Ping almost thought he could hear the heart demon seed sprouting.

Zhi Xiu immediately recalled Zhao Yin's self-destruction and death and saw at once that this was an omen of losing one's mind. His intuition told him that this had to be related to Zhou Ying. He said nothing, only squeezed Zhaoting's hilt. With a wave of his sleeve, he sent some mustard seeds full of spiritual stones to the Luwu steamships bringing up the rear.

Before he could complete his maneuver, he heard the Sword Slave say with emphasis on each word: "Was it because my shifu heard these inscriptions in the Lancang Mountains that you decided he had to be silenced?"

The Sword Slave was only worked up, bluffing at random. She hadn't expected that no sooner had she spoken than the Sect Leader's admonition of "impertinent" would come toward her along with the slashing point of his sword.

Xuanwu and the Third Elder quickly got out of the way to either side. Zhi Xiu leapt down from the clouds, landing on the surface of the sea. Zhaoting caught the better part of the sword energy, and the remainder was promptly parried by the upgraded immortal tools on the Luwu ships.

The stagnating Lovebird Sword Array was assaulted by sword energy from two great swords of Kunlun and seemed to come back to life. The sword array that had nearly been scattered by the Sword Slave took shape once again and pointed at her back.

Xi Ping gasped. His consciousness plunged into the Queen Mother of the West's mustard seed hidden realm. "Ziming-xiong, wake up!"

And meanwhile, the Blind Wolf King Xie Chu was struggling to trek over a field of snow.

This was outside the Beijue Mountains, a place of utter cold that no gaze in the world could reach. It could freeze a person's essence.

And once a cultivator's essence was frozen, all techniques and protective spiritual energy would be useless. Whether ascended spirit or shed skin, they would freeze to death here.

You couldn't even turn back and retreat if you sensed something wrong. Extreme cold caused hallucinations; it was extremely easy for the consciousness to become lost. The Blind Wolf King normally remained in the Snow Observation Pavilion in his true body, only sending his consciousness through the Beijue Pass; this was already extremely dangerous, but this time he had come in his true body.

He was prepared not to come back.

As he went deep into the Beijue Array, it seemed that he couldn't move a sliver of the spiritual energy in his essence. Light like a ghost fire glimmered on his body. He held a Lingchi Lantern in his hand—the Snow Wolf had once used this clumsy method to get to the feet of the Beijue Mountains, burning his own flesh and blood the whole way. Xie Chu had always turned his nose up at this stupid buck's conduct; he had never thought that he would become the next stupid buck.

“I've spent a lifetime building an illustrious reputation. Why the hell did I trust you?” he muttered. His senses seemed to have entirely stopped working. He could no longer distinguish anything; he was simply walking forward on a single held breath...following the dull rhythmic knocking on the Beijue Array. “I'm likely to die today thanks to you...”

The knocking on the Beijue Array ignored him. The knocker couldn't hear what he was muttering, anyway.

“If my guess is correct,” Zhou Ying had said before leaving, “as Kunlun's divine tool, the Ceaseless Mirror is likely to be linked to the Beijue Array.”

“What's the evidence?”

“The official history of the cultivation world,” said Zhou Ying. “The first lesson that inner and outer sect disciples of each sect are taught upon entering, concerning the origin on the immortal mountains—each sage had their own Way of the Heart and their own strength, but there were so many shed skin masters then, yet only five people stood out and became full moon gods. Do you still recall why this was, Wolf King?”

“The sages had visions of protecting the common people, according with the wishes of all.” After reciting this, Xie Chu rolled his eyes. “Stay on topic, little devil. How old are you? Do you still believe that crap?”

“No, the official history is admittedly whitewashed, but it’s coherent.” Zhou Ying calmly interrupted the Blind Wolf King’s cynicism. “You don’t have to believe that the sages were righteous and selfless, but it isn’t without cause that a balance has been kept between the cultivation world and the human world for thousands of years. Up to the present, while the masters struggle over power and act in all manner of nauseating ways, they still do their best to avoid affecting mortals. Wolf King, is this because they still have some conscience, or because of a warning from their spiritual senses?”

“What do you mean?”

“The Kunlun Mountains are the first spiritual mountains in the world. Legend says that the climate of the northern continent suddenly changed for the worse, bringing punishing cold, causing innumerable people and livestock to freeze to death. The Sword Ancestor took all his disciples and acolytes and used himself as a shield to block the killing wind coming from the north. He became a full moon sage after undergoing this tribulation, becoming the hope of the populace. The northern continent's spiritual energy gathered at the border, from east to west, and the Kunlun Mountain Range arose—that is the myth,” Zhou Ying said. “But there's one part of it that's right—the Kunlun Mountain Range did rise from east to west, because the east is densely populated. At the northwest corner, the power of the ‘will of the people’ might have been exhausted—that would be the Beijue Pass. Kunlun's Ceaseless Mirror is perhaps the only divine tool of the mountains in the world that isn't located within the immortal mountains. It's likely that it's located at the extreme end of the Kunlun Mountains.”

“This is pure conjecture.”

“It is,” said Zhou Ying, who had still been in the midst of the way of clarity at the time. “Why don't we bet on it and perform an experiment? I'll go to the Kunlun Mountains and think of a way to enter the Ceaseless Mirror. If you can hear our prearranged flying goose signal at the Beijue Pass, Wolf King, then we'll have bet right.”

“You'll think of...what? Kid, are you...”

“If that really is the case, we can find the source of the birth of the spiritual mountains,” Zhou Ying said, taking no notice of his views. “And perhaps also the true reason for your honored teacher’s death.”

CHAPTER 225 - A Life of Regret (37)

Xie Chu was conceited, fastidious, fond of wearing snow-white fox-fur robes that were especially hard to clean. His natural talents were unsurpassed. Even without working particularly hard a day of his life, he could stand out among his fellows. Therefore, he was haughty down to his bones. He admitted that this was wrong and rarely spoke his sarcasm aloud, but over time, it would still show in his face; it couldn't be hidden.

He had never been in such a wretched condition in his life. His sense of smell had gone numb, but the foul, charred odor coming from himself still came to him. There was no mirror out in the great northern plains; presumably he didn't look human, either.

Had he known that there would come a day like this, he thought, perhaps he would have been nicer to the Snow Wolf before... That way, when that stupid young man betrayed him, he might have felt more torment over it.

“They said that he had a disagreement with the Sect Leader, and that influenced his emotional state and caused him to be lost outside the Beijue Mountains.” Xie Chu knew perfectly well that the individual knocking on the array to guide him couldn't hear his weak, indistinct muttering, but he still had to talk, or else he wouldn't be able to distinguish whether he was walking a path in the world of the living or in the Yellow Springs of the Underworld. “Bullshit—after so many years, who would get angry at that old coffin board? If only he and that mystifying ‘mirror ghost’ could have spared one of their four eyes in the midst of all their pressing affairs to have a look at the northern continent instead of keeping all those eyes fixed on those trifling heaps of spiritual stones, my shizun wouldn’t have wasted so much time he could have spent training with the sword going out to get involved in trifles.”

The Second Elder had spoken very little, but there was weight to each of his words. Because of this, many people feared him. In fact, he wasn’t the type of person to get angry. Much of the time, all matters in the outside world were like passing clouds to him. He only concentrated on the things he wanted to concentrate on. Probably only the steadiest hand in the world could wield the nimblest sword; Xie Chu had always thought himself unworthy. That was why, after shizun had left, he had changed the name of his own sword to “Perplexing.”

“No one had a better sense of priority than him. He never ran an unnecessary risk, never had any superfluous curiosity...”

The Heart Sword used the consciousness as its medium; it required no physical form. The Second Elder’s physical form had never approached the Beijue Array, not because he feared death, but because he knew that if anything should happen to him, Kunlun had no one who could replace him.

His elder disciple was irascible and impetuous; the Second Elder wouldn't have felt easy about either the array or the disciple if he had let him go. His younger disciple was a genius, and all geniuses knew to seek their own path. All a teacher had to do was bless her with a little advice; it would be a waste to compel her to change her way for the sake of the big picture.

Such an introverted and cautious sword cultivator, who never had personal disputes with others—why would he have braved the wind and snow to rush hastily into the Beijue Array, as if he had been possessed by a ghost?

Not long before that, because Xie Chu had gotten drunk and made trouble, shifu had been sighing that he didn't dare to get old, and he had been fretting about how to coax his little shimei back from the Disciple Hall.

Just then, a frenzied wind blew toward him—there were often series of frenzied freezing winds outside the Beijue Mountains. Xie Chu's vision, hardly able to see the road, spun. Next, he realized that he had fallen on the ground, and the Lingchi Lantern had nearly slipped out of his hand. He could no longer feel his legs; he didn't know whether they had already burned away.

His mind began to float vaguely. Xie Chu thought that this had been a very foolish thing for him to do—he asked himself the question he had asked he didn't know how many times since crossing beyond the Beijue Mountains:

Did your head get sat on by the Snow Wolf? Why did you trust that brat Zhou Ying?

Because he had a paramount spiritual sense and had preserved his reason? Or because he had succeeded in being sent to his final rest in the Ceaseless Mirror?

“I...really... Zhou, how much longer...”

The dull knocking beneath the Beijue Array suddenly paused.

There was a bang. Something blown on the wind had opened a crack in the Lingchi Lantern.

Xie Chu gave a start. His dazed soul returned to position... That had been...the remnants of a beam of sword energy.

The knocking guiding him changed from a uniform speed to a specific rhythm. This was flying goose code—but there were no flying goose machines in Northern Li, and naturally the code only corresponded to a foreign language. Xie Chu’s head had nearly frozen, and he couldn’t have brought the codebook on his flame-encased body.

“I don’t understand, you scoundrel!” While he hunted in his brain for the scant remaining code there, the Blind Wolf King somewhere found the strength to hold himself up.

Laboriously facing the gale, he looked in the direction the sword energy had come from. He was stunned—

Not far ahead of him at an angle was a sword cut of the kind a master might leave behind, whose sword energy wouldn’t dissipate for centuries. The fierce wind had swept away the snow piled on the ground, revealing an enormous piece of “ice” next to the sword cut.

No, that wasn’t ice.

All the people on the northern continent were familiar with river ice. No matter how clean the water, there would still be cracks and bubbles on the surface of the ice. It wouldn’t have this even and smooth, perfectly clear texture. This was a mirror!

An enormous mirror!

Meanwhile, a Heavenly Question arrived in the Xuanyin Mountains and flew straight to Moon Plated Peak. Attached to it was a strange-looking plate.

“Sent by Heaven’s Design Pavilion from the border,” Lin Chi said, scanning the writing on the Heavenly Question. “The Southern He Luwu sent it back through an array.”

Wen Fei said, What the hell is this? A plate? It’s too shallow. What can it hold?

It could hold sound.

This was a recording plate. Unlike the mortal things that could only record sound, the sounds recorded by the upgraded immortal tool could also to a certain extent reproduce the spiritual energy fluctuations at the time—when Xi Ping had used a talisman to send Yao Qi’s recitation up to the sky, on a Luwu boat bringing up the rear nearby, a clever Luwu had recorded it, along with the Kunlun Sect Leader’s final sea-cleaving attack.

Having listened to the end, Wen Fei nearly hopped up. Kunlun’s ninefold sword? Who struck? The Sword Slave, or one of the other Kunlun shed skins? Zhi Jingzhai, is he... What’s the matter with you?

As if he had seen a ghost, Lin Chi held him down by the shoulder and lit the Unbound Furnace with a snap of his fingers, sending his seventh sense into it. He repeated the inscriptions on the disc.

But compared to Yao Qi, “possessed by a ghost,” his pronunciation had some discrepancies. The Unbound Furnace didn’t react, until he had recited up to a certain point past the middle, when the furnace fire suddenly quivered, and a fully-formed inscription leapt up inside it!

Wen Fei understood immediately. Without waiting for instructions, imitating Lin Chi, he played the recording again. The two of them tried again and again, going through it over twenty times. The sound of Kunlun’s ninefold sword had nearly activated the defensive arrays on Moon Plated Peak. Finally, some more inscriptions rose from the Unbound Furnace.

Lin Chi sent a beam of spiritual energy pointing at the library. Countless texts, new and old, flew toward them like rain, floating above their heads. Lin Chi flipped through the books with his consciousness. “One of these characters is very familiar, I think I’ve seen it somewhere before.”

Complete Glossary of Inscriptions, Ancient Hidden Realm Collection, Analysis of Inscriptions and Arrays......those known to him, those unknown, those that had been lost, those newly made—the two ascended spirits flipped through all the texts on Moon Plated Peak at the speed of “one glance per book” and came up empty.

Where had it been? Lin Chi frowned. It couldn’t have been in the Latent Cultivation Temple. Half-immortals couldn’t use inscriptions. Before Xi Shiyong had blown up the mountain, there had been very few texts concerning inscriptions in the Latent Cultivation Temple; and his shifu had left nearly all his manuscripts and texts to him, and he hadn't left his peak for eight centuries. Where else could it have been?

Suddenly, Wen Fei carefully prodded him with his fan. For once a little ill at ease, the Tanhua gestured and said, Well...shixiong, you put it in a book, I didn't look at it on purpose.

A piece of letter paper pressed very smooth fluttered down from inside a book, landing between the two of them. There was a special protective inscription on it. After eight hundred years, the paper was bright and clean as new.

This was a letter Hui Xiangjun had written to Lin Chi.

It was the last letter Hui Xiangjun had written to him after Lancang's blood moon. There was nothing to indicate that it was a final parting. She only spoke lightly of some trifles and mentioned "two little toys" that she had recently made, with diagrams attached.

The diagrams were roughly drawn with a writing brush, showing only vague outlines—inscriptions weren't like written characters, where a few missing strokes wouldn't keep them from being understood; sometimes two inscriptions that were identical to the naked eye might have totally opposite meanings. Therefore, there was no so-called “rough” version of them; the inscriptions on diagrams of immortal tools mostly only showed general positions. Some lazy people would simply draw a circle as a stand-in... Therefore, Lin Chi hadn’t attached any importance to the fact that the inscriptions marked on the diagram were ones he had never seen. He had thought she had just doodled them.

A diagram couldn’t indicate all the inscriptions on an immortal tool. Hui Xiangjun had only written two characters, and one of them had just been deciphered by Lin Chi from the recording.

“Write to them, it’s incomplete—I need all of it!”

In the South Sea, Zhi Xiu couldn’t receive letters for the moment. Never mind Heavenly Questions, even “Earthly Questions” couldn’t reach him.

While he hadn’t especially understood why the Kunlun infighting was happening, the former high general understood the situation. Right now, he had no help on the South Sea, near or far. The shed skin masters of the various sects were all his enemies. If the Sword Slave hadn’t suddenly disrespected her elders and started fighting their Sect Leader, he would have been fighting the whole cultivation world alone.

So when the Lovebird Sword Array moved, Zhaoting also moved.

The Luwu had replenished the upgraded immortal tools' spiritual stones. A strike from Zhaoting came flying, blocking the Lovebird Sword Array, which had taken aim at the Sword Slave's back; the angle was extremely crafty. Zhi Xiu had poked a hole in one corner of the sword array, knocking the main sword off target, touching Xuanwu, who was hiding from the Kunlun sword wind.

The Lovebird Sword Array no longer had a master. How could this big weapon tell who occupied what position? After all, not even the masters flying all over the sky could work it out. As far as the Lancang Mountains went, all outsiders were invaders; they would grab whoever they could get.

Xuanwu was caught unawares. In a flurry, he dragged the Silver Moon over to parry the blow and wretchedly flew half a li away. The Silver Moon, dragging a tail of light like a comet, slammed against the Lovebird Sword Array. Kunlun's Third Elder, watching the two great weapons aim at his Sect Leader, quickly drew his sword to fend them off. "Fellow Cultivator Xuanwu!"

Xuanwu didn't want to get mixed up with a crowd of sword cultivators and paid no heed. He wanted to withdraw on the spot. Before he could get a firm footing on his curved blade, there was a sudden chill at his back.

Xuanwu swept out his snow-white sleeve, spreading a handful of talismans behind himself. In the blink of an eye, spiritual wind congealed into a magnificent miragelike army, which was then pierced by a sword strike.

Nearly jabbing him in the forehead, Zhaoting forced him against the Silver Moon. In order to protect its master, the Silver Moon's radiance blazed, plating the Lovebird Sword Array with silver. The Lovebird Sword Array was unwilling to show weakness. The humming of the swords was deafening. The sword light enveloped Xuanwu, and the Third Elder, caught up in it, certainly couldn't get out.

This was precisely what was known as "war is the art of the unexpected."

While Zhi Xiu single-handedly dragged all the shed skins in the air above Lancang into a chaotic battle, the Heavenly Question from the Xuanyin Mountains, having failed several times, turned and flew toward Pang Jian, then passed through the hands of several Luwu because finally being transmitted to Wei Chengxiang...and Xi Ping's paperman.

Xi Ping's consciousness, searching through his mustard seed, had just found Yao Qi. He saw Ziming-xiong sit upright like a risen corpse. "Ziming, how much of what Lancang's Sect Leader said before he died can you remem..."

“Don’t speak!” Yao Qi sternly cried out in a groundbreaking moment. His lips were trembling uncontrollably.

He took an upgraded recording device from his own mustard seed, and under Xi Ping’s astonished gaze, as if he had eaten too much at once and was vomiting it up, quickly spat up a long string of inscriptions.

Xi Ping: “...”

Was this really his classmate who had spent over a decade in the southern mines without even learning to speak a single foreign language properly?

Then he saw the remnants of a talisman flash on Yao Qi’s brow. He gave a scream and rolled on the ground clutching his head. Xi Ping quickly found a mind calming pill on himself and stuffed it into Yao Qi’s mouth. “Wh-what kind of evil art is this?”

“An eidetic...eidetic memory talisman...it can record everything you see and hear within one day on your consciousness. No matter how difficult and unpronounceable, you can immediately remember it.” Yao Qi turned off the recorder and, trembling, offered the disc to Xi Ping. “It’s just...just when you remember too much, it’s like your brain is boiling... It’s...it’s all here...”

Xi Ping single-handedly drew a transport array to send the disc while clicking his tongue. “Who thought of it?”

Yao Qi glared at him, painted and hateful. “You...you...”

“Huh?” said Xi Ping. “It wasn’t me. I’ve never seen this.”

Then Yao Qi roared indignantly, “After you blew up the Qiu Courtyard, Luo-shixiong went crazy making us memorize A Selection of Common Inscriptions in its entirety, and if we got a single character wrong, we would be beheaded on the spot! I couldn’t remember it!”

Xi Ping gasped. “...Brother, my crime is unpardonable.”

Yao Qi lay face-up on the ground where he had fallen. Shortly, the mind calming pill had melted away entirely. He took a breath and whispered, “That senior used his Way of the Heart to suppress the Lovebird Sword Array. It seemed like he wanted to disseminate the inscriptions. Then there was an earthquake. The inscriptions for some reason backlashed, sweeping up that senior’s consciousness and the Lovebird Sword Array together. Then people came...”

“Who?” said Xi Ping.

Yao Qi slowly shook his head. “They were all masters far off on the horizon. How could I recognize them? Anyway they were all ascended spirits...and there were even shed skins. They said the Sect Leader wanted to counterattack with some kind of evil art... I didn’t understand, but anyway he was guilty of the most heinous crimes. They had already completely severed the Southern He Peninsula’s veins of the earth, and they said, ‘Those inauspicious articles have all been recovered.’ I don’t know what the inauspicious articles were.”

Xi Ping softly said, “It must have been the spirit-conducting gold to be used for repairing the veins of the earth.”

“I didn’t understand,” Yao Qi said quietly. “The sword cultivator senior who was there at the time...”

“Kunlun’s Second Elder?”

“Right. He explained to those people, said it wasn’t an evil art, it was Lancang’s Sect Leader trying to return the spiritual mountains’ spiritual energy to the mortal world. While he didn’t understand them, he had already memorized all the inscriptions. All they needed to do was try connecting the veins of the earth and they would know.”

Having said this, Yao Qi saw Xi Ping frown. He was already sighing.

“I saw that when those people heard him, they all had different expressions. They all looked like evil gods in an illicit temple, indescribably stiff and grim. I don’t know who started it, but they said that the spiritual sense of a person cultivating a Heart Sword was too high, and it was easy for him to be influenced by a heart demon. The Second Elder must have been bewitched by evil arts. There was someone who wanted to destroy those things that could repair the veins of the earth—the spirit-conducting gold. They’d heard that the Lancang Mountains no longer had any toolmaking cultivators. Once it was destroyed, that would be it. The Second Elder wouldn’t let them. They started arguing. There was a sword cultivator who called the Second Elder ‘shidi’ who kept trying to persuade him, and finally he brought in Kunlun’s High Priest. The High Priest and their Sect Leader ordered him to return to Northern Li immediately to go into seclusion to calm his mind, handing over the Southern He matter to the Third Elder.

“The Second Elder kept insisting. He said he had seen inscriptions like this elsewhere, they definitely weren’t an evil art. He begged them not to destroy the spirit-conducting gold, to leave the Southern He Peninsula a chance at survival. He would go find evidence... Then a heavenly tribulation fell onto the Lancang Mountains. The Lovebird Sword Array and the last of the Lancang Sect Leader’s consciousness dispersed, and I was thrown out.

“Shiyong, he—that Second Elder, he shouldn’t have said been so honest and said that he remembered everything, and he shouldn’t have said that he had seen them, right? What happened to him afterward?”

On top of the enormous mirror at the end of the Beijue Array, Xie Chu laboriously narrowed his eyes and saw Zhou Ying through the mirror.

Inside the mirror, Zhou Ying was standing next to someone.

That person was tall, plainly dressed, with traces of his solemnity in life remaining at the corners of his mouth and on his brow. He was sitting upright in the mirror...his face seemingly just as it had been over two centuries ago.

Zhou Ying respectfully cupped his hands toward the man, whose eyes were tightly shut, then bent down and turned him over, showing his back to Xie Chu, who was in another world.

Xie Chu forgot to breathe for a moment. His consciousness, which had been barely holding on, seemed to instantly explode. His teeth chattered amid the raging fire.

On that man’s back was a gash that went down to the bone. Strike him dead and Xie Chu couldn’t have seen wrong—this had been made by Kunlun’s ninefold sword.

CHAPTER 226 - A Life of Regret (38)

Only a cultivator of the same level could have cut a gash like this into the body of a shed skin sword cultivator.

But if two shed skins had been fighting, after over two centuries, the traces still wouldn't have vanished altogether. In other words, the killer had only struck one blow here.

At the time, the Third Elder was on the Southern He Peninsula, Wu Lingxiao wasn't yet the Sword Slave, and the Kunlun shed skin could only have been one person...a person the Second Elder could trust to have his back among the perils beyond the Beijue Mountains.

The Second Elder hadn't been born in time for the era when the Sword Ancestor had widely accepted disciples. While in the eyes of the current younger generations, he was also among the most ancient sword cultivators in the world, he was halfway to a junior in front of the Sect Leader.

The Sect Leader was the person who had led everyone in the struggle to get a foothold on the icy and barren northern continent after the sage had left the mortal dust. Each and every Kunlun sword cultivator had looked to him for guidance and support. Though the times had changed and many of their ideas had begun to clash, the Second Elder still made allowances for the difficulties the Sect Leader had in keeping equilibrium on all sides, and he remembered with gratitude the many compromises the Sect Leader had made for his sake.

To make a somewhat inappropriate comparison, the Sect Leader was to the Second Elder what Zhi Xiu was to Pang Jian.

As reliable and prudent as the Second Elder was, why would he have dared to run the risk of entering the Beijue Array in his true body? It wasn't just because he had a thorough understanding of the terrain after many years of guarding the Beijue Array; it was also because he hadn't been alone then. Another person had gone with him, someone who was like a father and a brother.

The Second Elder's body was with Zhou Ying, and his name token hadn't cracked after his death. That showed that before his essence could disperse, he had been sent into the Ceaseless Mirror.

In other words, the High Priest had also played a role in this.

He had been...killed in a conspiracy by the same Kunlun he had loved and protected for centuries.

Perhaps Zhou Ying had realized that it would be too hard on the Blind Wolf King to make him listen to flying goose code under these circumstances. His hand brushed the mirror, and a line of fleeting mist appeared on the surface.

Before the mist disappeared, as if racing against time, he quickly wrote a line of Northern Li writing—so that Xie Chu could see it clearly, he even wrote it mirrored.

“You can’t survive here for long. A person who is dead cannot come back to life. Better to do something more useful than wailing in mourning.” Perhaps because he was no longer in the land of the living, Zhou Ying didn’t even bother with basic courtesy, revealing his callous nature, impervious to reason. “Go find the reason your honored teacher was silenced.”

Xie Chu shot him a hateful look and cursed in Northern Li slang.

But after all, he was also a master sword cultivator with many years of fame behind him; even if his heart burst from grief, he still had his guts. Xie Chu grit his teeth and suddenly clapped a half-immortal grade talisman against the ground—he wasn’t a shed skin; his cultivation level was too far below the two who had come here before. Even with Zhou Ying’s guidance, he was a spent force. At the slightest movement, his essence would be in danger of freezing altogether. He had to lower himself to being a half-immortal.

Spiritual energy held up his legs, which had only bones remaining. Xie Chu took a bone jade cane from his mustard seed and walked toward the sword cut leaning on it.

The sword cut marked the place where the Sect Leader had launched a sneak attack on the Second Elder. The two of them must have seen something here.

Before Xie Chu could find his footing, another gust of fierce wind came crashing toward him. The mighty ascended spirit sword cultivator was nearly blown away by the wind. In the mirror, Zhou Ying was watching the flying snow filling the sky. He was different from the Second Elder's corpse next to him; his figure was hollow.

Xie Chu followed the direction of his gaze, and his eyes suddenly stopped. His hand, which was like that of a burnt corpse, reached into his mustard seed and pulled out a big handful of spiritual stones. The spiritual stones broke in his palm; they turned into a talisman and flew away. The snow piled over a zhang high on the ground was sent flying. With a loud clatter, the edges of the big mirror on the ground were revealed.

“Inscriptions...”

Inscriptions that clearly belonged to a single set had also appeared now in the Unbound Furnace. The Luwu had come through in the clutch. Lin Chi and Wen Fei had quickly obtained a complete inscription recording. Only by concentrating their full attention and trying innumerable times did the two of them succeed in relaying these inscriptions to the Unbound Furnace. The Xuanyin Mountains seemed to sense something. The silent Bell of Tribulation on the Principal Peak moved.

It seemed to know that the Xuanyin Mountains' sole shed skin wasn't here, and that he couldn't spare the attention to look after events in the north. It flashed intermittently in the air, turning with unfathomable intent in the direction of Moon Plated Peak.

Just then, an aged hand reached out from midair and touched the Bell of Tribulation—the Dignitary of Fate Zhang Jue landed on Xuanyin's Principal Peak.

Before, his appearance had been that of a sedate middle-aged man, but in a little over a month, his hair and beard had turned white, and of the skin of his hands, only the thinnest layer remained, covered in the wrinkles made by time.

Beneath Zhang Jue's feet was the main hall of the Principal Peak. On the roof tiles, an enormous karma beast appeared. It looked at him as though it understood human emotions, the expression in its eyes affectionate and calm.

Zhang Jue was an orphan picked up by the Southern Sage. He had grown up on the karma beast's back. At the time, the karma beast had not yet been committed to drawings and walls. It had fur like satin and warm breath. Its nature was proud. When it was angry, its furious roars could be heard dozens of li away. But it never screamed at children. When little kids roughly grabbed its ears and plucked its fur and annoyed it, at most it would snort out a breath and avoid them.

Zhang Jue never did mischievous things like that. At seven, he had been as quiet and prudent as he was now. He hadn't been prematurely elderly like Li Fengshan, hadn't had Lin Zongyi's extraordinary natural talents, and he certainly hadn't been as charming as Zhao Yin. He was always silent, as if he didn't exist. The Southern Sage hadn't been a very strict teacher. If his young disciples violated a rule, as long as they hadn't gone too far out of bounds, he would usually turn a blind eye. Even Lin Zongyi, who later became Yuntian Palace's Dignitary of Rule, had tested their shizun's bottom line and taken beatings for it in his youth. Only Zhang Jue had never broken any rules.

Whether there was someone supervising him or not, he would do whatever shizun said, down to the slightest detail; he had no objections, he asked no questions, he didn't fall short of what was required. He'd known enough of the suffering caused by the turmoil of war. He abhorred all inconstancy. Carefully observing the rules within a framework set down by the strong gave him an unparalleled sense of security. The day that the Sea of Stars had landed in the Xuanyin Mountains, Zhang Jue had become an ascended spirit. In that moment, he thought he had practically found perfect satisfaction—if one could catch glimpses of fate by observing the paths of the stars, wasn't that the best evidence that “everything has its course”?

He became the Dignitary of Fate and in a thousand years hadn't taken a single step out of line. He had taken a disciple just as “rule-abiding and sedate” as himself.

Right up until that “rule-abiding and sedate” disciple forfeited the Xuanyin Mountains in a single strike, smashed the Sea of Stars, and came to see him with a tiny karma beast squeezed into a drawing.

“I've seen that the main hall and the Southern Sage Great Hall have drawings of auspicious signs all over their walls. Those must be provided for the karma beast,” Zhi Xiu said. “I've heard that in earlier years, it often came to play here, but since I came to the mountains, the karma beast never again entered the inner sect without being summoned. Shifu, the sage is gone.”

Zhang Jue hadn't wanted to speak, but hearing this, he couldn't resist opening his mouth. "The sage shed his encumbrances and became free of the mundane dust. He exists with the universe."

"All right," Zhi Xiu said, changing his wording accordingly, "then he evaporated into the air."

Zhang Jue: "..."

"Sages turn into rain and fall to earth, common people fall like leaves and become mud," Zhi Xiu said. "Truly, there is a difference."

After a long moment, Zhang Jue sighed. He said, "Jingzhai, you never learned to observe the stars and natural phenomena. From the bottom of your heart, you never believed that fixed destiny exists. You don't belong to the way of the Dignitary of Fate."

"I don't believe it. Is destiny in the Sea of Stars?" Zhi Xiu calmly asked.

"Did you see what the Sea of Stars was when it was turned upside down, see what you have been scrupulously abiding by? Shifu, after all these years, when the Sea of Stars disappeared, didn't you feel the tiniest bit pleased?"

Zhang Jue froze.

“The karma beast misses its former master very much, and it misses you very much... It couldn’t come here to see you, so it asked me to bring it.” Zhi Xiu looked around the empty walls of the place where Zhang Jue was in seclusion—the karma beast could only appear in a place with human markings on the walls—and bent down to place a drawing in front of Zhang Jue’s prayer mat. “Though perhaps you don’t remember it anymore.”

However much it understood of human emotion, the sacred beast was still only a beast. There were many marvels of the mundane dust that it could not understand, and it could not interpret the laws and commandments of heaven and earth.

It only loyally remembered its master’s heart—the living, human heart buried under history and stone.

Zhang Jue closed his eyes briefly. Spiritual light flashed on his wizened hand laid against the Bell of Tribulation. The unrest and droning of the Bell of Tribulation were suppressed by his hand; it made no more sound.

Lin Chi and Wen Fei’s physical senses were fully occupied by the dazzling inscriptions, and their spiritual senses were numb. They had no idea that they had had a close brush with death just now.

Lin Chi watched the inscriptions closely. His seventh sense melded with the Unbound Furnace. The furnace fire of a toolmaking master could read inscriptions.

Inside the furnace fire, an entire universe took shape with a bang.

Lin Chi heard innumerable murmurs. He whipped his head around and saw two ancient cultivators doing battle by debate; he couldn't hear what they were saying—a debate between ancient cultivators wasn't an argument had out in public. There would be layer upon layer of barrier laid down around them, without a single sound allowed to leak out into the ears of outsiders.

Lin Chi saw the eyes of one of them suddenly grow round; signs of age appeared on their face, and their Way of the Heart shattered.

Neither of these two had low cultivation. After the Way of the Heart shattered, the essence would explode. Lin Chi was startled, automatically wanting to dodge, but he saw that the dead person's essence didn't explode; instead, it passed through an inscription and blended into the body of the winner, the person's aura disappearing entirely.

Lin Chi was all at sea. What kind of evil art is this? he thought. How could they absorb another person's cultivation?

But he quickly found that this was no evil art. The ancient gods and demons had grown strong precisely by consuming each other in this way.

Countless people brushed shoulders with him. The greater the masters, the more terrible their fights. Until recent years, when evil cultivators had frequently emerged and the chaos had been hard to hold back, cultivators of the ascended spirit level had fought very rarely, and it was almost impossible to catch a glimpse of the various nations' shed skins. Lin Chi had never beheld a scene of all the gods and demons of heaven locked in chaotic battle like this.

Through the furnace fire, Lin Chi saw invisible inscriptions "flowing" from cultivators' spirits during debates. The surroundings would immediately change. An ascended spirit could make a river run backward, ignite snow and boil ice. Shed skins could even overturn time and season within a certain scope.

Cultivators who knew restraint would establish boundaries with their arts, but the ones running wild didn't care how many crops in fertile farmlands would be ruined by sweltering heat in early spring or frosty winds at midsummer. In places where cultivators commonly appeared, the four seasons were in total disarray.

But Lin Chi suddenly took a step back, cold sweat rising on his back.

The difference between inscriptions on the one hand and arrays and talismans on the other lay in the fact that talismans and array were manmade; only inscriptions were “made by nature.”

Talismans were more convenient and could be activated by a cultivator with spiritual energy. Arrays were a little more complex, relying on the support of additional spiritual stones. In fact, any random cultivator could create their own talismans and arrays any time, it was just that the majority of them weren't very good. Only the most concise and practical, the ones that best economized on spiritual energy, would spread widely.

But inscriptions were different. New inscriptions weren't called “newly made,” they were called “newly discovered.” Inscriptions in themselves could change the pattern of the spiritual energy flow around them. As long as they weren't in a place like the Land of Turmoil, where the spiritual veins had been severed, they would need no additional source of spiritual energy.

Even mortals knew that inscriptions were the language of the origin of the world, that they had emerged from the primeval universe. The path of the sun and the phases of the moon, the cycle of day and night, living things existing and propagating—all these were contained within them.

But the inscriptions he saw were clearly flying out of the cultivators' spirits and influencing the surroundings!

It was just as if...inscriptions weren't the origin of the world, but the language of Ways of the Heart.

How could that be? Lin Chi had always believed that the vast majority of the time, people acted on their own. Then wouldn't inscriptions each be acting for themselves as well? Wouldn't that lead to total chaos?

As soon as this thought arose, Lin Chi's seventh sense trembled acutely. The wild and disordered struggle of the gods and demons was suddenly before his eyes.

The northerners had been warlike since ancient times, and had had the most sword cultivators. The northern continent had been the first to crumble.

Lin Chi's vision went white. He was nearly buried by the blizzard. In the Unbound Furnace, he saw the boundless snow fields...before the Kunlun Mountains had existed.

He struggled to recall the history books he had read upon entering the sect. It was said that snowstorms in the northern continent had turned into a disaster. The people were destitute. The Sword Ancestor, defending the northern border, couldn't stand to watch. Several times he proposed that cultivators stop fighting, but no one paid attention to him. He tried using his sword to do the talking, beating each one in turn, but cultivators won their fates in defiance of heaven, lived a hairsbreadth from death. Not only did Wanshuang fail to stabilize the four points, it instead provoked even more challenges.

Finally, that famous natural disaster of utter cold descended upon the north. The Sword Ancestor boldly stepped forward, leading his disciples and acolytes, and used his own essence to cast a spiritual shield to block the wind in the north.

That scene replayed within the Unbound Furnace, because the inscriptions flying from the brows of the Sword Ancestor and his followers were precisely the ones Lin Chi was using the furnace fire to analyze.

The disciples with the weakest cultivation were the first to exhaust their essence and die. But when they died, their Ways of the Heart did not shatter. Their Ways of the Heart sank into the earth, still surrounded by inscriptions. The vast majority of the inscriptions disappeared shortly. Only those that shared an origin in the Sword Ancestor were preserved under the influence of that powerful shed skin, their forms imprinted on the ground. After the deaths of their owners, the leftover inscriptions continued to help draw spiritual energy for their fellows.

The mortals protected by the Sword Ancestor were attempting to send all kinds of goods up to the cultivators. Seeing this, they took rubbings of those inscriptions and took them home to worship them. There were experienced and knowledgeable old people who knew that inscriptions could automatically draw spiritual energy, so they began to draw them as well. They passed quickly from person to person—those inscriptions practically became a sacred totem, covering houses, marketplaces, farms and edges of fields...

Lin Chi thought their efforts were futile. It was common knowledge: only a cultivator of the established foundation level and above could draw inscriptions; even a half-immortal couldn't do it. Even if mortals made identical rubbings, what use...

Could...it...

Lin Chi suddenly held his breath. A spiritual wind rose amid the fire of the Unbound Furnace. Something beyond his imagination occurred.

On the northern continent, in all the places where there were mortals, a sea of inscriptions appeared.

Tied together, they unexpectedly made great waves.

That sea of inscriptions drew frenziedly upon the spiritual energy scattered everywhere, gathering it in the north. Cultivators who wanted to profit from others' misfortunes seemed out of nowhere to encounter a formidable opponent in debate. They didn't even have a chance to learn what the subject of debate was before their Ways of the Heart were shattered by the torrent of inscriptions, and their essences went north after the torrent.

Lin Chi suddenly realized that those who had not established foundations weren't unable to draw inscriptions; it was just that the effects were so feeble as to be practically nonexistent. It took thousands upon tens of thousands at once for the water droplets to form a sea.

He turned and saw the spiritual energy flowing north along human tracks. It penetrated the landscape, became veins of the earth. At the northernmost extremity of the continent, it separated out spiritual stones. The spiritual mountains rose from the ground, moving from the most populous east to the west.

The inscriptions scattered throughout the mortal world all came from the Sword Ancestor, and they were supported by his Way of the Heart as they supported it. When the spiritual mountains began to be pushed up by the veins of the earth with a rumble, his consciousness instantly joined with the whole country—

The first spiritual mountains in the world arose.

The first full moon sage in the world came into being.

The spiritual wind of the northern continent was limpid. His way was quiet and still, leaving no marks.

It continued until both immortals and mortals were exhausted upon reaching the Beijue Pass. There the submerged Ways of the Heart grouped together, sinking into the earth like a mirror. At the mirror's four corners were the inscriptions that had raised the spiritual mountains.

They appeared in perfect detail in front of the Blind Wolf King. Xie Chu used the last of his strength to keep his eyes open, attaching his spiritual sense, which was frozen numb, to his vision. In the “mirror,” he saw his own reflection—at the center of his brow, there was also a ring of inscriptions.

CHAPTER 227 - A Life of Regret (39)

“What...what is this?” Xie Chu held his forehead blankly and twisted his head to look at Zhou Ying, but he saw Zhou Ying standing next to the two-century-old remains with his arms folded. Watching the movements of his mouth, Xie Chu thought he seemed to be saying, “I see.”

In the Law Breaker and the South Sea Hidden Realm, Zhou Ying had seen very similar blurred boundaries. At the time, his cultivation had only been a half-immortal's, and he had been unable to pry into it. But when his consciousness, protected by the heart demon seed, had entered the Ceaseless Mirror with his physical body, he had known that he had bet right.

In the Ceaseless Mirror, he could see an identical boundary. This time, he had succeeded in coming to the end of that unclear boundary.

This human world, stifled for a thousand years by the spiritual mountains, was like the Law Breaker, like the South Sea Hidden Realm—it was a manmade universe.

The Law Breaker was Hui Xiangjun's creation and the South Sea Hidden Realm was suspected of being Ancestor Tianbo's masterpiece, while the makers of this human world were the ignorant masses themselves.

The inside of Xie Chu's head roared, whether because he was freezing, burning, or had faintly touched upon a truth that threatened his Way of the Heart; the questions in his mind were so numerous that they jammed together. He actually didn't know which one to spit out first. "You see what? What is it? Just because of this... Nearly a thousand years of mutual support and friendship, and just because of this he actually killed him..."

Zhou Ying looked away from the inscriptions and waved a hand, interrupting him. He wrote: "Your honored Sect Leader wasn't necessarily acting of his own volition."

"Who could have coerced him...?" Having said this, Xie Chu suddenly saw the inscriptions at the center of his brow reflected in the mirror. His words cut off abruptly. Before a thought could arise in his mind, he was once again interrupted by Zhou Ying.

Zhou Ying was intentionally keeping him from thinking carefully about the relationship between cultivators and Ways of the Heart. "Certain of my doubts about the Kunlun Mountains have been resolved for the time being. There is another matter of utmost urgency."

Xie Chu was exhausted, his flesh and bones nearly all burned away. His essence had nearly frozen. His mind was unavoidably going numb. "What?"

Zhou Ying bent his head and looked at the Second Elder's corpse, which seemed to be sleeping.

The Wolf Kind had said that the Ceaseless Mirror could only be summoned by the High Priest, the Sect Leader, and the Sword Slave together. Of them, there was no need to count the Sword Slave. She had only had Wanshuang for a little over two centuries; he figured that calling her up was only a ceremonial need, to demonstrate respect for Wanshuang—but the Sect Leader and the High Priest, especially the High Priest, must be indispensable to summoning the Ceaseless Mirror.

Zhou Ying distinctly recalled that the High Priest had summoned his “corpse” up in front of him. Then a beam of light had flashed from between the old man's brows, and he had left the human world and entered the Ceaseless Mirror and, following the boundary that only a paramount spiritual sense could see, had found his way here.

Adding in the peculiar inheritance of Kunlun's High Priests...

“This is the main body of the Ceaseless Mirror,” Zhou Ying wrote, tapping on the surface. “Its entrance is between the brows of your honored sect's High Priests. It seems that they are incarnations of the divine tool of the mountains. Your honored teacher's corpse is here, and the scene of the murder is at your feet. In other words, there was a third person here then... a half-immortal. How did he get here?"

Right now, no one could have answered this question better than Xi Ping.

After he had narrowly avoided the pursuit of Kunlun's ninefold sword and sent his consciousness into the mustard seed to speak to Yao Qi, he hadn't stood around in place like an idiot.

Shifu had been tricked by the shard of Zhaoting, but that mixed-breed Wangge Luobao knew what was up. If that jerk hadn't been bitten to death by the Cauldron of Nine Dragons yet, the Kunlun sword strike earlier must have indicated his position to Wangge Luobao. Therefore, after dodging the point of the sword, Xi Ping, hidden in the sea, raced without hesitation toward the battle of two Kunlun swords—the most dangerous place was the safest place.

As expected, no sooner had Xi Ping left his original position than the huge figure of a waking dragon emerged on the surface of the sea. Furious roaring dragons poked their heads up from the bottom of the sea.

Wangge Luobao, having attracted the Cauldron of Nine Dragons, disappeared in a flash, somewhat flustered and hard-pressed.

Damn that Tai Sui!

Wangge Luobao cursed inwardly: he'd slipped away faster than a loach! Had his flesh healed? He didn't seem worried about his wounds getting steeped in saltwater!

Xi Ping heard dragon roars nearly brush past his shoulder and didn't so much as turn his head. "Come at me if you've got the balls."

It wasn't that Wangge Luobao didn't know that Xi Ping might head for the shed skin battlefield, but with his guts, he didn't dare to barge in boldly with the Cauldron of Nine Dragons after him. He could only lie to himself, betting that Tai Sui was as "rational and cautious" as him, fruitlessly leading the Cauldron of Nine Dragons in the wrong direction to try his luck.

Zhi Xiu had given his rebellious disciple three sword attacks, and the very last one still remained to Xi Ping. It wasn't necessarily stronger than the others, but its keen edge was unmatched—which had aggravated the symptoms of Xi Ping's overweening audacity; right now, he was the exact antonym of "rational and cautious."

Xi Ping slipped through the omnipresent sword wind. If he took a breath wrong, a cleft would appear in his head. Apart from him, there was no other living creature in a hundred li radius beneath the shed skin level.

While waiting for the outcome of Lin Chi's analysis of the inscriptions, he prepared to dig up the foundations of Lancang's great mountain array and trip up the Lovebird Sword Array as necessary.

When the change took place, he had just arrived beneath the feet of Kunlun's Sect Leader and the Sword Slave.

Of course Kunlun's Sect Leader had higher cultivation than the Sword Slave, who was a junior, but the Sword Slave wielded Wanshuang; the two of them were deadlocked.

Actually, thinking about it carefully, this seemed rather like a metaphor—the Sword Ancestor had left the mundane dust and his essence had dispersed into the Kunlun Mountain Range; the Sword Ancestor's Way of the Heart was the foundation of Kunlun, and Kunlun's Sect Leader and High Priest represented the utmost orthodoxy. Only the vital sword that was like half of a sword cultivator's body didn't acknowledge them. It was just like the karma beast, wandering through the mortal world and avoiding the immortal mountains.

“My—shifu!” The Sword Slave met the Sect Leader's reddened eyes and let out an inhuman roar. “Where is he?!”

This howl could have shattered the spirit of a low level cultivator whose mind was unsteady. Not far away, the Third Elder staggered on his sword, his heart and guts ready to burst—he wasn't entirely unaware of the situation. It was just that his understanding was slight.

When the Second Elder had stood his ground and quarreled with all the great sects, the Third Elder had been on the sidelines trying to smooth the situation over. Though everyone's mouths were full of pretentious talk, in fact they all knew perfectly well what was going on, so when the Second Elder was later forcibly summoned away by his sect, everyone present was of one mind and didn't mention him again. He didn't know what had happened afterward. He hadn't asked, and he hadn't investigated. A person who had lived for a thousand years knew when to be clever and when to be dumb.

But having seen the Sect Leader's reactions to this point with his own eyes and now hearing this question from the Sword Slave, it was like a sudden bolt of lightning breaking a stone.

The Third Elder trembled. Beneath the assault of the Lovebird Sword Array and the Silver Moon, his vital sword flew out of his hand. Seeing an opportunity arise, Zhi Xiu reacted swiftly, seizing the chance to deliver another blow; the Third Elder's vital sword flew straight at Kunlun's Sect Leader.

The Sect Leader had no time to turn and dodge. How could Wanshuang permit him to split his attention? It slammed heretically against the Sect Leader's protective spiritual energy. Had Xi Ping, hidden in the shadows, not been afraid of being beaten like a drum by Zhaoting, he simply would have given a cry of good work!

Just then, the world fell silent. Time seemed to congeal. A mustard seed flew from the Sect Leader's sleeve and, exposed to the sword wind, was shredded to bits. Light burst from it.

“Wu Lingxiao, you are disobedient!”

The word “disobedient” was pronounced by two voices layered together.

Zhi Xiu, who was nearest to them, suddenly received a warning from his spiritual sense. In a flash, he withdrew several li away. Without so much as turning his head, he used Zhaoting to knock aside several oblique strikes that the sword array had thrown at him. His pupils contracted slightly.

A human figure flew from the intense light between the Sect Leader and the Sword Slave. This person's spiritual energy was so weak it was negligible. It was an old man...an old half-immortal!

In a battlefield of sword cultivators at the pinnacle of cultivation, even a shed skin didn't dare to rashly charge in; an ascended spirit would be more brittle than a piece of old paper, so what about a half-immortal?

Almost as soon as the outlines of that old half-immortal's figure appeared, his body was destroyed. Only a little mirror on his spirit, two cun square, remained, fixing the world and everything in it in place.

The core array of the Sword Slave's half-puppet body was locked dead at once. She froze in place.

Zhou Ying had asked how a half-immortal like Kunlun's High Priest could enter the Beijue Array and place the Second Elder's corpse in the Ceaseless Mirror?

This was the answer: the Sect Leader had brought him.

Apart from the Silver Moon, the Lovebird Sword Array, and the Cauldron of Nine Dragons, which didn't dare to show its head, there was also a fourth "divine tool of the mountains" here.

Wanshuang slipped from its master's hand. The current High Priest's body was destroyed, and his crazed human-shaped puppet of a Sect Leader slashed at the Sword Slave. There was no time for Zhi Xiu to save her.

But just then, a beam of sword energy flew up from the ground, knocking the Kunlun Sect Leader's attack astray—it was of shed skin grade!

Apart from Zhaoting, Wanshuang, and the two Kunlun elders, there was another person here who held a sword attack.

A sword attack that had cut through clouds of tribulation.

After his mind emptied out altogether, Zhi Xiu almost had the impression that he was cracking to pieces. For the first time in his life, the world's most good-tempered sword cultivator understood that “hair standing up in anger” wasn't an exaggeration of the ancients.

Xi Shiyong, I'll break you to pieces!

The Kunlun Sect Leader's attack brushed past the Sword Slave and was blocked by Zhaoting before it could hit the ground. In the space of a breath, Zhi Xiu landed at the place that sword attack had originated.

After going through a major battle that had made his cultivation leap up a minor boundary, Xi Ping's hidden bones had obviously firmed up quite a bit. Using that sword attack had only broken him halfway. Just as he was about to duck into the shadow of a wizened tree, a light grey figure appeared before his eyes. Xi Ping's reaction was extremely fast. As if he had been "rescued," he used his sole remaining hand to cling to shizun's leg, pretending he'd had absolutely no intention of running off. "Shifu, the Luwu ship capsized, and that Wang from Southern Shu is drooling over my beauty, he just won't leave me alone. Because of him I got chased all the way back here by those big worms...by the Cauldron of Nine Dragons. I nearly died! I thought I'd never see you again, shifu!"

There was nowhere for Zhi Xiu's raised hand to fall. He had to retract it. Zhaoting buzzed as it vibrated; it was unclear whether it was pleading for mercy on Xi Ping's behalf or lodging a complaint against him.

"Good child." Zhi Xiu crushed a handful of spiritual stones and elixir pills and sprinkled them over him. Xi Ping trembled, feeling as if what shizun had crushed was his skull. "If I don't deal with you when we get back, I'll be calling you something."

But just then, the east wind suddenly turned keen.

There had been an east wind blowing over the Southern He Peninsula the whole time, strong enough for a hurricane, unusually so. But the fighting among the masters had been too intense. Everyone had been ignoring the wind.

But right after the Ceaseless Mirror appeared, that wind suddenly became an astral wind.

The houses on the ground, the mining machinery...all the remnants were swept away. Zhi Xiu threw out a hand behind himself to shield his wretched disciple, currently an inhuman lump. All the cultivators sniffed out an inauspicious aura.

The east...

In a flash, Xi Ping gave a start.

The Resurrection Vortex, the Impassable Sea!

Not caring that his body hadn't yet regenerated after being shattered by sword energy, his consciousness entered the paperman on Wei Chengxiang's boat—he really had a crow's mouth; the Luwu ship had indeed overturned. It was only that, protected by arrays and immortal tools, it hadn't yet sunk or fallen into the water. It was floating precariously on the sea. The half-immortals on the ship were brandishing all kinds of talismans, struggling to maintain equilibrium. The paperman Xi Ping fought free of Wei Chengxiang's arms and snatched up a Heavenly Question that had just come flying toward them and read it quickly.

Lin Chi's letter discussed the important points about the origin of the inscriptions and the cause of Kunlun's formation.

Since ancient times, the northern and southern continents had been inhabited by different peoples, their cultures and languages incomprehensible to each other. When the Sword Ancestor had put an end to the natural disaster in Northern Li, it hadn't yet impacted the southern continent.

But there was no barrier between the northern and southern continents, and spiritual energy circulated. After the first range of spiritual mountains formed and heavenly commandments were established on the northern half of the continent, the flow of spiritual energy throughout the whole human world changed its pattern along with him.

The southern continent had no sea of inscriptions created by the common people, and naturally it also had no veins of the earth. But spiritual energy began to assemble around those masters who shared the ideals and followed the way of the Sword Ancestor.

The south had the Two Sages, the east had the Southern Sage, the west had the Black Emperor, and on the sea there was Tianbo. Their cultivation rose with the tide; one after another, they reached the full moon boundary.

Kunlun had formed under the impetus of the people, and the Sword Ancestor had reached his “full moon” position because of the birth of the Kunlun Mountains. The other four ranges of immortal mountains had been made on this basis. First came the full moon sage, and then the spiritual mountains gathered with the sage as a foundation and put forth veins of the earth.

In the present, the cultivation world said that the Great Way has three thousand paths, all different paths with the same end; this was because those with different ends had nearly all been eliminated during that period. The ways of those who had fallen behind had shattered, and their essences had been plundered. The remnants of their consciousnesses had been unwilling to scatter; they had formed pestilences or lost their minds, nourishing the shadow beneath the feet of those in the cultivation world—heart demons.

In this way, “demons” had been born.

Lin Chi wrote: The origins of the world’s heavenly commandments, the origins of inscriptions, are in the Kunlun Mountains, in the Ceaseless Mirror. Lancang’s senior wished to use them to alter the heavenly commandments and disperse Lancang’s spiritual energy.

Xi Ping: “...”

Well, wasn't that a coincidence? The demon host was sealed in the resurrection vortex next door.

CHAPTER 228 - A Life of Regret (40)

First the Lancang Mountains had “come back from the dead.” Then, nearly all the extant shed skin sages had assembled on the Southern He Peninsula, where birds didn’t shit, and had started fighting.

Since antiquity, there had been a subtle connection between war and demons. When they had whipped the East Sea and the South Sea up to a boil several times with their fighting, how could the Resurrection Vortex remain calm?

The “shoddy patch” there wasn’t the genuine article, anyway, and of the three great shed skins who had done the patching, in Xi Ping’s current view, at least two had been dodgy goods; their work had nearly been destroyed by a half-immortal.

And never mind the three great divine tools of the mountains already locked in a chaotic battle here like headless flies, the Kunlun Sect Leader with his germinating cranium had also brandished the Ceaseless Mirror—it was said that this thing hadn’t made an appearance since the formation of the Kunlun Mountains.

According to Lin Chi’s interpretation, the Ceaseless Mirror was the origin of the set of inscriptions that had circulated at the time, which also meant that many “new inscriptions” used by later generations were effective because they were built upon the earliest built foundation of the heavenly commandments. The “demon host” in the Impassable Sea were the dregs that had been rejected by that series of inscriptions. When Xi Ping had hit the Ceaseless Mirror with his sword attack, it had amounted to loosening the ropes binding the demon host.

And the demon seal in the Impassable Sea was also written in inscriptions!

What Zhou Ying had done halfway before being desperately held back by Xi Ping, he had now unexpectedly completed himself in a single hit.

In just this brief span of time, a black mist had risen over the Resurrection Vortex and begun to spread in all directions.

And in addition to the demon seal, the great mountain arrays and all the national boundaries were also written in inscriptions.

In Heaven’s Design Pavilion on the Wan-He border, the karma beast suddenly stood up. The Kaiming Cultivators on guard watched dumbfounded as the ranks of invisible border inscriptions floated off the ground. Of them, approximately fifty percent of the inscriptions “went out” for a moment before reconnecting. Though it had only been for the blink of an eye, the wildfire on the Southern He Peninsula, driven to the border by the Lovebird Sword Array, seized this opening to squeeze in.

The vegetation at the border billowed like waves on the sea, withering and dying in large stretches. The “wildfire” vines raced in a frenzy into this land of plenty.

Next came the reeking wind.

When the demon seal broke, though the Resurrection Vortex was located between Wan and He, there was a gathering of masters on the Southern He Peninsula, which the demon host avoided, so it was Southern Wan that bore the brunt!

In the Kunlun Sect Leader’s bright red eyes there was only “expelling evil”; he ignored everything else. When his first assault missed its target, he cast the Ceaseless Mirror into the sky. That little mirror two cun large grew countless times, blocking out the sun.

The Sword Slave’s half-puppet core array originated from the Sword Ancestor’s sword-bearing puppet and could be controlled by the Ceaseless Mirror, while Zhi Xiu was afraid of stepping in lest he mistakenly harm the innocent. He scooped up Xi Ping and could do nothing but dodge hastily.

The momentary stagnation of the inscriptions had also made the Silver Moon and the Lovebird Sword Array skip briefly. The Third Elder and Xuanwu had seized that opportunity to escape.

“Don’t worry about me, shifu,” Xi Ping said quickly, forgetting the lie he had just blurted out. “Go back home! Don’t...”

The divine tools of the mountains could seal his link to the reincarnation wood, but they wouldn’t necessarily be able to sever Zhi Xiu’s link to the snow shuffler. A shed skin was after all a shed skin, and besides, among accompanying plants, there was a difference between “one’s own” and “second hand.”

Therefore, Xi Ping had used a tiny verbal trick, and as he’d expected, Zhi Xiu didn’t respond—Xi Ping knew immediately that shifu indeed still had a connection to his accompanying plant. If it had been impossible, Zhi Xiu would have calmly told him so instead of keeping silent.

There were no trees on the Southern He Peninsula. On the way here, Zhi Xiu had had to fly like the others. But returning would be the matter of a moment; no one could catch up with him, whether full moon or shed skin. This game on the Southern He Peninsula from the very first hadn’t been set up to catch him... If only he were willing.

Xi Ping was only too skilled at hitting people where it hurt. He nearly blurted out, Don't delay, what do I matter in comparison to the Impassable Sea? Anyway, that was my sword attack just now.

If he only said it, it would be just like how he had used a few sentences to interrupt Zhou Ying while the latter had been tormenting the demon seal; shifu would immediately be left with no choice.

Could he really abandon his country for the sake of his disciple and his own selfishness?

Even if Zhi Xiu himself were willing to shoulder that eternal infamy, what about Xi Ping? Having personally damaged the demon seal by mistake, if Xi Ping had a rest of his life, how would he live it down?

But when the words rolled up to the tip of his tongue, Xi Ping clenched his teeth and held them back, not spitting them out.

The situation was different from back then, he thought. That time, san-ge had been standing on the edge of the cliff, getting ready to jump. He'd only needed to turn back and see the shore. Therefore, Xi Ping had had no scruples; he only needed to haul him back from the edge, whatever it took. As long as it worked, it didn't matter what he said.

This was different. Zhi Xiu was already caught in a dilemma. If he spoke to compel him, it would be cutting out shifu's heart.

Do not be a hero, and certainly do not be a god. It had sounded like a warning coming from his shifu, but now that he thought about it, it seemed that this was the closest thing to a complaint that shifu had ever uttered in his life.

He had already made a poor showing while taking care of the Territory Map. He couldn't shift all the responsibility simply because shizun was the legendary "General Zhi."

Xi Ping was unfilial, but he wasn't yet unfilial to that degree.

"Don't...don't worry about not returning, either. Anyway, you can notify them, and the upgraded immortal tools will hold out for a while." Xi Ping took a deep breath. "Heaven's Design Pavilion and the Kaiming Department branch should both have snow shufflers. Have them plant some more, or else your field of vision will be limited... Be careful, the Cauldron of Nine Dragons is still in the sea!"

No sooner had his crow's mouth spoken these words than a shadow emerged on the surface of the sea. The Cauldron of Nine Dragons was also among the divine tools that had been impacted by the inscriptions, and Wangge Luobao had seized that opportunity to escape. And now that the appearance of the Ceaseless Mirror had suddenly altered the terrain, the “industrious” Lingyun Sect Leader immediately cast aside everything else in favor of “considering the situation as a whole,” taking a side and adding in his own push.

Zhi Xiu pushed Xi Ping aside. Zhaoting’s point forced the teeth-baring, claw-brandishing dragon head away at the last moment. The huge dragon crashed into the water, raising spray to the height of a hill. Through the curtain of water, Zhi Xiu’s complicated and unreadable gaze fell onto the rebellious disciple he had just wanted to give a beating to.

“I’ve really done it this time.” Xi Ping skillfully twisted his wrist, the last to grow back, returning the joint to its proper position. “It’s totally hopeless. If I can’t clean it up, won’t I have to sell myself to compensate for it? Ptui, I can’t do that!”

Zhi Xiu: “...”

“I have a way.” Xi Ping’s focus had reached the greatest heights, countless thoughts rising and falling in his mind. His consciousness was invisibly more concentrated than usual, and the speed of the hidden bones regenerating his body had increased considerably. In the time it had taken to have this conversation, the half of his body that had been shattered earlier had been almost fully restored. The three sword attacks he had taken from Flying Jade Peak had completely fused with his meridians.

No hopeless situation could hold back a heart bent of finding a way out. When he calmed himself entirely, Xi Ping indeed came up with a thought for how to answer the situation.

Wanshuang was being controlled; on their side, they only had shifu left—an ascended spirit didn't count on this occasion; presumably all the gods and demons of heaven were thinking that, too. But he wasn't without new cards in his hand. The first was that when the demon aura had blown toward them, the Kunlun Sect Leader's symptoms had clearly worsened; he had become even more lost. Second was that Master Lin had figured out the inscriptions; if mortals used inscriptions, as long as there were enough of them, there might well be a result, as long as he could restore his connection to the reincarnation wood.

Without Zhaoting, he couldn't fly a sword under the noses of shed skin sword cultivators, so Xi Ping simply stood on a talisman for riding the wind and charged toward the Ceaseless Mirror on the sea wind Zhaoting had raised cutting down the Cauldron of Nine Dragons.

“Keep an eye out for me, shifu. If you see me about to die, stab me!”

Only Zhaoting could shatter his body without harming his consciousness, letting his consciousness slip out through a crack. The others were all determined to destroy him body and soul.

Apart from the others, he also had a third card: Lin Chi's letter contained an enormous volume of information, the most important point being Kunlun's Ceaseless Mirror.

And inside the Ceaseless Mirror, there just happened to be a person—a consciousness.

If san-ge's word could be relied on, and he really could enter the Ceaseless Mirror without his consciousness being destroyed, then according to what Lin Chi had said, he had likely already found the Beijue Pass, the location of the main body of Kunlun's Ceaseless Mirror.

He couldn't strike at the Ceaseless Mirror again, or else the border inscriptions of all the nations would be damaged, and the situation would be even harder to clean up. But that didn't mean...that the Ceaseless Mirror couldn't escape the control of Kunlun's old lunatic.

Inside the Ceaseless Mirror, Zhou Ying's spiritual sense was touched. He whipped his head around to look back the way he had come.

The aura of the High Priest, fast approaching the grave, had lingered after bringing him inside. Now it had disappeared.

When the previous High Priest's body died, the entrance to the Ceaseless Mirror would settle on the spirit of the new High Priest, but it hadn't; in its place, there was biting cold sword energy. In other words, Kunlun's Sect Leader had temporarily taken over the Ceaseless Mirror—this could only mean that he and the High Priest were no longer in the Kunlun Mountains, and that the Ceaseless Mirror had made its appearance in the human world!

The only person in the world who could force a peak shed skin sword cultivator to brandish the Ceaseless Mirror was the Sword Slave; others weren't qualified in terms of fighting strength, and they didn't have the capacity to provoke the old Sect Leader into frenzy.

Zhou Ying tapped on the surface of the mirror and quickly scribbled a line of writing, asking Xie Chu: Can you still contact Xi Shiyong?

Xie Chu was just cleaning up the snow and ice around the Ceaseless Mirror, exhausting all his efforts to record the inscriptions at its edges. He didn't dare to waste a single breath of warmth. Even his breathing was very controlled. He snatched up a handful of the spiritual stones in his mustard seed, which were running out, and while he was at it touched the reincarnation wood, then shook his head.

In other words, Xi Shiyong was likely on the scene.

Zhou Ying cast his eyes down slightly, rapidly deducing the situation in the outside world right now. At the same time, he acutely sensed the aura of the heart demon in the Kunlun Sect Leader's sword energy.

The position of High Priest was temporarily vacant, and the Sect Leader who was pinioned by a heart demon without his knowledge had to control the Ceaseless Mirror; a portion of his consciousness would have to enter the mirror.

Beneath the Ceaseless Mirror was buried the origin of the spiritual mountains. The Way of the Heart of a master who regularly wandered here was likely to be corroded; therefore, the Ceaseless Mirror had always been Kunlun's taboo, controlled by the High Priest, who had a half-immortal cultivation level. Right now, the Sect Leader's reason probably hadn't yet fled entirely; opening the Ceaseless Mirror had been only a matter of convenience. Naturally he didn't dare to probe deeply with his consciousness. He had absolutely no idea that at the end of the divine tool of the mountains was the master of the heart demon seed.

Naturally Kunlun's Sect Leader had seen Xi Ping. A little ascended spirit, and not even a sword cultivator... The Sect Leader didn't even bother scolding him for overestimating his capabilities. He raised a hand, ready to crush this tiny ant. Just then, a familiar voice spoke into his ear: "Sect Leader shixiong."

It was as if Kunlun's Sect Leader had been struck by lightning. The next moment, he suddenly remembered: that person—or rather, his corpse—was in the Ceaseless Mirror.

CHAPTER 229 - A Life of Regret (41)

“Lanze...” The Kunlun Sect Leader moved his lips unconsciously, speaking in a voice as feeble as dust.

But it couldn't escape a cultivator's hearing.

At a distance from him, the Third Elder's heart trembled. He wished he were deaf. The Sword Slave, knocked down to earth by the Ceaseless Mirror, abruptly raised her head—“Lanze” was the Second Elder's courtesy name.

At this stage, Xi Ping had no more time to plan his steps. All his reactions were instinctive.

Synthesizing what Lin Chi and Yao Qi had said, the Second Elder must have gone too deep while repairing the Beijue Array and had inadvertently seen the inscriptions there, then had died there when he had gone in person to verify. The details couldn't be discerned. He processed it roughly, only picking up the irrefutable and vital points. “To launch a sneak attack on a fellow sect member in the place he had guarded his whole life, kill him to keep him silent, then hide his corpse in the Ceaseless Mirror to cover up the truth...”

His words were interrupted by sword wind.

This blow ought to have sliced him to pieces, but this foremost Sect Leader's mind was unstable. Xi Ping's "launch a sneak attack on a fellow sect member" and "hide his corpse in the Ceaseless Mirror" stabbed into his ears, and the "corpse" inside the Ceaseless Mirror was knocking again and again on his consciousness.

"I want to pay a visit to the Beijue Mountain Pass. Please undertake the array for me, Sect Leader shixiong."

"I know what they're all thinking, shixiong. You're the only one I trust."

"Sect Leader shixiong..."

Kunlun's Sect Leader couldn't distinguish whether the questioning voice was coming from inside or outside the mirror. His hand began to shake as it held his sword. Xi Ping, who was richly experienced in being hunted, narrowly avoided the thrust.

On the ground, all the bone jade in the body of the Sword Slave, bound by the Ceaseless Mirror, began to shake. Her mouthful of teeth that could crunch spiritual stones like candy chattered. "What did you say? What did you say?!"

The Second Elder had persisted in believing that if he could only prove that Lancang's Sect Leader hadn't been practicing an evil art before his death, no matter what else, the cultivation world wouldn't openly rob the common people to get spiritual stones. The Sect Leader could do nothing to change his mind. Pleading seclusion as an excuse, he had wanted to paper things over and wait for everyone to cool down, not expecting that when he began to meditate that day, he would for the first time come into contact with something that was almost a "heavenly edict." The contents of the heavenly edict were vague, but when the Sect Leader opened his eyes, the Second Elder saying I've seen inscriptions like this outside the Beijue Array lingered continuously in his mind.

Moved by obscure motives, he agreed to go with the Second Elder. Before he left, the High Priest came to see him and requested to come along. That was the previous High Priest, already elderly then, only waiting for a new High Priest from among the bodies with their consciousnesses sealed to inherit the memories and then awaken; it had been a long time since he had made an appearance... The Sect Leader thought that he ought to have known then that the expedition would be doomed.

Outside the Beijue Mountains, even for shed skins, was the most difficult place on earth to survive. To keep their consciousnesses from being lost in the utter cold, the two of them took turns standing guard as the other rested.

In recent years, though they had shared control over Kunlun's general affairs, there had been some disagreeable words spoken between them; when they met, they would stick to business. They rarely had a chance to reminisce about past affections.

In a difficult spot, people became much closer.

In order to stay awake, the two of them began idly chatting about the past. The Sect Leader had built Kunlun Mountain's Disciple Hall system single-handed, and the Second Elder had been in the first batch of disciples in the Disciple Hall, personally selected by the Sect Leader, introduced to cultivation by him step by step. They also each spoke of their respective troubling juniors. The Sect Leader brought up Wu Lingxiao; sighing out white steam, he said he had a whetstone, an excellent thing; when they returned to the sect, the Second Elder could take it and give it to his little disciple to coax her into coming back.

They also spoke of all the grave diseases plaguing the cultivation world at the time... The Sect Leader had never revealed so many of his quandaries to another person, not even the High Priest.

When cultivation reached the level of these two shed skins, it became very hard to confide in another. He hadn't thought that what was beyond the Beijue Mountains would drag divine sages back to mortality. The pair of thousand-year-old shed skins had to share their meager resources with each other so both could survive. They dimly returned to their youth, brothers and bosom companions walking shoulder-to-shoulder.

Until they reached the end of the Beijue Array.

Xi Ping said, “Your honored sect merits the position of foremost in the world. After doing a shameful deed, you still aren’t afraid that a ghost will come knocking at your door. I admire you!”

A ghost...

When the High Priest had pushed the Second Elder’s body into the Ceaseless Mirror, his essence had not yet completely dispersed. Was he really dead? Was it possible...that he was roaming in the Ceaseless Mirror, always watching him?

In that moment, the Sect Leader forgot the ascended spirit in front of him, forgot the Sword Slave, and forgot the friends and enemies from all the great sects. Heedless of all else, he sent his consciousness into the Ceaseless Mirror.

Zhou Ying silently turned into mist. The weak aura of an established foundation was matter-of-factly ignored by that sword cultivator. He sensed the Kunlun Sect Leader's aura charge directly toward the Second Elder's body.

Oh? So impulsive?

With a thought, Zhou Ying knew that most likely there was also someone outside the Ceaseless Mirror provoking him.

A shed skin sword cultivator's sword heart was extremely firm. The Sect Leader represented the will of the Kunlun Mountains. This heart demon had been too easy to raise; it couldn't only have been because he had done something shameful—Xuanwu had mistakenly killed Lingyun cultivators during his destitute wanderings, and Xiang Ning had tried taking advantage of Jinping's misfortunes and harmed its innocent people; they had both felt that they were too important to pay attention to such trifles. Neither of them had wavered.

Zhou Ying's gaze also fell on the Second Elder's corpse. Suddenly, he found that this body was very neat, much more dignified than Xie Chu, who was currently crawling through the snow. His crown was upright, and there wasn't a strand of loose hair—never mind trekking through ice and snow and getting stabbed in the back, he might not even have even been able to wake up this tidy from an afternoon nap.

Who had cleaned him up?

One thing, even if it was the revelation of a colossal secret, was in fact not so likely to incur such a tidy and efficient murderous impulse; at least there would have been a few words of argument.

The average person might think that the reason the Sect Leader had been able to bring himself to kill was that his political views disagreed with the Second Elder's and he bore a grudge, or he was jealous that a junior's cultivation might catch up with and surpass his...but would a shed skin master be base enough to be so shallow and impetuous?

When Lancang's Sect Leader had lost his mind, half of it had been the heart demon seed, and another half had been because he had betrayed the Lancang Mountains. Then Kunlun...

The shed skin sword cultivator's aura charged toward him, so aggressive it was hard to breathe. Fortunately, Zhou Ying was at present only a consciousness that had left its body. He didn't need to breathe.

Dispersed in the mist, a guess suddenly came to him. He changed his line of attack. "Sect Leader shixiong, I know it wasn't your choice to attack me. I don't blame you. I only feel pity that you, the hero of an era, have become the spiritual mountains' puppet and don't know it yourself..."

The Sect Leader's ears roared, his consciousness crammed full of the whispering of the heart demon—back then, when he had heard the happy surprise in the voice of the Second Elder walking in front of him, there had been a moment when he had actually felt a little gratified. In the present cultivation world, there weren't many who could still be so pure.

When he had gone over, he had even thought that Kunlun currently had enough spiritual stones, and it didn't plan on turning over immortal tools for mortal use. There was no need for them to covet another nation's spiritual mountains like the southerners. If Lanze really could give those hypocritical southerners a slap in the face, what would it cost him as his shixiong to cover up for him?

But all his thoughts disappeared the instant he saw those inscriptions. The Sect Leader was engulfed in unreasoning panic, as if the greatest secret of his life had been unearthed. Apart from the icy desire to kill, there was nothing in his head. His memories practically cut off at that moment.

He only remembered that when he had come back to his senses, the point of his sword had already fallen on the Second Elder's back. A single blow had cut through his body and pierced his essence. Next, the High Priest had emerged from the mustard seed hidden realm he was carrying and opened the Ceaseless Mirror in front of him.

The wintry wind outside the Beijue Mountain Pass was too much for an old half-immortal with one foot in the grave. The High Priest's form only appeared for a moment before it was completely frozen. The Second Elder's body disappeared inside the Ceaseless Mirror, and the previous High Priest stood rigid in front of it, having died in the line of duty.

Dazed, the Sect Leader retraced his steps in a panic. Because of his plentiful essence, in the end he didn't freeze to death outside the Beijue Mountains. Holding out with his last breath, he had returned the Ceaseless Mirror to the Kunlun Mountain summit. The new High Priest opened his eyes from among a group of "candidates" whose consciousnesses had been sealed. He had already received all the memories of the previous High Priest. Apart from being young, his manner and tone were in no way different from his elder's.

Seeing the Sect Leader, the first words he said to him were, "Zhu Lanze had become disloyal. Punishing him was the heavenly edict of the spiritual mountains. The Sect Leader only dealt with him fairly. I know that righteousness and personal feelings are hard to separate. The Sect Leader must be suffering now. I offer you my condolences."

The High Priest had been right. When the Sect Leader thought back to it after the fact, he thought more and more that the Second Elder had been heretical, wanting to shake the foundations of his own spiritual mountains for the sake of a few foreigners who had nothing to do with him. It had been a matter of urgency; however broken-hearted he might be, there had been nothing else he could do. Hadn't the High Priest endorsed his righteous choice to murder a loved one? The blankness in his mind then had been only the suffering of being unable to have it both ways.

Lying to himself and others, the Sect Leader had pushed a hidden truth down to the bottom of his heart: he had had no intention of killing then, and the one who had raised the sword to kill hadn't been him at all. It had been that will that had suddenly occupied his body.

But he didn't dare to believe it, didn't dare to think closely about it. He would rather admit that he was base and shameless, that he had been jealous of his extraordinarily talented shidi. Otherwise, in the millennium and more during which he had opened his spiritual eyes in the chaotic primordial world, refined his sword aura amid the harshest ice and snow, sought high and low in the face of near-certain death, made the difficult trek to the present, had he really been doing it all in order to cultivate himself into a puppet?

The heart demon sighed softly and said, "Mortals always lie to themselves and others and shift blame so they can feel good about themselves. You're clearly a good person, but why must you contort your own heart for the sake of a Way of the Heart? Sect Leader Shixiong, why don't you take a look in the Ceaseless Mirror, see who is the true 'sword slave' of the spiritual mountains?"

The Ceaseless Mirror, suspended in the sky above the Lancang Mountains, suddenly shook, instantly breaking free of the Kunlun Sect Leader's control.

The Sword Slave immediately fought free of the divine tool of the mountains and took up Wanshuang.

San-ge really was influencing events here through the Ceaseless Mirror! Xi Ping's chest grew warm, and his vision blurred. But he didn't delay. He immediately made way for the Sword Slave and escaped.

He needed to find a moment to break again, strengthen his cultivation, then think of a way to pare down the Silver Moon and the Lovebird Sword Array. Only then would he be able to reconnect with the reincarnation wood. Once he was free, he wouldn't be so passive anymore, and shifu would no longer be held back by him, caught here on the horns of a dilemma.

It was just that while shattering his body was easy, once his body was shattered, his consciousness would be unprotected. Never mind these masters, even running into an established foundation could destroy him. He also needed a chance to regenerate.

Perhaps at the bottom of the sea...

But while all of Xi Ping's focus was on the Ceaseless Mirror and the Kunlun swords, a huge roc beast spirit appeared out of nowhere beside him and slammed into him.

This was a technique of the Shu. That son-of-a-bitch Wangge Luobao!

The beast spirit disappeared. Xi Ping's vision darkened. He had been slammed back beneath the Ceaseless Mirror.

Kunlun's Sect Leader was caught by the heart demon, but the others weren't. For Xuanwu, this could be called new grievances on top of old resentments. He happened to arrive just now, his curved blade pointed right at the center of Xi Ping's brow. The Lovebird Sword Array and the Silver Moon locked onto Xi Ping simultaneously. Immediately, he couldn't move a muscle. Kunlun's Third Elder had heard what Xi Ping had said earlier; his urge to kill rose instantly. He also aimed a blow at him.

Wangge Luobao rejoiced as if he had received a divine blessing. His efforts had somehow been crowned with success. He seized the opportunity to dive back into the water. Countless aquatic spiritual beasts gathered above his head, meeting death with shrill cries, covering him with a thousand-zhang shield of flesh.

This ploy was steady, accurate, and relentless. Even from right next to him, Zhi Xiu couldn't have saved Xi Ping.

In a flash, the veins stood out on Zhi Xiu's hand as he gripped his sword. Then the Sword that Mended the Heavens flew out and pierced Xi Ping's body. If he were touched by a divine tool of the mountains, with ascended spirit cultivation, he would certainly be decimated body and soul. Only Zhaoting, shattering his body and releasing his consciousness, could leave him a chance to escape alive.

This was a genuine article, full-blown shed skin sword attack, innumerable times stronger than what Xi Ping himself had barely been able to wield earlier. Like a bit of froth, he was instantly crushed to bits. It was too quick. Xi Ping hardly felt the pain.

The force of the sword energy that had pierced him wasn't yet spent. It met the deadly foes.

Xi Ping's consciousness seized the opportunity to flee.

But just then, he saw himself in the Ceaseless Mirror.

Right now, he was plainly only a consciousness, but the out-of-control mirror reflected a complete and entire set of hidden bones—and unlike what he had seen in the Eternal Flame, the hidden bones in the mirror were covered with inscriptions.

When Xi Ping's consciousness was reflected in the Ceaseless Mirror, Kunlun's Sect Leader came back to his senses. He suddenly cast aside the Second Elder's corpse and stabbed at Xi Ping, caught by the Ceaseless Mirror.

Just then, a beam of utterly clear sword light surged upward. Wanshuang brushed shoulders with Xi Ping and blocked the fatal attack for him.

But the rapidly spiraling spiritual energy around him collected and pulled Xi Ping in like a whirlpool.

Zhaoting, Wanshuang, the great divine tools of the mountains, two Kunlun swords... Any one of those gusts of spiritual wind was enough to tear apart an ascended spirit's body. No matter what, the hidden bones couldn't manage to put him together.

“A...A-Xiang, help...help me out!”

“What?!”

Wei Chengxiang had just managed to get the capsized boat upright by using an upgraded immortal tool. When she turned her head, dazzling inscriptions began to emerge on the body of the paperman next to her.

“I’m a half-immortal. If I make a rubbing of an inscription, it’ll just be a doodle,” Wei Chengxiang said. “What kind of lousy idea is this? If you just needed enough people, then that rich and powerful bunch with tens of thousands of people working in their factories would have had them stamping inscriptions on everything, and making offerings and burning incense—wouldn’t the whole world be full of spiritual mountains?”

Xi Ping didn’t have time to answer her.

Luckily, while Wei Chengxiang didn’t believe it, she wasn’t idle. Before she finished speaking, she had already recorded the inscriptions on the paperman onto a seal and transferred them through an array to all the Luwu ships.

All the “survivors” from the Southern He Peninsula just happened to be on the Luwu boats.

Wei Chengxiang said, "I'm telling you, this is ridiculous!"

As she scolded, she "ridiculously" stamped inscriptions all over a potted reincarnation wood tree next to her.

Instantly, through the hands of the Turmoilers and the Luwu, countless inscriptions were stamped on reincarnation wood amulets of all forms. The half-immortals who normally used reincarnation wood to communicate automatically sent their consciousnesses into it, while the mortals concentrated and called out as usual—

"Tai Sui..."

"Tai Sui!"

A faint warm current seemed to flow over Xi Ping's trapped consciousness. With a roar, the people's voices surged toward him like the tide.

Wei Chengxiang, with her hand on the reincarnation wood, heard a familiar voice in her ears: "It's very interesting when you come to think of it. It seems that not being able to write inscriptions until you're an established foundation is also something stipulated by these inscriptions."

The hidden bones abruptly broke free of the spiritual energy tearing at him and gathered up spiritual energy. The outlines of Xi Ping's body were restored at a previously unheard of speed. The moment his hands grew out of thin air and planted on the strings of the Tai Sui Qin, Xi Ping knew that his cultivation had reached the late ascended spirit stage.

Tao County, the South Sea, Wan, Chu... All the places where reincarnation wood grew once again appeared in his consciousness.

The reincarnation wood amulet Zhi Xiu carried spoke: "Shifu, go!"

Zhi Xiu stopped hesitating. Before the force of Zhaoting's blow was spent, man and sword light had merged, simply swapping places with an accompanying plant on the Wan-He border.

At the same time, the reincarnation wood seeds Xi Ping had left with Yao Qi and Chang Jun sprouted inside the mustard seed—that mustard seed hidden realm had fallen into the sea when Xi Ping had been crushed to dust. The next moment, Xi Ping escaped from in front of the Ceaseless Mirror. Through the reincarnation wood saplings, he arrived in the mustard seed hidden realm.

"Your Highness the Blind Wolf King!" In the Beijue Mountain Pass, Xi Ping's voice came from the seemingly dead reincarnation wood amulet carried by Xie Chu. “Did my san-ge leave word for me?”

CHAPTER 230 - A Life of Regret (42)

When Xie Chu had been selected to enter the inner sect, he had gone himself to find the Second Elder and volunteer his services, because he had heard that the Heart Sword was the only kind of sword that relied on the spiritual sense. Supposing that there was something that required a certain innate talent to learn well, then a person who had that innate talent would certainly have an easier time if he entered that way.

Anyway, that's what he had thought. He had always preferred easy work to hard work.

The Lingchi Lantern burned quietly. All the parts of Xie Chu's body that could feel pain had already burned away. Apart from his skeleton and his charred flesh, only the essence, consciousness, and meridians of an ascended spirit cultivator remained... He thought that the Snow Wolf had been able to burn his meridians back then, too, but for some reason, a cultivator's meridians were like furnace dregs, squalidly left behind. When the fire was extinguished, they would be frozen here forever along with his essence.

“S-since you've guessed where I am...” Xie Chu said, sending out a talisman and revealing another patch of inscriptions, “could you at least... ask whether I'm dead or alive?”

Xi Ping asked in turn, “Well, aren’t you already beyond the Beijue Mountain Pass?”

Wasn’t that like shouldering a pack of dynamite and charging at the gates of the underworld?

Xie Chu scolded, “Little asshole,” while exerting all his strength to wipe the snow from the last patch of inscriptions. His vision darkened. Next, Xie Chu realized that he wasn’t the one who had burned out; it was the Lingchi Lantern.

The fire had gone out.

Once the fire went out, his essence immediately began to congeal. Xie Chu raised his head with difficulty. Through the Ceaseless Mirror, he saw Zhou Ying wipe a patch of mist, about to write something. His almost transparent finger hung there for a long while, then retracted as if he didn’t know how to start. He nodded faintly at him.

Xie Chu propped himself up and knelt on the ground. While drawing a little-used array, he said to Xi Ping, “There’s a set of inscriptions outside the Beijue Mountains. Do you know about it?”

Xi Ping opened his mouth. His breathing became rapid. He forgot the words that had come up to his lips. All his attention was focused on listening to Xie Chu's hoarse, exhausted voice.

“This is a place of desolation. With no one to guide you, finding your way here amid the boundless snow is impossible, unless you are a full moon sage who can go anywhere. Beneath a full moon sage, without the protection of a Heart Sword, your consciousness will be lost in the Beijue Array. Even if someone leads you by the shortest path, you still won't make it this far. At the feet of the spiritual mountains now, no new full moon sage will emerge. As for the Heart Sword... Kunlun is a millennium-old sword sect, and Zhu Lanze is the only one it has produced. If you want to wait for the next...the next person like my shifu, it might take you another thousand years. This sword he passed down only to me. Because your dad insisted on wallowing in the mundane dust, unwilling to budge, I haven't taken a direct disciple. That bullshit soft sword of the Snow Wolf's is only an imitation in form. So this lineage has been lost.”

These were last words—Xi Ping's throat moved slightly. Exercising his greatest patience, he kept from rushing him.

“Lost... My shifu's Way of the Heart can't be passed on, and as for me...” Xie Chu looked at himself in the Ceaseless Mirror. The inscriptions on his spirit began to slowly leave his body, dispersing into the air.

That heartless wretch Zhou Ying, in order to make him finish the work, had interrupted his contemplations several times. But a person couldn't control their own thoughts. Though Xie Chu had nearly been frozen silly and was slower on the uptake than usual, the truth was still like oil dripping onto paper. Bit by bit, it had seeped through.

He drew on the very last of his essence that could still move and finished drawing the array. The spiritual threads looked like scratches made on a coffin by a person who had been buried alive.

“What I mean is, little devil, in a while, I'm going to die here, and no other living person will come here again. In the world today, no one can obtain a full set of these inscriptions—I...can take a copy of the whole set. Your sange is asking, do you want them?”

Xi Ping's pupils dilated. He was knocked dizzy by this pie falling out of the sky. He nearly blurted out, “So what are you waiting for?”

The whole system of the spiritual mountains was built on this set of inscriptions. These were the extant “heavenly commandments.” If he obtained these inscriptions, he would have the spiritual mountains by the throat. Henceforth, the mountains and rivers, the veins of the earth, the sun, moon, and stars—all of them would be in the palm of his hand.

He could do whatever he pleased, become the sole “true god” in the world, no longer be controlled by anyone, no longer fear any villain or plot.

“Of course I...”

But just then, in the reincarnation wood, Wei Chengxiang put in a word.

“Though I still don’t understand the principle, that actually did work. You’re really something else... Hss...” Wei Chengxiang, exhausted, was leaning against the ship’s hold with her head tilted back. She had used too many talismans. The surge of spiritual energy through her meridians had tied them into a knot. “A cramp—Xiao A-Sui, the reincarnation wood has been restored, so you must still be in good health, huh?”

Her voice instantly seemed to shatter some illusion. Xi Ping gave a start. Before he could answer, he heard a racket in the reincarnation wood. The Luwu, all talking over each other, were reporting something to him.

“...What?”

“Oh,” said Wei Chengxiang. “The ones going quickly are already in sight of the Guzhou port.”

Guzhou was in Wan's southwest, adjacent to the South Sea. That they could see Guzhou's port meant that they had already basically escaped the Southern He Peninsula.

With the replenishment of Zhi Xiu's spiritual stones, the Luwu had finally caught their breath. Though some ships had capsized and some had simply sunk, they were at any rate all immortal tools operated by spiritual stones. While the masters were fighting fit to bring down the sky, they had fled in a frenzy in all kinds of desperate states, and now they had nearly made it.

It was hard to say what would happen in the future, but at least they had all survived.

"We escaped by the skin of our teeth," Wei Chengxiang said with a feeling sigh. "Though I'm in no position to represent anyone...thank you."

Xi Ping didn't know what he babbled in response. His heart, which had just been beating wildly, sank abruptly.

By coincidence, A-Xiang's interruption had just happened to extinguish the frenzy that had come over his mind out of nowhere. Xi Ping's mind went blank for a moment. He thought, What was I thinking just now?

Having calmed down, Xi Ping suddenly realized that he actually couldn't clearly explain what the inscriptions outside the Beijue Mountains were.

Flying Jade Peak had never been expert in talismans, arrays, and inscriptions. His shifu himself could only just muddle through in this respect, and Xi Ping was like a sprout pulled up too early; even his general knowledge lagged far behind those of the same level as him.

Before this, he had witnessed Kunlun's Sect Leader give birth to a heart demon and had known what had happened to General Zhi Yi before his death, and then he'd seen Lancang's Sect Leader via Yao Qi and the next life mist... He had collected a whole heap of causes and effects. If not for that, he might not even have been able to understand what Lin Chi's letter had been describing.

That being the case, when even Xuanwu had been at a loss before Master Lin had deciphered the inscriptions, how had he, upon hearing Yao Qi relate the Lancang Sect Leader's last words, known at once that they could control inscriptions?

Could his true identity be some rare inscription genius?

Impossible. All learning in the world that required rote memorization was anathema to him!

Afterward, because of Wangge Luobao's sneak attack, he had unexpectedly ended up in front of the Ceaseless Mirror. How had he, after seeing the inscriptions on the hidden bones, been immediately certain that those inscriptions could help him reconnect with the reincarnation wood?

It was true that at the moment of crisis, a person would rely on intuition and instinct to act. But "sowing discord," "exposing illicit love affairs," and "shifting blame" were his usual level. Learning and applying a set of inscriptions he'd never even heard of shouldn't have been included.

Also, he suddenly remembered, his panicked rush to find the Blind Wolf King had been so he could ask about Zhou Ying's current condition. Of course it mattered what was outside the Beijue Mountains, but from his point of view, it had to get in line behind his close kin. But when he had heard about the ancient inscriptions outside the Beijue Mountains just now, he seemed to have actually forgotten Zhou Ying.

The South Sea had been swept by the sword gods from the snow-capped mountains of the north and south. Keen-edged spray flew everywhere.

Xi Ping's chest went cold—the most frightening thing was that since he had seen the hidden bones in the Sea of Stars, he had been able to distinguish which thoughts were his own and which were those rotten bones making mischievous. But right now, had the Beijue Mountain inscriptions not made the hidden bones overly excited, leading them to slip up and expose themselves, he would have had no idea.

After being shattered repeatedly, it was the hidden bones that had brought their cultivation nearly to shed skin level, not him.

“I’m not trying...trying to rush you,” Xie Chu’s voice, weaker than before, came through the reincarnation wood, “but if you dither any longer, I’m going to kick the bucket.”

Inside the Ceaseless Mirror, there was a faint gravity to Zhou Ying’s expression.

Xi Ping concentrated and said, “From what you say, Your Highness the Blind Wolf King, it seems you really can contact my san-ge? How is he?”

Xie Chu paused.

Xi Ping could suppress the hidden bones, but this was a weighty matter. Precautions had to be taken. Xie Chu had received instructions in advance. If Xi Ping didn’t ask about “san-ge,” only set his heart entirely on asking about the ancient inscriptions outside the Beijue Mountains, he shouldn’t give them to him; if Xi Ping immediately answered that he wanted them, without any hesitation, he also shouldn't give them to him. It wouldn't be him making the decision.

Xie Chu laboriously turned his head and met Zhou Ying's eyes. He nodded: normal.

Zhou Ying's expression at last eased slightly. With a trace of a smile at the corners of his mouth, he raised a finger to his lips and shook his head at the Blind Wolf King: Don't create new problems. There was no need to tell him much.

"He's fine," Xie Chu's consciousness responded to Xi Ping. "The murderer—that Sect Leader of ours, I mean—has gone crazy, hasn't he? It was your brother's doing. His consciousness is intact."

Xi Ping quickly said, "I know his consciousness is intact. Where is he? How can I bring him back..."

Xie Chu interrupted him: "He wants you to mind your own business. For the moment, he doesn't want to return to the land of the living by borrowing a corpse, and he has his own place to go—have a heart, young master, my essence is already...completely frozen..."

Xi Ping's scalp went numb from his urging. He spoke quickly: "W-wait, wait... Y-your Highness, hang on a little longer, please! If this set of inscriptions comes to the mortal world, what will happen?"

If it was only something like a codebook or a tool, that wouldn't matter. He could act as a human flying goose machine and take it back to the Xuanyin Mountains. He didn't have the final say in Xuanyin. As for how to use this thing, everyone could talk it over later. The whole of Moon Plated Peak was covered in inscription experts, and if there was really nothing else for it, there was still the Unbound Furnace and the Eternal Flame. The sage of the past was still with them.

But what if this was something he had no way of comprehending at his level?

Concerning the heavenly commandments, there were many fantastical details. For example, when Qiu Sha had become an ascended spirit and broken the heavenly commandments, that commandment had ceased to exist, and in a few short years, ascended spirit evil cultivators had sprung up everywhere like bamboo shoots after a spring rain. For another example, Zhou Ying had previously been unable to speak the secrets of the bottom of the Sea of Stars aloud, and even forcing himself to scrape the edges and disclose a drop had made him cough up gouts of blood, until they had blown the whole Sea of Stars up into huge fireworks, after which they could discuss the fact that “Ways of the Heart of common origin can control junior cultivators.”

What Xi Ping was afraid of was that as soon as this set of inscriptions coveted by the hidden bones flowed into the human world, it might be like a hunk of metal thrown at a spiderweb, piercing right through the human world.

Perhaps the age of the spiritual mountains would end entirely, followed by the landforms altering radically, the sun, moon, and stars adopting new paths. All the common sense familiar and unfamiliar to him might be overthrown... This wasn't something he—a person who had led an idle life in the lands of the living for a few decades—could control.

Xie Chu said, “How...how would I know? Will you...”

After their essence froze, any cultivator would be like a mortal. Xie Chu's life was rapidly draining away, and his consciousness was like a gear about to rust through, getting stiffer and slower. The words that followed were so weak that Xi Ping could hardly hear them.

“Wolf King! Your Highness the Wolf King!”

Xi Ping's back was soaked in cold sweat. He was plainly hidden in a safe place now, but this moment seemed more harrowing than when he had been getting ripped apart by several shed skin masters earlier.

No one knew what would happen after that set of ancient inscriptions appeared in the world, but he thought it was most likely the latter option. Otherwise, if it were a pie falling from the sky, only benefits without shortcomings, san-ge wouldn't have asked an extraneous question; he would simply have tossed the thing to him.

Meanwhile, with Zhi Xiu, Xi Ping, and Wangge Luobao having simultaneously broken away from the battlefield, the Silver Moon and the Cauldron of Nine Dragons had lost their targets. The Cauldron of Nine Dragons once again dove into the sea to observe from the shadows, and the Silver Moon was hanging like a big lantern above Xuan-Chang'e's head, shielding him from the Lovebird Sword Array.

The several great shed skins and the divine tools of the mountains both with and without masters were all spontaneously avoiding the Ceaseless Mirror, looking at each other in dismay as they watched Kunlun's Sect Leader and the Sword Slave having a fight to the death... You couldn't have called either of these two sword gods clear-headed.

Kunlun's internal strife was nothing to do with him. San-ge had planted the heart demon seed precisely for the sake of reaping this harvest. The harder they fought, the safer Great Wan would be.

Shifu must already have reached the border by now. With his shifu to guard the country's gates and the Kaiming Department and Heaven's Design Pavilion's elites assembled at the border with countless upgraded immortal tools at their disposal, taking care of the problem of the Impassable Sea's demon host was only a matter of time.

Even the Lancang Sect Leader's regrets and his shifu's anguish from two centuries back could be brought to a satisfactory conclusion: the spirit-conducting gold that Southern He's last emperor had personally brought out must have been about the same as what Lin Chi was making now, able to surmount the spiritual mountains' heavenly commandments. It was the inscriptions that the Sect Leader had wanted to spread at the very last that would disperse Lancang into the veins of the earth, and Lin Chi had already decoded them. With the inscriptions and the spirit-conducting gold reappearing in the human world simultaneously, perhaps it wouldn't be long before flowers really could grow once more in the Land of Turmoil.

In this instance, he had been targeted and plotted against. The journey south had been one mishap after another. But this outcome could already be called a successful conclusion to his virtuous achievements. He could take his time settling the account with Wangge Luobao.

Once he fished up Yao Qi and Chang Jun, he would take advantage of the chaos to retire in glory...

All these thoughts flashed through his mind in the space of a breath. Xi Ping came to a decision: he already knew about the foundations of the spiritual mountains, anyway. It would be better to take it steady, take time to discuss and decide, slowly resolve the chronic illnesses of the southern continent. Currently no one could go beyond the Beijue Mountains, but that wouldn't necessarily be the case in the future. What if Master Lin could create upgraded spirit-conducting gold, make some kind of miraculous little car to drive over there?

“Do whatever I please, become the sole true god,” Xi Ping thought. “You just looked in the mirror, and already you’ve forgotten that you’re a sack of bones. How about I take a piss and give you another look for free?”

“Thank you, Wolf King,” Xi Ping said. “I’m not worthy. I don’t want them.”

“Fine...” Having heard the response in the reincarnation wood, Xie Chu raised his dim eyes and took a final look into the Ceaseless Mirror at the Second Elder beside Zhou Ying. “Fine... The younger generations will surpass the older. You’re a true hero.”

“Wolf King,” said Xi Ping, “are you...”

“The Lingchi Lantern can only burn one way, and I don’t have that much flesh. Once I lit it...I didn’t plan to return,” Xie Chu whispered. “I couldn’t let the old fellow remain lost, his fate unknown...”

He had come seeking the truth, and now he had found it. Glimpsing the truth of the spiritual mountains and Ways of the Heart, his Way of the Heart breaking because of it, these were an unexpected harvest.

The ancients said, “If you understand the universe in the morning, you can die in the evening.” He had gone looking for death, and on the way he had unexpectedly comprehended the universe. Wasn’t this a sweet bargain?

Only after these blustering centuries, he had found no soulmate, and he would die without wine. That was a great regret.

“Announce this...to the world for me,” the Blind Wolf King said in an almost inaudibly soft voice. “Little devil...give your mother and father...my regards...”

Emotion was faintly visible on Xi Ping's face. He was just about to say something when, the next moment, Xie Chu poured all the white spirits on him into the array. The array was instantly activated. The spiritual threads crawled out over the snow, sticking to one inscription after another.

With a smack, the reincarnation wood amulet was sucked into the crux of the array. There was an explosion in Xi Ping's mind. He felt that his consciousness was about to be cleaved apart. Through his consciousness, a group of inscriptions all poured into his head at once.

The Blind Wolf King's hands, burned black and frozen stiff, remained at the crux of the array. He died smiling...though no one could have identified a "smile" on that face.

Just as no one knew that the most crucial answer he had heard in the reincarnation wood hadn't been what Xi Ping had said.

CHAPTER 231 - A Life of Regret (43)

Zhou Ying stood alone inside the Ceaseless Mirror, looking at the starting point of this foul and tumultuous human world.

Five great spiritual mountains, with Kunlun as their beginning.

Whether it was Lancang's Sect Leader wanting to spread the spiritual mountains' inscriptions or Hui Xiangjun taking a section of the inscriptions to create the Law Breaker and the Riverward, both of them could only move bricks around on the foundation, with only localized impact.

This time, they had dug up the "foundation" in its entirety.

The Beijue Array was destroyed the instant the array transmitted the inscriptions outward. The wild wind stirred up the ice, snow, and fog. The Blind Wolf King's charred corpse was mixed up in it, turned to dust in the blink of an eye.

There was pitch-blackness before Zhou Ying's eyes. Supposing there had still been someone here, they would have seen the big "mirror" containing one man and one corpse slowly disappear like vapor. In the mirror, Zhou Ying turned to the Second Elder and at the very last sighed. "This disciple of yours..."

If this set of foundation-like ancient inscriptions fell into the mortal world, what would happen?

Xie Chu had asked this question at the start. At the time, he had just recovered his senses after his grief and rage over his shizun's wrongful death and was mechanically digging up inscriptions on the ground according to Zhou Ying's instructions.

Zhou Ying's answer had been the same as the one Xie Chu had later used to fob off Xi Ping: How would I know?

He had also said: I'm only a young frog at the bottom of the well with slightly better eyesight than most. Do you depend on me to see across the East Sea? If I knew, I wouldn't leave it up to Shiyong to choose for himself.

Xie Chu gave a ha. Anyway, he was charred and flaming; no one could see what shape his mouth made or whether he rolled his eyes. Taking advantage of Zhou Ying's inability to hear him through the mirror, he simply muttered, "Like hell I trust you."

No one, provided they were of average intelligence, would trust Zhou Ying.

A hero sacrificed themselves for others, a villain harmed others for their own benefit, a great person did good for the people that was as plentiful as water and created a lasting institution, an idiot had paste cooking in their head and was driven by their emotions.

Zhou Ying was none of these. Xie Chu thought that this nephew of Xi Zhengde's didn't seem to have been born of the mortal world.

In order to investigate the Ceaseless Mirror, he had simply given up his Way of the Heart and physical body. In a few short months, the Kunlun Mountains had nearly been brought to ruin at his hands. Xie Chu dug up one horrifying ancient inscription after another. He didn't know what the right thing to do was, but at any rate he knew that they couldn't end up in Zhou Ying's hands.

He tapped on the surface of the Ceaseless Mirror and tentatively scrawled a few words: Well, there's nothing better to do. How do you guess that little devil will choose in the end?

Zhou Ying was briefly silent. I don't need to guess. He'll say no.

Had Xie Chu's eyebrows not been burned away by the Lingchi Lantern, they would have risen all the way to the top of his head.

None of Kunlun's previous High Priests had established foundations. Even though they inherited the memories, each and every one like the same person occupying a different body, they had still all been half-immortals. Everyone had started out in the open-eyed stage—what was a half-immortal's cultivation level? Even with Zhou Ying's paramount spiritual sense, as a half-immortal, he had still been unable to see the boundaries of the tiny Law Breaker Bracelet, unable to see the interference in the Bell of Tribulation. How could an old fogey like the High Priest dare to call himself “omniscient”?

Now it seemed that the Ceaseless Mirror was a higher-level Sea of Stars. Xie Chu even suspected that it didn't predict circumstances but rather determined them, so what the High Priest said must be so... But the High Priest was after all only a half-immortal, with a weak consciousness, clearly unable to control the Ceaseless Mirror entirely. Basically, he was a slave to the mirror. So what if there were an ascended spirit in his place...or even a shed skin?

The former Heartless Lotus—the one that had bloomed in ancient times, that was—had gambled with his life trying to come get a peek at the Ceaseless Mirror.

Who could resist this kind of power?

But Zhou Ying seemed to have read something on his soot-blackened face. He wrote, Wolf King, have you heard of the Riverward?

Hui Xiangjun had left behind three great works after her death: the Gold Imitation Technique, the Law Breaker, and the Riverward.

The Gold Imitation Technique was the Eternal Flame's true kindling, while the Law Breaker was a metaphor for the spiritual mountain. The inscriptions it used had been based on the Lancang Spiritual Mountains of eight centuries ago, of the same grade as all the spiritual mountains apart from Kunlun. Only the Riverward seemed to be out of place beside the other two.

Its so-called ability to "step between life and death" was overstating the truth somewhat. The Riverward wasn't the next life spiritual fish, after all. While it also rated as a matchless divine tool, "silently entering and exiting any place" made it sound like a burglar's tool; it didn't seem so high-grade. Moreover, the Riverward had a limited number of uses, also making it look second-rate by comparison.

Considered closely, the limited number of its uses was also very delicate—Zhou Ying thought that if he had been Hui Xiangjun, hiding Qiu Sha would have taken one use. Expecting that if Qiu Sha really could break through the ascended spirit pass, she would be certain to give rise to carnage when she went out and draw the pursuit of all the great spiritual mountains, he would have given her another use as a lifesaving trump card. But there was truly no need for the third time. If a person brought themselves to a dead end twice, a dead person's relic wouldn't be enough to protect them. If he'd had the strength to spare, he would have preferred to use it on the Law Breaker, making the scope that the Law Breaker could envelop a little more useful than the area of minuscule Tao County.

Then why was the Riverward limited to three uses? It couldn't be because this sage had some kind of peculiar obsession with numbers, could it? Where had the third use been meant to be used?

The Law Breaker and Riverward, "children of the same mother," didn't get along; that also seemed to be a metaphor—

Xie Chu was surprised. You mean that the destination of the Riverward's final use was originally this place?

Yes. Hui Xiangjun had left behind the Unbound Furnace, created the Law Breaker. That showed that the successor to the Eternal Spring Brocade—who, after Kunlun had formed, had broken through the shackles by force and grown an accompanying plant—had had an understanding of the spiritual mountains' system that far surpassed the average person's. For her to have figured out Kunlun's secret using the other spiritual mountain as leads wouldn't have been surprising.

But in the end, she hadn't revealed this information to anyone, including Qiu Sha, who had taken away the Riverward. It seemed that after consideration, that master had given up on digging up the spiritual mountains' foundations and focused her attention on the Gold Imitation Technique; never mind bringing about her own death, she had also made later generations take an eight-century detour.

Why? said Xie Chu.

Because it would have been meaningless, said Zhou Ying.

If the ancient inscriptions had appeared and the heavenly commandments had fallen into the mortal world, it would only have meant the collapse of the spiritual mountains and the rise of new spiritual mountains.

And between the fall of the old and the rise of the new, there was certain to be instability, certain to be disaster on a grand scale. Where would the ants go to take shelter then? After the calamity, the past sages would be gone, and future generations would follow the same road to ruin. It would only be a sin.

Zhou Ying wrote on the surface of the mirror: I won't conceal from you—during the Dragon Boat Festival, in the South Sea, I asked him more or less the same question.

Xie Chu came back to his senses and looked meaningfully at Zhou Ying.
And if he agrees?

I already told you, said Zhou Ying, if he agrees at once, then it must be those hidden bones he's carrying.

I've never heard of anyone inheriting a way and refusing to acknowledge it, said Xie Chu. Did he actually inherit a Way of the Heart, or did he get possessed? ...Fine, I don't understand this "way of death" anyway—if he keeps calm and thinks it over, and then decides to agree?

Zhou Ying said, Then it means the hidden bones have grown strong enough to be on the point of going out of control. Unable to control him, they'll be controlling the reincarnation wood.

Xie Chu said in surprise, Then why are you still making him choose? To test how far the hidden bones have gone out of control? Then I'm not digging anymore.

Zhou Ying said, What strength you have, you didn't bring with you when you were born won't take with you when you die. If you save it up, there'll only be more here to freeze in a little while.

Xie Chu said, ... The Xi bloodline couldn't produce a scoundrel like you. What kind of bastard did that young lady marry to end up with you?

Having heard this out, Zhou Ying was very approving. Indeed, the Wolf King is wise. Keep digging, trust me. You'll know in the end.

By the time Xie Chu had uncovered all the inscriptions, he would have caught up and looked inward to his Way of the Heart. When his Way of the Heart shattered, he would understand why Xi Ping was completely at odds with the hidden bones, which were like a Way of the Heart.

There was a reason that none of Kunlun's High Priests had established foundations: a person with a Way of the Heart was the Way of the Heart's slave; they couldn't inherit these inscriptions. If the successor to the hidden bones didn't want them, then, starting from the established foundation level, no one could receive this set of inscriptions. Each of the spiritual mountains of the southern continent might dissolve, but Kunlun would be eternally strong as a fortress. This great wall and these shackles cast by immortals and mortals together would live forever.

Here and now, the one who would make the decision wasn't Xi Ping. It was Xie Chu.

Your Highness the Blind Wolf King, you have stood guard at the Beijue Mountain Pass for so many years. When you go, it will be clean, not leaving behind a single remaining shard of a Way of the Heart.

At the moment of enlightenment, what choice will you make?

For the stability of the overall situation, let the gross injustice done to the Second Elder remain in silence, let the cycle of the puppets of Ways of the Hearts continue? Or make a reckless move, risk the sky falling and the earth cracking, carry away the resentment and indignation of millions of the unjustly dead, shoulder the burden of this heavy crime and pierce the thread of heaven, in the midst of a raging storm place the rudder in the hands of a young man locked in ceaseless struggle with his “Way of the Heart”?

Hui Xiangjun had shrunk back, and Xi Shiyong wasn't so arrogant. He would have to put the Wolf King to the trouble.

Xi Shiyong's constitution, his spiritual sense, his natural talents...even his ability to concentrate were all no better than average. For his cultivation level to have risen to such a degree within a few decades of beginning to cultivate was completely unreasonable. The only explanation was that his cultivation level had nothing to do with him. Those hidden bones of his had been shed skin bones to begin with. After the Blind Wolf King had told him about the Beijue Array, he had been silent for a very long time. Zhou Ying had known then that he could no longer completely suppress the hidden bones.

Using the ancient inscriptions outside the Beijue Mountains to lure out the hidden bones now would still leave room to maneuver. Once the hidden bones found an opportunity to reach the shed skin level and returned to their peak, that would be when the person who had accidentally picked them up would have come to a dead end.

This was also Xi Ping's chance at survival.

When the Riverward had come into Zhou Ying's hands, he had made the wrong decision to use up the last opportunity. It had been wasted.

Now he had come here in the Riverward's stead. That was probably fated.

Xi Ping felt that his consciousness had been broken up and left behind on the northern and southern continents, among all the mountains of the five nations.

Amid his mixed shock and anger, he sensed the reincarnation wood go out of control—and it was different from when the Lovebird Sword Array had severed his connection to it. Before, the reincarnation wood had been like his hands and feet, his to use at will. Now it was still attached to him, the connection hadn't severed, but it seemed to have turned into a prosthetic limb that wouldn't take orders.

Before, the reincarnation wood had been like an orderly flying goose net, but now it had gotten jumbled up into a knot. The great mountain arrays of the immortal mountains and all the nations' border arrays were seized by an invisible power.

On the Southern He Peninsula, the Lovebird Sword Array suddenly shrank. The Silver Moon's light dimmed. The Nine Dragons, like dissipating beast spirits, returned to the Cauldron of Nine Dragons, which had floated up. Under the horrified gazes of the great shed skins, the Ceaseless Mirror suspended above the Lancang Mountains vanished like vapor!

At the same time, Xi Ping's consciousness, scattered all over, glimpsed the demonic energy of the Impassable Sea rise steeply and surge over Great Wan's vanished border inscriptions—

Meanwhile, at the Wan-He border, the upgraded immortal tools had put up an initial show of strength against the demons. The demonic energy retreated briefly. Then, an enormous figure identical to the Southern Sage walked out of nothingness.

The sage's face floated in the air, looking ghastly, yet there was a faint smile on it. "Oh? What kind of manmade toys are these?"

Pang Jian certainly couldn't fail to recognize the founder of his sect. He gasped. The karma beast on his sleeve roared furiously.

The "Southern Sage" didn't respond, but someone did answer: "This is the great demon that the Zhou family raised at the bottom of the Impassable Sea."

A white figure landed. Bai Ling, personally leading Kaiming Department reinforcements, had traveled nonstop to get here. "The Kaiming Department has sealed the walls and dropped the arrays. I guarantee that we will burn the wildfire vines dead at the border—there's no need for you to worry about it, General Commander Pang. There are enough spiritual stones, don't stop the upgraded immortal tools..."

Before he could finish, familiar shrill howls came their way on the sea wind. The swarming demon host was sucked in like the tide and swallowed by the great demon with the face of the Southern Sage. A cold that could freeze the blood and a reeking wind rushed toward them—this was the nightmare that Bai Ling had regularly had to face before meeting Zhou Ying. His face paled. He couldn't finish his sentence.

The ascended spirit grade upgraded immortal tools converted spiritual energy into firepower and shoved it out with earthshaking force, but the manmade divine tools that could temporarily hold off the Lovebird Sword Array were defeated. The enormous figure on the sea only paused infinitesimally, then continued to approach step by step.

The murderous demonic energy fell a step ahead on the blue-clothesers and Kaiming Cultivators at the front lines. Like wheat seedlings lodging, the outer sect experts were swallowed by the demonic energy before they even had a chance to struggle.

Pang Jian grit his teeth, raised the Barrier Dispeller Bow, and charged forward with a leap.

Bai Ling just missed holding him back. “General Commander Pang!”

Just then, snow-bright sword light fell like a thunderclap. The seawater surging like a tidal wave was frozen in place. The sword drew a line outside the coast. The chill rushed forward. The demon host, accidentally crossing the sword light, all dissolved in midair. Zhaoting, returned to its master’s hand, fell with a whistle and hacked at the all-powerful great demon’s head.

Pang Jian nearly burst into tears. “General Zhi...”

The great demon was split in half by Zhaoting. The black fog instantly faded. Heaven's Design Pavilion and the Kaiming Department's cultivators charged forward to save their colleagues who were still living.

Zhi Xiu had just withdrawn from a shed skin battlefield. He was in a wretched state. He brushed a hand over himself and the loose hair that had fallen from his crown, the tears in his robes all returned to position or healed as appropriate. Several heaps of white spirits disappeared in Zhaoting's sword light. Zhi Xiu landed, patted Pang Jian on the shoulder, and pulled him back. "Good work, Wenchang."

Not far away on the sea, the demonic energy that he had dispelled reassembled. The Southern Sage's face looked down from on high at the puny sword cultivator.

"Only fourteen years have passed in the human world, yet it seems that everything has changed." The great demon kept his eyes fixed on Zhi Xiu. "We meet again. This is a truly familiar scene, little General Zhi."

Zhi Xiu didn't fly his sword. He only walked onto the harbor's pier, going around the upgraded immortal tools and the border inscriptions. "I haven't yet thanked you for your instruction last time, senior."

Pang Jian suddenly remembered that last time, during the events in the Resurrection Vortex, General Zhi had nearly died in the East Sea. Alarm appeared on his face.

Bai Ling quietly said, “Don’t worry. Fourteen years ago, the Impassable Sea’s altar was disturbed by the Viscount. He didn’t have time to recover his full glory. The Bell of Tribulation could suppress him then, and now General Zhi is already a shed skin...”

“Oh?” Across several li, the demon with the Southern Sage’s face heard his whisper clearly. “Little half-demon, I wouldn’t dare to be so sure if I were you.”

The great demon’s voice raised echoes amid the freezing tide. As if he had pronounced some final verdict, it was just at that moment that the Wan-He border inscriptions dispersed as the ancient inscriptions from outside the Beijue Mountains came into the world. As a half-demon, Bai Ling was the first to sense something. Under Pang Jian’s shocked gaze, a row of inscriptions like tattoos quickly flashed over his face. Before Pang Jian could see their contents clearly, they disappeared.

Bai Ling’s aura abruptly turned strange. His cultivation, previously around the middle established foundation stage, rose sharply, coming close to ascended spirit level!

The Resurrection Vortex boiled. The Impassable Sea's demon seal was completely destroyed, both the patch laid down by Xuanyin's three sages and the one that the demon subduer had created by sacrificing his own body.

Demonic energy slammed against the mark drawn by Zhaoting. It was rebuffed, then slammed again—the tide frozen by the sea wind shattered into splinters and splashed. Each time, that sword mark was weaker than before. After the third time, there wasn't a trace of it left. The great demon was blocked by Zhaoting.

“Little sword cultivator, enough of this futile effort. It isn't easy to become a shed skin. You have already betrayed the spiritual mountains and may be said to walk the same way as me and mine. Why waste your strength?”

Zhi Xiu was trapped in black fog. He turned at deaf ear on this. Zhaoting wove a big net of sword light, horrifyingly holding the black clouds trying to ravage the city. Spiritual energy swept by around him now and then. There were the outer sect cultivators, unwilling to retreat, still helping him with upgraded immortal tools, just like Jinping's Heaven's Design Pavilion two hundred years ago.

Only this time, there might be no help coming when Xuanyin's masters descended from the sky.

Currently, the Luwu who had just made landfall in Great Wan's Guzhou had yet to recover their senses. The paperman beside Wei Chengxiang suddenly fell exhausted to the ground. The broken shard of a sword flew out and knocked a hole in the demonic energy surging toward the sky. It brushed past Zhi Xiu and sacrificed itself for its master.

The great demon's sage's face was distorted by the shard of Zhaoting. He gave a roar of anger and twisted into a ball with the sword energy. He split into three parts, revealing his true body that sucked in all light.

Zhi Xiu turned his head and looked into the crack cut by the broken sword. The vast plains of Southern Wan's nine provinces were dimly visible. He didn't hesitate again. He leapt and went in pursuit of the vanished shard of Zhaoting, charging toward the gathering place of the great demon's demonic energy—

Just then, from the hole cut by the broken sword, an aged hand reached out and held down the young sword cultivator's shoulder.

Zhi Xiu was caught unawares. He dodged. When he saw the newcomer clearly, his eyes abruptly opened wide.

CHAPTER 232 - A Life of Regret (Final)

It was the Dignitary of Fate Elder Zhang Jue.

Zhi Xiu thought that he and Xi Shiyong were different. That brat's shifu was an idler who lived on Flying Jade Peak in company with confusion and doubt, able to devote his own energy to bringing up a fiend.

His shifu meanwhile was one of Xuanyin's four elders, who year in and year out was at his post in the Sea of Stars, where no one but a shed skin could enter without authorization. He had already been over thirty years old when he had entered the sect. He wouldn't venture to say that he had been very steady, but at any rate he hadn't needed to be cared for and disciplined like a half-grown child. The Dignitary of Fate Elder had only come to inspect his progress periodically. After he had become an ascended spirit and left his tutelage, all that had remained were the letters Zhi Xiu sent paying his respects.

The Dignitary of Fate Elder was the most strictly rule-abiding person in the Xuanyin Mountains. Without particular business, not even his direct disciple would break the Sea of Stars' rules. Every ten years, that valley of despair would only be open to Zhi Xiu for half an incense stick of time. He would always deliberately pick a day like the Mid-Autumn Festival or New Year's Eve to go in and have a cup of tea with his shizun.

Unfortunately, the stars didn't celebrate the New Year.

Zhi Xiu didn't avoid people at all costs, and he also couldn't have been called very extroverted. When he encountered someone lively, he would become a little more talkative in response. If he was in company with someone reticent, he wouldn't voluntarily get closer to them. After they had exchanged greetings, teacher and disciple would basically have nothing else to say to each other. Their lengthy silences were like the thousand years and more that had congealed over the Dignitary of Fate Elder.

Over two centuries had passed in a flash. Now, Zhi Xiu could hardly recall any confidences he had shared with shifu. He only remembered that the bottom of the Sea of Stars was like a prison cell, with everything within sight a taboo.

Before leaving, afraid that the Bell of Tribulation would make trouble, he had gone to see Zhang Jue. He thought that after all the Dignitary of Fate Elder had been personally raised by the Southern Sage and would still remember what the spiritual mountains had been born for. Their ways were different; he didn't dare to have extravagant hopes for anything else. He had only brought over the karma beast, hoping that if anything went wrong, this shizun who was already a stranger would be able to rethink matters, give Lin Chi and Wen Fei some room to maneuver.

But he hadn't expected the Dignitary of Fate Elder to come here.

In only a day or two, Zhang Jue had aged another decade in mortal terms compared to the last time he had seen him. His eyes were deeply sunken in. His flesh no longer seemed capable of covering the bones that had been nibbled away by time.

When Zhi Xiu saw the newcomer clearly, he was even slightly distracted, suspecting that after the Impassable Sea's demon seal had broken, it had released some kind of demon that could disturb the intellect.

In that brief daze, a talisman flew out of Zhang Jue's hand holding his shoulder and permeated all of Zhi Xiu's meridians, locking him in place. Then Zhang Jue gave him a profound look. In the end, the Dignitary of Fate Elder didn't say anything to his only disciple. His figure flashed, and he landed a hundred zhang away, at the great demon's core.

The Southern Sage had never breathed a single word about the Impassable Sea. Only just before his departure had he instructed his disciples: The Impassable Sea's demon host had been born from the human heart. It could be neither dispelled nor defeated. It could only be sealed with the Ways of the Heart of the immortal mountains' orthodox cultivators. The Bell of Tribulation sustained the Ways of the Heart of the spiritual mountains. If there was a problem with the demon seal, they could request that the Bell of Tribulation come to the East Sea.

If it should happen that the Bell of Tribulation couldn't be moved, then it would remain to be seen whether the descendants of the demon subduer could produce an individual like their ancestor. Otherwise...it would need a nearly perfect shed skin Way of the Heart to debate against the demon host.

Before Zhi Xiu could cry out "shifu," Zhang Jue's aged figure was submerged in the all-enveloping demonic aura.

The Dignitary of Fate Elder was the "most orthodox" among the orthodox, with a Way of the Heart like a tree that had put down deep roots in the spiritual mountains. With the spiritual mountains on the verge of collapse, that tree still refused to budge, dead set on sharing in the destruction of the overthrown mountains.

Zhang Jue's flesh split open bit by bit. Amid the heavy demonic energy, he detonated his essence. It contained boundless spiritual energy, like a small spiritual mountain, almost enough to cover half the East Sea. His decrepit body was destroyed. Only a Way of the Heart remained.

But regretfully, that Way of the Heart was far from meeting the "nearly perfect" requirement. It wasn't even complete. Like the one Lancang's Sect Leader had slammed against the Lovebird Sword Array, the Way of the Heart of the Dignitary of Fate Elder was in poor condition. Even with no one to touch it, it might have broken on its own. Yet in this intense collision, like a miracle, it held firm. That Way of the Heart maneuvered the plentiful spiritual energy of the shed skin essence, weaving a net, firmly trapping the demon host.

The Sea of Stars was a fabrication. In the life of the Dignitary of Fate, there still remained this final thread of pitiful fidelity.

It took Zhi Xiu only a moment to fight free of Zhang Jue's immobilizing talisman, but he didn't catch up to him in time. The exploding shed skin essence and the demonic energy tangled together, shutting him out.

A drawing flew out of the wild wind. Zhi Xiu automatically reached out to catch it. Unexpectedly, the thin card hadn't torn in this intense conflict. Someone had placed two layers of protective talismans on it. The little karma beast was anxiously trying to run outward, but there was nowhere for it to go. It was only a beast spirit now.

Old acquaintances had changed, young men had grown old, and even the sages had passed away. The divine beast whose roar had shaken the nine provinces was now only a legend on paper.

“You want to debate with me?” Where spiritual and demonic energy collided, the great demon using the Southern Sage’s face said loudly, laughing, “The demon host is only the broken dregs left behind by the ‘heavenly commandments’ when Kunlun formed. As for why they have gained power, my disciple, haven’t you understood it yet?”

Zhang Jue’s Way of the Heart touched the core of the demonic energy and instantly shook. An even more obvious crack split that Way of the Heart from within—there was a familiar aura in the depths of the demonic aura. The remnants of Zhang Jue’s consciousness in his Way of the Heart witnessed what Zhou Ying had seen through the heart demon seed: the Southern Sage became a full moon god, brought the Xuanyin Spiritual Mountains into being, thoroughly became a portion of the human world’s “heavenly commandments.” Where the demon host dwelled, he saw his own reflection. The human part of him was unwilling to be annihilated and gave birth to a heart demon; the spiritual mountains cast a shadow.

To keep the spiritual mountains from collapsing, the Southern Sage promptly left behind the part of his Way of the Heart that “didn’t accord with the heavenly commandments,” just like the adjustment that his juniors would undergo when they became shed skins.

In the millennia-long history of Southern Wan, the Southern Sage had been the first person to cut the foot to fit the shoe.

The name of the great demon at the bottom of the Impassable Sea could not be spoken by anyone, because he, rejected by the spiritual mountains and sealed here by the demon subduer at the cost of his life, was...a part of the Southern Sage.

This was the truth that had caused Lin Zongyi's Way of the Heart to shatter when he had caught a glimpse of it in the Territory Map.

Zhi Xiu saw the captured demonic energy rise steeply, almost breaking through the spiritual energy net made by Zhang Jue's Way of the Heart. Without hesitation, he raised his sword and went forward. The demonic energy was dispersed by Zhaoting, then reformed, and was once again dispersed. Zhaoting's biting cold sword energy seeped in. The Sword that Mended the Heavens touched Zhang Jue's collapsing Way of the Heart. The crack in that Way of the Heart had nearly cleaved it all the way through, but in that moment, the spreading crack stopped, like a miracle.

Though it had been the start of the tragedy, the Southern Sage hadn't been forced to do what he had done. For a hundred generations of peace, he had willingly cut apart and imprisoned himself.

A thousand years later, the rebellious junior unwilling to bend his head to the spiritual mountains was still drawing his sword to mend the heavens.

The ragged shed skin Way of the Heart and Zhaoting, one inside and one outside, forced the captured demon host down toward the East Sea. But in the midst of the stalemate, Zhang Jue's detonated essence had been exhausted until hardly anything remained, and the supply of spiritual stones that Bai Ling had brought was having difficulty meeting the demand. But the demonic energy that had been suppressed for a thousand years at the bottom of the Impassable Sea was still coming in a constant stream.

Meanwhile, Western Chu's evil cultivators charged completely unobstructed into the Sanyue Mountains, which had lost their great mountain array. At the feet of Southern Shu's Lingyun Mountains, the spiritual beasts contained by the spiritual beast farm went out of control and surged toward the human world. Utterly cold wind began to pour in through the Beijue Mountain Pass. The Blind Wolf King's Snow Observation Pavilion was instantly submerged by violent snow.

The sky was falling.

Xi Ping's consciousness, like scattered sand, couldn't assemble, inundated with countless heartbreaking scenes. Amid the billowing demonic energy, he couldn't even find Zhi Xiu.

There was only the great demon with the Southern Sage's face greedily sucking in demonic energy. "Your resistance is a lost cause, unless the demon subduer who had no offspring can come back to life..."

Just then, a sudden change occurred in the Resurrection Vortex: the direction of rotation of the whirlpools on the surface reversed!

The reversed whirlpools were like an enormous air purifier. As the demonic energy constantly emerging passed through it, it was converted into spiritual energy. A portion of the spiritual energy attached itself to Zhaoting and Zhang Jue's Way of the Heart, and another portion surged toward the spirit-conducting gold, which automatically absorbed spiritual energy.

Zhi Xiu froze. Swapping between spiritual energy and demonic energy—this seemed to be...

The characteristic power of the demon-subduing Zhou clan's spiritual bones!

It was said that for the last eight hundred years, the Zhou family had been using precisely this property of their spiritual bones to rear demons.

The next moment, beneath the surface of the whole East Sea, a limpid Way of the Heart emerged—a little smaller than Elder Zhang Jue's. At the same time, the water carried up the fragments of bones that had sunk to the bottom of the sea during the last eight hundred years. Led by that Way of the Heart, a set of spiritual bones assembled in each of the Resurrection Vortex's whirlpools.

There was a familiar aura about that Way of the Heart.

“Duanrui-shijie...”

When the Territory Map had been completed, the Dignitary of Rule Lin Zongyi's Way of the Heart had shattered, and Princess Duanrui had sacrificed herself to bring him away; she had been caught in the explosion of the shed skin essence and passed away here.

Her body had perished, but her Way of the Heart remained. Though it had been occluded by dust while she lived, after death it had found a resting place.

The reversed Resurrection Vortex replenished Zhi Xiu's nearly exhausted essence, and replenished the upgraded immortal tools' power supply. Zhaoting's chilly sword light slammed against the demonic energy trapped by the Dignitary of Fate Elder, driving the demon host toward the East Sea.

Now was the time to reseal the demon host.

The demon seal's inscriptions were of a kind with the great mountain arrays, not something manmade; they were a portion of the heavenly commandments. You didn't need to be especially proficient in inscriptions. If a cultivator had at least ascended spirit cultivation, as long as they could suppress the demonic energy, the whole set of inscriptions could naturally be obtained through the cultivator's spiritual sense, which was open to heaven and earth.

In these circumstances, the outer sect cultivators on the Wan border still hadn't retreated. Seeing Zhaoting's attack fading, that excellent Pang Wenchang immediately used a row of ascended spirit upgraded immortal tools to help him make up the gap, leaving Zhi Xiu with time to concentrate and place the demon seal.

Spiritual light was already gathered at Zhaoting's tip, but just then, Zhi Xiu's expression changed slightly.

When the demon host in the East Sea had run wild, he had arrived in haste, deluged by the turn of events, so he hadn't even noticed right away that... something was wrong!

Zhi Xiu abruptly raised his head and looked into the sky.

He was an unworthy disciple of the Dignitary of Fate's lineage. Though he had always had considerable misgivings about fate, he still knew the basics of observing celestial phenomena. It was late now, and the wild wind on the sea had blown this patch of sky perfectly clean. The night sky was as clear as if it had been washed—with the great demon falling upon the world, why were there no clouds of tribulation? Why was there no blood moon?

The obscure thing that had pressed down on the canopy above, compelling all living things and also protecting all living things, had disappeared.

Just then, the demon host was beaten into the Resurrection Vortex by the powerful upgraded immortal tools. The spiritual bones and the two Ways of the Hearts of the masters converged. Zhi Xiu didn't have time to think much. He leapt and landed beside Pang Jian and Bai Ling. Zhaoting raised a shield of water like a city wall.

Bai Ling nearly thought he had gone deaf. With General Zhi shielding them, the wild wind that seemed as if it could shake apart the whole continent at least didn't hit him directly, but all the same, he still flew away. His sixth sense was in chaos. He crashed into some unknown colleague and instinctively reached out to hold that person up. He felt unprecedented lightness, a freedom as if he had never been born.

In a daze, he heard a distant voice in his ears: You can settle down here, Xiao Bai.

The person who had spoken these words was now somewhere unknown.

The rims of Bai Ling's eyes suddenly reddened. He landed, stumbling, his vision a blur. He blinked hard: the defensive perimeter established at the border by Heaven's Design Pavilion and the Kaiming Department had pretty much fallen apart. The enormous upgraded immortal tools had tumbled all over the place. He could see at a glance to the surface of the East Sea.

The sea hadn't been this calm and tranquil in a thousand years. The Resurrection Vortex, where unknown numbers of souls of the dead had been buried, had quietly disappeared, and with it the Ways of the Heart of the Xuanyin Mountains' Dignitary of Fate and Dignitary of Rites had been destroyed.

Someone whispered, "It's...it's gone?"

It was gone.

The demon host, said to share in the lifespan of the universe and the gods, which could only be sealed and not destroyed—didn't that mean...

Zhi Xiu suddenly felt bone-deep terror. He had no time to breathe a sigh of relief. His consciousness swept out—everyone said that a shed skin sage’s consciousness could encompass a whole nation, but in fact that was far from the limit. When Xi Ping had become an ascended spirit, his consciousness had been able to leap from Sanyue and Dongheng to Tao County. It was only that before there had been inscriptions at each nation’s borders, which consciousnesses couldn’t easily cross. But now all the border inscriptions had disappeared. Zhi Xiu’s consciousness, unimpeded, crossed over vast stretches of mountains and rivers and was startled by the north wind blowing in from the Beijue Mountains.

Other places hadn’t worked it out yet, but Western Chu, currently engaged in a power struggle, had noticed something ahead of the rest—there, the cultivation of all unorthodox cultivators spurted up. In the Sanyue Mountains, the Xiangs who lived like princes suddenly lost the protection of the great mountain array and were pushed back again and again. The assault of the “evil cultivators” who had spent hundreds of years torn this way and that by spiritual image brands and Ways of the Heart changed from a “sneak attack” to a steamroller.

Looking from a distance, Zhi Xiu saw at a glance that the Sanyue Mountain Range had already begun to change form.

The cultivators in the midst of it hadn't noticed that within Western Chu, all of the mountains had begun to sway. The houses and factories in the valleys, like dust, collapsed as the slowly expanding or wearily lowering mountains changed shape.

“Battles among cultivators impacting the local landforms, altering the seasons, even disrupting time...” This was the chaos that legend said had taken place during the Great War of Gods and Demons, before the spiritual mountains had formed.

“Shiyong?” Zhi Xiu pulled out a piece of reincarnation wood. “Shiyong!”

There was no answer. He sent his consciousness into it and only got an earful of confused voices that he couldn't tell apart.

A shed skin's consciousness couldn't be easily overlooked anywhere. Of course Xi Ping had heard him, but he couldn't answer. He seemed to have been shredded to pieces, then tied to the back of a bolting horse. His consciousness was being swept along by the hidden bones, shuttling through all the reincarnation wood in the world. Everywhere they passed, they left some inscriptions in the trees.

Having seized the ancient inscriptions from outside the Beijue Mountains, reincarnation wood became a vortex, sucking in spiritual energy from its surroundings. The trees with their rotten trunks that grew at will on walls and riverbanks instantly seemed to have been raised to godhood. One by one, they were plated with divine light.

Xi Ping could feel the wild joy of the hidden bones—Kunlun, Sanyue, Lingyun, Lancang...the spiritual energy of four great immortal mountains began to roll in accordance with the inscriptions. Soon it would flow into the reincarnation wood. Even the Xuanyin Mountains, which had become one with the Territory Map—there was reincarnation wood on the inside, acting as a go-between. It was also within their range of control.

They had won. They would soon become the only god in the world.

Last time Xi Ping had been this powerless, it had been back in the Latent Cultivation Temple. He had been only a powerless mortal then and had blown himself to bits. He had felt all his thoughts turn to dust, felt that he couldn't make it past the open-eyed pass no matter what. Duanrui-shishu and shifu had been with him, and those two masters had been unable to help him. At the time, he had thought, Forget it... Until A-Xiang had called from a thousand li away and awoken him.

Now there were too many voices in the reincarnation wood. He couldn't even find A-Xiang. All he had left was himself...a mortal who had spent a few decades shambling through the mortal dust.

But this time, he couldn't say, "Forget it."

He couldn't die, and he couldn't turn to dust and scatter his bones to the wind.

His nearly shed skin cultivation level belonged to the hidden bones, the reincarnation wood that could communicate with all points belonged to the hidden bones, his spiritual sense belonged to the hidden bones, and even his body, regenerated after being shattered, belonged to the hidden bones; he had cut out the shard of Zhaoting, the only thing that didn't belong to the hidden bones...

What else was there that could help him?

What else was there that belonged to this person called "Xi Ping"?

BOOK 5 - Travelers' Welcome

CHAPTER 233 - Conclusion (1)

He had a personal name.

He was the only son of the Marquis of Yongning, born on the ninth day of the third month in the ninth year of Taiming, on an evening when gentle spring rain was falling.

Wan's customs had been delicate since ancient times. They preferred refined and gentle men—intellectuals of the sort too frail for the weight of their clothes. Family and friends came to congratulate them, all bringing along pretty-sounding words, saying that this was a “a little gentleman delivered by the apricot blossom rain,” and in the future he was sure to be a romantic person, “graceful as a pine tree, bright as the moon.”

The Marquis even kept his breathing soft. He exerted a great deal of will power to control any other thoughts and, according to what he and his wife had discussed in advance, gave him the name “Ping.”

Later, the apricot blossom rain concerned had cried out against the false accusation. Old Madam Xi claimed that it repeatedly came to her in dreams to defend itself, saying that this fiend hadn't been delivered by the misty rain but instead had been formed of the ooze in the courtyard that had yet to be cleaned up.

After the old lady died, no one could know whether such a thing had in fact taken place.

It was hard to say whether this child was a “natural disaster” or a “manmade catastrophe”—less than half a year after he was born, he had driven two wet-nurses in a row to high blood pressure and made them resign their posts and go home. Madam Cui and Old Madam Xi each lost seven or eight jin, and the Marquis didn’t dare to have heart trouble for three years.

It was said that when this little master began to crawl, it was as if he were flying a sword stuck to the ground; even dogs couldn’t keep up. And once he learned to walk, he turned into a cannon on legs. When he opened his mouth, he could shout the Marquis, who had charged alone into the Beijue Mountains, into a daze, making him suspect that the talisman the Blind Wolf King had given him had been poisoned. He was everywhere throughout the whole Marquis Manor. Only when grown-ups yelled for him to come eat or sleep, he was always hard of hearing.

When he started schooling in early childhood, the number of private tutors who left in a rage was unprecedented and never to be duplicated; it was said that to this day no one in Dangui Lane had broken his record. He was also the only person whom His Third Highness, who even breathed more softly than others, had personally beaten. Soon his name shook the whole of the imperial capital of Jinping. An unknown number of innocent boys ended up getting beaten by their family's discipline rods without knowing what they were about because they had hung out with him.

He had a courtesy name.

According to Southern Wan custom, boys didn't need to reach the age of twenty; once they were sixteen, the age at which they could participate in the immortal selection, a courtesy name could be chosen. The Marquis chose the courtesy name "Shiyong" for him. When His Highness Prince Zhuang heard this, he made no comment, only clicked his tongue as if he had a toothache.¹⁰⁴

Later, the name "Xi Shiyong" leapt from the back molars of countless people.

He also had a nickname, which he had chosen himself.

When he was a little older than ten, he heard that a group of Southern Shu musicians had come to the pleasure boats, and they had spiritual beasts dancing backup, so he had called up a gang of his unruly friends. He had put on platform shoes to increase his height and gone to see the scenes of the south and was unfortunately caught in the act by His Third Highness, who had gone out to a social event for once. In front of others, san-ge kindly and gently patted him on the shoulder and kicked him under the table, squeezing out Touch the wine and you're dead between his teeth.

So on Xi Ping's first trip on a pleasure boat he didn't end up getting to see spiritual beasts dance. He was detained and forced to drink tea for a shichen —san-ge himself was drinking jasmine tea, but he had him served with kuding tea,¹⁰⁵ which was said to relieve internal heat.

The beauty serving tea pursed her lips behind her veil, furtively laughing at him. Xi Ping, looking glum, kept his head down, the tea service his only company as time dragged on at a snail's pace. He remembered the words carved on the tea tray: When drunk of old named Yugan, driving out sleep created the Marquis of Buye.

“The Marquis of Buye” seemed like he was trying to be equals with his father; he didn't dare to take it, so later he took the characters “Yu Gan” for his nickname, a memento of his first bitter taste of experience.

Mr. Yu Gan wrote many songs that were circulated and sung for a time. Sadly, none of them were worthy of being sung in elegant surroundings. Later, they had fallen silent with the decline of the pleasure boats on the Lingyang River.

A name, a courtesy name, and a nickname. These were the only things left of his life. Could he use these to overcome the near-shed skin hidden bones, keep the world from overturning?

Oh, yes. He also had an alias—

In the chaotic reincarnation wood, Xi Ping could no longer clearly hear what people were saying. Only the name “Tai Sui,” because it was mentioned too frequently, was constantly slipping past his ears.

“Tai Sui...”

“What are Tai Sui’s orders? What do we do?”

“Where is Tai Sui...”

“Tai Sui” was the one tiny bit of land that had remained to him when he had even lost the name “Xi Ping” and was walking in the mortal world.

It was also one of the reasons why, having come to an impasse, he wouldn’t hand over his consciousness altogether and allow the hidden bones to fuse with him.

“Stop calling,” he thought feebly. “Tai Sui can’t even look after himself!”

The reason that “Tai Sui” could be everywhere was because of the reincarnation wood. Could mortals really overcome the reincarnation wood and fish up his consciousness, which was inextricably linked to the hidden bones?

“Tai Sui!”

Just then, an aged yet powerfully resonant female voice suddenly came from a certain place. There was nothing strange about the human voice to begin with, but this cry of hers resonated with some qin strings. Those special qin strings droned once, and Xi Ping’s scattered consciousness was instantly shaken into some clarity.

He recognized the sounds at once. The qin was the Tai Sui Qin, and the person was his “good neighbor” in Tao County, Tao-er-nainai.

Because of her old age, Tao-er-nainai didn’t respect any taboos. She regularly went in and out of his “house” as she liked, and she looked after the yard and the reincarnation wood tree in it when Xi Ping wasn’t in Tao County.

His vital qin was hidden in that tree.

Xi Ping suddenly realized that among the places the hidden bones had passed through, it seemed that Tao County hadn't been included...and that ought to have been the place where reincarnation wood trees were densest.

Before Xi Ping could consider why this would be the case, the Tai Sui Qin sounded several more times. While the notes were weak and tuneless, they seemed to form a thread, passing through his scattered and skittering consciousness like threading beads on a string, faintly beginning to pull him back.

This qin was his vital qin, born of his bones, playing his deepest thoughts and feelings, taking its name from him... It really could overcome reincarnation wood.

The only problem was that his vital qin wasn't hanging up on a wall where people could just come up and strum it!

Tao-er-nainai was doing something in his yard, her voice loud and close, and some shout of hers had perfectly shaken the qin strings. But the old lady wasn't a practiced performer who had studied mimicry; not every one of her shouts could shake the qin strings...and at her great age, her lungs wouldn't hold out.

Indeed, after a few notes, the Tai Sui Qin fell silent. Xi Ping's consciousness was once again compelled. He was burning with impatience. Anyone would do, as long as they made the Tai Sui Qin play a few more notes...

In Tao County's Seventeen Li Town, Tao-er-nainai, hands on her hips, took several panting breaths, feeling that her throat had gone hoarse. She turned doubtfully to Zhao Qindan. "Sir Xu, if I shout like this, can Tai Sui hear it?"

Zhao Qindan frowned. She was always a little "deaf" in Tao County, unable to attach her spiritual sense to her hearing like she could outside. She couldn't say whether there was an echo from the Tai Sui Qin sealed inside the tree.

Amid the chaos in the reincarnation wood, Zhao Qindan had been the first to react. She had called over Tao-er-nainai and gotten the keys to Xi Ping's little house.

Before going to Southern He, Xi Ping's spiritual sense had been giving him constant warnings. He had been a little paranoid and made quite a few preparations, both useful and useless, including entrusting Zhao Qindan with the location of the Law Breaker and the Tai Sui Qin, so if anything went wrong, she wouldn't be at a total loss.

Xi Ping sealing his vital qin in reincarnation wood was equivalent to General Commander Pang placing his Barrier Dispelling Bow in his femur; an outsider couldn't remove it—not unless Xi Ping died and the power of the vital qin and the reincarnation wood dissipated.

Currently, there was no response from Tai Sui himself in the reincarnation wood, but the qin was still firmly lodged in the tree; this demonstrated that regardless of what Tai Sui had encountered, he was at least still alive.

How was she supposed to use this vital divine weapon that she couldn't get out to contact him...?

“Er-nainai,” Zhao Qindan said, getting a sudden flash of inspiration, a lousy idea appearing in her mind. She turned and asked, “Would you be able to find a gong?”

“A what?” said Tao-er-nainai.

Sometimes sharp sounds could shake the strings of a qin...or at any rate she had heard that it was like this for mortal instruments, and that this had produced rumors of hauntings. She didn't know whether this ascended spirit grade immortal qin would be the same.

Zhao Qindan decided to try her luck. “Have some people come and try striking gongs next to the tree, alternating the pitch. It doesn’t need to be the same tune—the more tunes the better.”

Tao-er-nainai was all at sea, not understanding what “Sir Xu” was getting at. But er-nainai was always going to listen to Sir Xu get into shouting matches...no, debating; she admired her tremendously. Though she didn’t understand, she still immediately did as she said. While running an inn, she had received people from all walks of life; she was a person of prestige and good moral standing in her community and had extensive connections. She quickly and efficiently accomplished her mission, exceeding the quota—there weren’t only gongs; she had called up all the locals from the surrounding towns and villages in Tao County who could blow, bow, pluck, or sing.

Xi Ping’s quiet yard was stuffed full of people, and busybodies were constantly strolling over. Soon, even the streets in front of the house and behind it were jam packed.

At er-nainai’s order, drums and gongs crashed and suona horns wailed, loud and sonorous human voices mixing with them. No one had a score. Now they played “The Dragon and Phoenix Bringing Prosperity,” now they puffed “The Filial Son Kowtows”... They didn’t know whether the master of the house was getting married or being buried. Totally confused, they followed Tao-er-nainai's commands, braising marriage and funeral in a single courtyard.

Zhao Qindan: "..."

This wasn't very much like what she had thought of, but this was no time to wrangle. She had to make do. The young mistress stuck close to the reincarnation wood tree, concentrating with all her might on the sounds within. Just when she thought she was about to go deaf, a weak qin note came from inside the tree.

"Stop, stop, stop," said Zhao Qindan, "stop!"

The whole yard full of festivity quieted. Only in the distant alley was there still an occasional toot. You could have heard a pin drop.

Imitating her, everyone pricked up their ears. They heard a continuous hum coming from the tree, like a call to the souls of the dead. After a while, the even note paused briefly, then returned with a tune...the qin sweet notes popular in Southern Wan!

Though Zhao Qindan was a girl from a decent family, she had spent the past several years hanging out with the bunch of spies in the Luwu; she had learned some sweet notes. As she listened, she took out the little notebook she carried with her and, groping and guessing, comparing what she heard against her notes, she succeeded in decoding the qin sweet notes: Madam, call off your magic power. I surrender.

Mortal music couldn't very well continuously shake the Tai Sui Qin, but inside the qin there happened to be a Law Breaker, and everyone present amounted to the Law Breaker's masters. The clamorous gongs and drums had disturbed the Law Breaker, agitating the qin strings from within.

Eight years ago, the Law Breaker's axiom had taken effect and fished Xi Ping's true body out from the bottom of the Impassable Sea. Now, with the Tai Sui Qin moving, they had also serendipitously called back Xi Ping's "soul."

When his consciousness crash landed in the Law Breaker's space, it could hardly keep a human shape. Then, Xi Ping noticed to his astonishment that the Law Breaker actually hadn't stopped working—outside, the sky was falling and the earth was cracking, but inside Tao County, the spiritual energy prohibition still held!

With Xi Ping's superficial understanding, he felt that this was unreasonable: the inscriptions outside the Beijue Mountains were the ancestors of all the inscriptions in the world. The spiritual mountains, the divine tools, the demon seal...even the mountains and rivers were built upon them.

And according to what Lin Chi had said, the inscriptions used by the Law Breaker, a manmade object, came from the same series as the Lancang Spiritual Mountains; Hui Xiangjun must have used some means to decode the Lancang Mountains' inscriptions and made the Law Breaker on that basis.

In everyday terms, the Beijue Mountain inscriptions were a house's foundation, the Lancang Spiritual Mountains were the first floor, and the Law Breaker was a little attic built atop the spiritual mountains.

Now, it was as if the foundation and the first floor had both collapsed, leaving an "attic in midair," hanging there on its own as if it were haunted.

Something stabbed Xi Ping's peripheral vision. He looked down and found that he had picked up a small scoop of inscriptions, which were now falling in scraps inside the Law Breaker's space. These were a portion of the crucial ancient inscriptions.

He had temporarily escaped the hidden bones' control, and he had "made off with the loot"!

CHAPTER 234 - Conclusion (2)

Outside of Tao County, because the inscriptions had fallen short, the collapsing universe froze.

The Tao World Record's “eyes and ears” scattered everywhere had no idea what was going on, but that didn't keep them from packaging up the information and sending it back to Tao County—this was their custom; when they couldn't work out what was going on, they would transmit back everything they saw and heard, handing it over to Sir Xu so she could pool it and come to a decision.

Practically all the core personnel of this toilet bulletin were Luwu. When they received the information transmitted from all over, they ran into the little alley swift as the wind to find her but couldn't get through the traffic jam of the spontaneously assembled open air music troupe, so they shouted inward, “Sir Xu, our scribes on the outside say that the abnormal shifts in spiritual energy seem to have stopped all of a sudden!”

The people talked over each other to convey this information inward while chewing it over with relish themselves.

“Fresh news! Fresh news! The ‘earth dragon’ in the mountains has stopped turning over.”

“I was wondering why it had gotten so quiet.”

“They say the avalanches in the Kunlun Mountains have stopped, too...”

“What about Southern Shu? Didn’t they say a whole heap of spiritual beasts had gotten loose over there?”

“There may be nothing to be done about the ones that have gotten loose. They can only mend the pen now that the sheep are lost.”

“What a nuisance, I hope they don’t wander over here. Everyone says the beast-taming cultivators these days are useless. All they do is pick out impressive spiritual beasts and raise them for fighting, and herd the rest into enclosures and order servants to take care of them.” An old man who spent all his time hanging out in tea shops launched into an extemporaneous critique of another country’s social ills. “When they’ve lost the tradition of their founder, how can anything go well? Something was bound to go wrong sooner and later, and wouldn’t you just look!”

Some years earlier, it would have been unthinkable for mortals to say things like this. Making presumptuous commentary about immortals was heresy. If the immortals heard and stopped protecting you, what would you do?

But spiritual energy had been prohibited in Tao County for eight years. Everyone felt that “immortals not protecting you” was pretty good.

Tao County had many “Exalted,” which were very easy to pick out. Those whose reactions were slow, who didn’t know when to get out of the way of a car, who always seemed to be trying to stamp on something when they walked, who plainly had no handicap but whose each and every movement made it seem like they were deaf and blind...these were all cultivators. They were restless, and they had an outside observer’s haughtiness.

Before, a single Qilin Guard could have scared the minor merchants out of their wits, but now everyone was eager to receive these cultivators—each one of that bunch had more money than brains; they were particularly easy to fleece.

Adding in the heap of little stories about gratitudes and resentments, loves and hates in the cultivation world that filled the toilet bulletins, which commented on the three thousand paths of the Great Way as though they were commenting on rice seeds, the people who lived here had been subtly influenced by what they saw and heard and had gradually lost their scruples as well.

“Sir Xu.” A person who had just been playing the suona put down the instrument and asked, “What’s going on? Does it have something to do with us?”

“Aren’t you clever.” Tao-er-nainai rolled her eyes and turned to Zhao Qindan. “Sir Xu, does it have something to do with our Tai Sui?”

When the people in the little courtyard and on the courtyard walls heard this, all of them turned their gazes on the reincarnation wood tree in the yard.

Xi Ping lowered his head and looked at the heap of inscriptions he had carried off.

Under the press of a thousand years of the system of the spiritual mountains, something like tens of thousands of people being of one heart and raising the Kunlun Spiritual Mountains on the foundation of the Sword Ancestor’s Way of the Heart couldn’t happen again. The set of ancient inscriptions outside the Beijue Mountains had become the sole “book of heaven”; obtaining it, after the old rules collapsed, you could make the sun and moon go around at your beck and call.

The present situation was: Xi Ping had been yanked back to Tao County by a bunch of musicians and had inadvertently torn off a corner of the “book of heaven.” The inscriptions that the hidden bones had were now incomplete, and the hidden bones were for some reason repelled by Tao County, so the total change in the outside world had gone halfway, then awkwardly gotten stuck.

There was no way of knowing whether Hui Xiangjun had anticipated, when she gave up on using the Riverward to steal the ancient inscriptions outside the Beijue Mountains, that eight hundred years later, the Law Breaker would become the hiding place of a portion of the ancient inscriptions.

At the same time, Xi Ping was trapped inside the Law Breaker—without the hidden bones, he couldn't control the reincarnation wood, and spiritual energy was prohibited in Tao County, so he couldn't make a paperman to use to move around. Apart from the vital qin that was connected to his innermost thoughts, he couldn't make a sound now.

From the Latent Cultivation Temple to Tao County, he had gone from a mortal to a near-shed skin, and when it came down to it, he was still unable to act freely, only able to convey information using qin sweet notes.

“Tai Sui,” said Zhao Qindan, knocking on the reincarnation wood's trunk, “do you have a solution?”

With thanks to the mighty flying goose machine, Xi Ping knocked out a string of qin sweet notes to answer Zhao Qindan: No, I don't understand it at all, tell the Luxu to contact the Xuanyin Mountains, I need outside aid!

Xi Ping didn't dare to be too optimistic. Outside were the northern and southern continents, the five ranges of immortal mountains, and countless reincarnation wood trees...and Tao County on a map was only a dot the size of a sesame seed.

Then he tried to tell Zhao Qindan what had happened, but this was a long story, and when it came to the ancient inscriptions, he wouldn't necessarily have been able to explain it properly even speaking, let alone using sweet notes and code. The two of them, one alternating methods of getting words out, the other groping and guessing, several times ended up at a communication impasse, making the audience sweat.

Fortunately the young mistress had spent eight years cultivating inside the spiritual energy prohibition; her temperament now was unusually steady. "Don't worry, the Luwu have gone to send the message. However you look at it, we haven't reached the point of extreme emergency yet..."

Someone must have infected her with a crow's mouth. Before she could finish speaking, she was interrupted by a dull twang from the Tai Sui Qin.

Zhao Qindan's eyebrows rose. "Hey, what's wrong?"

Xi Ping couldn't pluck the qin right now.

A consciousness could change shape, but that required mental energy to keep up. Under normal circumstances, people would preserve their most familiar state of existence—in other words, their true bodies.

Xi Ping's consciousness in the Law Breaker looked like himself, but just now, the right arm of his consciousness had broken without warning. This wasn't a voluntary change on his part, it was an external wound. Xi Ping gasped, and the Tai Sui Qin's melody went astray.

Nothing in the Law Breaker would attack his consciousness. Feeling the sharp pain, Xi Ping immediately realized: this wound had been inflicted on his true body!

His consciousness had been carried away by the hidden bones. He'd been completely incapable of being his own master. Using the Law Breaker, he had taken refuge Tao County, and his true body was still in the South Sea. Xi Ping had lived in company with the hidden bones ever since he had opened his spiritual eyes. As long as his consciousness wasn't extinguished, his body could always regenerate, unlike other cultivators, for whom it would be all over when their bodies died; unavoidably, he lacked some precautionary awareness—especially after becoming an ascended spirit, when he could switch places with reincarnation wood trees at will, he had been certain in the knowledge of his safety. He didn't even have any defensive tools on him!

If his physical body was broken, his consciousness would also be heavily mauled. And the hidden bones moreover could grow a new body. If his own consciousness just happened to have separated from the hidden bones at the time, whose body would that be?

And the physical body and consciousness were inextricably linked. Wounds to the body would certainly reflect on the consciousness. If his body was destroyed, it remained to be seen whether his consciousness, lacking the hidden bones, could survive!

Meanwhile, in the South Sea, when Yao Qi and Chang Jun had slowly awakened, they had bumped into Xi Ping coming out of a reincarnation wood sapling. Before the two of them had time to celebrate, they saw Xi Ping's expression suddenly become alarmed. He swayed, then fell over.

Chang Jun said, "...I was hoping he'd come to save us. I didn't think he was coming to run an insurance scam."

"Never mind, let's go."

Yao Qi's mustard seed had been lost and damaged in the chaos long ago; otherwise, the reincarnation wood seeds wouldn't have ended up falling all over the ground. Fortunately, Chang Jun still had his mustard seed. The two of them quickly gathered up the remaining upgraded immortal tools in it. In all, they still had three left of ascended spirit grade: an underwater boat shaped like a big fish that could disguise itself as a spiritual beast; a protective leaf in the characteristic style of Moon Plated Peak, just big enough for two or three people to crowd into; and a hand cannon in which Xi Ping had personally stored ascended spirit sword energy.

Chang Jun grit his teeth and lifted Xi Ping onto his back. "Fortunately I... I've opened my spiritual eyes. The hidden bones of a master like this alone weigh several hundred jin... Ziming, what are you doing?"

Yao Qi was searching the surroundings with a talisman, turning up several reincarnation wood seeds scattered in the vicinity and putting them away in his purse—Chang Jun had been careless; there were no seeds stored in his mustard seed.

"Just in case," said Yao Qi, who was used to preparing for the worst. "Let's go!"

Chang Jun laboriously carried Xi Ping into the belly of the big fish. He gasped in admiration: "You're really an expert at fleeing disaster. You're always so prepared!”

But to their surprise, that “preparedness” turned out to be somewhat dire.

In the water, the upgraded immortal tool was very covert. Even the living fishes and spiritual beasts shuttling through the sea didn’t notice anything. It even had a close brush with the silent Cauldron of Nine Dragons.

“C-c-cauldron of Nine... Damn it, that s-s-scared me to death...” Only when they had swum a hundred zhang away from the Cauldron of Nine Dragons did Chang Jun, who hadn’t dared to breathe, force a sentence from his throat. Yao Qi also let out a long breath and leaned over as though his strength had been exhausted.

Just then, Chang Jun, pointing at Yao Qi’s purse, suddenly said, “Hey, Shiyong, are you awake?”

Yao Qi looked down. Xi Ping himself was silent, but the reincarnation wood seeds in his purse had at some point sprouted. The twigs grew quickly. In the blink of an eye, they had torn the mundane brocade that the purse was made of.

With a bitter laugh, Chang Jun said, “You’ve picked a great time to wake up. You just wanted to make me carry you, didn’t...”

The rest of his sentence was drowned in a gasp of alarm—as if it had gone crazy, the just sprouted reincarnation wood attacked its master like a viper!

Xi Ping's right arm was twisted by vines and immediately broke, drooping limply down.

If not for the fact that Chang Jun hadn't yet had time to put him down and had automatically pulled Xi Ping half a step aside, this strike would have gone right through him!

“What's going...Ziming, look out!”

Yao Qi's purse burst open. The reincarnation wood branches were like a volcanic eruption. It grew wildly, then agitated the surrounding spiritual energy.

It couldn't use talismans; it only forced the surrounding spiritual energy to turn into sharp blades of wind, like knives, slashing as Xi Ping and Chang Jun.

Xi Shiyong...was attacking Xi Shiyong?

Yao Qi quickly took a step back and tossed a fire talisman onto the purse. Sadly, both Xi Ping's true body and the frenzied reincarnation wood were genuine article late stage ascended spirit items. Being hit with a half-immortal talisman was like being tickled!

Chang Jun dodged in a flurry, not knowing whether to toss Xi Ping's body aside or carry it away. "Why is he attacking himself? Is the problem with the tree or with him? Shiyong! Hey! Xi-shishu, listen, can you drop us a word? Say something...or use code... My goodness, Ziming, what are you doing?!"

Yao Qi had taken out the sole upgraded immortal tool that could be used as a weapon—that hand cannon. He put his finger on the trigger and without any hesitation shot ascended spirit sword energy at the teeth-baring, claw-flailing reincarnation wood. At the same time, he opened the entrance to the belly of the "big fish."

Seawater and spiritual energy suddenly poured in. Another big whirlpool appeared in the South Sea out of nowhere. The reincarnation wood was sent flying by that shot. It passed through the fish's belly and fell into the sea. Without a word, Yao Qi threw himself forward and pressed the button controlling the fish's belly. The upgraded immortal tool closed in response.

Almost at the very moment he sealed the fish's belly, the reincarnation wood vines, already as thick as pythons, slammed firmly against the fish.

Those vines actually knocked a crack in the ascended spirit fish. Yao Qi poured all the spiritual stones he had on him into the fish belly's array. The little boat shaped like a big fish paused, then rushed through the vines like an arrow loosed from the string.

Chang Jun's head slammed against the fish's hard belly. He howled, "Wait, wait up! How do you know that the problem is with the tree and not with him? What if there's something improper in his body, some demon invading him or something, and his consciousness went into the reincarnation wood to eliminate the evil... Don't do more harm than good!"

Yao Qi grabbed Xi Ping, who had slipped out of Chang Jun's arms. "What are you talking about, more harm than good? Whether Xi Shiyong was 'expelling evil' or being expelled by it, when would he ever attack you along with it? Have you forgotten why he wanted the half-puppet to throw an inscription at him back them?"

Chang Jun went blank. But before he could say anything, the big fish suddenly shook. In the sea, the frenzied reincarnation wood had stirred up tens of thousands of deadly spiritual energy blades, and the fish had been slashed. Yao Qi and Chang Jun watched as the upgraded immortal tool's array's spiritual threads burst apart in front of their eyes and the seawater and vines together surged in, bringing the big fish moving stealthily through the depths of the sea to a halt!

And meanwhile, the shed skins in the sky had yet to call it off—the Ceaseless Mirror had disappeared, which seemed to have called back the Kunlun Sect Leader's reason. He realized something. He suddenly withdrew and retreated. "Slow down, Wu Lingxiao! Let's..."

Wanshuang's sword wind interrupted his words. "Where the hell is my shifu?!"

Kunlun's Sect Leader recalled something, and all the blood left his face. He seemed to have become a ghost. The three other shed skins kept to a middle distance, making way for the sword points. They exchanged veiled and guarded looks, keeping their attention on Kunlun's secrets playing out while all extending their consciousnesses without prearrangement, inspecting the situations in their own countries.

At once, everyone's gazes were drawn in by the fang-baring, claw-flailing reincarnation wood.

These days, there was no one who was unfamiliar with reincarnation wood. The Lingyun Sect Leader, who was closest to the sea, was the first to react.

“First let’s take down that Southern Wan evil cultivator!”

So saying, the old fellow took the lead in hitting the reincarnation wood with a talisman.

Though Lingyun's Sect Leader had a shed skin’s cultivation level, he wasn’t particularly proficient at talismans. He took the reincarnation wood for an embodiment of Xi Ping. Presuming that this person had only just become an ascended spirit, he had underestimated the enemy.

When the shed skin’s talisman entered the water, the South Sea boiled, but the tree reaching up from the depths only shook slightly. It took absolutely no notice!

The expression on the Lingyun Sect Leader’s face was hard to describe.

But Xuanwu gave a cry. “What’s that?”

Perhaps provoked by the shed skin talisman, inscriptions flashed over the trunk of the rampant reincarnation wood—the fatal inscriptions that, out of everyone in the world, only Kunlun’s Sect Leader had seen!

Kunlun’s Sect Leader had yielded to several attacks from Wanshuang, only parrying, not attacking. He was about to say something when out of the corner of his eye he glimpsed the inscriptions on the enormous tree at the bottom of the sea. The thread of clarity in his head instantly snapped. In a daze, he seemed to hear the sound of the sword tearing through Zhu Lanze's back.

The long nightmare descended; the heart demon seed irrigated by guilt, remorse, and weakness burst into bloom. Wanshuang was knocked aside by the furious spiritual energy around him. The Sect Leader's pupils seemed to shrink to the size of pinpoints.

"It...it wasn't me..." He looked through the heart demon that had taken root on his spirit. "I wasn't the one who killed him..."

A voice that seemed to be luring him into something asked, "Then who was it?"

Who infected your mind? Who controlled your hand as it held the sword? Who forced you to murder your own shidi, whom you led into the cultivation world yourself...?

Something was attracting his gaze, making him look at the ancient Way of the Heart on his spirit. The Kunlun Sect Leader's whole body began to tremble. Something was on the verge of appearing, but he didn't dare to look directly at it.

He suddenly gave a loud shout, threw off Wu Lingxiao, and hacked at the inscriptions on the tree—it was the monstrous wind and snow outside the Beijue Mountains, it was the deluding Beijue Array, and maybe it was those strange inscriptions in the snow... In sum, it couldn't have been his Way of the Heart!

This time, the reincarnation wood couldn't remain unconcerned. The tree trunk took the thrust of the Kunlun Sect Leader's weighty sword directly. At the place where a piece of the inscriptions was missing on the trunk, it snapped in half. The branches dispersed. The fish-shaped immortal tool it had captured seized the opportunity to slip away.

Unfortunately, the ascended spirit grade fish couldn't take the shed skin sword wind. It went to pieces from a glancing blow.

The three people inside were immediately dropped into the sea. A beam of sword energy slashed Xi Ping's back. The blood threw itself at Yao Qi's face, entering his lungs along with the seawater.

Inside the Law Breaker in Tao County, Xi Ping felt as if he had been cut in two. His vision darkened. Something flew out of his chest.

Yao Qi swallowed that mouthful of ascended spirit blood. The spiritual energy in his meridians increased dramatically. In a flash, he outperformed himself, casting a talisman that clearly surpassed the level of a half-immortal and coalesced into a shield in the water. Though it broke at a single touch, it was still enough to give him a chance to take out the last upgraded immortal tool—that leaf. It wrapped the three of them up and squeezed out through a gap between the evil vines and the sword energy!

Inside the Law Breaker, Xi Ping fainted briefly before recovering his awareness. He waited for a long while, but no new wounds appeared on his body. Presumably when the reincarnation wood hadn't succeeded in killing him in one blow, Yao Qi and Chang Jun had worked out what was going on.

He'd never thought that his life would be in the hands of those two half-immortal classmates.

Xi Ping gave a bitter laugh and heard Zhao Qindan's already somewhat frantic voice. He was just about to respond to her when his gaze froze.

When his consciousness had taken heavy damage earlier, the thing that had flown out of his chest had been a small flame.

This was the Eternal Flame, which had burned in water and in ice without being extinguished for eight hundred years, the source of the Law Breaker and the Riverward.

Now, the flame had clearly weakened.

CHAPTER 235 - Conclusion (3)

Xi Ping's heart lurched.

Just then, there was a flicker of light and shadow in the flame as Lin Chi's face flashed through it.

Xi Ping froze. Then he immediately realized what was happening: the Unbound Furnace's true furnace flame had been in his hands all along; reasonably speaking, he could control the Unbound Furnace through its furnace flame, and he could use the furnace flame to see what the toolmaker was doing!

Earlier, he had been knocked dizzy by the sudden events and hadn't thought of it right away—Xi Ping hadn't used the furnace flame to peep before, because the Unbound Furnace was regularly packed with all kinds of important materials, and a layman prodding at the furnace flame at random was likely to cause problems. It wasn't like Master Lin was unreliable, and he didn't understand the little universes inside the furnace; what would be the point of blindly messing around?

And if he wanted to use the furnace flame to communicate with Lin Chi, he needed Lin Chi's cooperation. At the very least, he would first have to light the Unbound Furnace and send his consciousness into it. Under ordinary circumstances, if he could contact Lin Chi in order to instruct him to do all these things, he could also say whatever he needed to say. There was no need to use such a valuable thing in place of a Heavenly Question.

No one had expected a situation like the current one to happen.

Zhao Qindan had sent flying goose messages to Luwu outside Tao County, and the Luwu's Heavenly Question had come to Lin Chi's hands on Moon Plated Peak. The information had passed through many hands, and it was unclear how much of it had been lost by the time it reached Lin Chi. Lin Chi was all at sea when he heard, only roughly understood that reincarnation wood couldn't be used and Xi Ping's consciousness was trapped in Tao County.

Tao County was the place enveloped by Hui Xiangjun's Law Breaker. As soon as Lin Chi heard, he thought of the Unbound Furnace's flame, so, while sending a Heavenly Question to ask the Luwu for concrete details, as though trying his luck, he cleaned out all the materials inside the Unbound Furnace and sent his consciousness into it.

Seeing Lin Chi now, Xi Ping acted as if he were seeing his long-lost grandpa. He even took the initiative to develop manners: "Lin-shishu!"

This form of address took eight centuries off Lin Chi's lifespan. He quickly said, "C-c-certainly not! General Zhi keeps looking for you, are you all right? What's..."

"I'm not all right!" said Xi Ping. "I'm nearly cold! Burn some paper money for me, I'm heading to the Underworld to hire an assassin to take down that wolf spirit Xie Chu for me, then bribe the Kings of the Underworld to make sure he reincarnates as a pig in the next life!"

"Don't joke..." said Lin Chi.

This time, he really didn't joke; Xi Ping poured out the whole sequence of cause and effect for Lin Chi. "The reincarnation wood is out of control, Lin-shishu. The most urgent matter is to work out how long the Law Breaker can hide me and what to do about these damned inscriptions."

Lin Chi seemed unable to digest this information at once. He was silent.

Come to think of it, from Xi Ping's thrilling escape from before the Ceaseless Mirror to the hidden bones showing their true colors, the situation had developed rapidly; in a brief span of time, the world had simply turned upside down. If anyone survived, this single day could fill up a hundred pages in the historical annals.

After a long moment, the stalled Li Chi finally “slowly came to awareness.” “Wen-shixiong, give me another one of those pills from earlier—Shiyong, what did you say? I’ve always thought that the hidden bones were like the ungovernable way’s Way of the Heart, how...how could they escape your control and even try to push you into a deathtrap?”

Xi Ping gave a start, immediately realizing that he had slipped up. Lin Chi had personally experienced the inference of the Ways of the Heart of common origin; what if he kept thinking along those lines? Wouldn’t that harm his Way of the Heart?

He was just about to touch up his words when he heard Lin Chi continue: “In ancient times, the ‘unorthodox ways’ that weren’t among the three thousand paths of the Great Way disappeared when the Kunlun Mountains formed. Only the demonic gods of the reincarnation wood, the heartless lotus, the eternal spring brocade, and the late-autumn red gave birth to accompanying plants... Their ways are indeed strange. They seem to be entirely different from the present system of the cultivation world.”

Xi Ping opened his mouth and realized that Lin Chi had gotten ahead of him to say everything he had been about to say, and this self-deluding talk was more comprehensive than his lies would have been. All he could do was dryly agree: “...Right.”

At the same time, something flashed through his mind. Before Xi Ping could catch hold of the idea, Zhao Qindan knocked urgently on the reincarnation wood tree's trunk—

Meanwhile, at the boundary of Tao County, one of the “troops” from the Northern Xia Garrison suddenly opened his eyes wide, a panicked expression flashing over his face.

The person behind Tao County's Northern Xia Garrison was Zhou Ying. After eight years, a number of Luwu had of course infiltrated the troops. With the spiritual energy prohibition in Tao County, half-immortal Luwu were normally no different from mortals. But just now, one of the Luwu among the troops had suddenly felt his whole body lighten, his eyes and ears abruptly become sharp. Spiritual energy poured through his spiritual eyes into his meridians. He could use spiritual energy again!

The Luwu was startled and thought that he had accidentally stepped over the spiritual energy prohibition line. He quickly raised his head to look at the boundary marker standing on the line, but the boundary marker was still two zhang away from him.

Without the mortals being any the wiser, Tao County's spiritual energy prohibition line had shrunk by over two zhang.

The Luwu knew very well that this was a matter with far-reaching consequences. He quickly found an excuse to be relieved from his shift by a colleague and hurriedly went back to send a report. Before leaving, he turned his head back to take a look.

After the connection between Tai Sui and reincarnation wood had been exposed, many reincarnation wood trees in Chu outside of Tao County had been torn down... Though in this period of tumult, that sloppy and incompetent bunch of Qilin Guards hadn't taken care of them all, outside the spiritual energy prohibition line, there certainly weren't forests of reincarnation wood. Now, because the spiritual energy prohibition line had shrunk, a big swath of reincarnation wood forest had moved outside the line. Perhaps the Luwu was imagining it, but he suddenly thought that these reincarnation wood trees seemed different from usual.

The lush shadows of the trees flickered, overlapping on the ground. These were clearly the same trees he was used to seeing, but it seemed that countless pairs of ghastly eyes had appeared on them and were watching that Luwu greedily.

The Luwu's blood ran cold. He made a mark at the new spiritual energy prohibition line and raced to a Luwu inn. Without even saying hello to his colleague inside, he rushed straight into the basement and sent a message to Seventeen Li Town.

The area enveloped by the Law Breaker was slowly shrinking!

On receiving the news, Xi Ping and Lin Chi were simultaneously startled.

The Luwu rapidly calculated the speed at which the spiritual energy prohibition line was moving. It was one chi per incense stick, and the rate seemed to be increasing.

The Unbound Furnace flame in Xi Ping's hands, previously steady, began to dance slightly like a candle flame, as if it might go out at any time. Xi Ping's earlier ominous premonition had come true. This was dire!

"Contact my shifu," Xi Ping quickly said. "Lin-shishu, why is the Law Breaker's scope shrinking? Is it running out of oil, or running out of spiritual energy? How can we give it a refill?"

"I've already contacted him." Lin Chi's scalp was numb. "The Unbound Furnace flame isn't her Way of the Heart, it's something she made... She never even mentioned it to me. As for how it was made, how we can maintain it... Fenghan! Give me another pill!"

Wen Fei smacked him with his fan. If you take another one, you'll be going to see your ancestors.

Despairingly, Lin Chi said, “I can’t do it...”

Wen Fei’s fan flew up and stretched to over a zhang wide in midair.

Peak Master Wen, a former Heaven’s Design Pavilion thug who had gotten mixed in with the “weak medicine and toolmaking ways,” picked up Lin Chi and the Unbound Furnace, then tossed them onto the fan. The He people have died off, the Xiang family is all useless, Li and Shu have never valued the way of toolmaking. There’s no one presentable among them. You’re the Golden Hand. If you can’t do it, who can? We’re going!

Lin Chi stumbled. “Going wh—”

The words on the fan nearly pierced the clouds on the immortal mountains.
Tao County!

When Zhi Xiu, at the Wan-He border, received word, the first thing he did was to set off a firework.

Right now, all the shed skins had discovered that the great arrays of all the immortal mountains and all the border inscriptions had collapsed. Their consciousnesses were no longer limited by anything. They could sweep across the better part of the continent.

Though there were some thousands of li between the Lancang Mountains and the Wan-He border, the shed skins could now speak as though they were face-to-face.

“Everyone, listen to what I have to say—”

As Zhi Xiu spoke, his consciousness swept out toward the bottom of the sea, searching for Xi Ping.

To keep Xi Ping away from the pursuit of the reincarnation wood, Yao Qi and Chang Jun were certain to be using ascended spirit grade upgraded immortal tools, all Moon Plated Peak products, familiar to Zhi Xiu. Reasonably speaking, he should have seen them at a glance, but while his consciousness instantly covered the better part of the South Sea, he didn't find so much as a shadow.

Zhi Xiu's heart sank.

Meanwhile, Yao Qi and Chang Jun had escaped with Xi Ping from the reincarnation wood tree that was like a sea monster. The big fish that could travel stealthily over the seabed was gone. They'd had to squeeze into the leaf-shaped upgraded immortal tool.

This was a “protective immortal tool,” not a boat, and there was only enough space inside for one person to move around. With three grown fellows stuffed into it, it was almost bulging. It was pushed by the wind and waves on the sea, hopping up and down.

“Ziming...would you kindly lift your foot, you’ve nearly tapped out a New Year’s Greetings song on my belly!”

“It’s not my foot!”

“Right... I was wondering why it hurt so much... I’m going to throw up...”

“Hongzheng-xiong, don’t—”

Just then, the protective immortal tool gave a violent shake. Xi Ping’s ascended spirit heel was thrown against Chang Jun’s stomach, nearly twisting his half-immortal brother’s spine through the skin of his belly. Chang Jun’s face turned green. Exerting every bit of his strength, he freed up a hand to cover his mouth. But Yao Qi gave a start; he had a bad feeling.

The immortal tool that had been rolling wildly through the sea seemed to have been caught and stabilized. Through the half-transparent “leaf,” Yao Qi saw the figure of an enormous snake-like body, wrapped around the tiny protective immortal tool.

It was a waking dragon.

Flute music played in the water. The waking dragon wrapped around them moved as soon as it heard. It jumped several times. The two half-immortals inside the immortal tool no longer knew where they were.

A long, slim hand reached out of midair and tapped politely on the leaf immortal tool. Then came Wan language with the distinctive clinging character of the Miah clan: “There are none of those evil trees here. It’s safe. Gentlemen, come out and have a word with me.”

The legendary ascended spirit evil cultivator of Southern Shu.

Yao Qi and Chang Jun trembled simultaneously, like two frogs with a viper’s eyes on them, not daring to breathe too loudly.

Chang Jun quickly made a “hand cannon” gesture at Yao Qi, indicating for him to take aim at the ascended spirit. But Yao Qi, his expression dismal, shook his head—that ascended spirit grade hand cannon had slipped out of his hand while they were being chased by the reincarnation wood.

Chang Jun: “...”

He yanked Xi Ping's hair hopelessly: Wake up, brother, save us! The two of us won't even make a snack for that man!

Wangge Luobao landed on the waking dragon's head like the sea god himself and gently stroked the upgraded immortal tool in the shape of a furled leaf. He clicked his tongue in admiration. "So this is the spirit-conducting gold that lit the red moon eight hundred years ago. Amazing. This manmade object is sixty to seventy percent as effective as a cultivator's essence at conducting spiritual energy. If you had sheer force of numbers on your side, that would be disastrous. Fortunately..."

As Wangge Luobao spoke, there was a tooth-aching crack. He had found the location of the immortal tool's array with pinpoint accuracy. He pressed his flute to it and laughed softly.

Violent spiritual energy, completely out of keeping with that gentle sound, instantly pierced the immortal tool. Whatever other properties spirit-conducting gold might have, it was still a manmade object. Though it was also of ascended spirit grade, it could still never match up to a genuine ascended spirit master who had spent centuries cultivating. The immortal tool's core cracked in response.

In the blink of an eye, seawater was pouring in. Yao Qi and Chang Jun's vision darkened. They were knocked dizzy by a swipe of the waking dragon's tail as it rolled over. Xi Ping's wound-riddled body floated out and landed in a pair of arms.

CHAPTER 236 - Conclusion (4)

“Wan.” Wangge Luobao tilted his head with a trace of ridicule, examining Xi Ping with his odd-colored eyes as he held him.

The Wan and Chu had similar distinctive facial features, but looking closely, there was still a slight difference. Shu’s Xiuyi, meanwhile, looked more like the Chu. It was only that Chu and Shu were next to each other and had a great deal of contact, as well as always clashing at the border. Chu wasn’t like Wan, all the way across the South Sea—between nations, it was also sometimes the case that what was further away would be more attractive than what was close at hand.

As the rich and prosperous home of Moon Plated Gold, Southern Wan satisfied the Shu’s yearning for the land of the blessed: Wan-style aesthetic sensibilities were all high quality, the goods produced by Wan were all valuable. In Zhaoye City, the famous Xiuyi beauties all had some Wan qualities to their looks, while “Chu-style beauties” were often described as “beautiful enough, but a little garish.”

In fact, what was “elegant” and what was “garish”? In the main it was only some ordinary idiots who, having neither literary nor martial accomplishments themselves and incapable of learning those toolmaking arts that were unrivaled throughout the world, felt diffident and disheartened and had no choice but to flaunt their “taste.” It was just like wearing a pair of thick elevated shoes to put yourself a cut above the rest—after all, that was easier than getting taller.

Wangge Luobao said quietly to the waking dragon, “What do you think? A face like this— isn’t it what those pitiable Xiuyi long for even in their dreams?”

The waking dragon had no sense of human beauty or ugliness. It only turned into a rainbow in the sea, picking up Wangge Luobao.

“To have one’s Way of the Heart blend with the immortal mountains and the universe, to become a god and a sage—that is what the ants of the cultivation world long for even in their dreams. Western Chu’s Xiang Rong didn’t stint to refine his own Way of the Heart. No sooner had you entered the cultivation world than you obtained the most extraordinary inheritance in existence. With one more step, you would have been the next Kunlun Sword Ancestor, but you had to rebel...” Wangge Luobao laughed. The beast-taming flute in his hand pressed maliciously against the center of Xi Ping’s brow. “You truly cannot tell good from bad. Truly hateful.”

The beast-taming flute aroused Xi Ping’s protective spiritual energy. A thin layer of spiritual light covered him, turning the beast-taming flute ghastly white with its glow.

But Wangge Luobao only regarded him coldly for a moment and ultimately didn't blow off his head. He put down the flute. The beast-taming cultivator raised his voice and said, "The ducks know first when the waters are warming. Spiritual beasts react faster than humans. Now it appears that the foundations of the spiritual mountains have already been severed. Without restraints, the evil cultivators everywhere will rise in rebellion. The more vigorous the flames of war become and the more cultivators die, the more essence there will be dispersed everywhere, and the more difficult the position of this Tai Sui of yours will become as he defies the natural order—it doesn't matter if the two of you don't understand. You can convey my words to him."

Saying so, Wangge Luobao snapped his fingers. The waking dragon flew out of the water with a splash, wrapped around him and Xi Ping, then turned into a rainbow in midair and vanished, moving somewhere unknown, leaving only echoes behind on the surface of the sea. After a long moment, two terror-stricken heads popped out of the sea.

The hard-pressed Yao Qi and Chang Jun had just been knocked a hundred chi away by the waking dragon. They floated in the water staring at each other in dismay.

The half-immortals far away on the fringes of the battle with their incomplete information in fact didn't understand, but Xi Ping understood immediately—Yao Qi sent a Heavenly Question to Wei Chengxiang, which Wei Chengxiang then transmitted via flying goose letter to Tao County. Zhao Qindan asked Tao-er-nainai to disband all the gawping townspeople and moved the better half of the Tao World Record's office into the little courtyard to ensure that news from all over could come through without delay.

Zhao Qindan read aloud the message that had come through the machine several times. “What he means is, war will strengthen the hidden bones and weaken you?”

Xi Ping played the Tai Sui Qin like strong wind and swift rain: That's for sure! The ancient inscriptions are like foundations, and the immortal mountains are roof beams and pillars. When an earthquake collapses half of the house's foundation, the house is left struggling to stand up on a few pillars, and those idiotic sons of bitches are fighting each other for the chance to chop down those pillars so they can bring back some wood to stick together a coffin for themselves!

As the daughter of an important family, Zhao Qindan had only studied the basics of music, weiqi, calligraphy, and painting as a child for the sake of appearances. Her skills had been trivial and ordinary to begin with, just enough to get by, and after a decade of running around managing people's welfare, she had long ago returned those insubstantial attainments to her teacher. “Wait, wait, wait, you’re playing too fast, I can’t distinguish the notes! Can’t you make a long story short?”

Xi Ping held down the string and smashed out a few bitter notes: You—are—right!

Zhao Qindan gasped. The Tao World Record’s scribes were sending news back in a constant stream from all over:

The great evil cultivators led by Yu Chang had already fought their way onto the Sanyue Mountains. The Xiangs were completely unwilling to abdicate in favor of more qualified candidates and were mounting a defense to the death, relying on the arrays throughout the Sanyue Mountains. The blood on the Sanyue Mountains had nearly dyed the sky above Dongheng City red.

Shu’s spiritual beasts were rioting, Lingyun’s cultivators were run off their feet, and the Cauldron of Nine Dragons wasn’t there. The Miah survivors hidden in Southern Shu had seized the opportunity to launch a counteroffensive.

Never mind that on the South Sea there were still a number of shed skins ready to come to blows without a word.

And the more bad news the flying goose machine spat out, the more rapidly the Law Breaker shrank.

The Luwu were calculating the speed of shrinkage of the spiritual energy prohibition line almost once per intense stick interval. At first it had been one chi per intense stick, but now it had already doubled three times and then some and still showed signs of speeding up. The sacred guardian trees that the people of Tao County had revered in former days were nibbling and swallowing pieces of the paradise-like spiritual energy prohibition.

During this time, Lin Chi and Xi Ping had tried countless methods: piling up spiritual stones inside and outside the Law Breaker hadn't been the slightest use; chopping down the reincarnation wood trees, meanwhile, was completely impracticable—outside the line of the spiritual energy prohibition, the “rotten wood” of former days really had turned into divine trees. Not even the attack of a shed skin sword cultivator had been able to cut through the one in the South Sea—only the ones inside the Law Breaker had yet to “develop intelligence,” but eliminating them would have been meaningless now. Reincarnation wood had always been a tree that could start growing if you shook out some seeds or stuck a budding branch into the earth. Now, controlled by the hidden bones, the reincarnation wood trees outside the Law Breaker were spreading even faster than wildfire vines, on mountains and in water, on roofs and roadsides, in utmost cold, in scorching heat...

“And there’s your body,” said Zhao Qindan, “that Southern Shu evil cultivator...”

She was interrupted by Xi Ping’s irascible sweet notes, which sounded like a qin being slammed: I’m glad he’s taken it, don’t bother about it.

If it had fallen into someone else’s hands, that might have been something to worry about. It having fallen into Wangge Luobao’s hands was the safest thing now—though that Southern Shu evil cultivator was inhuman, his understanding of the hidden bones was certainly the most profound. As long as he didn’t want to let the hidden bones jump straight to the shed skin boundary, he wouldn’t want to destroy his body. Right now, the world was full of reincarnation wood trees that wanted to break him to pieces; even the sea wasn’t safe. A beast-taming cultivator who had “spies” everywhere was just the right person to hide him.

As for later...

Xi Ping thought, I may not be able to live to “later.”

The two female cultivators Zhao Qindan and Wei Chengxiang had identical reactions to this: That's your body! Not bothering about it is outrageous!

Xi Ping ignored the two of them. His thoughts jumped swiftly to another place: first they had to snuff out the flames of battle everywhere. The spiritual prohibition line retreating at a uniform speed was nothing to fear; small as Tao County was, it would still take months to retreat. But if it kept speeding up like this, it wouldn't be able to take it. The furnace flame was leaping ever more violently. The Law Breaker might come crashing down at any moment.

“Leave the shed skins to my shifu, have the Luwu Xu Rucheng detain Yu Chang. Yu Chang wants the Sanyue Mountains. If the hidden bones get the upper hand, even if the Sanyue mountains don't collapse, they still won't belong to him! Tell them to stop fighting and withdraw, and I'll return his vital weapon! Southern Shu... A-Xiang can contact Queru for me! Master Lin, I've gone around the Law Breaker with the furnace flame eight hundred times. When are you going to be through with decoding those inscriptions?”

Lin Chi and Wen Fei had already reached the Xia River.

The Unbound Furnace's flame was inside the Law Breaker. The whole way, Lin Chi had allowed Wen Fei to fly, carrying him along, while he had flung himself body and heart into the Unbound Furnace, attempting to interpret the inscriptions on that divine tool, the Law Breaker, and work out the connection between the Law Breaker and the furnace flame. But though he had researched Hui Xiangjun for eight hundred years, now he could still only interpret a portion of the Law Breaker's inscriptions with a struggle. The furnace flame was far outside the scope of his comprehension.

“Wait...this must have to do with the inheritance of the Eternal Spring Brocade, I...I...”

Xi Ping felt that if he pressed him any further, Lin Chi would have an emotional collapse; moreover, if it really was related to the way of the ancient demonic god, pressing him would be no use. His voice softened at once. “Shishu, don't fret, the Law Breaker inscriptions are enough. Send the inscriptions you've interpreted to individual Luwu and have these inscriptions leak out—the people of Northern Li once used inscriptions to carve the Kunlun Mountains, and now we may yet be able to realize the Law Breaker.”

Zhao Qindan, while being run off her feet carrying out his orders, found time among her many cares to contact Wei Chengxiang in private: “He has too many things to attend to at once right now, is there anything you can do?”

“I’m in Great Wan’s Guzhou!” Wei Chengxiang said. “What the hell, that bastard Xi Shiyong really is broad-minded...”

Just then, a Heavenly Question from Yao Qi and Chang Jun flew into her hand.

Yao Qi said that, while fleeing for their lives in the sea, he had been afraid that Xi Ping’s true body would be lost, so he had held onto a bit of the blood Xi Ping had spilled when he had been slashed by the reincarnation wood. With his blood, he could draw a tracking talisman to search for him.

When Wei Chengxiang had read this, her head began to hurt. She thought to herself that this big brother was thinking too much. Track an ascended spirit—even if he’d gotten ahold of the Southern Sage’s blood or the Sword Ancestor’s blood, any talisman he drew would still be of half-immortal grade...and not an especially accomplished half-immortal, at that. Unless Wangge Luobao died, once the talisman was complete, he would be able to detect it even with his foot.

She rather unskillfully manipulated the Heavenly Question in her hands and was just about to tell those two gentlemen to behave themselves and stay put instead of indulging in wild fantasies when she suddenly noticed the location of the senders—the Heavenly Question was the Xuanyin Mountains' most high-grade communication immortal tool, capable of establishing a one-way link to a specific person without being spied on by masters. When Wei Chengxiang wrote back, she could use this Heavenly Question to sense Yao Qi and Chang Jun's approximate bearings.

Her gaze paused as she found that the senders Yao Qi and Chang Jun had gone very far west.

In the west of the South Sea, apart from Southern Shu, there was also a place very familiar to her!

Shortly, Yao Qi and Chang Jun received a very special guide talisman through the Heavenly Question. Wei Chengxiang's response was: A half-immortal's talisman will be noticed by a master. Follow the guide talisman, and you will come to a place that may be able to hide the aura of your talisman.

Meanwhile, Zhi Xiu had succinctly shouted the fight above the Lancang Spiritual Mountains to a stop—he didn't even have time to finish. As soon as he mentioned the words “the ancient inscriptions from outside the Beijue Mountains,” that Kunlun Sect Leader suddenly seemed to go into convulsions. His expression became greatly alarmed. Then he turned his gaze across the South Sea onto Western Chu's Tao County and ran off in that direction.

The words "outside the Beijue Mountains" were similarly stunning for Wu Lingxiao, and Tao County was Western Chu's territory, so Xuanwu naturally couldn't just sit by and watch. The two of them followed the Sect Leader, and soon after that it was Kunlun's Third Elder and Lingyun's Sect Leader, a beat slow. Zhi Xiu said a few words to Pang Jian and Bai Ling, then leapt up and went in pursuit. For a time, all the masters in the world were heading toward Tao County.

The Sanyue Mountains' Xu Rucheng didn't drop the ball at the critical moment. He faultlessly relayed Xi Ping's own words to Yu Chang. When Yu Chang heard the words "vital weapon," the veins on his temples stood out, and he seized Xu Rucheng by the collar. "Tell him—I—will—fuck—his—ancestors!"

Then Yu Chang abruptly dove into the shadow of the Sanyue Mountains—because of that damned Tai Sui's mischief, his control over the evil cultivators and war lords of Western Chu had been pared down by fifty to sixty percent. Moreover, he understood his peers, who had been oppressed by the spiritual mountains for over a thousand years. They didn't give a damn whether mountains collapsed or people died. Their first reaction wouldn't be to prevent loss; it would certainly be to seize spiritual stones.

The shadow of the mountains covered the shadows of all the cultivators in Sanyue. Yu Chang didn't attempt to convince anyone. He only gave a bellow: "Xuanwu!"

He had used the "grit worm projection" to spout out this cry. The minds of Xiangs and evil cultivators alike were simultaneously shaken. It happened to be late already. A night breeze blew by, leaving the moon hanging high in the sky.

Yu Chang's ascended spirit grade illusion went up into the sky, obscuring the gazes of all the evil cultivators. For a time, the cultivators awed by the grit worm projection were incapable of distinguishing the real moon from the Silver Moon. They were overcome with terror. Some whose temperaments were insufficiently staunch immediately developed marks on their bodies as if they had been swept by the Silver Moon.

All the evil cultivators in the mountains instantly fell into disorder, brandishing precious tools they had kept in reserve and fleeing in all directions. Yu Chang gave Xu Rucheng a cold look and tossed him back where he had found him. He raised a hand and released a signal flare. "Here! Brothers, follow me!"

And in the depths of the South Sea, a “mortal steamship” left the South Sea Hidden Realm. The moment it squeezed out through the crack, the ship shook. The Turmoiler Li Manlong pressed a switch on the upgraded immortal tool. Spirit-conducting gold swiftly collected spiritual energy from spiritual stones, and that “mortal ship,” before it could be crushed by the weight of the water, swiftly changed into an immortal tool and parted the waters as if flying.

The upgraded immortal tool flying toward the surface scattered countless tiny flutes, which played a beast-taming melody to pacify spiritual beasts. Though it was only established foundation grade, it was still enough. The melody spread outside the Lingyun Mountains, and the spiritual beasts that had charged in among crowds of people moved slower and slower. One after another fell over.

After a moment’s shock, the Lingyun cultivators rapidly got the situation under control and split people off to return to the immortal mountains. The rebel Miah cultivators also received a secret letter from Wangge Luobao and withdrew en masse.

Following the colossal exertions of cultivators everywhere, regardless of orthodox or evil, the flames of war among the five great spiritual mountains were temporarily suppressed.

Starting from the Tao World Record's printing depot, printed Law Breaker inscriptions spread out to all points. The toilet bulletins that had been closely watching the Tao World Record ever since the start of the unforeseen events in Southern He fell over each other to imitate. As if they had grown wings, the Law Breaker's inscriptions were transmitted everywhere in the blink of an eye and reproduced by countless hands using different methods —

For the first time, the speed at which the spiritual energy prohibition was shrinking slowed.

“Twenty-four...twenty-three chi per hour.”

Zhao Qindan obtained data about the shrinkage of the spiritual energy prohibition as soon as it was available—not long before, the number had been over a hundred chi per hour.

“Much better, and the inscriptions are still spreading.” Zhao Qindan heaved a sigh of relief and couldn't resist making a joke. “What do you think, Xi-shixiong, is the spiritual energy prohibition going to start widening instead in a while? If the Law Breaker's inscriptions are everywhere, then wouldn't we accidentally be ‘realizing the Law Breaker’?”

Xi Ping went mute for a long moment. The Tai Sui Qin, which had just been strident and commanding, buzzed weakly: What did you call me?

Zhao Qindan came back to her senses and laughed lightly. She crossed her arms in front of her chest and, calm under pressure, walked two circles around the reincarnation wood tree. “Come to think of it, ‘Senior’ Tai Sui, don’t you still owe me an explan...”

But before she could finish speaking, she was interrupted by the sound of an explosion in the distance.

Zhao Qindan was petrified.

At the Law Breaker’s boundary, a Luwu taking measurements of the spiritual energy prohibition line had gone outside the line in his excitement. Before he could realize that he had forgotten himself, he froze in place—a wind blade composed of spiritual energy had flown out of a reincarnation wood tree outside the spiritual energy prohibition line, cutting that half-immortal in two. The protective immortal tool he carried exploded into a firework.

CHAPTER 237 - Conclusion (5)

As the Law Breaker inscriptions spread through the channel of the toilet bulletins, the hidden bones seemed to notice something. The reincarnation wood, which had only been spreading in all directions, started “hunting.”

The cultivators near the Law Breaker’s spiritual energy prohibition line immediately became nervous, facing off against the out-of-control reincarnation wood outside the line.

Southern Shu had luxuriant vegetation. Reincarnation wood saplings were hidden in cracks in rocks and mountain streams, shunting back and forth like mobile tripwires, silently invading the spiritual beast farm standing wide open because its inscriptions had been damaged. The Lingyun cultivators returning from capturing escaped spiritual beasts were sniped head-on!

The reincarnation wood trees even hid in snow and ice and snuck into the Kunlun Mountains.

The fan under Wen Fei’s feet pulled up over ten zhang, evading an attacking beam of spiritual energy. The waters of the Xia River were rising sharply now. He saw at a glance the densely packed reincarnation wood trees under the water; just the sight of it was horrifying.

Wen Fei gave a cry of surprise and tossed poison from his sleeve. The ascended spirit miasma that would have had even wildfire fleeing in defeat met the teeth-baring, claw-brandishing reincarnation wood vines in midair; the vines were burned black and exhausted, but the miasma was also broken!

Wen Fei's eyelids twitched. He had a bad feeling. As expected, the next moment, the blackened vines rapidly grew new twigs and buds and went in relentless pursuit.

When this thing had been taking Xi Shiyong's orders, it had plainly been a rotten tree that would bend wherever you pushed it! If its amulets weren't appropriately taken care of, they would get damp and sprout mushrooms. Why had it become so powerful as soon as it mutinied? It was completely absurd!

In Tao County, reincarnation wood was like a town gate, a symbol of safety. For the past eight years, for unnumbered Luwu finding themselves in desperate straits abroad, seeing reincarnation wood had been like seeing a glimmer of hope in their darkest hour.

They instinctively relied on this unprepossessing willow tree. Even though they had suddenly learned that reincarnation wood had gone out of control and intellectually knew that they ought to be on their guard against it, emotionally they hadn't caught up yet.

The Luwu's blood splashed on the brown tree bark. The reincarnation wood amulet that had been carried as a tool and as a protective talisman fell from the body, its owner having forgotten to remove it.

The vast majority of people now knew that reincarnation wood had mutinied and no longer spoke to their amulets. The noise coming through the wood had quieted, so Xi Ping heard that Luwu's cry of Tai Sui on the point of death.

Xi Ping was himself inside a tree, but his soul had already gone up in flames. His vital qin made a sound like tearing silk under its master's hands: There are so many munitions hidden under the Northern Xia garrison. Are they planning to keep them there until they have kids? If we don't blow the reincarnation wood to firewood now, I'm afraid nothing will ever take it out. Have the mortals withdraw, get further from the spiritual energy prohibition line!

Before he could finish playing this string of qin sweet notes, Zhao Qindan received the latest information: "But it seems that everyone it's attacking are our people... Strictly speaking, they're all cultivators."

Xi Ping froze.

Killing cultivators?

In his rage, his reason laboriously pushed aside the obfuscations and noticed the peculiarity in this.

It didn't make sense. If the hidden bones had been capable of killing everyone off, they would have done it by now. What need would there have been to lust after the ancient inscriptions outside the Beijue Mountains?

Because Xi Ping had carried off a portion of the ancient inscriptions, the hidden bones had gotten stuck halfway along their road to godhood. They hadn't yet overturned the old rules and formulated new rules like "spiritual energy gathers in reincarnation wood trees" or "reincarnation wood becomes the new spiritual mountains." Though the growth of the trees could be hastened with spiritual energy, they still couldn't store spiritual energy like a cultivator's essence.

Right now, the reincarnation wood controlled by the hidden bones could only use spiritual energy out in the world, operate near the spiritual mountains or in places where cultivators were plentiful and spiritual energy diffused everywhere.

The hidden bones' fighting capacity was currently about that of a late stage ascended spirit, limited by Xi Ping's own cultivation level—and somewhat reduced from that, too, since after all the bones were only a “natural disaster” left behind by a demonic god. Unlike a human, they couldn't use a wide variety of talismans and arrays. In Southern Wan, they were being neutralized by the snow shuffler, unable to make mischief in Jinping, so for the moment they couldn't steal spiritual energy from Xuanyin's Territory Map and veins of the earth, either.

When Xi Ping himself ran up against a formidable opponent, even he would have to find a place to replenish his spiritual stones somewhere. So what about the hidden bones?

Even if it was a matter of perfect indifference to the hidden bones whether mortals lived or died, directly pilfering heaven's order and draining every last drop of spiritual energy in the mortal world would still have extremely limited results. Spiritual energy consumed by attacking cultivators would necessarily involve a sacrifice of a large portion of reincarnation wood trees.

And the success of the first attacks had been pure luck. These cultivators had all been honed amid blades of wind and ice. As soon as they became aware of what was happening and started taking precautions, the amount of spiritual energy killing one person would use up would have to be greater than the spiritual energy contained in that person's essence.

Looking at it in the long-term... No, you didn't even have to look at it in the long-term. This muddleheaded move on the part of the hidden bones was like taking down ten of the enemy in exchange for eight thousand of your own.

What were they playing at? Had the hidden bones gone mad from urgency?

Or perhaps it was just that they were merely a dead man's bones, only capable of following their instincts to make trouble, incapable of counting?

With reincarnation wood going wild wherever cultivators congregated, the Sanyue Mountains naturally weren't exempt.

Yu Chang had retreated, leading the recently frightened cultivators, and hadn't yet had time to reach the location of the original great mountain array when his spiritual sense was suddenly touched by something. Yu Chang dodged, and a beam of murderous spiritual energy brushed past him, hitting another cultivator in the chest. Yu Chang casually tossed a lightning talisman in the direction the sneak attack had come from, breaking apart the attacking reincarnation wood tree. He was just about to come to the rescue—a wound to the chest wasn't a fatal one for a cultivator—when he saw a line of inscriptions flash in that wounded cultivator's wound.

His spiritual sense sent up another warning. Yu Chang stopped in his tracks. He saw the inscriptions burrow into the wounded cultivator's spirit. The cultivator went rigid. His spirit was crushed, his Way of the Heart broke apart, and he died.

The victim was an established foundation. A sudden death like this would result in an explosion of essence.

Yu Chang's reaction was extremely fast. He hollered, "Out of the way!" Protective spiritual energy spread out, guarding everyone like a shield.

But the anticipated essence explosion and spiritual energy dispersal didn't happen.

An inscription emerged slowly from the cracked brow of the victim. It hung in midair along with the body, whose eyes Yu Chang met in bewilderment.

Chu's cultivators, regardless of whether they were orthodox or evil, were all learned in talismans, arrays, and inscriptions, but Yu Chang had never seen an inscription like this. He knew in his heart that this might be one of those mystical ancient inscriptions.

He stared briefly at that inscription, and a faint feeling suddenly emerged in his mind... It was like when he had first become an ascended spirit and discovered for the first time that he no longer needed to consult documents and ancient texts. The laws and commandments of heaven and earth would be self-evident if he only focused and inquired.

Now, that vague intuition was urging him: Try copying an inscription.

Try...

An impulse spread from his spirit. While his protective spiritual energy had yet to disperse, Yu Chang extended a hand and copied that inscription in midair. Inscriptions without physical forms had limited effectiveness. If there was danger, he would be able to get out of the way in time.

It seemed that a cultivator's intuition never led them astray. That inscription didn't harm him.

The instant it was completed, a portion of the dead established foundation's essence rushed into Yu Chang along with the inscription. Spiritual energy like cool spring water swept over all his bones in a flash and converged in his essence!

Yu Chang slowly drew in a breath.

He wasn't the only one to have noticed something unusual. What this world was least lacking in were "smart people." Soon, cultivators elsewhere also noticed that by reproducing those inscriptions, you could take the essence of a cultivator killed by reincarnation wood for yourself.

And the spiritual energy obtained from an essence wasn't like the spiritual energy they normally drained from spiritual stones, which they could only take in until their own essence was full. This spiritual energy instead became a part of their essence!

For over a thousand years, if a cultivator beyond the established foundation boundary wanted to take a step forward, they would have to refine their Way of the Heart countless times, make an unending stream of spiritual energy flow through their essence, and in this way they could still only inch forward over the years. Now, however, by using a few inscriptions, they could easily snatch...

No wonder masters had been as plentiful as clouds in ancient times, ascended spirits filling the streets, and cultivators, instead of diligently cultivating, were everywhere risking their lives looking for people to debate and battle.

Unavoidably, people remembered the legends about that “Tai Sui” who had the misty willow for his accompanying plant. He had opened his spiritual eyes only a few months after beginning to cultivate, established a foundation in less than a year, become an ascended spirit within ten years... This explained it!

So this was Tai Sui’s secret, they thought.

In that moment, on the northern and southern continents, countless hands reached out for those ancient inscriptions.

With a tremendous enticement, even brothers could fall out, never mind that everywhere the flames of war had only been suppressed with difficulty.

The cultivators had been of one heart; now, that “public-spirited heart” broke easily.

An inscription drawn by an established foundation cultivator might be able to offset an entire prefecture’s worth of mortals. After all, it would take effect as soon as it formed.

The reincarnation wood’s inscriptions propagated among cultivators far faster than the Law Breaker’s inscriptions were spreading between mortals.

In hardly longer than the blink of an eye, Tai County's spiritual energy prohibition line, which had just slowed in its contraction, shrank two or three li. The Luwu near the spiritual energy prohibition line didn't even have time to react before they ended up in the outside world.

Soon after, like fine sand picked up by a wild wind, the spiritual energy prohibition line began to crumble all at once.

The Luwu didn't even need to calculate anymore!

Zhao Qindan said, "The spiritual energy prohibition line will have shrunk to where we are in a shichen or two at most..."

Stop dreaming, said Xi Ping, we don't have anywhere near that much time!

In his hand, the Unbound Furnace's furnace flame trembled violently. Xi Ping's heart nearly stopped for a moment. He cupped that weak flame, only the size of a pea, in both hands, wishing he could turn himself into kindling for the furnace flame.

What should he do?

Suddenly, Xi Ping realized that perhaps the Blind Wolf King Xie Chu forcing the ancient inscriptions from outside the Beijue Mountains on him hadn't been because he had been tricked by false information from the reincarnation wood... His san-ge had likely had a hand in this.

Those two gambling addicts might well have done it on purpose.

If it was a certainty that the hidden bones would go out of control, then once they crossed the shed skin boundary, perhaps they wouldn't even need the ancient inscriptions. In the current circumstances, the hidden bones would only need to seize the reincarnation wood and escape Xi Ping's control, and they would be able to take the Xuanyin Mountains—Southern Wan's Territory Map and veins of the earth were sewn together with reincarnation wood. If the hidden bones reached the shed skin stage, Zhi Xiu's finicky accompanying plant wouldn't be numerous enough to suppress them.

Lancang had no master, and its great mountain array and divine tool of the mountains had been beaten half to death by the Sword Slave. If another attacker of shed skin grade came along, they'd have no choice but to kneel and surrender. Xuanwu was Sanyue's only remaining shed skin, and he was facing enemies on both sides. There was only half of the Lingyun Mountains left, anyway, so they went without saying. Only Northern Li's Kunlun was formidable, and its Sect Leader had lost his mind, and Wanshuang had revolted... The out-of-control hidden bones could have had the five great immortal mountains in the palm of their hand, even easier than now.

As for how overbearing shed skin hidden bones would be, Xi Ping had no way of imagining. Perhaps his consciousness wouldn't even have had latitude to struggle before it was simply erased.

That being the case, san-ge must have thought that if the hidden bones could be lured out before they reached the shed skin boundary, the situation wouldn't be completely hopeless.

Then where was the breaking point?

It obviously wouldn't do now to rely on interpreting the Law Breaker's inscriptions and transmitting them to people in imitation of the way Kunlun had been raised. This past millennium and more, if the mortal commoners had been able to overcome the greedy cultivators, the spiritual mountains would have fallen long ago. It wouldn't have taken this long.

And the shed skin masters were obviously also unreliable.

At present, even if all the presentable shed skins assembled here, they couldn't cut down all the reincarnation wood trees in the world in a short time. Once the hidden bones got hold of all the ancient inscriptions, then never mind the shed skins, even the full moon sages coming back from the dead wouldn't be able to turn the situation around!

Holding the Unbound Furnace's furnace flame, which was growing weaker and weaker, Xi Ping burned with anxiety. He lost confidence in himself, suspecting that he had been knocked dizzy by the ancient inscriptions coming at him without warning and hadn't understood san-ge's intentions; he had carried out some earlier step wrong, missed his one chance.

Zhi Xiu and a crowd of shed skins arrived hard upon each other's heels. They hadn't been slow, but the whole Xia River was filled with reincarnation wood trees. The ancient inscriptions flashing over the surface of the water one after another were like the lanterns on either side of the Lingyang River.

Before Zhi Xiu arrived, a beam of sword light from Zhaoting flew out, scooping up Lin Chi and Wen Fei.

Xuanwu scolded, "Bold monster." The strength of a shed skin swept the whole Xia River. His curved blade, like a full moon, made a streak of ghastly pale light. The reincarnation wood trees outside the Law Breaker withered and died in swaths. But at the same time, the light of his blade also delineated the spiritual energy prohibition line, running faster than a Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon. The speed of the Law Breaker's spiritual energy prohibition line's retreat was completely unaffected by the reincarnation wood forest. It seemed to be mocking him.

Zhaoting held up Wen Fei's fan, which had nearly been capsized by the shed skin spiritual energy. He landed beside his own people. "How is it? Where is Shiyong?"

"That...th-that fucking old—old boy toy Xuanwu, is he helping or messing around!" Wen Fei struggled to find his footing and spoke hastily: "O-over there! Y-you can even hear his q-qin!"

Zhi Xiu looked in the direction he was pointing. Across the distance of all of Tao County, with the senses of a shed skin, the tree Xi Ping was temporarily residing in was right before his eyes. Seen from above, the surging spiritual energy prohibition line was charging at that tree like the tide.

Even if the sky fell and the earth cracked, the East Sea overturned...or all the shed skin masters around him collectively lost their minds, Zhaoting could strive to bar the way—whether god or demon, he only needed to know where to strike.

But who could bar the way to all the greed in the world?

The millennia-old spiritual mountains had rotted like this.

CHAPTER 238 - Conclusion (6)

But General Zhi was accustomed to being a pillar of strength, not looking around while wielding his sword. However much of a loss he was at, he didn't show it. He quickly averted his gaze, composed his mind, and found something he could do—

Zhaoting froze the Xia River after Xuanwu had cleaned it up and quickly carved the Law Breaker's inscriptions on it.

As soon as a shed skin stepped in, the spiritual energy prohibition line immediately slowed. The other shed skin masters no longer had the leisure to wrangle over whether the "Law Breaker" was evil or not. All the shed skins here apart from Zhi Xiu and Wu Lingxiao represented their nation's spiritual mountains. In this moment, all grudges and resentments were at an end. Including Kunlun's Sect Leader, who had gone half out of his mind, the masters fell into unprecedented unity: nothing must happen to the spiritual mountains.

Several inscriptions from the hands of shed skins took shape in rapid succession, and the racing spiritual energy prohibition line, like a wild horse towed by a rope, stagnated. People inside and outside the Law Breaker simultaneously breathed a sigh of relief and fell silent on both sides of the spiritual energy prohibition line.

After a long while, Kunlun's Third Elder at last broke the hush. "The ancient inscriptions have come into the world, and chaos has arisen. Even if today's troubles are resolved, vile ambition has everywhere slipped its reins. What course is the orthodoxy of the immortal mountains to follow?"

With a bitter smile, Zhi Xiu said, "The elder is taking the long view—but oughtn't we to put out the fire that's about to burn off our eyebrows? Today's troubles have yet to be resolved. While I was on the way here, Zisheng disseminated the Law Breaker's inscriptions to the Kaiming Department and Heaven's Design Pavilion, but you all know my country's situation. There are practically only half-immortals who haven't established foundations left in the outer sects..."

The Third Elder took his hint. He glanced at his Sect Leader, whose soul had gone wandering, and sighed. "Yes, we will take it upon ourselves to restrain our sect's disciples."

Having said this, he formed a Linked Heart in his hand and sent it back to the Kunlun Mountains in the capacity of an elder's order, forbidding the sect's disciples from propagating the ancient inscriptions. Lingyun's Sect Leader naturally followed suit.

But when they had issued their orders, the Third Elder and Lingyun's Sect Leader's gazes met; then each quickly looked away. Evidently they were both well aware that these orders were merely self-consolation. The results were likely to be negligible.

Walking a centuries-long road of cultivation in an instant, established foundation ants ranking among the clouds in the blink of an eye—with the road to heaven ahead, how many people could stand the test?

With enemies everywhere striding up to heaven in a single step, if you alone scrupulously abided by orders, apart from proving that you were a fool who couldn't adapt to changing circumstances, what other benefit could it have for the world?

Xuanwu knew the weak characters of everyone in Sanyue and didn't bother taking useless measures. He grimly fixed his eyes on Tao County. The curved blade in his hand rose and fell, slashing at the reincarnation wood tree where Xi Ping was hidden: finishing off the hidden bones within a short time was no longer feasible; if he could finish off Xi Ping here, the portion of the ancient inscriptions that the hidden bones had lost would never come to light. That boy was bad news, anyway.

Lin Chi gave a cry of alarm.

Zhi Xiu's hand went to Zhaoting's hilt, but then he recalled something and held himself back from drawing the sword—indeed, as soon as Xuanwu's mountain-cleaving blow entered the line of the spiritual energy prohibition, it was wafted apart, making only a shallow groove half a chi deep in the ground.

Xi Ping held the flame of the Unbound Furnace, which had nearly gone out earlier, in both hands. He saw Lin Chi stir. "What now?"

"Xuanwu tried to attack you," said Lin Chi, "but luckily..."

"Luckily, my ass," Xi Ping interrupted him. "If that old pretty boy could shatter my consciousness before the hidden bones get to it, I'd kneel and kowtow to him right now, and to that bald disciple of his along with him! Lin-shishu, I'm not trying to rush you...hss..."

Midway through speaking, Xi Ping's spiritual sense suddenly moved. This time it wasn't a sense of danger. Rather, it felt like someone very closely connected to him was repeatedly speaking of him with a cultivator's methods, but for some reason, he couldn't immediately seize on the source.

Meanwhile, Yao Qi and Chang Jun, guided by Wei Chengxiang, had smoothly found the South Sea Hidden Realm. Before they could gasp in astonishment that such a place should exist, the two half-immortals received upgraded immortal tools from the Turmoilers who had stayed back to stand guard and were sent on their way. Screened by an ascended spirit grade upgraded immortal tool, Yao Qi carefully drew a tracking talisman with Xi Ping's blood.

As the strokes fell and the talisman took shape, Yao Qi and Chang Jun held their breaths. The lines of blood on the talisman flowed slowly, pointing the way for the two of them.

“All right, we have a direction.” Chang Jun took out a new Heavenly Question, wrote up his message, and sent it. “We'll wait here for the masters... Wait, what does this mean?”

The blood on the talisman gave off a milky glare. The blood turned to dust.

“Someone is using a technique on Shiyong's body,” Yao Qi said. “If I remember rightly, white light means treating wounds...”

Before he could finish, a red glow appeared over the “friendly” white light. The ominous red glow nearly fused with the blood the talisman was drawn in. Yao Qi's voice cut off.

“Somehow I don't think this red is for a wedding,” said Chang Jun.

The red glow grew stronger and stronger, “flowing” from the talisman like water. When it fell to the ground, it spread and solidified into a bright red mirror. In the mirror, a pair of odd-colored eyes suddenly appeared, seeming to be looking at the two of them through the talisman. Yao Qi and Chang Jun jumped, stepping back simultaneously.

But under cover of the ascended spirit grade immortal tool, Wangge Luobao’s three successive attempts at inspecting Xi Ping’s body turned up nothing unusual. He grumbled in the Miah language, then went off to continue being paranoid. Only then did Yao Qi and Chang Jun get a clear look at Xi Ping’s surroundings... Xi Ping’s body was floating in water, suspended, causing ripples when he swayed slightly. In the waves, countless slender spiritual threads seemed to be reflected, like some inscription.

Yao Qi and Chang Jun’s eyes met. Chang Jun said, “What the hell is that place? He’s not trying to make some kind of pill out of Shiyong, is he? Are... are we still going to wait for the masters?”

“By the time any masters get here, he’ll be almost fully cooked.” Yao Qi grit his teeth and looked around—the Turmoilers couldn’t speak well, but they certainly had no hidden selfish designs. The upgraded immortal tools had come from Tai Sui and Wei-laoban. When Wei Chengxiang had issued a request, they had generously given whatever was useful to Wei-laoban’s friends. Yao Qi took a deep breath and hung all the upgraded immortal tools he could carry on himself. “With these, who isn’t an ascended spirit? Let’s go!”

Yao Qi’s expectations had been right. Before their Heavenly Question could even reach Wei Chengxiang, the masters were ready to come to blows.

Zhi Xiu’s expression was slightly grave. “Elder Xuanwu, what are you doing?”

“If that disciple of yours has any conscience left, he ought to take the initiative to finish himself off.”

“The way he cultivates is special. With his consciousness separated from his body now, even if he detonates his essence, it will only be letting the hidden bones have their way. His consciousness can only be destroyed by outside forces,” Zhi Xiu said. “If Elder Xuanwu has some means of entering and destroying his consciousness, I invite you to enlighten me. The disciple of my Flying Jade Peak is willing to make the sacrifice for the sake of the world.”

Xuanwu clenched his teeth with a click: with the Law Breaker unbroken, there were only mortals inside the spiritual energy prohibition line. He couldn’t get rid of that “Tai Sui” and his loquacious qin; and once the Law Breaker was broken, the hidden bones would obtain the ancient inscriptions ahead of any of them...because that qin was sealed inside a reincarnation wood tree!

Apart from quarreling brothers and idle leeches who forced women into marriage, the Sanyue Mountains' remaining specialty product was schemers. For a moment, judging others by his own standards, Xuanwu suspected that Xi Ping had sealed the qin in the tree deliberately from the start. He glared hatefully at Zhi Xiu. "What an excellent disciple you've turned out!"

"Yes, elder, it shames me." Zhi Xiu cupped his hands gently and perfunctorily. "You're perfectly right, I am far inferior in that regard."

Xuanwu: "..."

In fact, Zhi Xiu really didn't mean anything by this, he just wasn't in the mood to show off his discoursing skills for the benefit of an old fool who had been alive over a thousand years; he had only been trying to put an end to the spat however he could. While, thanks to his busybody disciple, he had heard the tittle-tattle from the Sanyue Mountains, it had after all been most of a decade. Even when he had nothing else to do, Zhi Xiu still didn't have the refined habit of subscribing to toilet bulletins and wagging his tongue. The tangle of grievances between Xuanwu and his brilliant disciple hadn't come to mind, and he had jabbed Xuanwu right where it hurt.

Zhi Xiu only realized what he had said when Xuanwu slashed furiously at him. He parried the blow and simply had no idea how to respond—seriously?!

“Elder Xuanwu, have you no sense of priority?”

Xuanwu was relentless, his curved blade nearly drawing a full moon. Zhi Xiu didn't want to engage in senseless battle and didn't fight back. When he dodged, he suddenly realized that the look in Xuanwu's eyes was wrong: Xuanwu's eyes, always somewhat cold, didn't seem as calm as usual; they were dimly clouded by madness.

Yes, his impulsive strike at Tao County just now had been a little off.

Zhi Xiu immediately realized: apart from him, the shed skins of the immortal mountains all shared their minds with the spiritual mountains. With the spiritual mountains at a dead end, the shed skins who were normally mysterious or mature and cool-headed would be affected, each one becoming irritable and impulsive!

And just then, the spiritual prohibition line that the shed skins working together had stopped moved again.

This wasn't hard to understand. There were only so many shed skins representing the will of the spiritual mountains in the world, and they were it; their cultivation levels had all reached the pinnacle. But the cultivators being used by the hidden bones and using the bones to broaden their essences were becoming more and more numerous, and their cultivation levels were constantly increasing as they replicated the inscriptions.

“Elder Xuanwu,” said Zhi Xiu, “if you still have strength to spare, you might as well go stop those people spreading the ancient inscriptions for their own personal gain.”

Wu Lingxiao was disinclined to devote her strength to the Law Breaker's inscriptions. She stood by watching with her hands in her sleeves. Coldly, she spat out a sentence in the Northern Li language: “If we can't resolve this, then let's first finish off the people who have shown themselves to be incompetent.”

Xuanwu's icy gaze shot toward her.

Wu Lingxiao hadn't spared him an extra glance with her pitch-dark eye sockets to begin with. Her gaze, like a flame from the netherworld, only stabbed at Kunlun's Sect Leader. “So the inscriptions on those trees are the reason that my shifu had to die? Ha—the orthodoxy of the immortal mountains, with secrets unfit for the light of day, and if you see them you'll be silenced... What, is there a scandal at the roots of the immortal mountains? In his whole life, my shizun, regardless of merit and demerit or right and wrong, toward Kunlun, toward Great Li, was nothing but sincerely loyal from the bottom of his heart. Even I know that. And you don't believe it?"

The Third Elder dryly attempted to smooth over the situation: "Lingxiao, this isn't the time to speak of..."

But Kunlun's Sect Leader was slightly shaken. For a moment, a thought flashed through his mind: "If Lanze knew that she had said such a thing..."

The heart demon seed, which had calmed temporarily due to the disappearance of the Ceaseless Mirror, once again seized on his flicker of weakness. In the facets of the heart demon that had taken root in his spirit, the meaning behind his own words was reflected.

When he thought of the Second Elder, he only felt infinitely forlorn. No matter what, he couldn't remember how he could have brought himself to kill him.

The heart demon and the despairing will of the spiritual mountains pulled at him from both sides. There was thunder inside the Kunlun Sect Leader's head. And Wu Lingxiao still wouldn't let him off.

She pushed forward aggressively. She didn't care what happened to the spiritual mountains—the deceitful heavens were fucking welcome to fall if they liked. Everything in creation had its end; why should the spiritual mountains be able to remain eternal?

“Actually, you believe it, too, you're just playing dumb. Tell the truth, shibo. They were saying back then that if Wanshuang were ever to take a master, only the Second Elder with his surpassing talents would be worthy of it. I think that's why you hated him, out of jealousy. You were clearly just waiting for an opportunity to get rid of him, but you still insist on giving yourself some high-sounding excuse.”

The Third Elder heard something wrong in the sound of her voice and immediately came forward and drew his sword. He prepared to block Wanshuang, swinging at the Sect Leader. “Wu Lingxiao!”

Lingyun's Sect Leader couldn't resist putting in a word: “Everyone, everyone—”

No one heeded him.

Since Ancestor Tianbo had departed, with the Xiuyi supercilious and the Miah ignorant, Lingyun hadn't been able to hold its head up on the southern continent at all. For over a thousand years, not one person of stupendous talents had come out of the Lingyun Spiritual Mountains at the edge of the South Sea, whether orthodox or evil. Foreign cultivators all privately referred to them with contempt as “farmers.” When their spiritual mountains had been damaged as the result of internal strife, they had really become the laughingstock of the other sects.

With discontented spiritual mountains stirring up an already unsteady mind, Lingyun’s Sect Leader was at the end of his endurance. On impulse, he pulled out his beast-taming flute and blew a blast on it. The sharp flute music of a master of the way of beast-taming could make a whole spiritual beast farm’s worth of spiritual beasts bend their heads. The consciousnesses of all the shed skins present were violently shaken by that blast.

But Lingyun’s Sect Leader had forgotten that there were also two innocent ascended spirits present. He knew that his cultivation gave him absolutely no advantage among those of the same grade as him, and he had wanted to make everyone listen to him, so he hadn’t held anything back in playing that note.

Whatever else he was, he was still a shed skin. The fan beneath Wen Fei’s feet instantly cracked, and blood trickled from his ears. Lin Chi’s mind was entirely inside the Unbound Furnace. When he was disturbed by the unexpected note of the beast-taming flute, the Unbound Furnace slipped right out of his hands.

Good-tempered as Zhi Xiu was, he still bristled. This crowd of fools only knows how to make things worse, he thought. Zhaoting showed no more mercy, shaking a crack into Xuanwu's round blade. He forced Xuanwu to retreat with a single blow, swept Lingyun's Sect Leader away with the backwash of the sword wind, and caught Lin Chi.

But he only had time to catch him; he couldn't reach the Unbound Furnace.

When Lingyun's Sect Leader was swept away, he just happened to block Wu Lingxiao's path. That overbearing Sword Slave, mad enough to scour heaven and earth, pushed him aside with her sword, and he happened to collide with the Unbound Furnace.

As one would have expected, the item left behind by the ancient demonic god of the eternal spring brocade was no ordinary object. It withstood the collision, but the body of the furnace fell over. The fire inside the furnace, which there hadn't been time to put out, drew in the spiritual energy around it and rolled up right behind Kunlun's Sect Leader.

With Wanshuang crashing down upon his head, the Sect Leader, being torn apart by his heart demon, hastily raised his sword to parry but was a little too slow. In a panic, the Third Elder quickly pushed the Unbound Furnace toward him. The enormous body of the furnace enveloped the Sect Leader and blocked Wanshuang's blow.

Xi Ping had just gotten halfway through talking with Lin Chi when he heard that the spiritual energy prohibition line had once again taken off. Before he could ask Zhao Qindan what the precise situation was, Lin Chi's consciousness suddenly vanished from the furnace fire, and Kunlun's Sect Leader fell in.

Xi Ping: "..."

What were the ancestors outside up to?!

A sword cultivator lacked the toolmaking way's "seventh sense," so one's consciousness naturally couldn't connect to the materials inside a toolmaking furnace, unless he did what the Sanyue Mountains' presumptuous Xiang Rong had done—made himself the "material" in the furnace.

Kunlun's Sect Leader instantly saw himself in the furnace fire...saw his wound-riddled Way of the Heart huddled on his spirit, and on that spirit, the heart demon growing rampant.

Strangely, he actually felt relieved.

He thought that, having with his own hands killed his fellow sect member and shidi, who had asked him to watch his back, it was only right and fitting that he should be pinioned by a heart demon. Had he been able to assign himself a punishment, perhaps he would have chosen something more severe.

In that moment, this shed skin ancestor could have easily escaped the Unbound Furnace, but he couldn't resist taking a step inward. He couldn't say why; perhaps he wanted to have a look at his heart demon...to see the Second Elder again, who had died unjustly outside the Beijue Mountains.

“Sect Leader shixiong!” The Third Elder's voice came from outside the Unbound Furnace.

“Everyone stop!” That must be that sword cultivator junior from the Xuanyin Mountains.

“Get the hell out here and give my shifu justice—”

That was Wu Lingxiao.

Kunlun's Sect Leader turned a deaf ear to it all. He drew near as though entranced. Then he saw that the heart demon on his spirit, beside his Way of the Heart, wasn't Zhu Lanze.

Just as the Southern Sage had seen in the den of the demon host that he had become the puppet of the spiritual mountains, Kunlun's Sect Leader saw in the Unbound Furnace the Second Elder's true murderer.

"It wasn't me..." This thought came out of nowhere. With a crack, the most ancient Way of the Heart in existence broke.

In that moment, a portion of the Kunlun Sect Leader's mind suddenly cleared. He remembered his own name, which no one had called him for a thousand years.

His surname was also Wu, personal name Guang, courtesy name Boren.

This name had become a yellowing page in a history book, as if the person who had been known by that name were already dead. Like his shizun the Sword Ancestor, like the Southern Sage and the others, he had long ago become an empty title.

With the Way of the Heart that had fettered and blinded him for a thousand years breaking, he glanced out of the Unbound Furnace, then found that he had no one worth warning, no last words to leave behind. It had been a long time since he had had anything to say to this world.

In that moment, fortune smiled upon Wu Boren's resourcefulness. He did the same thing Xiang Rong had once done inside the Unbound Furnace. In the furnace flame, he quickly formed the Law Breaker inscriptions he had obtained from Lin Chi, and fused his Way of the Heart with the furnace flame—

Xiang Rong had used the Unbound Furnace to remake his Way of the Heart into a copy of the Black Emperor's, and after successfully reaching a full moon position, he had disappeared into the Sanyue Mountains. As the Black Emperor's direct disciple, Xiang Rong's Way of the Heart had followed in a continuous line from the Black Emperor's. It had only needed to be partially altered. Therefore, when he had left the Unbound Furnace, he had still been able to hop around for a while. But the Kunlun Sect Leader's original Way of the Heart was incompatible with the Law Breaker. When he fused the two together, he was immediately destroyed.

But the nearly extinguished furnace flame in Xi Ping's hands instantly grew to more than the height of a person, and the Law Breaker's spiritual energy prohibition line was restored in the blink of an eye to the original boundaries of Tao County and even continued to expand past them, enveloping even the shed skins on the Xia River, who didn't have time to get out of the way.

Apart from Wen Fei, who had just fallen, and Zhi Xiu, who had landed so he could catch Lin Chi, the others tumbled down out of the sky like kites with their strings snapped.

CHAPTER 239 - Conclusion (7)

When the feeling of heaviness he hadn't known for over two centuries came over him, Zhi Xiu, as one of the few present who was still lucid, gestured at Wen Fei, then picked up Lin Chi, who had been shaken into a daze by the flute.

The three of them raced toward the bank of the Xia River, the same weird doubt arising simultaneously in their minds—did it really take so much effort to move human legs?

Just as they reached the shore, they heard an ominous crack from behind. Zhi Xiu turned and tossed the “frail scholar” Master Lin onto the shore and reached back to grab Wen Fei.

The Xia River had been forced to freeze by spiritual energy. As soon as the spiritual energy dissipated, the ice rapidly broke apart. Wen Fei had one foot on a big ice floe. Tugging on Zhi Xiu's hand to give himself momentum, he executed a breathtaking “flight” onto the muddy bank.

His ascended spirit's spiritual energy was gone, but the weight of his spiritual bones remained. Though Zhi Xiu was a trained warrior, he still involuntarily let out a gasp. His shoulder was dislocated, as if he had just smashed through a boulder.

The river thawed, and the bewildered shed skins were collectively dunked in for a “winter swim.”

“N-never fear, th-the doctor’s here!” Having said this, without waiting for the “patient” to consent, Wen Fei unilaterally rolled up his sleeves and pressed down on Zhi Xiu’s shoulder, pushing the dislocated joint back into place. His stuttering didn’t get in the way of him blowing his own horn. “Hey, my skills, they’re...they’re really smooth. It’s—it’s been years since I used them.”

As a sword cultivator, bumps and bruises were a common occurrence for Zhi Xiu. He didn’t think anything of minor injuries. But his “good neighbor” nearly knocked him over with his bear’s paw. He bit back a cry of pain: how many heads of cattle had Wen Fenghan killed with his doctoring before he was forced into changing his career?!

“J-jingzhai, l-l-l-look there!”

Icy wind came at them off the river. The spiritual energy prohibition line had already crossed the Xia River, making straight for Great Wan’s Yuzhou. Trapped in the ponderous mortal world, his senses and consciousness limited, Zhi Xiu didn’t see at once where the spiritual energy prohibition line had reached. He only felt the surroundings become so silent they seemed to lack civilization.

Only the Unbound Furnace was floating steadily in midair. The overturned body of the furnace had at some point righted itself. It was as if it were offering up a furnace of incense for the universe.

For a time, the only sounds to be heard on both sides of the Xia River were the water flowing and the ice crackling. No one had realized yet what had happened.

After a long while, the Unbound Furnace at last slowly descended. The Third Elder, who had climbed up the bank with difficulty, stumbled forward. He took one look into the furnace and fell to his knees.

The furnace fire was crystal clear. Kunlun's Sect Leader and the most ancient Way of the Heart in the world had disappeared together, as if they had never been.

The Luwu had gone deathly still for a moment when the sudden change occurred. Then information passed through the flying goose machines, converging on Tao County from all directions—

“The spiritual energy prohibition line has passed Yu Family Bend!”

“The spiritual energy prohibition line has covered all of Chu’s Lingdong County...”

“Talismans and arrays have stopped working in Great Wan’s Yuzhou...”

“The spiritual energy prohibition line has stopped at Qingling in Guzhou. It’s reached the South Sea.”

“The spiritual energy prohibition suddenly expanded six hundred li. What happened?” Zhao Qindan asked.

Xi Ping was the sole eyewitness in the world to what had happened in the Unbound Furnace. Now, everyone wanted to ask him: What happened?

The Tai Sui Qin was absolutely still. Xi Ping was silent, facing the flickering flame of the Unbound Furnace in a daze inside the Law Breaker.

In fact, during the chaotic battle over the Lancang Mountains, he had already dimly guessed where the Kunlun Sect Leader’s heart demon pointed. It had been no surprise to see that most ancient shed skin Way of the Heart go to pieces—since Zhou Ying had used himself as bait and planted a heart demon in the foremost master in the world, Xi Ping had known that that old Sect Leader's fate would most likely be the same as Zhao Yin's.

But...it seemed that it also hadn't been all that similar.

Zhao Yin had remained muddled to the last. Killed by the heart demon and his own obsession, he had brought destruction upon others in his death throes, making Xi Ping's shifu use up the sword attack he had spent five years saving up to wipe his ass for him.

But Kunlun's Sect Leader Wu had been lucid—perhaps he had never been so lucid since establishing a foundation and entering the cultivation world.

In the end, he had seen through the heart demon, let the heart demon and his Way of the Heart perish together, finding himself an appropriate ending.

When the spiritual energy prohibition line had been almost in front of him, Xi Ping had interrogated Lin Chi a hundred eighty times: what was there that could replenish the Law Breaker?

In fact, there had been no need to force Lin Chi to come up with an answer. He ought to have known the answer long ago.

He had seen with his own eyes how Xiang Rong had dissolved into the Sanyue Mountains, becoming a “complete restorative pill” for the spiritual mountains. And the Law Breaker...had been made on the model of the spiritual mountains.

When the Lancang Spiritual Mountains had been faced with destruction, they had chosen to sever their own veins of the earth, preferring to become the southern mines if it meant their own preservation. Now, all the great spiritual mountains were tottering on the verge of collapse. They were desperate enough to risk anything. What orders would they give those shed skins who were nominally “sages” but were in reality puppets on strings? If Kunlun’s Sect Leader hadn’t fallen into the Unbound Furnace, it would have been someone else.

Each range of spiritual mountains had shed skins. Though the hidden bones had obtained the ancient inscriptions, ultimately, they hadn’t passed the shed skin boundary. Facing the spiritual mountains, the hidden bones might be said to be evenly matched—the reasoning here was very simple; it was the same as Xi Ping on the Southern He Peninsula using the Lancang Mountains to play a little trick on the Sword Slave.

With his smattering of cultivation, Zhou Ying might not have been able to draw a talisman as skillfully as a disciple who had yet to graduate from the Latent Cultivation Temple. The only two trump cards he possessed—the heart demon seed and the power to turn into mist—he had left to Xi Ping before disappearing in the Ceaseless Mirror. Apart from this, the things he could do himself were very limited. Lately, it had practically all been him tossing out requests for Xi Ping to carry out.

While he was testing the boundaries of the human world, practically all his conjectures had passed through Xi Ping's hands to be verified. In the situation he had left behind, all the useful means and resources ought to have been more familiar to Xi Ping than to Zhou Ying himself.

But it was only...”ought to have.”

In front of the flame of the Unbound Furnace, taller than a person, Xi Ping didn't breathe a sigh of relief. His heart slowly sank.

Xi Ping in fact had no Way of the Heart to break, but neither was he a way of clarity cultivator, without feeling or desire.

Up to now, he had faced the truth concerning Ways of the Heart alone and had thought he had known what there was to know, but actually he had all along been unwilling to face it: his teachers and friends, apart from A-Xiang and the young mistress and the other juniors, practically all had Ways of the Heart.

A “bad Way of the Heart” shattered at a glimpse of the abyss; did that mean that a “good Way of the Heart” could be concerned only with itself?

Moreover, separating Ways of the Heart into good and bad had been only his way of lying to himself.

He had pushed Lin Chi out of the Unbound Furnace at the bottom of the Sea of Stars and in speech deliberately differentiated his hidden bones from a Way of the Heart, as if a person being at odds with their Way of the Heart was an exception limited to him alone—

He had pretended that he had only to keep the world at peace, plan well enough to deal fairly with both orthodox and evil, both immortal and mortal, and the people he cared about would all be safe and sound; pretended that as long as Xi Yue didn’t accept his “ungovernable way,” which forced you into lucidity, he would be able to continue on forever like the true “immortal” he yearned to be, grow up to be a sage who wasn’t a sham.

As long as the flowers of Jinping didn’t wither and the fire in the little cottage on Flying Jade Peak still roasted pine nuts and chestnuts, he was willing to dress up in colorful clothes for the amusement of his family, let his mother and her maids paint him with nail polish that couldn’t be washed off for three days, willing to plant flowers and weed the soil and get covered in mud, finish sweeping the snow before repairing the roof; he was willing to walk over mountains of swords and seas of fire, be crushed to dust...even though by nature he was a rich kid who shirked hard work and stuck to easy work, with unremarkable abilities.

Kunlun's Sect Leader had sacrificed himself to the furnace, and the spiritual energy prohibition line had expanded six hundred li. The hidden bones wouldn't leave it at that. The spiritual mountains wouldn't sit back and wait for death. This was only the beginning.

Those who had a Way of the Heart would not come to a good end, no matter how limpid, how aloof that Way of the Heart might be.

It had never been he alone who had taken the wrong path.

"Xi...Tai Sui?" Not hearing a response from him for a long time, Zhao Qindan had sensed something ominous from Xi Ping's unusual silence.

A few notes flew from the Tai Sui Qin inside the tree: Send cars.

Zhao Qindan raised her eyebrows. She thought she had heard wrong.

The shed skins of the various sects are beside the Xia River. Immediately clear a path and find them. Send cars, the fastest steamships, the Cloud...no, the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon won't work, the rails wouldn't have stood up to the strain, they must all have snapped, Xi Ping quickly said. Send them out of the spiritual energy prohibition line, the faster the better. The hidden bones have temporarily been swept away by the spiritual energy prohibition line and lost six hundred li of reincarnation wood trees. They're certain to take this opportunity to attack those spiritual mountains. Hurry!

Making them go put down rebellions, face reincarnation wood trees directly and chop them down, would be better than having the spiritual mountains, cutting off their tails in their bid for survival, treat them as those “tails.”

His shifu, Lin Chi, and Wen Fei were all there. Almost in a panic, Xi Ping thought, Don't look into the Unbound Furnace, don't look into the Unbound Furnace—

But upgraded immortal tools were new and had primarily been supplied to Southern Wan's defenders without established foundations to use against foreign enemies. The large quantity of hastily made tools had all been artillery or shields. The number of upgraded cars and ships was very limited. Tao County, a foreign locale where deliveries of spiritual stones were inconvenient, hadn't been equipped.

Everything outside the spiritual energy prohibition line had been taken over by reincarnation wood. The troops and the Luwu had been in constant retreat. There was no one left in the area of the Xia River. For masters who could fly through the sky and burrow into the earth, Xi Ping was in arm's reach from the bank of the Xia River. Now that spiritual energy had been prohibited, it would take much longer for cars and horses to get there—especially since motor cars needed good roads, and the roads had all been smashed by Xuanwu when he had lost his temper earlier.

But the hidden bones were unwilling to wait for them. While the masters were trapped inside the spiritual energy prohibition, just as Xi Ping had expected, they abandoned vast tracts of reincarnation wood forest, allowed the reincarnation wood trees that had seized territory everywhere to wither, and concentrated their attack on the spiritual mountains.

The first to be swallowed by the reincarnation wood and the ancient inscriptions were the Lingyun Mountains, of which only half remained.

During the Dragon Boat Festival, Xi Ping had snuck into the Lingyun Mountains, just in time for the sudden change in the evil cultivators' meeting. For ease of movement, he had left behind some reincarnation wood seeds at the feet of the Lingyun Mountains in the spiritual beast farm and the spiritual fields. He hadn't expected that after this Southern Shu would sink into slaughter and civil strife, everyone would be on edge, and to this day no one would have cleaned up the reincarnation wood seeds.

Lingyun's Sect Leader was already mediocre enough, and the shed skin elder he had left to watch the house, having lost the great mountain array, certainly couldn't hold the line. Though Wangge Luobao had sent orders, he was taking a long time to show himself. The Miah cultivators, with no one to restrain them, had gone out of control after discovering the "wondrous effects" of the ancient inscriptions. The Xiuyi caught up soon after, unwilling to take this lying down. At the feet of the Lingyun Mountains, the Ways of the Heart of common origin struggled with all their might to send "heavenly edicts" to the orthodox cultivators. These voices that struck straight at a cultivator's spiritual sense had previously succeeded in every endeavor, but now they were being covered up by the multiplying ancient inscriptions.

The ancient inscriptions manipulated the cultivators into killing each other and ruthlessly plundered the spiritual energy of the Lingyun Mountains. The reincarnation wood's growth hastened. In the blink of an eye, it had covered the whole Lingyun Mountain Range.

Southern Shu's spiritual veins were completely severed by the reincarnation wood. Li Manlong and the others watched as the battle, which had stabilized earlier, took an alarming steep decline. A certain...certain deathliness exceedingly familiar to the Turmoilers spread through Southern Shu's peninsula and the Three Islands. Everywhere came the moans of spiritual beasts who seemed to be dying.

The Sanyue Mountains were hardly doing any better. When Yu Chang returned to his senses after his momentary impulse, he had already involuntarily used the ancient inscriptions to drain the essences of a dozen people. He couldn't remember at first how he had charged up. He only felt that his essence was unprecedentedly abundant, and he was as worked up as though he were running a fever.

This was wrong...

Yu Chang, who had spent centuries struggling against the spiritual image brand that ran counter to his convictions, wasn't pleased; he was alarmed. Out of nowhere, he recalled the Queen Mother of the West's condition. He looked all around and saw on the faces of both friend and enemy cultivators alike an inexpressible frenzy, each person forgetting themselves as they duplicated the ancient inscriptions. The originally invisible ancient inscriptions were gradually emerging on the ground and climbing all over the mountains.

A rumble. Half of the colossal statue of the Black Emperor slid down.

And Northern Li's Kunlun had been born through the ancient inscriptions to begin with. The ancient inscriptions brought by the hidden bones were irresistible here and easily covered the Kunlun Spiritual Mountains, nearly frozen by the cold wind from the Beiyuan Plains.

The Blind Wolf King's former subordinates at the Beijue Mountain Pass, including the Snow Wolf dreaming his eternal dreams of being the "master of Posuo Palace," had turned into ice sculptures the instant that the ancient inscriptions had entered the human world. Now that fatal wintry wind was already pressing upon the regions inhabited by mortals. People had just finished packing their bags to flee the disaster. Some didn't even make it out the gate before they were frozen in their tracks.

And with Zhi Xiu trapped in the spiritual energy prohibition, the reincarnation wood in the Territory Map immediately lost anyone to suppress it.

The karma beast gave a sudden wail. Pang Jian abruptly turned his head and saw his old companion struggle fiercely a few times as if trapped by something, and the avatar that had accompanied them disappeared. Pang Jian had no time to pass into the wall to go in search of it before a Heavenly Question crashed into his arms. At the same time, he felt the earth quake.

Xi Yue, left by his elders on Flying Jade Peak, suddenly opened his eyes from meditation. The thirty-six peaks shuddered, the Grand Canal burst its banks, and monstrous vines reached out from underground and tore at Jinping's dragon vein.

Flying goose signals from all over broke off. The machines constantly clicking around Zhao Qindan went deathly silent—

The shed skins trapped inside the spiritual energy prohibition were now like mortals, working blind.

Xuanwu sat on an abandoned damaged boat in the Xia River. His eyes seemed to have been frozen by the icy waters of the river. The snow white irises were blank. He glanced at the Unbound Furnace and in a peculiar tone slowly said, “So—the evil object left behind by the evil cultivator Hui Xiangjun has pointed the way for us: to sacrifice people to her furnace?”

Lin Chi blurted out, “She wasn't an evil cultivator.”

But Xuanwu seemed not to hear. He had absolutely no reaction to this junior who dared to talk back.

In some agitation, Lingyun's Sect Leader asked, “So what now? Sect Leader Wu has sacrificed himself to the furnace. That means the tribulation is over, right?”

Everyone ignored him.

As a sword-bearing half-puppet, Wu Lingxiao's human body was incomplete. She was practically paralyzed now. It was Zhi Xiu who, on account of Wanshuang, found a damaged boat and, pooling his efforts with Wen Fei, fished her out with a fishing net.

It was even harder for her to speak. She stared at the Unbound Furnace in bewilderment. "What did he see in the furnace? Why would he want to smelt himself?"

Had he gone crazy?

His crime had been exposed, and it couldn't be denied?

Just then, she heard the Third Elder say in an almost solemn voice, "We inherited the way of the sage who came before us. It is natural and appropriate for us to meet death for the sake of the world. What is strange about it?"

Wu Lingxiao sneered. "Ha!"

But she soon found that apart from her, no one laughed—not even Xuanwu with his customary moodiness.

Within the spiritual energy prohibition line, individual cultivators who were careless about training their bodies might not even have been able to win a fight against a dog. It was a place where all ghosts and gods tumbled into the mundane dust, and the shed skin masters now were in fact all like chickens who had ended up in the soup. Their hair and beards were in disarray. They were either dripping on the shore or half immersed in the water, bumped and slammed this way and that by ice floes. They might have been said to be entirely without decorum.

But Wu Lingxiao thought that apart from the three from the Xuanyin Mountains, who were as confused as her, all the shed skins present had a certain freakish inhumanity about them.

The Third Elder stood respectfully beside the Unbound Furnace. Even his breathing was almost imperceptibly soft. Xuanwu with his white hair and skin was like a marble statue in the main hall on Sanyue's Principal Peak.

Strangest of all was Lingyun's Sect Leader.

Only half of the Lingyun Mountains remained, and Lingyun's Sect Leader also seemed to have been split in two. Wu Lingxiao found to her horror that his eyes were turning in different directions: one eye was wandering incessantly, showing unspeakable panic, as if he were appealing to someone for help; but the other eye was staring fixedly at the Unbound Furnace.

Lingyun's Sect Leader was muttering: "Moments ago I heard the spiritual beasts within my nation's boundaries had escaped, causing chaos. I ought to go back and take charge..."

But his feet, with unwavering resolution, were taking him with heavy steps toward the Unbound Furnace. The unctuous and flabby Third Elder straightened his hair and clothes and executed a bow northward. Xuanwu seemed to have heard something. He suddenly closed his eyes and sighed. He dove into the water and mechanically swam for the shore... His strokes were more regular than the movement of a pendulum.

Wu Lingxiao had long ago lost all sensation of temperature, but suddenly she shuddered from cold.

Lin Chi, beside the Unbound Furnace, automatically leaned back and nearly fell into the water. He was pulled back by Wen Fei.

Wen Fei ducked straight behind Zhi Xiu, as if a sword cultivator could repel evil. Zhi Xiu was knocked a step forward by him and took the opportunity to raise Zhaoting and bar the Lingyun Sect Leader's way. "The spiritual energy prohibition line has been stabilized. My disciple knows our location, he'll be sending people here at once. We can all discuss what happens next. Senior, don't..."

The Lingyun Sect Leader's neck was stuck straight up. The only eye he could turn spun toward Zhi Xiu. Zhi Xiu's voice stopped.

The Lingyun Sect Leader spat out words in the Shu language one at a time, as if speaking a foreign language: "There's no time, the spiritual mountains..."

The words that followed were vague and indecipherable. With Zhi Xiu's not especially firm grasp of the Shu language, he read the soundless movements of the Lingyun Sect Leader's lips. He seemed to be saying "help." Before he could even break out in gooseflesh, the Lingyun Sect Leader, who could have been knocked flat on his ass by Zhaoting in the presence of spiritual energy, somewhere found monstrous strength. He knocked Zhaoting aside and jumped into the Unbound Furnace like a ghost.

Kunlun's Third Elder, coming after him, mumbled, "We inherited the way of the sage who came before us. It is natural and appropriate for us to meet death for the sake of the world...to meet death for the sake of the world..."

But just then, a scream that scraped up your spine suddenly came from the Unbound Furnace. It seemed lucid to the extreme and despairing to the extreme—

The puppet had learned that he was a puppet and watched his Way of the Heart break, offered up on the altar.

The waters of the Xia River gurgled. The Third Elder's quiet muttering was interrupted for a moment by the scream. He seemed to feel something. Breathy noises came from his throat. He wanted to stop, but he couldn't close his mouth. A warped expression appeared on his face, like crying and like laughter.

“Inherited the way of the sage...”

Gurgle—

“Meet death for the sake of the world...”

Gurgle—

CHAPTER 240 - Conclusion (8)

This time Zhi Xiu was ready. He grabbed the Third Elder.

Given Zhi Xiu's age and generational ranking, he hadn't had any prior opportunity to interact with these ancient Kunlun sword cultivators, and since he had become a shed skin, Kunlun had been an enemy to him. He had no admiration, either, for the strict government decrees and protocols, the isolationism and poverty on the northern continent under Kunlun's rule. His older brother's death was even inextricably tied to this Third Elder. If the Third Elder had been killed by Wanshuang or some other person, Zhi Xiu would have had no objection; if the Third Elder had come at him with his sword raised, he also wouldn't have been unwilling to personally help the senior on his way.

But he couldn't stand by and watch him turn into furnace ash in this hopelessly muddled way.

That a shed skin sword cultivator of the Kunlun Mountains, the northernmost end of the northern continent, with wintry skies and frozen earth, who had wielded a sword hundreds of millions of times amid the snow, should in the end come to such a sorry fate.

Too pitiful...and too tragic.

The sword cultivator of the north was beefy. Zhi Xiu barely managed to hold on. Beside him, Wen Fei mimed a joint being displaced.

Zhi Xiu understood. With a “pardon me,” he clamped the arm whose shoulder he had dislocated around the Third Elder’s shoulders, meanwhile sweeping out with one foot—

But while the veins on his hand were already raised, he loosened his grip before he could exert strength. Zhi Xiu seemed to have sensed something. He allowed the Third Elder to struggle free of his arms and throw himself into the Unbound Furnace like a moth throwing itself at a flame.

Since spiritual energy had been prohibited, Lin Chi, the only toolmaking cultivator here, could no longer send his consciousness into the furnace. Xi Ping was left alone inside the furnace flame. Now, he could see others, but they couldn’t see him.

The scream of Lingyun’s Sect Leader had yet to fade from his ears. That shed skin master of the beast-taming way had died like a waking dragon under Wangge Luobao’s control. Xi Ping nearly missed a breath. Then Kunlun’s Third Elder also charged into the Unbound Furnace.

There was indescribable despair on the Third Elder’s face.

A shed skin sword cultivator was the world's apex of fighting prowess. Whether orthodox or evil, no one dared to say one's name directly or look him in the eye...but now he was blubbering.

Xi Ping instantly averted his gaze. It was as if fine pincers had pinched his heart. This past decade and more, he had become accustomed to separation in life and parting by death. He could accept his grandmother's sudden passing, quiet and serene, surrounded by her family, and even yearned a little to be able to protect his country eternally like Princess Duanrui. But he couldn't accept a death so wretched and utterly without dignity. Just imagining this repulsive fate falling on anyone he cared about was enough to drive him mad.

Tao County's troops simply used artillery fire to blow away the crooked and slanting reincarnation wood trees. Trucks cleared the way, and the first batch of swift horses raced toward the shore of the Xia River. The Luwu everywhere swiftly swapped out their equipment, once again getting in contact with flying goose machines. The spiritual energy prohibition line, which had come to a standstill, was racing outward once more.

Enough...enough...

Xi Ping wanted to put out the Unbound Furnace, but while he counted as the master of the furnace flame, the “materials” burning in that furnace far surpassed his cultivation level, and he wasn’t inside the Unbound Furnace himself. There was nothing he could do with the furnace flame.

But the spiritual mountains evidently didn’t think it was enough.

Beside the Xia River, Wen Fei and Lin Chi looked at Zhi Xiu, who had suddenly loosened his grip, with doubt all over their faces.

Zhi Xiu was silent. Just then, someone put in a word: “Even if he hadn’t let go, that old fool’s Way of the Heart would still have shattered. Never mind letting it go to waste, the exploding essence could have leveled both banks of the Xia River.”

It was Xuanwu who had spoken.

Xuanwu had swum here through the icy waters of the Xia River. He was even paler than usual. His dripping wet silvery hair hung loose down his back, as if he were coated with a layer of moonlight, or as if frost had formed on him.

He looked like a living Silver Moon.

“Some people think very highly of themselves once they cross the shed skin boundary and no longer cultivate, such that when it comes to the end, they are still torn apart by selfish desires and make a humiliating spectacle of themselves.”

Zhi Xiu quickly said, “Elder Xuanwu, there is something that perplexes me that I would ask for your instruction on: when you did not stint to bring the Silver Moon down into the mortal world for the sake of pulling the Late-Autumn Red up by the roots and nearly turned Tao County into a no-man’s land, I do not see that you had the least drop of pity for the mortals. But now you are prepared to die for the cause of the so-called ‘people of the world,’ blend your thousand years of cultivation with the Unbound Furnace—the relic of a person you scoff at as an ‘evil cultivator.’ Is there no conflict between your past and current actions?”

Wake up!

Xuanwu turned upon him irises that were the same color as the whites of his eyes, finally giving Zhi Xiu a glance.

Zhi Xiu abruptly shut his mouth—Xuanwu’s eyes were full of haughty pity.

“So as General Zhi sees it, before I was ‘damaging the country and causing suffering to the people,’ and now I am ‘sacrificing myself for the public good,’ and you suspect that I have gone crazy?’”

“I would not dare...” Zhi Xiu began.

“Ha! No wonder you were unable to enter the mainstream, no matter how good a sword cultivator you might be.” In a voice so solemn as to be peculiar, Xuanwu said, “*Heaven and earth are impartial. They treat all things as straw dogs.*¹⁰⁶ As long as the Great Way is clear, all living things will naturally each have their places, and blessings and disasters will naturally belong to their fates. I have never diverged in the slightest from the Great Way, yet you wish to pass presumptuous judgment on me from a commonplace perspective. You think you are bemoaning the state of the universe and pitying the fate of mankind. How is it any different from killing the tigers and wolves to protect the mice and rabbits, destroying a dam to keep an anthill intact? A nobody looking at the sky from the bottom of a well, reckoning based on enough achievements and experience to fill the bottom of a bottle, still dares to speak of ‘orthodox and evil, public and private.’ Zhi Xiu, who do you think you are?”

Zhi Xiu had no answer to give. This argument was excessively coherent. He couldn’t immediately judge whether Xuanwu was being controlled by the Sanyue Mountains or whether his own boundary was insufficiently high and he was incapable of understanding.

Xuanwu surveyed the three from Xuanyin and Wu Lingxiao. He thought that these people had either mistakenly wound up on wrong roads and failed to live up to their potential, or else their cultivation was meager and their ignorance had yet to be dispelled. They were so stupid that there was no saving them, and anyway it would have been wasting words. So he gave a cold laugh, flicked his sleeves without thought of turning back as he went to his duty, and stepped into the Unbound Furnace.

The furnace flames throwing themselves at his face turned the water clinging to him into vapor. Xuanwu's gaze as he stared at the furnace flame was almost greedy and impatient.

Xiang Rong had also once made a futile attempt to use the Unbound Furnace to become a full moon sage and accord with the Way, but he had only bent his Way of the Heart, forcing it into a shape it did not belong in. Xuanwu had sensed that though afterward the soul of that brother of his had gone into the immortal mountains, the Sanyue Immortal Mountains had not accepted him, or else the Silver Moon would not have taken Xuanwu back—the ridiculous imbecile, losing his head because he was caught at a bottleneck. In cultivation, one always had to reject self at pass after pass, cut away occluding thoughts. How could one take a shortcut like this? It was like a joke.

He was different. Now that the ancient inscriptions had come into the world and the world was in chaos, he could sense that this was the true moment to “accord with the Way.”

The moment that the furnace flame enveloped his Way of the Heart, a feeling of freedom that made him wild with joy surged up in Xuanwu’s heart. He felt his heartbeat unite with the Sanyue Mountains far in Dongheng. From now on, he was the spiritual mountains, and the spiritual mountains were him. The spiritual veins spread all around were his body. The mountains and rivers, the sun and moon were all a thought away for him.

Xi Ping watched in terror as Xuanwu was cloaked in flames, his snow white skin and hair put to the torch, his Way of the Heart melting like a wax candle. A thousand years of accumulated essence was drained in an unending stream by the Unbound Furnace. But the “burnt corpse” felt absolutely no sensation. Deranged, he let out inhuman laughter: “Perfect...I have become perfect...I am the only orthodoxy of the Sanyue Spiritual Mountains...”

Evil spawn of an unchaste woman...

His Highness is merciful, taking into account a slight blood relationship... If you want my opinion, in the end, he is a demon’s child.

How could a person like this open his spiritual eyes? And His Highness has even brought him to study under the sage...

He is only a retainer of record, he won't go far.

Suddenly, a certain peculiar feeling flitted past. There was no need for the Luwu outside to send flying goose messages, Xi Ping already knew—the widening spiritual energy prohibition line had reached Dongheng!

When the first set of spiritual mountains entered the spiritual energy prohibition, the spiritual energy floating over the mountains like the tide instantly froze. The ancient inscriptions that had occupied the spiritual mountains all lost effect. The cultivators darting through the sky, like locusts that had flown into a cloud of pesticide, pitter-pattered as they dropped.

The hidden bones took heavy losses, instantly losing thirty to forty percent of their reincarnation wood trees. At the same time, Xi Ping recovered control over the reincarnation wood inside the spiritual energy prohibition line.

Xuanwu's laughter came to an abrupt halt. Xi Ping quickly turned his head and seemed to hear him indistinctly call out "Mother"... It also may have been something else, but there was no way to seek verification now.

He vanished with the smoke and flame, “according with the Way.”

The Unbound Furnace had already swallowed three great shed skins. Zhi Xiu seemed not to have recovered from Xuanwu’s words. He kept staring at the Unbound Furnace, not averting his gaze for a long time. Wen Fei and Lin Chi’s reactions were extraordinarily uniform. They took a step forward simultaneously and put themselves between Zhi Xiu and that fatal furnace.

Xi Ping split off a portion of his consciousness to jump to the shore of the Xia River. A reincarnation wood tree that had been lying along the road scrambled to sprout twigs and catch firm hold of Zhi Xiu’s boots. The first group of Luwu to arrive reined in their horses and raised the loudspeakers they had brought along. A single cry could have scared away all the wandering ghosts in the surrounding towns and villages: “General—Zhi!”

Zhi Xiu: “...”

He came back to his senses and didn’t know whether to laugh or cry. “I have no intention of throwing myself into the oven, the Xuanyin Mountains have no influence over me, I was just... Shiyong, you’re going to pull off my boots! Let go...”

Just then, Wu Lingxiao suddenly interjected: “The Xuanyin Mountains have no influence over me. So what you mean is that it was the spiritual mountains that forced them to die?”

She abruptly raised her head. “Shed skins accord with the Way and the spiritual mountains, become a part of the heavenly commandments—is that what you mean? So when Wu Guang killed my shifu, was he also...”

Zhi Xiu sighed softly.

“But...but why not me?” Wu Lingxiao’s unfocused gaze fell on Wanshuang. Her mind was in confusion. Her indistinct words were slightly incoherent: “Because I’m a sword-bearing half-puppet? But the sword-bearing half-puppet’s Way of the Heart was shared with the Sword Ancestor, even Wanshuang acknowledged me... Can it be that the spiritual mountains are not the sage...?”

“Fellow Cultivator Wu,” Zhi Xiu somewhat rudely interrupted her, “matters have already reached such a pass that thinking too far would be unprofitable. The hidden bones have yet to be expelled. Since the three seniors have won us some time, let us all find a place to discuss what to do next, all right? My country has a new material which it now appears can be used inside the spiritual energy prohibition. If you are willing, Lin-shixiong can swap out a portion of your bone jade. At least you will be able to move freely.”

Saying so, without waiting for Wu Lingxiao’s response, he turned to the Luwu and said, “Fellow Cultivator Wu finds it difficult to move here. Female disciples, come and help her up.”

Xi Ping’s heart tightened: that tone... He seemed to know something! Then his Way of the Heart...

“Shifu, listen to me...” In his panic, Xi Ping immediately wanted to pull Zhi Xiu’s consciousness into the Law Breaker’s space, but just then, something tugged fiercely at his consciousness, and the twigs holding Zhi Xiu’s calves instantly lost their support and drooped limply.

His true body!

After swallowing the Sanyue Mountains, the spiritual energy prohibition had spread over Xuanyin to the east, fixing Great Wan’s collapsing veins of the earth in place. The hidden bones had lost another portion of their spiritual energy source. Then the Lingyun Mountains and a portion of the South Sea were also encircled.

It was just at that moment that Xi Ping's true body, taken by Wangge Luobao, ended up inside the spiritual energy prohibition.

Xi Ping had been forced to part from his true body to begin with. Now, caught unawares, his vision became a blur, and his injured consciousness was pulled right over by his true body.

But before he could react, an invisible barrier was placed on Xi Ping's consciousness and gave him a solid knock. Xi Ping's consciousness was already tensed to the utmost. He nearly fainted.

Yao Qi and Chang Jun had naturally also ended up inside the spiritual energy prohibition. The tracking talisman suddenly lost effect.

The spiritual threads on the blood talisman indicated that Xi Ping's body was within a hundred zhang. Then the bright red blood suddenly congealed and turned rust-colored. It wouldn't react no matter how they poked it. The two half-immortals in the sea were completely in the dark. They wanted to ask for help, but they found that they also couldn't send Heavenly Questions. In the vast sea, they were helpless and alone, having turned back into mortals.

Chang Jun felt that his senses were deadened, too. He shouted into Yao Qi's ear: "This must be that evil cultivator's demonic art! Ziming-xiong, I think I've gone deaf!"

Yao Qi quickly tilted his head to dodge his flying spit. "Not completely deaf, I can still hear a bit...and it seems that we can still use the upgraded immortal tools. Strange, can this demonic art be targeted only at people?"

"The upgraded immortal tools are a close-kept secret of Xuanyin's Moon Plated Peak, only just revealed on the South Sea. How could an outsider know about them? He must not be prepared." Chang Jun analyzed the situation meticulously and came up with a conclusion. "What do we do now? Go back?"

Yao Qi grudgingly looked at the already useless tracking talisman. "But we've come all this way..."

"But we can't use spiritual energy!" said Chang Jun.

"With our cultivation levels," said Yao Qi, "does it make a difference whether we can use spiritual energy?"

Chang Jun: "..."

That was fair enough.

“Let’s go!” said Chang Jun. “Search the area!”

Yao Qi pressed a button on the boat. The boat passing stealthily along the seabed extended a pair of thousand-li eyes and took in the whole of the pitch-black seabed. Shortly, the thousand-li eyes stopped moving.

The bottom of the sea was very dark, but there was a place darker than all the rest, as if it was soaking up all the light.

“What’s th...”

Before Yao Qi could finish, the pitch-black spot suddenly became agitated. A whirlpool as violent as those of the Resurrection Vortex arose. Because of the spiritual energy prohibition, the two half-immortals’ eyesight and hearing weren’t very good, and their reactions were unavoidably delayed. By the time they realized what was happening, the whirlpool had already reached them. A gale abruptly rose on the sea and greedily sucked up all the spiritual energy in the surroundings. The upgraded immortal tool, letting out spiritual energy in all directions, definitely couldn’t escape.

Shortly, where the whirlpool had swept, the bodies of marine life appeared. Yao Qi, Chang Jun, and their boat were all gone.

And meanwhile, from chaos, Xi Ping faintly recovered a portion of his senses—the senses of this true body.

He dimly felt that he seemed to be floating in water.

He couldn't open his eyes, couldn't move. The spirit at the center of his brow had been pierced by something, and all his meridians and acupoints seemed to have been nailed in place.

Xi Ping belatedly regretted casting his true body aside. What the hell was that bastard Wangge Luobao doing?

“Tsk, spiritual energy has been prohibited.” The clinging Miah language came to his ears. Then a finger pressed against the center of his brow. Wangge Luobao switched over to the Wan language and said softly, “The Eternal Spring Brocade, extraordinary—and you're also extraordinary, little Shiyong. You actually found a way to force the hidden bones to this pass. No wonder you are the one to break through.”

Xi Ping had no way to answer. All he could do was hurl abuses inwardly: I'm your fucking dad!

Wangge Luobao laughed and smoothed his slightly furrowed brow. “Wait a little bit, and we'll be able to have a chat... No need to worry, where getting rid of the hidden bones is concerned, we're on the same side.”

Xi Ping wasn't in the mood to listen to this odd-eyed man's nonsense. He only hoped that divine lightning would come from the sky and cook this Southern Shu evil cultivator who refused to die, even if he had to go with him to the grave. He had to get back to Tao County. Shifu...

Just then, Wangge Luobao suddenly said, “Do you want to know where accompanying plants come from?”

Xi Ping was startled.

Before the ancient inscriptions from outside the Beijue Mountains had appeared in the world, he and the cultivation world had all believed that “a shed skin outside the three thousand paths of the Great Way” would necessarily give birth to an accompanying plant.

But now that he had learned the whole story of the spiritual mountains, looking back on it, that was a little off.

Before the Kunlun Mountains formed, it seemed that there had been no distinction between “orthodox and evil.” Among cultivators, it was jungle law, the weak prey to the strong, and there had been no concept of “demonic gods.” It was only when the ancient inscriptions had descended and built a great framework of “orthodox and evil” in the world that the “orthodox” cultivators had begun to pursue the selfless and undesigning “Great Way for all,” with the goal of becoming sages who cast off the mundane dust.

The four great demonic gods—Eternal Spring Brocade, Late-Autumn Red, Reincarnation Wood, and Heartless Lotus—must all have become shed skins after Kunlun had formed but before the other spiritual mountains had arisen. The sages who “accorded with the Great Way” had concentrated spiritual energy, laid the foundations for the spiritual mountains, while the shed skin demonic gods rejected by the Great Way had left vestiges of themselves in their accompanying plants, like “impurities” in the system of the spiritual mountains.

So the problem was: while deciphering the instructions in the Unbound Furnace, Lin Chi had seen that after Kunlun had formed, the Ways of the Heart of the people who “did not accord with the Way” had broken, and they had been consumed by the orthodox. The ancient inscriptions had sifted out only the people who were going to the same end as them.

Then how had the four great demonic gods survived and even been able to become shed skins amid the rise of the four great spiritual mountains on the southern continent?

CHAPTER 241 - Conclusion (9)

“You ought to know already that after Kunlun formed, on the northern continent, practically everyone who didn’t accord with the Sword Ancestor’s Way of the Heart passed away, and the so-called ‘demons’ on the southern continent were also rejected and died as the four spiritual mountain ranges of the south arose—they were put to death by ‘heaven and earth,’ irresistible to human efforts. Those who could ‘go against the current’ in the face of this general trend had Ways of the Heart that were unusual.

“The demonic god of the Heartless Lotus was different from that poor sap forced to insanity by Xuanwu. That was a person born with two consciousnesses in one body, capable of containing multiple Ways of the Heart. Even if some of them were put to death, he could always find some others.

“Late-Autumn Red can be counted as one with Eternal Spring Brocade. The demonic god of the Eternal Spring Brocade wasn’t the mild and gentle lover of Xuanyin’s Golden Hand’s dreams. This person’s evil surpassed the Heartless Lotus. The ‘material’ he was most infatuated with was humans. Nearly all the evil arts you’ve heard of in your life, traced back to their roots, originated with him. His highest achievement, apart from the exceptionally talented and beautiful half-puppet of the Late-Autumn Red, was that he could refine Ways of the Heart. The way of toolmaking’s understanding of inscriptions is extremely profound. It's said that as soon as Kunlun formed, while the vast majority of people on the southern continent were still bewildered, he refined a false Way of the Heart for himself and avoided the heavenly commandments.

“Only Yuan Hui of the Reincarnation Wood was out of place among his ‘fellows.’” At this point, Wangge Luobao paused briefly, then gave a faint sigh. “The ungovernable way has no Way of the Heart. It cannot be countenanced by the world, nor can it be restrained by the heavenly commandments—haven't you wondered how he could be without a Way of the Heart?”

Of course Xi Ping had wondered. He had inwardly ruminated on this subject more than once—if you had no Way of the Heart while establishing a foundation, as soon as you swallowed the established foundation pill, the spirit between your brows would explode. He had personally experienced this. He had been lucky enough to hide inside the reincarnation wood then, but Yuan Hui had only acquired an accompanying plant upon becoming a shed skin. Where had he hidden while establishing a foundation? When everyone else exploded, what made him special? Was his skull made of iron?

But Xi Ping was really in no mood to listen. Through his eyelids, he couldn't see what Wangge Luobao was doing, only hear water and an ominous dripping. His spiritual sense was sending up frantic warnings, urging him to run, but where was he supposed to run?

He was worse off now than when he had been held in place by the Lovebird Sword Array. Then, his consciousness had been trapped, but at least his true body could still move freely. Now he couldn't move, and his consciousness couldn't run, and there was shifu...

Xi Ping's ears were full of ancient secrets, and his mind was moving rapidly: as he spoke, Wangge Luobao was not only deliberately dragging out his voice, he was also periodically throwing out hooks to entice him to listen.

A great evil cultivator wasn't a tea shop storyteller. This compelling rendition certainly wasn't just for the sake of amusing him. It probably also wasn't to disrupt his train of thought. Thinking about eight things at once was normal for Xi Ping. Never mind a bit of talk, if Wangge Luobao had stripped naked and said that he was actually a girl, it still wouldn't have disturbed him. It also certainly couldn't be to stall for time. Even if Wang didn't make a sound, as a total paralytic, Xi Ping couldn't pull out a gun and blow his miserable head off.

So...

Xi Ping clamped down firmly on a bellyful of curiosity, turned a deaf ear on Wangge Luobao's voice, full of bewitchment and implication, and meditated—at the same time, he determined something: what was trapping him was this place. Wangge Luobao obviously also couldn't use spiritual energy, or else there would have been no need for him to waste spit. A beast-taming flute could most easily subdue a person like Xi Ping, who was easily distracted by nature.

Xi Ping swiftly restrained his mind, dismissed distractions, and sank his consciousness into his spirit. When his mind was at its calmest, he perceived the thing passing through his spirit—it was an extremely thin golden thread.

Wangge Luobao's incessant talkativeness seemed to be for the purpose of keeping him from finding this.

Xi Ping immediately approached it with his consciousness. Just then, a sharp stabbing pain came from his physical body—Wangge Luobao seemed to have sensed something. He had stabbed through his finger!

While the fingers were connected to the heart, Xi Ping's body and mind both had been shattered countless times. A gentleman could afford to wait a decade for the moment to be ripe to get his own back. His mind only wavered slightly, then ignored it. But Wangge Luobao took this opportunity to slip a sentence into his ear: “Don’t you want to know where Ways of the Heart came from?”

Xi Ping was abruptly distracted.

“Don’t you want to know...how the shackles of a Way of the Heart can be escaped?”

To speak of Yao Qi and Chang Jun in the meantime, when the two of them were swept up by the sudden whirlpool in the sea, they seemed to have fallen into an excavator. When they had dizzily revolved for an unknown length of time and nearly gone through the bed of the South Sea, they finally stopped.

Their stealth boat was caught in a narrow entrance.

The two of them consulted briefly, then each arrayed himself with a handful of protective immortal tools. They shouldered upgraded hand cannons, filled them with spiritual stones, and went into the mouth of the cave.

This seemed to be a hidden realm. Though it was in the sea, there was no water inside. Only the passage became narrower and narrower. At last it was just wide enough for a single person to pass through, and it became darker and darker—at last, the two of them were holding onto each other, completely unable to see each other.

Yao Qi kept thinking, What kind of place is this? It's very uncomfortable. He felt for his upgraded hand cannon and opened the spiritual stone compartment a crack, but there wasn't a sliver of the spiritual light that ought to have spilled out. There was something here sucking up all the light.

“Hongzheng-xiong, have you noticed, this place...”

Yao Qi stopped talking abruptly. His words just now had been voiceless—even he hadn't been able to hear.

Yao Qi suddenly realized what the strange feeling he had been having was: in the midst of utter silence, he couldn't even hear his own breathing and pulse!

Next, his senses of taste, smell, and touch disappeared together.

Once his sense of touch was gone, he no longer knew where Chang Jun was. Yao Qi yelled—as before, there was absolutely no sound. A strange sort of illusion arose: he couldn't feel himself.

It was as if he were dead, nonexistent.

As soon as this thought flashed by, Yao Qi's mind became muddled. It seemed that his awareness was about to disappear as well...

Just then, a protective upgraded immortal tool Yao Qi was carrying exploded. With a snap, the white spirit inside the immortal tool turned to powder, and spiritual energy blasted Yao Qi away, simultaneously blowing a crevice in the narrow passageway. Icy seawater poured in, splashing his head and face.

Yao Qi breathed a mouthful of it into his lungs. His senses abruptly returned, and he was pushed forward by the seawater. Befuddled, he was thrust into a circle of weak light, and the seawater was abruptly blocked out, while Yao Qi toppled in headfirst and slammed the bridge of his nose into the thigh of Chang Jun, who was following closely after him.

Blood immediately poured from Yao Qi's nose and got all over his mouth. It was stinking and salty and suffocating. It was the feeling of being alive.

The two of them, just getting over their fright, looked at each other blankly. Chang Jun began to heave as though he had a collapsed lung.

Yao Qi quickly put a hand over his mouth, sharing the blood that had just come down in a torrent, giving Hongzheng-xiong a handprint "full of life

Then the two of them heard a foreign-accented voice speaking: “As everyone knows, establishing a foundation is the only step along the path of cultivation that requires the aid of a pill. The main ingredient of the established foundation pill is the silk dragon heart. Apart from assisting cultivators in concentrating an essence and establishing a foundation, a silk dragon heart can also be made into a special immortal tool, which helps poor half-immortal evil cultivators unable to get spiritual stones ‘pilfer heaven’s order’—do you know of another ingenious use for a silk dragon heart?”

No one answered him. The speaker paused briefly, then went on, answering his own question: “Hunting silk dragons is a Shu tradition, predating the existence of written language. At the time, the northern continent was still a wilderness, people had yet to domesticate cattle and horses, and there were no nations, no city-states in the world, only one tribe after another, living off the land. Of course, there also weren’t any cultivators... Individuals who were extraordinarily talented and particularly spiritual might by happenstance open their spiritual eyes, but from a modern point of view, they were only half-immortals who knew some tricks.

“Shu was rich in natural resources and overwhelmingly full of spiritual energy, but the ancients inhabiting it led lives of untold suffering and hardship—because they were all slaves of the ‘Shamanic Way.’ They were treated as pigs and dogs under the rule of a small smattering of people.

“Back then, Ancestor Tianbo, of mixed Miah and Xiuyi blood, led one hundred twenty-eight warriors—half Xiuyi and half Miah—and launched a spiritual beast tide, overthrowing the tyranny of the Shamanic Way, which had occupied Southern Shu by force. After this, the Miah and Xiuyi clans, with the founder as a bond, made a vow to join forces and be of one heart, the main peninsula and the Three Islands to keep watch for and aid in defending one another, never to betray each other. The slaves of the ‘Shamans’ became the mighty Shu. After Kunlun’s ancient inscriptions appeared, Ancestor Tianbo as a matter of course became Shu’s uncrowned king, attained a full moon position, and raised the Lingyun Mountains.

“‘Shaman’ is a translation into the Miah language. Tai Sui, you have a wide social net and are proficient in the languages of all nations. You ought to know what it means.”

Yao Qi and Chang Jun’s eyes met uncertainly: Tai Sui... Was the great evil cultivator talking to Xi Shiyong?

Was he awake?

Chang Jun patted Yao Qi’s arm and pointed upward.

Yao Qi raised his head and looked in the direction he was pointing. He nearly had a heart attack. Right above their heads, an adult silk dragon lay on its stomach, its big eyes wide open and staring at the two of them!

But they waited for ages, and the silk dragon didn't move a muscle. Only then did Yao Qi work up his nerve and fumble out a jade stamp, lighting the scene above him with its faint green light: it wasn't a real dragon; it was an incredibly realistic mural.

Around the dragon, graceful aquatic plants grew, with their tips like hair—this was the legendary “three-day dream grass,” said to be extinct.

The form of a peculiar fish was faintly discernible amid the thicket of three-day dream grass. Yao Qi and Chang Jun recognized it at a glance. That fish was the next life spiritual fish.

This place seemed to be a secret underground sacrificial altar. It was all dark, with an unspeakable sense of deathliness. It made Yao Qi and Chang Jun all at once recall that feeling from earlier, as though they were dead.

Amid the silence, the great evil cultivator said in a singsong voice, “That’s right, ‘Shaman’ means ‘a person with control over life and death.’”

Chang Jun gestured, and the two of them quickly took stock of the upgraded immortal tools they were carrying, then crept in the direction of the voice.

Inside the spiritual energy prohibition, Wangge Luobao was also deaf. Unaware, he spoke to Xi Ping, who didn't answer: "The 'Shamans' had three treasures: the next life spiritual fish, the three-day dream grass, and the silk dragon. The next life spiritual fish could travel between the lands of the living and the dead, the three-day dream grass could pull a dying person back from the abyss, and they also kept 'living corpse warriors'—"

For some reason, though Yao Qi and Chang Jun heard this line out of context, their scalps both went numb.

"The silk dragon heart was the main ingredient in refining living corpse warriors.

"The silk dragon heart can 'pilfer heaven's order,' so naturally it can store the universe's spiritual energy. The Shamans discovered that if a silk dragon heart were put in place of a dead person's heart, it would keep the corpse from rotting. If they were appropriately remade, the dead person's bones and meridians would be nourished and fixed in place by the spiritual energy. They would have endless strength and boundless magic power. The Shamans had no writing system, only a set of secret arts used to control living corpses. With this method, they were completely wanton. There was no evil they would not sink to. The other clans did not dare to speak against them...until the Shaman king became reckless in his lust and abducted a woman.

“This woman... There was no writing then, so no record has been left behind of her name. I only know that she was the holy woman of a certain tribe. It is said that she was unusually beautiful and remained youthful and unaging, that she had eyes that could ‘see through good and evil.’ Working off the records, she must have been a consummate open-eyed half-immortal, with a paramount spiritual sense—before the heavenly commandments of the Kunlun Mountains were created, the paramount spiritual sense had yet to be stifled by the false heavens. It was not yet a curse. It was a rare natural gift.

“The holy woman sent out dozens of tokens asking for help, but all the world’s cowards feared the living corpses, and no one dared to answer. In order to get her, the Shamans ordered the living corpses to slaughter her entire tribe. Apart from the holy woman’s son, who had gone to distant lands to study as an apprentice, not one survived.

“In order to take her revenge, the holy woman endured humiliation for many years. With the gift of her paramount spiritual sense, she saw through the secret arts of the living corpses, committed herself irrevocably. She did a mighty deed: she secretly ate a silk dragon heart and turned herself into a 'living corpse.'

“Beforehand, she carved instructions to take revenge onto her spirit, to ensure that she wouldn't be controlled by others. But an unexpected thing happened. Because she already had spiritual bones, when the immense wave of spiritual energy pierced her body, it was mediated by the spiritual bones. The silk dragon heart she had eaten not only failed to kill her, it created a 'spiritual core' surrounding the 'instructions' she had carved, repairing her shattered spirit... You must have realized that these were the first ever Way of the Heart and essence. This woman whose name is unknown was the first established foundation in the world.

“But she was only one person, with her foundation newly established. She was no match for a hundred thousand living corpses. So after she escaped, she hid herself, combined silk dragon hearts with the secret arts of living corpses, and created an 'immortality pill' that she disseminated. I think that she did it for the sake of revenge. Considering it from her point of view, she must not yet have known what a mighty thing she had done. She must have thought she was only a living corpse, neither human nor ghost.”

Yao Qi was scared witless at hearing this. He slipped. Chang Jun quickly used a protective immortal tool to cushion his fall, at any rate keeping Ziming-xiong from knocking any teeth out.

Just then, Wangge Luobao laughed quietly. His laughter echoed in the enclosed space, covering up the bit of noise Chang Jun was making.

“The established foundation pill...what was then called the immortality pill, became a precious treasure as soon as it came into the world. Countless people were provoked into fighting over it. Those whose spiritual bones were incomplete and whose Ways of the Heart were yet unsettled exploded and died if they took it. Only a tiny number of masters succeeded in establishing foundations. Amid the bloody struggle, the pill spread throughout the northern and southern continents, and belatedly came to the attention of the Shamans.

“The Shaman king obtained three immortality pills. That incompetent fool didn't realize that this pill had originated in his own clan's secret arts. At the time, people didn't know that an established foundation pill needed the two criteria of 'spiritual bones' and 'a Way of the Heart' to succeed. They had only roughly surmised the magical theory that 'Only people with sufficiently high spirituality and firm wills could pass the test of heaven.' So the Shaman king caught two people to try the pill on.

“These two people to whom good came from ill are both familiar to you. One of them had been sold out by his fellow clansmen because of his parentage and their envy for his talents, a rebel against the Shamans on Shu's Three Islands, the Miah-Xiuyi mixed blood Ancestor Tianbo.

“The other one was the holy woman's son who had gone to distant lands to apprentice himself and who now, finally hearing that his home had fallen into enemy hands, had come back to take revenge single-handed...and he was also the person who passed on those hidden bones to you.”

Yao Qi had fallen onto the soft protective immortal tool and was just about to get up, but he saw a sliver of weak light appear in a crack in a nearby stone. He quickly crawled a few steps forward and waved at Chang Jun to shift the stones.

The two of them pried open a little gap and stuck a spyglass into it. Shock appeared simultaneously on their faces—

CHAPTER 242 - Conclusion (10)

Xi Ping was in an enormous pool. The spirit at the center of his brow and all the major acupoints of his body had golden threads passing through them. These golden threads were drawing something out of his body, in texture like mist.

That mist was rooted at Xi Ping's spirit at the center of his brow—a place most familiar to cultivators. Chang Jun pinched Yao Qi hard and silently said: Consciousness!

Except in a special location like the Law Breaker, the consciousness of a cultivator, especially a high level cultivator, would be invisible to the naked eye, but now Xi Ping's consciousness was tangled in golden threads, and the glittering thin threads had outlined the form of his consciousness—right now, his consciousness wasn't in the usual human form; it was in the form of a skeleton.

The consciousness, the same height as his body, was about half a cun away from him, making it seem as though Xi Ping, in the midst of brilliant golden light, was intimately embracing a skeleton like mist.

The golden threads drawing out his consciousness were clustered together, the other end of the cluster tied to Southern Shu's great evil cultivator, Wangge Luobao.

Though Xi Ping's present condition was strange, from a distance there was still quite a sense of beauty about it. Wangge Luobao, however, was just plain terrifying.

Yao Qi's digestion had never been good. With spiritual energy prohibited, his tendency to get nauseated or have diarrhea easily seemed to have returned. He nearly threw up on the spot: he couldn't even figure out what organ Wangge Luobao was using to talk.

The other ends of the golden threads were all wrapped around a thumb-sized piece of bone, and that bone was embedded in the center of Wangge Luobao's brow.

The skin, flesh, and sense organs on Wangge Luobao's face had vanished without a trace, leaving behind only the skull. The little bone wrapped in golden threads at the center of his forehead was expanding at a speed visible to the naked eye, bit by bit taking the place of Wangge Luobao's own bones.

The creeping bone tore violently into the skin and flesh. The drip-dripping was the sound of Wangge Luobao's blood dripping into the pool.

Chang Jun suddenly tapped Yao Qi. He pointed at the spirit-conducting gold on the upgraded spyglass, then pointed at the “golden threads” on Xi Ping: Don't you think they're similar?

Yao Qi was startled. He quickly swallowed a mouthful of saliva and looked closely despite his nausea.

The spy glass was an upgraded immortal tool made of spirit-conducting gold. Inside the spiritual energy prohibition, only on spirit-conducting gold could a weak spiritual light be seen. It wasn't only the texture and color; the spirit-conducting gold light on the upgraded immortal tool was identical to that golden thread.

Chang Jun mouthed: Why does that golden thread look like spirit-conducting gold? How can he have spirit-conducting gold? Is there a traitor in Wan?

Yao Qi, his expression grave, shook his head. A traitor wouldn't betray us in this direction. It's too far a drop...

He suddenly recalled Lancang's Sect Leader. Before his death, the Sect Leader had wanted to destroy the Lancang Spiritual Mountains' inscriptions, make people use spirit-conducting gold to repair the severed veins of the earth, and return spiritual energy to the human world. But he had failed, and the brave people who had escaped harboring spirit-conducting gold had died for their nation. The spirit-conducting gold Lancang had made at the time had been precisely in the form of golden thread like this. A coil of it had somehow ended up in Wangge Luobao's hands.

In the spiritual energy prohibition now, only spirit-conducting gold could conduct spiritual energy. The great evil cultivator had held a treasure that could benefit the world for so many years, and he actually hadn't had any thought of developing it, but now, with spiritual energy prohibited, he had taken it out to use for an evil art.

Goodness, this was what you called "everyone has their own ambition"!

Yao Qi's gaze moved back and forth between Xi Ping and Wangge Luobao. As Wangge Luobao spoke of those deliberately sensational ancient secrets, Xi Ping's mind was evidently wavering. And every time his consciousness wavered, it would be drained a little thinner by the golden threads—when Wangge Luobao had said the part about "the person who passed on those hidden bones to you," the entire head of Xi Ping's skeleton-shaped consciousness had blurred. The parts that dispersed seemed to have been sucked by the golden threads into Wangge Luobao. The great evil cultivator's bald pate turned entirely golden!

Wangge Luobao was saturated in a deathly air, with only the top of his head shining, like a gas lamp that had been made in the shape of a skull—one that had a broadcasting function!

This scene, as Yao Qi and Chang Jun saw it, was the bone wedged into the center of his brow using the golden threads to absorb Xi Shiyong's consciousness.

What kind of evil object was that bone?

Yao Qi waved a hand at Chang Jun, took out an upgraded hand cannon, and gestured: The rest isn't important, anyway he's not doing anything good. We're too far away, we might harm our own by mistake, let's get closer.

Chang Jun sucked in a breath. The upgraded immortal tool in his hands imbued him with boundless courage. Let's go! We'll fuck him up!

The two of them had been close friends since they had lived in the same courtyard at the Latent Cultivation Temple. They had a perfect rapport. One quickly turned the spyglass to observe the terrain, and the other quickly took notes in a little notebook. Shortly, Chang Jun had drawn a rough map of this awful place: they would work separately, approach from two sides, and whoever was noticed would act as the bait.

Meanwhile, Wangge Luobao was still disturbing Xi Ping with his patter.

“To take the ancestor and Yuan Hui alive to try the pill on them, the Shamans required a great deal of assets and used many underhanded means. The two of them were taken in and brought back in stone coffins used to imprison violent living corpse soldiers. Of course, those Shamans were afraid that if the pills worked, there would be trouble if the two of them simultaneously rebuilt their bodies and joined forces, so they first gave that pill to the ancestor.

“My clan’s ancestor was too young then. His Way of the Heart was firm, but his spiritual bones weren’t quite ‘consummate.’ But in cultivation, the slightest shortfall means going astray by a thousand li. Even one missing sliver wouldn’t do. When he was forced to take the established foundation pill, his body couldn’t take it, but he also couldn’t simply die at once like a mortal. The Shamans observed him for a whole day, saw his spiritual energy constantly attempting to concentrate in his spirit and constantly flowing out of his maimed body. Seeing that he was on his last gasp, they knew that the pill was good, it was only the ‘test subject’ who wouldn’t do. So they opened the stone coffin of the second test subject—Yuan Hui’s ‘spirituality’ was purer than the ancestor’s, his spiritual bones a grade higher.

“When the stone coffin was opened, she...the vengeful holy woman hiding nearby, immediately saw her own son, who had been separated from her for many years.”

Earlier, Xi Ping had almost succeeded in entering meditation and had been interrupted by Wangge Luobao. Now he was attempting to restrain his consciousness again—but restraining his consciousness had become unusually difficult. Xi Ping clearly sensed his own consciousness becoming more and more muddled, as if he had returned to when he had been learning to meditate in the Latent Cultivation Temple; he absolutely couldn’t control the distracting thoughts racing wildly through his mind.

From the depths of his memory, he turned up Detailed Account of Meridians and attempted to recite it verbatim in his mind. When he had recited two lines, he heard Wangge Luobao’s voice say: “She had a rare power, the ability to turn a portion of her body into mist...”

Xi Ping felt his heart miss a beat.

Where Xi Ping couldn’t see it, as soon as his mind drifted, his skeleton-shaped consciousness nearly disappeared, becoming blurry from the ribs up. The golden light on Wangge Luobao’s head also spread down to his back. His neck tore open like a ghost’s painted skin. His shoulder blades, upper spine, and ribs all turned golden.

Seeing the image transmitted by the spyglass, Yao Qi's heart tightened: the evil cultivator had sucked away nearly half of Xi Ping's consciousness. If he was entirely "sucked" up by the evil cultivator, then wouldn't he be dead?!

With his radiant skull, Wangge Luobao's posture, bent over to observe Xi Ping, still exuded an unspeakable avarice. In a voice full of bewitchment, he asked, "What, does that power call someone to mind? As expected, it wasn't wholly without reason that those hidden bones came to you. They have countless connections to you. It was decreed by fate... Viscount Xi, do you believe in fate?"

The words "believe in fate" seemed to knock a bit of clarity back into Xi Ping. His consciousness, which had nearly dissipated entirely, congealed desperately as though struggling to the death. The golden threads between the two of them tensed.

At the same time, Xi Ping inwardly determined something: Wangge Luobao definitely couldn't read his mind, but he could clearly tell whether his mood was stable or agitated. This Southern Shu evil cultivator must be practicing some kind of evil art on his consciousness.

The hidden bones were attached to his consciousness. It was only because he had resisted that he had been able to escape and take temporary shelter in the Law Breaker.

Wangge Luobao had no reason to aid the hidden bones...and those rotten bones wouldn't have thanked him, anyway. So there was only one possibility: Wangge Luobao wanted to go through him to get the hidden bones!

“I know you don't.” Wangge Luobao didn't give him time to think carefully. He laughed. “Those of your way have had something demonic about them since ancient times.

“At that time, the cultivation world had yet to work out the system of cultivation. The later ‘crash course’ by which you could take pills, pour in spiritual energy, and open your spiritual eyes in the course of a year didn't exist yet. Those who could open their spiritual eyes were true cultivators. They had no one to guide them. They either encountered radical transformation or went through lengthy probing and enlightenment. They practically all had Ways of the Heart. And Yuan Hui was the son of the holy woman, richly endowed by nature. It is said that he left his native land when he was very young, precisely because he and his mother didn't get along. He didn't believe in the spirituality of the universe, the fate of all things, didn't believe in ghosts and gods and didn't believe in the Way. He was a misfit in the tribe he was born to.

“Seeing his plentiful spiritual energy, the Shamans thought that he was stronger than the ancestor and that the test was certain to succeed with him. But his own mother knew that Yuan Hui had been able to channel spiritual energy at a young age only because of his exceptional natural endowments. He had no Way of the Heart to speak of. Since the Shaman king had seized the immortality pills, the vengeful holy woman had been waiting in the shadows. She viewed the cultivators who succeeded in establishing foundations as living corpses. Just think of it... Suppose that the Shaman king, unable to recognize his own clan’s secret art for creating living corpses, took the pill. Either he would explode and die, or he would succeed through untold hardships in making himself into a ‘living corpse.’ How ridiculous would that be? As she saw it, that would be the taste of vengeance.

“As for the innocent test subjects... When she saw the Shamans carry in the coffins, she only looked on indifferently. There were so many heroes in the world, and when she had been at her most isolated and defenseless, hadn’t there been no one to help her? But an unexpected sequence of events turned her into an evil dragon biting its own tail.”

Xi Ping attempted to turn a deaf ear. His consciousness struggled even more fiercely.

Wangge Luobao gave a soft ha. “It seems that you still don’t believe it. Then perhaps after you’ve heard the rest of the story, you might have some more veneration for 'fate.'

“When the vengeful holy woman recognized her son, it was already too late. Though his talents were exceptional and he was an open-eyed half-immortal who had finished rinsing his spiritual bones, he was missing the most crucial ‘Way of the Heart.’ The essence condensed by the established foundation pill had nowhere to alight. His spirit ruptured. Soon he would be beyond saving. So the holy woman used a secret art—”

Xi Ping treated his words like a tortoise reciting scripture and finished reciting the preface to Detailed Account of Meridians. Just then, he heard Wangge Luobao spit out two words: “Life swapping.”

Xi Ping gave a start. The Detailed Account of Meridians in his mind flew up to the high heavens, every last page of it returning to his shifu.

His consciousness, which had concentrated in one place, seemed about to scatter entirely. The “torso” portion of the consciousness had nearly all been absorbed by Wangge Luobao, leaving only two legs.

“Ah...of course you remember ‘life swapping.’”

Xi Ping wouldn't forget it even in death.

This was an unrelenting talisman. If you drew it on a close personal possession of yours and at the same time made the object of the talisman drink a drop of your blood, when that person sustained a mortal injury, you could take their place. It didn't require strong cultivation; all it needed was for your cultivation not to be so much lower than the person's being protected that the talisman would lose effect... All you needed was sincerity.

Back during Jinping's Grand Selection, at the same time as Jiangli had dragged him into the whirlpool, she had used her birthday jade and a drop of blood in his tea to cast the life-swapping talisman on him, which had pushed him step by step to where he was today.

Hatred for cruel injustice, an avenger ready to stake everything on a single throw, voluntarily transforming her own body at a desperate pass, all of it falling through because of the games of fortune.

The holy woman of ancient Shu whose name was unknown, and the ill-fated Queen of Flowers beside the Lingyang River.

A rebellious son who had left his native land, and an ignorant rich kid...

These bones seemed like a cycle of reincarnation.

“At the last moment, this vengeful holy woman turned her blood into mist and drew a life-swapping talisman that she cast into Yuan Hui’s eyes, nose, ears, and mouth. Life and death were inverted between the two of them. The holy woman’s spirit burst, and she died at once. Her established foundation essence exploded, affecting all the half-immortals and mortals in the vicinity. Yuan Hui and the Shamans watching were crushed to dust. The Shamans went down to the Nine Springs of the underworld to keep company with their living corpse warriors. But Yuan Hui was enveloped in a bloody mist with the life-swapping talisman embedded in it.

“The life-swapping talisman protected his consciousness. The remaining spiritual energy in the bloody mist assembled and regenerated his bones and flesh... It was as if his mother had once again given birth to him. When he returned to the world, he had crossed the established foundation boundary.

“He had no Way of the Heart and couldn’t expand his essence by tempering one. Only through the destruction of his body could he die and be reborn time after time, as if he had an eternal mother.

“And of those present at the time, only one survived and witnessed all of this —my clan’s ancestor. The Shamans, seeing him growing weaker and weaker, had treated him as a failed test subject and tossed him into the stone coffin to live or die as he might. With his spiritual bones incomplete, he was in too much pain after being forced to take the established foundation pill, so like you right now, he couldn't move, but his consciousness was aware.

“When the holy woman was destroyed, her exploding essence was largely blocked by the stone coffin. The spiritual energy and the dust of the holy woman's bones just happened to make up for the bit of spiritual bones the ancestor was missing.”

Xi Ping's consciousness was now entirely formless. The golden threads wrapped around him gradually broke away from the main bundle, and his body sank with a deathly air into the water. And Wangge Luobao had turned entirely into a radiant skeleton. His voice grew more and more urgent: “So in the hands of the ancestor, there remained a small portion of bone that shared an origin with Yuan Hui's hidden bones.”

Ancestor Tianbo had been let down by his short-sighted clansmen since birth. How could he have wished for good things to come to them? The pity was that he had been born at the wrong time. He didn't have the chance that the Sword Ancestor had, and Kunlun gained power first.

The ancestor had only wanted to climb upward. His Way of the Heart in fact did not accord with the so-called false Great Way. He ought to have faded at this point. He survived thanks to this small segment of bone of shared origin, which siphoned off the spiritual energy accumulated by Yuan Hui.

“Since neither of you wants these hidden bones, you may as well give them to me...”

If he only consumed Xi Ping’s consciousness using the small remaining segment of the hidden bones, once he took a boat out of the spiritual energy prohibition, he would naturally be able to become one with the hidden bones.

What the ancestor had once failed to do just on the point of success in the Impassable Sea, he would succeed in doing.

And by a series of coincidences, this time, the hidden bones had actually also obtained the ancient inscriptions from outside the Beijue Mountains.

Didn’t this mean that fate had decreed that he would rise to godhood?

CHAPTER 243 - Conclusion (11)

Because of his too-rushed table manners during his last few sentences, Wangge Luobao had mixed the Wan and Miah languages. He looked like a demon of the end of the world.

In a moment of desperation, Yao Qi pulled the hand cannon's trigger, sending a shot at the strange bone at the center of Wangge Luobao's brow.

There was a hiss as the upgraded immortal tool cut through the filaments of spirit-conducting gold and bore down on Wangge Luobao...then missed.

Yao Qi: "..."

Why could this thing miss?!

Of course a hand cannon could miss. While it was an upgraded immortal tool, it had been developed from a mortal tool, and mortal soldiers all had to go through training to be able to use it. Cultivators normally relied on their spiritual senses. All they needed was to pull the trigger, and there was no target they couldn't hit. Therefore, it had never occurred to Yao Qi that this thing actually required skill.

What he had been aiming for was the center of Wangge Luobao's brow, but the upshot was that the beam of spiritual light, absurdly, hit three zhang wide of his target, and the sand and rocks it sent flying just happened to strike at the feet of Chang Jun, who was coming around from the other direction.

Without the support of his spiritual sense, Chang Jun was also deaf and blind. Making an unexpected misstep, he plummeted into the pool where Xi Ping was.

"It's over!" Chang Jun thought despairingly. "If Xi Shiyong can see us from the underworld, he'll be cursing eighteen generations of my ancestors."

Yao Qi decided that the damage had been done, and he might as well keep going. He didn't even bother to aim, prepared to simply shoot wildly and let a stray shot blow Wangge Luobao to his death.

Wangge Luobao took absolutely no notice of him. He grasped the golden threads binding Xi Ping. Chang Jun, who had fallen into the water, just managed to grab Xi Ping's arm when the last of Xi Ping's consciousness was broken up by the golden thread.

Xi Ping's mist-like consciousness turned into a beam of fragmentary light that broke free of his true body and was dragged away along with the golden thread by the bone at the center of Wangge Luobao's brow.

Wangge Luobao had turned entirely into a golden skeleton. His abdomen was shattered by a wild shot from Yao Qi's hand cannon, but he laughed heartily. Under Yao Qi's hopeless gaze, the fragmented bones repaired themselves and became as good as new in the blink of an eye—he had obtained the special power of Xi Ping's consciousness. The Xi Ping that Chang Jun had grabbed was only an “empty shell.”

Wangge Luobao reached back and activated a mechanism. The boulders around the pool quickly moved toward each other, ready to crush Chang Jun and Xi Ping in the water—that sack of skin filled with cotton waste had no further use.

Wangge Luobao was wild with joy. Having swallowed Xi Ping's consciousness, he had obtained even more than he had imagined: apart from the critical portion of the ancient inscriptions that Xi Ping had made off with, he could also feel that all the reincarnation wood trees inside the spiritual energy prohibition line had turned into his “hair, skin, hands, and feet.” Inside the spiritual energy prohibition where even a shed skin would have to ride a horse or take a carriage, he could pluck the Tai Sui Qin just like Xi Ping and swap places with any reincarnation wood tree.

He didn't even need a boat. In just the blink of an eye, he could go right around the still expanding spiritual energy prohibition line, charge out, and become one with the hidden bones.

The hidden bones would put together all the pieces of the ancient inscriptions, and he would have the hidden bones. When the time came, never mind the Unbound Furnace that had swallowed a few shed skins, even if the Eternal Spring Brocade's lousy furnace also refined a hundred Swords of the South, it still wouldn't be able to keep the universe from overturning.

With these hidden bones, the ancient times could recklessly come to the human world. There would be no need to carefully hone a Way of the Heart, no need to worry about being swallowed by masters. No force would need to be feared, all heavenly commandments could be disregarded.

Now, they would be influenced by no Ways of the Heart of common origin and would need to endure no interrogation. Even if they became obsessed and lost their mind, their Way of the Heart still wouldn't shatter; this was still the sole "way" in the world that could accept the ancient inscriptions from outside the Beijue Mountains without being drowned—this was clearly the unparalleled way to heaven of the son of the holy mother and divine woman who had been the origin of the cultivation world.

Even the spiritual mountains might not be able to last forever, but the master of the hidden bones would live as long as heaven and earth.

But perhaps there was nothing that came with a shortcut. Because this godhood was too easy to attain, two successive masters on the hidden bones had both been ignorant boys who hadn't tempered their minds. Everything had clearly been prepared for them, but faced with the only true godhood, these idiots who hadn't trained their hearts had been only in too much of a hurry to avoid it. In their bafflement, they had even developed the illusion that they were being "controlled" by the hidden bones.

As Wangge Luobao saw it, this was just like placing the mind of an insect into the body of a dragon. Not only could it not experience the pleasure of soaring through the clouds and riding on the mists, it would die of fright on the spot.

Ridiculous.

This road seemed to have no tests, but actually godhood itself was the test. Only a "chosen one" with extremely firm temperament, extremely good luck, extremely high skills could receive such a blessing. How could it be easier than cultivating to become a full moon sage? Even Ancestor Tianbo, who had pocketed all the Shamans' secret arts, had failed to achieve his ambitions. He could only settle for the next best thing, be content to hold the southwest corner of the continent—

Wangge Luobao's flesh swiftly regrew from his bones. His curly hair was as thick as aquatic grass, his odd-colored irises radiant with restrained light. He was tall, peerlessly handsome, like a true sea god.

The Xiuyi had called him a mongrel and put his mother to death for engaging in private dealings with a "Miah inferior." The father whose name he didn't know had lived down to the word "inferior"; after decamping with him, he had sold him for a good price.

His odd-colored eyes and tall figure had made him a "rare product," and he had passed from hand to hand among the wealthy who liked novelty. He had been a lowly bitch to men and a hand-warming rabbit buck to women. He knew all the ways of pleasing in the world, had developed eyes that could see through people's desires, and he hoped that all people would die out.

With these abilities, he had changed overnight, become the adopted son of a Miah elder "of good moral standing and reputation," joined Lingyun's Dragon Subduing Knights.

As the Xiuyi's oppression had gone too far, the Miah had become disloyal. The Miah had set their minds on the ancestor's Way of the Heart. Wangge Luobao, with undivided loyalty to his “clansmen,” had seized an opportunity that no one in over a thousand years had grasped—everyone said that Ancestor Tianbo’s Way of the Heart had been born from the desire for the Xiuyi and Miah clans to be eternally united and of one heart, so none of the babbling idiots had been able to receive Ancestor Tianbo’s Way of the Heart. Only a schemer harboring identical hatred to what Tianbo’s had been a thousand years ago was worthy.

He had risked his life to establish a foundation, “gladly” accepted the dragon-taming chain that the clan had pressed on him, betrayed the Lingyun Mountains; he had submitted to the Heartless Lotus’s lotus seal, betrayed the Miah’s leaders; he had pushed that damn bald donkey Zhuoming beyond redemption and usurped the position of the Miah’s clan leader. Finally, he had used the Miah’s spiritual beasts and the inferior Miah, themselves hardly smarter than the spiritual beasts, to stir up events in Southern He and capture Jinping’s legendary “Tai Sui.”

What had that useless Jinping rich kid ever done to deserve what he had? There was always a crowd of people lining up to protect him, nearly making Wangge Luobao’s efforts fall short just within reach of success—fortunately, though there had been twists and turns, the outcome had been even more satisfactory than he had anticipated.

This was his reward as the person who had walked a path more tortuous than anyone else's.

Wangge Luobao wasn't in the mood to waste any more time "looking after" those Jinping ants. He turned and passed through countless reincarnation wood trees.

Before exiting the spiritual energy prohibition line, serendipitously, he ended up in Tao County—in a reincarnation wood tree in front of the Unbound Furnace.

The legendary "Sword of the South" Zhi Xiu, the Sword Slave Wu Lingxiao, and a whole crowd of "great personages" whose names could shake the world were a few steps away, yet they had absolutely no idea of his presence.

Wangge Luobao ruminatively watched them circle the reincarnation wood tree like headless flies, not understanding why Xi Ping had once again fallen out of contact.

Then his gaze fell on the Unbound Furnace—this had been the relic of the most evil of demonic gods. Fallen into the hands of the miraculous Hui Xiangjun, it had unexpectedly pried open a thread of sky in the impregnable fastness of the spiritual mountains.

“Nothing remarkable about it.” Wangge Luobao walked unperceived toward the Unbound Furnace and glanced into that cremator of sages’ corpses. He said to himself, “What am I doing looking at it?”

As soon as this thought arose, Wangge Luobao suddenly froze: yes, why would he want to look at the Unbound Furnace? There seemed to be something obscurely guiding him to it, as if his spiritual sense were warning him that he had overlooked something...

Inside the spiritual energy prohibition, a cultivator’s spiritual sense would in fact become inaccurate. Perhaps this was because Xi Ping, whom he had consumed, had “prerogative” here.

What had he overlooked?

Wangge Luobao came over to a reincarnation wood tree next to the Unbound Furnace and peeked at the faintly leaping furnace flames inside.

The next moment, the reincarnation wood tree he had taken shelter in, as if it were haunted, pushed him right into the Unbound Furnace!

It was as if the fire in the furnace had been ready for the rice to be put into the pot. As soon as the raging flames touched Wangge Luobao, they leapt up precipitously. Lin Chi, pushed away from the furnace by Wen Fei, didn't even have time to see what had gone into the pot before the flames had completely engulfed Wangge Luobao's body.

When the mechanism in the pool had been activated, Chang Jun had had no time to react. While he knew that the Xi Ping he held was an empty shell, he still did his best to throw out all the upgraded immortal tools on him so his classmate could have an "intact corpse." Then he was dragged down by the "corpse" and sank with it to the bottom of the pool. There was a blur before his eyes. He didn't know whether it was the water in the pool or tears.

He had thought that with upgraded immortal tools, they could stand up in battle against an ascended spirit, but it turned out that mortals were mortals and ants were ants. They were useless.

"Maybe Moon Plated Peak is wrong after all," Chang Jun thought, giving up on himself as he sank. "The difference between ants and masters was never a matter of techniques. We..."

Just then, an icy hand turned over and grabbed him by the shoulder.

Chang Jun breathed a mouthful of water into his lungs: Damn it, a walking corpse!

Meanwhile, Wangge Luobao finally remembered what he had overlooked: Zhuoming had once told him that the furnace flame of the Unbound Furnace was in Tai Sui's hands. Zhuoming had spouted a lot of crazy talk. Apart from wanting to steam Xuanwu, it was all about wanting to eat Tai Sui raw. He hadn't listened closely and hadn't taken it to heart.

Yes, just now, he had clearly swallowed Xi Ping's consciousness and obtained the reincarnation wood and the ancient inscriptions, but he hadn't seen that legendary Unbound Furnace furnace flame!

The consciousness he had dragged out of Xi Ping's spirit was incomplete... but that bone, the secret arts the ancestor had gotten from the vestiges of the Shamans...

He had plainly nailed the consciousness of the ungovernable way's Tai Sui to his spirit! No matter how much of his consciousness had been dispersed, no matter how far it had gone, it would have been snatched back to the main body... How could this be?!

An indolent Jinping-accented voice spoke into his ear: "Heh, can't I have two spirits?"

Impossible!

“How come?” that hateful voice said cheerfully. “I contain multitudes. Alas, Lao Wang, I don’t mind telling you, after this lesson you’ve given me, I really have started to believe in fate a little.”

Back in the South Sea, in order to fool Zhi Xiu, he had used the power sange had left behind to cut off a portion of his spirit to carry off the shard of Zhaoting. Afterward, the sword shard had sacrificed itself to protect its master, and the paperman carrying a portion of his consciousness had remained with Wei Chengxiang, kept perfectly safe by Great Wan’s most reliable half-immortal.

Wangge Luobao had used an evil art of unknown name to trap his consciousness on his spirit, repeatedly interrupted his meditation, weakened his consciousness, left him with nowhere to run—but he hadn’t expected him to have two spirits.

If what this Miah evil cultivator had said was true...

Thousands of years ago, the rare power to turn into mist had cast a life-swapping talisman, creating the undying bones, unique in this world.

Thousands of years later, the same power had dragged down the final zealot who had wanted to reach heaven in a single step.

Xi Ping had guessed that given Wangge Luobao's wickedness, once he had his consciousness, he would be certain to destroy his body while he was at it. He had meant to immediately push through a counterstrike, but those two daring half-immortals Yao Qi and Chang Jun had thrust in their oar, "turning awkwardness into cunning," and kept his body whole. So he'd had a sudden flash of inspiration. Through the consciousness that Wangge Luobao had swallowed, like the Ways of the Heart of common origin in the Sea of Stars, he had sent a "heavenly edict" to the "god-to-be" who had "accorded his temperament with the way," made him come have a look at the Unbound Furnace.

As expected, the god-to-be's heart was sufficiently sincere. Without hesitation, he had "received the grace of heaven."

A portion of Xi Ping's consciousness had been taken by Wangge Luobao into the furnace to act as "material." As a cultivator who didn't belong to the toolmaking way, he once again cooked himself in the pot, obtaining an ability like the "seventh sense," connecting to the Unbound Furnace—

"Wang-xiong, your storytelling was quite well done, nicely modulated, but the style was a little too subtle. I'm still inclined to put more trust in the stories 'decoded' by the furnace flame."

CHAPTER 244 - Conclusion (12)

The Unbound Furnace traced the origins of its “material,” quickly burning through Wangge Luobao's entire hasty life.

For a toolmaking furnace, a person's loves and hates weren't worth ‘decoding,’ no matter how heartrending they might be. Xi Ping hadn't even had a chance to take a close look before the body of Southern Shu's foremost evil cultivator and his centuries of destitute wandering turned to ashes before his eyes.

The only thing that remained of Wangge Luobao was the little bone that had come from Ancestor Tianbo.

The experiment of the greedy Shamans had turned out two incomparable masters, and the only person who knew the full story behind this was Ancestor Tianbo, who had been tormented by the established foundation pill—even Yuan Hui, despite being one of the principal parties, wasn't fully aware.

Yuan Hui had been force-fed the established foundation pill while unconscious. From his spirit bursting to the “life-swapping” taking effect, he had narrowly escaped with his life in confusion, and he had no idea what had happened.

Afterward, Ancestor Tianbo, with his glib tongue and thunderous tactics, united the Xiuyi and Miah clans, raising the banner high. He led the enraged people of ancient Shu in overthrowing the Shamanic Way, committing to the flames the living corpse army that had occupied the blessed land of Southern Shu.

He hogged the secret arts of the Shamanic Way to himself and resolutely destroyed everything, becoming the very last person in the world who knew the history of the established foundation pill.

The fire of the Unbound Furnace expanded Ancestor Tianbo's bone hundreds upon thousands of times. Through that bone, Xi Ping impatiently went in pursuit of the traces that spirit-conducting gold had left behind.

The composition of the bodies of the Shamanic Way's living corpses was very similar to that of cultivators. Their bodies also contained a large quantity of spiritual energy accumulated by a silk dragon heart, analogous to a cultivator's "essence." Once a cultivator's Way of the Heart shattered, their essence would explode; not even a master like Lin Zongyi could survive it. Then wouldn't it have been even easier for the living corpse warriors to "burst their barrels"?

The Shamanic Way had controlled the living corpse warriors for so many years. They must have had a means of destroying the living corpses, committing them safely to the earth.

If there existed a means to allow people to escape Ways of the Heart, then it had to be part of the Shamanic Way!

As soon as Xi Ping's consciousness touched that bone, there was a hum in his mind. He nearly fainted amid the excessively jumbled and complex information—

He bit down hard on the tip of his tongue and held out. Countless secret arts flashed before his eyes, all kinds of complex rites of the ancient Shamanic Way, the worship of death, incomprehensible secret spells and scriptures, the silk dragons that could keep the dead in this world, the three-day dream...

Wait, the three-day dream grass!

With a sudden flash of inspiration, Xi Ping recalled Li Queru telling him that three-day dream grass could only be grown by silk dragon hearts.

From a certain intuition, Xi Ping hung his consciousness from the three-day dream grass flashing by, and saw countless corpses hidden among the thicket of wild grass.

The whole life cycle of the three-day dream grass appeared in the Unbound Furnace's fire. He saw masked Shamans driving living corpse warriors, making the living corpses draw a spell in the altar pool. Large quantities of three-day dream grass grew from the spell. When the spell was complete, the aquatic grass spread over the whole pool and grew hairlike filaments.

The living corpses lay down on their own, and the filaments of the three-day dream grass wrapped them up, like a cocoon, and like a mother's womb.

Then the fine filaments of the three-day dream grass gently pierced the living corpses' brows, and one inscription after another broke free of the center of the living corpse warriors' brows, following the grass filaments, silently dissolving in the thicket of aquatic grass that grew ever more lush. The spiritual energy of the living corpses dissipated, their rigid limbs gradually softened, and they sank with serene looks...

Xi Ping's heart began to beat wildly: it turned out that the Shamanic Way had used three-day dream grass to eliminate living corpses, and three-day dream grass had been preserved in the South Sea Hidden Realm!

Supposing that three-day dream grass could eliminate the inscriptions in the living corpse warriors, then...

There was a light at the end of the tunnel.

Xi Ping thought that he could ask the Southern He brothers in the South Sea Hidden Realm to ship out the three-day dream grass. He would spare no expense.

He could be entirely free of the hidden bones, save many people.

Shifu, Wen Fei, Lin Chi, Pang Jian, Bai Ling...and Xi Yue, who had been forced to establish a foundation. Time could at last be turned back, and the hidden bones and ancient inscriptions would be eliminated, the Law Breaker would be realized, and the spiritual mountains, like those living corpses, would fade from the human world, serene and quiet.

He could go home, take care of his parents in their old age, keep vigil by his grandmother's coffin, make up for the fourteen years of his absence.

He could continue leading the Luwu in business, and he could travel around seeing the sights, ride the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragons from north to south, brag to people and tell them that he was General Zhi's disciple, embarrass shifu all over the world, then pick up a beauty to marry and go home.

When the thousand-year-old shackles disappeared and the Law Breaker was realized, would that human world count as “beyond the bounds”?

Then...would the person who had arranged to meet him beyond the bounds still be able to furiously scold him for being “scandalous”?

The rims of Xi Ping’s eyes burned. He lost all interest in ancient secrets.

The Unbound Furnace was connected to the thoughts of the master of the furnace flame. Large swaths of three-day dream grass leapt out of the flames, rapidly “decoding” the secret spell that eliminated living corpses. Xi Ping gobbled it up unthinkingly, carving it onto his consciousness.

Meanwhile, through the reincarnation wood he had just regained control of, he contacted Lin Chi.

“Master Lin!” Exhausting the last of his reason, Xi Ping kept himself from telling Lin Chi, who still had a Way of the Heart, the whole story. He only quickly said, “I’ve obtained a secret spell that can eliminate inscriptions using three-day dream grass. Perhaps it can be used to dispose of my hidden bones. Hurry up and take a look for me!”

A beat late, Lin Chi gave an ah and said in confusion, “But three-day dream grass won’t work...”

“It’s gone extinct, I know, but I can get some, don’t bother about that, just...”

Lin Chi didn’t understand the details. He only thought there was something wrong with his manner. “Shiyong, what are you saying? What’s wrong? Calm down.”

Xi Ping wanted to laugh. “Lin-shishu, I’m very calm...”

Then Lin Chi gently said, “Three-day dream grass is ‘netherworld grass.’ It repels the bodies of the living. It can only be plucked to use as a medicinal herb. Even if it really can eliminate inscriptions, we still can’t use it on you.”

“No,” Xi Ping retorted instinctively, “you don’t know...”

“Did you decode something inside the Unbound Furnace?” Lin Chi thought the problem was that he was unfamiliar with toolmaking furnaces, so he said, “There are histories behind the inscriptions and arrays that toolmaking furnaces decode. Look closely, don’t be rash—we’ll discuss this later, come out now. What happened earlier? General Zhi is very worried...”

Xi Ping wasn’t in the mood to listen to him. He cast his gaze back into the fire of the Unbound Furnace and found that the Unbound Furnace was plainly telling him that three-day dream grass repelled living things.

No...

Xi Ping searched desperately for another line of thought: maybe three-day dream grass itself was rather shy, but while this secret spell might not work, something else might. They had the Golden Hand, they had the most powerful medicine making master in the world. The troublesome evil cultivators and pigheaded shed skin puppets had all died off, they had time to do research, there was no rush.

But sadly, he really wasn't a person to lose his head easily. His reason remained lucid.

Xi Ping recalled that the bone the Unbound Furnace had decoded had been left behind by Ancestor Tianbo. If three-day dream grass really could eliminate a living person's Way of the Heart, he never would have allowed records of it to remain, or allowed it to go extinct only several hundred years later.

"Shiyong?" Lin Chi called to him. "Can you still hear me? Shiyong?"

For a moment, Xi Ping was alone in the Unbound Furnace, and he realized that if even the Shamanic Way, the source of all this, didn't have a means for destroying Ways of the Heart, then perhaps...there was no way.

The Unbound Furnace diligently restored all the traces held in the bone—

Because Kunlun had unexpectedly formed, Ancestor Tianbo's "road to godhood" had nearly died prematurely. He set his thoughts on Yuan Hui's hidden bones—only by obtaining the complete hidden bones could he be free of the restrictions of his Way of the Heart, find an opportunity to overturn the game board.

So in the name of "expelling demons and upholding righteousness," he had lured Yuan Hui to the Impassable Sea, and, when he encountered the heart demon, used the hidden bones that connected the two of them to tell Yuan Hui about the "life-swapping." Yuan Hui's consciousness was infested by the heart demon seed, and Ancestor Tianbo seized that opportunity, meaning to snuff out his consciousness and take the hidden bones for himself. When the two of them had halfway melded together, Yuan Hui had struggled to win back a thread of lucidity and cleaved the hidden bones apart with his own hands. He died, and his way was destroyed, while Ancestor Tianbo's consciousness was seriously injured.

This had taken place precisely at an important stage in the formation of the spiritual mountains. The Southern Sage glimpsed the truth of Ways of the Heart in the Impassable Sea and gave birth to a heart demon, and Xuanyin's Territory Map came into the world. Ancestor Tianbo, meanwhile, suffered backlash from the hidden bones. The spiritual mountains that had been born around his Way of the Heart split in two under the influence of the hidden bones and formed a South Sea Hidden Realm that he himself could not enter.

So much commotion couldn't be concealed from the people around him. Ancestor Tianbo had no choice but to obscure it under the guise of "concern over a future split between the Xiuyi and Miah clans."

So the South Sea Hidden realm prohibited Ways of the Heart, had no silk dragons, only had pools full of fake three-day dream grass—

Yes, Queru had also said that the three-day dream grass in the South Sea Hidden Realm did not match the historical record. Like ordinary spiritual plants, it could be activated with green ore powder.

Because that wasn't really three-day dream grass, only Yuan Hui's secret and unrealizable wish on the point of death.

The Unbound Furnace's flames rose slightly, cleanly digesting Ancestor Tianbo's Way of the Heart.

Wangge Luobao had only been an ascended spirit, but the origin of his Way of the Heart was too great. The spiritual energy prohibition line had originally been locked in a stalemate with the hidden bones at the Lingyun Mountain Range, which was the extreme end of the western continent, but when that Way of the Heart melted away, the spiritual energy prohibition line suddenly took a great stride forward.

Southern Shu's Three Islands and the South Sea Hidden Realm all entered in the spiritual energy prohibition.

At this point, there was nowhere left for the hidden bones to rest on the whole southern continent.

It wasn't only cultivators—even mortals felt a certain unspeakable sense of wonder. The birds and beasts that had been restless because the ancient inscriptions had entered the world became peculiarly calm. The ant colonies returned to their nests. The strange-looking dense clouds dispersed, revealing clear sky. On Shu's Three Islands, a green-eyed Miah child cried while working up his nerve to whistle. A shaking shepherd's song swept out. A sturdy sable sheep appeared in answer and chased away the flesh-eating spiritual beasts.

In the courtyard of Jinping's Yongning Marquis Manor, in the interests of safety, Zhi Xiu had gotten rid of the reincarnation wood using his own accompanying plant. Now fresh buds once again grew on the dead tree. The Marquis and the little cat stood side by side under the tree, listening to distant steam whistles coming from the Grand Canal.

The dust of the whole world was settling, and some people had come to the end of the road.

Finally, leaving aside Kunlun, all the spiritual mountains on the southern continent had fallen within the scope of the spiritual energy prohibition. The border of the Law Breaker surged over the Hong River and swept across the Tianze River, narrowly stopping at the line of Beijue and Kunlun—the place where the ancient inscriptions had once formed.

At the utterly cold Beijue Mountain Pass, the spiritual energy prohibition line finally ran out of momentum, unable to take another step forward. The world's most ancient spiritual mountains had been entirely occupied by the hidden bones.

The Kunlun Mountains collapsed, rumbling. The spiritual stones within the mountains had been carried away by the hidden bones, and the sword cultivators had turned into one ice sculpture after another. The Wanshuang Sword suddenly cracked and began to tremble as if lamenting.

There was no more barrier against the freezing wind of the utter north. It blew right into the human world. The Law Breaker could stop spiritual energy, but it couldn't stop the freezing wind. The great natural disaster of a thousand years earlier was being repeated. This time, there was no Sword Ancestor to execute the wishes of the people.

Xi Ping's consciousness left the Unbound Furnace.

Everyone saw him emerge from a half-dead reincarnation wood tree as if he had lost his soul, with menacing bloodstains still at the center of his brow. Wangge Luobao had stuck him full of holes earlier, and he still couldn't move very nimbly. He stumbled and went to his knees. A familiar light grey robe appeared in his field of vision... Shifu had been swapping between just a few robes for centuries.

"Shifu..." Xi Ping had narrowly escaped with his life from the clutches of the great evil cultivator. He was completely disheartened, with thousands of words in his mind, but all he said was, "I'm fine, just wishing you an early happy new year."

CHAPTER 245 - Conclusion (13)

“Tai Sui!”

“Shiyong, what’s the...”

Doctor Wen said, “Make...way...”

The shrill sound of a horse’s whinny interrupted the chaos of human voices.

A Luwu from the Tao World Record came hurrying over. He staggered as he dismounted his horse, bringing the latest news from Northern Li: “The freezing north wind has reached Yanning!”

Lin Chi turned pale. “So fast?!”

Before Xi Ping had come out of the tree, they had just received word of a change in the Kunlun Mountains.

It was over three hundred li from Kunlun to Northern Li’s capital Yanning, and the utterly freezing wind from the northern plains had crossed the distance in the blink of an eye. Without the Sword Ancestor to guard the northern border, would the wind from the utter north freeze all the five nations?

Wen Fei glanced at the Unbound Furnace as if willing to try anything in desperation. Wu Lingxiao, who could move only half her body, on hearing these words pushed aside the Luwu supporting her.

“Fine, then I’ll be firewood. This wretched place has turned me into a cripple. Just as well. My shizun spent his whole life guarding the Beijue Mountains. I can see this trifle through to the end for him.” Her gaze swept coldly over Wanshuang, which she would never again take up. “I only regret that I never got the chance to fight against Zhaoting.”

“There’s nothing to regret. Even without the spiritual energy prohibition, I would not have fought you face-to-face. Zhaoting is inferior.” Zhi Xiu verbally admitted defeat without any impediment, then single-handedly picked up his disciple, who was full of bloody holes. “All the Kunlun Mountains’ spiritual energy and spiritual stones have been carried off already. There’s no sense in pushing the spiritual energy prohibition further north. There’s no lack of kindling in the furnace—everyone, let me say a few words.”

General Zhi’s tone was even, perfectly steady. As ever, it seemed as if he would never lose his temper. Xi Ping’s blank gaze fell on him, and he wondered whether Shifu already knows the truth about Ways of the Heart was a mistaken impression on his part.

Then he heard Zhi Xiu say, “The spiritual energy prohibition line has already forced the hidden bones out of the southern continent. They truly have no spiritual energy to use. Knowing full well that Kunlun is Northern Li’s protective screen, they still drained the spiritual mountains dry. This isn’t necessarily a bad thing—Shiyong?”

Xi Ping responded numbly: “The cold wind of Beiyuan can freeze a cultivator’s essence. The hidden bones’ cultivation level is only late stage ascended spirit. Once they’ve knocked over Kunlun, it will be hard for their heap of reincarnation wood to survive. These are the dying struggles of a trapped animal. Moreover, as soon as the utterly freezing wind comes down from the northern border, those shit-stirring evil cultivators won’t dare to go outside the spiritual energy prohibition line to hold it back again. But, shifu...”

It wasn’t the hidden bones that had driven people to the end of the road.

Zhi Xiu waved a hand, interrupting him again. “Inside the spiritual energy prohibition now, can reincarnation wood serve as a transport array?”

“As long as the person at the other end spills blood on reincarnation wood and lets me pull their consciousness into the Law Breaker.”

Zhi Xiu turned to Wu Lingxiao. “There are flying goose machines in Tao County. Please compose a letter to send to Northern Li to combine the Night Revenants and the other remaining cultivators within the borders. If I recall correctly, areas inhabited by northerners all have arrays and immortal tools to protect against wind and cold, yes?”

“They do have them,” Wu Lingxiao said, nodding, “but hasn’t spiritual energy been prohibited? What can those useless things do?”

“We still have spirit-conducting gold,” Zhi Xiu said. “Lin-shixiong, you go with Senior Wu, see whether you can use spirit-conducting gold to activate some arrays, give people some latitude to temporarily shelter and warm themselves.

“Publish this matter urgently, have the people of all nations prepare. If there are any changes, the Tao World Record will print the information at once.” Zhi Xiu turned to Wen Fei. “Fenghan, deal with something for me. When the various forces recover their senses, they’ll all request reincarnation wood for the sake of convenience. Have Heaven’s Design Pavilion and the Latent Cultivation Temple help you draft up regulations, as quickly as possible. This is precisely our opportunity to get this chaos under control. Otherwise, all the nations are like scattered sand. Even if we resolve the danger of the mountains collapsing, it will still be hard to calm things.

“While the wind is fast, the temperature needs time to drop. The northern continent is regularly cold and frozen, and everyone has a means for handling an emergency. They won’t freeze to death at once. They ought to be able to hold out for a few days. Contact the Kaiming Department for me, have them prepare to evacuate everyone to the south—Bai Ling can handle the organization.”

“General Zhi,” a Luwu couldn’t resist saying, “even if all the emergency immortal tools and arrays on the northern continent can be activated, without the Kunlun Mountains, there will still be nothing to block the freezing wind from Beiyuan—unless the Sword Ancestor manifests, it will be only a matter of time before the southern continent freezes as well. This...”

Softly but with absolute confidence, Zhi Xiu said, “That won’t happen.”

The Luwu who had asked the question stared.

“When the Sword Ancestor raised Wanshuang to block the wind from the utter north, he had not yet become a full moon sage,” Zhi Xiu said. “The world’s shed skins haven’t all died out yet. Go, get on with it.”

The Sword that Mended the Heavens of a thousand years earlier had cracked, but the one of a thousand years later was still in the hands of the new sword god.

Of the figure of Kunlun's founder, the Sword Ancestor, with Wanshuang in his grasp, only scant words remained in the history books. No one had seen him...but that Luwu suddenly thought that if the Sword Ancestor were here now, he would probably be willing to have a drink with Zhaoting.

He leapt onto his horse, turned, and left.

In a few words, Zhi Xiu had sent everyone running around. At last, only Xi Ping remained beside him.

Xi Ping was a monkey to begin with. He got into everything. And what was more, inside the spiritual energy prohibition, the reincarnation wood, which could connect to the Law Breaker's space, was the sole "spiritual item." Under ordinary circumstances, he would have been hopping by now, but instead he was off to the side, wordlessly lost in thought while things happened around him.

Only when everyone in the vicinity had left did Xi Ping's eyes move. The toppled reincarnation wood trees around them stood up once more and circled around, making a place where no one would disturb them. "Shifu, I..."

"Don't fret," Zhi Xiu said. "You're agitated now. Go get out your qin."

Xi Ping was briefly silent. With a thought, he reached out across space and brought out the Tai Sui Qin, which had been sealed in the trunk of a reincarnation wood tree.

This qin had been born of Xi Ping's bones. At the start it had been invisible and formless, its strings intermittently sounding, so no one could make anything of it, as confused and undetermined as its master.

Immediately upon entering the world, it had met the great tribulation of the Impassable Sea, run right up against the great demon of the East Sea, been sealed away by the sages, remained mute for five years, until it had recorded all the sad cries of the human world.

But while the Law Breaker had dredged Xi Ping's true body up from the abyss, it had also trapped the qin inside the spiritual energy prohibition. For eight years, it had hidden alone in the gnarled tree in the yard of the house in the countryside, with only a replica made by the Discard the False and Keep the True book to accompany its master. When one broke, another could be made, in a neverending cycle.

It was like its master, constantly struggling, constantly being imprisoned, but while it was located beyond the reach of the light of day, its sound could still raise countless storms.

Zhi Xiu reached out and plucked a few notes on the Tai Sui Qin, tunelessly, then handed the qin over to Xi Ping. “I studied a bit when I was little, but it seems I’ve given it all back to my teacher. Come here, play something for shifu.”

Xi Ping didn’t move.

He had started messing around with a qin as soon as he could use chopsticks properly. He could reproduce a large majority of all the tunes he had ever heard. But now, when he accepted the qin, the only thing that came to mind was that bleak and desolate Soul Calling Melody.

“What would you like to hear?”

Zhi Xiu considered it. He slouched against the Unbound Furnace. “The one that moved the Lingyang River—the one that won you the camellia crown of the Queen of Flowers.”

“I said that was only a rumor.” Xi Ping forced a laugh. “I was cheering on a friend. With your disciple’s celestial countenance, would there be any need to waste effort singing and dancing to win Queen of Flowers? I could just stand there, and anyone who didn’t acknowledge me as a beauty surpassing all the rest would have to be blind.”

Zhi Xiu: "..."

Xi Ping rolled up his sleeves and pressed his fingers to the qin strings. For a long moment, they didn't stir. Finally, he sighed. "Shifu, I can't remember the tune. Can you make do if I switch to one about hastening home for an elder's funeral? Weddings and funerals are both happy occasions, anyway."

"Get out of here," Zhi Xiu scolded jokingly. His gaze passed over the Xia River, looking at Great Wan's Yuzhou on the opposite bank. With service suspended, the bridge of the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon was cheerless and deserted. Following the tracks, the tall clock tower was visible at a glance.

Suddenly, apropos of nothing, he said, "When I was little, there weren't so many strange cars and ships. It took a day's riding even to take an outing to the southern outskirts. The furthest place I ever went was Yuzhou, sending my a-jie off to get married."

"Oh?"

"My brother-in-law was the son of an old family friend. Their engagement had been fixed since the two of them were little. It was thought originally that this was someone we knew inside and out, but unexpectedly, that old friend was transferred to Yuzhou, and his whole family moved here... All the adults said we might have a hard time seeing her in the future, and indeed, for over thirty years after, there were only rare letters.”

Wiping his vital qin, Xi Ping listened quietly, not interrupting.

Mortal carriages were slow, cherished memories were long, and lifespans were short. Everything came suddenly as the dew. What was unusual about separations in life or partings by death?

“But I was still young then, I didn’t understand these things. I only thought that the scenery in Yuzhou was very different from Jinping. Everything was fresh. My sister was always a madwoman. She let me pick water chestnuts and catch frogs with the local children, and even had the lousy idea of having me keep one in da-ge’s teapot. Then, at the appointed auspicious hour, she was married, and I was a page at the wedding, and even lost my first tooth when it got stuck in a Yuzhou caramel.” Zhi Xiu turned to Xi Ping. “Have you ever eaten Yuzhou caramel?”

Seeing Xi Ping shake his head, as if struck with sudden inspiration, he patted himself down and unexpectedly really did come up with a few copper coins. “Money for the New Year, go to the opposite bank and buy a bag, then come back.”

“Thank you, shifu,” Xi Ping said, sighing. “You’re so generous.”

He went back and forth along both banks of the Xia River by means of the reincarnation wood. He put the coins in front of a peddler’s window and used a tree branch to snag a bag of candy and bring it back.

Yuzhou’s tastes were similar to the Chu. When they put the caramels in their mouths, teacher and disciple’s expressions turned dismal simultaneously.

“Still the same taste,” said Zhi Xiu. “*Hss...*no better than the rattan pepper sunflower seeds.”

“You really lost that tooth for nothing,” said Xi Ping.

The two of them spoke almost at once, and at once each was interrupted by the other.

Xi Ping was silent for a long time, then finally recovered from his earlier numbness. With his head in his hand, he laughed bitterly.

“I spent most of a month in Yuzhou, enjoying myself to the full, and only right before leaving did I find out that a-jie wasn’t going back with us. I was heartbroken. I jumped out of the carriage and ran back to find her. When da-ge sent someone to grab me, I stayed in her carriage and wouldn't leave, crying so hard I nearly choked." Zhi Xiu pushed the bitter Yuzhou caramel into his left cheek. "Do you know what my sister said to me then?"

Xi Ping's teeth were glued together by the caramel. Indistinctly, he answered, "What?"

"She said, Without partings, there are no cherished memories. No one can enjoy themselves to the full at a banquet that never ends." Zhi Xiu raised his eyes and calmly looked at Xi Ping. "I have no regrets about entering the Way, but when I think about it now, had I died of illness at thirty, I may have had as much of my fill of joy as now. You are the only one in the world without a Way of the Heart. Shiyong, you've been keeping it in for a very long time, haven't you? In fact, when a person establishes a foundation, it's no different from dying, right?"

Xi Ping was taken unawares. With a crunch, he bit through the piece of candy.

"Do not worry, my Way of the Heart has not broken." As Zhi Xiu spoke, he opened his hand. In his palm was a snow shuffler seed. "Heretical ways' are always a little sturdier. What did you see in the Unbound Furnace? Let's go to the Law Breaker and you can show me."

Xi Ping hesitated for a long moment, then took Zhi Xiu's consciousness into the Law Breaker's space. He had meant to carefully gloss over what he had seen in the Unbound Furnace, but unexpectedly, perhaps because these feelings knotted in his heart had been oppressing him for too long, once he started, there was no stopping—

Xi Ping quickly restrained his consciousness, wanting to push shifu's consciousness out, but Zhi Xiu held his shoulder down with Zhaoting. The sword cultivator's hand as he held his sword was steady as Mount Tai.

Even inside the spiritual energy prohibition, a shed skin consciousness was far faster than anything else. In a single glance, Zhi Xiu had seen the whole sequence.

“Three-day dream grass.” Xi Ping was watching for shifu's reaction in terror, but Zhi Xiu laughed. “I see.

“These second-hand accompanying plants.” Zhi Xiu gave him a smack with Zhaoting and sighed. “Didn't you notice that when Yuan Hui died, his essence didn't explode?”

CHAPTER 246 - Conclusion (14)

“Send General Zhi to Northern...” When Bai Ling received word, he was stupefied. “Wait, you’re saying he wants to go where? Does the Viscount know?!”

Then he realized that the Luwu passing along the message was using reincarnation wood to speak to him, and Xi Ping, in the reincarnation wood, had said nothing.

“Don’t get excited, Wenchang-xiong.” Bai Ling reached out to hold down Pang Jian, who had jumped out of his chair, and said to the Luwu conveying the information through the reincarnation wood, “Pass on to General Zhi...

“General Zhi is Great Wan’s stabilizing force. The Kaiming Department is willing to cooperate with all of General Zhi’s dispatches.” Bai Ling mentally arranged his wording in a hurry. One had to honor heaven, earth, one’s sovereign, one’s parents, and one’s teacher—after all, as a junior, there were some things the Viscount couldn’t very well say, so he would have to be the one to give counsel. “But there are thousands of people in the Kaiming and the Luwu...”

Pang Jian cut in irately: “And Heaven’s Design Pavilion hasn’t died out yet!”

“And there are the millions of people of Wan. Since ancient times, it has been a place of culture, a nation of civilization, but while its customs are gentle, its people have pride.” As always, Bai Ling’s voice was restrained and chilly. He spoke with emphasis. “Even if a human sacrifice will create a heroic legend, how can we stand for it?”

How could the Viscount stand for it?

“Please reconsider, General Zhi!”

In the reincarnation wood, the Luwu transmitting the message didn’t speak. A very mild voice responded: “Thank you.”

It was Zhi Xiu.

Bai Ling froze up slightly, then said, “Unless you can imitate the Sword Ancestor and raise the Kunlun Mountains again like a thousand years before... But, General Zhi, the times have changed. With how much of the people’s resentment the spiritual mountains have amassed to this day, especially in Northern Li, would they be willing to raise another range of spiritual mountains?”

“No,” Zhi Xiu flatly interrupted him, “no new spiritual mountains will rise. You’re right, young Mr. Bai, the times have changed. Do not worry, I am only going to scout a trail, verify a hypothesis.”

Bai Ling thought that there was a peculiar joy in his tone and was just about to follow up when he received a private message from Xi Ping sent to him alone.

“Make the preparations,” said Xi Ping, “I’m here.”

Bai Ling: “...”

You’re the one I’m worried about!

For some reason, Bai Ling suddenly remembered how, when he had just reached the human world and was hiding in a stack of paper, he had first seen Xi Ping—he had just been at the most insufferable age. This human child who had grown up in a honey jar—seeing him, the half-demon who had neither father nor mother felt deep envy and jealousy, so he had always disliked that young master cousin. He’d just never said anything about it in front of his lord.

But at some point, he had begun to see that person through Zhou Ying’s eyes, so in Zhou Ying’s place, he felt so choked that his chest ached.

Once Xi Ping had spoken, there was no one who could bar the way to Zhaoting. The Luwu made arrangements with unmatched swiftness. For the first time, Zhi Xiu took a long distance trip in a car.

Northern Li had lost its inner sect, and the members of the outer sect scattered throughout the continent were at a loss, and their manpower was insufficient. The Luwu had brought in a troop of soldiers from Hongyin on the Wan-Li border.

Mortals were repairing arrays!

And succeeding!

While Northern Li was conservative, it was also valiant. The unyielding men and sturdy women who had grown up buffeted by the northwest wind, seeing the situation, ran after the Hongyin troops in rapid succession.

A crowd was the hardest thing in the world to fathom. Sometimes, a crowd would slip collectively into an abyss from unbelievable stupidity, like one hollow, apathetic puppet after another, using the same witless brain; and sometimes a crowd would be like a spark in a gold-smelting furnace, burning with incredible light, unstoppable once it got started.

The knowledge behind arrays and spirit-conducting gold, profound or mysterious, was disenchanted. All kinds of manuals passed through countless hands and were copied. When Zhi Xiu crossed the border into Northern Li, he saw arrays modified with spirit-conducting gold everywhere, spread over the northern continent, golden light glowing like a miracle.

The descendants of the Li people who in their confusion and helplessness had transmitted inscriptions and entrusted their families and their safety to a god had now taken up tools and were choosing to be gods themselves.

Where in the past the ancient inscriptions had been carved, now there were all kinds of arrays to protect against cold. Though they were all low-level arrays—one was useless, and two were also useless—tens of thousands of them had firmly blocked out the bitter cold of the utter north as it came south.

Three days later, Zhi Xiu reached the northern border of the spiritual energy prohibition.

Xi Ping had come with him—he hadn't passed through reincarnation wood; the reincarnation wood trees here had all frozen to death. If not for the effects of a large quantity of warming arrays, Xi Ping suspected that he could only have stuck it out for a few breaths.

Neither of them spoke. The wind was too strong. Even if one spoke, it wouldn't reach the other's ears.

Because of the hidden bones, Xi Ping still didn't dare to leave the spiritual energy prohibition at will. He only stood by the spiritual energy prohibition line, holding up an upgraded immortal tool that protected against the wind.

Zhi Xiu gave Xi Ping a look, and with somewhat stiffened fingers made a don't be scared gesture at him: As we agreed.

Xi Ping didn't move, as if he had already frozen solid. The milky white light in his hand spilled onto the blank and boundless snow as he watched Zhi Xiu step out of the spiritual energy prohibition.

Zhaoting, which had been as quiet as mundane iron, let out a clear and melodious ringing. Spiritual light spread from it. Next, countless upright snow-white accompanying plants rose steeply from the ground, amid the vast wind and snow forming an expanse, forming a forest, spreading as far as the eye could see.

Zhaoting, leaving its sheath, stirred the surrounding spiritual energy. Amid the cluster of accompanying plants, it replicated the secret spell that the living corpse warriors had drawn amid the thicket of three-day dream grass

Across the spiritual energy prohibition line, Xi Ping sensed something. He raised his head laboriously, feeling even the violent icy wind stagnate.

When Yuan Hui had hewn apart the hidden bones, it had been equivalent to other cultivators destroying their own Ways of the Heart. His corpse ought to have exploded into dust. But instead he had lain peacefully in the depths of Impassable Sea, amid the forest of reincarnation wood, just like the living corpse warriors who had gone to rest in the three-day dream grass.

When Zhi Xiu had pointed this out in the Law Breaker, Xi Ping had immediately realized something.

Reincarnation wood, three-day dream grass...

“Three-day dream grass repels living things, because it is the resting place of the living corpses,” Zhi Xiu had said. “Have you considered that three-day dream grass may have been the ‘accompanying plant’ of the living corpse warriors?”

“Shifu, why are accompanying plants actually born? Wangge Luobao didn’t explain it clearly...”

“Because he didn’t know either. That gentleman from Southern Shu, to judge from his conduct, would not have had an accompanying plant even if he had lived to become a shed skin. Since ancient times, people have thought that when a person who does not accord with the Great Way drags their existence out to the point of becoming a shed skin, they will give birth to an accompanying plant, but actually that isn’t entirely right—otherwise, while I may be untalented, I suppose I still don’t count as more ‘evil’ than Lingyun’s Tianbo.”

“Then...what is it?”

“It is a resting place. Like the leaves falling in autumn, the summer flowers becoming the next year’s mud—no one and nothing can last forever. In the end, all will change from one thing to another, in an endless cycle. An ascended spirit can put inquiries to heaven and earth, ask questions until heaven and earth have nothing left to say to them, and then another shed skin who ‘accords with the Way and becomes heaven’ will appear in the world. I was willful and unfilial, hopelessly pigheaded, never willing to come to the ‘Way,’ so at the shed skin pass, I was interrogated for eight years—become a god and sage, or be a common fool. Gods do not fail. They last as long as heaven and earth last. But a common fool is forever himself and in the end has a resting place. Accompanying plants are ‘resting places’ for us living corpses. It isn’t only evil cultivators who have them. It is those who know that ‘I’ and ‘my Way of the Heart’ are perhaps not the same.”

The four ancient demonic gods, Hui Xiangjun who had carelessly cast the Eternal Spring Brocade’s Way of the Heart into an old furnace, Qiu Sha who had lived all her life for a single person, Zhuoming who had stored up and played with Ways of the Heart like marbles... Some were venerable, some were despicable, some were detestable, some were hard to describe, but from birth to death, they had all been themselves.

When he felt his essence flow out of him like water, Zhi Xiu suddenly thought that he had just forgotten to say something important to his little disciple.

Xi Shiyong was the wisest person he had ever met in his life.

Though his spiritual sense was average, his constitution just adequate, his heart unsettled and his mind unfocused, and he was the foremost shirker of work and responsibility...Zhi Xiu would forever remember what he had said when he hesitated, unwilling to become a disciple of Flying Jade Peak—

Everyone takes their “Way” and uses it to make inquiries of heaven and earth. If I were heaven and earth, I’d be sick of it.

Then, Zhi Xiu's spirit trembled, and a certain indescribable calm surged up. His Way of the Heart was melting away along with his essence.

It wasn't like Lin Zongyi, a resolute destruction, and it wasn't like Xuanwu and the others, absorbed by force into the Unbound Furnace. When his Way of the Heart quietly flowed out, it was like eating a fruit and burying its pit in the earth.

To an observer, his body was instantly covered with frost and snow, as if he had been frozen solid.

“Shifu!” As if he could take no more, Xi Ping stepped over the spiritual energy prohibition line. His voice was carried away by the wild wind.

As spiritual energy once again began to flow through his limbs, the hidden bones, on their last gasp outside the spiritual energy prohibition, immediately fixed on him. This time, the hidden bones had obtained all the spiritual energy of the Kunlun Mountains. They threw themselves at Xi Ping with a force to topple mountains and overturn seas!

Just then, the snow shuffler forest suddenly moved on its own, rapidly growing and expanding. The frost and snow on the canopies all fell to the ground, nearly burying Xi Ping.

The secret spell on the snow shuffler was flickering rapidly. A crack that sounded like a wail came to Xi Ping's ears. Next, spiritual energy thousands of times fiercer than Zhi Xiu's shed skin essence poured into the snow shuffler forest.

This could only be the spiritual energy of an entire range of spiritual mountains. The snow shufflers, serving in place of three-day dream grass, had also melted away the hidden bones charging toward Xi Ping!

But Xi Ping didn't pause for a moment. As if he was completely unsurprised, he chose his timing precisely, flew a sword upward, grabbed hold of Zhi Xiu, and retreated back inside the spiritual energy prohibition without a look back, already casting a handful of warming talismans on Zhi Xiu, his hands moving with utmost speed. Then, not pausing in his steps, he charged into a steam carriage modified with spirit-conducting gold and raced south wildly.

“Shifu, shifu, we did it! Accompanying plants really can substitute for three-day dream grass, they can eliminate Ways of the Heart...”

There was no sound from Zhi Xiu. He had entered the spiritual energy prohibition, but the secret spell of “going rest” was still slowly dissolving his essence and Way of the Heart. Xi Ping could feel it.

He didn't dare to look in the rearview mirror. "Shifu! What I did back there, I didn't talk it over with you, I was wrong, you should flog me, shifu..."

Xi Ping's vision blurred, and the modified upgraded car slammed into a big rock. The car leapt up several chi when it hit the boulder and screeched as it scraped a long mark into the ground. Zhi Xiu's icy, stiff body bumped against Xi Ping, just as if he really were flogging him in response to his words.

Xi Ping raised his hand. Over and over, he didn't dare to grasp that stiff sleeve. Outside the car window was a vast sea of snow, the wild wind sobbing. Ever so slowly, he bent down—

And heard a weak voice say: "...What's wrong with you, you unfilial fiend? You wouldn't play some happy tunes when I asked, but you're so proactive when it comes to wailing for the dead?"

CHAPTER 247 - Conclusion (Final)

The next year—it was no longer called by the old era name; when the hidden bones had swallowed Kunlun, Zhou Huan had unfortunately been impacted, dying in the torrent of wind and snow, without time to issue an edict abdicating the throne. But the teenage crown prince, who had remained in Yanning City, was perceptive. He dutifully wrote a letter back to his country, indicating that he had no talents and no virtues and could not ascend the throne. He would leave everything up to the immortal to decide.

Zhi Xiu took him at his word. He decided to change the era name to “Kaiming,” letting the Kaiming Department and Heaven’s Design Pavilion respectively continue to act for him in all affairs of government and defense, with an annual examination to select talented individuals, the subjects and system in the course of slow progressive fluctuation. Zhi Xiu handled matters in much the same way he behaved, without haste.

The secret spell of the Shamanic Way and the accompanying plant had sent ashes to ashes and dust to dust, laying the living corpses to rest in the earth and fully dispelling the sword god’s essence and Way of the Heart, leaving them at the northern extremity of the continent. All that remained to him was his sword. He was no longer a god, having returned to the condition of a half-immortal...like the Latent Cultivation Temple’s Su Zhun.

Although inside the spiritual energy prohibition, there wasn't much difference between half-immortals and shed skins. They all had to take cars or walk, anyway. The only difference was that the minor ailment he'd had in his youth of being given to coughing when the seasons changed had come back, and the extreme cold seemed to have damaged his joints, so he was always a little uncomfortable on rainy days.

But without discomfort, you couldn't appreciate how pleasant it was to be at ease. He himself thought this was pretty good.

In the second year of Southern Wan's Kaiming Era, in the spring, the baby was born in the South Sea Hidden Realm, a girl, with a voice like a large bell as soon as she emerged. She was born with thick hair and would certainly be strong-featured in the future. In two hundred years, she was the first normal child born among the Turmoilers.

As everyone had previously arranged, Li Manlong gave her the name "Hope."

Hope that with the veins of the earth repaired, the Southern He Peninsula would once again be full of spiritual energy; hope that the drifting exiles would be able to return to their native soil, even if it might take decades.

He wouldn't last that long, but by the time little Hope had become old Hope, they would be able to go home.

Northern Li's tens of thousands of arrays and the towering snow shuffler... no—for public purposes, official documents called it the “moonlight frost” forest—the towering moonlight frost forest there blocked the utterly freezing wind.

The hidden bones seemed to have vanished. Zhi Xiu said that they had only themselves to blame; they had frozen in the land of utter cold.

There were some people with a special bearing natural to them that made others believe what they said. He successfully covered up the secrets of the Shamanic Way's secret spell and the vanished Way of the Heart and essence.

With the crisis resolved, troublemaking profiteers got ready to act up again. The Xiuyi and Miah clans were about to have another falling out; Yu Chang used his numerical advantage to seize the Sanyue Mountains, and the nation of Chu entered the era of Are those princes and nobles, those generals and ministers born any better than us?

Northern Li recovered after nearly freezing solid and prepared to repay kindness with betrayal; some powerful officials in Yanning got the idea of attacking the southern continent to demand the annexed territory of the Southern He Peninsula. They were cut down at one stroke by Wu Lingxiao—Wu Lingxiao, with Lin Chi's skillful modifications, had swapped many of her meridians and a great deal of bone jade for spirit-conducting gold and could finally move freely, like a human.

But these were all minor problems. After all, inside the spiritual energy prohibition, reincarnation wood was everywhere, and it couldn't be wiped out if you couldn't use spiritual energy. All reincarnation wood trees were Xi Ping's spies, and he had something on everyone. Moreover, during the emergency, practically everyone had spilled their blood on the reincarnation wood, and who knew what that "Tai Sui" would use it for? Because of this, Xi Ping's word still had weight.

Even Yu Chang was forced to hold his nose and once again indicate that he wanted to work with Tai Sui.

Tai Sui was unexpectedly accommodating. He not only admitted him with pleasure, he even seemed to find his conscience; he returned the Chief Offering's vital weapon, and had only one request: that Yu Chang not leave the spiritual energy prohibition.

The Unbound Furnace would one day burn out. The spiritual energy prohibition was constantly shrinking, some dozens of li per year.

Hearing his unreasonable request, Yu Chang said to himself that of course it had been too good to be true; how could Tai Sui find his conscience? That asshole had no conscience. So he had to go out and have a look around.

So Yu Chang spent three years becoming the new master of Dongheng. When the domestic situation had been stabilized, he impatiently packed his bags and took a ship outside of the spiritual energy prohibition to the south...and was dumbfounded.

Yu Chang found that after spending three years in that cursed spiritual energy prohibition, his cultivation level had fallen from middle stage ascended spirit back to established foundation—a major boundary!

Yu Chang nearly broke down. He cast aside the nation and resolved to live as a savage on a desert island. But he soon found that even outside the spiritual energy prohibition, his essence was constantly draining away. He tried all the means he knew of and finally lost hope.

The great turmoil created by the hidden bones had broken something in the mortal world. He couldn't accumulate spiritual energy, and his Way of the Heart was constantly dissolving.

After returning in dejection to Dongheng, Yu Chang gave no outward signs—no one could know of this. Since he had the initiative, he had to prepare in advance. Therefore he offered Xuanyin a sky-high price to purchase a batch of spirit-conducting gold.

Xi Ping said, “Sell it to him. That’s my brother who’s shared in mortal peril with me. Even if we give it to no one else, we have to give it to him!”

So Southern Wan cleaned out all the spirit-conducting gold gathering dust in its warehouses and gave it to Yu Chang at a high price. Yu Chang left feeling very pleased, ready to throw all his forces into producing a heap of upgraded protective appliances.

The next month, Moon Plated Peak announced an upgrade to spirit-conducting gold. The new version of spirit-conducting gold could be used by ordinary people; it was cheap, and its output greatly increased. Yu Chang immediately got a headache. Never mind that this later became a much-told tale.

Xi Ping, having tricked him down to threadbare underwear, ran back to the Xuanyin Mountains through the night to tell Zhi Xiu the results of his experiment with the great fool Yu Chang—the Ways of the Heart of the world’s cultivators were indeed silently dissolving.

There was no need to go to the trouble they had taken dealing with the hidden bones. Inside the spiritual energy prohibition, with everyone having spilled blood on reincarnation wood, the Shamanic Way's hidden spells carved on reincarnation wood trees were like cluster after cluster of three-day dream grass, working day and night to dissolve every Way of the Heart in the world.

And no one knew about it. Thanks to Ancestor Tianbo, the Shamanic Way's secret spells had died out long ago, anyway.

But for some reason, when Zhi Xiu had heard this, he didn't look happy. He only gave the "heartless" Xi Ping a somewhat worried look and suddenly said, "Shiyong, I'm in charge of the Xuanyin Mountains, and I don't hold with so many restrictions and taboos. You...could find a companion and get married. You don't have to restrict yourself based on family background and history, as long as it's not someone too preposterous..."

Xi Ping choked on a mouthful of wine. "*Cough-cough-cough...*huh?"

Zhi Xiu said, "Aren't you on good terms with Miss Zhao? And she's a classmate and friend..."

"We won't be friends for much longer!" Xi Ping waved a hand. "As soon as she writes five toilet bulletin articles scolding me this year, I'm breaking off all ties with her...and she's already written four!"

"Miss Wei..."

Xi Ping turned pale with fright. "Unacceptable, there's a generation gap!"

"Then..."

"Shizun, have you been possessed by my mother's second cousin's wife?" Xi Ping made off with two jars of his homemade wine and hugged them to settle his nerves. "It's impossible. But the venerable old lady does send me a gold bar in a red envelope every year. Why don't you learn something from her? Hey, hey, hey, I'm scrambling, I'm scrambling."

Then, in a whirl of bustle and disarray, the fourth year of the Kaiming Era came.

It was the last month of the year.

The Yongning Marquis Manor's Madam Cui stood abruptly, felt dizzy, and fell, dying painlessly. And she was nearly eighty; it was a happy death.

Half a month later, when the first snow broke the branches of the reincarnation wood tree in the garden with its weight, the page went as usual first thing in the morning to get the Marquis out of bed to do shadowboxing exercises, but he couldn't get him up.

Xi Ping, having seen off his parents, cleaned up the house, lived there alone for the better part of half a year, then left Haozhong to take care of it while he returned to the Xuanyin Mountains.

He no longer had a home in Dangui Lane.

In the sixth year of the Kaiming Era, the previous General Commander of Heaven's Design Pavilion and steward of the Latent Cultivation Temple Su Zhun declined, passing away on the praying mat in his meditation chamber. Luo Qingshi became the new steward.

Xuanyin's inner sect no longer accepted new disciples. The Latent Cultivation Temple became the place where the Kaiming Department and Heaven's Design Pavilion advanced their cultivation, a gathering of geniuses and talents. Luo Qingshi was no longer forced to build a wall with muck. He relaxed and grew a handspan.

In the seventh year of the Kaiming Era, the spiritual energy prohibition retreated over a hundred li, and the cultivators at last discovered a problem: a small group of people who had gone exploring outside the spiritual energy prohibition, and some who hadn't gone, began to show early signs of decline. The cultivation world panicked.

For a time, all kinds of explanations seethed and bubbled. Despairing cultivators tried one unbelievable method after another in close succession, trying to hold onto their dissolving Ways of the Heart. They worked at it for a full twenty years—the spiritual energy prohibition was receding faster and faster. The utter north no longer seemed so cold. It wasn't only the Ways of the Heart dissolving, it was also the spiritual mountains, with Lancang and Xuanyin taking the lead, having nearly halfway dissolved; and even the Sanyue Mountains shrank several zhang at a speed visible to the naked eye.

The Tao Word Record published an article, the gist of it being: the cause of the great natural disaster in Beiyuan had been uncontrolled fighting among cultivators, which had led to the seasons being turned upside down and the climate becoming changeable. Now the spiritual mountains were dissolving, and cultivators' essences and Ways of the Heart were dissolving—wasn't this returning spiritual energy to the mortal world?

No one paid attention. The cultivators were still in the midst of blank despair.

There followed an incredibly chaotic thirty years, during which one heard all kinds of unbelievable news every day.

Fifty years later, the spiritual energy prohibition retreated to the continent, and high level cultivators began to show signs of aging one after another—began to be plagued by minor injuries and illnesses.

The human world had been changing with each passing day, and the cultivation world at last belatedly acknowledged that there were new heavenly commandments.

In a century, accompanied by a clap of spring thunder, all the spiritual energy of the Xuanyin Mountains melted into the veins of the earth, leaving only the empty mountains and stones.

Wheat seedlings grew in Southern He. Zhi Xiu's hair was grey.

The following year, when the cicadas sang, teacher and disciple were fishing outside the Latent Cultivation Temple when Zhi Xiu suddenly brought up an old topic and said to Xi Ping, "Shiyong, why don't you get married?"

"Mother's second cousin's wife," said Xi Ping.

Zhi Xiu used his fishing rod to splash water all over him.

Xi Ping leapt up and hid inside a reincarnation wood tree on the bank. “I have little Xi Yue to keep me company, shi...uh.”

Before he could finish, he saw a teenage boy dressed in fisherman’s clothes poling a boat, gawking at him from not far away. He had just happened to see him go into the reincarnation wood tree. “Tai...Tai Sui!”

The teenager went to his knees with a thud, planning to kowtow to the legendary divine grand duke.

When he looked up, the two former celestial beings who had come down to slack off in the mortal world were already gone. It was as if he had been hallucinating.

“Shifu.” Xi Ping was carrying their fishing rods and pails. He turned his head and looked around. Seeing that there were no interlopers, he said seriously, “I heard from Master Lin that you bragged to that old monster Xuanwu and said, ‘The disciple of my Flying Jade Peak is willing to make the sacrifice for the sake of the world.’ Look, when you’ve already bragged about it, how could I let you down?”

Zhi Xiu said nothing else, only sighed.

In another three years, Great Wan had been run by humans for several generations and had gotten entirely on the right track, so Zhi Xiu left a letter and went out traveling.

He didn't come back.

So Xi Ping no longer returned to Xuanyin. The Xuanyin Mountains were no longer his home.

Later, everyone he knew, everyone he didn't know, his kith and kin, old friends and enemies...he saw them off one after another, the Ways of the Heart that had stood as commemoration for thousands of years returning to the earth.

When the first soft shoot grew at the Beijue Mountain Pass, the half-demon Bai Ling disappeared. At the end, he bid Xi Ping farewell.

The half-demon's death wasn't as wretched as a human's. He seemed unharmed, only said, "Viscount—"

Bai Ling had called him "Viscount" all his life.

"Shall we bet?" he asked. "Do you think you'll be the first to see my lord, or will I see him first?"

“Me,” said Xi Ping categorically.

Bai Ling laughed loudly and turned into a lump of paper.

He had even saved on paper money.

This was Xi Ping’s last friend. From then on, he moved into the reincarnation wood. The human world was no longer his home.

In another two hundred years, one day, Xi Ping sensed something. In a rare occurrence, he walked out of a reincarnation wood tree in Tao County.

He had been sleeping for forty years inside the tree. Seeing the dazzling rays of the morning sun, he only thought it looked unfamiliar to him, as though something were missing.

Dongheng’s Sanyue, the very last range of spiritual mountains in the world, had also vanished.

Xi Ping raised a hand and found that not a sliver of his essence remained, but he could use a bit of spiritual energy. The spiritual energy prohibition was gone.

“Tai Sui!” A voice from the South Sea Hidden Realm came through the reincarnation wood—the younger generations didn’t know who he was; they recited this title out of habit like their ancestors. “We’ve floated up! The South Sea Hidden Realm has emerged into the world!”

There was a crack. A little bracelet fell out of the Tai Sui Qin. The Law Breaker’s axiom had been realized; the borders had been broken.

The fire in the Unbound Furnace was extinguished.

A little out of the habit, Xi Ping put a hand to his chest. Suddenly, he recalled something, and began to run like mad—without the Law Breaker and only half-immortal cultivation left to him, he could no longer pass through reincarnation wood. He could only fly a sword.

But soon, he found that technology had developed too quickly in the last forty years. Flying a sword wouldn’t be as fast as taking a train.

After a day and a night, he got off the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon, switched to flying a sword, had his ears filled with fantastic stories of the South Sea Hidden Realm emerging, but he was too busy to pay attention to it and turned a deaf ear, only raced north—further north.

The furious Beijue Mountain Pass seemed to have been appeased by the cultivation world returning its spiritual energy. The snow on the mountain slopes had melted somewhat, and small flowers had bloomed all over it. Some years ago, people had begun mining here.

As soon as Xi Ping arrived, he heard people gathered together talking about some “strange phenomena” and “mirages”... What they were talking about were shepherd’s songs suddenly being heard outside the Beijue Mountains.

In addition to the South Sea Hidden Realm, there was unexpectedly also a hidden realm outside the Beijue Mountains, in no-man’s-land. It wasn’t large, and it didn’t have as many resources as the South Sea Hidden Realm. It was like a paradise. The people there were herders—they said that this was the village where the Sword Ancestor had lived while cultivating.

They didn’t know about Kunlun, but unexpectedly they still remembered the great natural disaster that had brought about the birth of the spiritual mountains. They only said that before the utter cold had come, in a moment of emergency, the Sword Ancestor had sent their whole village into a mustard seed.

After that, most likely the mustard seed’s master had died, leaving it broken, and the people in the little village had never found other outsiders.

Others didn't understand it and stood around in circles having rapid discussions, but Xi Ping suddenly realized that this hidden realm might have been like the South Sea Hidden Realm and Great Wan's Territory Map, the unreconciled human heart cut away from the Sword Ancestor, the founder of the spiritual mountains, left outside the "heavenly commandments."

"Are you a divinity?" While Xi Ping was lost in thought, a curious child suddenly ran over. He wasn't shy of a stranger, having presumably seen that he had a tidy look. He hugged Xi Ping's leg and said, "There's a big mirror hanging on the mountain at the village entrance! There's a divinity inside the mirror, who looks kind of like you."

Xi Ping gave a start. "Wh..."

"Nara, don't talk nonsense, get over here!" The nervous mother snatched back her child and smiled at Xi Ping. In ancient and exquisite Northern Li language, she said, "It's only a stone that's been polished very clean. It must have broken in the earthquake. Otherwise we couldn't have found the way out..."

"Take me there!" The crowd saw the man who looked like a divinity suddenly seem to go insane. He removed practically all the gold, silver, and other valuables he was carrying and shoved them into people's arms. "Take me there!"

“No need, no need...it’s right there.” The village head assigned a few tall, strong men to accompany him. “It really did break entirely. Look, everyone put the broken stones they cleaned up over there. What divinity? It was just a child looking in a mirror and not being able to tell what he was looking at... Hey, you!”

Xi Ping gathered the remainder of his weak spiritual sense in his eyes and at a glance picked out a smooth stone from the pile. There was writing on it.

“Oh!” His guides also went over to observe. “What kind of writing is that?”

It was Wan writing.

The familiar handwriting on it said: I was here.

EXTRAS

EXTRA 1 - Antiquity

That year, Xi Ping celebrated the New Year with shifu on Flying Jade Peak—the concrete distribution of work was that Divine Physician Wen made the New Year’s Eve dinner, Xi Yue assisted, and Master Zhi, Master Lin, and little Master Xi played cards while they waited to eat.

Zhi Xiu occasionally helped translate the expletives it took Wen Fei ages in puffing and blowing to get out, then gave a few mild and gentle words of consolation; but he had no intention of moving his ass. Lin Chi was responsible for being abashed, and Xi Ping was responsible for answering back on everyone’s behalf amid shifu’s completely insincere Do not be wanton.

Just then, Flying Jade Peak received a flying goose message from Zhao Qindan.

“Sir Xu” had lately been writing a history, using popular novels to relate the rise and fall of the immortal mountains. If there was something she couldn’t work out and needed research done on, she would send a letter to ask Xi Ping.

Xi Ping gave a long sigh and craned his neck to lazily read the letter. “It’s the New Year, can’t this lady cool off a bit? Why so much fighting spirit? ... Oh, the origin of the water dragon beast spirits?”

Zhao Qindan said that the Tao World Record had received letters from its readers asking whether the water dragon beast spirits were actually manmade puppets or whether there had once really been such a spiritual beast, and if they were real spiritual beasts, what heinous crime had they committed to still be imprisoned in Heaven's Design Pavilion, serving out their sentences thousands of years later?

“Do all the people in the world already have justice? They've even started worrying about the beasts,” Xi Ping muttered. “Shifu, do you know where the water dragon clan came from?”

Zhi Xiu automatically looked up at the sky, then remembered that “observing celestial phenomena” was a trick that no longer worked. Apart from being able to tell whether it would rain tomorrow, you couldn't see a thing. Therefore, he pretended not to have heard and tossed his cards aside. “Hey, Fenghan, why are you doing all that on your own? It's a disgrace. I'm coming to help you!”

Xi Ping: “...”

Lin Chi gave a dry cough. “There are records concerning beast spirit arrays on Moon Plated Peak. You could probably look into the history as well...”

“It’s the New Year!” said Xi Ping. “You want me to trek through the mountains to do research? Are you nuts? Am I taking the imperial exams next year or something?”

Lin Chi blinked. “Oh, you don’t want to go look at them?”

Xi Ping fumingly stood up and bundled himself up into a sphere. Humiliated, he said, “...I’m going.”

In ancient times, there had been a clan of water dragons in the East Sea. They had once been auspicious beasts that lived far from the continent, with shrimp soldiers and crab generals as their daily provisions, having no association with humans.

But there were always belligerent people who didn’t know what was good for them. The whole continent was insufficient for them to show themselves off, and they had to run out and fight in the East Sea as well. When these people fought, their arms and legs would go flying all over the place. The smell of blood and the essence splattering everywhere attracted the enormous beasts from the depths of the sea.

The water dragons had a moment of greed and got a taste. From then on, there was no turning back.

This was a problem. Eating stinking fish and rotting shrimp would at most give you the runs, but eating bits of festering human would go to your head.

These dismembered body parts contained not only flesh and blood, they also contained Ways of the Heart and the consciousnesses of that group of people, dead in the midst of resentment, which tried to snatch the huge dragons' bodies after they were consumed. But how could a human consciousness occupy as large a head as that of a dragon of distant antiquity? The body-snatching failed, and instead the Ways of the Heart and consciousnesses were “digested” by the huge dragons.

The huge dragons today ate ten jin of “insatiable avarice,” tomorrow ate a vat of “heinous lust for power,” the day after that mistakenly consumed a half-bushel of cultivators gone out of their minds...and thereupon had a change of attitude.

The auspicious animals developed completely unnecessary intelligence and henceforth became vicious beasts, stirring up trouble almost every day, snatching a few people from the shore to munch on.

Seeing that there was no saving them, the masters on the eastern continent could only slaughter a dragon whenever they met one, and the Southern Sage was particularly mean—he created an art to collect beast spirits; when he captured a water dragon, he would skin it and rip out its tendons, trap it in an array, and go around releasing the beast spirits to clean the silt from the waterways, ordering them around like earthworms or loaches.

This was the origin of the water dragon beast spirits.

“This thing is ancient.” Xi Ping was reading carefully through handwritten bamboo slips, afraid of accidentally breaking them. Casually, he asked, “Whose writing is it?”

The handwriting on the slips, blurred by time, couldn’t be called good, but it was very neat. Supposing that handwriting matched its owner, Xi Ping thought that the person who had written this must have liked cleanliness.

Lin Chi said, “Most of the ancient works on Moon Plated Peak were left by our ancestor.”

Xi Ping stared: the Dignitary of Rule Elder?

Reading ahead, he saw that at the very end of the bamboo slips was written:
The gallbladder of the water dragon is deep blue, like first-rate blue jade, but...

But what? The bamboo slip broke off there. The remainder of the writing was lost.

Lin Chi held it with both hands and tucked it away in his sleeve. He said, “Traces of the writing remain. The Unbound Furnace ought to be able to restore the missing portion.”

“Eh, that’s enough.” Xi Ping thought to himself that even if a dragon gallbladder could restore life to the dying, the things had been extinct for thousands of years. Even if he read it, the knowledge would be useless—anyway, the young mistress hadn’t asked.

He was in a hurry to report back to Zhao Qindan. He gathered up the main points, copied them out concisely, and sent a letter back, then took the cable car between the mountains to go back and play cards, no longer concerning himself with this matter.

But maybe Master Lin had some “wanting to fix anything he saw broken” problem. After this, he couldn’t let it go until he had asked Xi Ping to use the furnace flame to restore the missing portion of the writing.

The remaining writing contained records concerning living water dragons: “the dragon gallbladder can calm the mind, restore the reason of a lunatic,” etc., etc. It was in fact all useless information. Lin Chi just liked repairing things, he didn’t have a hobby of archeological studies. When it was repaired, he put it away without reading it closely.

It was only many years later, when Xi Ping couldn't find anyone to play cards with, when he had so much time he didn't know how to use it up, that he turned up this book on the already cheerless and deserted Moon Plated Peak.

Perhaps it was boredom, and perhaps it was that he was now as old as the Dignitary of Rule Elder Lin Zongyi had been back then. He read about the hundred and eight uses of all the water dragon's organs, then still felt unsatisfied and dove again into the Unbound Furnace, attempting to use the furnace flame to decode this work, see the ancient story behind the writing.

He found to his surprise that Lin Zongyi had written this book of bamboo slips during his youth. At the time, the Xuanyin Mountains hadn't yet formed. The Southern Sage made his home in a valley. His disciples and acolytes added together made up several dozen people. His manor was called the Xuanyin Manor.

Being turned into beast spirits by the Southern Sage was the water dragon tribe's great shame. The dragons felt bitter hatred for the Southern Sage. They couldn't defeat him, so they could only bide their time and nurse their grudge. Once, they finally seized upon an opportunity to settle the score and get revenge: during the disastrous snows in the Beijue Mountains, the Southern Sage was called upon by the Sword Ancestor to support the continent's array. He departed in a hurry, leaving only a crowd of young disciples behind in Xuanyin Manor.

While the Southern Sage himself was gone, the manor's array remained. The water dragons brought a flood that submerged the valley, but not a drop of it penetrated the array. That vile manor seemed to be wrapped in an inflated fish bladder. The dragons, mad with rage, slammed against the array while opening their bloody maws wide, spitting obscene language meant to provoke the enemy.

Li Fengshan was the eldest of the Southern Sage's direct disciples. All the members of the sect called him "da-ge." Naturally he had taken responsibility for the manor's defenses.

"Chunsheng!" Li Fengshan held up the young shidi who had run into him in a panic. "Don't be scared. Did you send shifu the letter?"

"Chunsheng" was the nickname of his shidi Zhao Yin. He had been born with a smiling, round little face. He always appeared full of joy; everyone liked him on sight. Though he wasn't very talented and liked to slack off, his progress so slow it gave you a headache, shizun still couldn't bear to criticize him harshly.

His little round face was all red from running. Amid the earsplitting roars of the dragons, Zhao Yin raised his voice and cried, “Shizun didn’t answer! Da-ge, can that ‘Heavenly Question’ or whatever really reach the northern continent?”

Li Fengshan wasn’t sure himself, but he couldn’t very well show it. All he could do was console his shidi, saying he was certain it could while inwardly considering who else they could reach out to for help.

As soon as he was finished placating Zhao Yin, he turned his head and saw another shidi, Zhang Jue, still slowly drawing talismans to reduce noise and disturbance. “A-Zhuang, that’s useless, don’t waste spiritual energy! We may have to face a tough battle soon.”

Zhang Jue was an orphan with a painful childhood, but he had been born with the body of a young master.

When other children went out to play, they would get as tan as frisking little potatoes and come back covered in calluses. Zhang Jue couldn’t do that. If he was out in the sun too long, his skin would start peeling, and before he could get calluses from his straw sandals, his feet would become a bloody mess. All shifu could do was give him the nickname “A-Zhuang” and hope that he could become a little sturdier. Sadly, events had run contrary to his desires; having grown to the age of starting to grow facial hair, Zhang Jue was still more delicate and fair than a little girl. He stayed indoors all day, like an ice person, only capable of melting, not sliding. It was frustrating to behold.

Zhang Jue said, “Their speech is filthy. Listening to it may easily distract hearts.”

Li Fengshan waved a hand restlessly. “Distract which hearts? Who’s going to listen to the howling of some beasts? Not even an idiot would fall for those serpents’ tricks, don’t...”

No sooner had he spoken than he heard a cry of alarm: “Lin-shixiong!”

He’d forgotten about that one!

Li Fengshan’s heart stuttered; he instantly had an ominous premonition. He looked up and saw a green streak shoot into the air, with a sword pointing straight at the lead water dragon’s head. “Brutes! You dare to insult my shizun!”

There really was an idiot who would fall for it.

Li Fengshan sucked in a breath and yelled so hard his voice broke. “Lin Xiaoman, you get back here!”

“Lin Xiaoman”’s full name was “Lin Zongyi.”¹⁰⁷ He was the outstanding figure of their generation, phenomenally talented and a hard worker, eager to be best in everything. In the whole of the Xuanyin Manor, among the disciples and the acolytes, none could surpass him.

However, he still got on well enough with people and didn’t attract much jealousy, because all his smarts seemed to be devoted to cultivation. He would answer any question he was asked and believe anything anyone said. His thoughts were straighter than a ruler; he always seemed a little slow.

Lin Zongyi turned a deaf ear on the rebuke. The manor’s great array only blocked external enemies from invading; it couldn’t stop those inside from getting out. The green-robed teenager formed a hand seal and rushed out of the great array. Before his fellow sect members could react and back him up, he had already charged solo among the dragons.

Naturally the foremost disciple of Xuanyin Manor wouldn’t go down without a fight. He cast three talismans, drawing lightning into the water. Apart from Lin Zongyi, who had a lightning-repelling talisman on him, everything in the water crashed against the lightning. The huge dragons slowed. Lin Zongyi raised his hand and brought down his sword, severing one obscene water dragon tongue.

The shocked and furious roars of the water dragons nearly shook the disciples with weaker cultivation off their feet. Amid the reek of blood, the dragons went berserk, easily breaking through Lin Zongyi's protective talisman. The teenager's form vanished amid the forms of the demonic dragons.

Even the most phlegmatic Zhang Jue looked alarmed. He jumped to his feet. "Xiaoman!"

Without hesitation, Li Fengshan flew up and went in pursuit, meanwhile pushing back Zhao Yin and Zhang Jue, who had followed him. He shouted at his shidus, "Stay back, look after the crux of the array, wait for shifu!"

Only after he had burst out of the manor's array did Lin Zongyi realize he had been reckless. He was only an early period established foundation; he hadn't had time yet to travel alone to gain experience. He had only seen plenty of the water dragon beast spirits in the manor and had thought they were just big and thick-skinned.

But compared to the originals, the beast spirits were nothing but paper kites made to look like them. The water dragons that had swallowed the consciousnesses of countless cultivators had a viciousness that was practically demonic. Even a peak established foundation master meeting one in the wild would have a tough battle cut out for them if they weren't adequately prepared, never mind him—never mind that there were seven or eight water dragons surrounding Xuanyin Manor now!

The dragons' breath passed over him, and Lin Zongyi's physical senses stopped working altogether. He could only just barely dodge by relying on his spiritual sense. A glancing blow from a dragon's tail shattered his protective spiritual energy.

At the same time, Li Fengshan flew out of the manor's great array carrying dozens of talismans. He parted the water in the valley and flew among the group of dragons. "Xiaoman, run!"

He had meant to catch them off guard and give Lin Zongyi a chance to escape back into the array, but unexpectedly, the water dragons who had just been struck by lightning had learned the lightning-repelling talisman from a single sight of it. The talismans that had scooped out nearly half of Li Fengshan's essence were easily brushed aside like a heap of scrap paper by the water dragons.

An ominous undulation passed through the water. Li Fengshan hurriedly stuck his sword out behind him. The sword struck the fangs of a water dragon launching a sneak attack and broke into several pieces. Li Fengshan was sent flying. Another water dragon opened its bloody maw, ready to snatch its meal out of the air.

The corrupted water dragons were ruthless and base; they took pleasure in tormenting living creatures. When eating a cultivator below an ascended spirit, they never swallowed them in one gulp; they would pierce the cultivator's essence with their fangs, relish the excitement of the essence bursting in their mouths, then, when the cultivator's consciousness was delirious from the torment of their body being crushed, tear it apart and fuse it into themselves bit by bit.

Li Fengshan thought, It's all over.

Just then, an invisible whip made of spiritual energy split the "lake" filling the valley in two and struck the water dragon with its mouth wide open head on. The moment Li Fengshan fell into the dragon's mouth, the dragon's head was torn off by the brutal spiritual energy. Hard bone fragments and gore knocked the early stage established foundation junior dizzy.

The headless dragon corpse flew straight forward and crashed into the group of water dragons surrounding Lin Zongyi. The water dragons were all intelligent; they understood what they were up against and immediately fled in all directions. But it was already too late.

Li Fengshan, shielding his head with his arms, pushed aside the gore covering his eyes and looked up with difficulty. He saw a man dressed in a short jacket of coarse cloth land on the surface of the water.

Though he was shabbily dressed, he was tall and imposing, with a well-developed skeleton of the sort only possible in a person who had never gone hungry, who had never stooped or cowered while being beaten and scolded. His cuffs were faded from many washings, and his hair was perfectly arranged to the point of constraint, in complete contrast to the fashion of the day, which sought to be wanton and unrestrained. His cold gaze met Li Fengshan's for just an instant. Then he went straight along the path that had just been opened in the water.

At the man's feet was a tree vine that had grown halfway up the mountain. Such a tree had never been seen in Xuanyin Manor's valley before. It was like a willow, with a trunk more indolent than the willows that trailed into water from the shore.

The vine had already extended dozens of zhang, and it was still endlessly extending. When the water touched that vine, it parted automatically, only too eager to avoid this divine killer. Dazzling talismans flowed from the vine, wrapping around the water dragons' necks and limbs.

Next, there was a crisp pop.

It was like the sound of dry kindling splitting apart in a gentle heat. Li Fengshan and Lin Zongyi's eyes opened wide simultaneously—

The talismans of varying size wrapped around the water dragons burst one by one like water spraying. The dragons wrapped in them burst into bits, chunk by chunk.

This was a slaughter that looked like a fireworks display, almost magnificent. The noiseless talismans silently dissolved in the water, and all was still. Even the ripples fell silent. A dozen water dragons big enough to form hills when coiled up had instantly turned into a bloody mist. The whole valley had turned into an enormous pool of blood.

The unknown man landed in front of Lin Zongyi. Lin Zongyi instinctively wanted to retreat, but his body was still paralyzed by the remaining dragon breath. He couldn't budge. The man didn't so much as look at him. He reached into the water, fished up a deep blue water dragon gallbladder, and instantly disappeared.

The scene in the Unbound Furnace disappeared there. Xi Ping reached out to clasp the restored manuscript under his arm.

There were only fragmentary imprints on the ancient manuscript. Even with the Unbound Furnace, it was hard to see especially clearly. And what was “soul-stirringly alarming” to an established foundation could hardly help making Xi Ping, who had experienced the collapse of heaven and earth, yawn.

But...

The person that the sage had asserted “couldn’t slide” had in the end become covered in grime, the person who answered every question had shut his mouth, the loyal and charming little shidi had grown into an able schemer backed by wealth and power, the “da-ge” shielding his brothers from their own shortcomings had fallen out with them... The mutual reliance and closeness of youth had become a thing of the past.

Time changed all, people and things. Nothing was the same.

He would have been better off not looking. Xi Ping was even more lonely. Only after a long moment of blankness did he force his wits to perk up and try to distract his attention. He thought, The man who came along to save the show was treading on reincarnation wood. It must have been Yuan Hui. What did he want with dragon gallbladders?

EXTRA 2 - Antiquity Continued

The deep blue water dragon gallbladder could treat insanity. That was what the Dignitary of Rule Elder Lin Zongyi had said.

Lin Zongyi's research was quite rigorous. Xi Ping judged that his notes wouldn't be too unreliable. But at the time, the array of the Beijue Mountains had yet to form, and the spiritual mountains were still who knew where. The forces of evil were running wild everywhere, and even Yuan Hui, one of the four great demonic gods, looked like a righteous man willing to help others. With the world so deranged, who would need to be treated for insanity?

Xi Ping pondered it backward and forward until he had worked up an interest in getting to the bottom of things, so he went to the karma beast.

When the hidden bones had invaded the Territory Map, they had gravely damaged the karma beast's beast spirit. The beast spirit had disappeared from the ground, and everyone had thought that the sacred beast was dead. Pang Jian had been inconsolable. From then on, he avoided cats and dogs. He couldn't bear the sight of four-legged animals.

This continued until Xi Ping, on his shifu's order, had been inspecting the veins of the earth through the reincarnation wood in the Territory Map as usual and had happened to find traces of the karma beast spirit's dwelling place—the hidden bones had been very quickly expelled by the Law Breaker back then and hadn't had time to destroy it completely. So a whole crowd of Xuanyin masters had gone through all the inner sect's texts, looking for the Southern Sage's way of reining beast spirits. They spent several years on it, and finally, with Lin Chi responsible for giving instructions and Xi Ping controlling the Unbound Furnace, they at last brought the sacred beast that had nearly followed the sage in casting off the mundane dust back to the human world.

Based on this contribution, Xi Ping thought that the sacred beast ought to recognize him as its second father.

But this rebellious child was very unfilial, without any sense of gratitude to its second parent. When others summoned the karma beast, it would always be an avatar that came, a little palm-sized lump, which would sometimes even roll over and expose its belly, demanding pets without any shame. What Xi Ping summoned was always the ferocious original form of the giant beast, which would shake its whiskers and glare at him as soon as it came, provide a complimentary series of furious roars...though that was also a matter of a very long time ago.

Summoning beast spirits was an ancient art. No one knew it now. The karma beast was always in hibernation underground, with Xi Ping as its only remaining old friend, who occasionally called it back to the human world. However much they didn't get along, over these many years, they had still developed affection for each other. The karma beast wanted to be a little nicer to him every day. During the New Year, it even delicately changed its fur to red...then was angered by the nuisance surnamed Xi into changing it back to its original color.

To summon the sacred beast, Xi Ping drew a portrait of the karma beast on the wall. He was convinced that it was absolutely lifelike.

When the sacred beast came and saw it, it not only didn't appreciate the sentiment, it bared its fangs and waved its claws, biting that drawing to pulp, and in one breath paid its respects to eighteen generations of the artist's ancestors.

Xi Ping wasn't having it. "Do you know how much money my authentic works are worth now?"

The enormous, hill-like beast, on hearing this, dug irascibly with its paws, expressing its view: Ptui, stinking dog shit!

A certain individual surnamed Xi, having forgotten his own surname amid the plaudits of the auction houses, angrily said, "Ignorant brute!"

Man and beast, trading words and howls in equal portion, cursed at each other for a while. Ultimately, a human throat couldn't outshout a beast. Xi Ping shouted until his lungs hurt and had to bow out of the battle.

He poured himself a cup of homemade wine, tried a mouthful, then sucked on his gums—his winemaking technique could be called an authentic tradition handed down from his teacher; it was extremely inconsistent. Each time he opened a jar, it was like playing A-Xiang's Silver Tray Lottery. There was no way of knowing whether he was opening good wine or dregs. "This batch is no good. Karmie, let me ask you about something."

The karma beast waved its big tail indifferently.

Xi Ping said, "Yuan Hui once cut out a heap of dragon gallbladders. What was he doing with them? Selling them wholesale to the Heartless Lotus to fix his head?"

The karma beast snorted and became thumb-sized. It jumped onto the bamboo slips and left a paw print on the ancient Wan writing.

Xi Ping looked where the paw print indicated and saw a record there about water dragon pearls. "Don't mess around, I know what water dragon pearls are for, I used to have one. I asked you..."

The karma beast rolled its eyes at him—it had learned this expression specifically to use on Xi Ping—then raised its front paw again and tapped heavily against a line of small writing at the edge.

“Lacking the aura of the water dragons, only a master with cultivation that can overpower a water dragon can activate...” Xi Ping froze. “Huh?”

Water dragon pearls were extremely precious. After so many years of dawdling in the human world, Xi Ping hadn’t seen another one. The one in Zhou Ying’s hands must have been unique. Presumably apart from the infinitely resourceful demon of the Impassable Sea, no one would have been willing to take it out and use it casually. Therefore, he had nothing to compare it with.

But putting himself aside—he had at any rate been a near-ascended spirit then—san-ge had plainly just opened his spiritual eyes; he couldn’t even draw a talisman properly. But hadn’t he just waved a hand and flicked the water dragon pearl into him?

Had Lin Zongyi gotten it wrong?

Xi Ping stared at the karma beast in bewilderment. “You don’t mean that...”

The karma beast drew near, sniffed his fingers where they were holding down the bamboo slips, then once again acted like it was burying shit.

Xi Ping stood up, turned, and passed through reincarnation wood, returning to the Yongning Marquis Manor, which he had not seen for a long time.

Jinping no longer had nobles. When his friends and relatives in the mortal world were gone, Xi Ping had handed the Marquis Manor over to Jinping's authorities to have them take care of it.

This was a gift that burned the hand. Who would dare to overstep their authority to live in his former residence? Finally, the Kaiming Department made a decision. They put protections on the buildings and changed the Yongning Marquis Manor into the "Tai Sui Manor"—also popularly called the "Tai Sui Temple"—and it became a famous former residence for people to come visit.

Now the Yongning Marquis Manor was full of dense ancient trees. It was one of the eight sights of Jinping. It received an endless stream of tourists every day. There were many rumors circulating among the people about "burning incense in the Tai Sui Temple working a miracle" and "seeing a reincarnation wood tree cast a human shadow in the temple."

It was all pure nonsense. Xi Ping might not go back for centuries, and when he did go, he didn't go during the day. He didn't like to see people.

It was midnight now. The Tai Sui Manor's guards had locked the three gates. The incense smoke had dissipated. When Xi Ping came out of a reincarnation wood tree, he first attended to the sounds in the vicinity, then laughed in spite of himself, feeling like a thief.

He bowed to that somewhat divine ancient moonlight frost tree in the garden and passed through the garden to the rear courtyard.

The rear courtyard wasn't open to tourists. The Yongning Marquis Manor's old possessions were all stored there. The order of the books hadn't even been disarranged. Only a layer of protective film to guard against water and insects had been put over them. They seemed to still be waiting for their master to return. On the innermost bookcase, Xi Ping found the Xi family's genealogical record.

The genealogical record was quite long. Many generations had lived calmly in Great Wan.

Thinking about it, this was actually strange. The paramount spiritual sense appeared among people at random. It wasn't passed on between generations, because those lunatics not only didn't leave behind descendants, beneath the spiritual mountains, they were certain to lead lives plagued with disasters. Whole families dying out was the standard.

But the Xi family seemed to be an exception. Though it was also very hard for them to have children, and they often had children who died young due to their unusual spiritual sense, the bloodline had survived in fits and starts. The possessors of paramount spiritual senses born into this family, while they couldn't necessarily preserve their reason with dignity to the last, they had all had company in life and death; they were already greatly fortunate as compared to their fellows... Why was that?

It couldn't be because each generation had a reckless person like the Marquis who colluded with foreign evil cultivators, could it?

Xi Ping had found a new riddle, and he pursued it in high spirits. Following his family's genealogical record, he first found the origin of recent generations—they had migrated from the west after a plague of locusts—then used the reincarnation wood, which could get in by every crack, to wander all over, sneak into storehouses of records everywhere. He consulted ancient texts, compared historical events, researched local guides.

Unfortunately, it wasn't so easy. Xi Ping went all out for thirty years, but the leads still broke off. But he wasn't worried about doing useless work, anyway. He treated it as travel for pleasure.

During this time, he became a true scholar. He read too many documents and texts containing difficult and unpronounceable words. No matter how out-of-the-way a thing was, if it mentioned a few key terms, he could work out its entire history clearly. He more or less knew all the writing systems that traces could be found of. He also made himself a fake identity and went to the nation of New He to take part in the civil examinations, easily passed based on the fact that he had been reading longer than everyone else's grandfathers had been alive, and got himself a position in an archeological office. From time to time, he went to lecture to the college students.

If Dandan were still writing histories and wanted to consult him again, he wouldn't have to run muttering from the New Year's Eve dinner to flip through books now.

“You missed the good times.”

Inside the Law Breaker, Xi Ping spoke regretfully to the Zhao Qindan duplicated by the Tai Sui Qin's melody.

Zhao Qindan pushed up her reading glasses impatiently and gave him a stern glare, and asked him a number of questions she believed to be cunning. Wei Chengxiang, sauntering over to invite her out on a stroll, just happened to overhear. She plastered herself to the wall and slunk away, ashen-faced.

Xi Ping sighed. From past experience, he easily pretended to be stumped and begged her for mercy.

Because spiritual energy was prohibited, the “people” inside the Law Breaker couldn’t leave it using papermen. And inside the Law Breaker, by nature each was only a segment. Though they could talk and move, they were eternally static, stopped at a certain moment. They couldn’t change.

So Zhao Qindan always used the same questions to put him in a difficult spot, and Wei Chengxiang didn’t know that she had already overheard this conversation countless times and could never remember the answers.

The Wei Chengxiang in the Law Breaker was A-Xiang when she was young, duplicated by Xi Ping according to the melody he remembered. She had gone out to sea adventuring and disappeared, dying on the way to the unknown. There had been no time for her to say anything to her friends and loved ones.

She had lived her life beset by perils, left Jinping alone at sixteen, always rushing ahead to where the road was wider, not stopping until death.

Zhao Qindan, however, had the appearance of an old lady, after she had begun to show signs of decline—in fact, he could have duplicated any segment he wanted; her residence had been fixed in Tao County most of the time, and she was the most frequent visitor to the Law Breaker. From the twenty-something ignorant young mistress escaping a marriage to the renowned scholar Sir Xu who could summon hundreds with a single cry, Xi Ping had the “score” for every age. It was Zhao Qindan who had insisted shortly before her death that it be the very last portion of her lifespan that remained in the Law Breaker.

“The young me won't do,” she said softly on her deathbed. “I was just a pretty face then, without all my wits. I didn't understand anything. I'd have nothing to say to you. I couldn't keep you company.”

There was no concern about keeping a distance between men and women then. Xi Ping sat alone at her bedside to see her off.

Each day the Law Breaker enveloped the human world, each day the axiom had yet to be broken or realized, as the “steward,” he couldn't fail or age. When they had met, they had been classmates of about the same age, but on parting, he looked like her grandson.

He coiled up her white hair and mixed up rouge. Before he could apply the rouge, he looked around and saw that the young mistress, who had kept to Wan manners all her life, was clinging to his sleeve, weeping.

“Hey, old woman, can’t you hold out a little?” Xi Ping spoke rudely, but his hand as he wiped away her tears was very gentle. “You’ll make the makeup run. How am I supposed to apply the rouge?”

“Get...get out.” Zhao Qindan couldn’t catch her breath. “Don’t think... that I don’t know, back then...you dressed up as me, and made yourself up like a ghost...nearly scared off the great evil cultivator Yu Chang...”

“You’re nearly a ghost yourself, what do you care if I make you up like one?” Xi Ping laughed. Then, as if humoring a child, he said, “The banquet’s festivities are all over, and the drunks have all gone home. Someone ought to clean up, right? Fine, fine... Anyway, you’re all still here. When I’ve had enough of idling outside, I’ll come back to the Law Breaker.”

In the Law Breaker was A-Xiang, not yet set out on her journey, the young mistress who had returned, Lao Pang who couldn’t eat enough osmanthus duck, the eternally calm and quiet Bai Ling.

There were also the seniors—as the masters’ essences flowed away and their cultivation levels gradually dropped until they reverted to half-immortals, to mortals, ceasing to be divinities and once again becoming human, Xi Ping was finally able to hear the melodies of their consciousnesses in the Law

Breaker. So inside the Law Breaker, Master Lin stayed inside every day tinkering with odd bits of machinery and gears; shifu had a fish pond, where he took out a small boat to catch shrimp and fish when he wasn't practicing swordsmanship; Divine Physician Wen had planted a field of flowers beside the pond, and the flower dew and petals became ingredients for shifu to make wine...

Though no matter what was planted, only a few types of flowers would grow, and no matter what was brewed, the results would always be the same jar of wine, it was still lively.

But there was a person missing amid the excitement. Xi Ping could never duplicate san-ge's "score."

Zhou Ying's consciousness was nowhere to be found in the known realms.

At last, when Xi Ping had grown tired of archeology and was ready to "retire in order to return home" in New He, people discovered a tomb at the bottom of the sea—it ought to have been an islet, but it had been submerged by seawater as the terrain had altered. At the depths of the tomb, people discovered an altar and some leftover "deep blue gemstones."

Historical circles boiled over; everyone had different opinions, proposed all kinds of conjectures. Only Xi Ping recognized at a glance that the "deep blue gemstones” were fragments of the legendary water dragon gallbladders.

Exploiting the perks of his position, Xi Ping pilfered a piece of water dragon gallbladder, used a reincarnation wood seed to slip into the altar, and used the Unbound Furnace to decode it.

In the furnace flame, he once again saw Yuan Hui.

“The water dragon gallbladders you wanted.” Yuan Hui placed a mustard seed in front of a woman.

The woman had a blind person’s cane in her hand. Her eyes stared directly ahead. She was not only blind, she also seemed to have trouble moving, unable to stand up on her weak, slender legs.

Xi Ping was slightly surprised—the woman’s features were very similar to Yuan Hui’s. It was clear at a glance that they were close kin.

“Then we’re even.” The woman felt around for the mustard seed and laughed softly. “Da-ge.”

Yuan Hui shook his head and dully said, “It’s not about being even or not. I owe you my life—when I had just established a foundation and was trapped among the Shamans' living corpses, I would not have escaped without your help. If you want anything in the future, just notify me. You know how to contact me.”

The woman smiled brightly and said, “I am a humiliation left behind by our mother. My father the king saw me as a stain and never treated me as his own child. If I hadn't helped you, I would also have died trapped there.”

Xi Ping understood at once and said to himself: After the holy woman was abducted by the shamans, she had a daughter.

Yuan Hui didn't stand on any further ceremony with her. He only asked, “What do you want the water dragon gallbladders for?”

The woman gently pressed down on her underbelly. Yuan Hui's gaze followed where she indicated. “You...”

“I can feel it, this child is the same as me...and our mother.” The woman sighed softly. “It will be hard for the child to survive.”

Yuan Hui, frowning, said, “It is indeed difficult for children that are born frail to inherit your gift. Why don't you look after your health and not deliberate so much, don't use things at random. The water dragon gallbladders are...”

“For treating insanity,” the woman interrupted him quietly. She raised her head. Silver light flashed over her unfocused pupils as she looked out into emptiness. Those eyes possessed of a paramount spiritual sense couldn’t see the human world, but they seemed to see the future. Suddenly, out of nowhere, she said, “Have you heard of the spiritual mountains that have arisen in the northern continent?”

Yuan Hui seemed a little bewildered, not knowing why she had suddenly mentioned the northern continent.

“Our mother opened the way to chaos, da-ge. The world is going to change.” The woman spoke as if chanting. “The canopy of heaven will descend, and those who can see the stars will always be insane. In fact, there’s nothing wrong with being insane. It’s easy. I just hope that I can leave a sliver of another choice for later generations... If our bloodline isn’t extinguished, perhaps one day, someone will be able to escape the prison.”

Yuan Hui was all at sea. “What are you even talking about?”

The woman smiled without answering. Her strange eyes looked through him and met Xi Ping’s eyes as he spied through the Unbound Furnace. Her eyes suddenly moved, as if they had pierced thousands of years of time to meet Xi Ping’s gaze. She smiled at him.

She said, “Perhaps because of the water dragon gallbladders mixed into their bloodline, later generations will be able to activate dragon pearls, just like the dragons, command the clouds and rain.”

“What do you mean, like water dragons?” Yuan Hui shook his head. He seemed to be accustomed to his sister saying mysterious things that he couldn’t understand. He stepped forward to push her wheelchair. “I’ll take you back... Why are you turning your head? Is something wrong with your neck?”

The woman sat in the wheelchair, turning her fine long neck, her blind eyes “watching” Xi Ping from start to finish. “It’s nothing. I’m looking at the future.”

Yuan Hui shut his mouth. He was a little anxious, feeling that it seemed that she ought to eat some dragon gallbladder. Their two figures slowly vanished from the furnace fire.

Xi Ping abruptly left the Unbound Furnace, suddenly remembering the power of the first established foundation paramount spiritual sense in the world to turn into mist. This power had been unheard of for thousands of years, yet when the spiritual mountains had been nearly at their end, it had appeared in Zhou Ying.

A beginning and an end.

Before the spiritual mountains had formed, had the eyes of an unsuppressed paramount spiritual sense really been able to see the future?

Had the Xi family's bloodline really originated there?

That he and san-ge could easily activate the water dragon pearl, was that really because the bloodline passed down to them from antiquity contained the aura of the water dragon gallbladders?

The water dragon tribe had died out, and there were no more dragon pearls. The people from thousands of years ago had also long ago become unfindable vestiges. There was no way to investigate any of this.

But there was one thing he could be certain of. San-ge, having passed through the Ceaseless Mirror, must have escaped the prison and glimpsed the sky beyond the bounds.

When he thought this, Xi Ping suddenly felt that he didn't regret not being able to see him in the Law Breaker as much.

He turned to leave. From familiar habit, he arranged to fake the death of his identity in the mortal world and escape.

Xi Ping thought that he was a little tired. He would return to the Law Breaker to dream.

EXTRA 3 - New Capital

Those who had gone to work in the factories earliest of all had been craftsmen, each and every one possessing some unique skill. Wei Chengxiang had mixed with these people since she was little and had been imperceptibly influenced by what she heard and saw. In the usage of axe, chisel, adze, and saw, in woodworking and carving seals, she knew a bit of everything. Adding in that she was literate, if she hadn't met with unexpected disaster back then, perhaps she would have been a skilled worker with considerable prospects.

The only unfortunate thing was that, had she been a mortal, she wouldn't have lived to see the day when a woman could enter the Kaiming Department or a factory college without raising eyebrows. She would probably have spent her whole life as a "man," hiding and covering up, shutting out anyone who came to her with proposals of marriage, finally ending up as an old bachelor who was always running off to Rat Alley, getting smeared with stinking gossip.

That way, she wouldn't have met Xi Shiyong.

Jinping City was vast. Living under the same sky, all walks of life were cut off from each other. Even if by chance there had been an opportunity to brush past each other, probably it would only have been like their encounter in the southern mines—in fact, Wei Chengxiang had forgotten about that long ago. It was later, casually chatting with Xi Ping, that she had recalled that such a thing seemed to have taken place. Looking at Xi Ping, as if looking at foreign scenery, she might have said admiringly that he was a handsome young lord, like taking a hurried glance at Cui Ji's restrained and elegant front yard or the expensive fine clothes behind a glazed window; she would have exclaimed, then turned away and forgotten.

In fact, that...wouldn't have been a bad thing.

Now she couldn't become a skilled worker, but she still liked to do a bit of woodwork in her free time, put little things together. She always had some books of lost ancient He arts about her person, and she had a period of infatuation with embroidery.

At New Year during that period, her friends and family all received embroidered works that she had made. Even the Xuanyin Mountains' General Zhi, who had once done her the favor of giving his advice, received one.

The workmanship was rather fine, and there were categorically no bumps and hollows from loose threads. The style was...very "He."

The young mistress put the lady's purse that there was really no way to carry under a crystal cover to keep as a bizarre ornament and tactfully said in "praise," "Rather a lot of ancient Southern He style about it."

Pang Jian, in the position of an uncle, didn't feel comfortable making any appraisal, either. All he could say was, "The screen is very lively, the sacred beast likes it there."

Her other Wan friends for the most part stopped themselves from saying anything like these two did. Only the Turmoilers and Zhi Xiu lavished her with praise.

The Turmoilers went without saying. Anyway, even if Wei-laoban had tried an original approach and embroidered a pair of kissing houseflies, they would still have praised her blindly.

As for Zhi Xiu, he had only two requirements for what he wore: that it be neat and tidy, and that it didn't constitute a breach of etiquette at important social occasions—for the rest, it didn't matter.

Knowing that someone was thinking of him, he greatly appreciated the sentiment, and after losing his essence, he in fact wasn't as resistant to cold as before, so he gladly accepted the young lady's respectful gift of gloves.

These gloves—per Xi Ping’s description, taking a single glance at them would pollute your consciousness.

Perhaps A-Xiang had thought that there wasn’t enough room on as small a piece of cloth as a glove for her to display her skills. She had covered them with embroidery, not leaving a single stitch blank. The design she had embroidered was “peaches and plums accompanied by the spring breeze,” representing a teacher’s earnest instruction of his pupils. Not taking into account the fact that these two species didn’t bear fruit in spring, she embroidered them in peach pink and plum purple, full of the joy of a rich harvest. As for the colors of spring, she proudly asserted that in order to convey gradation, she had used eighteen different kinds of green thread; it had been very hard labor.

Xi Ping thought that even if she had found a white banner and used black thread to embroider the Wan characters “Peaches and Plums with the Spring Breeze” and turn it into a mourning banner, she still wouldn’t have attained such a horrifying outcome.

A few days later, there was another heavy snowfall on Flying Jade Peak. It was outrageously cold. So Zhi Xiu asked for those frightening “peaches and plums,” put on the “riotously colorful eighteen shades of green,” and, all snug, went to practice swordsmanship.

Though Zhaoting was willing to be crushed to dust for his sake, it still couldn't take mistreatment like this. The divine sword refused to be drawn. Zhi Xiu, uncomprehending, pulled harder and nearly got smacked on the chin by Zhaoting's sheath as it popped up.

“It is indeed easy for your hands to slip while wearing gloves.” Zhi Xiu took off the gloves. He didn't understand Zhaoting's fit of temper, so, with a show of earnestness, he elevated this matter to the summit of human life and narrated it to his little disciple Xi Yue next to him. “In the way of the sword, regardless of whether one has a Way of the Heart, one must temper one's muscles, bones, and skin. A person might take a detour, but he cannot take a shortcut. Do not be like your older brother.”

Xi Yue obediently received this lesson and nodded.

Mentioning Xi Ping, Zhi Xiu frowned and asked, “Right, where is he? Yesterday he was still chasing after the blue luan on the mountain. Did he get ‘busy’ as soon as I mentioned the sword?”

Xi Yue's throat had been modified by Lin Chi. He could speak slowly. He just wasn't used to speaking. But in front of shizun, he couldn't very well flail around gesturing wildly, so he laboriously said, “He's gone to see Wei-laoban.”

Hearing this, Zhi Xiu's brow unfurrowed—chasing after a young lady was much better than chasing after a chicken. It sounded more like serious business. “What for?”

Some strange anguish appeared on Xi Yue's face. He answered, “Maybe he's gone to offer a humble apology.”

Xi Ping had obtained an exquisite embroidered purse. When he had opened it, he'd taken only one look. Then this scoundrel had given his most sincere reaction.

He had said: “Hahahaha, what the hell is this!”

Wei Chengxiang hadn't spoken to him for several days.

Wei Chengxiang was just recording something on paper when she heard a creak. Then a familiar aroma surged up.

She raised her head and saw that the study's little window had been pushed open a crack from the outside, and a hand was reaching inside, furtively stuffing in an oilpaper bag. The oilpaper bag had the stamp of the Phoenix's Perch Pavilion on it. The stewed duck's head inside was steaming, fogging the glazed window.

This was the new capital of Southern He, tens of thousands of li away from Jinping. Only one person could bring a stewed duck's head fresh from the pot in Jinping to her desk.

Wei Chengxiang was expressionless. "Go away."

"You won't eat it?" said the person outside. "Fine, then I'll throw it away."

Wei Chengxiang said, "...Slow down!"

Wasting food immediately jabbed Wei-laoban in her sore spot.

Though she had a big house in Southern He's new capital comparable to what Princess Anyang's manor had been and no longer needed to carry scales and scrape off bits of green ore, she was still as stingy as ever. Perhaps even mountains of gold and silver couldn't make up for the handful of copper coins she had been short in her youth.

When she opened the window, she saw Xi Ping's brightly smiling face. This wretch had a face that, as long as he didn't talk or move, could make a person forgive him even when he had committed the most heinous of crimes.

Wei Chengxiang pulled a long face and took the oilpaper bag. Half her anger had already dissipated. Seeing his smile, she simply wanted to sigh.

The duck's head was hot and numbing, with a strong aroma. As there had been more and more Cloud Soaring Flood Dragons over the years, Jinping had gradually accepted the heavy flavors from the north and south. It was only that there still weren't many locals who ate spicy food, and the audience for hot and numbing foods was small. The shops didn't make them every day—Wei Chengxiang, meanwhile, had been young when she had left Great Wan, and her tastes had been influenced by those of other nations.

She thought: Xi Shiyong would never get wrong what the people around him liked to eat and what they avoided, would never mishear the hidden thought another person revealed between the lines. He was just a purebred scoundrel.

Wei Chengxiang opened the paper bag, took out a duck's head, and bit fiercely into it as if it were Xi Ping's head. "What? Say whatever you have to say."

"Let's talk business, Wei-laoban." Xi Ping, smiling radiantly, leaned against a reincarnation wood tree and said, "Sell me the pattern for the gloves you embroidered for my shizun."

“You can ask General Zhi for them yourself.”

“What would I want with those lousy gloves?” Xi Ping waved a hand. “As long as the fire in the Unbound Furnace is burning, I won’t freeze to death. How about the Jiuwei buy that pattern from you and use it for the embroidery pattern on a set of formal robes for next spring?”

The Luwu had been short on money in the early years, so they had started many businesses in the various nations. First, this was to arrange identities for themselves, and second, it was to subsidize some of their expenses. The Jiuwei was one of the Luwu’s most lucrative businesses. It sold Wan-style fashionable clothes and jewelry. Leaving aside for the moment the quality of the products, as the originators and promoters of the toilet bulletins, the Luwu had been the first to grasp the authority to judge what was beautiful and what was ugly. Now they could turn a small investment into a huge profit based on their reputation.

“The Jiuwei are highbrow, how could bumpkins like me be worthy?” Wei Chengxiang rolled her eyes. “Don’t you think they’re ugly? Who are you going to sell them to?”

“I’m not planning to sell them. We’ll make a model and put it on display, tell a story about ‘a gift of gratitude from an immortal in the East Sea,’ set the price at five hundred, and if someone with more money than sense wants to buy it, we'll say it's sold out. Who says that clothing has to look good?" Xi Ping waved a hand. "Everyone looks at it—wow, that's ugly! It will certainly make tongues wag, and those toilet bulletins that fill their pages with idle gossip will follow along at once, and the Jiuwei will save on publicity expenses next year—we'll give you ten percent, buy your execrable design."

"Get the hell out," said Wei Chengxiang.

Xi Ping said, "Ten thousand."

Wei Chengxiang stopped in the middle of smacking his hand with the window.

Xi Ping smiled. "In—Wan—gold."

Wei Chengxiang immediately wiped her hands clean, straightened her clothes, and opened the door. Her expression also cleared, and her tone became polite. "Senior Tai Sui, please come in and have a seat."

Xi Ping sauntered in, complacently asked her to pour him tea, ate half a saucer of "rebirth berries"—after Southern He had been plowed by the wildfire vine, this strange mutated berry had grown there. It was sweet, with unusual perfume. It only bore fruit in the twelfth month of the year, and it was just in season now. You couldn't get it this fresh anywhere else.

When he had tyrannized enough, he explained his strategy for how to “use ten thousand gold to buy a season of scolding and turn it into an opportunity to sell other things.” Hearing it, Wei Chengxiang stared, wondering whether the rich people who scrabbled over the Jiuwei's products like ducks were idiots.

But when she had heard it out, she still didn't especially understand.
“You...”

Can just take it if you want it. Anyway, I already gave it to you guys.

Xi Ping raised a hand to interrupt her. “The Luwu aren't my private property, I have to keep accounts. I can't just throw money at a foreign fleet, you understand. Let the Jiuwei test the waters this season, and if it works, I can find another reason to work with you later.”

Wei Chengxiang was dumbfounded.

In fact, she was short on money currently.

This was a long story—Shu’s Miah and Xiuyi clans had made a definitive break. The Miah, having come to a dead end, had asked the South Sea Hidden Realm for help. Li Manlong had come to a prompt decision then. While upgraded immortal tools had yet to become popular everywhere, he had taken the initiative and used upgraded beast-controlling immortal tools to help the Miah hold on to Southern Shu’s Three Islands.

After this, Southern Shu split in two. As repayment for the alliance, the South Sea Hidden Realm and the surrounding area of sea was given to the He, to serve as a temporary location for the new nation of He until the Land of Turmoil was repaired.

The spiritual mountains had returned their spiritual energy, but they couldn’t heal the wounds to the earth of Southern He. There were a thousand things to be done. And this place rich in skilled craftsmen had been left behind by the era of the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon. The early period after founding the nation was extremely difficult, until the South Sea Hidden Realm made by the past sage with his life had once again protected the people in their utmost need—nearby, they discovered a large “dragon’s breath resin” mine.

Dragon’s breath resin was a combustible fuel, also called “oil water” or “black gold.” In recent years, as people gradually cast off the first generation Gold Imitation Technique altogether, it had seen more and more use.

Relying on the resources of the black gold mine, New He had trekked over the most difficult part of the road, and from then on, the people of He had developed a complex about going out to sea.

There were unpeopled places out there, beyond the spiritual mountains. Cultivators who had grown up at the feet of the spiritual mountains had instinctively rejected it, and mortals, even with access to steamships, had always operated in the coastal waters at most, not penetrating the depths of the ocean.

Apart from dragon's breath resin, was there something else in the depths of the sea?

Resources that could take mortals up to the sky and down into the earth, unheard of ancient relics, never before seen rare monsters...

Once, through reincarnation wood, Wei Chengxiang and Zhou Ying had looked at the boundary of the South Sea Hidden Realm, one inside and one outside. One had seen a limitless voyage, and one had seen a boundless canopy. Starting then, a long-cherished wish had begun to put down roots and sprout in her heart: she wanted to be like Kuafu seeking the sun in legend, be the first person to seek the horizon.

But this needed not only technology, it also needed financial resources, and the ability to rally fellow travelers in great number.

Wei Chengxiang blurted out, “How did you know I was preparing a fleet?”

“I belong to the lineage of the Dignitary of Fate. I just reckoned on my fingers... Hey, hey, hey, why are you beating up your bankroller?” Xi Ping crossed one leg over the other. A rebirth berry bulged his cheek out. “Wow, these are delicious. There are only pickled ones in the north. Pickling things is a waste. Pack up some baskets for me, I’ll take them back to the Xuanyin Mountains. You said it yourself. You were blowing so much hot air to my brother back in the South Sea Hidden Realm that all the sable sheep in there rose into the sky, right?”

Wei Chengxiang was silent for a while, then put a hand to her forehead and smiled bitterly. Suddenly, she said, “Hey, do you know what it means when a woman gives you an embroidered purse?”

When she spoke these words, the clock on the desk and the wind outside by coincidence quieted for an instant. In the air there was only the mouthwatering aroma of the rebirth berries.

The water in the pot boiled then and turned off with a click. The sound of the boiling water sank in pitch. Xi Ping put down his tea bowl.

“I know,” said Xi Ping. Without any unease, he removed the lid from the bowl and waited to be served like a young master. “I thought that you didn’t know.”

Wei Chengxiang: “...”

Why was this jerk’s angle of approach to being incorrigible always so mysterious?

“After all,” said Xi Ping, “to judge from your work, it seemed like you were trying to send me to my grave.”

Wei Chengxiang took a deep breath and reached out to pick up the pot. In order to avoid having his face scalded by boiling water, Xi Ping greased his steps, making himself scarce before Wei-laoban could murder her bankroller.

On leaving Wei Chengxiang’s house, you crossed a street and came to Sages’ Square.

Southern He’s new capital was a city with no history, with spotless buildings and perfectly dovetailed paving tiles. In the spacious square, each and every statue was lifelike. This was the look of a place that had yet to be toyed with by the elements.

The most striking sage's statue was of a slender, graceful woman in antiquated Chu dress. She was smiling thoughtfully, appraising everyone who came before her, as if she were curious about everyone—when this statue of Hui Xiangjun had come to the new capital, Master Lin, who never went out, had actually left the mountains. The Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon hadn't spread to Southern He yet at the time, so he had had to take it to the Wan-He border, then transfer to car and boat.

This whole arduous journey, undertaken just to take one look at her.

By coincidence, it was just when he walked up in front of the statue that his eight-hundred-year-old Way of the Heart dissolved. The body and heart of the immortal whose emotions were more colorless than paper returned to the mundane world, and all his persistent shackles disappeared, so that he could sob his heart out in the square full of people coming and going, coming back to life vivid and bloody before the statue of his old friend.

Next to Hui Xiangjun was the statue of an ugly Turmoiler, only half her height, his figure stooped, rendered an even more unbearable sight by comparison with the beauty beside him. This was New He's other sage: Li Manlong, who had long ago passed away and departed.

Li Manlong held the hand of a girl with her hair in two buns; this was one of the founders of New He, whose full name was Li Wenwu. She had been over sixty when she had passed away. It had been her own wish for the appearance of the statue to be taken from her childhood. She had a more romantic nickname—she was called “Hope.”

Further on, there were more people, those who looked like Turmoilers and those who looked like ordinary people. To a greater or lesser extent, Xi Ping had had dealings with them all and seen them all die.

He passed slowly among his old friends and saw a few long lines. These were people waiting to receive porridge. Xi Ping calculated on his fingers and suddenly realized that it was the eighth day of the twelfth month.

The Laba Festival was a particularity of Great Wan, which had four distinct seasons; it was for celebrating a rich harvest at the end of the year, during the slack season for farming. Southern He was warm year-round and had no winter break; naturally it didn't celebrate this festival.

This was a tradition that originated from long ago, when the new capital had first been founded—naturally A-Xiang had brought it here.

Back then, she would spend the day cooking rich, fragrant, sweet porridge for a city full of He people who couldn't eat their fill; anyone could have a bowl. Later, there were no more people in the city who couldn't eat their fill, and people had preserved this outmoded practice. Each year on Laba, the merchants would open their stands and hand out porridge while they advertised next year's goods, wish their regular customers an early happy new year.

"Young fellow, come over here." A salesman hawking in the street passed by and stuffed a flyer into his hand. "Our Fire God Porridge is chilled porridge, with stewed lotus seeds and rebirth berries in it!"

In authentic Southern He language, Xi Ping said bitterly, "You're all crazy. It's a waste of the products of nature!"

Oh, yes, Southern He's Laba wasn't called Laba; it was called the "Fire God Festival"; this was a pretext that the glib-tongued Wei-laoban had made up back then.

By the road, an adult leading a child picked the child up and said, humoring, "For a Fire God Festival, there needs to be a Fire God. Do you know the Fire God's name?"

The bald child crisply responded: "Chunying!"

Xi Ping turned his head to look their way and just happened to see an empty space in the long line of sages' statues—this was Wei-laoban's spot. The He people had insisted on making her a statue, and Wei Chengxiang felt ashamed and insisted that they shouldn't. The two sides had spent years going back and forth, and finally they had only left a place; there was no one there yet.

There was no rush. After all, she hadn't yet completed her journey.

“You haven't even set out yet, and you want to fasten yourself to a tree sharing a lifespan with the Law Breaker. You'll be scared of dying.” Xi Ping shook his head at that empty statue space. “If you're scared of dying, how will you come and go freely under the high sky and over the vast sea? Stupid girl.”

Having said this, he turned and went back—two incense sticks had passed, A-Xiang ought to have packed up the rebirth berries for him. He wanted to take them back to the Xuanyin Mountains while they were fresh, then come back and pick a place whose porridge didn't have all kinds of random things stewed into it.

There would be favorable weather in the coming year, all wishes fulfilled.

EXTRA 4 - Western Chu

After the hidden bones disappeared, there was total disorder in Chu. The remnants of the Zhao clan fled as the tree fell. The Luwu masks were naturally of no more use, so Xu Rucheng simply resumed his true identity and represented the Luwu in negotiations with Yu Chang.

The spiritual energy prohibition had come too abruptly. No one, whether shed skin or ascended spirit, could soar into the sky or burrow into the earth anymore. The power of Great Wan's upgraded immortal tools was magnified, and the gap couldn't be filled in a hurry. Worst of all was that the Law Breaker was still operating, and reincarnation wood, able to get in at every crack, could deliver weapons to the four corners of the earth in the space of a breath. All powers black and white had to submit to Tai Sui's tyrannical rule.

On the one hand, Yu Chang was beside himself with delight over having finally obtained the Sanyue Mountains, but on the other hand, he still had to bend his head to that damned Tai Sui. But what sort of man was Yu Chang? Believing firmly that a true man could endure the unendurable, he contributed a performance that was the pinnacle of "honeyed words with a sword in the belly." He was like an assiduous shopkeeper, acting "close as brothers" with Tai Sui while precisely noting down every debt, so when the prohibition on spiritual energy ended and his cultivation was restored, he could demand repayment from a certain person surnamed Xi for every last item.

Because of this, while Yu Chang had obtained power over Western Chu, he still wouldn't indulge in a single moment of comfort. Sensuous pleasures, whether of sound, sight, taste, or fragrance—he didn't come near any of them; he worked hard to cultivate and lived ascetically, not letting up for a moment. Though he couldn't sense the tiniest bit of spiritual energy, he still persisted in meditating daily in a heap of white spirits, in rain or shine; it was deeply touching.

Six months later, Yu Chang held his nose and accepted all of Xi Ping's unreasonable provisions, including that people couldn't be prohibited from moving freely, that cultivators whether righteous or evil had to be registered, that suppressing toilet bulletins without cause was prohibited, and so on—as well as delimiting Tao County and its surroundings within a three hundred li radius as independent territory, henceforth free of Chu.

When both sides had signed and made their marks, Xu Rucheng heard a tune in his ear. As he took part in the monumentally ostentatious entertainment Yu Chang had arranged, he surreptitiously asked Xi Ping, “What's that noise?”

Xi Ping answered from a reincarnation wood tree a thousand li away:
“Looking at Yu Chang’s smile, I was suddenly inspired to compose a song based on him.”

Xu Rucheng was curious. “What’s it about?”

Xi Ping answered profoundly, “An honest woman with a hard lot in life forced into prostitution, who hides rat poison in her bosom while receiving guests.”

Xu Rucheng: “...”

He suddenly felt that the wine at the feast tasted strange.

With the treaty between Wan and Chu concluded, Xu Rucheng could finally withdraw after winning merit.

The Silver Moon was no longer to be seen above the empty Sanyue Mountains. In Dongheng City, the streets and lanes were hung all over with Yu Chang’s banners, which fluttered boldly and arrogantly beside the terrified old colored lanterns.

While entering the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon station, Xu Rucheng heard a boom. Through a thousand-li eye glass, he saw that the statue of the Black Emperor of Sanyue's Principal Peak had been smashed to dust.

The new emperor was reveling atop the remnants of the old regime, not knowing yet that only scraps remained inside those remnants.

Xu Rucheng shook his head and handed over his ticket. "Tao County."

He had two long-cherished wishes: one was to show that imperial grandson his own impressive appearance, so for the rest of his life that bastard would feel ill whenever he heard the words "dragon and phoenix symbolizing good fortune"; the other was to go to Tao County and meet Zhao Qindan, return her name to her.

Sadly, he was unable to realize the first—just as he had been busying himself on Tai Sui's behalf, he had stopped paying attention, and the third-rate imperial grandson had gone off in a flurry to report to the netherworld. It was a great regret.

Xu Rucheng and Zhao Qindan were two half-immortals, one a poor country man with no home or property, one the precious young mistress of a great family; one had nearly given up his life to enter the Way out of resentment in the midst of upheaval, and one had exceptional natural talents that had let her effortlessly stand out among her peers at the Latent Cultivation Temple.

Supposing that their paths in life had not been so bumpy, supposing that there had been no “Kaiming” or “Luwu,” the only opportunity the two of them would have had to meet would have been if Xu Rucheng, as an “evil cultivator,” had been arrested and soul-searched by the Heaven’s Design Pavilion...and the responsibility of soul-searching him might not even have fallen to Zhao Qindan; after all, it fell into the category of “dirty work.”

Two such people, unexpectedly, had somehow come to exchange lives beneath a Luwu mask.

Zhao Qindan met him in person at the train station in Tao County. The two of them normally each had their own work and had little contact. They only exchanged greetings through the reincarnation wood at the New Year. At first Xu Rucheng was a little reserved, worried that they would be stuck with nothing to say to each other, but instead, as soon as they saw each other, an unspeakable sense of familiarity and closeness arose of itself... especially when he realized that the two of them performed an identical gesture of rubbing the writing brush callus on their middle fingers with their thumbs when nervous.

Living through danger together made people “brothers,” so after the two of them had spent a decade “wearing” each other’s lives, they had probably become twins with no blood relationship.

“Dongheng City was a total mess then. Among the Xiangs, some were with Xuanwu, some were against Xuanwu, and then there were those against the Xiangs, the rebels. You had no idea where to stand. After Xuanwu gained the upper hand, Prince Qing Manor, which had joined the wrong team, fled that very night to your...to the Zhao hidden realm. Before they could stop, they heard that Xuanwu was dead. The two families thought this was the light at the end of the tunnel and were beside themselves with self-satisfaction. They set out together with great pomp back to Dongheng, unexpectedly running into Yu Chang’s invasion.” Xu Rucheng sighed. “If not for that, given their prudence, they actually wouldn’t have ended up falling so fast.”

After she had heard out the fate of the Zhao family, no sorrow was visible on Zhao Qindan’s face. She only asked, “What about my mother?”

“Your honored mother died of illness three years ago. She didn’t live to see the tumult.”

Zhao Qindan went blank, after a long moment gave an mhm, and nodded—she had spent a decade in Tao County, written countless articles. She had a profound awareness that human weakness didn’t change on account of completed spiritual bones or rising cultivation, so she hadn’t probed into Dongheng's Zhao family's situation even once, simply not giving herself the chance to be weak.

Just as well, Zhao Qindan thought, that her delicate and well-born mother hadn't lived to see the tumult. She was so affectionate, so feeble. She had never had an opinion in her life. She could only submit, or cry and submit. It was her luck not to have lived to see this.

Xu Rucheng said, "Do you want to ask about anyone else?"

She shook her head, and Xu Rucheng understood; he said nothing further—the clan leader had also died, and all the Dongheng Zhao family's cultivators had died. That they had died off so cleanly, apart from bad luck, was down the old clan leader, at the final critical moment, leading a group of established foundations and half-immortals who could no longer use spiritual energy in an attempt to take advantage of the chaos to break into the Sanyue Mountains and take back Zhao Qindan, who was "trapped in Sanyue."

With them in such a hurry to die, Yu Chang had naturally taken them up on it, and afterward had even attempted to seize the items in the Zhao hidden realm, and was taught a lesson by the reincarnation wood.

As for how much of this concern had been motivated by worry and familial love and how much by plans for the family's future, there was no way of knowing now. There was no benefit in considering it; it was just as well not to mention it.

“The things in the hidden realm were transferred into the Law Breaker. Tai Sui says you can come make an inventory and pick them up when you have the time.”

Zhao Qindan waved a hand. “I’m not short on money, and anyway, I haven’t had any connection to them for a long time. You’re the one who’s ‘Zhao Qindan,’ and you ought to be the one to handle it.”

“N-n-n-no, I, I’m not...” Xu Rucheng turned into a stutterer on the spot from fright, afraid lest he be unable to break free of the identity of “Zhao Qindan.”

Zhao Qindan laughed.

Over a pot of Xia River Baijiu, the two of them spoke of the former sweatshops in Yuzhou and the densely forested Latent Cultivation Temple, discussing all the past. Zhao Qindan raised a cup of wine in honor of A-Hua, and Xu Rucheng hoped that he would one day be able to see the South Sea Hidden Realm with his own eyes.

On his departure, Zhao Qindan saw him to the ferry crossing on the Xia River and asked, “What plans do you have for the future, Xu-xiong?”

Xu Rucheng said, “Go back and rest for a while, wait for a new identity.”

“Oh?” said Zhao Qindan.

“While we can’t use spiritual energy, cultivators are after all different from mortals. Tai Sui says that the first couple of years will be all right, but afterward, as time goes on, there will necessarily be new discord between mortals and those who were once cultivators. Perhaps a small number of people will create calamities.” Xu Rucheng clutched at his hair. “It’s so strange to say ‘those who were once cultivators.’ I asked him why, and he just said, ‘You’ll know in a few years,’ all mysterious... Anyway, no matter what, the Luwu will prepare in advance.”

“With your record,” said Zhao Qindan, “you amount to an elder in the Luwu, and with your relationship with Tai Sui on top of that, transferring to the Kaiming Department’s general headquarters in Jinping...”

“To be an official?” Xu Rucheng waved a hand, laughing. “Don’t, I’m not cut out for that. I don’t understand about the big picture or the little one. I’d better stay among the common people quelling calamities.”

Saying so, he aimed a glance at Yuzhou on the opposite bank. The gentle river breeze carried away the steam. Though the spiritual energy prohibition had been in place less than a year, Great Wan had stabilized at an amazing speed. Fishing boats put into port in droves, and from a distance mechanical chug-chugging could be heard.

In all of this, the Kaiming and Luwu's contributions could not go unnoticed. If A-Hua were still alive, if she told people what he did now, probably they wouldn't mock her for having "poor eyesight."

When the third-rate imperial grandson had gone into the West, Xu Rucheng had in fact made time to go, and for a horrifying effect, he'd had a colleague alter his appearance by hand. When he sat down flagrantly by the third-rate imperial grandson's bedside, he had been planning to gather breath in his diaphragm and cry out Mua-ha-ha, get a load of who I am!, not expecting to have his sleeve clutched by the bewildered imperial grandson, who was gasping for breath.

The imperial grandson could no longer see, and he didn't recognize anyone. His flesh and bones seemed, like his life force, to have shrunk down to the point where there was nowhere left to shrink. Xu Rucheng felt that if you picked him up and shook him, perhaps there would be nothing left but skin, like a ragged kite.

Somehow, Xu Rucheng didn't play his malicious prank. He brought his ear close and listened to this noble worm's thin panting. As he gasped for breath, he said almost inaudibly, "I'm scared...I'm scared..."

After a dozen intermittent sobs, the imperial grandson choked, like a hiccup. Xu Rucheng bent his head and saw that his unfocused eyes were slightly open, staring at the bed curtains. A crowd of servants knelt outside, silent as cicadas in winter. No one cried, no one paid homage.

Naturally the imperial grandson's surname was "Xiang," but he was called Xiang...what was it now?

Xu Rucheng sat by him for half an incense stick and ultimately didn't remember, so he reached out and closed the third-rate imperial grandson's already cold eyelids.

Even more undignified than death was dying afraid.

Even more miserable than living alone and wretched was not knowing what you were living for.

"I'm going." Xu Rucheng saluted Zhao Qindan and boarded the ferry to cross the river. "Sister, look after yourself."

Some years later, when all the cultivators discovered that their cultivation was constantly regressing and their Ways of the Heart were melting away irreversibly, just as Xi Ping had anticipated, the conflict between the frightened cultivators and the mortals climbed to its heights. Groups of cultivators acting surreptitiously began to appear everywhere. They were opposed to technology, killed various toilet bulletin celebrities, kidnapped mortals to try all kinds of evil arts on them—fortunately, the Luwu were ready.

Like a fish entering the water, Xu Rucheng led the Luwu in infiltrating all kinds of filthy corners. He also persisted in sending a New Year's greeting to Zhao Qindan every year, and sometimes he would even get someone to pass along some little handmade trinkets to her.

This lasted until one year, when Zhao Qindan stayed up all night seeing in the New Year with a crowd of colleagues at the Tao World Record, and by daybreak, his New Year's greeting still hadn't come. She looked up at the daylight and understood.

A few months later, Xi Ping gave her an old knotted bag shiny from being touched and said that Da Cheng had given it to him to pass on to her. She embedded the knotted bag, along with the dust and old marks on it, in resin and turned it into a piece of amber.

Another hundred years, and Zhao Qindan retired due to old age, stepping back with honors. She left the name of “Sir Xu” to the Tao World Record and returned to the little house she had bought long ago. She no longer discussed the great events of the world, national economies, or people’s livelihood. She began to write in the Wan language a compendium on fine foods to be found around the lower reaches of the Xia River, under the name “Zhao Qindan.”

The main ingredient of the famous dish called the Xia River Ice Fish is actually the red carp from the Tianze River, which in the eleventh month of every year comes south in large numbers from the Tianze River to the Xia River and goes north after the 2nd solar term. When the red carp comes, the New Year is near. Therefore, years back, Wan called the red carp the ‘Beauty Announcing Spring,’ while Chu called it the Yu Fish...¹⁰⁸

This was followed by an annotation that had been inserted at some point. It said: Suspected of being Yu Chang’s brother.

The tip of Zhao Qindan’s pen paused. Glaring at that line of flashy cursive, she considered putting up a sign on the study door: No Admittance to Xi Shiyongs or Dogs.

Writing a fine foods compendium was interesting enough, but it incurred Xi Shiyong; that jerk had demonstrated great interest. He was always sneaking into the study to steal peeks at her draft, coming more regularly than a rat and often leaving behind samples of his “beautiful handwriting” giving directions on this and that. His views were extremely biased: today he wrote Excellent! after the golden flower almond paste, tomorrow it was Yuck after the savory and numbing clay jar vegetables, and most wicked of all, one day he left his remarks beside the mixed filling buns, saying, The filling ingredients are mostly pickled; eating them is like sucking on a corpse’s toes... and Zhao Qindan had just eaten mixed filling buns for breakfast that day.

She took off her reading glasses and sighed, ready to cross out that nefarious annotation, when the girl who looked after her house ran inside in a panic. “Ancestor, there’s a guest! It’s...it’s...”

Zhao Qindan frowned. Before the girl could finish, a commotion of footsteps and voices came from outside. The uninvited guests were rather rude, intruding without being invited in.

Zhao Qindan was just about to call for a guard when she heard someone say loudly outside the study: “Is Sir Xu here?”

Next, a big crowd of people came in surrounding an old man.

The old man was sitting in a wheelchair, hair and beard white, weighed down with age, seeming about to drown in his robes. He had lost the appearance of his youth, and only a pair of bright red eyes remained to make his identity unmistakable.

It was Yu Chang.

After the spiritual energy prohibition, the Ways of the Heart of the cultivation world's masters had melted away. But once they reverted to being half-immortals, there wasn't much connection between their lifespans and their original cultivation level—those whose paths in cultivation had been rather bumpy and who had many internal injuries often aged prematurely.

And when it came to bumps in the road, no one could count more potholes than Yu Chang, who had spent centuries wavering on the edge of losing his mind.

He had passed his whole life living in the present, without view of a future. Now, when Zhao Qindan, who had been a half-immortal all along, had just started having problems with her vision, Yu Chang already had one foot in the grave.

He was still breathing, but he seemed to have turned into a desiccated corpse. He only barely managed to sit upright with the support of two attendants. As if it used up all his strength, Yu Chang saluted Zhao Qindan.

As before, he was very polite to her, though his voice was now so aged it sounded like a chimney that hadn't been cleaned in a decade. "Sir—Xu. An old friend...ahem...an old friend has come to call."

Zhao Qindan automatically softened her breathing, afraid that if she breathed too loud, she would blow him to dust.

Originally, Yu Chang had only wanted to become Xuanwu, or even Xiang Rong or the Black Emperor; he'd had no intention of governing any nation. He only wanted to occupy the richly endowed Sanyue Mountains like the Xiang family before him and erect an invincible position on its pinnacle, so that Western Chu, as his appendage, would naturally shape itself after his order.

But the spiritual energy prohibition was like a nightmare he couldn't wake up from. When he opened his eyes, he was still in the belly of the beast; there was no struggling free of it. He couldn't become "Xuanwu"; he was only going to become the "wu."¹⁰⁹

Yu Chang had gone for a stroll outside the spiritual energy prohibition line and upon coming back had gone thoroughly crazy. All the ancient texts and secret scrolls that he could hunt up in the Sanyue Mountains—he tried them out one by one. Spiritual stones, the internal cores of spiritual beasts, all kinds of materials you could think of and ones you couldn't think of—he ate them all in every manner of preparation.

Sautéing, deep frying, boiling, eating cold with dressing, baking—he had even driven needles into his meridians and spiritual bones, injecting the magic materials. Ultimately, not only did he not manage to get his cultivation back, he nearly sent himself off preemptively.

But just when he had completely given up hope and was ready to choose between going crazy and living in a drunken stupor, the disorder in Chu reached a certain degree, and there finally came a collapse.

Commoners everywhere rose up in rebellion. In less than half a year, seven or eight insurrectionary armies cropped up. Those that didn't want to revolt fled the catastrophe, crossing the river east or simply escaping to the autonomous prefecture of Tao County.

The borders of the Tao County autonomous prefecture were surrounded by a ring of reincarnation wood like a city wall. They didn't block the roads or the waterways; they only kept out the ill-intentioned. Starting with the spiritual energy prohibition, there had been a stream of clever Chu fleeing to Tao County. Transportation was well-developed there, tall buildings stood like trees in a forest; in just a few years, it was more flourishing by far than Dongheng City had once been.

Later, Tao County could no longer contain such a large population. When it could accept no more immigrants, the Chu simply occupied land beside Tao County, found themselves reincarnation wood seeds, and planted reincarnation wood forests themselves.

Anywhere with reincarnation wood amounted to Tai Sui's domain. Therefore, apart from Southern Wan and Tao County, all the nations had signed a treaty with Tai Sui, prohibiting reincarnation wood within their borders.

But while Yu Chang could hold up the international treaty to make Xi Ping behave, he couldn't keep the Chu people from planting the trees themselves. The more strictly they were prohibited, the more seeds people smuggled in, and the means of smuggling were endless in variety and peculiarity. Xi Shiyong not only said nothing, he even regularly used the reincarnation wood trees that made it into Chu's interior to deliver firsthand news to the offices of toilet bulletins of his acquaintance.

The most ruinous incident was when a eunuch betrayed his nation and stuck a reincarnation wood branch into a flower pot in Yu Chang's sleeping quarters. How could Xi Shiyong, who had ascended to godhood in the way of rottenness, pass up such an opportunity? The next day, "Photo of Western Chu's Emperor Yu Drunk and Undressed in his Sleeping Quarters" appeared in the papers, written and illustrated.

Goodness, everyone had only ever seen their own bare-assed spouse at home; who had ever seen a bare-assed emperor? Therefore, they fell over each other to circulate it, nearly using up all the paper in the five nations for printing.

Though the headline of this photo was misleading and the main character in the image was still wearing an inner robe, the collar only open a little wide, Yu Chang still became the first emperor in history to make the papers for his "lithe and graceful bearing." Even the neighboring country's General Zhi, hearing of this farce, couldn't bear to look. He chided "preposterous" several times in a row, snatched Xi Ping back to the Xuanyin Mountains and gave him a thrashing, then grounded him for half a year.

When Yu Chang sobered up, he wanted to wash the imperial palace with blood on the spot. He nearly lost his mind there and then—but this person had been both righteous and evil in his life and had at last come to stand at the pinnacle of the Sanyue Mountains; there was some destiny upon him. It was at that moment that his Way of the Heart melted.

Centuries of seeking were like a dream; suddenly, he lost all sense of time... Yu Chang's heart palpitated, and his straying intellect was cut off in its tracks. During this pause, the female officials at Yu Chang's side stood up.

After seizing control of Western Chu, Yu Chang had conferred a noble title upon his mother and erected her statue on Sanyue's Principal Peak, in the place where the Black Emperor's statue had once stood. For this reason, apart from Great Wan's Kaiming Department and Tao County, the latter of which represented pioneering and freedom, Western Chu was the earliest to permit women to take the civil service exam and involve themselves in politics.

Yu Chang was an evil cultivator. His methods were vicious. As a ruler, he was severe and mistrustful. He was only somewhat more tolerant towards female officials, mostly lenient in sentencing even when they were convicted of crimes.

Chu was isolated, haughty, and uncivilized. It had always esteemed might. Chu's female officials, who had just gotten their feet under them, knew perfectly well that while Yu Chang was despicable, apart from following him, they could have no other foothold, unless they abandoned everything and betrayed their nation to flee elsewhere.

The female officials put all their efforts into whole-heartedly supporting him. Not minding the trouble, they expostulated with him and rushed about busily and in fact managed to stabilize Yu Chang, who had just reverted to a half-immortal. He spent three days calming down. The flames of his rage calmed, and his hatred of Xi Ping once again rose to new heights, such that even when he recovered his cultivation, he temporarily tossed it to the back of his mind, devoted heart and soul to training troops and strengthening the nation so he could flatten the reincarnation wood in Tao County and Great Wan with artillery fire.

He held that breath for a hundred years.

Western Chu broke free of its instability bit by bit. The “one minister and three officials” emerged—four remarkable women whose names would be remembered throughout the ages; when the old ladies had long since died in their beds of old age, they continued to live on in the annals. Chu’s festering diseases had been eliminated. While he hadn’t amassed the national might necessary to attack Jinping, there was stability everywhere, all professions were thriving, and the slightly derisive “Emperor Yu” spoken of among his peers had turned into a true Emperor Yu.

The attendant pushing the wheelchair said to Zhao Qindan, “Might we request that Sir Xu contact Tai Sui? His Majesty hopes to see him.”

Yu Chang pulled at his sleeve and interjected with difficulty, like a faulty bellows, “If...if I don’t see him now, I won’t see him at all...”

Zhao Qindan froze, then quickly ordered her maid to get reincarnation wood. Just then, a familiar voice came from outside. “Here I am.”

Xi Ping passed through a reincarnation wood tree by the street outside the house and arrived beside Yu Chang in an instant.

Yu Chang narrowed his dim eyes, staring unblinkingly at Xi Ping, who hadn’t changed a bit in all these years. A frightening light appeared in the lifeless red eyes. His mouth moved, but he made no sound.

Zhao Qindan pushed up her reading glasses. To judge from lipreading, this seemed to her to be a colloquial Chu profanity.

Xi Ping, looking at this old acquaintance, his...hard to say whether enemy or friend, felt a tangle of emotions welling up. Involuntarily, he lowered his tone somewhat and asked almost gently, “Yu-xiong, what did you want to say to me?”

Yu Chang’s lips moved again, but he seemed to choke on a mouthful of phlegm. He clutched his chest. The people around him crowded forward, making a loud fuss while patting his chest and feeling his pulse. There was even one who took out a needle—

Yu Chang suddenly waved a hand, sending them all away. He looked fixedly at Xi Ping. Xi Ping understood. He took over the wheelchair and bent down to put his ear next to Yu Chang's mouth. "Go ahead."

"Xi Shiyong, you...you..." Breathy sounds came from Yu Chang's throat.

Xi Ping sighed, bringing his ear closer. "Don't rush."

Yu Chang reached out an emaciated claw and seized his collar. Xi Ping didn't dodge. "I'm here."

"You...you're..."

"Hm?"

"You're an asshole! Ptui!"

Yu Chang's last exclamation was suddenly sonorous. He spat at Xi Ping. Even though this sole "celestial being" in the world reacted quickly, he was still caught somewhat unprepared. He managed to dodge himself, but his clothes were sullied.

Yu Chang, looking at his stunned expression, laughed aloud.

He had probably never been so carefree in his life. After three laughs, the sound came to an abrupt halt. The hand clutching Xi Ping's collar fell. Yu Chang's expression was fixed in a look of perfectly contented tranquility.

This mouthful of spit just before parting obliterated centuries of debts of gratitude and vengeance.

Though the Chu had been prepared, they were still greatly grieved. Zhao Qindan had to call over Tao County's troops to help make arrangements for them. The commotion in the little house didn't quiet until it was night.

Xi Ping went on foot to escort Yu Chang to the border between Chu and Tao County, then stood at the border, watching the motorcade until it disappeared.

Zhao Qindan returned to the little house alone. Since getting old, she often had insomnia. After lying in bed for a while, she still couldn't sleep, so she got up and turned on a light, filling in the entry on "Xia River Ice Fish" that she hadn't finished before.

The red carp is large, its flesh sumptuous and fatty, yet with a unique stink that boiling does not avail against, and that heavy seasonings and frying also do not remove. Smelling it causes vomiting. Only during years of famine would starving fishermen catch and eat it.

This continued until the first year of the Kaiming Era, when the sages did battle beside the Xia River and General Zhi froze the river with his sword energy. Tao County was heavily damaged by the incursion of the hidden bones. Seventy percent of the residences were destroyed, leaving many people with no home to go back to. Therefore, people beside the river fished out the red carp that had frozen to death so they could eat their fill and found to their surprise that the flesh of the fish was delicious and fragrant, without any unpleasant stink.

Since then, the unique fine dish known as “Xia River Ice Fish” has passed on to the present. Only travelers who visit Tao County around the New Year can eat it...

EXTRA 5 - Frost and Snow

The Xuanyin Mountains' spiritual energy drained away year by year, and gradually, Flying Jade Peak ceased to be so cold. In recent years, mundane grass and flowers had begun to sprout sparsely around the little cottage in high summer, and on sunny afternoons, you could do without lighting the heater. Listless auspicious animals filled the area near the immortal palace at the mountain's summit—yes, Flying Jade Peak's immortal palace had once again seen the light of day.

Exploiting the perks of his position, Xi Ping had called up a bunch of meticulous Luwu to take a cable car up the mountain, bringing abacuses and ledgers. Only after working around the clock for the better part of half a year did they manage to dig out Flying Jade Peak's immortal palace, which had been sealed for centuries.

But the inhabitants of Flying Jade Peak were too few. Even if they invited all their neighbors to make up the numbers, it still wouldn't be enough to fill the enormous immortal palace. Therefore, teacher and disciples still lived in the little cottage and only used the immortal palace when they needed to keep up appearances.

The cottage had been expanded somewhat. The first floor was where General Zhi usually received visitors. There was a large clock hanging there.

A karma beast avatar dwelt year round in the clock.

Perhaps because Zhi Xiu had brought it back to the Xuanyin Mountains, and perhaps because it had seen the shade of its former master in this new master of Xuanyin, the karma beast was a little dependent on him. It was always hanging around Flying Jade Peak. So Zhi Xiu had simply set it to watch the door and announce visitors.

The clock had been made by Lin Chi himself. It had been the first purely mechanical product of Moon Plated Peak after spiritual energy had been prohibited. The clock face was an entire zhang square, round on the outside and square on the inside, with a night half and a day half. Apart from the twelve shichen and ninety-six ke, there was also a “character hand” as tall as a person. Each shichen contained twenty-four characters, matching the twenty-four solar terms, so when the big clock ticked off a character, a mythical beast representing the solar term would jump out on the clock face and run around the dial. When it had run around twenty-four times, it would have come to the next character.

The karma beast loved it. It was always gamboling after the mythical beasts, full of delight. Outside of Zhi Xiu and Heaven’s Design Pavilion, Lin Chi became the third person it liked.

But now, Zhi Xiu had said that an important guest might come to visit, and having a single karma beast watching the door might not be respectful enough, so he had also set a Xi Ping to watch it.

They waited and waited, and the “important guest” didn’t come. Xi Ping spent two days exchanging hateful looks with the karma beast and got fed up with it. “So who is it? Such airs. If they don’t come soon, I’m not waiting any longer.”

“All right, then stop wasting time here,” Zhi Xiu said, “pick up a sword and come out back with me...”

Before he could finish his sentence, his accomplished disciple sat right back down. “I’m waiting for the guest.”

Zhi Xiu: “...”

“Hey, shifu,” said Xi Ping, “I’m going to your wine cellar to get a jar of wine-steeped plums to eat!”

Other people drank wine that had been cooked with plums; he particularly liked plums that had been steeped in boiling wine. He mixed them with honey to eat them. Decades-old mellow wine, and he would drink a couple mouthfuls at most and boil the rest away, never mind how wasteful it was.

Zhi Xiu went out holding his sword. “You can’t have it. It’s an insult to the wine.”

Xi Ping was selectively deaf. “Thanks, shifu!”

He got out an old manuscript of Zhang Jue’s, followed its directions to perform a divination, picked out a jar according to the results of the divination, expectantly broke off the sealing clay, sniffed. A failure.

Shizu was no good; his divinations were inaccurate. Shizun was also no good; the wine he made was as bland as water.

“Fortunately, I am filial and not picky.”

Xi Ping returned with the wine jar. First he teased the karma beast until steam was coming out of its ears. Then he idly got out a novel about Chu’s Emperor Yu Chang and read while he cooked plums.

The novel was a little hackneyed. It told a story of Chu’s Emperor Yu Chang remaining completely unmoved among a crowd of beauties (suspected of being impotent), loving only a young palace maid of unremarkable appearance.

He had once bought a book called Romantic Tales—Chu Emperor Anthology; all the stories in it were this sort of thing, the unshakeable red-eyed Yu Chang falling head over heels in love with a series of palace maids, eunuchs, female petty officials, carpenters, seamstresses, flower-sellers...and so on—and being summarily rejected.

At first, Xi Ping had read with keen pleasure, a peculiar smile on his face. Later he had read too much of it and memorized all the plot devices. He thought it ought to have been called Demeaning Anecdotes—Blindness Anthology.

As he read, he began to yawn repeatedly from boredom. His head, propped on his hand, began to nod.

The aroma of the plum wine entered his dreams in a daze, enchanting and dissipated. This smell took him back to the old Jinping of his youth.

He dimly heard the sounds of string and woodwind on the shore of the Lingyang River. The tune was very familiar, only distant, fading in and out.

Xi Ping followed the sound, struggling to listen closely and distinguish the old tune. Just as he was satisfied, he heard a bang—a huge monster suddenly turned up in the river in his dream. A hideous human head flew out of the water and opened its mouth to roar: “Zhi Jingzhai, I challenge you!”

Xi Ping's dream, runny as the water of the Lingyang River, was shaken to bits by this cry. He nearly fell out of his reclining chair. The karma beast running around the big clock also ran headfirst into the character hand.

The startled man and beast, fur bristling, exchanged a brief look of dismay. Xi Ping gave an ah and came back to himself. Pained, he rubbed the center of his brow. "Oh, it's her. I was wondering why I was being made to receive the guest."

There was no need to receive a frequent guest—for example, their "good neighbor" who came to visit every day; the karma beast could just call for them.

For guests from outside, it was usually Xi Yue receiving them. After all, General Zhi had some care for his reputation, and sometimes he was worried about outsiders getting a strange impression of Flying Jade Peak.

Only when Wu Lingxiao of Northern Li's Kunlun came would Zhi Xiu half-purposefully make Xi Yue stay away. Right now, he had sent Xi Yue to Jinping's Heaven's Design Pavilion to run errands for a few days.

Wu Lingxiao... She was a difficult person to appraise.

There were some people who had perhaps come out of the womb with a murderous aura.

After the life-and-death battle in the Land of Turmoil, Wu Lingxiao, whether she was compelled by the spiritual energy prohibition situation or had really come around, had accepted spirit-conducting metal...and accepted it a little too much.

At first, just so she could move as a half-puppet, she had made about the same adjustments on Moon Plated Peak as Xi Yue. After getting used to that, ignoring all of Moon Plated Peak's attempts to dissuade her, she had insisted on having upgraded immortal tools attached to her body.

The spiritual energy prohibition had just begun then, everything was in an exploratory phase, and half-puppet techniques were evil arts, strange to an orthodox sect. Lin Chi told her to give him at least a year, and only then would he dare to try out the safest upgraded immortal tool. Until then, he didn't dare to rashly operate on a human body.

Wu Lingxiao found even looking at him to cost an effort. She waved a hand. "Fine, go have your baby, I'll think of a way myself."

Next, an amateur being more dangerous than an expert, this madwoman ready to stake everything on one throw, having a general grasp of spirit-conducting gold, attached an upgraded immortal tool to herself.

Inevitably, she failed the first time and blew a manmade lake into Moon Plated Peak. Fortunately, though spiritual energy had just been prohibited, she still had her cultivation level; a shed skin body wouldn't die so easily.

This attempt at getting herself killed was too outstanding; even Xi Ping was amazed. He deliberately ran to get Xi Yue and tell him the outcome of altering a puppet on one's own authority. After this, it took Wu Lingxiao half a year and the help of a crowd of spirit-conducting gold experts working themselves into a frenzy to put herself together. Moon Plated Peak breathed a sigh of relief, thinking that she ought to calm down now.

The upshot was that before the venerable old lady could warm up her arms and legs, she went and did it again.

This time, she got very lucky and didn't blow herself into a heap of spare parts. She was fortunate enough to acquire an arm that could hold up a cauldron. Afterward, Lin Chi reviewed the whole process in trepidation and found that she had nearly answered the call of the Sword Ancestor. While putting what he had learned in order, he advised fearfully, "Princess, it was by a pure lucky fluke that you were unharmed this time. In the future, you must not act rashly again!"

“None of your damn business,” said Wu Lingxiao.

Before Lin Chi could sort out his ideas, she took Wanshuang and left without saying goodbye, returning alone to Northern Li.

At the time, Northern Li’s Kunlun was a headless dragon, and there was fierce internal strife in Yanning—precisely the moment when there was a mountain with no tiger. Just as ambitious people on all sides were raising armies, itching to act, the god of death descended from above.

She seized the Sect Leader’s Seal. Relying on an arm with an upgraded immortal tool attached to it and Wanshuang, she took control of the Kunlun Mountains. Then, without another word, she went straight toward Yanning, shut the city gates, and washed the imperial capital in blood. It was said that that night, Wanshuang’s fuller seemed to have rusted. Fire in Ping’an Palace turned the western sky red.

She suppressed the vying warlords with force and eradicated dissent. The situation stabilized somewhat. Then, there was no stopping her once she got started—one after another, she added new upgraded immortal tools to her body. Each time Xi Ping saw her, she was more ferocious than the last time. Among the swords of Northern Li, none was more richly endowed with talent than her, none more willing to sacrifice than her. They had to bow their heads and give her their allegiance.

Though there had been countless cruel and ruthless people in Northern Li's history, Wu Lingxiao still stood out among them.

After seizing sole power, she overturned the policies of shutting the nation to the outside world and forbidding Moon Plated Gold that had held for nearly two hundred years and began to commandeer domestic land almost radically, urging people to construct factories. At first glance, this seemed like a good thing, but ruling a great nation was like boiling a small fish—the reasons that made chronic diseases chronic had complicated history behind them; interests, culture, structure, and even the system of government couldn't keep up with her “instant success” strategy.

And Wu Lingxiao's method of “cutting the knot” was always the same—killing.

She abandoned the Night Revenants, chose the obedient and useful among them, reorganized them into the “Night Criers,” went to great expense to purchase equipment from Wan, then, copying the set-up of the Luwu, spread her “informers” out across whole length and breadth of Northern Li. It was said that Wu Lingxiao had special upgraded immortal tools in her ears, so when the Night Criers thought it necessary, she could directly “see” the scene long-distance.

Like Western Chu, now that Northern Li had become “enlightened,” on the surface it no longer prohibited the publications of toilet bulletins or the movement of people in and out. But before a renowned scholar’s article wantonly decrying the new policies could be published, his whole family died in flames. The Yanning nobles who had received word in advance and were preparing to escape encountered shipwrecks or assassins; no one managed to leave the northern continent of incessant wind and snow alive.

What brought this bloody page to its climax was “Ping’an Palace’s Night of Blood”—in Yanning’s Ping’an Palace, a favored concubine of the puppet emperor, confident of enjoying favor, got drunk and spoke without discretion, saying a few words mocking Wu Lingxiao. The next morning, she was found dead in bed by palace maids, her mouth wide open, her tongue and teeth gone, the bed dyed rust-colored with her blood.

Under the enormous shadow of the Wanshuang Sword, the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon went through the northern continent, factories grew up dense as trees in a forest, and the former Disciple Hall for sword cultivators became a place specially devoted to training new Night Criers. Wu Lingxiao appointed herself Kunlun’s orthodoxy and publicly challenged her former fellow sect members. She killed a dozen master sword cultivators who had studied under the Sect Leader and the Third Elder. Three ascended spirit masters passed away, including Kunlun’s Cheng Yu, the only one Xi Ping knew.

From then on, never mind the full name “Wu Lingxiao,” even “Princess Changji,” “Princess,” “Wanshuang,” and the term “sword-bearing” became taboo words on the northern continent.

The people of the northern continent had the valor and tenacity of those who braved the winds and defied the snow, and they were also the world’s most obedient citizens, most capable of enduring humiliation for a higher cause. “There are ears stuck to the threshold, and a knife to cut your throat in the frosty wind”—from the officials, nobles, and cultivators of the immortal mountain above to the common peddlers, herdsmen, and serfs below, everyone was on edge, not daring to say a single word out of line.

Zhi Xiu with his bone-deep breeding would enumerate a person’s good points even when badmouthing them behind their back. After this, when Wu Lingxiao was mentioned, he simply didn’t discuss her. His attitude was clear.

But the master of Wanshuang still came to the Xuanyin Mountains every few years. It was lonely to stand too high above the rest; apart from Zhi Xiu, there was no one else left on earth who could understand her way of the sword. She couldn’t even find an opponent for a debate.

“I get stuck with all the difficult ones,” Xi Ping muttered. He whistled to the karma beast and bestirred himself to greet her. “Senior, I hope you have been well...”

Before he could finish, a beam of sword light came right toward him. Xi Ping wouldn't respond to this attack. He turned and sauntered out of a nearly reincarnation wood tree and finished his sentence: “...since we last met.”

Wu Lingxiao was even taller than the last time he had seen her. She had countless things attached to her, like a warship on legs. On entering another nation's borders, all her offensive weaponry had to be disabled; otherwise, there would also have been a bloody light on her.

At present, the fourth generation of spirit-conducting gold had been developed, and the technique had been disseminated among all the nations. In fact, it had long ago been possible to make a half-puppet seem hardly any different from a human. But she hadn't repaired her countenance. As before, there was a thin layer of human skin over her face, and large expanses of metal were exposed. Her manmade eyeballs glowed red, scanning back and forth. Meeting her gaze could give you half a night's worth of nightmares.

Wu Lingxiao looked askance at him. “What, you don’t dare to respond to a single attack?”

Xi Ping, grinning, tucked his hands into his sleeves. “Let’s say I respond to one of your attacks, and you give us a ten percent discount on iron ore and furs next year. How about that?”

Wu Lingxiao worked herself into a fury, feeling that he was insulting her sword, but before she could scold him, Xi Ping offered a perfunctory salute. “I have already notified my shizun. He is practicing swordsmanship at the rear of the mountain, and it will take him some time to arrive. Won’t you come in and have a seat, senior?”

Having said this, without waiting for the guest to answer, he disappeared where he stood, transporting himself right to the potted reincarnation wood tree inside the cottage.

Wu Lingxiao paused, slowly put Wanshuang away, and swallowed her chiding—Xi Ping refused to walk two steps without using reincarnation wood to transport himself; this was a veiled warning.

The Law Breaker enveloped the northern and southern continents. The spiritual mountains were dead. The position of the master of the Tai Sui Qin and the Eternal Flame was transcendent; he was the only person she needed to have scruples about.

When she went into the little cottage and took a look, had she had eyebrows, perhaps they would have flown to the top of her head. Wu Lingxiao had lived for centuries, and she had never heard of a shifu going out into the cold and snow to practice swordsmanship while his disciple dozed, hugging the heater.

“I’m not normally so idle. I was specifically waiting to welcome our important guest.” Xi Ping removed the wine that couldn’t be used for receiving guests and put an earthenware jar on the stove to boil water for tea instead. He put a civil and insincere smile on his face. “Please have a seat, senior. I was just speaking of this year’s price of iron...”

Wu Lingxiao stiffly interrupted him: “I came to discuss the sword, not to discuss business.”

“Well.” Xi Ping nodded obligingly. When it came to “discussing” the sword, he had nothing to say; he simply didn’t say a word and started a staring contest with their guest; they would see who felt awkward first.

Perhaps Zhi Xiu was crawling back. The water boiled, and he was still nowhere to be seen. Wu Lingxiao really couldn’t take it. She said to Xi Ping, “Whatever else Flying Jade Peak may be, it still has the reputation of the Sword of the South. With an unfilial disciple like you, how has your shifu not broken your legs yet?”

Xi Ping rinsed the bowls and moistened the pot, putting on a great show with the tea set. Hearing these words, he raised his eyebrows and gave an indirect answer to the question: “My shizun likes to eat glutinous rice dumplings, because when he was little, back home in Jinping, every day when he finished his martial training, they would make him a bowl to eat at home.”

Wu Lingxiao sneered and muttered “southerners” under her breath.

Xi Ping continued to speak unhurriedly: “No matter how old a person gets, he still likes to eat what he was used to eating as a child. If you like it, too, he’ll tell you that it’s best to dip them in osmanthus sugar. If you want to learn, he’ll enthusiastically teach you the best way to blend the ingredients for the sugar. If you’re afraid of getting your false teeth stuck in it and won’t touch the stuff, at most he’ll mock you for missing out on good food. He won’t force you to eat it, and he certainly won’t break your legs if you don’t eat it. Senior, for my shizun, the way of the sword is a bowl of osmanthus sugar dumplings.”

When Wu Lingxiao had heard out this fallacy, she said, “Bullshit.”

Xi Ping, without urgency, asked in turn, “Then, senior, would you instruct me, if the way of the sword isn’t osmanthus sugar dumplings, then what is it?”

Wu Lingxiao said, “My sword is...”

“I know that the sword you wield is Wanshuang, but what is Wanshuang to you?”

Wu Lingxiao froze. When it came to discussing the sword, talking about sword aura, she could go on at great length, talk in a steady stream. She was the true root of Kunlun’s ninefold sword. Kunlun’s ninefold sword was wide-ranging and profound, its sword aura inherited in a direct line from Wanshuang’s Sword Ancestor. It was a sword unwilling to snap amid ice and frost, a sword that roared as it cut through the northern wind.

It shook heaven and earth; it was irresistible.

But a sword like this, what was it to her?

Wu Lingxiao coldly said, “What kind of insulting question is that? Wanshuang is me, and I am Wanshuang.”

“As far as I know, Wanshuang acknowledged you as its master less than three hundred years ago. Was it really because you looked at this sword and felt kinship with it that you transformed yourself into a sword-bearing half-puppet?”

Wu Lingxiao furiously said, “You...”

The reincarnation wood branches in the room swiftly elongated, firmly holding down the table Wu Lingxiao had almost knocked over. The karma beast had returned at some point. Its bright gaze shot out from the clock and fell on Wu Lingxiao.

But she seemed not to feel it. Xi Ping’s gaze came through the dense steam. There was a sly smile in it. Wu Lingxiao almost had an illusion of being sucked in by that gaze, irresistibly recalling the past in response to his words.

Her close kin and her elders had all left her then. She had suddenly lost everything. Under the Kunlun Mountains were hundreds of thousands of hands that wanted to pull her to the bottom of the valley. All she had was one desperate gamble—

Xi Ping’s voice became even softer. “Even if that was the case, before you encountered Wanshuang, what was the way of the sword to you then, senior?”

In Kunlun's Disciple Hall, newer disciples weren't separated from older disciples. There was a trial by fire every month, where anything might happen. At each trial by fire, the new disciples who had just joined would be bullied until they were half dead. If you wanted to endure less hardship, you had to strive desperately to become stronger. The old disciples didn't want to suffer retaliation from wave after wave of shidis who had become stronger, so they didn't dare to slack off for a single breath, either. Each one of them grit their teeth, held blood in their mouth, raised their sword again and again. It was especially hard for a girl, particularly after her brother had been eliminated.

Xi Ping's voice, which had become slightly distant, floated into her ears. "... I heard that it was blood and tears."

Wu Lingxiao's heart and mind shook. "A pack of drivel..."

"Only hatred and fear will give rise to anger. But I'm someone else's disciple. How is it any of your business whether I'm good at the sword? Why do you get angry as soon as you see me? Since you don't hate me or fear me, then what is it that you hate? What is it that you dread?" Xi Ping said softly. "Kunlun? Wanshuang? Or yourself without Wanshuang in your hand—"

After about two incense sticks of time, Zhi Xiu at last trailed in.

He smelled of medicine and was walking very slowly, as if his legs were acting up again. When he walked in, he didn't see Wu Lingxiao, only saw that Xi Ping had put out the fire he had used to boil water and poured the water right out. The smell of wine still lingering in the room covered up a trace of another aroma. Only someone accustomed to smelling the wine would be able to distinguish it.

“Where is Fellow Cultivator Wu?”

Xi Ping, “Got rid of her. You can stop pretending to be lame, shifu.”

“Is that any way to talk?” General Zhi's feeble legs did indeed become nimble at once. He took two herbal plasters from his sleeves and set them aside. “And what's that smell you have here?”

“I got it from Stut...Stupendous Scholar Wen-shishu.” Under his shifu's gaze, Xi Ping changed his wording midway and took a medicine bag out from under the earthenware jar. “I know when to stop. This thing only refreshes the mind and improves the memory. It's undetectable. Don't worry, she won't come again... Listen, where did you find such stinking herbal plasters? Are you sure these things are for treating rheumatism? What a shoddy act...”

As expected, Wanshuang did not come south again. Only much later, when there was an occasional mention of the “Sword of the South,” she would say, “Our ways differ.”

She had grown up amid dread and become the dread of countless people. The northern wind couldn’t blow away the enormous shadow she cast.

Thirty-five years later, Wu Lingxiao was betrayed by her subordinates and attacked by assassins willing to die at a critical moment in replacing her puppet parts. The upgraded immortal tools attached to her blew her and a dozen assassins to dust together. The northern continent’s darkest epoch ushered in a sliver of dawn.

In the morning light, the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon railways were laid down, the system of industry was fixed; under a myriad of souls of the dead, it was the northern continent that broke free of the shackles of the old spiritual mountains fastest of all.

The rights and wrongs of Wu Lingxiao’s life were hard to judge.

She had been born amid wind and snow, and she was scattered amid wind and snow, quietly and without a trace, like a late frost¹¹⁰ dissipating in the rays of the morning sun.

EXTRA 6 - Jinping (1)

“Her Ladyship has already prepared a gift on Your Highness’s behalf. This is a joyous occasion.” The nurse smiled obsequiously, very cautious, speaking almost humbly to the small boy in front of her. “When it is time for the little Viscount’s ‘hundred year celebration,’ the weather will have warmed up, and Your Highness can go in person to the Marquis Manor to have a look...”

The boy ignored her, continuing to scrawl on drawing paper. The nurse accidentally caught a glimpse of the paper, gave a start, and forgot what she was saying.

The third prince Zhou Ying, child of Yuying Palace’s Imperial Consort Xi—everyone said he enjoyed particular favor.

Because he had been born frail and sickly, His Majesty sent someone to ask after him every few days. No matter what was being distributed in the palace, His Third Highness was sure to get the first share; even the crown prince had to get in line. Princes and princesses under ten couldn’t leave the palace at will; he alone had that freedom. He could say a word and have the Yongning Marquis Manor submit a tally and take him to stay in Dangui Lane. Having inadvertently caught a glimpse of him casually scrawling, His Majesty had invited Mr. Tanghua to come the following day, making the famous expert of the day entertain a child.

Zhou Ying learned drawing quickly. He copied still lifes with his teacher and soon had something to show for it. But when no one was watching, he drew and drew, and the clumsy trees and stones became surrounded by savage faces that coldly looked out at people through the drawing, like one vicious ghost after another inhabiting the drawing.

The nurse took fright each time she saw it. She thought that this child had an extremely evil disposition.

The third prince was as quiet as a dead person. He practically never cried, and he didn't laugh, either. He plainly wasn't deaf or mute, and he wasn't simple-minded, but at four or five years of age, he didn't speak. The Office of Imperial Physicians could find nothing wrong with him.

But quiet didn't mean that he was easy to look after. The nurse had never seen such a ruthless and temperamental child. He might be as tranquil as a calm sea one moment, and without anyone bothering him, he would turn nasty the next.

Dropping paperweights and smashing cups and plates was nothing. Setting dogs to bite people, refusing to eat, harming himself—he could do anything until he got what he wanted. That was how he had obtained the tinderboxes he had on him.

This was the worst of it: he also liked playing with fire.

Other children had candies and pastries in their purses. His purse always contained a tinderbox; when he was bored, he would play with fire.

Once, when he woke up in the middle of the night and couldn't get back to sleep, this young master had been inspired with some "marvelous idea" and lit his bed curtain on fire, nearly burning down Yuying Palace.

With such a catastrophe taking place, naturally it wouldn't end well for the palace servants. The eunuch who had been keeping watch that night was going to be dragged out and flogged to death. He wailed, asking His Highness to "consider the many years he had served him," be merciful and speak on his behalf. He kowtowed until his head was bloody. Zhou Ying stood by looking on indifferently. When he saw this person who had been with him since early childhood dragged away like a dead dog, he smiled.

The nurse knew then that a vicious ghost had reincarnated in this little prince.

He had no heart and no sentimental attachments. He didn't consider consequences and knew no fear. He was like a snake that wouldn't warm when you held it. No matter how you praised him or humored him, it wouldn't win his good opinion. If you dared to be disobedient, you were asking for death.

Most horrifying of all, his expression would sometimes change while looking into empty space, as if communicating with some...invisible thing. Though he didn't speak, his lips moved, and from the movements of his mouth, he clearly wasn't saying anything nice.

The Imperial Consort had a weak temperament and couldn't control him at all. His Majesty must have been bewitched; he didn't think there was anything unusual about his son who seemed to have been possessed by an evil cultivator. If he heard gossip about him, he would have the gossiper beaten to death. Who would dare to be indiscreet?

The Yuying Palace servants could do nothing but carefully keep their eyes fixed on him twelve shichen a day, carefully attending on him with fear and trepidation.

Strange to say, only in front of the Marquis of Yongning could this evil child restrain himself somewhat.

Of course the Marquis couldn't beat or scold a prince, but he never minced words with this precious nephew.

He would pour a cup of sugar water and say, "Would Your Highness please sit? This subject has no choice but to give you some counsel." Then, stern-faced, he would deliver a long lecture. Once he started "counseling," he could go on for at minimum most of half a shichen, and there was no upper limit. It would continue until the old lady or his wife came to the "rescue."

The nurse, to her amazement, had watched the third prince "sit upright" in a grown-up's chair, his two short legs dangling in midair, his head drooping, the cup of warm sugar water clasped in his hands, not daring to drink and not daring to put it down. He really did seem somewhat chastened.

But however stern and inflexible the Marquis might be, His Third Highness was always willing to go to the Marquis Manor to be reprimanded. As long as he wasn't sick in bed and unable to leave the palace, he would spend around ten days out of every month in Dangu Lane.

This continued until it was discovered that the Marquis of Yongning's wife was pregnant.

After the third prince heard this, he stared blankly for a long time and didn't go out all winter. He only went to the Marquis Manor when he was invited for the Lantern Festival. He went there and back in a hurry, as if calling roll in the morning; he didn't stay the night.

That day, when the nurse was lifting him out of the carriage, she trembled when she touched his icy little hands. For some reason, Zhou Ying hadn't used the heater. His whole body was tense. His pitch-black eyes were focused on emptiness as he met the gaze of some unknown monster.

The nurse didn't dare to breathe loudly. She carried him back and offered him up as if she were carrying a bomb, thinking that the Marquis Manor's little Viscount was in danger. If he died in the womb, it would almost certainly be because this prince had cursed him.

The Imperial Consort had been pregnant last year. As soon as word got out, the people in Yuying Palace had felt insecure. The shrewd people said that while His Majesty loved His Third Highness, this child was peculiar and seemed unlikely to live to adulthood; the future of Yuying Palace would lie with the little one.

Unexpectedly, a dog in the palace, not watched carefully, had peeled off a section of a vibration repelling inscription in a corner while no one was paying attention. That section just happened to be struck by lightning during a stormy night, immediately bringing down half the courtyard wall. That night, the third prince out of nowhere ran a high fever that wouldn't go down, and the Imperial Consort went out in the rain to see him. She was struck head-on by the explosion and spiritual wind from the inscription and lost the child.

Not long after this was the incident of the bed curtain being lit on fire. All the restless “shrewd people” anxious to go elsewhere were sent by this fire to the torture chamber. Their “wishes were granted,” and they went to join that little prince or princess.

The bloodless smile on the third prince’s face that day gave the nurse nightmares for a month.

The third prince wasn’t close to the Imperial Consort. The nurse had seen that he was even a little impatient with her. And even so, he couldn’t tolerate another child, so if one arrived in the Yongning Marquis Manor, where he was “close,” what would become of him?

The nurse was on edge. She gave secret instructions to the palace servants, telling them to stay alert, not let that demon incinerate Guangyun Palace.

In the third month, with the Southern Sage’s blessing, the child in the Marquis Manor wasn’t killed by the demon. He was born without a hitch.

Rip. Zhou Ying had torn the drawing paper in his hands.

The nurse watched him tear the scrawl with the ink not yet dried into strip after strip. Then he raised a hand and pointed.

“W-would you like to see...the gift list?”

Zhou Ying took the gift list and glanced over it expressionlessly. He raised the brush he had just used to draw ghastly faces and made some strokes on the list.

The childish handwriting bore a trace of the rough edges of the brush being wielded unsteadily, but the structure of the characters was very correct. The writing said: One congratulatory drawing.

Part of the word “congratulatory” was written in a now rare ancient Wan character. It not only didn’t seem joyous, it looked a little horrifying.

This was another peculiarity that no one dared to mention. The third prince was literate—he hadn’t started his schooling. He could read and write without anyone having taught him, and all he knew was ancient characters.

Born with knowledge—if he wasn’t a reincarnated vicious ghost, then what was he?

The nurse shuddered, but Zhou Ying ignored her. He turned and took out a rolled up drawing, already mounted, and put it in a brocade box, indicating that she take it away.

The nurse's lips moved. She wanted to say that this was after all a joyous occasion, so it wouldn't be too appropriate for His Highness to send a ghastly scrawl like a gift to the bereaved, would it? Even if the Marquis didn't make a fuss of it and the child wouldn't understand, wouldn't it cause problems later? She took a look at Zhou Ying's expression and didn't make a sound—it wasn't her business.

Decades later, before handing over the Yongning Marquis Manor to the Kaiming Department, Xi Ping returned home to tidy up old possessions and turned up that old congratulatory drawing, then invited Bai Ling to help him sort out having it removed and mounted, prepared to take it back to the Xuanyin Mountains.

This wasn't a "ghastly scrawl." It was a drawing of the Marquis Manor's courtyard, decked with lanterns and colored streamers. The kindly old lady was seated in the center of the courtyard, the solemn Marquis was welcoming guests for the joyous occasion, and Madam Cui had a baby in her arms. The colors were extremely warm, full of joy.

Xi Ping glanced over this sign from the past and asked in surprise, “Did san-ge draw this when he was little? How old was he?”

Bai Ling said softly, “This was a congratulatory drawing for the occasion of the Viscount’s birth.”

Xi Ping blurted out, “Oh? Was he a prodigy whose talent came to nothing through lack of education?”

Bai Ling: “...”

Would you dare to ask such a question to his face?

Zhou Ying had been taught by experts. Naturally he was skilled at music, weiqi, drawing, and calligraphy—but only at the not completely incompetent level societal norms required for noble children; it didn’t amount to any particular talent. He had no inclination toward the arts.

The scenery and composition of this congratulatory drawing were very childish. The stones, flowers, trees and other such things drawn as embellishment were very stiff, and showed signs of having been copied; only the people in the drawing were stunning. Naturally people were harder to draw than objects; he might not have learned to do it yet at the time. Each person was drawn vaguely, with a few strokes. But in just those few strokes, which didn't even fully describe their figures, seemed to be an impression of their vital beings. Anyone who was familiar with them would know who they were as soon as they saw the drawing, could even imagine the expressions of the people in the drawing.

Xi Ping considered it briefly. "These people weren't drawn, I think. How did the two of you manage it?"

"You can tell, Viscount?" Bai Ling said, smiling. "Actually, I helped him make an 'impression' for this. I had only a paper body then. I connected to his consciousness and helped him make an impression of the images in his consciousness on my paper body, and then he went back and copied it onto the page."

Xi Ping stared. That really was a method that only a child would think of, circuitous and clumsy.

It was said that a paramount spiritual sense could see through a person's soul at a glance. Indeed, the impression on the paper was of their souls.

But then, Xi Ping noticed that there was something about the old lady in the drawing. To one side of her were lively maids, but to the other, there was nothing. There was clearly a blank part of the drawing.

The joyous page was missing a person.

“He was having a fit of temper.” With his deftness at judging people’s feelings from their words and gestures, Xi Ping understood the meaning behind this drawing at a glance. “My dad said that because of me, he didn’t come visit for over a year? Abominable. I don’t remember any such thing. If I’d known he loathed me so much, I never would have gotten close to him. He disliked me on sight?”

Bai Ling smiled.

“Hey, Lao Bai, have you ever thought that my brother is especially like my dad in this way? He didn’t pick up any of his good qualities, but he learned inflexibility from the old man. He couldn’t accept new things.” The once-rejected “new thing” said, dissatisfied, “Every year he had new clothes made for him that looked just like the last year’s, wouldn’t try anything he hadn’t eaten before... Even when it came to growing flowers, it was the same—over and over it was just a few varieties. What do you say, didn’t he have the slightest curiosity?”

“He did,” Bai Ling answered mildly. “He always wanted to see what it would look like when the sky fell.”

Xi Ping: “...”

Was this human curiosity?

“But I don’t remember him being ‘mute.’”

Not only had he not been mute, he’d had quite a bit to say. Words came to him especially easily when it came to chiding and telling ghost stories.

“Yes, this was before you were born, Viscount,” Bai Ling said. “When he was little, he couldn’t tell the Impassable Sea and Jinping apart. The demon host varied in intellect. Some could only shout, and there were those like the heart demon, who knew all mortal languages. A majority of the rest would go on and on repeatedly in some place’s ancient local dialect. He started hearing that at birth. Though he could understand speech, when the words came to his lips, he mixed them up. After he scared the Imperial Consort to tears once, he simply stopped talking.”

Xi Ping was silent for a while. “My aunt wasn’t crying because she was scared.”

Bai Ling agreed—the two of them knew, but a child wouldn’t know.

Once he knew, he wouldn’t be a child anymore.

“Actually...” Bai Ling took a look at the obtrusive blank space in the drawing. “It might not entirely have been because of a fit of temper.”

“Hm?”

“He had never seen himself, so he couldn’t draw himself.”

There was a kind of person in the world who, despite having all his faculties intact, couldn’t speak his mother tongue and had “never seen” himself.

There was an ice mirror in Guangyun Palace that could reflect a person’s pores, clear as if it had absorbed their soul. Many people didn’t dare to use it. But even standing in front of the ice mirror, Zhou Ying still couldn’t see himself clearly.

In his eyes, countless threads of karma incomprehensible to him were wound around each person, and their surging thoughts were always churning at the centers of their brows. When he was little, he couldn’t distinguish the subtle differences between sadness and anger, malice and fear. He would only roughly and ignorantly separate “good” from “bad,” and the vast majority of people were “bad,” including himself.

He was wrapped up in billowing blackness, his face blurred. For many years, Zhou Ying hadn’t even been able to work out whether he was a person or a skeleton.

When he was little, he had been unable to control his consciousness. When his surroundings constrained him, it was easy for him to skip into the Impassable Sea. A child's memory wasn't so long. When his body and mind fell out of sync, he was likely to be confused when he returned. And by coincidence, just when he was at his most bewildered and helpless, the people around him would become more frightening. They would do their utmost to pretend nothing had happened, not daring to look him in the eye.

In the vastness of Guangyun Palace, even the milky white light of the gas lamps rejected him.

He was immersed in this loneliness, enduring it day after after. Only when he went to the Marquis Manor did he have a chance to relax.

In his grandmother's courtyard was a little room with a blue window screen. It was his. When he opened the window, there was the old lady's garden, with cluster after cluster of tuberose plants at the foot of the wall.

There was an inexhaustible store of legends in his grandmother's belly, and inside the room were new toys that Cui Ji had collected from all over, hunting high and low. If he only went there, she wouldn't do anything else all day, only play with him, cherishing this first grandchild like a pearl, often saying, “If the old man could see A-Ying, he would be so happy.”

As if this “vicious ghost reincarnated,” this freak, were some...some great treasure that, if you missed seeing it, you would take that regret to the underworld.

When she occasionally saw his gaze become empty, she was never surprised, only gently patted him on the head, pulling him back from the den of demons, then slowly continuing what she had been saying—and this was also extremely rare. When Zhou Ying came to the Marquis Manor, as if he now had a foothold in the human world, his consciousness would hardly ever be drawn by the Impassable Sea. Apart from the old lady, who was always with him, no one else had seen it happen.

Even when the “wind rose” and his marrow was sucked by the demon host, and the pain came through his spiritual bones to the human world, his youthful consciousness would always be gently led by a pair of warm, dry hands.

The old lady wasn’t very learned, but she knew how to do everything. Though the Xi family hadn’t wanted for money, they still weren’t notably rich, and naturally the appropriate match hadn’t been with some grand family's young mistress. She had had to attend to household affairs and do needlework when she was young.

She could make a kite, a big swallow with several long tails behind it, which flew up more steadily than those made in the palace workshop; she could make imposing tiger head hats and all kinds of clever rag dolls; she could also turn the hidden demons in Zhou Ying's drawings into silly faces, stitch them onto little sandbags, and give them to him to play with...

It will end now, Zhou Ying thought when he asked his paperman friend in the Impassable Sea to make an impression for the drawing.

The tuberose and the evening breeze, the sweet soup and the opera highlights, the roomful of rag dolls, the big kite hanging on the wall... These things weren't his to begin with.

That was the Marquis Manor, and his surname wasn't Xi. He had always been an outsider.

Luckily he had already "grown up." He could split his attention to interact with both sides simultaneously, and he had gradually learned to distinguish the human world from the sacrificial altar, could even carefully speak complete sentences in Jinping dialect. He no longer needed to go to that little garden to "take refuge."

For the Marquis Manor's little Viscount's Hundred Day Celebration, he sent a gift but didn't go. In the seventh month of that year, when the old lady's birthday came, Zhou Ying had already started schooling. He only went over with the Imperial Consort's gift to pay his respects. He was gone before his tea was cold. During the Double Ninth Festival, he was sick again, confined to Yuying Palace... Anyway, he could always find an excuse.

It wasn't until the following year's Dragon Boat Festival that the old lady, bringing wrapped up zongzi and an embroidered purse, came in person to see the Imperial Consort and, brooking no argument, took Zhou Ying back with her.

That was the first time he saw Xi Ping.

When Xi Xiaobao was fourteen months old, the swift feet that would easily take him climbing over walls when he grew up already existed in a fledgling stage.

As soon as Zhou Ying walked into the courtyard, before he could find his bearings, a "ball" rolled out and bumped right into him.

The "ball" himself plopped onto the ground and knocked Zhou Ying, whose soul wasn't at home, into the old lady's arms.

“Hey, you naughty little thing, go, go, run along.” The old lady, in a “tie him up and lead him away” tone, called over the nurses and directed a group of people in carrying away the kid trying to climb Zhou Ying. “Rude little darling, he can’t take you bumping into him...”

The threads of karma on the child were shallow and faint, and his mind was incomplete. Zhou Ying didn’t see anything extraneous on him, only a plump dumpling with unwiped drool on his face, clucking “gege, gege” like a hen while reaching out his dirty paws trying to throw himself at him.

What was this? Zhou Ying was alarmed. He was still, immobilized...and then he saw Xi Xiaobao’s eyes.

Xi Ping’s eyes weren’t small after he grew up, and when he was little, he had been all eyes. The huge black eyes held Zhou Ying’s reflection. He was startled. For the first time in his life, he saw his own face clearly.

Only a child’s eyes could reflect such a limpid view. For those couple of years, Zhou Ying, relying on his eyes, understood what the world must look like in the eyes of others, refined himself until there was no fault to be detected.

Later, Zhou Ying learned that the ball on legs had already ploughed through the Marquis Manor, inside and out, several times; only the little room in the old lady's courtyard had been locked so he couldn't get in.

“Because that's your cousin His Third Highness's room. When gege comes, you have to ask him for permission to go in.”

The more he wasn't allowed to go in, the more he wanted to, especially since you could see the little swallow kite hanging on the wall of the room from out the window. Xi Xiaobao made a circle outside every day, longing day and night for his cousin to come. As soon as he saw him, he was as ardent as if they had known each other in a past life.

In Xi Xiaobao's childish heart, his cousin was a door god with great power in his hands. In order to win the right to come in and play for a while from the door god, he would sing or roll around, whatever was asked. Zhou Ying's words were more effective even than the Marquis's discipline rod.

Later, san-ge became a symbol for Xi Xiaobao that he “could eat Grandmother's hidden candy,” “could get out early from being grounded,” “could skip out on a beating,” “could not have to study for a day.” Without saying a word, their grandmother had turned A-Ying into Xiaobao's holiday, charging him with a heavy responsibility, so he would have to come, couldn't get out of it if he tried.

The moment he escaped the spiritual mountains, Zhou Ying at last saw the true, free and unobstructed heaven and earth—what he had wished for all his life.

And, in the stone that was as reflective as a mirror, he saw his own soul.

Spotless, complete, unencumbered.

Zhou Ying met his own eyes briefly, then traced his own image on the surface of the stone—the drawing he had given many years ago had been missing a person.

He had to make good the omission.

He had used up all his tricks just to see himself again. So when the old woman had let him see himself for the first time, how much painstaking effort had it cost her?

“A-Ying is wonderful.”

“If the old man could see A-Ying, he would be so happy!”

His wish in life had been fulfilled. Looking back the way he had come, every drib and drab of it turned out to have flavor to it.

The journey had not been made in vain.

The drawing was complete and a line of small writing left beside it. The artist's whereabouts were unknown. Presumably he had lost interest and returned.

EXTRA 7 - Jinping (Final)

On the third day of the year, according to precedent, the various nations' ambassadors to Wan finished their rounds of social engagements in Jinping and went together to the Xuanyin Mountains to pay their respects for the new year.

On this day, the Latent Cultivation Temple opened to the public, and all the toilet bulletins came to gather and observe, sending their people who were best at weighing others' words and expressions, hoping that they could discern something from various interactions during the New Year's greetings and make a judgment about the coming year's disposition.

But when it came to General Zhi, all thousand-li eyes and ears to the wind had to lay down arms. In his rebellious disciple's words, all the Xuanyin Mountains' auspicious animals tied together couldn't match up to shifu when it came to presiding over a situation.

He stood beneath a moonlight frost tree, smooth and easy, neither familiar nor distant, even-handed and impartial, treating everyone with the same regulation cordiality, guaranteed not to give any of the toilet bulletins the slightest opening to embellish.

Even with spiritual energy prohibited, Zhi Xiu still satisfied all of people's fancies about celestial beings...

On the surface.

“That’s the Xiuyi ambassador to Wan, Li Zhen, courtesy name Gucheng, from Zhaoye, a member of a collateral branch of the Xiuyi’s Li family... Shifu, didn’t he come just last year? And he publicly composed a verse in praise of your wine. I have goosebumps from it to this day.”

“Here you are, Gucheng, come warm yourself up. Winter here isn’t as warm as it is in Zhaoye.” As if nothing were the matter, Zhi Xiu hid the piece of reincarnation wood he was using to cheat at his fingertips and greeted the Xiuyi ambassador to Wan familiarly; there was absolutely no sign that he actually couldn’t remember who the person in front of him was. “You must take another couple of jars of wine back with you.”

“Oh! General Zhi, I am overwhelmed by flattery, really overwhelmed...”

Xi Ping lowered his head to hide that he was rolling his eyes.

Since spiritual energy had been prohibited, apart from the old injuries and illnesses that gave life a bit of “flavor,” perhaps the greatest inconvenience Zhi Xiu felt was that he couldn’t “consult celestial phenomena” anymore.

So General Zhi's masks of "ease and skill" and "steadiness like a mountain" had fallen and shattered to bits in front of his disciple.

After skillfully dealing with the Xiuyi ambassador to Wan, Zhi Xiu quietly squeezed the reincarnation wood in his hand. "Shifu's getting old. These foreign ambassadors come and go like images on a revolving lantern. How could I remember their faces after seeing them once or twice? When they've come a few more times..."

Xi Ping shot a glance at his shizun, elegant as a jade tree facing the wind, and numbly said, "This brother has been stationed in Jinping for six years."

Zhi Xiu: "..."

Xi Ping said, "This is the sixth time you've asked me 'Who is he?'"

There were people who lost the ability to tell left from right as soon as they started to fret, there were people who naturally couldn't tell directions, and there were people who could recognize written characters but not faces—none of that was rare.

But based on Xi Ping's many years' understanding of his shifu, Zhi Xiu didn't have any of the above problems.

He simply didn't pay attention.

The Sword of the South's special skill wasn't the sword, and it certainly wasn't celestial divination, already determined to be a lost art; as Xi Ping saw it, shizun's particular supreme feat was that no one ever noticed when his mind was wandering.

For rather dull occasions like ancestral sacrifices and social engagements, a peevish person like Zhou Ying would send a low-level paperman to disgust people, and a rude person like Xi Ping would of course simply not go.

But not so Zhi Xiu. He could be present from start to finish, behave so that no one could detect a hint of discourtesy about him, and if you asked him afterward whom he had seen, he would have to ask the stars.

Zhou Ying had always taken exception to General Zhi's style of handling affairs. Mentioning it on occasion, he would snidely say, "Doesn't he get tired?"

....No, he didn't get tired at all.

Everything he wasn't interested in, that wasn't important to him, Zhi Xiu was guaranteed to forget as soon as he saw it. That person or thing certainly wouldn't stay the night in his brain.

The Sword of the South's way of the sword was the same. A sword had only a narrow cutting edge, and a person's mental forces were also limited. It was enough to give one's full attention at the important moment; for the rest, you could muddle through, relax when it was time to relax.

So neither of his disciples had obtained his full teachings: Xi Ping didn't know what it was to "give one's full attention," and Xi Yue didn't know what it was to "relax."

It took a battle of wits and valor to get Xi Ping to practice the sword, and Xi Yue...

The expression Zhi Xiu said most to Xi Yue was That's enough.

Especially after the sword heart he had inherited melted.

"What has little Xi Yue gone to do? Why was I the one selling my charms here this year?"

Having concluded an entire day of entertaining guests, neither teacher nor disciple wanted to smile again. They roasted tangerines and ate them with the door shut, expressionless. Even the tangerines became grave.

“Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s examinations are coming up. He’s gone to help Wenchang.” Zhi Xiu tapped the karma beast that had climbed up his sleeve. “Go ask Xiao Yue whether he’ll come back on the fifteenth to eat tangyuan.”

The karma beast rolled over indolently and came to the back of his hand. An image flashed over it as it sent an avatar to Heaven’s Design Pavilion.

“Isn’t there still another month before Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s examinations...?” At first Xi Ping was perplexed. Then he realized something. “What’s wrong with him now?”

“He advanced prematurely and suffered backlash from the sword traces at the back of the mountain. If he had continued to cultivate, he would have lost his mind.” Zhi Xiu frowned. “I told him to leave the mountains to cool off for a while, think about why he wants to practice the sword, and to stop practicing for now if he can’t understand it. This isn’t the way to cultivate one’s body.”

After Ways of the Heart had vanished, only half-immortals remained. Of course there were differences among half-immortals, but at Xi Yue’s level, he was capable of leaving the mountains to handle any situation.

This was the era of upgraded immortal tools. There was truly no need to be so eager for rapid progress.

“What, does he want to usurp Lao Pang’s position?” Xi Ping tossed a tangerine segment into his mouth. “Shifu, what are you glaring at me for?”

Zhi Xiu waved a hand. “You scoundrel... Fine, enough nonsense, go find me the locator, I don’t know where I tossed it again.”

The locator was another product of the next-door Moon Plated Peak, tailor-made for Zhi Xiu by Master Lin. This was a board about half a chi square that automatically recorded the locations of all the items inside the cottage. If you couldn’t find something, you would pick up the board to search, and it would automatically give directions. Special treatment for the scatterbrained—since he could no longer practice divination, apart from Zhaoting, Zhi Xiu could lose anything.

The only problem was, he also frequently couldn’t find the locator.

Teacher and disciple were both young masters. The lazier of the two set the other to the task, and after turning everything over, there was still no trace of the locator. A few days later, Xi Yue returned, travel-weary, to save his sloppy shifu and useless big brother; he found the wretched locator in the wine cellar under the cottage—the temperature in the wine cellar had previously been maintained by a talisman, and after the spiritual energy prohibition had begun, that had been changed to a half-mechanized upgraded immortal tool. There were two pipes of spirit-conducting gold, one to cool and one to heat. To economize on spiritual stones, it wasn't always running. It only turned on when it detected a variation in temperature.

On Immortal Lady Shen's birthday, Wen Fei had come over to find someone to drink with. When Zhi Xiu went down to get wine, the temperature stabilizer had just happened to be inactive. He hadn't taken notice and had made a random grab, carrying back a wine jar and leaving the locator on the heating pipe.

When Xi Yue found it, the locator had been cooking on the heating pipe for over half a month.

Xi Ping craned his neck to look; it was quite well cooked, crispy on the outside and tender on the inside. "Shifu, should I sprinkle on some spiced salt?"

Zhi Xiu: "..."

Xi Yue sighed, rolled up his sleeves, and, working hard without complaint, cleaned up the mess added to the already messy cottage after his older brother had “swept” it, then went to Moon Plated Peak with the medium-well cooked locator.

Xi Yue was taciturn. Outsiders might think that he was cold, but actually he was very easy to get along with.

He was attentive and generous, and never appeared impatient no matter how many of Flying Jade Peak’s trifles were left for him to handle. How could such a person nearly lose his mind over and over out of eagerness to make rapid progress?

A chestnut flew at Xi Ping’s head and bounced off. He snatched it, and before Zhi Xiu could say anything, he sighed. “Yes, shifu, I know.”

Zhi Xiu, hands behind his back, walked over to him. “When he occasionally makes progress, he always unconsciously looks around, but he never knows who he’s looking for.”

That “eliminate the past” had swept away the concerns of the first half of Xi Yue’s life. Now, for the half-puppet, Xi Ping was only a very close older brother who liked to tease him. When he returned, Xi Yue was as happy as shifu and all the auspicious animals on the mountain; when he went abroad with the Luwu, he might be gone for three to five months at a time, and Xi Yue couldn’t be especially concerned about him—when ordinary brothers grew up, they always had their own things to do; the two of them, moreover, weren't brothers by blood, and the mortal relatives who had maintained their connection had passed away.

But unexpectedly, the "eliminate the past" had left behind dust.

Xi Yue had forgotten the sense of helplessness of his youth that could make him spit blood, but an unease that had no explanation remained. The goal he was pursuing was gone, but his legs were still fruitlessly racing.

Xi Ping squeezed the chestnut open and ate it. "Shifu, I'm taking a trip."

The medium-well cooked locator was naturally unsalvageable. Lin Chi took it back, the corner of his eye twitching; he would have to remake it. And after that day, Xi Ping once again ran off somewhere unknown. He was nowhere to be found on the Lantern Festival.

Three months later, a message came from Moon Plated Peak. The new locator was done.

The new locator was only palm-sized, so thin it was like a little mirror, much more exquisite. But while exquisite it might be, even the big one had been casually roasted. Wouldn't the little one be even easier for its careless owner to lose?

The instant Xi Yue saw the object, he made to speak, then held back.

“This one won’t be so easy to lose,” said the understanding Master Lin.

“This version of the locator can enter dreams. If you’ve touched it within the last twelve shichen, when you’re asleep or in meditation, it will link up with your consciousness. If there’s anything you’ve forgotten, it will automatically straighten it out for you, and it will ‘appear in a dream’ to tell its owner to find it when he wakes up.”

Xi Yue: “...”

Master Lin had really put a lot of thought into this.

Lin Chi said, “I also made it resistant to water and fire. This time there won’t be anything to worry about even if you drop it into a furnace pit. Go ahead and roast it.”

The “good neighbors” who were always coming up with outrageous requests could claim a large share of credit in the fact that Moon Plated Peak could always be first under heaven, making outstanding contributions in the field of upgraded immortal tools.

Xi Yue brought the new locator back home and reported on his task, then relegated this matter to the back of his mind.

Unexpectedly, that very night, he became the first person to receive a visitation in his dreams from the locator.

While meditating, Xi Yue already felt that his mind was a little unsettled. It was considerably harder than usual to remove distracting thoughts. When he finally managed to settle his mind, hardly an incense stick of time passed before his spirit once again shook faintly.

If your spirit shook while you were in meditation, normally it was due to major, insoluble matters appearing in your mind; pushing them down by force was not conducive to cultivation. Xi Yue knew that he had experienced no difficulties lately and figured that this was happening because he had touched the locator during the day, so he relaxed his mind and allowed his thoughts to wander, wanting to see what dream the locator would send him.

Soon, he seemed to be transported beside a long river. An event from the past flashed before his eyes: while he had been a walker in the mortal world with Heaven's Design Pavilion in his youth, he had fulfilled a filial duty on someone's behalf at the Marquis Manor...

Fulfilled a filial duty on someone's behalf? Whose?

Before he could get a clear look at this thought, time continued to flow, and he saw himself following his big brother off the mountain to the Land of Turmoil, beset by terrors and alarms the whole way...

Further back was the Latent Cultivation Temple...

Xi Yue stood beside the river of memory, a little confused: hadn't Master Lin said that the locator would only send a dream to remind you of things you had forgotten?

He hadn't forgotten anything.

The past was long. There really were some trifling details he didn't remember—like who had worn what color, what they had eaten for three meals a day; he wasn't a camera.

But he knew the sequence of events clearly. Could it be that because he didn't like to forget things, the locator would pursue them to perfection, remind him of all the details?

It seemed that this thing had no sense of priority.

Xi Yue wasn't sure whether to laugh or cry. If even he was getting this treatment, wouldn't shizun be overwhelmingly busy tonight?

Master Lin could also be unreliable sometimes. He would have to pay a visit to Moon Plated Peak tomorrow morning...

Xi Yue had meant to focus and break free, but he tried a few times and couldn't rid himself of the past events before his eyes, so he just had to make the best of it, allow that demented locator to lead him into the past. He felt that his memory was pretty good, so there shouldn't be too many forgotten details. He might as well get it over with quickly so this thing would let him go.

When he saw his big brother lazing in bed on the ship, asking him to do his assignment for him, then immediately being discovered by shifu far away in the Xuanyin Mountains and getting chased around and beaten by sword energy, Xi Yue smiled involuntarily. This really was something he would have done.

He also remembered that after this da-ge had used an immortal tool to drag General Commander Pang next door down with him...

In the memory, the hither seal flashed; the pleasure at another's misfortune had yet to be wiped clean off Pang Jian's dumbfounded face. All the details were recreated, true to life, by the locator. Xi Yue seemed to find himself once again on that ship, surrounded by chaos.

Suddenly, Xi Yue froze, noticing that something was wrong.

He very rarely recalled the past, so he had never realized that the scenes of events that came clearly to mind had absolutely no feeling of authenticity. There was a strange insubstantiality about them, as if he had read about them in a book...or as if someone had “written” them into his mind.

Only now had this memory truly “come to life” in his mind, becoming once again his own experience.

A familiar sense of consternation arose, filling his chest. Every time Xi Yue overdid it when practicing the sword and entered a condition of forgetting self, he would feel this consternation, forcing him to become a little stronger, a little stronger still, or else...

Or else what?

Or else...

He recalled his childhood, spent starving, in a constant state of anxiety, and all his joints began to ache. He was only a half-puppet who had been born at death's door. Being "useful" was his entire guarantee of safety.

"Useless thing, I'll chop you into firewood one of these days."

This was the first sentence he had understood in his life.

Or else...

He was caught by Heaven's Design Pavilion, a dragon-taming chain put around his neck. He was afraid, angry, dove headfirst among the tantalizing blue jade, and with a bit of the relief of this is how it ought to be, he waited in perfect contentment for death.

The sharp knife hadn't cut open his belly. He had found a new cornerstone for his misshapen life.

Or else...

With a rumble, the dams laying across his heart cracked, and love and hate came roaring out like a flood, bursting the calm, waveless river of his emotions.

He remembered being forced to throw the inscription in the Latent Cultivation Temple, the dragon-taming chain shattering in the Resurrection

Vortex, the seemingly unending five years of waiting, the wind and intermittent singing blowing past him at the funeral of the Marquis Manor's old lady. It was as if he were lame, never fast enough. Using all his strength, he could only glimpse a retreating figure.

Or else...what was the point of a half-puppet's life?

During the sudden attack in Jinping, he destroyed his half-puppet core, was taken back to the Xuanyin Mountains by shifu. An icy hand holding spiritual light touched the center of his brow, bit by bit wiping away the marks etched deep into his soul, turning his past into emptiness.

The big clock on the first floor of the cabin ticked off a character. The phoenix representing the "Grain Rain" solar term flew past the karma beast's nose. The karma beast, asleep on its back with its limbs splayed out, slitted open its big eyes and was just about to close them indolently when its eyelids moved. It rolled over and sat up. There was a human figure leaning toward it, seated in the rattan chair by the window.

Xi Ping, who had been gone for several months, had returned at some point. He hadn't turned on the light. His breathing was shallow and urgent. There was a sword in his hands. He was practically collapsed over that sword.

The karma beast sniffed in alarm and sniffed out a faint scent of blood. It strolled over along the wall, jumped onto the side of a flowerpot, and stared at Xi Ping.

Xi Ping, following the karma beast's gaze, looked at himself and realized that a wound on his chest had begun to bleed; it had soaked through the front of his clothes.

This was the only thing he had found inconvenient since shattering the hidden bones; his body didn't heal as quickly.

“Shh...hss.” Xi Ping waved a hand at the karma beast and carefully put down the sword. “Don't make a sound, or I'll put a rat into your clock tomorrow.”

Hearing this, the karma beast's fur stood on end, and it glared: Asshole.

“If shifu asks, say A-Xiang needed something and I've gone to winter in Southern He.” Xi Ping laughed and put down the sword. He left a note, turned, and ducked into a reincarnation wood tree.

The note said: For Yue-bao'er: The ancient sword Xiuluo, makes anyone who uses it powerful.

The famous sword Xiuluo, which had been out of the ordinary since its creation. According to legend, it had been created by the hand of the first Eternal Spring Brocade. After it was damaged, it had been repaired by the second Eternal Spring Brocade.

Hui Xiangjun had preserved the famous sword's sword aura whole and entire, and used the Unbound Furnace to pare away the remaining violence in the sword, leaving this famous sword without any "airs"; it didn't have a temper like Zhaoting and Wanshuang. It wasn't picky about its master. Any living creature with hands could pick it up. Before spiritual energy had been prohibited, anyone who got ahold of it gained a tremendous aid that could spare them a hundred years of struggle. Even the good-for-nothing Xiang Zhao had been recommended for promotion to ascended spirit.

This sword had previously ended up in Qiu Sha's hands, and had been taken by Xuanwu after Qiu Sha's death. Out of selfish motives, he hadn't turned it over to the Sanyue Mountains and had taken it with him when he had fled. Later, it had been forgotten in the no-man's land of the All-Devouring Marsh on the Chu-Shu border. It had taken Xi Ping several years of scouting with reincarnation wood to find a trace of it.

It was only that there were fierce beasts among the spiritual creatures nearby. He had come in at the wrong angle and disturbed the clutch of lizards guarding the Xiuluo Sword. While being hunted by those big brutes, he had been scratched a few times.

Fortunately, the journey hadn't been made in vain.

Xi Ping concealed his injuries and joyfully went to hide.

As expected, the Xiuluo Sword would let you get twice the result with half the effort. From then on, Xi Yue really didn't have any more inexplicable instances of trying to rush ahead to make quick gains.

And maybe it was a mistaken impression on Xi Ping's part, but Xi Yue seemed closer than before. Previously, apart from asking after an elder's health as a matter of etiquette, Xi Yue had practically never voluntarily spoken to anyone—though when others spoke to him, he would always respond at once. Now, when he encountered something he couldn't wrap his mind around in the mortal world, he would occasionally ask Xi Ping about it, and he had even asked for help once.

After Pang Jian retired from office with honor and entrusted Heaven's Design Pavilion to Xi Yue, he kept the peace in the human world for fifty years.

He had spent his life proving that even though he was “useless,” he still deserved to be loved; though he had been born defective and needed to spend twice as long as others slowly growing up, he also had his place at last.

Only when Xi Ping had grown tired of being “Tai Sui” and duplicated the souls of the departed in the Law Breaker’s little space did he notice that he only had a score preserved for Xi Yue from his youth. After obtaining the Xiuluo Sword, for some reason, he hadn’t entered the Law Breaker again.

“What secret were you hiding that you were afraid would be revealed by the Law Breaker’s music for me to hear?” Xi Ping said to the puppet at his side.

The puppet smiled without answering and refilled his teacup.

After all, half of a half-puppet’s body was human. A puppet body could be repaired and have parts replaced without limit, but the human body always had an end. Xi Yue’s dying wish had been to have the puppet body he left behind made whole and left to Xi Ping.

“I’ll be able to make tea...young master...” He seemed a little confused and whispered the wrong form of address. “Too...bad...”

Too bad that a mechanical puppet can’t help you with your assignments.

“You silent type.”

Hundreds of years later, the Law Breaker was realized, and the human world returned to the human world. An old gentleman came along with his puppet and countless forgotten old tunes that had once been popular and began a retro fad. He had a head of white hair like satin. The puppet could always brush it shiny and smooth for him and tie a snow-white peony into it.¹¹¹ His stage name was “Mr. Peony”; he dressed in whatever way was fashionable.

Mr. Peony made a movie. During the public screening, the old fellow shamelessly said that the leading man wasn’t as handsome and elegant as him, and spontaneously played the ending theme; for the first time, he accidentally played off-key.

“Hey, I’m losing my skills. I’ve gotten old.” He didn’t feel embarrassed in the least, as if “getting old” was yet another gift in life worth celebrating. Grinning, he put away his qin and turned his head to call to the puppet, “Yue-bao’er, we’re going home.”

There were those who said that he stumbled when he left the theater, and the people who stepped forward to help him into a car were dressed in blue.

There were those who said they had seen him in the vicinity of the Xuanyin Mountains.

The identity of “Mr. Peony” was a topic on which opinions varied wildly for a time, but his popularity quickly passed. He never appeared again.

“According to legend, Tai Sui is an ancient god—”

“No, that’s wrong, I did a search, it said ‘Tai Sui’ means a magic meat fungus.”

“And what’s a magic meat fungus?”

“Maybe it’s a big mushroom that gives you immortality if you eat it...”

REFERENCE

MEASUREMENTS

Units of Length

1 cun (寸) = 1/10 of 1 chi

1 chi (尺)*

1 zhang (丈) = 10 chi

1 li (里) = 1800 chi

*The proportions between these measurements have historically remained more or less constant, but the measurements themselves have changed over time. One historical record has 1 chi equal to around 9 inches or 23 cm, which seems to me a reasonable basis upon which to interpret the measurements as used in this novel.

Units of Mass

For purposes of this novel, only three measurements are necessary: the liang (两), equal to about 1.3 oz or 40 grams; the jin (斤), equal to 16 liang; and the qian (钱), equal 0.176 oz or 5 grams.

Units of Time

Time is measured by shichen (时辰), equivalent to two modern hours, and further divided into ke (刻), roughly fifteen minutes. Names for shichen with equivalent time listed below:

- Zi (子) 11pm-1am
- Chou (丑) 1am-3am
- Yin (寅) 3am-5am
- Mao (卯) 5am-7am
- Chen (辰) 7am-9am
- Si (巳) 9am-11am
- Wu (午) 11am-1pm
- Wei (未) 1pm-3pm
- Shen (申) 3pm-5pm
- You (酉) 5pm-7pm
- Xu (戌) 7pm-9pm
- Hai (亥) 9pm-11pm

At night time is kept by numbered watches: 1st (7:12pm), 2nd (9:36pm), 3rd (12:00am), 4th (2:24am), and 5th (4:48am).

⁷To clear up any potential confusion, Zhang Jue's surname is 章, different from the Crown Prince's maternal family, surnamed 张.

⁸Or huochong (火銃), an old type of firearm.

⁹Note on usage here: prince or princess of the second rank (respectively, 郡王 and 公主) are titles for the children of an emperor, while prince or princess of the first rank (respectively 亲王 and 长公主) are titles for the siblings of an emperor. Titles for princes are generally collapsed already (e.g., Zhou Ying is almost always referred to simply as 庄王, Prince Zhuang). I have also by and large collapsed most instances into just “prince” and “princess” except where the distinction is relevant and not apparent from context.

¹⁰The term the original text uses here is 螟蛉 (mínglíng), an insect whose English name is the corn earworm; the ancients observed the parasitic wasp stealing the nests of the corn earworm and believed that they did it to raise the corn earworm's young in their stead; therefore, the name of the insect has the additional meaning of "adopted son." I've shortened the name slightly to make it less cumbersome.

³⁶His name is 千日白 (qiānrìbái), the name for globe amaranth (Gomphrena globosa Alba), which is different from flowers belonging to the genus Amaranthus but belonging to the same family; amaranth on its own is just a nicer name than “globe amaranth.”

³⁷山陵崩 (shānlíng bēng), the name of this arc, is a euphemism for the death of a monarch.

³⁸The original expression is 义商良贾，泽被乡里。 More literally, it's "Good and righteous merchants spread beneficence in their hometowns," but 泽 (zé), which has the literary meaning of "beneficence," also means "pool"; like a large pool of blood, for example. So I've twisted it around a little to make that clear.

³⁹衙门 - administrative office or residence of a bureaucrat on the local level.

⁴⁰An idiom equivalent to “where there’s life, there’s hope.”

⁴¹潘安, birth name Pan Yue (潘岳), a writer of the Western Jin dynasty whose name is used as a byword for handsome men.

⁴²In the legend, dragon’s saliva impregnates a woman, and the child goes on to be the cause of calamity that ends the dynasty. Specifically, this passage refers to Bao Si, concubine of King You of the ancient state of Western Zhou, who deposed his queen for Bao Si’s sake and made her son the crown prince. Bao Si only laughed when the king lit the war beacons unnecessarily, which eventually lost him the trust of his nobles and left him without aid in a time of crisis, leading to the downfall of Western Zhou.

⁴³This references the ten directions (十方) in Buddhism—the eight points of the compass (north, south, east, west, northeast, northwest, southeast and southwest) and the directions of up and down (zenith and nadir).

⁴⁹Tai Sui is indeed one of the names for the Feng (封), a legendary food that grows back as soon as it is eaten, and that in folklore is said to be the earthly manifestation of the god Tai Sui.

⁵⁰A note on both names together: both the 开明兽 (kā míng shòu) and the 陆吾 (lù wú) are divine creatures that appear in the 山海经/Classic of Mountains and Rivers. They are both guardians of the gates of the divine mountain Kunlun, described as beasts with human heads and tiger bodies. In addition to being a guardian, the Luwu is also described as the steward of the celestial capital and an enforcer of divine law.

⁵¹秋杀, the second half of the expression 春生秋杀 (chūn shēng qiū shā), which means “what grows in spring withers in autumn.” By analogy, Qiu Sha on its own refers to something being punishing like autumn, which kills living things. The fifteenth day of the eighth month is also the Mid-Autumn Festival, when the moon is believed to be at its largest; part of the traditional celebration is gathering to observe the moon.

⁵²The ‘táo’ in the county name (陶) is pronounced identically to the word for ‘to escape’ (逃).

⁵³魏老板, or “Boss Wei” or “Shopkeeper Wei.” Purely a concession to what sounds nicer on my part.

⁵⁴The characters used here are 望川 (wàngchuān), which sounds the same as the Wangchuan River in the underworld, which souls cross to reincarnate.

⁵⁵There are conversions already on the Reference Page, but going by the most likely conversions, her height is probably around 6’9” or a little over 2 meters.

⁵⁶So what happens here is that the listing uses the character 贱 (cheap, base), which is pronounced the same as 剑 (sword); in my translator’s discretion, I figured this is about the level of the joke.

⁵⁷十面埋伏 - a classical and difficult to execute pipa piece with a rapid tempo that describes a famous battle.

⁵⁸The Magpie Bridge appears every year on Qixi (七夕), precisely the festival that takes places on the seventh day of the seventh month, which marks the once yearly reunion of the lovers the Weaver Girl and the Cowherd over a bridge across the heavens formed by a flock of magpies.

⁶⁸鲲鹏 - the kun is a legendary giant fish that transforms into a peng, a likewise legendary giant bird.

⁶⁹女儿红 - a kind of yellow rice wine from the area of Shaoxing city; traditionally, in a wealthy family, a father would bury a number of jars of it upon the birth of a daughter, then dig them up when the daughter was married to give as a gift to the groom's family.

⁷⁰硕鼠 - reference to a poem from the Spring and Autumn Period, in which the speaker tells the rat not to eat their crops and leave them to starve, or they will leave in search of a better place where they can keep what they produce; the "huge rat" represents an exploitative landlord overtaxing farmers on his land.

⁷¹Ancient measurement of volume used for grain, about equivalent to 100 liters or 22 gallons.

⁷²Author's Note: Means glaucoma.

⁷³Taotie and Jiuwei are both, like Luwu, names of mythological beasts, one a vicious monster and one a nine-tailed fox.

⁷⁴Kuafu (夸父) is a legendary giant (or the name of the tribe the giant belonged to), who attempted to catch the sun and died of thirst.

⁷⁵These names denote distance and breadth.

⁷⁶The Yu Changs are numbered with ordinal numbers based on the ten heavenly stems. The third heavenly stem is 丙 (bing). In place of Yu Chang's surname here is written the homophonous 鱼, fish; 丙 is also a homophone for 饼, cake; so in sum Xi Ping may as well be saying that he's planning on making a 鱼饼 (yú bǐng), fish cake.

As a side note, commenters often refer to Yu Chang as 鱼肠, fish guts, because it's a homophone for his name.

⁷⁷胡琴, general name for a two-stringed musical instrument played with a bow, most commonly represented by the erhu (二胡) or spike fiddle.

⁷⁸二嫂 and 二奶奶 are both terms for the wife of a family's second son, the distinction being whether the speaker is of the same generation as the individual addressed or a younger generation.

⁸⁴That's respectively 七 (qī) and 器 (qì).

⁸⁵The character of his given name, 荣, means “glory.”

⁸⁶流觴曲水 - a game for learned gatherings; cups of wine are floated down a stream, and the participants must compose a poem before their cup reaches them, then recite it.

⁸⁷This expression literally describes trees growing strong and sturdy, and metaphorically describes a family or a culture proliferating.

⁸⁸牝鸡司晨 - a (still derogatory) idiom referring to a woman who gets involved in politics.

⁸⁹This is a partial quote of the first two lines of Tang dynasty poet Liu Zongyuan's famous poem “江雪” (“River Snow”); the full lines read: A thousand mountains with no birds in flight, ten thousand paths unmarked by the step of man.

⁹⁰步琼 - the name is homophonous with 不穷, “not poor.”

⁹¹烛龙 - one of the great mythological dragons; in one version of the legend, it is equivalent to the sun, and can alternate day and night by opening and closing its eyes.

⁹²Author's Note: a telegraph, in other words.

⁹³The name 濯明 means “to cleanse (of sin)” — Zhuoming's implication is that Xuanwu gave him this name out of a desire to be cleansed himself.

⁹⁴口吐莲花 - a Buddhist term to describe a subtle remark, as the lotus is a symbol of Buddhism; commonly used to describe clever speech. Rather ironic use here.

⁹⁵Reference to a Buddhist proverb: “The sea of suffering is boundless and dark; turn your head around and you will see the shore.”

⁹⁶First referenced in Chapter 45; it is written 镜花, “flower in the mirror,” similar to the arc title (镜中花); like the arc title, it suggests something beautiful but illusory, too good to be true.
