BOOK 1 - Drawing Spiritual Energy

CHAPTER 1 - Midnight Song (1)

Southern Wan, the twenty-eighth year of Taiming, late spring.

The flowers of the imperial capital of Jinping were ready to wilt, but the fogs had yet to disperse.

Since the arrival of the Gold Imitation Technique created by the great master, the immortal Lin Chi, the Golden Hand, the fogs of the mortal world had become thicker year after year, more choking year after year.

But this was nothing to complain about.

The Moon Plated Gold created by the Gold Imitation Technique was a wonder bestowed by heaven. The strength of steam engines powered by Moon Plated Gold was endless. They could power great ships of a hundred chi in length. The Beiming Sea could be crossed with ease, and fast-moving great sharp-edged vehicles could level mountains and fill seas. Outside the walls to the south of the city, there were uncountable factories of all sizes. Machines thundered all day without rest, turning out top quality cotton yarn like running water. It was sold along the grand canal to Northern Li in the north, transported to Western Chu to the west; in the mountains of Southern Shu with its continuous cruel summer, neither gauze nor silk lacked for a market.

The livelihood of countless families, the old and the young, relied on Moon Plated Gold. Thirty li from the west of the city, Maze Station had been completed only the year before last, and already people and goods came and went. It was full of activity. The trains that drew in and spat out white steam were also popularly called Cloud Soaring Flood Dragons. Every day, morning and night, they rushed over the railways in their set patterns. In the morning they hauled goods, and at night they transported people.

Was this not a beneficence granted to the common people by the immortals?

The fogs of Jinping City couldn't be called fogs; they had to be called auspicious clouds.

After the new year, large numbers of fresh able-bodied laborers rushed toward the capital city like the tide. Maze Station overflowed every day. It was too expensive to find housing in the city. Even the dog kennels on the eastern bank of the Lingyang River couldn't be rented with half a string of copper coins per month, which was enough for a worker's rations.

The workers that came from other places had to pour into the shacks in the factory district to the south of the city, nearly putting together a proper town outside the city.

This year, Jinping City was especially busy, because it was the Grand Selection Year, which came once in ten years.

The immortal sect was going to choose disciples.

At present, Great Wan had only one place worthy of being called an “immortal sect.” This was the state sect, Xuanyin, one of the four great sects of the day.

Each Grand Selection Year, Xuanyin would calculate an auspicious time and send an immortal envoy to Jinping to choose outstanding talents from the mortal world to enter the immortal path. Jinping City had been bustling since the New Year, and heroes of all kinds were making trouble—potential disciples had to burn incense in honor of deities and cultivate their bodies and minds; successful candidates from the provincial exams had to come to the capital to take part in the general examinations; martial arts academies took to the ring to compete with fists and feet; even the houses of ill-repute weren't content to be still but had to add to the fun by voting for a Queen of Flowers.

Where there were many people, there was much business, and naturally there were also many places in the city hiring workers; anyone who had strength and was willing to try their luck could always find a bowl of food to eat. So while the state sect only chose among the scions of the upper ranks, leaving no part in the business for the common people, everyone still looked forward to the Grand Selection Year.

When the immortal envoy came down from the mountain, the year would be full of favorable weather and plentiful harvests.

And if the harvests weren't plentiful, that was still all right. To be able to come to the capital to look at the pleasure boats on the Lingyang River was also an experience. If you could add to that hearing from afar a couple of strains of singing with musical accompaniment, you could go home and say you had heard the voice of the Queen of Flowers, enough to spend half your life bragging.

On the first day of the fourth month, the blooming of the flowers was ending.

At the House of Overflowing Splendor, Jinping City's most highly-reputed pleasure house, the Flower Viewing Festival had also reached its end.

This truly was a splendid spectacle to mark the passing of spring. Rouge scattered throughout the city. A Flower Viewing Invitation for a private room could hardly be had for any riches.

That evening, the Marquis of Yongning was pestered to death by a group of “poetic celebrities” and dragged to Overflowing Splendor to bear witness as the newly-chosen Queen of Flowers took her crown.

This year’s Queen of Flowers was the famed courtesan Jiangli. The Marquis munched on melon seeds, taking a glance from time to time, feeling that this “famous flower” was nothing to write home about, with eyes and brows that turned down in an unfestive look.

But with the crowd of rogues partying all night and everyone’s faces plastered with three layers of white paste, you couldn’t tell one from another. Watching their revelry made the Marquis’s eyes hurt. When he saw Jiangli take to the stage with only a single musician, white-clothed and plain-faced, he didn’t care what she sang; as long as it wasn’t noisy, he would already feel some goodwill toward her.

It was said that she was singing a new song. No one knew where the musician had come from; she was quite skilled, able to command the scene while playing the qin on her own. Both the accompaniment and the singing were good. All the guests found it refreshing. When the song ended, gold and silver and ornaments fell like snowflakes, making the rising and falling stage let out steam wildly. The small building for a time seemed like the inside of a bamboo steamer.

In this way, the camellia crown of the Queen of Flowers fell on Miss Jiangli's head.

Wearing the camellia crown, Jiangli descended from the stage to thank the audience. When the big givers among the customers called her to drink a toast or sing an encore, she had to agree. Fortunately, there were many people, and quite a few audience members were of high rank. They wouldn't make too disgraceful a scene. After she had made a round of the audience, she just had time to breathe a sigh of relief and prepare to bow and make her exit before, all of a sudden, some idler called out: "Queen of Flowers, your victory today is half owed to that musician. I think she must be new. She's superior to your house's other musicians. Why don't you ask her to step out? In the future, we'll all take good care of her."

Jiangli's musician had been veiled the whole time, hiding behind a cotton screen. She had only shown an edge of her skirt when leaving the stage. The mystery made people's hearts itch.

Jiangli froze. Then, with an apologetic smile, she said that her own musician had unluckily injured her hand, and the one playing today had been temporarily brought in from outside. It wasn't suitable for her to show her face in Overflowing Splendor. She asked the gentlemen to excuse her.

The gentlemen made a fuss and weren't having it: what was all this about "outside" and "inside"? There were so many nobles in the audience that even the top scorer in the general examinations would have to dismount his horse and bow; what was she, top courtesan for half a night, doing putting on airs?

Jiangli was "elegant and refined"—too refined; she had no long sleeves to wave and, inevitably, wasn't up to dealing with this situation. While she stood there, stiff and not knowing what to do, someone said, "I'm coming! Look all you like—if you dare."

This voice was deep and low but forced up to a high pitch, hanging suspended, making listeners break out in gooseflesh.

Everyone looked up. They saw that the musician Jiangli had tried to conceal was a frank and straightforward person, openly shouldering...carrying her qin as she walked downstairs.

Her face was heavily made up in the fashionable style for court women. Over a face full of white paste, she wore a half-sheer veil.

Reasonably speaking, if you could still tell anything about a person's features under all this makeup, her appearance ought to be nothing to be ashamed of...but for some reason, there was something strange about her.

She was too tall and broad. Most of the ladies only came up to her shoulder. That big white face standing over the crowd of beauties was a little shocking. She was tall, and her build was large. The collarbones sitting openly on her “shapely shoulders” flared out so much that the sleeves on her upper arms were about to burst. Her big feet had pushed her embroidered shoes out into a pair of boats and shook the earth when they moved...and she was walking unnaturally, putting the arm and leg on one side forward at the same time.

This lady walked out and made a circle of the room, paying her respects, opening her mouth wide to exhibit her brilliant white teeth in all directions. The rouge on her lips was hastily applied. Some had accidentally rubbed onto her teeth. When this bloody maw opened, it seemed that she hadn't rinsed it after gnawing on a dead child. Looking too long could render you possessed by an evil spirit. It scared all the noble guests in the audience sober!

At this time, the Marquis of Yongning had unobtrusively left his seat.

As a young man, the Marquis had been acclaimed by women as the handsomest man in Jinping. He felt that these “famous flowers” were average-looking, and their so-called “arts” were sloppy and inferior. There was really nothing worth looking at. He would be better off going home and looking at himself in the mirror. He had come to Overflowing Splendor out of social obligation. He had said what he needed to say and didn't feel like watching these people disgrace themselves and make a fuss. Therefore he tidied his clothes and went downstairs, ready to go home. When he came downstairs, he had a direct encounter with the big-footed musician who was making her exit.

The Marquis normally wouldn't look a prostitute in the face, but since this lady's height was so abundant, if he didn't want to look her in the face, he would have to roll his eyes up.

He was startled by the heavily made up face that met his eyes and was just wondering where this fiend came from... But why did she seem a little familiar? Then the musician, who had been up to dealing with the scoundrels, abruptly looked alarmed, the half jin of white paste on her face nearly cracking open. Without a word, she turned and ran.

"Her" qin was left behind, and "her" shoes flew into the air. The dash made a big stir. It was like a wild horse equipped with a steam engine. The only thing missing was steam coming out of the tailbone!

The Marquis hadn't thought that the dainty House of Overflowing Splendor would be rearing this sort of mythical beast. After a moment's confusion, he realized something. He put a hand to his chest, his face turning ashen.

Around him, his household was perplexed, thinking that the master was once again having an attack of chest pain. They quickly stepped up to support him. “Master?”

Then the trembling Marquis trilled in a mumbling, altered pitch: “Get...get me that...”

The guards and servants were confused. “Get who?”

The Marquis took a deep breath and spoke from the diaphragm: “Get me that fiend!”

All of Overflowing Splendor went silent at the Marquis’s yell. Soon, everyone had heard—Gentlemen, guess what? The “lady musician” who just scared us to death without paying her dues? None other than the Viscount of Yongning in disguise!

A man dressed as a woman in a brothel, and he had run headfirst into his own father—how exciting!

Now, what sort of person was the Viscount of Yongning?

His full name was Xi Ping. It was said that in all of Jinping City, among the myriad wastrels, none could surpass him.

With this preposterous new trick, while all the wealthy people were scrabbling for one of Overflowing Splendor's Flower Viewing Invitations, the Viscount had taken the stage as one of the flowers himself. Anyone who heard would have to concede that he knew how to have fun.

At that moment, all the wealthy people gathered in Overflowing Splendor sobered up. Each of their necks grew two cun longer. They wished they could send their heads flying to observe the Viscount of Yongning fleeing by night in female garb.

The Viscount's flowing sleeves fluttered; the crush of his father's people turned him into a big moth. He tore his skirt, which was too narrow to spread his legs in, up to the knee. With his big feet bare, he flew out of Overflowing Splendor, running toward the northwest.

When he had just run past the pleasure boat ferry crossing, he met Wang Baochang, son of the War Ministry's assistant minister, head on. Xi Ping silently cursed his bad luck. Truly, enemies walked a narrow path.

It happened that this Young Lord Wang was a poor student and thought he was something special, a true talent. This “talent” had failed the military examination, leaving his parents to pay to find him a spot in the imperial guard. He often went to the brothels to show off. When he had shown off to his satisfaction, he would get drunk. With two cups of wine in his belly, he couldn’t find his way around and would try to display his “conquering heroic spirit” in front of everyone. Generally he would shout and snarl at the girls looking after him; when the wine went to his head, it wasn’t unusual for him to get physical. So as soon as he appeared, the girls became apprehensive. He was given the title of “Big Dog Wang.”

The Viscount and the talented Wang couldn’t stand each other. They were always at odds.

Now, Wang Baochang was standing at the mouth of an alley about four chi wide. This fellow’s figure was unusually valorous; he took up about half the mouth of the alley. Perhaps he was drunk. He held a ghastly pale decorative lantern in his hand, his blank eyes looking fixedly at Xi Ping. He didn’t make way.

Just then, by coincidence, an evil wind swept by. A gas streetlamp at the mouth of the alley went out for some reason. It popped and released a thin stream of smoke. A wooden carving of a kingfisher hanging under the lamp, half-blackened by soot, waved ambiguously in the wind.

Xi Ping thought that he had already been put to the test. His own father had barely recognized him. Why should Big Dog Wang?

But to avoid trouble, he was still planning to hide his face. Therefore, he waved his water green long sleeve and swept it in a surge of fragrance over Wang Baochang's face. In a high-pitched voice, he gave an eerie wail: "Faithless rat, give me back my life—"

With a female ghost demanding his life in the middle of the night, Brother Big Dog might have been scared silly. He actually didn't react at first. Xi Ping took the opportunity to shoulder him aside. He ran past without a look back, heading straight for Prince Zhuang Manor.

Prince Zhuang was the present third prince, issue of the emperor and the Imperial Consort Lady Xi.

The Imperial Consort was the Marquis of Yongning's younger sister, Xi Ping's aunt.

Xi Ping had been Prince Zhuang's study companion for several years as a child. He didn't stand on any ceremony with his cousin. Whenever he suffered a setback, he would come running to take refuge. Anyway, the Marquis couldn't break down Prince Zhuang's gate in the middle of night to get him back.

After squeezing through the alley in one breath, Xi Ping found that the footsteps of his pursuers had vanished at some point. He looked back for a moment and saw that his father's henchmen weren't following. It seemed that they knew where he was heading, and that they couldn't follow him there, so they had simply called it a day.

So Xi Ping, pleased with himself, swept his hair, loosened as he ran, back over his shoulder. Humming a tune, he went happily toward Prince Zhuang Manor, trampling on the hem of his ruined skirt.

There was no moonlight on the night of the first of the month. Dust and steam mingled together and clung to each other inseparably.

The grey fumes climbed over Jinping's gold dust-stained footprints, spreading outward from the Lingyang River and mixing with the steam spurting out from the engines. It tightly covered all of Jinping.

As for the people from the Yongning Marquis Manor, they had heard that eerie wail from far away. The Marquis Manor's head servant had plenty of experience. With one look at Wang Baochang's face, he knew that his young master had been up to no good. He quickly stepped forward and said, “Forgive me, Young Master Wang. That was my young master just now... He’s drunk. If he has given any offense, the Marquis will order to him to pay you a visit and apologize tomorrow.”

Wang Baochang was blank. He didn’t answer.

He couldn’t really have scared him out of his wits? The servant was nervous. He took another step forward. “Young Master...”

Just then, Wang Baochang stiffly turned his body, which had been knocked askew by Xi Ping. He was like a rusted piece of machinery. His staring eyes turned in a half circle. His pupils rolled up.

The servants from the Yongning Marquis Manor looked at each other in dismay, not knowing what this gentleman meant by pulling faces... Could it be that because their young master had just scared him, he was planning revenge himself by scaring them?

Before they could decide whether to cooperate and take fright, they saw Wang Baochang open his mouth and begin to wail a funeral lamentation: “Raise the casket, hang two mats, shelter it fully seven days—”

This description isn’t meant to disparage the quality of Wang Baochang’s singing. It’s that the words he was wailing were in fact part of the “Soul Calling Melody” used during funerals by country folk in Ning’an, which neighbored Jinping.

His voice was hoarse and shrill, like a crow cawing in the night. It chilled its hearers to the bone.

As he sang, he walked forward stiffly.

hrrk!”

He took a step forward with each word he sang. At “home,” his voice and footsteps both came to a sudden halt. He was “stuck” for a moment, standing bolt upright. Then, like a door without a frame, he fell flat on the ground.

A green jade tablet fell from him and rolled two chi away along the stone-paved street, making a string of crisp striking sounds.

He didn’t move again.

After a long moment, a brave servant went over to investigate. He reached out to push Wang Baochang by the shoulder and raised the lantern in his hand.

“Young Master Wang? What is this, Young...ah!”

The servant gave a brief scream, then plopped down on the ground. The glazed lantern shattered into bits.

He had no attention to spare for the broken object. As if his buttocks had grown feet, he skittered away in a panic—

He had touched an ice cold dead man. He was stone dead, even rigid. On the back of his neck, which was facing upward, there was even a big patch of livor mortis!

CHAPTER 2 - Midnight Song (2)

In a Grand Selection Year, at the foot of the imperial capital's walls, under the gazes of all, the son of a high court official had gone to see the kings of the underworld just like this, without a sound.

And the kings of the underworld had sent him back in the middle of the night to sing a little folk ditty, as auspicious as you could ask for, to add some color to the night on which the imperial capital selected a beauty!

By coincidence, a squad of city guards was patrolling the area. As soon as they saw Wang Baochang, they knew that something serious had happened. They immediately fended off the observers and notified Heaven's Design Pavilion.

This so-called Heaven's Design Pavilion was the state sect Xuanyin's outer sect.

The immortals of Xuanyin Mountain focused on cultivation and didn't often descend to the mortal world. All ordinary trifles were handled by Heaven's Design Pavilion, so Heaven's Design Pavilion's members were also known as “walkers in the mortal world.”

A “walker in the mortal world” was a cultivator of the “open-eyed stage” who had set foot into the immortal sect. It was said that they could take spiritual energy into their bodies but hadn’t truly established a foundation and entered the Way. In the mortal world, they were normally called “half-immortals.” Because they dressed in blue when they were on official business, they were also popularly called “blue-clothed half-immortals.”

Cultivators in the open-eyed stage lived a couple of hundred years and knew a variety of magical skills. They didn’t make obeisance to the emperor. They supported the immortal sect, expelled evil and kept to the Way. They were sent by the state sect to preserve the peace and safety of the country. Under normal circumstances, they weren’t under the court’s control; when it was convenient, they could even mobilize up to a thousand troops from the local garrisons.

Heaven's Design Pavilion’s walkers in the mortal world came very quickly—in Jinping City, apart from the Heaven's Design Pavilion’s head office, there were also seven stations to match the Seven Mansions of the Blue Dragon in the sky. It was said that they guarded Jinping’s Dragon Vein. They were called Azure Dragon Towers.¹ Each night, there were people standing guard at the stations.

The Azure Dragon Heart Tower just happened to be near the pleasure boat ferry crossing. The guard captain on duty at the Heart Tower tonight was surnamed Zhao, named Yu. As soon as the walking dead Wang Baochang gave his hoarse cry, the bronze bells under the eaves of the Azure Dragon Tower began to thunder simultaneously, startling Captain Zhao from his meditation.

When Zhao Yu arrived at the ferry crossing with two subordinates, the city guards saw the dazzling sapphire blue robes from afar and made way one after another, respectfully calling out “Exalted.”

Zhao Yu kept his gaze focused straight ahead, striding toward the corpse. Before he could take a close look, he heard a heartrending wail from a hundred meters away.

The city guard officer keeping watch over the body quickly said from beside him, “Exalted, we’ve already dispersed the rubbernecks. This is the deceased’s family.”

“Evil cultivators have many means. Before the body has been thoroughly investigated, don’t let mortals come add to the trouble,” Zhao Yu ordered lightly, then asked, “Who is the dead man?”

The officer responded: “The Ministry of War’s Assistant Minister Wang’s son.”

Hearing this, Zhao Yu paused slightly. His tone became somewhat more polite. “Explain all the details to his family and ask them to step aside and wait for now... I’ll go in person to offer my condolences to Assistant Minister Wang soon.”

The officer gave an affirmative, then turned to give his subordinate the order. Holding up a lantern himself, he slavishly followed after, offering up a green jade tablet wrapped in cloth. “Exalted, this fell from the deceased. There’s writing on it.”

A corner of the green jade tablet had broken off. All that was left on it was someone’s horoscope.

Before Zhao Yu could take a close look, a soldier from the city guard trotted over.

“Come here and report.” Zhao Yu raised his eyelids. “What is it?”

“E-Exalted.” Brought before a walker in the mortal world, this young soldier was about to forget how to speak. He babbled, “We’ve found his family...and his page boy. The kid says that his young master... Well, he says his young master was still drinking in company at Overflowing Splendor half a shichen ago, and there was nothing unusual about him. They still haven’t broken it up at Overflowing Splendor. Many people saw the deceased... They say he'd just had too much to drink earlier and wanted to go out for a walk, but after he went out, he didn't come back."

The officer pulled a long face. "Nonsense. Take the page boy in for close questioning. With the body this stiff, he must have been dead at least five or six shichen!"

The young soldier shivered and mumbled an affirmative.

"Not necessarily." After listening to this, Zhao Yu had people turn Wang Baochang's corpse over. He scrutinized it for a moment. He took out a thumb ring and put it on his thumb. The thumb ring was set with a crystal the size of a soybean. Captain Zhao lightly tapped four acupoints traveling up the corpse's torso. Finally, his fingers abruptly pressed with force into the acupoint at the hollow of the corpse's throat. Meanwhile, he held the crystal on the thumb ring between the corpse's mouth and nose.

Wang Baochang's corpse puffed twice. Like a coal stove burning low quality charcoal, black smoke spouted from the seven orifices of his face. All at once, it poured into the crystal on the thumb ring.

The surrounding city guards retreated in unison. The officer holding the lantern involuntarily craned his neck and did his best to hold his breath.

They saw that the crystal, which had been clear as ice, had turned into a bead of charcoal after sucking in the smoke. Looking closely, there was also some dim rust-liked red in it.

“The vigor has yet to disperse,” Zhao Yu asserted. “He just inhaled this breath. It’s still fresh.”

The city guards didn’t dare to speak. They could only exchange glances. They were all thinking that from his condition, this fellow didn’t seem very fresh.

Zhao Yu ordered: “Shave his hair.”

The city guard officer had gone overboard in currying favor. He just happened to be standing next to Zhao Yu now. Hearing the order, he didn’t dare to shirk. He had to brace himself and personally follow through.

When about half of the corpse’s hair had been shaved, the officer gave a surprised “oh!” and jumped up off the ground—starting from the top of the head, the corpse’s skin had turned bright red, as if a sheet of rouge had been stuck close to his scalp. The edge of the red was already drawing near to his hairline, about to spill over onto his face.

Zhao Yu weighed the jade tablet with the birth character written on it in his hand. His expression became slightly grim. “The dark veil. Someone has stolen him for an underworld marriage.”

Xi Ping only heard of this the next morning.

The night before, he had gracefully “flown” into Prince Zhuang Manor. His Highness Prince Zhuang had been unhealthy from birth. He had dim sight disease. Startled in the middle of the night, he threw on his clothes and went to have a look, then nearly went blind altogether. He cursed “disgraceful” three times in a row and called servants to haul the Great Moth Xi away to be washed. The Viscount’s heart was easy. When he was clean, he simply stayed on at Prince Zhuang Manor, planning to sleep till midday as usual.

But as soon as day broke, he was dragged out from under the covers by Prince Zhuang and taken to receive a guest.

Xi Ping was hastily cleaned up and shoved into the south study. In the south study, he met a walker in the mortal world who looked like a Bodhisattva. The “Bodhisattva” hurled a bomb directly into his face: Wang Baochang, who was strong as an ox, had keeled over and died the night before!

For a moment, Xi Ping forgot to close his opened fan. With the big words “Peerless Beauty” on the fan laying across his chest, he became a wooden chicken of peerless beauty.

Beside him, Prince Zhuang coughed gently.

Out of habit, Xi Ping picked up a teacup, tested the temperature with the back of his hand, then passed it to him. Then he finally came around. His expression changed. “Our manor’s people found the body? What about my father? Was he also there at the time? Did he also see the dead man?”

In his youth, the Marquis had been called Great Wan’s Wei Jie. He was a Xishi² among men. He was always going around around having chest pains. If he had bumped into a corpse giving a funeral wail in the middle of the night, wouldn’t he have been scared into an attack?

The walker in the mortal world said, “In fact, he didn’t. Set your mind at ease. The Marquis was hanging back a step. He wasn’t with your manor’s guards.”

“I see.” Xi Ping wafted the “Peerless Beauty” fan twice, his heart falling back into his chest. “What did you just say, sir? What does it mean to be stolen for an underworld marriage?”

“It’s a means evil cultivators use to kill,” the walker in the mortal world patiently explained. “The evildoer will think of a way to get the victim to accept a dead person's marriage proposal card. Then they collect a measure of his fresh blood and three of his hairs, and mix them with corpse grease, incense ash, cinnabar, and other such materials, turning it into a pigment, then write a 'marriage contract' on a human scalp that has been peeled off whole. Written on the proposal card will be the horoscope of the original owner of the scalp. The 'auspicious date' written on the 'marriage contract' will be the victim's date of death. Before death, his words and actions will be just what is written in the 'marriage contract.' Even if you were to make him slice off his own flesh and eat it, he would still comply. A person who has been stolen for an underworld marriage will stiffen before he dies. After death, he will start turning red from the top of the head. Within three shichen, the red stain will spread to the chin, like a bride's veil, so this appearance in death is also called the 'dark veil.'”

Having heard this, Xi Ping was startled. “No, wait a moment, that's... Exalted, are you saying that a ghost snatched Big Dog Wang up to be a groom...no, a bride? What kind of ghost has tastes that offensive to all of society...hss!”

Prince Zhuang had kicked him under the table, interrupting his heartless opining.

The walker in the mortal world who had come to pay his respects at Prince Zhuang Manor was Captain Zhao Yu himself.

Heaven's Design Pavilion had spent the night before searching the pleasure boat ferry crossing and had come up empty. That was why they had come to Xi Ping—he was the last living person to see Wang Baochang. Hearing that he had stayed the night at the third prince's manor, Captain Zhao had come in person to pay a visit.

Zhao Yu was rather self-possessed. He didn't take offense at Xi Ping's words, only asked, "May I ask whether you noticed anything strange at the pleasure boat ferry crossing last night?"

Xi Ping thought about it for a while. "No, I was the strangest thing at the ferry crossing."

Zhao Yu also asked, "Then are you aware of who might have had a grudge against the deceased?"

Xi Ping gave a "ha." Having been asked this, he warmed to his subject. He shut his fan. "There are plenty of those. With that Big...that fellow Wang's popularity, if you go to either bank of the Lingyang River and ask around, nine people in ten would probably want to curse him to death..."

Seeing that he was becoming more disgraceful the more he talked, Prince Zhuang could only interrupt him once more. "He wasn't sternly disciplined as a child. He's been spoiled out of all seeming. Pardon me, Exalted."

The Viscount of Yongning's "good name" was well known. Zhao Yu had heard of him before. Seeing him in person, he knew he wouldn't get anything useful out of him. He could only turn toward Prince Zhuang and say, "Evil cultivators have infiltrated Jinping in a Grand Selection Year and, with a corpse as a medium, conspired against the life of the son of a high court official. Their plans are sure to be of considerable scope. Heaven's Design Pavilion will do its best to chase down these evildoers. You and the others of high rank are asked to look after yourselves. Also, those who die stolen for an underworld marriage often have corpse poison on them. I heard that the Viscount made contact with the deceased last night. I have here a talisman to calm the mind and ward off evil. Please remember to soak it in water and consume it."

Prince Zhuang waved a hand to order the servant who was about to step forward to retreat and took the talisman himself. Then he turned to instruct someone to bring out an ancient painting he had collected. He said to Zhao Yu, "By coincidence, I recently obtained this treasure. As a layman, I don't know how to store a famous artwork without doing it a disservice. I heard long ago that Heaven's Design Pavilion has an Exalted Zhao who is an expert. By a happy coincidence, I've encountered you today, so I can't do without being shameless enough to entrust it to you."

Zhao Yu raised his eyebrows slightly. “Your Highness has heard of me?”

Prince Zhuang said, smiling, “When I was little, I studied painting with Mr. Tanghua of the Ning’an Zhao family. He mentioned you more than once, Exalted.”

Hearing this, Zhao Yu smiled. With his young man’s face, he involuntarily assumed the posture of an elder. Nodding, he said, “Tanghua is my third younger brother’s son.”

Xi Ping had woken early and hadn’t eaten yet. Prince Zhuang wouldn’t let him talk, so while his wicked mouth was resting, he had furtively snuck a pastry off the table next to him. Hearing this, he nearly choked on a lotus crisp. In spite of himself, he was filled with veneration toward the blue-clothed Exalted in front of him—Mr. Tanghua was so old he was senile; how old would his uncle have to be?

He sure could live!

Elevated as his lineage was, Prince Zhuang was still a mortal. Zhao Yu hadn’t meant to say anything to him; he had planned to leave after talking about official business. But he was pulled back to the mortal world by the name “Tanghua.” He remembered the little nephew he had played with when he had been mortal. His manner involuntarily became somewhat more cordial. He gave a pointer: “The immortal envoy will come to the capital soon. The chaos will only last a little while. Remember not to go out much in the next few days and not to accept anything with a horoscope written on it, or anything resembling a marriage proposal note. Punishing evil is our duty. There’s no need to thank me, Your Highness. The painting isn’t...”

Before he could finish, a servant came up holding out a wooden box with both hands. As soon as the box was opened, Zhao Yu’s refusal caught in his throat.

Xi Ping craned his neck and looked. He saw a scrap of painting in the box, only a half-chi square, all ragged. He thought, What the hell is this? An old dusting cloth that’s been stewing in a dying vat?

But the walker in the mortal world Captain Zhao, seeing this “dusting cloth,” had to use all his strength not to reveal a trace of the storm surging in his mind. Because he was holding back so much, his voice was a little tense. “The Mount Fu Mirage Drawing.”

Prince Zhuang casually said, smiling, “My knowledge of painting and calligraphy is superficial. I only obtained this scrap of the painting, and I really can’t tell whether it’s real or fake. I’ve heard that you have a ‘viewing wave,’ Exalted, that can tell fake from real. Please appraise it.”

The corner of Zhao Yu's eye twitched slightly. He silently extended a hand and twisted his fingers, putting on the thumb ring set with a crystal. As soon as the crystal came within an arm's length of the canvas, it let off a warm white light, impatient to declare that this painting couldn't be more genuine.

“It seems I wasn't taken in. That was nerve-racking. If it really had been fake, I would have humiliated myself in front of you.” Having said this, Prince Zhuang ordered his servant to wrap the painting up. “Please don't stand on ceremony, Exalted. Mr. Tanghua was my teacher, and you are Mr. Tanghua's elder. It's proper to show respect to an elder.”

The Mount Fu Mirage Drawing had been torn to pieces in the chaos of war. Zhao Yu had hunted high and low for over fifty years, and till now he had only found two surviving sections of the work. If he had encountered it elsewhere, he might have been beside himself with joy; he would have paid any price to get it.

But now, no matter how Prince Zhuang had obtained it, the reason Zhao Yu was shocked was that this ancient painting was the key to whether he would be able to take a step forward and establish a foundation. Every cultivating half-immortal had such a “key.” This was a profound secret.

Why would Prince Zhuang give him this painting?

Was it coincidence, or...

This sickly young man's smile was very pure. He seemed entirely unaware of the ancient painting's value.

Zhao Yu was uneasy, but he really couldn't refuse the scrap of the ancient painting. After dithering in silence for a long time, he tucked his "viewing wave," which was slightly hot, into his palm. He cupped his hand respectfully and quietly said, "Such being the case, I thank Your Highness. If there is any errand you may have..."

"Oh," Prince Zhuang interrupted him, "how could I dare? I only wanted to accumulate a bit of merit. We can all live safely in Jinping City through the blessings of the immortal sect and the protection of you Exalted."

Zhao Yu gave him a profound look, took the painting, stood, and said goodbye. Prince Zhuang personally saw him to the door.

Xi Ping didn't bother to think about what riddle these two were playing at. As soon as Exalted Zhao left, like a shameless dog, he slipped behind Prince Zhuang, planning to give him a back massage.

“Go away.” Prince Zhuang turned, his expression changing. The smile that seemed to have grown there was torn off. “I can’t endure your pounding.”

Xi Ping drew back his paws and poured tea for Prince Zhuang. “Thank you for sheltering me, san-ge. Have some tea, san-ge.”

Prince Zhuang put on a grim expression and glared at him.

Great Wan’s imperial family’s surname was Zhou. His Third Highness Prince Zhuang’s given name was Ying. He looked as mild as jade. Adding in an air of sickliness, no matter how he glared, he didn’t seem stern.

Anyway, Xi Ping grinned, not the least bit afraid of him.

Prince Zhuang questioned him: “What actually happened last night?”

“My birth sign has clashed with Tai Sui.³ I’m having a year of bad luck.” Xi Ping plucked a piece of chilled lychee, peeled it, and tossed it into his mouth. “There’s a girl at Overflowing Splendor, her musician had a bit of an accident right before going on stage. The song she was going to sing was written by me. I saw that she was in an awkward situation... Well, I also wanted to show off my skills, so I dressed up and accompanied her. But I was unlucky enough to run into my father. I mean, our old master, he’s hardly a respectable person himself. Fine, the governors are allowed to set fires, while the commoners aren't even allowed to light lanterns. He sent his people to chase me down eight streets. I wore out the soles of my feet..."

Prince Zhuang said, angrily, "What a scandal!"

"Who said it wasn't?" Xi Ping slapped his thigh. "It's one thing to bump into each other. Awkward enough. Wouldn't it have been all right for the two of us to pretend not to know each other? But he just had to yell so loud, and now it's all over the city. Isn't he worried about the humiliation?!"

Prince Zhuang: "..."

His maternal uncle's family was hard to describe. His Third Highness's temples ached. He tapped on his wooden chair's armrest, making the servants bring warm water. He dissolved the talisman Captain Zhao had given them and forced Xi Ping to drink it.

"Oh, oh, oh, I'll do it myself... Hey... Damn, what is this taste? Was this talisman drawn on toilet paper?"

"Talk any more nonsense and I'll stuff your mouth with toilet paper," said Prince Zhuang.

Xi Ping quickly grabbed a handful of preserved fruit and stuffed his mouth full, leaving no room for toilet paper.

Prince Zhuang glared at him for a while. The rims of his eyes began to sting, but his gaze still couldn't pierce the brat's face, which was three chi thick. He could only say in exasperation, "Didn't you hear just now that the immortal envoy is about to arrive? Give it a rest for a few days, all right? For a few days, stay at home. If you don't want to study, then sleep. Don't go to those disreputable places."

Xi Ping spat out a pit. "What does the Grand Selection have to do with me..."

"You're the son of a noble family, too, and you're of suitable age. How could it not have to do with you?" Prince Zhuang became serious and called him by his courtesy name: "Shiyong, you're not a child anymore. You ought to give some thought for your future!"

"Noble families have golden thresholds and wooden thresholds, but ours is a 'water threshold' rented from the Dragon King Temple," Xi Ping said carelessly. "San-ge, don't make fun of my father. At his age, leave him some dignity."

The Marquis of Yongning's threshold being of "water" wasn't any kind of secret—during the reign of the previous emperor, Great Wan's noble houses had colluded. The present emperor's wife's relatives had brought about disaster, raising a stink in court. This emperor was a steely-hearted personage. After succeeding to the throne, he had silently endured for many years. Once he had brought order out of chaos, he had cut down his important relatives until flowers bloomed on their ancestral tombs; he had even nearly killed his own empress.

There were many noble ladies of high rank in the palace who suffered the fallout from their families. In this way, by happenstance, Lady Xi was able to shine.

Lady Xi came from a humble family, with a petty official for a father who had died young, leaving only a good-for-nothing older brother to head the family. Like a common green foxtail that had gotten mixed in with peonies in a garden, she had unexpectedly caught the sovereign's eye, then given birth to the astonishingly comely and talented third prince. She remained a favorite and rose to the position of Imperial Consort.

In three generations of the Xi family, man or woman, young or old, there was no one who wasn't beautiful, and no one who wasn't an empty head.

But while empty heads were useless, they were also harmless. This family didn't make trouble and didn't strive for power. They focused on spending their own money and didn't damage the country or bring calamity to the people. Placed at court, they were unusually pleasing to the eye. His Majesty, in order to nauseate an old political opponent, with a wave of the brush, had created the imperial consort's older brother as a do-nothing empty "Marquis of Yongning"—hoping that the family wouldn't forget their origins and would forever remain as they were.

A "decorative" noble house like theirs might spook the common people, but it wasn't enough to fool Xuanyin Mountain into giving them a selection card. After all, Prince Zhuang was still young; he hadn't supplanted his big brother the Crown Prince.

It could only happen if the family's younger generation was unusually talented, with a good name that spread far and wide.

Though Young Master Xi's "good name" ... Eh, don't mention it.

Xuanyin Mountain's selection cards might be scattered throughout the streets of Jinping City, and one still wouldn't come to him. Lately his mother had been looking out for a match for him.

"Don't blame your own lack of talent on my uncle."

Xi Ping sighed. “A dog father can’t rear a tiger cub. Having raised me, what face can the Marquis still have?”

For a time, Prince Zhuang actually had nothing to say.

Xi Ping waved a hand, pulled over a small porcelain dish, peeled two lychees, and put them in front of Prince Zhuang.

His qin playing was superb, and his fingers were very clever. None of the fruit’s peel stuck to the flesh; it was completely clean. “You’ll get inflammation if you eat too many of these things, san-ge. I’ve peeled two for you and put them there. Sweeten your mouth, don’t eat too much.”

When this brat was acting out, he really was disgraceful, but when he was good, he was truly good. Prince Zhuang’s furrowed brow softened.

Then Xi Ping came up with a new line: “Anyway, I don’t want to go. Xuanyin Mountain is so finicky, all ‘three improvements, three abstinences,’ don’t do this, don’t do that... Is that any way to live? It’s better to die young than live forever like that.”

Saying so, perhaps because he had eaten too many lychees, he burped on the spot.

Prince Zhuang's hand, reaching for the lychees, drew back once more. He was aggrieved and angry. "Bullshit. You have no sense of taboo! I... You... Get out, out, out."

Xi Ping nimbly stood up. "All right!"

"Wait, Xi Shiyong," Prince Zhuang called him to a halt. "If for nothing else, the capital has been turbulent lately, and there's even been a death. Don't go out to fool around so much, do you hear me?"

Xi Ping called out "At your command," while his feet took him gliding out of the south study—if he only ran fast enough, san-ge's earnest admonitions couldn't catch up to him.

CHAPTER 3 - Midnight Song (3)

Xi Ping was a bastard, hard-hearted and lacking in sentiment. At any rate, Wang Baochang's death didn't move him at all.

As he saw it, with Big Dog Wang's character, it wouldn't be a surprise for him to be beaten to death in the street any day. The surprising thing was that someone had used such a bizarre method to kill him, as if deliberately giving Jinping City something to talk about.

As for the warnings of Captain Zhao the walker in the mortal world and Prince Zhuang, he treated them as wind blowing past his ear—as a young man of eighteen or nineteen, he was full of vigor, without any reverence in his heart.

He returned to his guest room and slept until the sun was setting. Then this night owl woke up.

He stretched enormously, sat up, and ate three trays of crystal dumplings along with bird's nest porridge, filling up on liquid—his cousin was young, but he lived like an old man. The food in the prince's manor was all soup, dull to eat—so Xi Ping planned to go elsewhere to hunt for food.

The Viscount plucked a perfectly blooming rose in the garden and clumsily stepped on the tail of Prince Zhuang's big black cat. The big black cat bristled and retaliated.

These two fought a battle, which Xi Ping won.

Satisfied with himself, he stuck the flower into his lapel. Letting off a powerful sweet fragrance, he left the prince's manor and went to play around at the House of Overflowing Splendor once again.

When Prince Zhuang, Zhou Ying, heard a report of this from his servant, he was just playing weiqi with his assistant Wang Jian. Hearing the report, he wasn't in the least surprised. "He's run off again?"

He took the offended black cat and gently tapped the cat's head. "How about you? You're always getting bullied. Why don't you stay away from him? Are you stupid?"

The cat feared the strong but bullied the weak. It couldn't defeat Xi Ping, so it vented its anger on its owner. It batted at him with its paw. Fortunately, Prince Zhuang was used to dodging. His hand was uninjured, though a thread of his long sleeve came loose.

The young eunuch was frightened enough to drop to his knees with a thud.

But the black cat had no fear. It flailed its hind leg and kicked its owner, then ran off, hissing.

“It’s no matter. You may leave.” Prince Zhuang waved a hand. It was unclear whether he was cursing the cat or the man when he said, “Can I lower myself to argue with a little beast I myself spoiled?”

Wang Jian said, smiling, “The way Your Highness treats the Viscount is truly...no less than his own older brother would do.”

He held down a series of coughs with hot water. The heat brought a faint flush to his fingertips. He was like a weary snowman.

When the young eunuch had closed the door and departed, Prince Zhuang finally put down the porcelain cup and looked at Wang Jian.

Wang Jian understood. He took a piece of paper from his sleeve. He said, quietly, “This is the current list of selected disciples we’ve received, thirty people in all. Xuanyin’s immortal envoy hasn’t arrived yet. If the immortal envoy takes a liking to someone at the last moment, perhaps a name or two will be added. Normally, there won't be much of a change. As I see it, this is more or less the outcome of this year's Grand Selection."

Prince Zhuang took it and glanced at it. He picked up a brush and crossed off a few names. "Before the immortal envoy comes to Jinping, these people will either disgrace themselves or suffer ill health."

His tone was flat, as though his word was final.

"Very well," Wang Jian agreed, and waited for Prince Zhuang to tell him whom to recommend—while it was the immortal sect that chose disciples in the Grand Selection, who was in fact selected in the end depended on chess games at court.

But Prince Zhuang didn't go into this. He turned his face away and coughed a few times, then lightly said, "Let the Crown Prince's in-laws get word of this. I remember that my oldest brother has a brother-in-law of appropriate age this year."

Wang Jian paused. He couldn't resist giving Prince Zhuang a look.

The luminous pearl suspended in the study was as bright as a full moon. The light fell on Prince Zhuang like moonlight falling on snow.

Reflecting frost.

All the big families had people at Xuanyin and could “speak to Heaven.” Even the emperor couldn’t remove or demote people as he liked. When Emperor Taiming had calmed the disorder caused by his wife’s relatives, he had in fact also made use of internal strife at Xuanyin Mountain. After the business had passed, the great families at Xuanyin had been reshuffled. The Crown Prince’s mother’s Zhang family had been one of those shuffled out, and since then they had had no part in the immortal sect—the Zhang family’s younger generations could no longer enter the Grand Selection’s name list.

This Crown Prince, who was both the son of the official wife and the eldest son, was known for his benevolence and filial piety. He had been dragged down for years by his mother’s family and had always acted with utmost caution. If he had the chance to plant his wife’s family at Xuanyin Mountain, would his desires be aroused?

Would he meddle in Xuanyin’s Grand Selection under the nose of a sovereign in the prime of life?

Wang Jian didn’t dare to think any further. He agreed respectfully. Then, a little ingratiatingly, he said, “If the Crown Prince truly can’t resist and steps in, we’ll be able to control it. Perhaps we can get the Viscount in as well.”

Without so much as looking up, Prince Zhuang said, "I asked. He says he doesn't want to go."

Wang Jian said, smiling, "Young people don't understand. They don't know the gravity of the future. And perhaps the Viscount is uncomfortable asking it of you..."

Prince Zhuang tossed down a piece with a clatter. He raised his eyelids and glanced at Wang Jian.

Wang Jian gave a start and hastily drew his front teeth back into his mouth.

"My hand slipped. No need to be nervous, Ziqian. When has that scoundrel ever shown any shame when he wanted something from me? If he says he doesn't want to go, he doesn't want to go. Anyway, a cultivation sect isn't a clean place. I'm not desperate enough yet to hope he'll go test the waters in my stead."

Wang Jian quietly said, "We'll change the subject."

"No need," Prince Zhuang said. "Don't put away the board. We'll continue another day. Go about your business."

Wang Jian, keeping himself to himself, retreated and left. There was a trace of sweat at the corners of his brow. When he reached the courtyard, he looked up and saw the dim River of Stars. The night was oppressive. In spite of himself, he sighed: there were secret currents surging at court. In heaven and on earth, it never ceased.

Even Xi Ping, when he went out, felt that the atmosphere in Jinping wasn't right.

The Lingyang River passed through Jinping City from north to south, cutting the city in two: on the west bank was Guangyun Palace surrounded by the imperial city with its nine gates, as well as the gathering place of the high officials and noble lords; the east bank, however, was inhabited by the lower classes. A river separated the wealthy and the poor. On the river there were dinner parties, music and singing; it was always full of floating pleasure boats.

But this afternoon, the Lingyang River, which previously had been active until daybreak, was completely still. Even the steamships were quietly moored by the banks.

Without the clouds and mist produced by the pleasure boats, the view over the river was considerably clearer. You could see right to the east bank, where the city guardsmen were obviously more concentrated than usual.

The out of town workers spending the night outdoors to save money were scared of getting into trouble; there was no one in sight.

Even the House of Overflowing Splendor had calmed down.

The Flower Viewing Festival had been just last night, but now, when Xi Ping made a circle of the main hall, all he heard anyone discussing was Wang Baochang, as if Big Dog Wang were the new Queen of Flowers.

There was also an individual who claimed to be well-informed, spraying spit as he described Wang Baochang's appearance in death, all "fangs sprouting from his mouth" and "red fur growing on his face"...just as if he had seen it with his own eyes. When he reached an exciting point, he waved his hands and stamped his feet, accidentally bumping the cup of wine in Young Master Xi's hand and spilling half of it.

Inadvertently caught in the crossfire, Xi Ping was about to flare up when he heard a bustle from the stairs.

"It's the Queen of Flowers!"

"Look, look, look, it's Jiangli! Jiangli has come out!"

Jiangli's hair was loosely tied back. She was the center of attention as she came downstairs. She glanced idly toward the main hall and knew at once that today was different from yesterday. There were no high ranking people who could push her to start her act. Her expression chilled at once—Jiangli had always accepted only distinguished guests. She wouldn't give the undistinguished ones so much as a look.

Reasonably speaking, those who hung up their shingle and did business only played with the rich, but no one was like Jiangli, whose face said right out "I'm a snob."

But then again, a base nature couldn't attain the noblest heights; there were quite a few people who bought what she was selling.

Xi Ping glimpsed her from afar with interest—ordinarily, Jiangli liked to wear plain-colored clothes. Today, with the camellia crown on her head, she had instead gone out of her way to choose a red dress, and the rouge was thick on her lips. She was bristling with arrogance, like an azalea that had cheated spring. The other fresh flowers, big and small, who ordinarily vied with each other, seemed to have reached an agreement; each one was dressed as though there had been a death in the family, once again setting her off outstandingly.

Only when she saw Xi Ping did a trace of a smile appear on Jiangli's face. "And I said you wouldn't come today. What's that splashed on your sleeve?"

She didn't so much as look at anyone else. She walked up, took Xi Ping, and left. "I washed and perfumed the clothes you changed out of yesterday. They didn't pass through anyone else's hands. Come, you can get changed."

Xi Ping originally hadn't been planning to take the clothes he had left behind at Overflowing Splendor. But feeling a pile of envious gazes fall on him, he wanted to show off in spite of himself. He waved the "Peerless Beauty" fan in satisfaction and actually followed the Queen of Flowers to her boudoir.

"You've taken the camellia crown, and now you've changed. Young lady, there's no comparison between yesterday and today." As soon as Xi Ping walked into Jiangli's room, he was nearly blinded by the glare. The hairpins, bracelets, rings, and pendants that the generous customers had tipped her with the night before were spread out in a heap on the cabinet. The old screen in the corner had been swapped out for one with an exquisitely embroidered peacock between two flowers. And on top of the screen was carelessly draped a blue peacock cape hung full of pearls and jades, delivered in private by someone with more money than sense.

Jiangli washed cups and brewed tea in the outer room. She rolled her eyes.
“Did you come to make fun of me, too?”

Hearing that she was in a peculiar temper once again, Xi Ping said curiously, “That’s unjust, beauty. Why would you say that?”

Jiangli spoke with a Ning’an accent. Ning’an was a hundred and fifty li from Jinping, but the accent was very different. There, people dragged out the ends of their words, very softly. Women sounded especially pleasant when they spoke. It was said that Ning’an had three treasures—“the steam cage bent bridge, the delicate iris peddlers, the plump water chestnuts among the lotuses.” Of these, the “delicate iris peddlers” were the flower-peddling girls who hawked their wares in the street. Each one’s voice and looks were touching; this was one of the place’s sights.

Jiangli’s speaking voice was extremely pleasant, but she never said anything nice. “They’ve all been saying that with ‘Mr. Yu Gan’ personally playing the qin last night, even a donkey could have gone up on stage with him and won the title with two donkey’s brays.”

“Mr. Yu Gan” was the pseudonym under which Xi Ping wrote ditties among the singing-girls and actresses. At first he had paid the beauties to sing his songs. Later, because these songs were different from the current melodies and sounded fresh, he had instead begun to be pursued. It had become the group of beauties asking him for songs.

The silly boy, hearing Jiangli's words, paid no attention to the young lady's happiness. He responded, thrilled, "Haha, they flatter me."

Jiangli threw the teapot onto the table with a thump, her face turning red with anger. "Xi Shiyong!"

"Hey." Xi Ping, having changed, came out from behind the screen, happily adjusting his outer robe, and perfunctorily consoled: "Don't be mad. Who's been talking bad about you? Tell me who they are, and when those chatterboxes ask me for songs again, I won't let them have any until they've learned three donkey's brays... Oh, what's this?"

From an inner pocket of the clothes he had changed into, he took an exquisitely embroidered silk brocade bag and was about to open it.

"Don't open it now," Jiangli said, stopping him. "Look later."

"What is it?"

"A gift to thank you." Looking displeased, Jiangli set a teacup in front of him heavily. "I was afraid Mr. Yu Gan would also make me learn to bray like a donkey next time.”

“My pleasure.” Xi Ping put the small bag away, picked up the teacup, and sipped. He frowned and put the cup back down—the tea was too strongly brewed, and it had a slightly weird flavor.

“With me you can be pretty nice. If you were a little more careful with people in high positions, you wouldn’t end up with your musician falling through at the last minute without even a word of warning.”

“It’s not worth the effort.” Jiangli lowered her eyelids, looking like an arrogant cat. “My fate is bad, and luck is against me. It’s better that I stay away from people so I don’t pass my misfortune onto them.”

“Nonsense.” The Viscount was quite disapproving of these words and said in rebuttal, “If your luck was bad, how could you have met me?”

Jiangli: “...”

Because he was excessively sure of himself, this Viscount often gave people the strong impression that his rampant narcissism was entirely justified.

Jiangli had always thought she was contrary. No matter how many people admired her and flattered her, she thought it was annoying. Only this young master, who was even more proud and willful than she was, remained in her thoughts...and he had no heart; among the rouge and powder crowd, he was doted on by everyone. He had never taken her seriously.

Jiangli couldn't answer him. After a long time, she finally sighed. "I'm telling the truth—there was a murder at the pleasure boat ferry crossing last night, and the victim had just left Overflowing Splendor... Didn't you see that hardly anyone dared to come today? I've just taken the camellia crown, and this unlucky thing happens. Perhaps it's God's displeasure that I've aspired to something I'm unworthy of."

Xi Ping casually dropped a line of sweet talk: "You're joking. What is there in the world that our Queen of Flowers is unworthy of..."

Jiangli turned her gaze. "You."

His expression unchanging, Xi Ping finished: "...in fact, there is that."

Jiangli, her expression blank, watched him closely, suspecting for a moment that she had heard wrong. There couldn't be such a rotten man in the world.

Xi Ping looked back openly, his rottenness undisguised, interior and exterior coinciding.

His skin was thin and his bones were fine, his lower jaw sharp, but his features were so distinct they were oppressive, so dazzling they looked almost vicious. His was a naturally faithless and fickle face.

For a time, Jiangli couldn't speak. She could only raise her hand and point to the door. Shaking, she indicated for him to get lost.

Xi Ping thought that her menses must be coming up. Every other sentence she said was deliberately provocative. He wasn't interested in cheering her up. He stood and stuck his fan into his belt. He said, "You should stop dwelling on it so much. Throw your kettle away, even strong tea can't cover up the flavor of rust. Aren't you worried it'll upset your stomach? You should get one made of Moon Plated Gold. I'm going."

"Viscount." Just as he was about to leave, he heard Jiangli say behind him, quietly, "Aren't you even willing to play along?"

Xi Ping turned back and looked at her, confused.

Jiangli was half soaked in the shadow of the dim gas lamp. There was an unspeakable gloom in her expression. "Take care of me like other men, give me an illusion of happiness. I could refuse to see others in the future, dress myself and make myself up for you alone. Wouldn't that be good?"

“Oh, right!” Xi Ping suddenly “saw the light.” “After all that talk, you want me to pay for you to buy back your freedom, right?”

Jiangli: “...”

“Why didn’t you just say so? What’s wrong with a little thing like that? But I’ve been spending ahead of my allowance, I don’t have the money now, you know that. How about this, wait a couple months, and I’ll save up.” Saying so, he grumbled, “You’re really something. Why compete for the camellia crown if you want to buy back your freedom? Don’t you know that the price doubles if you win the crown?”

Jiangli was so angry her lungs nearly burst. Gritting her teeth, she interrupted him: “I can free myself. I have no need to ask for your money!”

Surprised, Xi Ping said, “What are you after?”

“After what I want! I’ve saved up some security over the years...”

“I think you should forget about it. You want to call your odds and ends a ‘security’?” Xi Ping waved a hand. Putting himself in her position, he advised her, “If I were you, I would make good money while I was young, then use it to take care of myself in my old age. Why waste time fixating on dead ends?”

“If you were willing to lie to me properly, I would cut out my own heart and give it to you, never mind my security!”

At this point, Xi Ping finally gave up his act.

He had experience. Having heard the opening notes, he knew what the tune was. It wasn't that he didn't understand what Jiangli was getting at.

But connections in pleasure houses were thinner than steam. Take money and sell your smiles, pay money to buy a good time, and everyone leaves with the business complete. However liquid the Yongning Marquis Manor's threshold was, he still wouldn't be allowed to marry a prostitute, and their family wasn't permitted to take concubines. What was he supposed to do with her? Anyway, there were too many beauties around him. He had seen enough of both the plump and slender ones. Because she had a good voice, Jiangli had managed to win a few extra songs from him. You really couldn't say she was a novelty. There was no need to waste her time, so he had been patient and played dumb to try to pass the matter off.

But something had upset this girl today. As if she had eaten something funny, she just wouldn't stop!

“If you get what you want, you’ll only be deceived.” Xi Ping stopped smiling. “What benefit is there for you?”

Jiangli sadly asked, “What harm is there for you?”

“No harm, but no benefit either. What would I do with your heart?” Xi Ping spread his hands. “I have my own. It’d just be harming you without doing me any good...”

He thought that he was being kind and advising her from the best intentions, but before he could finish, Jiangli pushed him out.

Xi Ping was momentarily dispirited. Then he simply left Overflowing Splendor.

When he went out, a scrap of song floated down from Jiangli’s room. Xi Ping stopped and listened for a while. He heard her singing a strange southern tune—it sang of the hopeless love of a witch from the Land of Turmoil, and how she sewed the man she loved into a human puppet. As she sewed, she vindicated herself with her thwarted love.

The south was a savage place. Many of the songs that came from there were ghastly. Jiangli was playing the qin quietly, emphasizing the ghastliness of the song. It made the listener feel unwell.

Xi Ping thought: I've been wasting my time giving her my advice.

Therefore he raised his head and shouted toward Jiangli's window: "Don't you have anything better to do?"

The peculiar music and singing came to a sudden halt. After a moment, a flowerpot flew out the window and sent the Viscount scrambling away.

"He's gone."

Jiangli hadn't been the one to throw the flowerpot. It had been a tiny, wizened old man whose back was so stooped he was almost a hunchback. He had at some point appeared in the boudoir of the Queen of Flowers, like a goblin grown out of the shadows.

Jiangli held down the strings and carelessly agreed.

"Young lady." The hunchback's voice was like a stringed instrument damaged by damp. "He doesn't walk our path. He isn't worth regretting."

"I know," Jiangli said with a bitter laugh. "And I'm not worthy of regretting him. You saw. He won't even take the time to go through the motions with me. There isn't a trace of affection there. Only..."

"Well?"

Jiangli hesitated a moment. "Only I remember that while his temperament is odious, actually, he's never bullied me. I feel sorry for harming him like this."

"Gentlemen regret the death of beasts, so they place the kitchen far away, but they don't become vegetarians," the hunchback said coldly. "There are no good people on the west bank of the Lingyang River, young lady. Think of your parents and your whole family, think of all the suffering you've endured!"

Jiangli pursed her lips and was silent.

The old hunchback lowered his voice: "The conflagration burns on, the cry of the cicada is without end."

After a long moment, Jiangli said, almost inaudibly: "Better to die in frost than to forsake one's convictions.... Fourth Uncle, I know."

CHAPTER 4 - Midnight Song (4)

Prince Zhuang was a chronic invalid and went to sleep early. If Xi Ping went to the prince's manor now, he would have to get him out of bed again. Xi Ping didn't want to interrupt his san-ge's sleep two days in a row, and he supposed that the Marquis's anger would have dissipated by now, so he went back home.

Just as he turned into the south end of Dangui Lane, he met a carriage. Xi Ping saw the character "Dong" written on the carriage lantern hanging from it and knew it belonged to the house of Lord Dong, an official in the Office of Protocol.

The Dongs were a family of scholars and looked down on their good neighbor the "sycophantic" Marquis of Yongning, so while the two families both lived in Dangui Lane, there was ordinarily little communication between them. Xi Ping didn't feel it was worth his while to go over and make himself annoying. When he ran into them on his way, he gave a perfunctory greeting and let them pass. He hurriedly walked on without looking back.

He passed by like the wind. The person in the carriage must not have heard him clearly and wanted to ask who it was; he tapped lightly on the carriage door.

The old driver looked up and saw that Xi Ping had already hurried down a narrow lane and entered the Marquis manor by a side door, then unhurriedly answered, “Young Master, the one who just went by was...”

Before he could finish, he heard a roar fly out of the shut-up Marquis Manor’s rear court—as soon as Xi Ping slipped in through the side door, his father’s powerful shouts hit him right in the face: “Shut the gates! Hold him! Don’t let him run!”

In response, a dozen burly fellows leapt up from either side. Some rushed at Xi Ping with ropes and some locked the gate, all of them surrounding and cutting him off.

Xi Ping had a wealth of experience. He dodged left and right, spotted an opening, and forced his way out of the encirclement, just like a vigorous weasel.

As he ran toward the inner courtyard, he cried out for show: “Lord Marquis, spare me! Spare me! I’m sorry!”

The Marquis of Yongning, having taken the upper hand, slipped up and let himself be taken in. “What are you sorry for?”

Xi Ping seized the subject and dumped the evil onto his dad's head: "If I had known that you were a fan of Miss Qingke, no matter what, I'd never have gone on stage myself to help Jiangli compete against you!"

The Marquis had just spent half of last night kneeling in penitence to his wife for having gone to Overflowing Splendor, nearly bringing on an attack of rheumatism. Having this dirt splashed on him, his vision went dark—the wretched child had gone too far!

"Throw that unfilial son in the stables and break him to pieces!"

In the lane on the other side of the wall, the Dong manor's carriage rumbled by. The old driver, hearing the domestic squabble in the Marquis Manor, said, "Ha, do you hear that? It's the Marquis of Yongning's house."

But the "young master" in the carriage made no response. He kept tapping on the carriage door over and over.

The sound of the tapping was even and mechanical. Against the slightly damp wood, it made an eerie muffled sound.

Tap—tap-tap—

"Young master?"

Tap—tap-tap—

The driver realized that something was wrong and stopped the carriage.
“Do you have any other instructions, young master? We’re nearly home.”

Tap!

The sound of tapping on the door came to an abrupt halt. There was silence all around, apart from the faint clamor still coming from the Yongning Marquis Manor nearby.

The driver turned slowly, seemed to hesitate for a moment, then put his hand on the carriage door. But before he could open it, the carriage door was pushed open from inside.

The driver’s seat had been unsteady. He fell down. Next, a big heap of white paper money flew out of the carriage door. Like a ghost come to demand a life, it threw itself at the first living being it came upon, coming right toward the driver and sticking all over his body.

The paper money was covered in bloody writing. The writing was a horoscope.

A powerful smell of blood rose to the sky. A hoarse mourning wail came from the carriage: “Raise the casket, hang two mats—”

The strange paper money bored continuously into the old driver’s flesh. Whatever place it touched began to fester.

It was as if the driver had developed a white rash all over his body. He rolled on the ground, screaming, but only got more paper money on himself as he rolled. Soon, one dark red flower after another bloomed on his festering flesh. The old driver began to leak like a rotten peach!

The quiet night of Dangu Lane was split by mournful cries. The decorative lanterns at the south end of the street lit up all in a row. The white steam took on a bloody tinge.

Xi Ping was just about to go over the wall into the inner courtyard when he heard the noise. Straddling the wall, he automatically turned to look.

At first, he didn’t realize what the ball of white rolling around in the street was, only saw the paper money continuously flying out from the carriage, moving without a wind, nearly filling the whole street. He was bewildered: where had so many moths come from? It was a sickening sight.

Then he saw the white paper money assemble into a human shape with a head and legs. It stepped forward on its “legs,” “walking” toward a place where there was a door.

The “paper money man” reached the door and slapped it lightly. As it tapped, the paper money fell from it with a rustle, silently sticking to the door and in the cracks between the door and the frame.

Tap—tap-tap—

More than one home had been startled by the scream in the night. The porter watching the side door soon opened it a crack and looked out in a way he thought was covert.

But even a crack the width of the pupil of an eye would have been enough to let the paper money slip in.

The first porter to open the door a crack saw the whiteness outside and thought that this was smoke spat out by an exploding streetlamp. He was about to call for help when a piece of paper money fell in through the crack of the opened door.

The porter looked down and got a clear look at what this was, then cursed “unlucky” and planned to kick it away. But the paper money flew up from the ground and came toward his face at lightning speed!

As if he had been splashed in the face with boiling oil, the porter yelled and fell backward. The door was opened at once from the outside, and more paper money rushed in to swallow the porter whole!

Xi Ping, who had watched the whole process of the paper money tricking a person into opening the door and then “eating” him, was stunned.

Just then, the paper money in the carriage at last ran out. The dim halo around the carriage lantern with the character “Dong” written on it lit the half open carriage door.

By that light, Xi Ping glanced inside, and all the bad words he had ever heard in his life instantly surged up in his mind.

He saw a man...a male corpse sitting inside the carriage, the rot and livor mortis stuck to his features like a mask. It was hard to tell at first who he was. And this blotchy face was at this moment turned toward Xi Ping!

The corpse seemed to sense his gaze. The dead eyes turned toward him. The corpse seemed to want to smile at him. The corners of the mouth trembled upward, and another piece of skin fell from the face. The corpse sang, wildly off key: “Shelter it...fully seven days. The Great Way touches Heaven and sends you back home...do not linger...a lifetime's...joys and sorrows are like illusions...go to the West...go to the West..."

This scene categorically had nothing to do with this world. Xi Ping's brain ground to a standstill.

But just then, there was a knock at the side door of the Marquis Manor, too!

He saw the paper money like flying moths standing three chi high at his house's door, slavering over the fresh meat and living people inside. It was tapping at their door!

"Don't open the door! Outside there's...shit!" Xi Ping had cried out in his urgency, forgetting that he was still on top of the wall, and fell down headfirst.

"Young master!"

When he recovered, he was surrounded by a big crowd of people. The Marquis, who had just wanted to "break him to pieces," was stroking his back, asking over and over, "Did you lose your balance? Where did you hit yourself? Did you hit your head? What did you see... Dad is here, don't be scared, don't be scared. Letai, get someone to see what's happened outside.

Who is that making noise in the middle of the night and even knocking on the door?”

The butler Wu Letai had just given an affirmative when Xi Ping shook his head, dizzy from the fall, and jumped up.

He spared no time for explanations. He pushed the Marquis aside. One of his legs was still a little lame, so he limpingly climbed the wall. “Everyone... all of you...move aside, don’t stand near the door! Don’t look outside! Is there fire? Give it to me!”

As he spoke, he rolled up his sleeves and prepared to do battle with the forces of evil. “I’ll burn you all down!”

“What are you doing? Didn’t that fall knock any sense into you? Come down...” The Marquis was all at sea. He was about to order his wretched son to get down when he heard bells urgently ringing.

The Marquis of Yongning looked in the direction of the sound, surprised.

The sound of the bells came from Heaven's Design Pavilion’s Azure Dragon Horn Tower!

Of the seven Azure Dragon Towers, the Horn Tower was the one in Dangui Lane.

Dangui Lane was near the foot of the imperial city. To avoid “shocking the higher-ups,” none of the buildings here surpassed three stories, making the six-story tower at the north-east corner look unusually lofty. At night, when the residents of Dangui Lane looked up from their yards and saw which floor of the tower the moon had reached, they could make a rough estimate of the time.

The outer eaves of the Horn Tower were hung full of bronze bells 9.6 cun long, but these were different from ordinary bells to scare off birds. These bronze bells had no clappers. The bells were always moving without ringing.

The Marquis had lived in Dangui Lane for over twenty years, and this was his first time hearing the tongueless bells ring!

There were high and low bells, mixed together, like the murmur of conversation. Next, the top of the Horn Tower let out a dazzling white light, even brighter than Maze Station’s beacon. It pierced the mist in the air and fell precisely on the spot where the screams were coming from.

The Horn Tower’s response was even faster than the Heart Tower’s last night at the pleasure boat ferry crossing.

No sooner had the bronze bells under the tower's eaves moved than three blue-clothed figures flew out following the white light. In a few hops they reached the south end of the street.

Right now, the south end of Dangui Lane was in chaos. There was hardly any place to stand. Several houses' side doors and back doors had already been pushed open by the paper money. The servants and guards were running like sheep driven by a hungry wolf. Some screamed, some chanted prayers, some threw lamp oil and torches directly onto the ground... Ominous flames soared. Four or five people had already fallen to the ground, entirely wrapped in paper money, their condition unknown.

A few blue-clothed people landed on surrounding courtyard walls and tall lampposts. Their leader's attire was a little different from the others'—he also wore a silver belt embroidered with a subtle crane design.

Because the Horn Tower was near the imperial city, it was an important place in the capital. Those who kept guard at the tower were all major figures within Heaven's Design Pavilion.

The person on duty at the Horn Tower tonight was Heaven's Design Pavilion's Assistant Commander Pang Jian, who oversaw matters in the capital.

Lord Pang was broad-shouldered and narrow-waisted, with thick eyebrows and big eyes. His face was weathered bronze. Even the sedate sapphire blue robe couldn't suppress the sense of wildness about him.

He didn't look like a cultivation sect's half-immortal. He looked more like a wandering chivalrous swordsman down on his luck.

After glancing at the ground covered in paper money, Pang Jian took out a whistle. The whistle was tiny, but the sound it made was deeper than a bugle's. It rumbled like thunder. Before the whistling had dispersed, another team of blue-clothed people came from the Horn Tower in response.

In the blink of an eye, six walkers in the mortal world had gathered in a small alley on the south side of Dangui Lane—it was said that at each Azure Dragon Tower, only seven people in all stood watch at night.

Xi Ping, ready to crawl along the inner courtyard wall to go burn paper, was astonished. He watched avidly as the blue-clothed people fell into formation, his eyes unable to follow the walkers in the mortal world, who were nearly blurs.

Pang Jian took out a flag around two chi long and threw it at the ground.

Crack. He must have been very strong. The wooden flagpole passed through the stone floor tile as if cutting through tofu and stood firm.

With that flag as the center and the six of them arrayed around it, an enormous “cyclone” rose from the ground and all at once swept in all the paper money around them.

As soon as the paper money was swept into the array, it caught fire. The papers flew away as if fighting for their lives, but after a long struggle, they were sucked up by the “cyclone” one after another. For a time, the sky was full of flying fiery butterflies. They danced wildly, then at last burned to ash and fell. The cyclone, which had started out colorless and formless, was enveloped in endless ash and dust and became a smokestack reaching to the sky, making the atmosphere in Dangui Lane as foul as in the factory district to the south of the city.

In only one ke, all the paper money scattered in the street was burned away, and the great wind came to a stop. The wailing corpse in the carriage had at some point shut its mouth.

Thump. The corpse fell out and landed facedown in the dust and ashes covering the street.

This was a genuine article “ashes to ashes, dust to dust.”

The south street was completely silent. It was as if they had collectively been sucked into a grotesque nightmare. Apart from the Viscount squatting on the wall of the Marquis Manor, no one dared to show their heads, no one dared to make a sound.

There were only the extravagant decorative lanterns of Dangui Lane, bright as daylight, silvering the edges of the messy heaps of dismembered and rotting corpses on the ground.

Tonight the pleasure boats were silent. Jinping was still. From the opposite bank of the Lingyang River came the distant and muffled sound of a night watchman's clapper.

The second watch of the night.

Pang Jian shot Xi Ping a glance and shoved him off the wall with a flick of his sleeve. "Whose dim-witted child is that, watching the fun?"

He was the first to jump down from above. He retrieved the array flag with a pinch—the little pale yellow flag had turned as black as coal, and there was one whole piece of paper money stuck to the flag.

Like a wary lion, Pang Jian drew close and sniffed the paper money. Then he snapped his fingers at it, and the last trembling piece of paper money also burned to ashes and fell from the flag.

Pang Jian put on a pair of gloves as thin as cicada's wings and turned over each of the people fallen on the ground one by one to inspect them. After a moment, he shook his head.

Never mind survivors, there were hardly any people on the ground with their organs intact. A faint touch and loose parts came off them.

“Call some people from the imperial guard to come help out, then go to the Heart Tower and have Zhao Yu come over here,” Pang Jian ordered as he stepped over the rotting flesh toward the corpse that had fallen out of the carriage. He turned the corpse over. “Male, around twenty... He's wearing a private seal, the carving on it says... ‘Dong Zhang.’ Who's that? Does anyone know him?”

“He's the eldest son of the Office of Protocol's Lord Dong by his wife, and nephew of the Virtuous Consort at the palace,” a walker in the mortal world came up to say quietly. “The Dong manor is one street over.”

“He's very young. A pity.” Pang Jian nodded, then added, “Come, someone go to the manor to break the news... Be a little careful, don't startle the family.”

Then he stood and pointed to the two remaining blue-clothesers. “You two, visit all the houses around here and notify them. Tell them the rebellious evildoers have been expelled. Give your condolences to those whose family members have been killed, but say that they can’t touch the remains yet. We’ll handle them. Ask while you’re at it whether anyone noticed anything unusual.”

The imperials guardsmen came quickly and tightly surrounded the south half of Dangui Lane. Under Pang Jian’s direction, they efficiently cleared the scene, removed the bodies, and exorcised the evil.

In hardly any time, Zhao Yu of the Azure Dragon Heart Tower also arrived.

“Commander, I heard that another person has been caught in an underworld marriage? That’s...” Zhao Yu was startled by the ground covered in corpses. “How many dead?”

“Only this one died from being stolen for an underworld marriage.” Pang Jian pointed to Dong Zhang’s corpse. “Apart from him, the carriage was also full of paper money soaked in corpse poison that flew at people as soon as it saw them and rotted their flesh where it touched. Fortunately, it’s night, and there are few people in Dangui Lane. If this had been broad daylight in the east bank city center, I don't know how much trouble it would have caused.”

As he spoke, the imperial guards carefully disassembled the Dong manor's carriage. On the roof of the carriage was something drawn in fresh blood. It was unclear what it was. Staring too long at the lines that twisted like vipers caused dizziness and nausea.

Zhao Yu's expression was apprehensive. “But mortals can't draw curses.”

“Naturally,” Pang Jian said. “He was forced to draw it by the evil cultivator who performed the underworld marriage.”

“But, commander, making a person sing a song before dying can't be compared to forcing him to draw a curse and murder people.”

“True.” Pang Jian nodded thoughtfully. “From this it seems that the evil cultivator who performed the underworld marriage must at least been in the established foundation stage. And the corpse used for writing the ‘netherworld marriage contract’ can't be freshly dead, either. At the very least it has to be refined with secret arts for fifty years and more... How strange. Too much expense went into killing this man.”

Even fifty-year-old aged wine was hard to come by, never mind a corpse steeped for fifty years. Young Master Dong’s father probably wasn’t even fifty years old—who would pay such a high price to kill a frail young lordling?

With Dong Zhang’s physique, wouldn’t stabbing him once have killed him?

Could all this trouble really have been for the purpose of having him be his own mourner before dying and taking along a few drivers and servants?

“Commander.” Just then, one of the blue-clothesers who had gone to make inquiries returned and reported, “Imperial Duke Li’s manor went to bed early. The duke is elderly and couldn’t stand this in the middle of the night. The manor’s servants didn’t dare to alarm him. There were casualties at the manors of both Vice-President Sun of the Board of Rites and Lord Lu of the Imperial Court of Justice. I put together cleansing arrays for them and left behind calming talismans. The Yongning Marquis Manor didn’t open their door at the time, but their Viscount had just come home. He met the Dong manor’s carriage and just happened to witness the paper money killing people...”

Pang Jian and Zhao Yu spoke almost at the same time.

“That idiot straddling the wall just now?” said Pang Jian.

“From the Marquis of Yongning’s family?” said Zhao Yu.

Pang Jian looked at him. Zhao Yu hesitated for a moment, then thought that this business wasn’t hard to look into. It was no good covering it up. So he said, “The one at the pleasure boat ferry crossing last night, the last person he met before his death was also the Viscount of Yongning. I went to see him just this morning.”

“Go, notify them at the Marquis Manor,” Pang Jian said. “There’s serious business at hand. Ask the Viscount to come out and let us have a look.”

CHAPTER 5 - Midnight Song (5)

“I’m not drinking that, give me some wine.” Xi Ping pushed away the mind-calming decoction a page boy was offering him. When the paper money had come to knock at the door, he had been thinking about splashing lamp oil and engaging in a desperate struggle. Only now did the reaction had hit him. He broke out in a cold sweat.

He had only heard of Wang Baochang’s death at the pleasure boat ferry crossing, not seen it with his own eyes, but he had fully witnessed the sight of several living people being wrapped in paper money and turned into rotting flesh. However broad-minded he was, he still couldn’t avoid being shaken.

Now that both his body and mind had calmed down, Xi Ping was also puzzled—why him again?

Last night at the pleasure boat ferry crossing, you could have said it was coincidence. After all, the Flower Viewing Festival attracted attention; the pleasant and the repulsive had all come to play.

But now, what about this Young Master Dong from the Office of Protocol official’s family?

The corpse could have walked at any time, but instead it had chosen to cry out just after meeting him in Dangui Lane... Surely it couldn't be that "Mr. Yu Gan"'s good name had spread down to the Nine Springs of the Underworld and even the walking corpses were lining up to sing for him and be judged?

Just then, a page boy came in to report in a flurry: "Lord Marquis, Heaven's Design Pavilion's Assistant Commander is at the door with his people!"

The Marquis of Yongning froze. Hesitating slightly, he said, "Ask them in."

Then he reached out to give Xi Ping's shoulder a shove. "Go in and see your mom and the old lady."

Before Xi Ping could react, the page boy continued: "The Exalted said in particular that he...wants to see our young master."

Summoned by name by a walker in the mortal world twice in one day. Xi Ping simply thought someone had buried a signal gun in his ancestral tomb. If not, where would all this smoke be coming from?⁴

It smelled a little off to have Heaven's Design Pavilion coming to the door for a second time.

Zhao Yu, whose manner had been quite cordial in the morning, acted like he didn't know him. Strictly businesslike, he questioned him about where he had been, whom he had seen and spoken to, and ordered an imperial guard standing by to note all of it down regardless of importance, intending to find someone to corroborate all of it.

The silver-belted Commander Pang looked him over with eyes like knives, as if he wanted to cut open his organs and give them a close look.

Young Master Xi was a donkey; if he felt uncomfortable, he was sure to kick, especially since this Pang character had knocked him off the wall earlier—so he expressionlessly shot back a retaliatory look, looking directly into Commander Pang's eyes like a provocation.

But when he glared, Pang Jian smiled.

This man, who looked like wasn't to be trifled with, in fact had a pair of smiling eyes. He asked, genially, "Were you well acquainted with the two victims?"

Xi Ping said, "I couldn't get away from Wang Sidu, but I wasn't very familiar with Dong Zirui."

“Lord Dong’s son was elegant and refined, and studied at the Imperial College. He never had anything to do with this unworthy thing,” the Marquis of Yongning put in a timely word. Then, pointing at Xi Ping, he added, “I was always saying that if this devil could have a part of that young man’s talents, I would happily die a few years earlier, but now... Who could have guessed that the Dong family would meet with such a calamity! Everyone’s been saying that their oldest son was almost certain to enter the immortal sect this year... Ah, isn’t this a disaster for his parents?”

The devil Xi Ping lowered his eyelids and rolled his eyes under their cover.

The Dong family was upright and honest, and First Young Master Dong was a pinnacle of righteousness who had never fooled around...he had only kept a “beautiful confidante” outside the city.

Come to think of it, by coincidence, with the Grand Selection happening this year, this confidante had taken a chill from a passing wind at the start of the year and thoughtfully passed away.

It was said that Young Master Dong had been inconsolable on her account. He had worn a white jade hairpin in mourning for three full days.

Apart from the Marquis with his affectations, Xi Ping had never known another proper pampered beauty. At any rate, he couldn’t understand how a grown person could catch a chill from a passing wind—Jinping’s winters weren’t cold, anyway.

In his opinion, another version sounded more credible: it was said that the confidante had been sent on her way by a bowl of abortifacient drugs.

But he could tell that his dad was trying to get him out of this, so he held his tongue and didn’t rashly undercut him.

Zhao Yu calmly sighed and said in accordance with the Marquis of Yongning’s words: “In fact, it’s a pity.”

But Pang Jian, as if he hadn’t heard at all, was still staring at Xi Ping. He asked, “May I check your pulse, Viscount?”

As you like, Xi Ping thought, extending his arm. Do you want to check whether I’m pregnant?

Two heavily calloused fingers lightly touched his pulse. Next, a faint warm current flowed up his veins and throughout his body. Xi Ping gave a start.

The laughter lines at the corners of the Marquis of Yongning’s eyes smoothed at once. He said, grimly, “Exalted, is there something wrong with my son?”

“Nothing.” Pang Jian casually drew back his hand. “I suppose the young man likes to play around and often stays out late? He’s a little low on vitality.”

The Marquis’s expression relaxed slightly, but he heard Pang Jian continue: “Though I’m only a dabbler. After all, the Viscount brushed shoulders with a carriage full of corpse poison today. For safety’s sake, I’d like to invite him to spend the night at Heaven's Design Pavilion for a thorough inspection as insurance.”

What did that mean?

An inspection or an investigation? Was he being invited or arrested?

The Marquis’s face instantly froze over. “Last night at the pleasure boat ferry crossing, quite a few people encountered the corpse. As far as I can see, they’re all right. My son is willful and mischievous, the honor is too...”

Xi Ping spoke almost at the same time: “All right, then, when are we going? Should I take a page boy?”

The Marquis: “...”

Several gazes fell on Xi Ping, sheltered behind the Marquis of Yongning. Xi Ping, like an idiot who didn't know good from bad, had no idea what "going to Heaven's Design Pavilion" meant; he casually said to the Marquis, "Dad, let me go, I've never been to Heaven's Design Pavilion."

"Troublemaker!" The Marquis turned his head and scolded, "Heaven's Design Pavilion is no place to fool around!"

"Why shouldn't I stay the night? It's not like I'll wet the bed."

The Marquis was so angry his mustache curled.

Then Xi Ping said, "If I close my eyes now, I can still see that dead...still see Dong-xiong batting his eyelashes at me, and I feel chilled all over. I'll certainly have nightmares tonight. So let the Exalted take me to Heaven's Design Pavilion to pick up some of the immortal aura and build up my courage. I'll take Haozhong with me. I promise I won't make trouble for the Exalted... Should I take my own bedroll, Exalted?"

Pang Jian smiled. "The head office has guest rooms."

Hearing this, Xi Ping didn't wait for the Marquis to speak. Without getting permission, he agreed at once: "All right, I'll go send someone to pack my things!"

And this was the sole scion of the Yongning Marquis Manor: from childhood, he had been impervious to any kind of persuasion or coercion.

Normally when the Marquis chased him with the discipline rod, he was willing to run around a little out of respect for his father and to give the old fellow some exercise. When he was really fixed on some idea, he didn't listen to anyone.

After he had agreed, Xi Ping didn't even look at the Marquis's face, which was black as the bottom of a pot. Swift as lightning, he sent someone to pack his things, then joyfully got into Heaven's Design Pavilion's carriage. Before leaving, he even heartlessly stuck his head out of the carriage and waved at the Marquis. "Dad, I'll be home to eat at noon tomorrow, leave me something good! His Third Highness has nothing but soup and porridge, I haven't been able to eat my fill all day!"

If there hadn't been outsiders present, the Marquis of Yongning's curses probably would have reverberated off the Lingyang River.

Hearing him mention Prince Zhuang, Pang Jian's gaze flickered. He said, smiling, "Not to worry, we won't starve you."

The walkers in the mortal world had come bearing fire and went like the wind, leaving behind only a series of armored imperial guardsmen closely surrounding Dangui Lane in case of further mishap.

On the south end of the street, all the houses sent brave servants to clean up the filth at their doorsteps. Quite a few people saw Heaven's Design Pavilion take Xi Ping away. But servants of great houses all know when to pretend to be deaf and mute. They glanced over and immediately looked down without making a sound.

Later that night, the south end of the street was still. When occasionally an imperial guardsman's weapons and armor touched lightly, the clank sounded far off, startling many people out of sleep.

The middle-aged man waited until the courtyard was completely silent before taking out a wooden protection amulet.

He dipped a thin pin in water and wrote on the wooden amulet: Horn Tower heard mourning wail, arrived in the blink of an eye, six people. Xi has been taken.

His writing was crooked, like a child just starting to learn. The water didn't soak into the wooden amulet. When he had written the last stroke, he bit through his index finger and pressed a drop of blood to the wood. Instantly, both the water writing and the blood were absorbed by the wooden amulet, and its surface was left as bright and clean as before.

After a moment, the wooden amulet warmed slightly, and three words appeared on it out of nowhere. These were in exquisite regular script, evidently penned by another hand. This hand wrote: According to plan.

The unremarkable protection amulet in the servant's hand was actually an immortal tool that conveyed messages!

The middle-aged man closed his eyes and gently let out a breath. Then he wiped away the water droplets on the wooden amulet and wrote once more: Brother 32 died for the cause as he wished.

He paused, then used blood to send this sentence. Then, struggling to keep his finger from shaking, he wrote on the wooden amulet, one stroke at a time: The conflagration burns on, the cry of the cicada is without end.

The wooden amulet was silent for a moment. Then the person on the other end responded: Better to die in frost than to forsake one's convictions.

Meanwhile, Xi Ping, taken by Heaven's Design Pavilion, was still quite at his ease.

He was at his ease everywhere, as though he had been born without the concept of reserve. In the carriage, he impudently sized up Pang Jian—it was said that Heaven's Design Pavilion's chief was in seclusion, and this Assistant Commander currently commanded the defense of the capital city and environs. He was a grand personage. There was normally no opportunity to get a look at him. Since he was here now, it would be a waste not to look.

Sitting upright, Pang Jian's back was as straight as a pole. The hands laying on his knees had prominent knuckles. The veins wrapped around his wrists coiled slightly. There were calluses on his fingertips and palms, and quite a few old scars unevenly pitting the backs of his hands. Next to him, Zhao Yu sat keeping himself to himself. His manner toward him was very respectful. When Xi Ping remembered the true nature of this youthful-faced "Grandfather Zhao," he couldn't resist wondering: So how old is Assistant Commander Pang?

Pang Jian said, "Do you have something to ask?"

Xi Ping grinned familiarly at him. "I was thinking that you threw that little flag and stuck it right into the south street flagstones, but you only look a few years older than me. How did you train to do that?"

Pang Jian answered, "By being a few years older than you."

“How many years?” said Xi Ping.

Pang Jian unhurriedly answered, “Not many. Just another turn of the sixty-year cycle.”

Xi Ping: “...”

Excuse me, Grandfather Pang!

“But I’m curious—normally, when a person gets taken away by Heaven's Design Pavilion in the middle of the night, he’ll be a little nervous.” Pang Jian looked Xi Ping over. “Even the Marquis was troubled. But you don’t seem to have taken it to heart at all.”

“It’s just that our Marquis takes things too hard. Don’t take offense, Exalted.” Xi Ping crossed one leg over the other casually. “Two days in a row, I ran into someone who went and turned into a walking corpse. Can that be a coincidence? What happens if I really have picked up something unclean?”

Pang Jian hadn’t expected him to lay it out directly. His eyebrows lifted slightly.

Xi Ping continued: "It's one thing if I could just quietly pop off like Big... like Wang Sidu, at worst I'd become a ghost the next day and go get revenge. But what if I end up like Dong-xiong today and drag other people in before I die? Our Lord Marquis may still be nimble, but there's my old grandmother, who's in her seventies. For safety's sake, I'd rather sit in prison at Heaven's Design Pavilion."

This was intolerable. Zhao Yu wanted to protect him on Prince Zhuang's account, but hearing this, he couldn't resist giving a cough.

Pang Jian, smiling, said, "It won't come to that."

Xi Ping looked around. Now that he was done babbling, he showed off his cleverness: "I know. On His Third Highness's account, you Exalted won't put me in an awkward position."

Pang Jian really did feel a trace of increased respect for him.

On his first sight of the Viscount of Yongning, he had thought he was an idiot wrapped in gold and silver. Hearing him drag Prince Zhuang in as insurance before leaving, he had seemed like a pampered rich boy getting up to little tricks. Having attracted a bit of malice, he then plopped down and openly displayed his shamelessness, erasing his previous foolish act and his little schemes in one fell stroke.

“Bold, unbridled, and clear-headed,” Pang Jian inwardly appraised Xi Ping. “A naturally gifted scoundrel.”

Heaven's Design Pavilion was quite polite to Xi Ping. They led him to a guest room and indeed did not starve him. They gave him a midnight snack and some mind-calming decoction.

The blue-clotheser who had led him in kindly told him, “As cultivators, our residence is a little plain compared to the Marquis Manor, but sleeping a night here can calm the mind and cure a hundred illnesses. There’s no need to worry about having nightmares.”

Xi Ping lined up his small white teeth and gave this Exalted a stupid smile. He thought, If there is anything the matter, then I am the “hundred illnesses.”

But his conscience was clear. Even if he really did have some “illness,” it had been brought on him by someone else. Why should the victim feel guilty? Therefore he magnanimously called over the page boy Haozhong, and the two young fellows polished off the midnight snack that could have fed three or four people.

Master and servant were both broad-minded. After eating and drinking their fill, they were soon both still, one in the inner room and one in the outer room.

The glazed gas lamps hanging from the ceiling seemed to know that they were asleep. They dimmed on their own.

Dozing off, Xi Ping felt that there seemed to be something around him, watching him. But his eyelids were too heavy. He really couldn't open them. He simply rolled over, letting those gazes enjoy the view as they liked.

Faint light came from the four walls, like a twilight glow. Then a strange "mural" seeped out of the wall—the drawing was of several monsters like big-eyed lamps. The eyes of the monsters in the "mural" could actually move. As their big eyes turned, their gazes fell together on Xi Ping.

Next, not only did their eyes move, the monsters' bodies also began to scurry over the walls, turning circles around Xi Ping.

All of a sudden, one of them seemed to smell something. It leapt from the wall onto the bed curtain, changing from a "mural" to "embroidery" on the curtain.

The sinister “embroidery” quickly climbed down the bed curtain to the quilt and onto Xi Ping’s chest!

Just then, by chance, Xi Ping rolled over. Something he had dropped was chafing him. He dug around impatiently and pushed the thing aside, then curled back up under the quilt, coming right under the monster’s fangs, as if trying to catch the monster’s drool with his face.

The big-eyed monster, nose to nose with him, was almost embarrassed. It backed up a little and shyly sniffed around for a while, the anger on its face gradually changing to doubt. It gathered up its friends and crawled from the quilt onto the mattress. The monsters it had called over split up and searched inside the bed curtains. After a moment, one of the “big-eyed lamps” found the little silk brocade bag that Xi Ping had pushed to the edge of the bed.

The “big-eyed lamp” went over and sniffed, then recoiled as though it had smelled a pile of excrement; it shook its head hard a few times and scoffed toward Xi Ping, suspecting him of having produced it.

The monsters with eyes as big as dippers came close and surrounded the little silk brocade bag. They communicated silently for a moment, then finally decided that this thing, while its stench was unbearable, seemed to be harmless.

After examining Xi Ping from head to foot for half a shichen, the beasts' bodies at last faded from the walls, quilt, and mattress. The strange murals and embroidery disappeared, and the faint light dimmed. Quiet was restored in the room.

CHAPTER 6 - Midnight Song (6)

Around first light, two figures landed in the rear court of Xi Ping's guest room. These were Pang Jian and Zhao Yu.

“After leaving the Imperial College yesterday, the deceased Dong Zhang left the city under the guise of an outing in the countryside. In reality, he went to visit a grave.” Zhao Yu briefly reported the matter of Young Master Dong keeping a mistress outside the city. “In the carriage he rode in before his death, the imperial guard discovered a proposal card on red paper. The horoscope written on it is the same as on the paper money he scattered—the horoscope of his mistress.”

“I see, a love affair's debt from the netherworld,” Pang Jian said coolly. “I'm afraid this Young Master Dong didn't go to visit a grave. With the Grand Selection at hand, he was worried that his ‘golden house outside the world’ would be discovered, and he went to get his affairs in order, right?”

Xuanyin Mountain valued cleverness in its disciples more than Kunlun and the other sects did, so in the Grand Selection, it didn't choose children whose intellects had yet to develop; the males had to be over sixteen, and the females over fifteen.

The immortal path was long, and commonplace worries were a great hindrance. The immortal sect stipulated that those who were selected could not be married.

But the Grand Selection came only once in ten years. This was too hard on the scions of Jinping's upper ranks—before each Grand Selection, nameless bastard children and their nameless mothers died in batches; Pang Jian was already used to it.

“Well...he must have visited the grave, too.” Zhao Yu sighed and quietly said, “The driver driving Dong Zhang's carriage last night was his mistress's father.”

Pang Jian frowned. “Do you mean the driver who was the first to die of the bitter fleabane curse when the carriage door opened?”

“That's right,” Zhao Yu said. “If the driver hadn't died, we would have had to take him to the Quell and thoroughly inspect him.”

“Does he have any surviving family members?”

“No, he was a widower, and this daughter was his only child. She died at the beginning of the year. He worked as a servant and had a taciturn disposition. Apart from driving, he had no other communication with people. We found nothing at his residence. There was a considerable amount of ashes from burned paper under the bed. He had clearly burned everything there was to burn... Commander, as I see it, this really is the customary style of evil cultivators.”

A bitter life, a solitary existence, no contact with others.

“I see,” said Pang Jian, unable to deny it. He approached the guest room and listened to the sounds within. “He’s sleeping pretty soundly. This kid can keep his cool.”

“If he can sleep peacefully under the noses of eight karma beasts, he may truly have nothing on his conscience,” Zhao Yu said. “The investigation shows that Dong Zhang’s death must be connected to the driver. Provided that the karma beasts also think there’s nothing wrong with the Viscount of Yongning, then perhaps he really...”

Pang Jian put his hands behind his back and looked at him calmly, his expression hard to read.

Zhao Yu weighed his gestures and looks and immediately changed tack.

“Though it’s still too much of a coincidence to run into him twice. I think we should investigate the people he has daily contact with. They must all be Jinping City residents with known backgrounds. It won’t be hard.”

Hearing this, Pang Jian smiled, thinking that this Zhao was worthy of his family name; he didn't let anything slip by.

Everything he had said seemed neutral, but actually he was quietly pushing the Viscount of Yongning out of the business, not forgetting to hint that Xi Ping's family background was clean, so even if he had been pulled into some dirty business, he must be passive and innocent.

“Fine, you take the lead in the investigation, I won't take part. Ah, I'm a country bumpkin, I can't compare to all of you with your great families. I can't make sense of all the relationships between those people in Dangu Lane.” Pang Jian looked at the pitch-dark guest room and said, meaningfully, “This pretty boy has some connections.”

Xi Ping, the pretty boy with connections, slept until full daylight.

He regularly went to bed late and didn't get up until the morning was over; it had been a long time since he had had such a substantial sleep. His whole body had limbered up. He was just about to get out of bed and call for Haozhong to come and attend him when something rubbed against him uncomfortably.

Xi Ping vaguely felt around and pulled a small silk brocade bag out from under his butt. Only then did he remember that Jiangli had given him a present.

Last night had been too bizarre; he had forgotten about this detail.

Xi Ping quickly tore open the silk brocade bag and took out a piece of red jade. The color wasn't pure enough for blood jade. It was a bit big, without any decorative carvings on it. It looked like it cost less than the bag itself. But there was a faint, subtle fragrance permeating the jade, which was as sleek as soft skin. At a glance, this was something kept close by a woman year in, year out.

What did she mean by giving him a close possession? Any normal person could understand that. Xi Ping was a little fed up with this and was just about to toss it aside when he felt notches on the other side of the jade.

He casually turned the piece of jade over and saw the small line of writing on it: *Baishao of the Ning'an Chen family, Ding Chou year, 4th month, 9th day, Mao hour.*⁵

The Ning'an Chen family? Who was this?

There wasn't so much as a flower carved on the piece of jade. What kind of signature was this? Anyway, a signature would only be accompanied by a year and month, occasionally a day. No one would write in the time of day as well, not like a horoscope...

Wait, a horoscope!

With a start, Xi Ping's head cleared.

No... This wasn't a signature; it was a place of origin, given name and surname, and horoscope!

It was an old custom in Great Wan for young ladies to carry a "birthday jade" close to their bodies from childhood. When it came time to negotiate a marriage, after the matchmaking and betrothal gifts were done, the bride would give the groom her birthday jade. The groom would accept the jade and give a pearl in return, fulfilling the perfect pair of pearl and jade.

In other words, a birthday jade with a horoscope carved on it was approximately equivalent to a marriage proposal.

He had heard that a birthday jade had also fallen off of Wang Baochang's body. And the instructions Exalted Zhao had given him earlier at Prince Zhuang Manor sounded in his ears—don't accept anything with a horoscope written on it, or anything resembling a marriage proposal note!

Xi Ping hurled the piece of jade to the foot of the bed, jumped up, and slapped himself all over, as though improving his circulation could protect him against turning into a walking corpse.

Overnight, he had nearly forgotten Dong Zhang's discontented rotting face. Now, with this suspicious birthday jade as a reminder, he once again recalled it.

He hadn't even had a chance to be a human's husband yet; was he going to be forced to be a ghost's husband? And they'd have to shave his head after he died!

Was this the tragic fate of all beauties?

No way, Xi Ping thought, he absolutely couldn't agree to this marriage!

Without even putting on his shoes, he prepared to charge out the door, planning to let out a shout and beg the blue-clothed Exalted to "beat apart the lovebirds."

Haozhong was putting away the bedding in the outer room when he watched dumbfounded as his young master shot out like a firecracker, scaring away the second half of his yawn.

Then he saw the young master slap the guest room door and interrupt him with a raised hand, his expression imposing. In this pose, he pondered for a while. Then, as if sleepwalking, he turned and went back to his room.

When Xi Ping had reached the door, he had suddenly remembered that this jade had been given to him by Jiangli.

Jiangli wanting to hurt him...that didn't make sense.

First, he thought he was the most lovable man on earth. He absolutely didn't believe that a woman could stand to hurt him.

Second, he had treated Jiangli fairly, even worn chest-baring, open-backed female clothing in public and outshone all the discontented female ghosts of Jinping. What more did she want?

Taking the most extreme view, even if Jiangli hated him out of thwarted love, she could have put rat poison in his wine any time, enough to kill him eight times over. There was no need for her to arrange a posthumous marriage for him.

Xi Ping picked up the red jade with a towel. He was puzzled—if Jiangli didn't want to hurt him, then what was this thing?

Just then, Zhao Yu's voice came through the window. Xi Ping heard the Exalted ask Haozhong: "Is your young master up?"

This was Heaven's Design Pavilion, not his own home. He couldn't laze around in bed. So Xi Ping quickly put the jade away, hastily cleaned himself up, and went out to see Zhao Yu.

Exalted Zhao had accepted Prince Zhuang's ancient painting. In front of others, he avoided the suspicion of bias, but in private he treated Xi Ping much more kindly. First he said a lot of pleasant nonsense, all "keeping him at the head office was a mere formality, they didn't suspect of him anything" and so on. Then he gave him a small porcelain bottle. "I've heard that the Marquis has heart disease. It was unavoidable for us to disturb him last night. These heart pills were refined by an elder of mine in the sect. This medicine is mild. Ordinary people can use it. Take it to your father for me. Another day I'll pay a visit to apologize."

Xi Ping accepted the bottle and thanked him. Then Zhao Yu said, smiling, “You’re very young, but you don’t panic in the face of trouble and have a tranquil mind. You may have a great future ahead of you.”

Xi Ping didn’t take this flattery seriously, and further deduced that Exalted Zhao must have spied on him while he was sleeping last night—only when he was fast asleep did he have anything to do with the word “tranquil.” So he asked, “Exalted, have I been cleared of suspicion?”

The laughter lines at the corners of Zhao Yu’s mouth froze. He couldn’t tell whether this wastrel was clever or stupid; he was very direct. So he said, “Your family background is clean. There was no suspicion to start with. It was as you said. We kept you here for a night only because we were worried you had crossed paths with evil cultivators without knowing it.”

Xi Ping readily changed his wording: “So, Exalted, am I still clean? I haven’t picked up anything dirty?”

Zhao Yu: “...”

“You...are fine for now.” Captain Zhao was sophisticated, after all; he forced his calm Bodhisattva’s face to remain in place and softly said, “Go home now, don’t make your family worry.”

Squeezing the little porcelain bottle Exalted Zhao had given him, Xi Ping thought that the scrap of painting that looked like vegetable peelings his sange had given Zhao Yu must have been rare indeed if it could make a great walker in the mortal world wish to curry favor with him.

His wicked mind cranked away, considering the matter. He felt that the painting Prince Zhuang had given Exalted Zhao, instead of being a precious gift, was a honeyed handle over him. So he had to try to pressing his luck: “But, Exalted, I’m still scared. Isn’t there something you can give that can... keep me safe?”

Zhao Yu paused. The look in his eyes became slightly grim as he watched Xi Ping.

Xi Ping put on a convincing show of nervousness. “If I so much as think of the south street covered in paper money last night, I don’t dare to go home. Though I suppose it’s been cleaned up, what if there are still a few pieces in some nook or cranny, hiding in the cracks of a stone or a brick wall? Ah, why don’t I go to Prince Zhuang Manor again today to scrounge a meal...”

He was interrupted by Zhao Yu placing a fan in front of his eyes.

The ribs of the fan were quite plain and neat. When the fan was opened, there were auspicious cloud patterns at the corners, and in the center was drawn a monster with eyes that took up half its head—just the same as the “embroidery” and “mural” in Xi Ping’s room last night.

As soon as Xi Ping opened the fan, the monster on the paper moved on its own. It first dug with its front legs, like a dog or cat burying excrement, then dashed to the other side of the fan!

“What kind of magic weapon is this?”

“It’s not a magic weapon,” Zhao Yu said. “This is Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s sacred karma beast. Tradition says that it’s a sacred beast that belonged to the Southern Sage. It abhors evil. It can pass through paper, silk, walls...any place apart from the ground where there is something written or drawn—if there isn’t anything drawn in a place, you can just scribble down a few words. When common evil objects encounter karma beasts, they burn up. If you meet with paper money like last night’s again, you can wave it away with the fan.”

Xi Ping gave a cry and put the fan away. “Then I won’t stand on ceremony. Thank you, Exalted!”

Zhao Yu had no more attention to spare for him. He only wanted to make the brat get lost. “If you remember anything else, you can send someone to let us know.”

When he said this, Xi Ping remembered the birthday jade he was carrying and was just about to mention it when a blue-clotheser charged over at a gallop. “Huff—Zhao-shixiong, is the commander here?”

Before Zhao Yu could answer, Pang Jian walked straight through the courtyard wall in response. “Well, what are you panicking about?”

Damn! The legendary walking through walls technique!

Xi Ping stared at Pang Jian, for a time forgetting how to speak—with this skill, he’d be able to get in wherever he wanted when he came home in the middle of the night; he wouldn’t be caught at the door and scolded by his father!

Then the blue-clotheser jumped off his horse and took out a gaudy paper card. “Commander, Zhao-shixiong, please look at this.”

“What is this?”

Xi Ping craned his neck and glanced at it. “A Flower Viewing Invitation from Overflowing Splendor?”

“Yes, it’s a ticket to a private room on the last day of the Flower Viewing Festival,” the blue-clothed half-immortal said. He rubbed the card open; it turned out that the card had two layers. When it was torn open, there was crooked, dark red bloody writing hidden on the back; written there was a horoscope!

“Let me see it.” Pang Jian narrowed his eyes, then turned and asked Xi Ping, “Did you touch one of these?”

“No.” Xi Ping shook his head. “I didn’t need a ticket. I got in on the strength of my face.”

“Oh, well, pardon my manners,” Pang Jian said with undisguised sarcasm. He looked away, his expression cooling. He ordered: “Bring me Overflowing Splendor’s boss, its madam, all the stewards, whoever wrote these invitations, and whoever bought the pen, ink, and paper. Throw them in the Quell and question them!”

Xi Ping stared blankly.

Every child in Great Wan knew about the “Quell.” Naughty children had all grown up hearing “If you don’t behave, I’ll have you shut up in the Quell.” It was said that this was the place where Heaven's Design Pavilion kept evil cultivators. A hundred thousand evil monsters wailed there every night. If a mortal went in, they wouldn't come out.

Was this...so serious?

But apart from him, none of the observers seemed to have any objections.

Zhao Yu asked, "Should we close down Overflowing Splendor?"

"Obviously! A filthy place that harbors evil practices like that should have been closed down long ago!" After this piece of misplaced blame, Pang Jian glanced at Xi Ping impatiently. "Viscount, if you haven't received anything like this, please leave. Or is there something else?"

There was nothing else. Xi Ping made himself scarce. He picked up the page boy Haozhong and left.

It was only now that he realized that not just anyone could stay in Heaven's Design Pavilion's "guest rooms."

Without a prince for a cousin and an imperial consort for an aunt, however big your business, however wide your network, if you fell under suspicion of evil arts, you would soon end up in the Quell waiting to be interrogated.

So...it went without saying what would happen to a prostitute, as unmoored as wild grass.

In the blink of an eye, Xi Ping came to a decision. He had to conceal the jade.

Such a sensitive thing at such a sensitive time—if the Exalted learned of it, they would certainly throw her in the Quell. With Jiangli's physique, could she survive that?

Anyway, he didn't know what was going on with the birthday jade yet. He couldn't kill her so negligently.

The bustle of the Flower Viewing Festival had been like a fire with oil thrown on it, dazzlingly luxuriant, but it had vanished as if blown away by a strong wind. The brothel from two nights ago became a rathole. It was all gone. The monkeys had scattered; even the silks at the door had faded.

It was said that none of the stewards escaped; all of them went to the Quell.

As for the girls in the house, because of their status, they couldn't precisely count as people, so they weren't sent to squat in prison; instead, like Outstanding Splendor's cats, dogs, and parrots, they were shut up in the house and not permitted to go out, to make it convenient to question them —this was what Haozhong went and found out after Xi Ping came home from Heaven's Design Pavilion.

Xi Ping asked, “What about Jiangli? Has she also been shut up in the house?”

“Miss Jiangli isn't there,” Haozhong answered. “By coincidence, she left for the south of the city this morning.”

“Why did she go to the south of the city?”

“She said she'd gone to Southern Sage Temple to burn incense and make a vow before, and it worked—she took the camellia crown, didn't she? So she went to fulfill her vow.”

Xi Ping nearly split his sides laughing—Southern Sage Temple was over ten li south of Jinping. Legend said it was the spot where the state sect Xuanyin's founder had ascended to Heaven. Xuanyin had nearly written “men and women must not have direct contact” into the decrees of Heaven, and someone had actually gone to pray for the camellia crown at Southern Sage Temple!

Xi Ping said, “As if! If it had really worked, the old Southern Sage would have sent down a bolt of lightning to cook her! What was she thinking?”

Haozhong said, “Young master, why don’t I go meet her on her way back? I can tell Miss Jiangli to find someplace to hide for now instead of going back. There’s such a fuss at Overflowing Splendor...”

“Fine.” Xi Ping hesitated, then nodded. “Here, if you see her, ask her for me about yesterday, why she gave me...”

At this point, he stopped talking. For a long moment, there was no follow-up.

Haozhong waited for a long time and couldn’t resist asking, “What did she give you yesterday?”

“Forget it, don’t worry about it, I’ll go myself.” Xi Ping glanced at the sky. If he went out now, he would certainly be able to come back before nightfall. So he stepped right into his riding boots. “Close the windows and doors for me. If my dad and the others ask, say I didn’t sleep well at Heaven’s Design Pavilion and I’m making it up.”

“No, young master... Ah, young master!” Haozhong’s small features twisted. Before he could protest, Xi Ping had run off.

A perfectly good Viscount; what a pity he had grown legs.

Though Xi Ping didn't believe that Jiangli wanted to hurt him, it was still hard not to get hung up on her giving him such a thing at a time like this: both Wang Baochang and Dong Zhang had only gone off after running into him, the tampered-with Flower Viewing Invitation just happened to come from Overflowing Splendor, and Jiangli, who had for no reason at all given him a birthday jade as a gift, just happened to leave the city and avoid the investigation at Overflowing Splendor.

If this was all coincidence, then there were too many coincidences.

A normal person in his position, having seen Dong Zhang's death with his own eyes and been dragged into this strange business, would have handed the birthday jade over to Heaven's Design Pavilion by now.

But the Viscount was accomplished at courting disaster. He had never followed common sense.

He had decided to say nothing and go to Jiangli himself to have her explain the story behind the birthday jade.

Even if there was something the matter with this thing, if he could only get back before nightfall, he would still have time to go to Heaven's Design Pavilion to beg to be saved. If there was nothing wrong with the jade, and he pissed himself with fear because there was a horoscope written on it and got a young woman thrown into the Quell over it, could he still claim to have balls?

So, carrying a heavy weight of boldness and his own principles, Xi Ping left the city by the south gate.

On leaving the south gate, there was the grand canal. On the banks of the canal, apart from crude laborers' houses, there were factories shrouded in smoke, the machines inside them droning without regard for night and day. Near the banks there was a layer of green oil floating on the water, making a foul stink.

Along the river were peddlers selling mixed grain flatbreads. The vendors, more dead than alive, cried out "two for one." Workers naked to the waist squatted by the banks, eating amid the brackish reek from the dirty water.

The atmosphere was foul, but on the southern mountains' Sage's Road, there wasn't a speck of dirt.

This mountain road went to Southern Sage Temple and had a carved marble railing on both sides, the height of a man. Carved into the railing weren't auspicious animals or clouds, but inscriptions to eliminate dust and expel dirt. Inlaid along the bottom of the fence were jade stamp spiritual stones. Mixed with the rare sight of spring in the south of the city, it seemed like an immortal road that had accidentally ended up in the mortal world.

As soon as Xi Ping left by the city gate, he covered his nose. He puffed out his cheeks and chest, holding his breath until he had ridden quickly onto Sage's Road, when he opened his nostrils and breathed.

To go to Southern Sage Temple, you had to go and return by Sage's Road. Reckoning the time, Jiangli would be coming back now. He could meet her on the way. Jiangli's driver Lao Zhang was a hunchback, particularly hunched; you could see him from two li off. And the road wasn't busy now. He couldn't miss them.

But instead, Xi Ping rode all the way to Southern Sage Temple Mountain without seeing a shade of Jiangli.

The sun had begun to sink into the west by now. It wasn't New Year or a festival, and it wasn't the first or fifteenth of the month; there were hardly any worshippers at Southern Sage Temple. There were just a few coaches tied up at the post outside the temple. Xi Ping asked around; everyone said they hadn't seen Hunchbacked Zhang.

In spite of himself, he felt an apprehension: was that dog Haozhong dependable?

Just then, someone chimed in next to him: “The hunchbacked driver? I saw him. He didn’t stop at the post.”

Xi Ping looked around and saw an old man harnessing an ox cart near the teahouse, getting ready to wind up business.

As he worked, the old man muttered, “That man with a back even more bent than mine. When he finished making his purchase, he went south. I didn’t see him come back.”

“What did he buy?” said Xi Ping.

“Flowers.” The old man put his hands together and gestured toward Xi Ping, illustrating. “I brought a lot of white flowers today and thought I couldn’t sell all of them, but he bought them all up. Someone in the underworld has a guest today.”

Someone in the underworld...

Xi Ping froze. He looked south in the direction the old man was pointing—that was the direction of the south city’s Blissful Village.

The Blissful Village was a set of graves, done up quite properly, with someone to guard and take care of it daily, but it wasn't a proper graveyard. Most of the names carved on the gravestones were false names—slave girls gone missing from beside the sons of the noble and wealthy, precious daughters who had lost their chastity and committed suicide, concubines kicked out of noble manors, batch after batch of “famous flowers” wilted on either side of a pleasure boat... These people, who couldn't see the light of day, who couldn't leave behind their names, all settled here when they had left the world of the living.

Jiangli had claimed to be going to Southern Sage Temple to fulfill a vow, but actually she had snuck off to the Blissful Village to visit a grave?

Xi Ping found out from the old flower seller that they hadn't come back, so he urged his horse toward the Blissful Village.

He felt no taboo about the dead, and there was nothing to be afraid of about the Blissful Village. Though it was a graveyard, it had long since become one of Jinping's destinations. Each year on Qing Ming and the Winter Clothing Festival, rich and idle young men would get together to go burn paper goods at the Blissful Village. This was known euphemistically as “paying homage to lovely souls.” They didn't come empty-handed. Since they were already coming, they had to leave behind some eulogies, so the old pagoda trees and ancient cypresses were stuck full of nonsensical funeral orations, as if the trees had a skin condition. It was sickening enough to disperse any trace of ghostliness.

When Xi Ping reached the Blissful Village, perhaps because of the damp in the air, a fog rose in the woods. He pulled his horse to a stop. The horse snorted and continuously beat its two front hooves against the ground.

Animals were always unusually sensitive to places where bodies were buried. Xi Ping took no notice. He raised his voice and called for the grave guard. "Liu-ye, are you there?"

Liu-ye was the solitary old man who guarded the graves. He lived in a little cottage outside of the Blissful Village. Every month, he received twenty jin of grain and half a string of copper coins. In his spare time, he raised chickens and grew vegetables in his yard.

The chickens weren't there now. There was only the old man, on his own, bent and loosening the soil for his vegetables.

Perhaps because he was old, his digging movements were unusually heavy, like a machine ready to rust.

"Hey, old man, rest for a moment." Xi Ping took a piece of silver from his pocket and flicked it, tossing it into Liu-ye's little yard. "I want to ask you something. Has anyone come here today?”

Liu-ye stared at the silver bead fallen at his feet. He stopped digging and nodded slowly.

Xi Ping said, “A young woman with a hunchbacked driver, right? Did they leave?”

“Uh-huh.” Liu-ye may have been senile. It cost him an effort to speak. After a long time, he finally spat out the words, “Still here.”

“Fine... Oh, right, do you know who they came to pay their respects to?”

The old grave guard was hard of hearing. Xi Ping asked twice, but he didn't hear him, only concentrated on digging.

“Tsk, old thing.” Xi Ping ran out of patience. Seeing that it was getting late, he didn't waste any more time talking to the old man. He urged his horse on into the woods.

Strange to say, his horse had just been unwilling to go into the woods no matter what, but now, there was no need for its master's urging. As soon as the reins loosened, it dashed in.

The fog became thicker and thicker. Soon there was no trace of the man and horse who had gone into the woods, as if they had been swallowed by the fog.

Then, the thick fog spilled over from the woods and surrounded the grave guard's little cottage.

The solitary grave guard hit the reeking earth with his rake. With a pop, something fell off his face and into the hole in the earth. When it fell, it rolled out...

It wasn't a bead of sweat. It was a clouded eyeball.

As before, the old man brandished his rake again and again, completely unaware.

CHAPTER 7 - Midnight Song (7)

“Shh—” Xi Ping quickly pulled his horse, which had suddenly gone mad, to a halt.

The wind raised by the horse knocked down the “husband’s funeral oration” on the ancient pagoda tree next to them. The ragged paper covered Xi Ping’s face, stinking. With one hand, he kept a tight hold on the horse; with the other, he tore away the rotting paper and saw the masterpiece on it. It said:

Beauties fill the Blissful Village, lithe forms lying on display.

Next year when the moss grows green, all their suitors here will play.

“Ugh!” said Xi Ping.

The horse shot forward another few zhang and nearly stepped on someone’s burial mound. It raised its front hooves high. With its big, fearful eyes staring, it whinnied.

Sadly, its master didn’t know its mind. He didn’t understand what it meant and even kicked it.

“Stupid thing, where are you running off to!”

The terrain of the Blissful Village wasn't complicated. There was a paved road dug out around the graves where carriages could pass. Within were numerous little dirt roads made by the trampling of the "poets" who came to pay their respects to the beautiful souls.

Jiangli's carriage wasn't stopped outside, so it must have gone into the graveyard. If a carriage went in, it could only travel along the paved road. If he went along the paved road, he was sure to run into them. As Xi Ping thought this, he forced his horse into a trot, hitting and cursing.

But as they trotted, he noticed that something was wrong.

Was the Blissful Village...this big?

In Xi Ping's memory, the big road and little roads put together wouldn't take more than three ke to stroll around on foot. But he had trotted on horseback for ages without even coming to the end of the paved road—he couldn't even find the entrance where he had come in.

It was nearly dark, and the fog was growing thicker and thicker. Xi Ping had the impression that something had broken off the beginning and end of this paved road and turned it into an endless loop. Looking around, the weathered ancient pagoda trees and ancient cypresses all seemed to have come out of the same mold. Dense fog flowed between their branches. He could see nothing clearly past three chi away. Even the shapes of the trees were flickering shadows.

The third time he passed a branching path, Xi Ping stopped his horse and muttered, “I feel like I’ve seen this path before. What do you think?”

With its long face grim, the horse gave another sharp whinny.

Xi Ping thought about it. “Come on, let’s go have a look... Hey, I said come on!”

He was bravely advancing, but his horse was desperately retreating; it absolutely refused to budge.

Xi Ping wrestled with it for a while and truly couldn’t move the useless animal, so he had to tie the horse to a tree by the road and proclaim that at the New Year’s feast at the Marquis Manor this year, there would be “a plate set aside for it” on the table.

Then he bundled up the hem of his robe and simply stepped in.

Xi Ping had heard rumors about the “ghost labyrinth.” If he ran around blindly here, he might be running forever. Instead, he was going to go in and see what kind of amorous ghost had coveted his handsome looks and trapped him here.

Xi Ping hadn't planned on saying out all night, and he hadn't brought a lantern. He only had a jadeite tinderbox—he usually used it to light his grandmother's pipe.

He shook the tinderbox and felt that it was nearly out of fuel. He depressed the spring. The Moon Plated Gold cogs turned the firesteel around for ages, like a donkey pulling a carriage, before finally warming up slightly. The flame wouldn't pop out. Xi Ping picked up a stick and tested it, but it was too wet to catch fire, so he tossed it aside and picked his way blindly toward the depths of the thicket.

He wasn't scared, and he didn't care about the big and small graves lined up on either side of the path.

The thicket covered the graves so thoroughly that they never saw the light of day, burying these people who had never seen the light of day while living. From birth to death, they seemed to have simply moved from one coffin to another, always silent, and in death they remained silent in boundlessly absurd lewdness. As Xi Ping walked, he tore down the amorous verses drooping like hanged ghosts, thinking that if these ghosts were the type to go haunting, they would long ago have gone to get their revenge. They wouldn't still be in the Blissful Village putting up with this bullshit.

Whoever had used the ghost labyrinth to lure him in probably had a grievance to report.

But all around it was still discomfotingly peaceful, and it was dark. He kept tripping. Cursing, Xi Ping groped around for a while. Then he felt he was being too irascible. It wasn't appropriate to spit out so many "lotuses" in front of the lovely souls. So he decided to whistle a little tune to calm his mind.

His thoughts went astray, and he began to whistle the Soul Calling Melody that Wang Baochang and Dong Zhang had sung before their deaths.

The Soul Calling Melody was passed from mouth to mouth among the common people. There were many versions. It had a general outline, but the concrete details had to be filled in by the mourners themselves.

As for Mr. Yu Gan's version of the Soul Calling Melody, never mind anything else about it, it won hands down over the others when it came to being sweet-sounding.

While Xi Ping was getting carried away with his own self-importance, all of a sudden, he found that there was an “echo” to his whistle.

He stopped at once, but the “echo” only stopped half a beat after him. Xi Ping’s scalp bristled. He put a hand on the ornamental sword at his waist.

At the same time, the person imitating his whistle realized that they had been discovered. There was a rustling in the thicket. That person was burrowing into the depths of the forest!

Despite Xi Ping’s immense boldness, his spine still went a little numb, and he instinctively wanted to run in the opposite direction.

But just then, he found that there was a sliver of lantern light piercing the fog not far ahead of him, and footsteps coming along with the lamplight, in his direction.

On one hand, there was someone...or something in the graveyard thicket imitating his whistle, and on the other hand, there was a person carrying a lantern and walking slowly. Reasonably speaking, however you looked at it, the latter seemed a little more normal. This might be a visitor to the graveyard, trapped like he was. It might be Jiangli and her driver.

But in a flash, Xi Ping still turned away and burrowed into the thicket.

His ears and eyes were naturally more acute than normal. Because he had played all kinds of instruments since he was little, he was very sensitive to sounds. In a group of dozens of musicians playing together, he could tell who was playing the wrong note. When the person imitating his whistling had moved, he could tell from the sound of their movements that they were very small and had run off in a panic when discovered.

But on the other hand, he could roughly tell the height of the person carrying the lantern from how high the lantern was off the ground. Jiangli and the old grave guard weren't so tall, never mind the hunchbacked driver.

The paths in the woods weren't as even as the paved road. Even Xi Ping had twisted his ankle several times. Adding in the heavy fog, even with a lantern, how could this person's steps be so steady?

One was an unknown, the other at least sounded like they could be restrained with brute force. Xi Ping quickly considered it and decisively chose to go for the soft target.

He went into the woods at first to hide from the person carrying the lantern, but the person imitating his whistle thought that Xi Ping was chasing them and started to flee wildly. When a person was nervous, their legs would often be faster than their mind. If someone chased them, they would instinctively run; and if they ran, another person would also instinctively go after them. By the time Xi Ping realized what he was doing, he had already gone in pursuit of the sound.

He was tall and long-legged and could be considered a very good runner, but after he had chased for a while, Xi Ping began to wonder what exactly he was chasing... This thing seemed to be only half the height of a man, but it ran faster than a dog!

In spite of himself, he became apprehensive. Just what kind of demon was he chasing?

All of a sudden, Xi Ping tripped over an old root sticking up from the ground and went sprawling. He just happened to catch the fleeing shape. He seized the opportunity to brandish his sword. When he touched a body, he made a quick grab, and the two of them fell to the ground together.

Then Xi Ping got a clear look at the “thing” he had grabbed. He was shaken—

This was actually a child...a human child!

He had grabbed a little boy with his hair in two childhood knots who, standing, might not even have come up to his waist. He had two perfectly round eyes like grapes. His eyes and brows were rather far apart; he had a natural expression of surprise and confusion.

Why would a child be running around an open graveyard in the middle of the night?

Just then, Xi Ping heard the sound of a horse's hooves hitting the ground. Before he could look in that direction, the child he was holding took a deep breath, as though about to scream.

Xi Ping held the child down and covered his mouth. Then he struggled to look out through a crack in the thick woods. Just then, a wind came and blew some of the fog away. Xi Ping squinted and saw a familiar carriage.

The driver's figure was indistinct. His back was bent nearly into a circle—a hunchback.

Lao Zhang?

If the driver was here, where was his master Jiangli? Was she in the carriage, or somewhere nearby?

The old driver's figure seemed to be wet from the fog. It mixed with the interlaced figures of trees in the woods, flickering, like a deformed spirit.

Before Xi Ping could get a close look, lamplight fell into his eyes. He immediately lowered his breathing and crouched closer to the ground—as he was chasing the strange child just now, he had gotten turned around in the thick woods and had accidentally circled around back to the path. The person holding the lantern was also coming here.

The heavy footsteps approached. The shape of the person carrying the lantern gradually appeared.

The newcomer, as Xi Ping had guessed, was a full eight chi tall, wrapped in a big grey cape. He calmly passed by the bushes where Xi Ping was hiding and walked toward Lao Zhang.

As soon as he came near, Lao Zhang's horse took fright. Its front hooves seemed to leave the ground by a chi. It whinnied without stopping. Lao Zhang exclaimed and grasped the reins with one hand, forcing the horse to stay in place. The strength this must have taken was at least enough to lift several hundred jin, but it didn't occur to Xi Ping to wonder where the old man's strength came from—he had no attention to spare for Lao Zhang, anyway.

Curled up in the bushes, the arteries in his neck pumped fiercely, pushing all his blood out to his limbs—he had seen the face of the man carrying the lantern clearly.

The man had no skin!

The face and hands of the man carrying the lantern were red and white, blood vessels crawling over the naked flesh like spiderwebs. Xi Ping, downwind from him in the bushes, also smelled a choking scent of blood coming from him. He nearly threw up on the spot!

Watching this “demon” walk toward Jiangli’s carriage, Xi Ping’s spine instantly tensed.

Jiangli was only a frail girl, and her old driver could only count as half a person... What should he do?

Xi Ping grit his teeth and squeezed his sword with one hand. He focused, staring at the back of the man carrying the lantern. Though he had been lazy since childhood and sloppy in learning martial arts, at any rate he was a noble lordling who had picked up a bit of fancy footwork.

If that didn’t work, he was also a young and vigorous man. He had height and strength!

He deepened his breathing, considering how likely he was to kill the “demon” in one stroke if he burst out and stabbed him.

But just as he was getting ready to pounce, Jiangli’s old driver came forward quickly in greeting and called to the man carrying the lantern, “Sir, you’re here at last!”

Xi Ping narrowly stopped himself and nearly choked on a breath.

What was going on? These two knew each other?

Somewhat impatient, the old driver hurriedly asked, “It’s nearly time, have Heaven’s Design Pavilion come yet?”

The man holding the lantern sighed. “Not yet. Don’t worry, the illusion array is already in place in the forest. As soon as a cultivator bursts in, the illusion bell will ring. Don’t lose heart until the very last.”

Xi Ping didn’t understand much of their conversation, but they seemed to be waiting for Heaven’s Design Pavilion... Why?

What kind of trouble had Jiangli gotten herself into?

Seeing that the driver was well acquainted with the man holding the lantern and not afraid of him, Xi Ping hesitated a little. He thought, Could it be that it's only his appearance that's suboptimal, and he's actually a good person?

The old driver sighed and wailed over and over, and the man holding the lantern consoled him again: "We received word from 18. While 32 died for the cause, everything in Jinping is going smoothly, and our people are lying in wait at the Azure Dragon Towers. That little lord has already been taken to Heaven's Design Pavilion. The thing your Miss 50 passed to Heaven's Design Pavilion through him must have been delivered already. As long as they aren't completely useless, they won't miss the clues you dropped along the way. It's only that those paper-pushers are scared to die, so they're probably going in circles outside the forest now."

Xi Ping was at a loss when it came to all these 18s, 32s, and Miss 50s, but he had an idea that the "little lord taken to Heaven's Design Pavilion" seemed to be...Xi Ping himself.

"Something the young lady passed to Heaven's Design Pavilion through him..." What thing?

Xi Ping felt around in his clothes and thought, Could it be the piece of jade?

But he hadn't handed it over!

Xi Ping didn't know what role had been arranged for him in all of this, but evidently he hadn't gone along with the script.

He was a little bewildered for a time, not knowing whether he had done something bad from good intentions, or something good from bad intentions.

Lao Zhang said, distressed, "Thank you, sir... Ah, in fact, we knew from the start that however flawless the plan was, there would be some change. 32 went on ahead last night, and my young lady has already...has already prepared herself. If we can't grab a lackey from Heaven's Design Pavilion to serve as an offering, she'll use her own flesh and blood to welcome the god."

Xi Ping: "..."

No, wait up!

These two "good people" were talking about grabbing what? Doing what?

"Brother 32 was spirited, and Miss 50 is righteous. It really makes me ashamed of my own meaningless life." The man holding the lantern tapped his chest lightly with his fist and said heavily, “The conflagration burns on, the cry of the cicada is without end.”

Lao Zhang restrained his sobs and quietly responded in code: “Better to die in frost than to forsake one's convictions.”

“The time is nearly here. Tai Sui is about to arrive. I can delay no longer. I must go and join my companions in the array.” As the man holding the lantern spoke, he looked up at the sky.

The fog was so thick it seemed to have solidified. Who knew what he saw... Perhaps the view from lidless eyes was unusually open and clear.

“Oh, right.” After taking a few steps forward, the man holding the lantern remembered something. He turned to Lao Zhang and said, “My slave ran off somewhere. I just heard him whistling the Soul Calling Melody, somewhere over there. Now there's no sign of him. There was a hitch when that little thing was refined. I can't seem to tame him. If you see him, catch him for me. Don't let him run around and get in the way of major affairs.”

Whistling...the Soul Calling Melody?

“Slave”...

“Refined”...

At these unpleasant-sounding words, Xi Ping realized something. Slowly, he lowered his gaze.

He saw the “child” whose mouth he was covering clinging to his arm with his little hands. Those hands felt strangely cold, and they were covered in coarse...wood grain and knots!

The “child” simply folded in half, then in half again. His wooden fingers retracted into his palm one by one, then began to curl up from the elbow with a creak, retracting all the way to the shoulder—in the blink of an eye, the “child” had turned from the neck down into a square wooden peg!

Xi Ping: “...”

The little monster took the opportunity to struggle. The wooden peg was very smooth. Xi Ping lost his hold and let him...it roll out of his hands.

It opened its mouth—this mouth was an awful thing. You could have shoved a living person’s head into it whole when it was opened. Inside were rows of closely packed sharp teeth like a bed of nails!

“The moon is dark, the wind is high; fitting conditions for a corpse to transform.” Just then, the man with the lantern’s voice floated over on the wind from not far away. “Tonight the ghosts of Jinping City walk. The marvel of the sight will all depend on the little lord from the Marquis Manor.”

The Marquis Manor’s young lord, on whom such “high hopes” were placed, lay not far away in a cluster of trees, having a staring contest with a head on top of a wooden peg.

The head took a deep breath and puckered its lips, ready to whistle!

CHAPTER 8 - Midnight Song (8)

Jinping City was under curfew; only Heaven's Design Pavilion's outside lights were brightly lit.

At this time, there were fully twenty-three carriages bearing family crests at the gates of the head office. The sons of noble families, young upstarts from court, descendants of past imperials... The idle rich and the pillars of state were all gathered together, anxiously crowding the courtyard.

Pang Jian stood in the shadows, impatiently observing the courtyard full of young talents.

Given these people's social standing, thirty to forty percent were probably on Xuanyin Mountain's list of top candidates. Looking at this scene, anyone who didn't know better would have thought that this year's Grand Selection had come early.

Now, the noble were as confused as the lowly, talking over each other, making Heaven's Design Pavilion's courtyard as noisy as a frog pond after the rain. There didn't seem to be anything noble about them. No one knew for sure how Dong Zhang and Wang Baochang had died, but they had all touched similar marriage proposal cards, and no one knew whether he would be the next to die.

“Commander,” a blue-clotheser said, walking over quickly, “Prince Ning and his eldest son have also arrived!”

“Have Lao Zhao receive them, don’t come to me,” Pang Jian said. “I’m not familiar with that noble crowd, and I don’t have a good memory for faces. Wouldn’t it be awkward if I got someone’s name wrong?”

A while later, another blue-clotheser came to report: “Commander, Lord Chai of the Imperial Academy, Lord Liang of the Court of Justice, Princess Xincheng’s husband, the Minister of Rites’ son, Duke Ying’s son...”

Pang Jian: “...”

Was this a shopping list?

The blue-clotheser said, quietly, “Too many are involved. We don’t have enough people at the head office.”

“No kidding.” Pang Jian turned around. Like flipping the page of a book, all the derision and cynicism were wiped clean from his face. It wore a stern gravity. He said, “Not only do we not have enough people, I see we don’t even have enough seats. We’ll have to borrow some chairs from the Phoenix’s Perch Pavilion.”

The blue-clotheser said, “Maybe we should...temporarily transfer everyone from the Azure Dragon Towers to the head office.”

Pang Jian looked into the blue-clotheser’s eyes and said, “The Azure Dragon Towers guard the Dragon Vein. Do you mean to say that these nitwits...these nobles are more important than the Dragon Vein?”

The blue-clotheser was stumped.

Zhao Yu, who had just finished making arrangements for Prince Ning, also came over. He quickly said, “Of course no one is as important as the Dragon Vein, but, commander, the Dragon Vein will always be there, but this is an urgent matter—during the attack in Dangui Lane last night, didn’t you yourself bring out everyone standing guard at the Horn Tower, commander?”

Pang Jian slowly said, “Last night was an emergency. With paper money controlled by a curse floating around, if it wasn’t taken care of at once, the outcome would have been hard to predict. Today, all the potential victims are already here, aren’t they? And the city is under curfew. No matter what happens, we’ll be able to stay in control of the situation. Don’t worry.”

Zhao Yu blurted out, “Of course we can control the situation, but we may not be able to save these people.”

Clearly there were members of the Zhao family among the “talents” in the courtyard.

After he had said this, Zhao Yu immediately noticed his urgency. He quickly relaxed his voice. “Commander, so many of the people here are excellent candidates for the Grand Selection. The evil cultivators behind this must want to spoil our sect’s Grand Selection, injure the sect’s saplings.”

Pang Jian glanced at the “saplings” putting down roots and thought, Who would bother?

An overwhelming majority of Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s walkers in the mortal world came from noble families and had entered the sect during the Grand Selection. But not Pang Jian.

The threshold for the Grand Selection was too high. He hadn’t managed such a successful reincarnation—he was one of the few cultivators of “unorthodox” origin in Heaven’s Design Pavilion.

Actually, strictly speaking, the only orthodox immortal sect in Great Wan was Xuanyin Mountain. All cultivators outside of Xuanyin counted as “evil cultivators,” unless, soon after opening their spiritual eyes, they had the good fortune to be recommended to become a “disciple of record” by a person of consequence within the sect and be raised to an honorable position.

Assistant Commander Pang was precisely one of these disciples of record from among the common people.

He didn’t care one bit whether these sons of the wealthy and aristocratic lived or died, so he wasn’t worried. As he saw it, these good-for-nothings had nothing to recommend them apart from reincarnating well; it simply wasn’t worth it to go to so much trouble to “murder” them. On behalf of the killer, he even regretted those corpses, perfectly preserved for decades. With Dong Zhang and Wang Baochang, it seemed more like the killer was hiding in the shadows, testing the response speed and methods of the Azure Dragon Towers. The early revelation of the funny business with the Flower Viewing Invitations was also too deliberate.

What scheme was this person using these good-for-nothings for?

“I know you’re concerned,” Pang Jian said, perfunctorily placating Zhao Yu as he considered, “but last night, I was the one standing guard at the Horn Tower, and Dangui Lane is under the Horn Tower’s eaves. We could come and go quickly. It made sense to move everyone from the tower. I can’t make the decision to remove everyone from all the city's Azure Dragon Towers. I would need instructions from the sect or the General Commander—shidi, why don't you go ask?"

Zhao Yu: "..."

The General Commander held his position without working. He had been in seclusion for eight years. As for asking for instructions from the sect...if he went on a round trip to Xuanyin Mountain, he might not even be in time for these people coming back on the seventh day after death.

Pang Wenchang wasn't making any sense!

Pang Jian continued: "Also, I don't believe that this killer can perform an underworld marriage for so many people at once. If he really did have the skills, he would already..."

But before he could finish, without any warning, total silence fell over the noisy courtyard.

Inexplicably, everyone had shut their mouths at once.

Several breaths went by, and no one spoke to break the silence. The atmosphere suddenly changed.

Each of the walkers in the mortal world watching the courtyard put a hand to his weapon. The antsy old and young masters, as if fixed in place by a spell, were all frozen in the courtyard like bizarre waxworks.

Pang Jian's expression instantly grew serious. He had just finished saying that the killer couldn't perform an underworld marriage for so many people, and it had come back to hit him in the face.

But there were scores of people in this courtyard. What would it even mean to control this many corpses at once with an underworld marriage?

Could the killer be an almighty "ascended spirit" cultivator?

The immortal sects ranked cultivators in several grades. The fundamental stage was "open-eyed," also called "open spiritual eyes." All of Heaven's Design Pavilion's walkers in the mortal world were of this grade. Only once your spiritual eyes had opened and you had a sense for energy could you be formally considered as being on the immortal path. The vast majority of the disciples who entered the sect through the Grand Selection stopped at this stage.

After opening your spiritual eyes, you were only a "half-immortal." Only once you had established your Way of the Heart and constructed your immortal spirit would you count as a true immortal. This was called established foundation. An immortal with an established foundation could live forever without growing old, ride the clouds and fly on mist. The protective magical devices carried by the wealthy and aristocratic were generally granted by established foundation immortals.

An “established foundation” cultivator was the highest rank a mortal might have the rare fortune or misfortune to meet.

Above the “established foundation” were those who had truly attained the highest heavens.

“Ascended spirit” immortals had entirely cast off their physical bodies and the need for sustenance. To take Xuanyin as an example, once you had an ascended spirit, you could found a lineage or a peak on your own.

For certain reasons, nearly all evil cultivators were unable to pass the open-eyed stage. When one was occasionally lucky enough to succeed in establishing a foundation, they would often lose their mind early in the established foundation stage.

There was no such thing as an ascended spirit evil cultivator!

All the blue-clothesers stared apprehensively at the frozen people, waiting for these “brides” turned corpses to rebel.

But...after one ke, when the legs of the blue-clotheser nearest to the “corpse brides” were about to go numb from standing still, the “walking corpses” had yet to show any sign of movement.

It was as if they had stopped midway into “becoming corpses” and then been refused by the groom’s side for their inadequacy. There was no next step.

Pang Jian realized something. He looked up at the eaves.

Yes, he’d thought there was something missing. The evil-expelling bells under the eaves hadn’t rung!

“Move aside.” Pang Jian passed through a wall and strode into the courtyard. He poked one of the “walking corpses” with his sword.

The “walking corpse” fell over. His chest undulated evenly...he was still breathing!

Pang Jian half knelt and pushed aside the unconscious man’s hair. He looked at the top of his head and said, “Paper!”

A walker in the mortal world immediately handed him a blank piece of talisman paper. Before he could get out cinnabar, Pang Jian had bitten through his fingertip. He quickly drew a fortune talisman. It was an immediate success.

The talisman trembled and caught fire, producing thin white smoke, which entered the “walking corpse”’s nostrils.

The “walking corpse” spasmed. His limbs twitched. A sound like thunder came from his belly!

After a moment, he turned face down and threw up a big puddle of green water with an overwhelming stench... In the filth was an insect the size of a fingernail that flew away as soon as it saw the light.

Pang Jian pointed at the insect and nailed it to the ground with a gust from his finger.

“Is this...” Zhao Yu stepped up and said in disbelief, “Is this a sleep paralysis imp? Aren’t sleep paralysis imps extinct?!”

Pang Jian held his nose, frowned, and said nothing.

An inexperienced blue-clothesser said, “Zhao-shixiong, what is a sleep paralysis imp?”

“A type of insect from the south that hasn’t been seen in many years,” Zhao Yu said. “If a person or animal mistakenly eats its eggs, they’ll mature in the host’s body after a couple of days. The insects release a particular kind of venom that causes paralysis. The host’s entire body will go rigid, and their breathing will become strained. They will seem like a walking corpse. This generally occurs in the middle of the night, so these people are usually asleep. The symptoms are very similar to sleep paralysis, so these insects are called sleep paralysis imps.”

The blue-clothesser was astonished. “Do you mean that all these people have this evil creature inside them? Why haven’t our evil-expelling bells rung?”

“Because this insect isn’t an evil creature. The venom disperses quickly and does the body no damage. At worst the host will think they’ve had a nightmare. If they’re sound sleepers, they won’t even wake up. The sleep paralysis imp stays in the body for around ten days, then crawls out of the nose without leaving a trace. Hundreds of years ago, the people of the south even treasured these insects and caught them to manufacture anesthetic. That’s how they drove the sleep paralysis imp to extinction. Strange...”

“It isn’t strange.” Pang Jian’s lower jaw, sharp as the edge of a knife, tensed as he interrupted Zhao Yu. “The imps are harmless, as long as you don’t encounter soul-driving spice.”

“Wow, what a big piece of human-shaped soul-driving spice.” This was what Xi Ping heard as someone lifted him by the scruff of the neck.

Xi Ping had slipped up and let the little monster get away. The little monster had been about to cry out and attract the skinless big monster. Then there was a sudden hum in Xi Ping’s ears; it was as though a transparent “shell” had covered the area for one zhang around.

Next, a clump of earth flew over and knocked the little monster precisely on the temple. The little thing fell to the ground without a sound.

All of this happened in an instant. Xi Ping didn’t even have a chance to blink before he was picked up.

One-handed.

The last time Xi Ping had been picked up one-handed, he had been the nominal age of six... His dad had managed to put on a show of “might,” then thrown out his back. Since then, he hadn’t picked him up again.

As soon as he caught up to what was happening, his fur bristled, and he leapt forward, throwing off that hand. His forehead bumped firmly against the invisible shell. He groaned.

Xi Ping was afraid of alerting those strange people. Ignoring the pain in his head, he quickly looked in the direction of the man holding the lantern and the old driver, but he found that the two of them seemed to have gone deaf and blind. They hadn't heard anything of the noise he had made.

The man holding the lantern was still walking into the depths of the thick fog, and the old driver had his hands raised in a salute to send him off, bowing respectfully, the top of his head not far from the ground.

“Hey, kid, take it easy a little,” the person who had lifted him one-handed said in distress. “This mustard seed cost me two white spirits—don't worry, people outside the mustard seed can't hear us.”

Xi Ping had the habits of a rich lordling. Seeing something nice, he blurted out, “Where did you buy it? Can you sell me one?”

The newcomer said in surprise, “A white spirit costs a hundred liang of gold, about nine hundred liang of silver. That's nine hundred strings of copper coins! One mu of good farmland near the capital only costs one or two strings. It's enough for a whole family to eat on for two or three years. The official salary of a high general of cavalry is less than five hundred liang of silver per year. If he doesn't eat or drink for two years, he might save up for one white spirit. What family's wastrel are you, young man? Does your dad know you talk so big?"

Xi Ping's head was ringing from his bump. Listening to this accounting of thrift made his head hurt even worse—crucially, this guy's accounting was wrong!

"Da-ge," said Xi Ping, "one liang of gold is twelve liang of silver. How do you get a hundred liang of gold being nine hundred silver? Anyway, a mu of land near the capital can't even be rented for less than twenty hundred liang of gold. You want to buy good farmland for a string of coppers or two... You must be buying it in your dreams."

When the person heard this, he stared in terror. He looked up at the sky and reckoned on his fingers, then murmured, "Oh... One gold is twelve silver, and a string of copper coins has gone up from a thousand to a thousand five-hundred... Is the land rent in Jinping so high now?"

Xi Ping: "..."

No, wait, how come he had to find out common sense things like this by observing celestial phenomena?

By the faint light leaking out from inside the carriage, Xi Ping saw the newcomer clearly.

This actually wasn't a burly fellow. His figure was about the same as Xi Ping's. He was a somewhat slovenly young man dressed in a shabby green gown, carrying a small wine pot.

He had phoenix eyes, thin lips, and a slightly hooked nose. His was a face with a stern and upright cast, but his manner and expression were very kind and gentle, as if he had never been angry in his life. When he blinked, faint laugh lines appeared at the corners of his eyes.

"It's hard to earn a livelihood." The green-gowned man sighed and said to Xi Ping, "Let's not talk about that anymore—when did you accidentally eat soul-driving spice?"

Xi Ping held his head and groaned out a single dubious syllable: "Huh?"

"Soul-driving spice is a rare type of fruit with a very mild scent. Only the sleep paralysis imps of the south can smell it." At Heaven's Design Pavilion's head office, Pang Jian narrowed his eyes slightly. "Imps that breathe in soul-driving spice will burrow into their host's blood vessels, and the harmless venom will become toxic. The toxicity will soon spread throughout the body, and the host will change from a fake corpse to a real corpse. Then the blood vessels will begin to burst open starting from the top of the head, turning the scalp red. At death, the whole body will be rigid. The appearance in death is just as if they had been snatched for an underworld marriage. In the south, they also had an unknown secret art. They could use the juice of the same piece of soul-driving spice to draw a soul-driving spell on a mirror and control the imps inside the dead person's body, make the dead person perform the same movements as the person standing in front of the mirror—forget about the horoscope, it was all a cover. There never was any underworld marriage!”

Just as he'd said—how could anyone stand to use such carefully preserved corpses to kill good-for-nothings like this!

“But...why would they want to make us think it was an underworld marriage?” A blue-clotheser, ignoring the question of how their commander would know about an “unknown secret art,” said in confusion, “Was it just to get all these people to crowd in here and take a nap to give us a scare?”

“Sound the Azure Dragon Tower bells, activate the executioner's arrays. If I'm wrong, deduct my spiritual stones.” Pang Jian turned quickly. This time, he could “make the decision.” “It's because someone else should have been here tonight. Go to the Yongning Marquis Manor!”

It was no accident that the Viscount of Yongning had bumped into two walking corpses. If he was right, then the Viscount definitely had a piece of soul-driving spice on him.

And if that soul-driving spice had been at Heaven's Design Pavilion's head office tonight, after nightfall, the moment the sleep paralysis imps matured, there wouldn't have been a courtyard full of unconscious living idiots here—there would have been fresh corpses under someone's control!

Even the thought of this scene made his scalp go numb. With all the forces of evil dancing around, Heaven's Design Pavilion would have overreacted.

The majority of the walkers in the mortal world were in fact out and about pursuing evil cultivators. Apart from a few people at the head office, the only people guarding the capital were scattered among the seven Azure Dragon Towers. There weren't enough people at the head office; they would have had no choice but to bring in reinforcements from the Azure Dragon Towers, like last night.

This was a feint; it was likely that the killer's targets were the Azure Dragon Towers that guarded the Dragon Vein!

But something had gone wrong. The person who ought to have been here had pulled some trick that even the evil cultivators hadn't expected.

“Wait.” Zhao Yu had also caught up. He quickly reckoned on his fingers.

“The Viscount of Yongning doesn’t seem to be in the city.”

“How do you know?”

“Lead the way!” said Pang Jian.

As he spoke, the earth of Jinping began to tremble faintly. Thick dark energy rose in the south, surging toward the sky.

CHAPTER 9 - Midnight Song (9)

“So...so these whatever imps, what are they usually in?”

“I think they would have been in wine.” Hearing Xi Ping ask about the insects instead of the soul-driving spice, he thought he hadn’t understood, so he patiently explained, “The soul-driving spice has a very faint scent, and the insect eggs are very small. They can be taken for sediment in unfiltered wine—but you must only have consumed the soul-driving spice, not the eggs, or else if the two had combined, they would have acted up by now.”

The breath caught in Xi Ping’s chest eased: that was all right. Because of the “heart disease” that didn’t impede him in eating or running around, the Marquis never touched a drop of wine when he was out of the house.

“How would I know?” He at last turned his attention to the soul-driving spice and laughed bitterly. “At Overflowing Splendor, I drink wine like I breathe air. If you asked which breath I took it in with, wouldn’t that...”

Just then, a wailing like the sound of a bugle horn sounded in the fog-covered woods, interrupting Xi Ping.

Wssh. Strong rain came down, breaking up the thick fog, like a hand wiping steam off glass.

Before Xi Ping could get accustomed to the suddenly clear view, his eyes met with an attack—he saw four...”people” carrying a coffin they had lifted out of some grave.

One of the people carrying the coffin was the man who had been carrying the lantern. In this crowd, he was actually rather put together. Among the other three, one had no facial features, only a single crack in a ghastly white face that may have been an eye or a mouth; one was missing a shoulder, his head perched precariously on a triangular chest, like a flag on a pole; there was another one missing a big piece of his skull, the caved-in place covered with a rag, the pounding of the blood vessels in the brain making the thin cloth skip and hop.

The people carrying the coffin were facing directly toward Xi Ping, less than a hundred steps away!

Unexpectedly seeing these monsters head on, Xi Ping nearly missed a breath. He felt as if the sight had taken a decade off his lifespan.

“Evil cultivators often lose their minds, and their external appearances are frequently bizarre. No need to be afraid.” The green-gowned man sipped a mouthful of the wine in the wine pot. Seeing Xi Ping trip over a tree root as he backed up and nearly sit down, he reached out to support him and raised the wine pot toward him. "I have wine. Do you want some?"

"Yes," said Xi Ping.

The green-gowned man: "..."

He had only been being polite, figuring that now that the boy knew he had been dosed with something in his wine, he certainly wouldn't dare to consume something another person gave him at random. He hadn't thought he would really want it. But the words had been said, so he couldn't not give him the wine. He handed the wine pot over a little regretfully. "There's not much left, go easy."

The young master had reached his present age without learning the words "go easy." He took the wine pot and gulped a big mouthful, nearly draining it dry.

The wine was very strong. As soon as he put it in his mouth, the alcohol surged down his throat and swept through Xi Ping's organs, then decisively turned around and went back up to his head. In a few breaths, the burning feeling suddenly disappeared, and the rich wine flavor surged up.

Xi Ping exhaled a warm breath, emboldened once more.

Then he noticed that there was someone following the coffin.

This person was dressed in deep mourning, her face bloodlessly white.

It was Jiangli.

But...she didn't seem like Jiangli.

Xi Ping couldn't say at first what was different about her. The features were hers, and even her hairstyle was the same as usual. But somehow, she didn't look tender or sweet. Before, she had looked like a flower that ate the wind and drank the dew, but now, she had suddenly grown a warm, living human body that could spoil and stink; there was a coarse "humanity" about her.

"Someone you know?" the green-gowned man asked. "A lovely confidante?"

"She is lovely." Xi Ping's eyes didn't leave Jiangli for a moment. He was remembering how, in order to protect her, he hadn't even trusted his own page boy, but had gone to seek her himself, from the mortal world to the nether world. He thought he was a little ridiculous. Clenching his back molars, he laughed. "I'm no confidant of hers—I'm not worthy."

There was a thump as the demons put the big coffin on the ground. Jiangli and the coffin bearers walked around the coffin in a particular tempo, each step falling precisely on the ground. The ground seemed to become a big drum. Each time they stepped, a dull thump came from the ground, each seeming heavier than the one before.

Xi Ping's oversensitive ears hurt from the pounding. He was about to cover them with his hands when, suddenly, he caught a faint sound...coming from the coffin.

He was instantly chilled all over. There was someone in the coffin beating time!

Next, an exceptionally clear female voice came in among the drumming. The singer whose voice had stunned the Lingyang River sang, so beautifully it made you tremble.

Once, a person had listened to Jiangli's songs to the point of addiction, then had thrown down his cup in a fright and left, saying, "This singing is inauspicious, there's bewitchment in the voice, and the singer has the look of a devil." Hearing this, Xi Ping had laughed, because most of Jiangli's songs were written by him. His family's works could be used as lucky charms; how could they be "inauspicious"?

The person who said these words must have been another idiot dazed by loveliness.

Now, at last, he knew who the real idiot was.

As she sang, a greenish light appeared above the coffin, floating in midair like a ghost light. The people surrounding the light had nothing human about them; they were like ghosts.

The singing, the footsteps, the knocking inside the coffin, and the shaking of the ground wove together, louder and louder. Xi Ping could hardly keep his footing. He had to drape himself over a tree next to him. He turned to ask the green-gowned man, “Exalted, aren’t you going to do something?”

“Exalted?” The green-robed man had been considering how to get his wine pot back without seeming stingy. Hearing this, he raised his eyebrows. “Do you know who I am?”

I’m not stupid, Xi Ping thought—he had heard the man holding the lantern say that there was a trap in the woods specially set for Heaven’s Design Pavilion. This impoverished-seeming old brother had not only not fallen into the trap, he was instead watching avidly from the sidelines. Obviously he was more powerful than these terrifying-looking demons.

Anyway, in his capacity as human-shaped incense burner, instead of obediently lying on the incense table, he had followed the “leads” that these people had left for Heaven’s Design Pavilion and run off here, but they had no idea. Did that make sense? There had to be some master making trouble in the background.

Though this master couldn’t keep accounts, he could casually reference the salary of a high general of cavalry; he had evidently been to court. He might be a high official in Heaven’s Design Pavilion, or even...

The green-gowned man shook his head. “This is only a ceremony. There’s no point in interrupting. They’ve already offered themselves up.”

As he spoke, a long groan came from the north, like the roar of some enraged beast of prey. It came on a fierce wind, suppressing even the drumming that was ringing in Xi Ping’s ears.

Jiangli’s voice broke. Like torn silk, the exquisite voice turned into a hoarse shout; it hardly even sounded human.

This was Xi Ping’s first time learning that sound could become a hammer. He felt the mingled noises bang against his chest and nearly crack his ribs open on the spot. His vision went dark. When he recovered, there was blood flowing from his nose.

But he didn't take the time to wipe it away. In that instant, inexplicable tremors crawled up his back. He felt that there was someone...no, something behind him, looking at him through the thin "mustard seed"!

The languid stance of the green-gowned man in front of him changed. Silently, he stuck up a finger toward Xi Ping. His suddenly sharp gaze went past Xi Ping, aimed behind him.

The blood from Xi Ping's nose dripped down to his mouth. He didn't dare to wipe it away at first. After a while, he heard extremely faint footsteps shuffle past and recede. He quickly turned his head but saw nothing at all, only a line of distinct, shallow footprints in the loose earth, unhurriedly walking toward Jiangli and the others.

The stride was neither big nor small, very steady, but...there was no one making the footprints!

Xi Ping had never believed in ghosts or gods. Now that he was seeing a ghost with his own eyes, the top of his head nearly burst off.

He looked again. The people next to the coffin were kneeling. The lid of the coffin that the knocking had been coming from flew up!

An evil wind rose inside the coffin and scattered in all directions. The lush foliage of the woods was swept by the wind, and the green leaves instantly dried and yellowed. They trembled and fell to the ground.

Jiangli didn't so much as blink. She efficiently brought down a knife and cut open her wrist.

It must have been a ruthless stroke; it cut nearly halfway through her wrist. The blood sprayed all over the coffin. The footsteps had reached the coffin now.

The people crouching on the ground called out, "Welcome, Tai Sui—"

Just then, Xi Ping heard a crisp sound, like a sharp weapon shattering a glass cup.

Next, four or five blue-robed figures descended from the sky. The one in the lead held a sword, slicing toward the coffin. Heaven's Design Pavilion's people had come at last!

Xi Ping was dazzled. He didn't even see who had come from Heaven's Design Pavilion, and he didn't know whether the footsteps or the sword stroke reached the coffin first. He only knew that the walkers in the mortal world and the demons had begun a chaotic fight.

The crash of metal on metal was fierce enough to send up sparks. Then there was a clatter, and the coffin in the middle burst apart. Among the wreckage, a man stood up!

The dear friend who had been trying to open the coffin lid earlier revealed his true face.

His figure was tall and broad. He was wearing dark brown grave clothes with a Five Blessings design,⁶ auspiciously planted in the center of the coffin. Some evil cultivators gathered back to back to defend him, confronting the walkers in the mortal world.

But Xi Ping didn't have attention to spare even for the risen corpse. His attention was all taken up by Jiangli—in the moment he had missed looking, her face like a lotus standing above the water had turned dry and wrinkled as an old woman's. Her spine had folded up, and most of her black hair had turned white. If not for the fact that the cast of her features remained in the bones of her face, he would hardly have dared to identify her!

“Move over!” A clear whistle came from the woods nearby as an acquaintance brushed over the treetops on a sword. Assistant Commander Pang had come in person!

Pang Jian mimed drawing a bow in empty air. The rain swirled and gathered in his hands, congealing into a “water arrow.” It shot straight toward the man in the coffin.

Jiangli stepped forward without giving it a thought and bodily blocked the water arrow. She opened her mouth and let out a sharp howl.

The green-gowned man had come up beside Xi Ping at some point. He slapped Xi Ping on the ear.

At his light slap, there was a buzz, and the sound of water bubbled as it “flowed” from his right ear all the way to his left ear, rendering him temporarily deaf.

He couldn’t hear Jiangli’s voice, but he could feel the foliage around him shaking. The wheels of the carriage that was stopped at the roadside splintered out of nowhere. The horse fell to its knees, twitched a few times, and didn’t move again!

The scream shook the sword out from under Pang Jian’s feet, and he vaulted and landed on the ground like a swallow.

The noise of water only bubbled in Xi Ping’s ears for a moment, then soon exited by his left ear. His hearing was restored, but his mind was numb—what had he seen?

The delicate flower Jiangli had just sent Heaven's Design Pavilion's unfathomable commander staggering!

Pang Jian called out, "Form the array!"

Several swords were already woven together. The sword array of the blue-clothed men fell like thunder. Numerous sword strokes formed a net and came directly toward the man in the coffin wearing grave clothes.

But just then, the dead man opened his eyes.

His eyes were gold, his gaze arresting. He raised a hand, and a stinking wind rose out of nowhere. The blue-clothesers didn't even have time to draw breath before they were sent flying, swords and all, several zhang away.

Pang Jian's expression at last became grave.

The horrifying gold irises lowered. The golden-eyed man lightly flicked the dust off his grave clothes. His gaze, almost gentle, swept over the evil cultivators around him. The stiff corners of his mouth turned upward in a faint smile.

He put one in mind of an unknowable divine image.

The skinless man who had carried the lantern was trembling all over. He mumbled, “Tai Sui...it’s Tai Sui...”

The evil cultivators reacted half a beat late. One after another knelt at his feet, crying and laughing as if demented.

“Tai Sui!”

“Behold Tai Sui!”

“Tai Sui! Tai Sui has truly arrived!”

The man they were calling “Tai Sui” looked at Jiangli and extended a deathly pale hand toward her.

Jiangli was kneeling. She shuffled in front of him on her knees.

“Sister of the Chen family.” His voice was actually very soft, and it had a faint Ning’an accent. “Thank you. I know your story.”

Xi Ping froze.

Sister of the Chen family... Jiangli's surname was Chen?

He inadvertently reached into his clothes to touch the birthday jade.

The jade said "Ning'an Chen family." Could it be...

Just then, Tai Sui's figure flickered slightly.

Jiangli was startled. She called, "Tai Sui?"

Tai Sui pressed a hand to the center of his brow and sighed. He looked up toward Pang Jian. "Commander Pang, Jinping's dog. Your reputation is deserved. You truly are hard-hearted. Dozens of lives spread out before you won't move you. It seems that the brothers and sisters lying in wait by the Azure Dragon Towers have died for the cause."

Pang Jian gave a cold laugh. "Well said."

Hearing this, the crowd of demons around the coffin looked distressed. Someone involuntarily cried out, "It can't be! We haven't received news of any mishap!"

Jiangli raised her head quickly. "Tai Sui, if they are unable to take the essence of the Dragon Vein, then you..."

Tai Sui looked at her with an almost compassionate gaze. “My body is only barely sustained by your ‘offerings.’”

“I’ve heard of someone who seized a body and presumed to use the veins of the earth to sew together body and soul. That person was struck down by heavenly lightning afterward. This is my first time seeing someone set his mind on the Dragon Vein. Your will is truly lofty, senior.” Pang Jian sighed in admiration and saluted. “There may be no need for heavenly lightning tonight. I think that walking corpse of yours can only be sustained for a short while by the lives of these monsters. Why go to the trouble? It’s so ugly. Why not take it off and...”

Before he could finish, there was a sudden flash of lightning that threw Tai Sui’s shadow behind him.

His shadow was a dragon’s!

The dragon shadow flowed at Tai Sui’s feet. Wherever it passed, birds and small insects that had no time to get out of the way were sucked dry and blown to sand. The shadow dragon threw back its head in a silent roar and launched itself toward the walkers in the mortal world!

Fortunately, while Pang Jian had been chatting, his nerves had been tensed. The moment the lightning flashed, he immediately tossed out a talisman.

But before the dragon shadow reached it, the talisman went to pieces.

Pang Jian shook his sleeve, and seven or eight talismans left his hand at once, tightly shielding his colleagues behind him.

“Indeed, this body of mine can only be sustained for a brief moment.” Tai Sui calmly rolled up the long sleeves the grave clothes. “But for you little ‘open-eyed’ ones, isn’t a moment enough?”

This time, Pang Jian couldn’t say a single word. He could hardly keep the feigned frivolity on his face.

His origins were humble. He had climbed up by himself step by step. While walkers in the mortal world could only be open-eyed, he had encountered more than one established foundation evil cultivator in his life. Relying on his many years of experience and extensive travels, even if he couldn’t win from a weak position, he could still hold out until reinforcements came.

He had never before been brought, as at this moment, to the point of having no strength to fight back after a single exchange, as if he had become a powerless infant in front of a robust man eight chi tall.

And this was only a walking corpse... What boundary had this demon reached?

Tai Sui evidently didn't take the group from Heaven's Design Pavilion seriously. His golden eyes turned in Xi Ping's direction. "And here is this friend with his vast magic powers. Have you seen enough?"

CHAPTER 10 - Midnight Song (10)

Xi Ping didn't know from boundaries. His mere mortal eyes hadn't even been able to understand which side had won in the exchange just now. He could only judge on the basis of his experience with street fights. He counted up the number of people: fine, Heaven's Design Pavilion had more people.

So he came to a conclusion: no need to be afraid, it's a done deal.

When the great demon turned and spoke in his direction, Xi Ping automatically thought he was speaking to him. Perfect, he just happened to have something to say to Jiangli. He wiped away the blood from his nose and raised his sword, acknowledging the description of "vast magic powers." He turned and asked the green-gowned man: "Exalted, where's the way out?"

The green-gowned man looked at him very strangely for a while, then patted him on the shoulder. "Come on, child, stand back a little. Hold on to the wine pot... Leave me a mouthful. Don't drink it all."

As he spoke, he gently shook his sleeve, sweeping Xi Ping backward.

It was as if Xi Ping instantly became weightless. When he came around, he had already flown into the thicket a zhang away and landed lightly as a feather.

Next, the night wind poured into his nose and mouth. Xi Ping smelled a rotting wood scent of mingled camphor and cedar. It was very heavy, as though it had been steeping in the earth for many years.

The transparent mustard seed had been removed.

The green-gowned man moved aside the dry branches blocking him and made his appearance. First he smiled at Tai Sui. Then he waved mildly at the crowd from Heaven's Design Pavilion. "Good work, everyone. Why don't you step back for now?"

When he waved his hand, Pang Jian and the others felt as though a big mountain had moved aside. The oppressive force of golden-eyed Tai Sui disappeared at once. From inertia, nearly all of them stumbled before finding their footing.

Pang Jian let out a breath and spoke respectfully: "May I ask if I'm speaking to the inner sect's immortal envoy? Which shixiong are you?"

"I'm not," the green-gowned man said, smiling. "I think you'll have to call me shishu."

Pang Jian was faintly startled—Xuanyin Mountain opened its doors once every ten years; for a cultivator, ten years might be only a brief stay in seclusion. Fussily sorting out class after class by generational ranking was too confusing, so, whether inner sect or outer, everyone addressed each other as though they were of the same generation. “Shixiong” or “shijie” was a broadly applicable honorific for any member of the sect with whom you weren’t acquainted.

Only the ascended spirit peak masters who had the standing to found lineages and accept disciples could be addressed as “shishu.”

But hadn’t all the previous immortal envoys been established foundation disciples sent down by peak masters who wanted to take new disciples? The more slapdash ones might simply send an open-eyed stage disciple with a comparatively long service record. Which peak master was this who had descended to the mortal world in person?

Before Pang Jian could consider it carefully, Tai Sui in his grave clothes raised his golden eyes again and looked at the immortal envoy. The dragon shadow at his feet grew increasingly fierce, as if it wanted to leap off the ground, open its mouth, and attack. But his tone was still as polite as before.

“I always knew that Xuanyin Mountain would fix their attention on me, but I didn’t expect that they could bear to send you out,” Tai Sui said. “It’s my honor, Zhi Jingzhai... General Zhi.”

As soon as these words left his mouth, everyone present went blank.

Pang Jian forgot to lower the hand he had just raised, and in the thicket, Xi Ping nearly dropped the wine pot.

The ignorant and incompetent Viscount Xi might at best be able to remember five regnal names of the current dynasty, and those not necessarily in the right order. But even he knew the weight of the name “Zhi Jingzhai.”

“Jingzhai” was a courtesy name. This General Zhi’s given name was “Xiu.”

Over two hundred years ago, in the reign of Renzong, there was a neighboring country to the south of Great Wan called He. The leader of its state sect Lancang Sword lost his mind and stirred up the flames of war. Southern He expanded north into the central plains, and Great Wan bore the brunt.

The Lancang Sword Sect had gone against tradition. Ignoring the separation between mortal and immortal, it sent several master cultivators to travel with the army and used secret arts to cut off communication between Xuanyin Mountain and Jinping. The Southern He army cut its way irresistibly to Jinping overnight. The capital was overthrown in an instant.

At the time, Grand Marshal Zhi and the other high generals were all by the border, and none of the local garrisons could send help in time, while Xuanyin couldn't receive news. Inside Jinping City, there were only thirty thousand imperial guardsmen and Heaven's Design Pavilion's several dozen resident open-eye cultivators...and, by coincidence, the youngest son of the Zhi family, who was in the capital city recovering from an illness.

This young general took command in this crisis, requisitioned immortal tools from the palace and the homes of the aristocracy, coordinated with the city's inscriptions and arrays, and, a mortal himself, defended Jinping for a day and a night. He held out while people from Heaven's Design Pavilion, risking death, broke out of the encirclement and sent word to Xuanyin Mountain.

Later, the other great sects encircled Lancang, and the Lancang Sword Sect was annihilated. Five great sects became four great sects, and Southern He also came to the end of its road; the country was destroyed. Because the evil energy didn't disperse, the country withered for a hundred years, and the former location of Southern He was today's Land of Turmoil.

Zhi Xiu made his name in that battle and was afterward appointed high general of cavalry. He was Great Wan's military star.

Sadly, heaven is jealous of heroes. No sooner had General Zhi been appointed than he contracted a grave illness. That year wasn't Xuanyin Mountain's Grand Selection Year, but Xuanyin's Elder Zhang Jue⁷ couldn't stand to see his star fall. He made an exception, came down from the mountain himself, and took Zhi Xiu in to be his final disciple. Decades went by, his relatives in the mortal world died one after another, and General Zhi remained hidden in the immortal sect. He didn't show himself again.

From Renzong to the present, six reigns had gone by. General Zhi wasn't present in the human world, but his illustrious military exploits became the subject of famous stories and legends. He was the idol worshipped by every youth in Great Wan. What little boy waving a wooden stick and playing at war in the streets hadn't fallen out with his little companions over wanting to be General Zhi?

And now this legend was actually before their eyes!

Alive!

And he still perfectly recalled what his annual salary as a high general had been!

“I haven’t gone out in over a hundred years, yet Your Excellency still recognizes me,” Zhi Xiu said, smiling. “Pardon my manners. May I ask what our connection is?”

“There is none, in fact,” Tai Sui said to him, modestly. “In my humble travels through the human world in my youth, I had the good fortune to encounter you. A general’s merits persist throughout the ages, and General Zhi’s graceful bearing inspires admiration.”

Zhi Xiu said politely, “You honor me.”

With the immortal and the demon seemingly competing to outdo each other in politeness, the atmosphere was for a time as harmonious as though they were exchanging New Year’s greetings.

Then Tai Sui made a friendly suggestion: “I have no desire to be your foe. It must have been a hard trip for you from Xuanyin Mountain to Jinping, General Zhi. Why don’t we both step back tonight?”

Zhi Xiu saluted. “Thank you for your solicitude. It wasn’t hard, only what I ought to do for my sect.”

Tai Sui's expression became increasingly mild. "I only need to borrow a small segment of the Dragon Vein. I guarantee that it can be restored as good as new afterward. There will be no harm to the nation's destiny. Then we can each take our people and leave. Would that be all right?"

The smile on Zhi Xiu's face seemed to hold the bygone spring air of Jinping City.

Then he said, "Ah, I'm afraid that won't do."

Before the others could understand what he meant, the dragon shadow on the ground had already raised its neck.

Almost simultaneously, countless water drops falling out of the sky gathered in Zhi Xiu's palm and froze into an enormous ice sword that sliced directly toward the golden-eyed walking corpse.

Instantly, Tai Sui was ten steps away. All the dry branches within a hundred zhang radius took on frost from the stroke of that ice sword!

Tai Sui opened his hands. The dragon shadow at his feet roared silently. There was a crisp sound, and the ice sword in General Zhi's hand shattered into countless pieces, cutting a strand of his hair.

The sudden wintry wind chilled Xi Ping to the marrow. “Ah—atchoo!”

His enormous sneeze drew everyone’s gazes to him.

When Jiangli and Pang Jian noticed him, they spoke simultaneously.

“So you’re here,” said Pang Jian.

“What are you doing here?!” Jiangli cried out in surprise.

Xi Ping patted the bits of grass and ice off himself and crawled out of the thicket.

He sniffled, then muttered, “Well, it’s a long story.”

“There’s no hurry to tell it,” Zhi Xiu’s voice came from very far away. He was speaking to Pang Jian. “Retreat a bit and look after these kids for me.”

At this point, both Zhi Xiu and Tai Sui’s movements were nothing that open-eyed cultivators could follow along with.

Wherever this immortal and demon passed, the fine spring rain froze into blades of ice. The blades of ice made from frozen rain were sharp enough to cut through iron as though it were mud. One hit a stone and bounced off, then cut apart the talisman-protected belt worn by one of the blue-clothesers!

The walkers in the mortal world and the evil cultivators were forced to gather and retreat to clear the stage for the mighty.

A blue-clotheser said excitedly behind Pang Jian, “Now that Zhi-shishu is here in person, there won’t be anything for us to do. Commander, all the evil cultivators who slipped through the net are here. Should we take this opportunity to capture them?”

As he spoke, he was about to raise his sword and get to it. Pang Jian nimbly held back the overexcited blue-clotheser and dragged his rash subordinate back. “Don’t get yourself killed, stay out of the way!”

His instruction to stay out of the way was silenced by a sky-shaking, earth-shattering dragon’s roar. The dragon shadow roaming over the ground had assumed a physical shape. It had leapt off the ground like a pitch-black flame!

In the depths of the flame, the black dragon opened a pair of golden eyes that were staggeringly bright in the night, like two inextinguishable raging fires.

The ice blades filling the sky instantly vanished into nothing, like a drizzle encountering a conflagration.

All of Jinping City shook at the dragon's roar. Ominous bells rang in Southern Sage Temple.

Pang Jian made a grab in midair and "pulled" over the nearby Xi Ping. With his other hand, he pulled out a metal tool so long it looked very much like a hand cannon,⁸ but when the trigger of this "hand cannon" was pressed, what it shot out was a thick concentration of talismans.

The hand cannon shot quickly and soon formed a talisman net of layer upon layer. But these talismans were so weak they seemed to be made of air; they caught fire as soon as the wind touched them. The speed at which they flew out couldn't keep up with the speed at which they were destroyed.

Pang Jian, dazed, covered the sky with talismans as he shielded the rapid retreat of the others. They were several zhang away in a flash, and the front of his robe was already burnt and ragged, as though it had been soaked in acid from the factories!

The blue-clotheser who had nearly charged out almost went weak at the knees. He muttered, "What...what level of cultivation must this be?"

Another blue-clotheser said, dumbstruck, “Zhi-shishu is an ascended spirit peak master! Can this person be an ascended spirit cultivator?”

“Don’t talk nonsense! There’s no such thing as an ascended spirit evil cultivator!”

Xi Ping finally struggled free of Commander Pang’s rough grip on his neck. “Listen, Exalted...cough-cough...stop discussing ascended spirits. I think if we stay to watch the fun any longer, we’ll be the ones ascending to heaven. If we can’t beat him, can we move away?”

Just then, the dragon shadow let out a peculiar low roar, as though beckoning to something. The mountain ridges around them cracked. Something seemed to burst out of the ground.

Zhi Xiu’s figure landed not far from the black dragon. The kind and gentle smile was gone from his face.

“General Zhi, though you are a rare genius, have you been an ascended spirit for even a hundred years? Naturally, I dared to come because I had something to rely on. I won’t conceal from you that I am a consummate ascended spirit. I am only a step away from shedding my skin. The distance between two major boundaries is like the distance between heaven and earth. You're no match for me." Tai Sui's voice came from the black dragon. The dragon's face was like an evil ghost's, but he still spoke kindly.

The walkers in the mortal world who had just been arguing about whether there was such a thing as an ascended spirit evil cultivator were dumbfounded.

If you said that an ascended spirit cultivator had attained the highest heaven, then you could say that a cultivator who had shed his skin was no longer human.

It was said that the mighty cultivators in the "shed skin" stage could call up thunder, cover midsummer with snow, turn the deep ocean into fertile fields. Many of the "deities" the common people offered sacrifices to at the beginning of each solar term were in fact elders of the shed skin stage.

"It isn't that I can't seize Jinping's Dragon Vein by force. I've only gone by this roundabout method because I'm unwilling to harm innocent common people. I wanted to quietly pry open the Azure Dragon Towers, take a sliver of the Dragon Vein, and go. Why must you spoil my ingenious plan and compel me to seize it by force instead? If I remove Jinping's Dragon Vein by force, the river will rise and the earth will shake. Immortals, it's one thing if you care nothing for the millions of ordinary people in the city and outside of it, but what about the noble people on the west side of the Lingyang River and those in the inner courtyards of the palace? Do you care nothing for them, either?”

As he said this, the gigantic dragon’s head turned once more toward far off Pang Jian. “Commander Pang, let’s talk it over. For the sake of the big picture, please temporarily remove the seals on the seven Azure Dragon Towers and permit me to borrow a bit of the Dragon Vein, and none of us will disturb the people, all right?”

Pang Jian said, smiling coldly, “Even as a walking corpse Your Excellency doesn’t forget to concern himself with the country and the people. How truly admirable.”

Tai Sui ignored his fit of pique and responded levelly: “Cultivators value the world above all.”

Pang Jian was very repressed in Jinping City. All day he had to put on a decent act. Only in front of evil cultivators could he reveal a trace of his true obstinate and unruly nature. At once, he clapped his hands and said, “How rare to see an evil cultivator like Your Excellency have such an open heart. Well said. Cultivators value the world above all. In that case, why don’t you commit suicide at once? If you’re no longer in the world to cause trouble, you’ll be benefiting mankind and saving the people. I’ll be sure to explain your meritorious deed to my sect and have them raise a memorial temple to you in the Blissful Village. Of course the common people of Jinping will be overwhelmed with gratitude and come every year to offer sacrifices.

Wouldn't that be to everyone's satisfaction?"

The dragon's head gave him a pitying look and didn't sink to the level of arguing with this open-eyed ant and his empty rhetoric. Instead, the head turned calmly toward Zhi Xiu. "General Zhi, what do you think?"

"Today's young walkers in the mortal world truly are sharp-tongued. My speech isn't as skilled as his," Zhi Xiu answered, also very calmly. "As for whether you can take the Dragon Vein today, why don't you ask this?"

As he spoke, he swept out his hand, and a sword fell into his palm out of thin air.

A blue-clotheser cried out in surprise, "Zhaoting!"

"Zhaoting"—this was the peerless sword said to have fended off tens of thousands of Lancang monsters and the Southern He army in the past.

There wasn't a single stick in Jinping that some child hadn't picked up to play the part of Zhaoting!

The black dragon's reaction to Zhaoting was considerable. Almost as soon as they met, a mournful dragon's howl resounded throughout the world. The black clouds covering the sky over the Blissful Village suddenly thickened.

Pang Jian held down Xi Ping's head while he raised a hand and opened an unprepossessing black umbrella, shielding the two of them. The moment the umbrella opened, countless bolts of lightning crashed down.

Xi Ping felt a sharp pain in his ears and temporarily lost his hearing.

For a time, everything outside the umbrella, even the pouring rain, was swallowed by the lightning. Never mind the immortal and the demon, he couldn't even see Pang Jian right next to him.

Xi Ping felt that he had become a tiny ant amid a colossal flood, desperately huddling on a leaf that could capsize at any moment. All his ideas took flight, and for a moment he actually felt a bit lost.

The storm plowed through the whole Blissful Village. Zhi Xiu quickly planted Zhaoting in the ground, and the peculiar shaking of the ground stopped temporarily. But at the same time, he was entirely encircled by the black dragon!

Like a python, the black dragon wrestled with the keen sword energy all over Zhi Xiu, staring greedily at the green-gowned man and Zhaoting in his hand as though he wanted to swallow the man and the sword together.

Xi Ping, deafened and dazzled, managed to recover some of his senses and felt that the hand the insufferably arrogant Commander Pang was using to hold down his head was shaking!

Next, he heard a crisp sound. The canopy of the umbrella in Pang Jian's hand tore in half down the middle and its ribs broke.

Pang Jian had already been injured while facing Tai Sui earlier. Now he could hardly stand up. He stumbled.

Xi Ping quickly held him up, and Pang Jian fell on him, getting an unexpected noseful of the young master's rich clothing scent. Stifled, he turned his head away and sneezed.

The sneeze aggravated his internal injury. He followed it up by coughing up a mouthful of blood.

Xi Ping: "..."

What a disaster. He'd made Heaven's Design Pavilion's commander throw up blood!

As Xi Ping was wondering whether he should keep holding him up or, for Commander Pang's good, push him aside, he heard a voice as thin as gossamer. "Why...why are you here?"

Still supporting Pang Jian, Xi Ping looked in the direction of the voice and saw Jiangli in her mourning dress.

In the thunderstorm just now, both Heaven's Design Pavilion's half-immortals and the evil cultivators had found their own shelter. Jiangli had been pulled under a coffin board by her companions with missing parts.

As soon as the thunderstorm had passed, she had struggled up from under the coffin board.

She seemed to be choked and burned by some strange force. She absolutely had to understand.

"Why are you here...? How can you be here?" As if obsessed, Jiangli stared at Xi Ping with an unfocused gaze. "You...you shouldn't..."

Everyone was in a sorry state now. Only Xi Ping, shielded by Pang Jian, hadn't even lost a strand of hair. He shot back, ignorant and undaunted, "Then where should I be? Divine lady going in disguise through the mortal world, why don't you tell me how it should be?"

Because of her sudden aging, the bones around Jiangli's eyes seemed to have collapsed, making the eye sockets bigger and deeper. Inside were two clouded eyes.

She muttered incoherently, "You were clearly taken by Heaven's Design Pavilion. Why didn't you give them the birthday jade? Why didn't you stay at Heaven's Design Pavilion tonight?"

After spending so long in the woods, even if he had been an idiot, Xi Ping would have understood—Jiangli must have put that soul-driving spice into ordinary food or drink and marinated him into a human incense burner without him knowing about it. He was a dissolute night owl to start with. He was sure to run into an unlucky devil infected with the insect eggs and kill him with the scent. The appearance of these corpses was very much like that of a victim who had been snatched to be a ghost's wife. Everyone's first impression being the strongest, they would decide that these people had been snatched for an underworld marriage.

Jiangli had counted on him being taken to Heaven's Design Pavilion, then discovering the birthday jade in the silk brocade bag he was carrying. Thinking he was also a candidate to be a "bride," he would have run in terror to hand over the stone, then hidden at Heaven's Design Pavilion in like a turtle in its shell, seeking protection.

This way, the walkers in the mortal world would certainly have sent someone to investigate Jiangli. But to handle a mere singing girl, there certainly wouldn't be more than one or two people. They would follow the leads the old driver had deliberately left and step right into the evil cultivators' trap, then be captured by them to use as offerings—presumably in that instance, Jiangli wouldn't have been the one to bleed.

Once night came, the "incense burner" mixed in among the insect egg hosts would have been able to kill all the cowards who had been sent running scared by the Flower Viewing Invitations to spend the night at Heaven's Design Pavilion. When the time came, Jinping would have been full of walking corpses running around. There wouldn't have been enough walkers in the mortal world, and they would have been flustered. Then there would have been an opportunity for the evil cultivators' associates in the city to steal the Dragon Vein!

Pretty fucking well thought out, too, but couldn't she have asked him before casting him as such a clown?

“Well, I haven’t asked you yet!” Xi Ping said angrily. “What were you thinking? That I would be so scared by a lousy rock that I wouldn’t dare to leave Heaven’s Design Pavilion and get you thrown in the Quell? Why did you cast me as some bleating, pants-wetting coward?! Is that me?”

Xi Ping’s anger had gone to his head. He even forgot to speak well of the dead and blurted out, “That’s Big Dog Wang!”

But Jiangli didn’t hear a word of it. She was in extreme despair now, and not because the plan had failed—she had been prepared to sacrifice herself; she hadn’t counted on being able to easily capture Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s half-immortals to stand in for her.

In all her life, all her hopes had come to nothing, and all her expectations had let her down. There was no exception. She had long ago acknowledged this as her fate.

The soul-driving spice and the insect eggs were both concealed at Overflowing Splendor. She hadn’t hesitated for a moment before giving Xi Ping the wine with soul-driving spice concealed in it. He was the last thing tying her to this world. Once any thought of him had been destroyed, she would be “perfect.”

Hearing that Xi Ping had been taken by Heaven's Design Pavilion "without a hitch," she had known that this was a surefire thing. She had only to wait before she, the worthless "toy," was once again thrown aside. Others were willing to coddle her on account of her beauty, but this cold-hearted young master didn't even care for that. What suspense could there be?

But this time, the "surefire" person hadn't thrown her away.

And he had made all their arrangements fall through at the last minute.

Just this once.

As if her fate was to have all her wishes contradicted...no matter what those wishes were.

Jiangli with her head of white hair screamed, still and sad: "But your feelings for me are clearly more ephemeral than dew!"

The wretch Xi Ping didn't understand a thing. He thought he hadn't explained himself to her, so he boldly and forcefully yelled back, "I don't love you, so that means I'm a coward? Are you some kind of proving ground for bravery?"

Pang Jian: "..."

In the sky the immortal and the demon were deadlocked. All of Jinping City might shake itself into a pile of ruins at any moment, and every single one of them would be dissolved into a fine powder. And these two still had the time to argue!

And they were arguing about something so irrelevant!

CHAPTER 11 - Midnight Song (11)

Tai Sui's human body separated from his dragon's body. With his ashen dead man's face that had yet to regain the nimbleness of life, he stood behind the dragon's body, soaked through by the rain. Amid the noisy rain, he said, "General Zhi, when you were mortal, you said that you fought for the common people of Great Wan. Now that you've gone to the immortal mountains, you've forgotten us, haven't you?"

General Zhi didn't respond. Zhaoting had begun to shake. A part of the black dragon fell to the ground and turned back into a "shadow." The "shadow" flowed toward Zhi Xiu like dirty water and wound around Zhaoting, which was joined with the earth.

At first, the black shadow touched the sword like cold water pouring onto fierce flames; it was vaporized at once. But as more and more black shadows poured off the dragon's body, the light coming from Zhaoting began to weaken.

Pang Jian was about to speak, but he was choked by the blood still in his throat. For a time, he couldn't speak, so he elbowed Xi Ping. Xi Ping somehow understood. He hadn't chewed out Jiangli to his satisfaction, so he turned and scolded the great demon: "Great Wan's common people belong to many families, but which family are you supposed to be part of? Do you carry your parents' names, or do you make do with the name of the skin you've stolen..."

Tai Sui didn't so much as turn his head. The black dragon's tail came crashing toward them.

He sighed. "General Zhi, you were the first to abandon us."

The black dragon wrapped around Zhaoting, then continued downward to pierce through the earth. Soon, an enormous dragon shadow had spread over the ground like an oil spill.

Raging waves rose on the calm canal outside of Jinping City, as if an enormous dragon were sweeping past underwater, the big waves nearly capsizing the ten-zhang-high steam-powered cargo ships; the southern mountains' ridges cracked, and many ancient trees along the cliffs were pulled up, roots and all; on the Sage's Road, eternally untouched by dust, the inscriptions suddenly dimmed, and the snow-white stone blocks were splashed with mud from the rain; in Jinping, a crack appeared in the perfectly joined paving stones in Danguai Lane, like a snake, crawling from east to west, straight toward the imperial city, snapping the rich decorative carvings on the stones in two.

The Board of Astronomy's seismic golden toad spat out a copper bead, setting off alarm bells.

An earthquake!

When the dragon's tail came crashing toward them, Pang Jian was prepared. He seized Xi Ping with one hand and used his blood-stained other hand to draw a talisman on the ground. "Come on!"

The dragon's tail fell with a rumble, but the two of them had vanished into thin air.

Xi Ping had seen Commander Pang walk through walls. This time he personally experienced "burrowing into the earth."

He felt as if he had been turned into a sheet of paper, temporarily losing his senses, his whole body shrinking into a thin slice. In about the space of a breath, he was released once more. Xi Ping instinctively inhaled. The breath seemed to fill up his paper body and expand it once more.

And he was three zhang away, being pulled out of a gravestone by Pang Jian.

Amazing!

Xi Ping had no attention to spare for the fact that he had just nearly been pounded into the earth to join the beauties of the Blissful Village in their peaceful rest. He looked expectantly at Pang Jian, waiting for Commander Pang to instruct him to scold the demon again.

He wanted to have another go.

But when he looked, he found that Pang Jian's face was rather grave.

Zhaoting could no longer suppress the earth's tremors. A golden cord broke through the earth and surged toward the sky but was sucked midway into the black dragon's mouth. The golden cord was pulled toward Tai Sui and wavered on the hem of his robe, quickly forming line after line of celestial inscriptions incomprehensible to mortals.

Pang Jian coughed twice to clear his throat. "This looks bad."

"What's wrong?" said Xi Ping.

Pang Jian didn't answer. Actually, he didn't especially believe that a half-dead evil cultivator could be a consummate ascended spirit, but regardless of whether he believed it, this demon could actually seize the Dragon Vein out from under Zhaoting.

His face grave, he looked in the direction of Jinping—somewhere, black smoke was rising. The sky above Jinping was clouding over.

Tai Sui had been completely wrong. Even if Jinping's earth dragon rolled over, the important personages of Dangui Lane would at most receive a fright. There were no tall buildings to crush people on the west side of the Lingyang River, and moreover every family had a big garden where they could go to avoid natural disasters, as well as well-trained servants and guards; what did they have to fear?

The only ones to die would be the people struggling to survive in the narrow alleys and factory shacks... This demon must not have seen any wealthy and high-ranking people; perhaps he was a rustic demon.

“Exalted, don't you think we ought to get a little further back?” The young master from Dangui Lane tugged at him. “All your subordinates have run off.”

“You go with them.” Pang Jian brushed away his hand and calmly pulled a long bow out from his femur. “I can't look after you. Go find a place to hide on your own.”

Xi Ping froze, watching Commander Pang step forward raising his bow.

Xi Ping knew nothing about “ascended spirits,” but he had already worked this much out from the blue-clothesers' reactions: in the fight between General Zhi and Tai Sui, even the Exalted of Heaven’s Design Pavilion had to stay out of the way. It was the same way house cats and street mutts were best off not even watching dragon wars and tiger battles, and instead running as fast as they could; even accidentally making a sound would bring mortal danger; they could only burrow into the earth to save their lives.

But something had possessed the mutt Commander Pang. With a struggle, he approached the edge of the enormous dragon shadow and brazenly drew the long bow with no arrow notched. A whirlwind formed at the center of the empty bowstring. The veins on the back of Pang Jian’s hand popped up as he forced his ceaselessly shaking hand to remain stable. Scraps of leaves, fragments of rock, droplets of rain...everything was pulled in.

“A near-shed skin evil cultivator” sounded too unbelievable. Even the immortal sect couldn’t have expected it. If General Zhi had backup, it would have appeared by now. Heaven’s Design Pavilion only had cultivators of the open-eyed stage. Pang Jian was well aware that in all of Jinping, apart from the immortal envoy, his own better than nothing cultivation was the highest.

When the bow was fully drawn, a reddish-gold arrow appeared out of nowhere on the empty bowstring, with fletching like the legendary phoenix, so scorching it dazzled the eye.

But when this awesome arrow hit the churning black shadow, it was like a weak spark sinking into a deep pool; before Xi Ping could even open his eyes, it was annihilated.

Xi Ping didn’t know what kind of bow this was, but he felt that the arrows it shot seemed to be a part of Commander Pang. As the arrow disappeared, Pang Jian staggered, the blood instantly draining clean out of his face. Only in his wild wolf’s eyes was the blaze unextinguished. He stared steady as stone at the golden cord weaving inscriptions on Tai Sui’s clothes and notched a second arrow.

Having lost Commander Pang’s protection, Xi Ping knew he ought to turn and run as far as he could. But for some reason, he stared at Pang Jian’s figure for a time without moving.

Amid the reeking wind and bloody rain, Xi Ping watched across a distance of several zhang as Pang Jian set about his futile task, shooting arrows whose flames grew weaker and weaker to no avail.

A second arrow, a third, a fourth...

There was blood at the ghastly pale corners of Pang Jian's mouth, but the arrows fell with precise accuracy, closely pursuing the golden cord. Even if he had to move one step at time, he was still approaching.

The moment the sixteenth arrow fell into the black shadow, the golden cord actually paused for an instant. For just that instant, a segment of the golden cord "climbing" up the robe was pulled back by Zhaoting, and General Zhi and the demon were once again at a standstill.

Pang Jian couldn't hold out any longer. His legs went weak, and he went to his knees. Before his knees touched the ground, he was dragged backward over three chi from behind. A sharp wind like a chopper nearly scraped the soles of his shoes as it fell, cutting a deep gouge in the place where he had just been standing.

Pang Jian turned his head in astonishment and saw Xi Ping. He didn't even have the strength to speak now. He could only use his eyes to ask: What are you still doing here?!

Xi Ping truly had the makings of an arrogant and overweening person. Propping up Pang Jian with both hands, he cheered him on enthusiastically: “Exalted, shoot another one, that one just now worked, I think you can do it!”

Pang Jian: “...”

Easy enough for you to say! Go fuck yourself!

“Are you out of arrows?” As if by divine aid, Xi Ping understood Commander Pang’s look. He got out a big branch from somewhere, as long as the arm span of a grown man. All the little twigs on it had been pared away and a long string of rotting paper messily strung to it, all the lewd verses he had torn down in the Blissful Village—he had been pretty busy just now.

Then this mystical youth took a paper fan out of his clothes and strung it onto the big branch as well. “Use this as an arrow! That Exalted Zhao said this karma beast or whatever is the Southern Sage’s mythological animal and can expel evil. Try it! Hurry, hurry, while the wind is in the right direction!”

The karma beast that hated all evil, forced into coexistence with a pile of unspeakable material, showed an ominous glint in its enormous eyes, as if it wanted to expel this bastard Xi first of all.

Pang Jian managed to take a breath. “Kid, are you even human?!”

He put a hand on Xi Ping’s shoulder, holding himself up, and really did take the incredible “arrow.”

This time, Pang Jian didn’t shoot the branch at the great demon. He considered briefly, steadied his shaking hand as best he could, and shot the spear-like piece of wood into the air.

How could an ordinary thing like this branch approach an ascended spirit cultivator? It had hardly left the bowstring before it disintegrated. The papers on it also went to pieces and floated toward Tai Sui like snowflakes.

There wasn’t a trace of spiritual energy on these scraps of paper. Tai Sui didn’t so much as look at them.

But the next moment, he froze.

Slowly, Tai Sui tilted his head. His gaze fell on the hem of his robe.

A two-cun long karma beast passed from countless scraps of paper onto his robe—the grave clothes had designs on them. When the karma beast landed amid the inscriptions, it opened its mouth wide and bit them!

The little beast's body was immediately torn apart and disappeared into nothing. But it had bitten off a corner of the robe, and the dovetailing line of inscriptions immediately went askew.

Inscriptions required extensive knowledge and profound scholarship. The least error, and everything would go wrong. At this tiny tear, the inscriptions in golden cord collapsed instantly and were pulled in by Zhaoting!

The collapsed inscriptions swirled wildly. Tai Sui's robe seemed to become a pool of molten gold, lighting up the Blissful Village's night as though it were noon.

At the same time, General Zhi's voice rang in Xi Ping and Pang Jian's ears: "You two have some guts! Get back!"

General Zhi was evidently far away; how could his voice reach their ears? Before Xi Ping could understand it, Pang Jian, without any hesitation, grabbed him by the scruff of the neck and pulled him back into the gravestone.

The two of them had just hidden in the stone tablet when there was a furious dragon's roar. The scattered golden cord gathered into a big net, one end wrapped around Tai Sui, the other held to the ground by Zhaoting.

The torrential rain came to a halt, as abruptly as it had begun to pour, as though someone had shut a sluice gate.

There was sudden silence all around, all the different sounds ceasing at once. For a space, even time stopped.

In the dead silence of the Blissful Village's woods, you could have heard a pin drop.

The big golden net sudden drew in. The enormous dragon in the net struggled desperately, trying to throw the net off itself. Then a fierce flash of light fell from the sky onto Zhaoting, piercing through the dragon's body on its way.

Like a snake stabbed through the heart, the huge dragon immediately raised its head from the ground. The whole Blissful Village was nearly razed flat. The gravestone where Xi Ping and Pang Jian were hiding fell over with a crash. Xi Ping, nearly stifled to death, rolled out of the stone tablet and was on the point of being sent flying by the dragon's tail!

Just then, a ray of red light flew from Xi Ping and blocked the dragon's tail as it came toward him.

Amid the thundering, a woman's faint sigh sounded in his ears, just for a moment, like a hallucination.

Pang Jian took the opportunity to pull him back into the earth. At the same time, countless golden threads "grew" out of the ground. Following the light from Zhaoting, they passed through the black dragon and Tai Sui's human body, cutting them to pieces. A ray of bloody light flew from the body parts toward the horizon, but an unshakeable golden cord stuck to its tail. The next moment, the bloody light was pinned to the ground by Zhaoting, following after the golden cord.

A thick scent of blood spread explosively in all directions, nearly knocking out Xi Ping, who had just climbed out of the stone.

Dimly, he heard pattering. The rain that had stopped earlier was falling once again.

The rain washed away the scent of rotting wood, but it couldn't wash clean the stink of blood. Rumbling came from the ground, like thunder, but also like a dragon's roar, echoing the quivering of Zhaoting.

The quaking of the earth and shaking of the mountains stopped. The Dragon Vein had been placated by Zhaoting and returned to its original position.

After a long time, Xi Ping at last came around. He climbed up shakily and found that he had been covered in blood.

The dozen mu of the Blissful Village had all been soaked with blood coming out of nowhere, turning the rain into a red river, as if the beautiful souls whose homes had just been raided had returned to the human world to shed all the blood they hadn't had time to shed during their lives, creating a hellish lake of blood.

Xi Ping dizzily held onto a tree trunk to support himself and retched. He saw the normally perfectly turned out blue-clothesers each looking even more sorry than himself. A few couldn't even stand up. Far away, a few evil cultivators whose limbs hadn't been intact to start with had suffered even more damage; there wasn't a single one without parts missing. The dear friend who had originally been missing half of his skull was the most horrifying. There were no contents left on top of his neck; it was unclear whether he would be able to live.

Only Jiangli was missing.

Xi Ping held his buzzing ears and felt faintly anxious. He thought, Has she run off?

“Looking for your little confidante?” A wound-covered hand reached over and took the wine pot Xi Ping had kept tucked into his clothes—the wine pot had gone through all the rolling and scrambling with him, but it hadn’t broken.

Xi Ping blurted out, “She’s not my...”

“All right, she’s not.” Zhi Xiu sighed. “Stop looking, she’s at your feet.”

Xi Ping looked down. His black boots were soaked through with blood. He looked as though he had just waded through a sea of bodies. There was nothing at his feet but mud.

He looked up at General Zhi in confusion.

Zhi Xiu didn’t answer. He casually wiped the blood off the wine pot with his sleeve. With no thought for dirt, he drank the remaining wine in the pot.

Beside him, someone picked up in a hoarse voice: “You must not have noticed the ‘life-swapping talisman’ you’re carrying.”

Pang Jian limped over and saluted Zhi Xiu. “Shishu.”

“No need to be so polite,” Zhi Xiu said mildly. “Call some people to come clean up the aftermath.”

Even a person as insolent as Pang Jian became somewhat more respectful when facing General Zhi, in spite of himself. He suppressed his wildness and responded with a proper, “Yes, shishu.” He turned and took out his whistle, faced north and blew three times. Then he said another word to General Zhi and went to inspect his companions and the evil cultivators.

Xi Ping went after him and asked, “Exalted, what is a ‘life-swapping talisman’?”

Perhaps owing to the life and death adventure they had just gone through, Pang Jian’s manner toward Xi Ping had improved slightly. He answered, rather patiently, “A life-swapping talisman is a special type of talisman that doesn’t require very high cultivation to draw. It only needs to be drawn on some item you’ve carried close over many years. If the person who takes the life-swapping talisman encounters mortal danger, the talisman’s maker will take it on in your stead. That’s why it’s called life-swapping. Did she give you something?”

Xi Ping remembered something. He took out the birthday jade.

Its color, originally almost like blood jade, had at some point turned to mottled coral. It looked even cheaper. There was a crack down the middle of the words “Ning’an Chen family.”

Jiangli’s accent had never changed. Xi Ping knew that she came from Ning’an, and the great demon had called her “sister of the Chen family”...

Was this her birthday jade?

“It has the remnants of a spell.” Pang Jian took the birthday jade from his hand and smelled it. “But this talisman is a type of protection talisman that does no harm, so the head office’s karma beasts didn’t take it for an evil item. When that evil cultivator’s tail nearly turned you into a piece of flatbread just now and suddenly froze, that must have been the effect of the life-swapping talisman. She took that hit for you.”

Xi Ping instinctively denied it: “Wait, no... Didn’t she think I was going to give that thing to Heaven’s Design Pavilion?”

“When the talisman’s maker confers the talisman, she only needs to have the person receiving it drink a drop of her blood, and in the future, even if the object that carries the life-swapping talisman is lost, the spell will still remain on you. It won’t lose its effect.”

Xi Ping was dazed.

Yes, when Jiangli had given him the silk brocade bag, she had in fact poured him a cup of odd-tasting tea. He had thought it was because the pot was rusty.

“Tsk.” Pang Jian handed the jade ornament back to him. “Taking advantage of people with your pretty face.”

Xi Ping took the piece of jade. “Exalted, don’t you suspect me?”

Pang Jian gave him a strange look. It seemed to be ridiculing, yet without any malice. He was looking at Xi Ping, but Xi Ping wasn’t the target.

“You? If some of your fellow sons of the rich and powerful had pushed each other into losing their heads and playing around with witchcraft and sorcery, then you would be rather suspect. But stupid things like worshipping evil gods and sacrificing yourself... Your sort doesn’t usually have anything to do with that,” Commander Pang said with a trace of mockery. “You don’t have the makings.”

In all his life Xi Ping had never done anything apart from eating and drinking except making merry. The worst things he had encountered had been household punishments from the Marquis.

Now, dressed in bloody clothes and standing in the ice-cold rain, squeezing the cracked piece of jade, he had been informed that Jiangli was dead.

His ears heard it, but his mind was muddled. Standing perfectly still in the sea of blood, he still unconsciously looked around, waiting for Jiangli to appear so he could ask for an explanation—

Didn't she see him as just the same as Big Dog Wang's ilk?

Hadn't she decided that as soon as he found the horoscope on the jade, he would immediately hand it over without another thought?

Didn't she think he was not only faithless and heartless, but also a complete bastard?

Then why would she give him her only birthday stone? And swap her life for his when he ran into peril?

Hadn't she ever met a decent man in her life?

Xi Ping could make no sense of this no matter how much he thought about it. He was bewildered for a long time, then finally realized: he wouldn't be able to find Jiangli.

The immortal had said that she had turned into a pool of blood, becoming one with the many women like her in the Blissful Village.

He hadn't had a last look at her, only remembered the last words she had said in the mortal world. She had said: "But your feelings for me are clearly more ephemeral than dew!"

But her life, her fate, her hurried trample through existence—how could any of it be more substantial than dew?

It was only romance... Look at this stupid woman talking nonsense.

CHAPTER 12 - Midnight Song (Final)

The big black cat stretched, leapt up onto Prince Zhuang's knees, and idly stepped all over him. It didn't retract its claws and pulled out threads of silk all over his brocade robe, as well as getting cat hair everywhere.

Prince Zhuang had no temper where the cat was concerned. Not only did he never get annoyed, he sometimes even casually rubbed the cat's head and let it keep walking.

But this time, for once, he wasn't in the mood to play with the cat.

The chime clock struck three times, and there was a knock at the door from outside.

Prince Zhuang looked up at once. "Bai Ling, enter."

In answer, a piece of "paper" slipped through the crack in the door. The bolt didn't move at all.

When the "paper" came into the room, it shook and expanded, landing on the ground as a very skinny man. He was thin, with a long face and very proper features, but for no apparent reason, it was impossible to remember what he looked like. Even his eyes were slightly lighter than usual.

He entered the room without a sound, more light-footed than a cat.

So Bai Ling, the head of the Prince Zhuang Manor's secret guard, was a cultivator.

And the sort that hadn't taken the aboveboard path!

"Your Highness," said Bai Ling.

Prince Zhuang waved a hand. "No need to be so polite. How is it?"

Bai Ling answered, "The earthquake has stopped. There are executioner's arrays concealed at the seven Azure Dragon Towers. Not a single one of the people who went to plunder the towers escaped. Around the fifth watch of the night, the assistant commander of Heaven's Design Pavilion returned to the city with his people..."

Prince Zhuang listened impatiently as he detailed these things, then simply interrupted him: "What about that walking calamity Xi Shiyong?"

Bai Ling said, "All is well with the Viscount. Set your mind at ease, Your Highness. He returned with the immortal envoy's carriage."

Prince Zhuang exhaled, his expression relaxing almost imperceptibly.

The chiming clock kept moving forward. He raised a coarse pottery cup and drank a mouthful of water. Then he was once again the unflappable third prince. “Very well—what, did he really leave the city on his own?”

“The immortal envoy’s cultivation is too high. I didn’t dare to approach,” Bai Ling said. “I’m not aware of the details of what happened, but the Viscount was sent back in Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s carriage, and the blue-clothesers at the Yongning Marquis Manor politely dispersed. This must not be a bad thing.”

Prince Zhuang coldly instructed, “Tell the gatekeepers and the guards that if that brat dares to come again, no one is permitted to let him in. Tie him up and send him to the Marquis. He needs a few beatings, or he won’t learn.”

Laughter lines appeared at the corners of Bai Ling’s eyes. “Ah.”

Then Prince Zhuang continued: “Xuanyin’s immortal envoy has come? In previous years, there was news of the immortal envoy months in advance. Whose family does this one belong to? Why has his identity been so strictly concealed?”

“He... Pardon my rudeness.” Bai Ling stepped forward and said a name into Prince Zhuang’s ear.

Hearing it, Prince Zhuang’s eyebrows rose slightly. “Him?”

“Yes,” Bai Ling said quietly. “An ascended spirit peak master coming down from the mountain in person happens hardly once in a hundred years. I don’t know the reason. Perhaps it has to do with the mutiny of the evil cultivators.”

Prince Zhuang patted the black cat, sending it off to play by itself. With his hands behind his back, he walked to the window.

In the courtyard, rain fell on the banana trees. The rainwater fell on the leaves in droplets of mud, as if all the smoke and dust floating over Jinping was falling. Perhaps after this cleaning, tomorrow the fogs would disperse.

The foul black clouds created by mortals in the end fell back upon the mortal world.

There was one thing that others didn’t know, but of which the children of the imperial family were well aware—due to the incident of Lancang to the south, Great Wan’s Dragon Vein had broken once. Xuanyin’s Dignitary of Fate High Elder, the immortal Zhang Jue, had personally come to the mortal world to repair the Dragon Vein and restore the country's fortune. This was the only "shed skin" immortal of Xuanyin who had publicly shown in his face in the mortal world in thousands of years.

The repaired Dragon Vein wasn't as stable as the original one. It needed to be reinforced once every ten years. This was why Xuanyin Mountain sent down an immortal envoy, who incidentally presided over the Grand Selection. Reinforcing the Dragon Vein required a suitable time. It was always on a different day, so the date of the Grand Selection had also become mysterious.

When each Grand Selection Year came, the Dragon Vein would be unusually weak. This was also the reason the evil cultivators had chosen this time to take a risk.

Had "this individual" come down from the mountain this year because the evil cultivators scheming against the Dragon Vein were particularly powerful, or...was Xuanyin Mountain hinting that the imperial star was fading, that the sovereign had transgressed, or even that the Dragon Vein was unsteady?

"Tell Wang Zixian that we'll take no action at this time," Prince Zhuang said after deliberating silently for a moment. "An ascended spirit cultivator is an ascended spirit cultivator, after all. Let's not be too clever under this one's nose."

Bai Ling gave an affirmative, then said, "There is no clear information about this mutiny of the evil cultivators. The whole thing seems strange from beginning to end. I've heard that Heaven's Design Pavilion wasn't very polite to the young masters staying at their head office last night. I'm afraid there will be great changes to the Grand Selection roster. If the Viscount had the good fortune to make his name known to the immortal envoy, should..."

Prince Zhuang looked at him expressionlessly. Bai Ling immediately shut his mouth.

Prince Zhuang swept his long sleeve over the window lattice. A silver inscription flashed on the wooden window frame.

This was a third-class inscription. With this embedded in the wooden beam, the room was warm in winter and cool in summer with no need for coals or ice, and it could withstand the earth dragon rolling over three times. Even if outside the sky fell and the earth split, as long as it didn't reach the stage of the Azure Dragon Towers collapsing, the prince's manor would be invulnerable.

A half-immortal in the open-eyed stage couldn't create an inscription. These inscriptions had to come from the hand of an immortal of the established foundation stage or beyond—in other words, one a member Xuanyin Mountain's inner sect.

According to the rules, only a Prince of the Second Rank⁹ or better, or a renderer of extraordinary service receiving special honors, was entitled to use a third-class inscription.

When the immortal sect occasionally bestowed a couple of inscriptions, it was the greatest honor of a mortal's life.

But how distant the immortal sect was!

Even if you received a selection card and were permitted to enter the Latent Cultivation Temple to cultivate for a year, then were fortunate enough to open your spiritual eyes, those who could enter the inner sect were still vanishingly rare. Out of one class every ten years, it wasn't certain that the inner sect would choose even one person.

The black cat jumped onto the windowsill, stuck up its big tail, and let out a long “meow” at its owner, shamelessly raising its head and demanding to be pet. The cat's cry called Zhou Ying's mind back. He once again returned the jade-like mildness to his face and calmly said, “Mr. Tanghua's seventieth birthday is coming up. Prepare a generous gift and send someone to let Heaven's Design Pavilion's Captain Zhao know. Tell him that the Viscount of Yongning is reckless and insolent, and we're afraid of offending the immortal envoy's eyes. If possible, could the Exalted please take a look, and, in case the immortal envoy should wish to make serious changes to the roster of chosen disciples, have the Viscount removed from the alternate list."

A selection card from Xuanyin Mountain could have all the children of nobility squabbling over it. This was Bai Ling's first time hearing of someone being removed from the list. He was dazed.

Prince Zhuang said, quietly, "In Jinping, no matter what disaster may come, I can ward it off for him. If he enters the immortal sect, my reach truly won't be long enough. I only have the one brother. If he had only..."

At this point, he realized that he had misspoken, starting from "only one brother"—where did that leave all the true offspring of imperial blood in the palace? Therefore he stopped speaking, swallowed the following phrase, "if he had only been born ten years later," only paused, then continued: "One understands one's own family. He has no natural talent, and the Marquis Manor isn't struggling to feed him. There's no need to seek this insupportable 'great good fortune.' My uncle understands perfectly. All you need to do is take care of it."

Early the next morning, news of the entrance of the immortal envoy into the capital had indeed exploded.

There was at once an explanation for all the activity the night before—this was General Zhi!

When General Zhi came down to the mortal world, never mind Southern Sage Temple's bells ringing and the Dragon Vein leaping, there would have been nothing surprising about the true dragons on the Nine Dragon Pillar turning into fried dough twists!

For a time, rumors in the streets spread like bamboo shoots after rain: there were those who said they had glimpsed auspicious clouds with their own eyes that night; there were those who said the immortal envoy's carriage had passed their door and old stakes that had been dry for decades had sprouted buds; there were also those who said they had met the immortal envoy in casual dress, and the breath of immortal air had cured their chronic diseases at once!

Locations where the immortal had been encountered included but were not limited to wonton stands, pastry stands, tea shops, wine shops, tofu businesses... Evidently General Zhi had not only cured all illnesses, he was also a glutton who had eaten his way through Jinping in a matter of days!

Amid all this teeming rumor, the inexplicable instability of the Dragon Vein was covered up, and Jinping City's curfew was lifted without any explanation. The peaceful singing and dancing in the city fell back into rhythm with the rumbling steam engines outside the city.

The singing corpse at the pleasure boat ferry crossing was said to have been drugged by an enemy, and the House of Overflowing Splendor, inextricably connected to the murder, was completely shut down. The bustle of the Flower Viewing Festival seemed to have been only fireworks.

It had begun with a river of red fire, but when the fire was done, there was only ash.

“Those who received the Flower Viewing Invitations didn't dare to speak of it after they left,” Pang Jian said to Zhi Xiu, who was inspecting the list of provisional disciples. He deliberated for a moment, then asked, “Shishu, won't it harm your reputation to let these people talk nonsense and fill the world with rumor?”

Indeed, of those rumors about eating at a hundred restaurants, more than half had been created by Zhi Jingzhai himself.

“It’s better than them talking about the Dragon Vein being unstable, anyway. Never mind that it would put the common people in a panic, it would be bad for His Majesty, too,” Zhi Xiu said. “My reputation... What do I want with a reputation like a flawless jade? To drop it on the ground and listen to the crash?”

He held a small writing brush. As he spoke, he swept the shaft of the brush over each name on the list in turn. When he pointed at someone, that person’s face would automatically appear on the paper, along with a genealogical background and any history of wrongdoing.

Pang Jian glanced over and saw General Zhi’s brush shaft point at a “Zhao Wenhong.” Beside the name appeared a rather proper young man’s face. Under the picture appeared small writing, explaining that this person belonged to the main bloodline of the Ning’an Zhao family. It stated his age, who his parents were, which immortals belonged to which generation of the family, and so on.

Then there followed a final line: Raped and insulted his younger half-sister by a concubine; she doesn’t dare to report it.

Pang Jian: “...”

What the fuck was this?

General Zhi was a military man, but perhaps because he had spent many years cultivating, his temper was very mild. At a glance, he looked like an unremarkable scholar. This was completely at odds with both a legendary hero and an ascended spirit peak lord of the immortal sect.

Only now did Pang Jian realize why ascended spirit cultivators had “attained the highest heaven.”

Commander Pang had been in Heaven’s Design Pavilion for most of a century. Excluding the years he had been in other parts of the country on official work and had been unable to return in time, he had received five or six immortal envoys—late established foundation stage ones, as well consummate established foundations. He had never seen methods like this.

All the deeds, good and evil, in a mortal’s lifetime, no matter how private, no matter how “kept between heaven and earth and us,” became transparent in front of General Zhi, if he only wanted to know about them.

It was as if he were the “heaven” and “earth” that witnessed all.

Zhi Xiu casually struck off the name “Zhao Wenhong.” He asked, “Is there a member of the Zhao family in Heaven’s Design Pavilion?”

“There is,” said Pang Jian, giving up Zhao Yu. “I’ll let Zhao-shidi know and have him go home and deal with it.”

In less than the time it takes to drink a cup of tea, General Zhi had struck off nearly half the names on the list. “Is there a backup list?”

“Shishu.” Pang Jian, watching from the sidelines, had found the sight too shocking to behold. He couldn’t resist saying, “Don’t you think that we’re... sheltering wicked deeds like this?”

“Some of them really are disgraceful,” Zhi Xiu said very mildly, judging the matter as it stood. “I struck off all the ones who were unsuitable. Fortunately, they’re all the sons of the aristocracy. They won’t be hard to investigate or locate. Whoever deals with these things—have them handle it.”

As he spoke, he looked up. His long phoenix eyes were like a two calm lakes, reflecting the beautiful and the ugly without judgment, neither shocked nor angry. Looking into them for a while made you calm down along with him.

Pang Jian was silent for a moment. “Yes, my colleagues ought to have an alternate list ready. Allow me to go look, shishu.”

Soon, Zhao Yu presented the alternate name list. He didn’t dare to say much, only went home, dejected, to deal with his family’s unworthy descendant.

Zhi Xiu crossed out and pointed. Soon he had put together a final list of thirty people and gave it to Pang Jian. “No need to look further. These will do for this year.”

As soon as he spoke, a blue-clotheser came in and said, “Shishu, commander, those evil cultivators who launched a sneak attack against the Azure Dragon Towers all killed themselves after being captured. Of the ones at the Blissful Village, those that didn’t die on the scene couldn’t endure a single soul-searching. We only managed to get fragments in questioning. These people normally use immortal tools made of reincarnation wood to transmit messages. They don’t use their real names when they communicate. They call the evil god they worship Tai Sui. The situation has been handled and written up. Please take a look, shishu.”

Zhi Xiu said “good work” and took the report. He flipped through it carefully. “This was the result of my negligence. I didn’t expect that this evil cultivator would be a consummate ascended spirit. I caused all of you alarm.”

Pang Jian asked, “Shishu, aren’t there very few evil cultivators who can pass the established foundation pass? How could there be an ascended spirit evil cultivator? Also...”

“Well?”

Pang Jian hesitated, wondering whether what he was going to say would be too arrogant, but the look in General Zhi’s eyes gave you the feeling that you could say anything in front of him, that he could pardon anything, so he couldn’t resist saying, “I think that that evil cultivator was a little weak—of course, even if I had craned my neck until it broke, I still wouldn’t have been able to see the dust under his heels, but...I just think that he doesn’t... doesn’t quite match my idea of a near-shed skin.”

When he had spoken, he waited for Zhi Xiu to laugh, but General Zhi didn’t laugh. Seeming to take his words very seriously, he reflected for a moment, then nodded and said, “Indeed. There are many riddles about this person, and the sect’s information is currently limited. But all of you can set your minds at ease. This kind of evil cultivator may not be encountered once in a thousand years, and their arrival is always preceded by great events. The sect will know ahead of time.”

Pang Jian could tell at once that Zhi Xiu didn’t want to say anything more about it. He knew that there were a great many taboos within the sect. What the elders didn’t tell you, you couldn’t casually inquire about. So he tactfully shut his mouth and didn’t ask again.

But Zhi Xiu scrutinized him, smiling, and said, “Wenchang, if I saw right in the Blissful Village woods that day, then your spiritual bones are already complete. You’ve fashioned your Way of the Heart, haven’t you? Since you’ve reached a consummate stage, do you want to go a step further?”

Pang Jian’s eyes opened wide. He licked his lips involuntarily.

Zhi Xiu said, “An established foundation cultivator has to enter the inner sect. While I don’t take disciples, I can still help you get a reception order.”

Having crossed over to the established foundation, you would truly throw off the mortal world and live forever. No cultivator could be unmoved. This was what countless walkers in the mortal world longed for but couldn’t attain.

Pang Jian was human, too.

But while he opened his mouth and an obvious struggle appeared on his face, he still swallowed his words. Meeting Zhi Xiu’s mild gaze, he lowered his head. “Shishu, entering the inner sect...means I won’t be a walker in the mortal world any longer.”

“Naturally,” Zhi Xiu said. “Those are the rules.”

Hearing this, Pang Jian didn't speak for a long moment. General Zhi seemed to have infinite patience and didn't rush him.

Finally, Pang Jian said, almost solemnly, "Thank you, shishu. When I entered Heaven's Design Pavilion, I didn't wish to go far along the path of cultivation. I only wanted to learn some skills and be a watchdog for the mortal world, to protect the peace. To ascend to the immortal sect and never again leave the mountains...I just think...I just think..."

Zhi Xiu laughed. "That it would be betraying something."

At a loss, Pang Jian said, "Well...I mean...that is..."

"Don't be embarrassed." Zhi Xiu waved a hand. A trace of longing appeared on his face. "You're a lot like an old friend of mine. Let's do this. I'll leave you the reception order, and when you want to enter the inner sect, send word to me."

Pang Jian, confused and disoriented, thought, How could I do that?

So he became even more ill at ease.

Just then, fortunately, another blue-clotheser ran in. "Shishu, commander, there's another thing. How should we handle that 'earworm'?"

Pang Jian felt that his savior had arrived. He nearly wrenched his head off.
“What ‘earworm’?”

“Ah,” said Zhi Xiu, pausing, “I’d forgotten about it. Is it still alive?”

After a moment, Pang Jian saw the little monster that had drawn Xi Ping into the depths of the Blissful Village.

At a glance, this little monster was an ordinary child, with a big head and thin neck, trembling as he was brought to Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s head office. From far away, he saw Zhi Xiu in his jade stamp-green robe and drew back desperately, like a frightened young animal.

Pang Jian pried open his mouth and looked into the little monster’s mouth full of sharp teeth like a bed of nails. He exclaimed in surprise. “This is an ‘earworm half-puppet’?”

Pregnant women were the most easily impacted by evil cultivators. In places where evil cultivators had stayed, children in the area were often born with deformities. Poor families couldn’t look after them, so they could only abandon them. There were evil cultivators who would collect these deformed child and use evil arts to turn them into a half-human half-puppet; they would extend their lifespans and keep them as slaves and pets. The euphemistic name for this was an ‘earworm’”¹⁰

“He seems to be a little scared of me.” Zhi Xiu didn’t approach. He said to Pang Jian, “Do you have a spiritual stone? Give him one to eat.”

Pang Jian gave an all right and took out a blue jade spiritual stone bead the size of a pinky fingernail. As soon as he took it out, the little monster grabbed impatiently it and swallowed it greedily.

“He’s starving. I wonder how long it’s been since he was fed.” Zhi Xiu sighed. “Earworm half-puppets aren’t living people. They can’t eat or drink and have to survive on spiritual stones—was this one created by one of the evil cultivators?”

“Yes,” the reporting blue-clotheser said, “his owner died in the Blissful Village woods.”

“He has to eat spiritual stones? Why not simply live off gold?” Pang Jian said in horror. “Anyway, he’s an evil cultivator’s thing. Let’s dispose of him.”

The little earworm hadn’t expected him to be even more ruthless. He ducked behind the blue-clotheser in fear.

“Wenchang, don’t tease him. A half-puppet may not have the intelligence of a normal child due to the arts used to create him, but he still understands some human speech,” General Zhi Xiu said. “Good and evil have nothing to do with an ignorant little thing like this. I’ll take him to the Latent Cultivation Temple and see whether one of the wealthy disciples would be willing to take him in.”

“On that subject,” Pang Jian said as though “suddenly remembering something” while he flipped through the list of remaining provisional disciples, “Huh? Why wasn’t that Xi Shiyong on the alternate list?”

“You mean that kid from the Blissful Village...the one as reckless as you?”

“He’s the Viscount of Yongning, nephew of the Imperial Consort in the palace. His full name is Xi Ping. Reasonably speaking, he ought to...”

Affecting total carelessness, Pang Jian said, “Hey, that’s strange. Perhaps it’s because there aren’t many members of the Xi family, and my subordinates overlooked him.”

Zhi Xiu smiled. He knew that Pang Jian was doing this on purpose and didn’t expose his act. He casually wrote Xi Ping’s name on the paper, and Young Master Xi’s blooming face appeared.

Xi Ping's "offenses" were simply too numerous to record: on such a month and day, acting in collusion with such and such individuals, beat up the son of the assistant minister of the War Ministry for the sake of an actress; on such a month and day, while drunk, scolded the madam of Fragrant Spring House until she cried; on such a month and day, fed such a person's saddle horse a laxative; on such a month and day, bullied the cat at Prince Zhuang Manor and chased it up a tree...

Pang Jian: "..."

This brat was truly a hidden treasure. So diverting.

Zhi Xiu laughed and added Xi Ping's name to the end of the list. "Let's add him, then."

CHAPTER 13 - The Dragon Bites Its Tail (1)

On the ninth day of the month, before the fourth watch of the night, Xi Ping woke with a start.

He forgot what he had been dreaming about as soon as he opened his eyes. He stared blankly at the birthday jade hanging on the bed curtain for a moment, saw “fourth month, ninth day” carved on the jade, and thought: Jiangli’s birthday.

He rolled over and wearily closed his eyes, blearily wondering what he should get her.

Lately the quality of southern pearl strings had been good, though they were rather big and looked ridiculous on thin people; a gold filigree enamel pocket watch with an inlaid peacock design was a little gaudy, but young women didn’t mind gaudiness; there were also Magu’s¹¹ birthday greetings crafts which, while the quality of the jade wasn’t the best, had carvings of the goddess that at a glance had quite a bit of Jiangli’s charm, and “birthday greetings” were both suited to the occasion and auspicious. He could...

Suddenly, Xi Ping opened his eyes again.

He had remembered. He couldn’t give her anything.

It turned out that this matter had been silently fermenting in his chest for several days and had only now swelled to a sufficient size to block his excessively open heart.

This was Xi Ping's first time experiencing a parting in death. The impression may not have been deep, but the after-effects were lingering.

He draped on his clothes and got out of bed, then wrote half a stanza of a lament for a deceased wife... He couldn't force out a second half. Reading back over it, he felt involuntary sadness welling up, because his great work was truly rubbish, no better than the trees' "skin condition" in the Blissful Village.

The House of Overflowing Splendor had silently disappeared, and for a time, the Jinping social scene had dimmed. Xi Ping had suddenly decided that those places of feminine charms were all very boring. A couple of days ago, a drinking buddy of his had obtained a "steam carriage" that didn't need a horse to pull it and had asked him to come out for a drive, and he, disinterested, had refused.

During the day, he either listened to opera with his grandmother or posed for his mother's drawings, and at night he stayed in his grandmother's courtyard. When the old lady went to sleep, he read on his own.

Even though he was always knocked down within two pages, it was still reading.

In a little while, he was even planning to obey the Marquis, go to the “young masters’ training camp” to make up for his deficiencies, then get married and have children, live a normal life.

But an immortal’s light-hearted joke could rewrite a mortal’s destiny.

Xuanyin Mountain’s selection card arrived at the Marquis Manor when the Marquis was taking a day off.

In the first ke of chen hour,¹² apart from the old lady, who was getting on in years, the whole house was sleeping in. A white crane flew elegantly into the Marquis Manor and waited on the roof for a full ke until the sun rose, but it didn’t see any living people.

It had its orders. There was nothing it could do. It had to trespass into the rear courtyard.

The old lady was watering the flowers. Startled by this auspicious vision, she thought she had reached the end of her lifespan and this immortal crane had come to carry her into the west. She was so scared she dropped her watering can.

Xi Ping heard his grandmother's servant girl cry out in alarm and thought a thief had broken into the house. Without even opening his eyes, he picked up a sword and ran out to fight. He looked around fiercely and couldn't find the thief. He was completely bewildered when a big bird handed him a wooden tablet...and a letter.

He couldn't tell what kind of wood the tablet was made of. Xi Ping yawned and drew in a chilling breath of costus root. The costus root scent put you in mind of soughing pines and bamboo forests that had been silent for hundreds of thousands of years amid cold morning mists. When a breath of it poured into his lungs, his head cleared.

On the front of the wooden tablet was carved a cluster of bamboo beside the character "journey." On the reverse side was a line of small writing:
Viscount of Yongning Xi Ping, on the fourth month, fifteenth day, to enter the Latent Cultivation Temple.

One ke later, the dreaming Yongning Marquis Manor was boiling—there was red rain coming from the sky, how could they still sleep?!

The wastrel that their joke of a Marquis Manor had bred had actually received a selection card for Xuanyin Mountain's Grand Selection!

How wonderful! He hadn't even worked out how to be a man yet, and now he was qualified to become an immortal!

Even the Marquis was stunned. He checked the golden seals of Xuanyin and Heaven's Design Pavilion on the envelope several times before he dared to open it.

The contents of the letter were clear and concise. It only said that provisional disciple Xi Ping was to come at such a time to such a place to do obeisance to the sage at Heaven's Design Pavilion's altar, then travel to the Latent Cultivation Temple to cultivate for a period of one year.

Attached was a list of sect rules three chi long.

As for other trifles—for example, how they would travel, what to bring, what traveling clothes to wear—none of it was spoken of. Xuanyin's Grand Selection was confined to the circle of the children of nobility. Everyone understood the rules.

When the shock was over, the whole family looked at each other in dismay.

A selection card could make Jinping's wealthy and influential lose their minds, but when this unique family encountered pie falling out of the sky, once they had recovered, they didn't seem happy about it at all.

The Marquis read the letter several times and gravely gave a servant a quiet order to go notify Prince Zhuang.

The old lady, meanwhile, using a silk cushion to pick it up, found a brocade box suitable to hold the wooden tablet and muttered, confused, "The Xuanyin Immortal Sect...sent my baby a selection card?"

The Marquis of Yongning's wife Madam Cui frowned. "Our family never thought... But I've already sent someone to find a potential daughter-in-law, what am I supposed to say?"

The old lady asserted: "The immortal sect must have expanded its admissions this year."

Madam Cui became more and more anxious. "Everything was going fine, why would the immortal sect expand its admissions? Is there going to be unrest in the country?"

Madam Cui was skilled at painting and calligraphy and had a quick imagination. She was the only person in the whole family who could coherently explain scenes of beauty—the rest could only act as “scenes of beauty,” shut their mouths, and let her explain. This was what she had once used to entrap the Marquis. But people with overly sensitive minds were often prone to melancholy and thinking of the worst outcomes whenever anything happened.

The old lady knew of this bad habit and quickly consoled her daughter-in-law: “No matter what, this is still a good thing.”

Then she lovingly patted Xi Ping on the head. “Your grandfather was a good-for-nothing. It took him eight years to pass the county examination, and half his life to pass the provincial examination. He spent the family’s money to become a petty official. If he found out that my baby was making so much of himself, I think he’d laugh so hard he’d pick up his teeth and climb out of the ancestral tomb!”

Xi Ping: “...”

Really, there was no need to disturb the old fellow.

The old lady sighed. “But the mountain is timeless. If you happen to get chosen to enter the inner sect while you’re at the Latent Cultivation Temple, by the time you’ve transformed and cast off your mortal body and come down from the mountain, your grandmother will long ago have rushed off to the next life. I won't get to see my baby again."

Madam Cui heard this new anxiety added to her old worry, and tears swam in her eyes.

The Marquis was thinking to himself, You two ladies are worrying over nothing. The inner sect... Does the inner sect accept scraps?

Then he heard Xi Ping say, categorically, "That's not possible. At most I'll stay at the Latent Cultivation Temple for a year then come home. Mom, if you want to look for a bride, then go ahead and keep looking. I'll get married when I get back. There won't be any delay."

Hearing this rubbish, the Marquis of Yongning immediately wanted to shake his mustache once more. But before he could express his anger, he was stifled by his mother and his wife speaking in unison: "God bless us, that would be wonderful."

He had no voice in this family. There was nothing the Marquis could do. He could only put all his strength into glaring at Xi Ping, feeling very oppressed.

Xi Ping could just as well have done without this. In fact, he didn't especially want to go, but it would have seemed pretty shameless to say that. He quickly got over it. While it sounded pretty miserable to be shut up in a mountain valley, luckily it was only for a year, and if he happened to do well, he might get into Heaven's Design Pavilion when he got back.

Heaven's Design Pavilion!

Even the most undistinguished teenage boy was still a teenage boy and could admire force. The image of Pang Jian's back as he drew the bow in the rainy night had branded a yearning into Xi Ping's mind. He didn't know what it would be like when he got to the Latent Cultivation Temple, but for now, at any rate, he was determined to work hard.

His unexpected selection threw off the whole family's relaxed pace.

The old lady and Madam Cui asked around and learned that when you went to the Latent Cultivation Temple for a year, you couldn't leave the mountain, you weren't allowed to contact your family, there were no servants to look after you, and even the luggage you could bring was limited. They both turned pale, feeling that their darling was being banished to penal servitude.

His grandmother and mother gave him repeated exhortations, and Xi Ping patiently accepted them all without question.

This was the result of the Marquis teaching by example since Xi Ping was little: even a beast knew to retract its claws when it returned to its den. If you had a temper to work off, you went and did it outside. Once you came home, you absolutely couldn't make your mother and wife mind your moods. So Xi Ping was used to being pulled this way and that by the two ladies.

But in spite of this, he still couldn't quite take it this time—Madam Cui may have thought that you had to abstain from food when you entered the immortal mountains; she did her best to feed him a year's worth of food in advance, three meals a day with six snacks. She fed Xi Ping so much his spine nearly grew a hump.

Xi Ping got serious indigestion. For several days in a row, there was always acid coming back up his throat. And at night he had one wild dream after another. He kept thinking there was someone humming that Soul Calling Melody into his ear.

When Xi Ping could barely stand it at home any longer, the day to set off had nearly come. Before leaving, he went to Prince Zhuang Manor to say goodbye to his san-ge.

Prince Zhuang seemed to know that he had been tormented by all kinds of exhortations, or perhaps the warming temperatures had sapped his vigor. He was unusually reticent, only told him in brief roughly who had been selected. Before Xi Ping left, he gave him a two-layered brocade box.

Normally, whenever Prince Zhuang obtained any good tea or good wine, he would always give him some to take back to the Marquis Manor. Xi Ping was used to this. He took it and left. The upshot was that when he got home and opened it, he took one look and was astonished: it turned out that this box didn't contain any tea or pastries; it was a "downgraded immortal tool!"

An "immortal tool"—this was a tool that only an immortal could use.

Immortal tools had different grades. A master could use a low-grade immortal tool, but the other way around didn't work. For example, even if an open-eyed half-immortal got hold of Xuanyin Mountain's greatest immortal implement, it would be like giving a saber to a baby. They couldn't make it work.

Mortals with their obstructed spiritual sense naturally couldn't command immortal tools, but after Moon Plated Gold had entered the mortal world, in recent decades, humanity's steam technology had improved by leaps and bounds and had in turn influenced the immortal sect. A toolmaking master had attempted to add mechanical works to some low level immortal tools, making them operate on the basis of spiritual stones with a supplement of kerosene, making “downgraded immortal tools” that mortals could also use.

Though there was still some dispute among the immortal sects over “downgraded immortal tools”—it was said that the conservative old Kunlun Sect had forbidden these things.

Xuanyin, however, was far more relaxed. After all, Lin Chi, the inventor of the “Gold Imitation Technique” and “downgraded immortal tools,” belonged to it.

But despite this, downgraded immortal tools were still very rare. For one thing, once the immortal tool was downgraded, its functions would become much simpler than in its original version; there would be many limits on its usefulness. But the mechanical workings inside were a complex technology, and the cost was extremely high. It was no easier to reequip a downgraded immortal tool than it was to forge a high level proper immortal tool. The masters who created these tools were all proud and arrogant and usually didn’t feel like spending so much time for the sake of mortals.

Also, apart from burning kerosene, downgraded immortal tools also burned spiritual stones.

Among spiritual stones, the most inferior and most impure “green ore” stone still cost a liang of gold per stone.

The lowest grade “jade stamp” had a market price of ten liang of gold. You could exchange a bead of jade stamp the size of a finger pad for a good horse.

The middle grade “blue jade” was forty gold to buy—the Marquis of Yongning’s entire year’s salary, no more or less, was equal to one blue stone.

As for the highest grade “white spirit,” it wasn’t worth mentioning. A “white spirit” bead that was up to quality standards cost a hundred gold, enough to buy a presentable house in the capital city, where land was extremely costly.

The spiritual stones burned by downgraded immortal tools couldn’t have too many impurities; they had to be at least jade stamp stones. The pickier ones even needed to burn blue jades, or else it would lessen the lifespan of the tool. Who could afford that?

In the two-layered brocade box Prince Zhuang had given him, the upper layer contained white jade boards edged with Moon Plated Gold, as well as a few little amulets for exorcism and protection.

The lower layer, meanwhile, was packed full of “blue jade” spiritual stone beads.

As soon as the box was opened, the spiritual energy became oppressive. All the air in the study cleared. It was enough power for a downgraded immortal tool to burn for several years.

Xi Ping was nearly blinded by the blue light. He blurted out, “Damn it, my san-ge hasn’t even had a daughter yet, and he’s already giving me her dowry?”

The Marquis glared at him.

“I thought it was food,” Xi Ping said. “If I had known it was this, I wouldn’t have taken it.”

The Marquis said, “This represents His Highness’s affection for you. He gave it to you, so take it. It’s a useful thing. Our family won’t be the ones to say that His Highness’s means are straitened.”

Saying so, the Marquis took out one of the white jade boards. “Take one of these boards and give the other one to your grandmother.”

“What is this?” Xi Ping picked up a white board and scrutinized it. The white jade was nearly flawless, and there was a small brocade carp engraved in Moon Plated Gold in the corner, looking extremely clever. “A chopping board...? Hey, wait, dad, can’t we just talk it over normally, why do you always have to start getting physical?! If I dodge out of the way too quickly and you throw out your back, I’ll be the unfilial one again.”

“This is called a proximal.”¹³ The Marquis withdrew his foot, which had had no effect, and lifted his chin to indicate for Xi Ping to put the jade board down.

He put a blue jade bead in the groove on the underside of each jade board. Soon after, a gentle fluorescence flashed over them.

The Marquis picked up a brush and demonstrated to Xi Ping how these were used. He wrote the character “Xi” on one jade board. Fluorescence rippled over the other jade board, and an identical character “Xi” appeared in the same place.

“As long as there are spiritual stones in both proximals, no matter how far apart they are, you can use them to communicate. The Latent Cultivation Temple doesn’t allow disciples to write to their families, but it doesn’t prohibit or intercept messages sent through immortal tools. It must be tacit permission for you to bring them,” the Marquis said. “Your mom and I are all right, but the old lady is getting on in years. She doesn't say it, but in fact she can't bear to see you leave. Even if you don't have anything to say, just don't forget to let her know you're safe and sound every day."

"I see," said Xi Ping.

The Marquis pressed down on the Moon Plated Gold brocade carp on the jade board, and the fish seemed to come alive. It flapped its tail energetically and moved over the jade board following the Marquis's finger. Wherever it moved, the handwriting there turned to steam and was wiped clean. "Sit here, and sit properly. I have a few more things to say to you."

Xi Ping uncrossed his legs and sat up straight as the shaft of a pen, awaiting his father's admonitions.

The Marquis said, "I didn't expect you to receive a selection card, or else I would have said this to you before. All our ancestors have been mortal. You'll have no protection in the immortal sect. If you make trouble the same way you do in Jinping, no one will clean up after you."

Xi Ping said, protesting, "To hear you talk, you'd think I was a walking calamity."

"What else are you supposed to be?" said the Marquis.

Xi Ping was about to retort when he heard his dad say coldly, “The Xi family can’t reach the immortal sect’s threshold. You’re going on account of the Her Ladyship the Imperial Consort and His Highness Prince Zhuang. Even if you try to get yourself killed, don’t involve them!”

“...I see,” said Xi Ping.

But at this point the Marquis remembered something, and his thoughts wandered a little as he looked out the window.

It was already very late. The swirling shadows of trees fell on that profile that had for a time been the most handsome in Jinping, turning the grey temples black once more and deepening the ravines at the corners of his eyes.

Time had never spared the feelings of mortals when it began to wear them down.

Out of nowhere, Xi Ping thought that the Marquis wasn’t at all happy about him receiving a selection card, not the pure unease of his grandmother and mother, but a kind of...deeper anxiety.

Then he looked at the pair of white jade proximals and felt increasingly doubtful—since he was little, the Marquis had told him that there was separation between mortal and immortal, and he had to keep a respectful distance from the immortal families. So their family was different from other families: they always only made offerings to their ancestors, never burned incense or worshipped deities. There were no talisman papers, inscriptions, or anything like that in the house... So why did the Marquis himself seem so familiar with this downgraded immortal tool?

Just then, the Marquis came back to himself and added, “Whether it’s the immortals teaching at the Latent Cultivation Temple or your schoolmates, just don’t be in a hurry to offend any of them. We have no need for meteoric success, and we have no use for you currying favor with those ‘heavenly’ people. Have you got that? Also...”

The words “don’t enter the inner sect” came right up to the Marquis’s lips, but when he looked up and saw his wretched son, he swallowed them.

It was already good if one provisional disciple out of each class could enter the inner sect. There were so many imperial kinsmen who hadn’t measured up, so what connection could the inner sect have with their family’s great treasure? It would have seemed completely clueless to say these words, like exhorting a warty toad not to go marrying Chang’e.

“...tone down your frivolous nature when you’re at the Latent Cultivation Temple. Go in peace, and return in peace a year from now. Don’t make your mom and your grandmother worry.”

“Dad,” said Xi Ping, “if you can’t bear to let me go, just say so, don’t use them as cover. Your face gets thinner and thinner the older you get.”

The Marquis: “...”

Little whelp!

His father was too embarrassed to admit it and could only roll up his sleeves to fend off his unfilial son.

Early the next morning, Xi Ping was dressed by the servants for the last time. When he was dressed, he said goodbye to his grandmother and his parents and went to Heaven’s Design Pavilion.

Four streets around Heaven’s Design Pavilion were sealed off. Emperor Taiming came in person. In fur coat and ceremonial headgear, leading the three lords and nine ministers, he arrived at the start of chen hour at Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s altar.

The provisional disciples lined up and knelt to listen respectfully to the imperial address.

This year's imperial address was unusually short. His Majesty only said a few brief words along the lines of "cultivate your bodies and minds, protect the nation." He didn't seem at all as talkative as hearsay made him out to be.

It was said that the immortal envoy overseeing the Grand Selection came very late each time, and the higher his cultivation was, the more airs he put on, leaving everyone to wait around in vain, relying entirely on His Majesty to play for time. Each time, His Majesty was obliged to have a very long speech prepared, wanting nothing more than to become a stutterer so he could draw it out even longer.

This year, an ascended spirit peak master had come, and everyone had thought that they would have to wait until the sun began to set. But instead, General Zhi presented himself punctually at the first ke of chen hour.

Zhi Xiu didn't arrive flying on a sword, nor did an immortal crane lead the way for him. He had changed into a light grey gown with hidden inscriptions, absolutely proper, neither sumptuous nor shabby. If not for all of Heaven's Design Pavilion's half-immortals stationed in the capital rising to welcome him, looking from afar, you almost would have thought he was an ordinary person.

General Zhi had been cultivating in secret for centuries, but he still seemed to remember the role of a courtier of Great Wan. He politely saluted His Majesty and joined him in offering sacrifices to heaven and earth, giving ample consequence to the mortal world's sovereign.

At wu hour and two ke, thirty one carriages stopped at Heaven's Design Pavilion's gates. Part-time workers had already stowed the disciples' luggage. The carriages were drawn by a set of white horses, so white they reflected the light. Their eyes displayed the particular blue-green light of jade stamp spiritual stones... Likely they weren't living creatures but a kind of immortal tool.

Heaven's Design Pavilion's head office and the seven Azure Dragon Towers in the city tolled their bells three times. Emperor Taiming saw the immortal envoy to the eastern gate. General Zhi stepped on Zhaoting and went back to the immortal sect to report.

Then all the disciples bid farewell to the imperial father.

Xi Ping, mixed in among the crowd, joined them in saluting. He snuck a glance at the emperor.

In childhood, he had seen the emperor Zhou Kun at the palace. His memory of the “imperial countenance” was already blurred. Xi Ping only vaguely recalled that His Majesty had seemed as tall as Southern Sage Mountain, with very thick, large hands; he spoke very kindly toward children and often had treats.

Only now did he find that His Majesty wasn't as tall as a mountain; he wasn't even as tall as Xi Ping himself.

Emperor Taiming had the sun at his back; his expression was indistinct. He was weighed down by his ceremonial robes, so solemn he looked almost melancholy. On the coiled dragon column behind him were two dragons with faces of fury. Out of nowhere, it made Xi Ping remember the furious dragon in Tai Sui's shadow.

Now that the ceremony was over, the disciples, under the protection of Heaven's Design Pavilion, would proceed to the Latent Cultivation Temple.

CHAPTER 14 - The Dragon Bites Its Tail (2)

Pang Jian watched the new provisional disciples get into the carriages with a smile—the fourth prince, the ninth princess, the Prince Cixi's eldest son... Adding in a few imperial kinsmen, it meant that, out of thirty-one provisional disciples, those with the surname Zhou took up six places. But of the other great families of Xuanyin, there was only one member of the Lin family's main bloodline who had been selected, and a barely connected collateral relative of the Zhao family. The remainder were all...rather unexpected choices.

Was it that this year's set of sons of the noble and wealthy were unusually immoral and so had been struck off the name list at once, or had Zhi-shishu done this on purpose?

He couldn't say.

A blue-clotheser said into his ear, quietly, "Commander, which ones do you think have the potential to enter the inner sect?"

"Who are you asking? A country bumpkin like me couldn't even find the door to the inner sect," Pang Jian answered indifferently. "Anyway, if it's not one of the Zhou, then it'll be the Lin."

The blue-clotheser said, “Then the remainders will be our future colleagues.”

“Drop it.” Pang Jian languidly kept pace. “The Latent Cultivation Temple isn’t some kind of guaranteed path like a sewer, where you can open your spiritual eyes just by entering. Every year there are quite a few who manage nothing but eating enough to gain ten jin.”

Xi Ping, placed at the end of the line of carriages, heard this and looked up. This brat’s ears were amazing; across several zhang of distance, he could still hear others whispering. He must have spent a lot of time eavesdropping. Xi Ping filtered out the other information and determined that the meals at the Latent Cultivation Temple were good. He was quite pleased and waved familiarly at Pang Jian.

Disbelief appeared at once on Pang Jian’s face. He couldn’t resist asking his colleague, “Do I seem like a friendly and approachable person?”

His subordinate misunderstood him and smoothly produced some flattery: “Naturally, commander, you’ve always been good-natured and amiable.”

“Go to the medical hall later and get some pills for eye disease,” Pang Jian said expressionlessly.

Just then, Zhao Yu came over in a hurry.

Even since a member of the Zhao family's main bloodline had been the first to be struck off the roster by General Zhi, even Zhao Yu had been dejected. He had been somewhat more subdued than usual lately. He didn't make eye contact with anyone. He came up in front of Pang Jian and quietly said, "Commander, the person standing guard was inattentive to his task. I just received a report that that earworm half-puppet has run away..."

"Let him run." Pang Jian didn't take it seriously. An ignorant little half-puppet was less dangerous than a stray dog, and given his condition, he came pretty cheap; this didn't amount to a financial loss.

"Well..." Zhao Yu hesitated, then quietly said, "After all, it's a thing that Zhi-shishu asked after by name."

"What would shishu want him for? He just couldn't stand to see the little thing starve to death. You..." For the sake of the Grand Selection, Pang Jian had been busy with unnecessary rigmarole for several days. His focus was lacking now, and he nearly let some words of truth slip out.

He nearly blurted out the sentence, "You'd be better off disciplining your family's youth rather than giving your opinion on this kind of trifle." At the last moment, he held back.

“You...have no need to concern yourself with him. A half-puppet that lives off of spiritual stones won’t get far in the mortal world. It may be that one of these young masters or young mistresses has brought along some treat and lured him off.” Pang Jian dragged his words back and put on a show of decency, patting Zhao Yu on the shoulder. “I’m going to take the little whelps to school. I’ll start back as soon as I get there. For the next couple of days, you and the others will be responsible for Jinping.”

Then he puckered his lips and whistled. A sword appeared at his feet.

When Pang Jian flew up riding the sword, all the white horses drawing the carriages let out long whinnies in unison and began to move, sprinting along Zhengyang Street, which had been emptied.

Xi Ping stuck his head out the window and saw that the little alleys tucked away on either side of the street were full of people watching the fun. Quite a few commoners, seeing a blue-clothed half-immortal flying on a sword, bowed in excitement by the roadside as though witnessing the arrival of a god.

Commander Pang, naturally, was used to this sight. Sleeves fluttering in the wind, he kept his gaze fixed forward.

For a moment, envy arose even in the useless young master's heart.

He couldn't resist thinking, In another year, will I also be able to wear the blue robe and go by in majestic flight?

Just then, the fleet of carriages passed by the Heyin Building—the Heyin Building was imperial property, the tallest restaurant in all of Jinping City, which stood at the western city gate; everyone who had come there was seeing off the disciples.

A private room's window was half-open, and a familiar face flashed by. It seemed to be Prince Zhuang.

But before Xi Ping could get a clear look, the fleet suddenly accelerated and left by the western gate like the wind.

Xi Ping wasn't sitting steadily. His back bumped against the body of the carriage, and a strong air current surged in through the window. The inscriptions on the window flashed and automatically sealed it. His ears buzzed, and he was pressed down into the carriage seat.

After a while, the pressure finally decreased a little. As soon as Xi Ping sat up, he heard Commander Pang say loudly, with a laugh, "Everyone hold on and sit tight. Better not open the windows and look down."

His words were too effective. No sooner had he spoken than nearly all the carriage windows were open, heads sticking out of them in unison.

Xi Ping was choked by the fierce countryside wind of mingled smoke and dust and couldn't quite catch his breath. He narrowed his eyes into slits, then found to his astonishment that the ground of Jinping was already far away from them. The houses, roads, tall buildings, and watercourses were all constantly shrinking... They were flying in the sky!

The eyes of the young man closest to him rolled up into his head. He fell straight back into the carriage in a faint.

Pang Jian, satisfied, veered aside on his sword and casually flew over beside the carriage to seal the window for the brother who had fainted. "Tsk, scared of heights and can't follow directions."

Out of the corner of his eye, he saw Xi Ping's head blown out of shape by the wind. Commander Pang's gaze suddenly focused as he noticed something. He murmured, "So that's where you've run off to."

"Huh? What did you say?" With the fierce wind pouring into his ears, Xi Ping was thinking that flying through emptiness wasn't a delightful experience at all. He shouted, “Exalted, aren’t you worried about your skin getting as chapped as a radish?”

Before Pang Jian could answer, Xi Ping felt something touch his foot. He looked down and saw the hem of a pink garment peeking out from under the seat.

A ghost in broad daylight!

Xi Ping, caught unawares, was startled. “Hey!”

The owner of the pink hem quickly curled inward. Xi Ping stepped on the hem and pulled the “ghost” right out.

There was a crash, and a whole box of blue jade spiritual stones rolled over the whole carriage. He had pulled a small child out from under the carriage seat.

Each of the small child’s little paws was clutching a blue jade, and his lips were tightly pressed together in an unnatural way.

Xi Ping: “...”

Had he accidentally taken someone else's luggage and brought along someone's kid? And why did this little thing look familiar?

Just then, a gust of wind came through the window and hit the small child in the chest. The child gave a cry and spat out two blue jades, revealing a mouthful of sharp teeth.

"It's you!" The familiar "bed of nails" teeth reminded Xi Ping. This child was the "little slave" that belonged to the skinless evil cultivator at the Blissful Village!

"Ho, rich man." At some point Pang Jian had come through the wall into his carriage. When he saw the blue jade pearls rolling over the floor like pebbles, his expression cooled almost imperceptibly.

As soon as the earworm half-puppet saw him, he was immediately too scared to move.

Pang Jian waved a hand. The scattered spiritual stones rolled back into the wooden box on their own and arranged themselves. He picked up the box and weighed it. He knew there had to be at least a hundred liang. Each and every one of the spiritual stone beads in the box was sparkling and clear, without a single blemish. All were first-class blue jade.

The price of this box of beads could be described as sky high.

“Quite a healthy patrimony.” Pang Jian raised his eyelids and examined Xi Ping, his smile growing cold. “Is the Marquis of Yongning’s salary so high?”

“Don’t mention it. The Marquis’s little income isn’t even as much as we bring in managing the bit of land left by our forebears in the southern outskirts.” Xi Ping seemed not to have heard the barb in Pang Jian’s words. He smoothly closed the whistling window and casually said, “Hey, sit down, Exalted. Would you like some pastries? I brought them from home. They’re still warm.”

Pang Jian’s expression warmed slightly. He politely turned down the kind offer. “I see, your family has your ancestors’ blessings.”

No one had farmed the earth in the southern outskirts for a long time. After Moon Plated Gold had come to the mortal world, all kinds of steam engine factories had grown up like spring bamboo shoots after rain, especially in the southern outskirts, which contained the canal docks. If you had a bit of land there, you could get rich on the rents alone. No wonder they were so liberal.

Pang Jian closed the box of spiritual stones and put it aside. “How much land does your family have? Can it stand up to this kind of expense?”

Xi Ping counted on his fingers. “Two or three hundred mu, I think. Who knows, I’m not sure of the exact number. The rents are trifling. Our Marquis primarily gets by on the strength of his looks.”

“Oh?”

“Have you heard of Cui Ji, Exalted?” said Xi Ping.

In fact, Pang Jian had heard of Cui Ji.

Cui Ji was Jiangnan’s greatest jeweler and occupied a huge compound of stillness amid noise in the most prosperous part of Jinping City. If a wealthy matriarch or young mistress went out without a couple of pieces by Cui Ji on her, she would be too embarrassed to talk to people.

When the name of a business was famous enough, even those who didn’t shop there would hear of it—for example, even the youngest child knew about the high quality Shaoxing wine at the Heyin Building, even monks had heard of the osmanthus duck at the Phoenix’s Perch Pavilion, and even a man like Commander Pang could recognize Cui Ji’s little carp imprint, which had cut through the purse of every wealthy lady in Jinping.

Xi Ping picked and chose among the box of pastries. “My mom’s surname is Cui. Cui Ji is my grandfather’s business, and my mom owns thirty percent of the shares.”

This was a long story: when Madam Cui had been a young mistress, she had gone with a sister for a trip in the countryside. On the way, their carriage had broken. The Marquis happened to run into them and kindly lend a hand. Young Mistress Cui was easily swayed by beauty. One look, and she was bewitched by his sexual charms.

The Marquis hadn’t been a Marquis at the time, only an idle and pampered young man. Though in the eyes of Boss Cui, the Xi family amounted to paupers, in the eyes of the world, a petty official was still a government official, and his status was higher than a merchant’s. The Xi family had only this one son; he couldn’t marry into his bride’s family.

Anyway, they weren’t a good match.

But the young mistress didn’t care. She insisted on marrying him, and no one could talk her out of it. Boss Cui was furious. Go ahead and marry him, he said, and when you’ve married your boy toy, you can forget about your father. So the young mistress had strictly obeyed her father’s wishes: she had broken off her connection to the Cui family, turned her head away, and gotten married, not taking even the end of a thread with her.

But times change—later, the Xi family’s young lady entered the palace and became a success. The unreliable boy toy, relying on favor shown to his sister, somehow managed to become the Marquis of Yongning, and the mixed up Young Mistress Cui became the lady of the Marquis Manor.

How could you reject relatives from a noble family? So Boss Cui and Madam Cui’s father-daughter relationship had naturally been renewed.

The boss carried on in impressive style. The Yongning Marquis Manor, and even the Imperial Consort in the palace, were all amply provided for, to the satisfaction of all.

Xi Ping gave a rough account of the Marquis’s history of acquiring riches and commented, “Actually, I feel like it’s more like my mom and my aunt got married, and my dad was just thrown in as a bonus.”

Pang Jian: “...”

Having heard this, he didn’t know what comment to make. Anyway, he was a little envious.

Xi Ping stuffed a preserved egg dumpling into his mouth and narrowed his eyes at Pang Jian as though in provocation. He gave a half-mocking laugh.

“Exalted, what are you thinking? A family of nobodies like us, we rely entirely on the grace of the imperium. There are eight hundred pairs of eyes at the imperial censor’s terrace watching us twelve shichen a day. We’re faulted at every turn. When there’s something we can’t touch, we won’t even dare to bend down to pick up a dropped copper coin. Do you think it’s so easy being a sycophantic courtier?”

Pang Jian was dazed by his defiance.

Everyone who saw a walker in the mortal acted like they had seen a god, and even the nobility was polite, never mind that Pang Jian was famously hard to deal with. Since he had come into power at Heaven’s Design Pavilion, no one had given him any attitude. The feeling was novel. Commander Pang actually didn’t get angry. He asked curiously, “Kid, do you know that even if you come back from the Latent Cultivation Temple, you’ll be running errands under my command?”

“Not necessarily,” said Xi Ping. “If I manage nothing but eating enough to gain ten jin, I’ll probably be running errands for the imperial guard’s young masters.”

Pang Jian: “...”

For once he was speechless for a moment, then laughed in spite of himself. He remembered this whelp's conduct at the Blissful Village; indeed, he was a magic beast that feared neither heaven nor earth.

Pang Jian reached into his sleeve and pulled out a small gold leaf, which he gave to Xi Ping. "I misspoke. I'll give this to you as an apology."

"Thank you, Exalted." Xi Ping had always been direct when accepting gifts. He would take anything that anyone dared to give him. He had never put on a show of refusal. "What is it?"

"A dragon-taming chain. It answers to a drop of blood from its owner. It's used for taming beasts." Pang Jian indicated the half-puppet next to them with his chin. "This little thing eats spiritual stones, like eating gold without shitting it out. An ordinary person couldn't support him, but since you have the money, you can take him."

"Huh?" Xi Ping stared. Then his voice rose an octave in pitch. "No way, didn't this thing belong to an evil cultivator? And it bites! What would I want it for, to use it as a curse to kill my enemies?!"

The little half-puppet also appeared alarmed.

“If there had been a curse on the half-puppet, Heaven’s Design Pavilion would have taken care of it by now. No need for you to get involved. If you put the dragon-taming chain on him, he won’t be able to bite you anymore. He’ll do whatever you want him to.” Pang Jian leaned back. His body “melted” into the carriage wall, leaving only his features showing. He said, “Otherwise, there’ll be no one to wait on you at the Latent Cultivation Pavilion, young master. You’ll have to make your own bed.”

Xi Ping had wanted to refuse decisively. His mouth was already open. But when he heard these last sentences, he hesitated.

“Fine.” Pang Jian’s hand reached out from beneath his features. “If you don’t want him, give that back to me.”

Xi Ping quickly squeezed the gold leaf. With his face three chi thick, he saluted. “I don’t dare to refuse what an elder has bestowed. It would be impolite. I won’t stand on ceremony, Exalted.”

This little bastard.

Pang Jian pointed at him twice across empty space, then left through the wall.

As soon as he left, the little half-puppet immediately looked fierce and threw himself at Xi Ping, trying to snatch away the dragon-taming chain. But just as Commander Pang had said, the half-puppet only looked fierce; in fact, he had no more magic powers than an ordinary child. At any rate, Xi Ping could easily control him with one hand.

In desperation, the half-puppet opened his mouth and bit Xi Ping's hand.

The mouthful of teeth like a bed of nails was truly sharp. Blood immediately began to seep out of Xi Ping's hand. Droplets of blood rubbed off on the gold leaf. The dragon-taming chain immediately grew. A pop, and it trembled in midair, separating the man and the puppet. Then it curled around the half-puppet's neck and turned into a neckband.

The little monster was immediately controlled. He backed up a few steps like a puppet on strings.

Xi Ping meanwhile had a strange feeling—the neckband...no, the little monster held by the neckband seemed to become a part of his body, like a cat's tail: when you weren't paying attention to it, it would move on its own; when you wanted to pay attention to it, you could control it at will.

Xi Ping tried out an order: "Can you walk two steps to the left?"

The little monster's expression was fierce and unwilling, but his feet unwillingly walked two steps to the left.

The little monster was as obedient as Xi Ping's own legs.

“Hah.” Xi Ping was amused. Commander Pang had given him something good. “Now you'll behave? Bow to me.”

“Now dance.”

The little monster was tormented into dizziness. Hatred appeared in his black bean eyes; he glared ferociously at Xi Ping.

Xi Ping had never been afraid of being glared at. He would get more and more worked up the angrier someone was. Licking his canine tooth, he played a dirty trick: “Stop, no more twisting—come on, let me hear you say ‘dad.’”

But this time, he didn't have his way. The little monster opened his mouth, but only a brief exhalation came out, like a leaking tinderbox.

Xi Ping took a close look and saw that the little thing only had a short segment of tongue, curled up behind several rows of teeth. His throat and soft palate were also very deformed.

It seemed that...he couldn't speak.

The little monster, controlled by the dragon-taming chain, was unable to fulfill his master's orders and could only continue to make breathy sounds, weird and pitiful.

Xi Ping suddenly felt a little unwell. The half of a tongue had put him in mind of the dogs at the palace—there had to be solemn silence in the imperial city, and dogs weren't allowed to bark, so all the dogs in the palace had to have a section of their throat cut out. Imperial Consort Xi had originally had a dog that had been friendly with Prince Zhuang since he was little. When Prince Zhuang set up his own household, he took it away from Guangyun Palace.

Every time that old dog tried to play with other dogs, it could only make breathy sounds like this. Slowly, it had lost interest in playing, and in a few months it quietly died.

On account of this, Prince Zhuang had suffered a major illness and had nearly died himself.

“Enough, stop.” Xi Ping stuck his head out the window. The wind blew so hard he couldn’t open his eyes, and he couldn’t clearly see where Pang Jian was. He could only yelled into the wind, “Exalted, what was wrong with that evil cultivator? Why didn’t he either not give it a mouth or give it a normal tongue? What’s going on with this half-tongue? Can you fix this thing?”

Hardly had he finished speaking when something came flying at him and nearly hit him in the face.

Xi Ping caught it with both hands and saw that it was half of a thread-bound old manuscript. It was almost falling apart and had a sour smell.

He cried out in surprise, closed the window, and distastefully pinched the yellowing pages with his fingertips.

On the first page of the old manuscript were drawn several deformed babies. Underneath them was written: Ten methods of creating a half-puppet.

“What the hell...”

Xi Ping flipped through it, scanning quickly. But as he read, his tightly knitted brows sank, and his eyes opened wide in astonishment.

When he had read another ten pages or so, he shut the old manuscript without a word. His gaze fell on the half-puppet.

For some reason, the half-puppet that had originally been so angry his face was about to change shape froze briefly, then slowly calmed down.

Perhaps because...Xi Ping had looked at him the way you look at a person.

Xi Ping murmured, "So you aren't a puppet wrapped in human skin. You used to be human?"

The half-puppet was a little bewildered by his question. He stared back helplessly at Xi Ping for a moment, not knowing how he ought to respond. He could only hesitantly bare his mouthful of fierce teeth.

Xi Ping considered, then bent down and picked up the box full of spiritual stones. He took one out and gave it to him. "Here, you want to eat this?"

As soon as he saw the spiritual stone, the half-puppet forgot everything. He threw himself forward, snatched it out of Xi Ping's hand, and swallowed it.

Xi Ping wanted to say something else, but just then, a long crane's call passed through the skies. The carriage shook, and he had a sudden impression of becoming a hundred jin or more lighter.

He was shaken: they had arrived at the Latent Cultivation Temple!

Xi Ping had no more attention to spare for anything else. He casually stuffed the box of spiritual stones into his luggage and impatiently stuck his head out to admire the immortal mountain...not noticing how the half-puppet watched the box of spiritual stones closely, the black bean eyes sending out greedy beams.

CHAPTER 15 - The Dragon Bites Its Tail (3)

“...after the flying horses landed, they turned into white jade horses, and Commander Pang vanished without a trace. He must have gone to pay his respects to some immortal. There was a half-immortal at the gate to welcome the disciples, he introduced himself as Yang-shixiong, Yang Anli, Princess Xincheng’s son, a shixiong from the last Grand Selection class.

“Yang-shixiong is very polite. He looks a little like san-ge, though naturally he can’t compare with my san-ge.”

After night fell in Jinping, in the south study of Prince Zhuang Manor, Zhou Ying held a white jade board the same as the white jade proximals he had sent to the Marquis Manor—it turned out that these white jade proximals weren’t a pair; they were a set of three.

At this point, Xi Ping must have gotten settled in at the Latent Cultivation Temple and had begun to write his grandmother a lengthy letter; line after line of writing appeared quickly on the white jade board.

Next to him, Wang Jian was laying out the weiqi record as though nothing were the matter, pretending that there was nothing worth being shocked about in his lord spying on a letter Viscount Xi was writing home to the old lady.

Since her early years, Old Madam Xi had been a well-bred lady who didn't leave the house. She had never pursued any studies. Everything Xi Ping wrote was in colloquial speech and included illustrations along with the text.

For example, he wrote: "In front of the temple gates, there are blue luan and white deer running around. A blue luan is a bird less than half a chi long, with a long tail like a cape."

Underneath was a lifelike drawing of a blue luan...though the draftsmanship was a little rough, and it looked like a duck with a fan stuck to its butt.

The corners of Prince Zhuang's mouth turned upward.

"None of the footmen in the temple are human, they're scarecrows operated by spiritual stones. They're called 'straw children.' They can give directions, sweep the courtyards, beat a gong to tell time, and so on. You just need to stick the right talisman onto the back of the straw children's heads, and you can make them do tasks. When I've learned to make straw children, I'll definitely make you a bunch, a pair to rub your legs, two to fan you, and we can put together a theater troupe."

Prince Zhuang laughed. “No wonder our grandmother favors him so much. This brat can flatter the old lady better than I can.”

Wang Jian humored him: “As the saying goes, everyone has his weaknesses and strengths. On the subject of striving for favor, Your Highness truly falls short.”

On the white jade proximal, Xi Ping finished flattering and went on to discuss the food at the Latent Cultivation Temple. Generally he was very satisfied and only said regretfully: “They only provide two meals a day, breakfast and dinner. The disciples don’t get snacks.”

Having commented on the food, he went on to the residence: “The male and female disciples are separated here. In classes and daily life, they don’t run into each other. Too bad, too bad! The female disciples live one to a courtyard, while the male disciples live two to four to a courtyard because the number is so much higher. I’m living in the Qiu courtyard along with two classmates.

“One is Chang-xiong, the eldest grandson of Royal Tutor Chang, with a face as round as a piece of flatbread. He’s friendly to everyone and very talkative. Less than two ke after he moved in, he’d already passed along eight bits of news, like an ascended trumpet.”

Prince Zhuang thought, You have the face to call someone else talkative? You're the one who needs a slap on the mouth.

Wang Jian, seeing him for once in a good mood, tactfully went to refill his cup of water. He had just lifted the pot when he saw the smile on Prince Zhuang's face cool, so he shot a furtive glance at the white jade board.

He saw that Xi Ping had written: "The other one, Yao-xiong, is a grand scribe's son, the Crown Princess's younger brother by a concubine. When this brother learned that he was going to be sharing a courtyard with me, he was so scared he ran to the outhouse seven times in one night, nearly excreted himself out into a noodle. I even felt conscience-stricken. In the future, I'll have to get friendlier with him."

Prince Zhuang's fingers twisted on the white jade board. "The Crown Prince's wife's younger brother..."

Wang Jian quickly said, "Since the Marquis of Cheng'en's Zhang family committed an offense, the Crown Prince has been increasingly subdued. The Crown Princess's birth isn't high, so her family, the Yao, have been even more cautious. The Second Young Master Yao who's been sent to the Latent Cultivation Temple now has never been heard from in Jinping. He must not have a particularly flamboyant disposition."

Prince Zhuang said, “Oh, I know. That bastard Xi Shiyong may be obnoxious at home, but there’s no need to worry about him being bullied when he goes out... It’ll be a good thing if he manages to hold out and not cause any trouble for me.”

Wang Jian said, smiling, “Set your mind at ease, Your Highness. Among the disciples who have entered the Latent Cultivation Temple this time, there are few direct descendants of the big families. Apart from His Fourth Highness and Her Ninth Highness, there’s only one son of the Lin family. The Lin family is His Fourth Highness’s mother’s family, so presumably he wouldn’t get into a dispute with him. Her Ninth Highness is young, and her disposition is frail. I don’t think there’s any suspense about which disciple the inner sect will choose this time. His Fourth Highness conducts himself properly. With him there to keep watch, the others won’t be able to make any big waves. Anyway, his relationship with you in the mortal world has always been very good. Presumably he would look after the Viscount for you.”

“I wouldn’t call it very good. Zhou Xi has known since he was little that he would enter the immortal sect and didn’t associate with a mortal like me. He only kept from offending anyone for the sake of his mother.” Prince Zhuang smiled. “But, in fact, he truly isn’t a rash person...hm?”

The white jade tablet was nearly filled with writing. Though the chatterbox Xi Ping hadn't yet fully expressed himself, he had to wind it up here. Having asked after the whole family's health, he added a line in the corner:

“Heaven's Design Pavilion's Commander Pang and I have hit it off pretty well. He even gave me a half-human half-puppet little servant. It's a long story, I'll tell you in more detail tomorrow.”

“Pang? Pang Wenchang?” Prince Zhuang raised his eyebrows when he read the words “hit it off”—no wonder that when they had removed Xi Ping's name from the alternate name list, the Yongning Marquis Manor had still received a selection card. “Him?”

“This Lord Pang is noted for covering cruel intentions with a smile, being unmoved by force or persuasion, and deferring to no one. All the members of big families who have tried to curry favor with him could find no opening,” Wang Jian said. “As the Viscount has entered the Latent Cultivation Temple, when he returns in the future, it's almost certain he'll enter Heaven's Design Pavilion. At this stage, if he's hit it off with him...that isn't a bad thing.”

Prince Zhuang continued to think it was a little strange. A lone wolf like Pang Jian didn't sound like the type to give someone a “little servant.”

But on the other hand, the mighty assistant commander of Heaven's Design Pavilion would have no more difficulty squeezing a handful of mortals to death than knocking over an anthill. He wouldn't play any tricks on a young disciple...would he?

“Don't forget to send Commander Pang a gift for the Dragon Boat Festival.”

Wang Jian agreed: “Of course.”

The little fish on the white jade proximal began to swim on its own, erasing Xi Ping's words and drawings. The old lady began to write a response.

So Prince Zhuang put down the proximal and said to Wang Jian, “The diplomatic envoy from Chu came today.”

Wang Jian quickly sat up straight. “About the train business?”

“Yes, His Majesty has made up his mind to expand ground transport. A few Maze Stations within Great Wan's borders won't satisfy his appetite. He's planning to connect to Chu's Dongheng.” As Prince Zhuang spoke, the look in his eyes became cold once more. The illustrated white jade proximal seemed only able to dispel the frost from his brow for a moment.

“Dongheng’s Xiang family are unorthodox in their practices; they’ve actually fallen in with his plans.”

Wang Jian considered it. “What about water transport?”

Steam engines had blown the skies of Jinping full of smoke and dust, and they had also blown up the purses of water transport. A single grand canal, with so many noble families latched onto it sucking blood—how could they stand to give a share to the “Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon” that ran over the ground?

“Water transport? Ah, they nearly scraped the ground with their heads before the envoy had even left, saying that railroads ‘pierce mountains and go around forests, obstruct fengshui, harm the nation’s blessings.’ They all but brought in an immortal from Xuanyin Mountain to give a verdict.”

Prince Zhuang smiled. “The water transport department’s Sun Yuqing sure is quite the genius.”

Wang Jian said, shaking his head, “The Sun family’s greed is bottomless. They can’t make up their minds. Before they curried favor with the Marquis of Cheng’en, and when the Marquis of Cheng’en fell, all they wanted was to plead their innocence of the connection before the Crown Prince.”

Before he had finished speaking, he saw a cold smile appear at the corners of Prince Zhuang's eyes.

“Do you have some instructions you wish your student to carry out, Your Highness?”

Prince Zhuang pressed a hand to his lips, turned his head away, and coughed a few times. “When the railroad was first being laid from Jinping to Yuzhou, there was an instance of corrupt officials tricking the common people out of their farmland and selling them to the court at a high price. Do you remember?”

“I remember. Later a few people were easily taken care of, but as for the land, well, the court already had it, so naturally it couldn't be returned,” Wang Jian said. “You mean...”

“To be sure, the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon is awe-inspiring, but the common people have lost farmland where they could settle down and make a living. How are they to live now? A pity.” Prince Zhuang sighed, as lightly as though blowing dust off fine porcelain. “Why don't you drop a word to Lord Sun and let him know to stop thinking about bringing a complaint before the Southern Sage—not when there's a ready-made ‘right way.’”

Wang Jian understood him. After giving an affirmative, he added, “But, Your Highness, His Majesty has always been hard-hearted. A handful of common people who have lost their land won’t necessarily stop him...”

“Why would I want to stop him? Whether he wants to expand the railways or the waterways, what connection does it have to a homebound invalid like me?” Prince Zhuang swept his sleeve wearily. “This is the Crown Prince’s business.”

“The Crown Prince? How could the Crown Prince wade into these muddy waters?”

“It’s out of his control.” Prince Zhuang toyed with his coarse pottery cup between his fingertips. His voice was almost inaudible. “After all...what does the Crown Prince have apart from his reputation for benevolence?”

At this point, he propped his head on his hand and inadvertently glanced at the white jade proximal next to him.

Old Lady Xi had already written a whole long-winded heap in enormous characters. Their old grandmother’s exhortations were nothing more than these three: “Eat well, dress warm, don’t make trouble.” There was nothing new. Prince Zhuang read it and was about to avert his gaze when he saw the old lady write: “I don’t want any scarecrows, those are like monsters, they’d be terrifying if you caught sight of them at night. It would be better if the immortal sect taught you how to make pills and elixirs. Be sure to keep His Third Highness in mind.”

Prince Zhuang stared. For a moment, his eyelids trembled slightly, as if his eyes had been burned by the old lady’s writing. After a long while, he finally turned the proximal over and waved a hand at Wang Jian.

In the Latent Cultivation Temple, Xi Ping, finished exchanging letters with his grandmother, put away the white jade proximal and forced himself to lie down and go to sleep early.

The Latent Cultivation Temple was in the Xuanyin Mountain Range’s outermost valley. Green pines and cypresses formed rolling blue-green waves. There was no buzz of machinery, no clamor of gears. There wasn’t even a striking clock in the room. The disciples’ rooms only had a half-cun square hanging calendar block of blue-green jade; this was an unconventional immortal tool. Every night at midnight, the calendar block would automatically change the date, solar term, and the day’s weather.

It was too quiet in the mountains, so quiet Xi Ping couldn’t quite get to sleep in this new setting. He had wild dreams all night, once again hearing that Soul Calling Melody reverberating over and over in his ear, keening all night.

At mao hour, the calendar block on the wall suddenly threw out dazzling white light. Next, a thunderclap exploded in the small room, tremors shaking the beams.

Xi Ping was so shaken by this sudden clap of thunder that his three immortal souls left his seven mortal forms. He clambered up, felt up and down his body, made sure that he hadn't lost any parts in the lightning strike, then finally, still unsettled, looked at the calendar block.

The date on the calendar block had long ago changed to the sixteenth day of the fourth month. Under the words "clear and fresh, clouds drifting through the sky" had appeared another line of twinkling gold writing that silently urged him: "Make yourself presentable; at mao hour and three ke, morning class at the Qiankun Tower."

At this hour, the young master usually wouldn't even have gone to sleep yet.

And they wanted him to make himself presentable... It would be about the same as making a corpse presentable.

Xi Ping meditated profoundly in the direction of the calendar block for a while, then threw himself straight into bed and went back to sleep.

Unexpectedly, no sooner had his face touched the pillow than a strong light once again burst from the calendar block, and a second clap of thunder fell. It seemed to strike right at Xi Ping's head. Xi Ping's ears were more sensitive than other people's to start with; he was nearly deafened by this shaking. All his sleepiness vanished.

“Ah—” he yelled irritably, pounding the bed. “Come here, come here!”

After yelling, he stretched out his arms, closed his eyes, and leaned against the headboard, waiting for someone to dress him and do his hair.

But he waited for ages, and the clothes didn't automatically wrap themselves around his body. Xi Ping opened his eyes and impatiently and found that the inside of the room was silent. There was no Haozhong, and no maids; there was only the weird little half-puppet, squatting in a corner like a mushroom, watching him.

Only then did Xi Ping remember that this was the Latent Cultivation Temple. There were no more page boys.

The little half-puppet was lacking in intelligence. It wasn't that he couldn't understand human speech, but he didn't understand it very well—as Xi Ping saw it, his intellect was about on a level with his san-ge's lousy cat.

Pang Jian had clearly been talking nonsense. Never mind delicate tasks like dressing and doing hair, you couldn't even hope for this thing to make the bed or sweep the floor.

Xi Ping hadn't thought yet of how to deal with him. Grumpy about having to get up, he only tossed the little thing into the study. "Move, don't get in my way."

Getting dressed and cleaning up was all right, but fixing his own hair nearly killed him. Before he could get it right, he heard the voice of Chang Jun, who shared the courtyard with him. "Shiyong! Are you coming? We'll miss class! H-h-hurry up!"

Even the chatty Chang-xiong was stuttering. Xi Ping pulled out his pocket watch and glanced at it. He thought that they actually had plenty of time.

But Chang-xiong was in such a hurry he was about to burn down the door, so he had to shove his hair into its headpiece however he could, ignoring how many strands fell out; he wished he could take refuge in monastic life and shave it all off.

He'd just had time to copy down the map when his courtyard mate Chang Jun pulled him away.

“Did you bring a guide talisman?” said Chang Jun.

Xi Ping was bewildered: what would he need one for?

Before he could respond, Chang Jun quickly said, “No problem, I have a stack. If we mess up writing them, there are replacements. Let’s go find a straw child. Our first time using a talisman, I’m afraid we won’t get it right at once and have to try several times... Hey, over there!”

Xi Ping looked in the direction he was pointing. Several of their classmates were babbling as they surrounded a straw child.

“The morning class is in the Qiankun Tower. You have to write ‘Qiankun Tower’ in regular script, make it neat... Don’t go out of the lines!”

“Don’t crowd the straw child. If you’re blocking its way, how is it going to lead you? Spread out a little.”

Chang Jun pulled Xi Ping into the crowd. “Great, they’ve already found a straw child to lead the way. Let’s follow them!”

Before he had finished speaking, the straw child with the guide talisman stuck on moved slowly—under everyone’s gazes, this scarecrow walked in quick, mincing steps like a fine lady, as if afraid of stepping on an ant, demurely pattering west along the path.

By the time its elegant steps reached the Qiankun Tower, they would be just in time to eat a New Year’s reunion dinner.

Xi Ping: “...”

The disciples cried out and went to pieces. Only then did Xi Ping find that, apart from the map he was carrying, the others only held guide talismans.

Wonderful! They clearly couldn’t even read a map for themselves, so how could they trust a so-called “immortal tool” so much?

“Don’t rely on that.” Xi Ping quickly glanced at the map and called upon his experience of getting chased all over Jinping by the Marquis carrying a discipline rod. “Come with me.”

“May I ask what family you are from, brother?”

“Do you know the way to the Qiankun Tower, brother? Do you have an older relative who holds office at the Latent Cultivation Temple?”

“Could it be that you have some other immortal tool, brother?”

Xi Ping thought, All you have to do is follow me. None of you can find your way around, so what’s with all this useless babble?

But it was only his first day here, and the Marquis’s order not to make trouble was still sounding in his ear. He resisted the urge and allowed Chang Jun to chatter away behind him, introducing him to everyone.

All the disciples had perhaps heard of the “renowned” Viscount of Yongning. There was a weird silence; then they said, each in a different tone, “I’ve looked forward to meeting you.”

But at the moment, these lost headless flies had no other choice. If there was a butt, they would fly after it. They stuck behind Xi Ping and crowded their way to the Qiankun Tower.

The Latent Cultivation Temple had been tranquil for ten years. Now that it had brought in this bunch, surprised groups of crows scattered in all directions and angrily dropped several loads of “sky dung,” fertilizing the invalids running the slowest at the back of the line.

When they could already see the Qiankun Tower's name plate, Chang Jun screamed breathlessly, "Oh, oh no, the straw child is about to beat the gong!"

Everything in the Latent Cultivation Temple followed the ancient order: a chime at chen hour, a drum midway through shen hour, watches sounded at night, a thunderclap for mao hour first ke. For other important times—for example, mao hour third ke's morning class—the straw children announced the time by beating a gong.

Sound carried well in the valley. The strike of a gong could spread throughout the area.

In the blink of an eye, Xi Ping had strode over and uncompromisingly snatched away the straw child's hammer.

The straw child stood there and watched as a crowd of young men rushed by like a flash flood. It turned circles in confusion, picking at the edges of the gong.

When the hair-raising crowd charged into the Qiankun Tower, the immortal in charge had yet to arrive. The breath caught in Xi Ping's throat eased at last.

He tucked away the hammer. As he looked around, he found an empty spot and sat down. Before his butt could touch the chair, the person sitting next to him stood and moved away as though avoiding a plague.

Xi Ping looked up. Oh, it was the Crown Prince's little brother-in-law.

The little brother-in-law was named Yao Qi. His birth mother had died young, and his father's official wife didn't like him. Though he hadn't been abused, he also hadn't been well brought up. A decade and more earlier, Empress Zhang's bloodline had run into bad luck. The formerly illustrious Marquis of Cheng'en's Zhang family tree had fallen over and sent the monkeys fleeing. It had also scared Lord Yao out of his wits.

Though Lord Yao was only a little grand scribe, he had his sights set high. He felt that the Marquis of Cheng'en's head rolling three chi away was lesson to be learned from. Ever since his eldest daughter had married the Crown Prince, Lord Yao would review the story of the Zhang family's destruction every night before bed.

In the Marquis of Yongning's words, the Crown Princess's whole family was weird.

Yao Qi had been born into the weird Yao family. He looked as though he was trembling with fear, small and skinny as a girl not yet of age. He had already been scared half to death by being unexpectedly chosen to enter the Latent Cultivation Temple; when he had arrived and learned that he would be living in the same courtyard as the Xi family's son, his vision had gone black.

The Crown Prince was the heir, and Prince Zhuang had been sickly since birth. Neither of them would take part in the immortal selection. Emperor Taiming had only these two grown sons remaining in the mortal world. One, though he was the genuine eldest son of the official wife, was held back by his mother; the other was the son of the accommodating Imperial Consort who fully enjoyed the emperor's favor. Even if the two of them weren't interested in a struggle, others still wouldn't let them off.

The reason that the Crown Princess's family and Imperial Consort Xi's family hadn't fought like oil and water was that both families were rather useless and didn't have any fight in them...but that didn't mean that they could live in harmony.

Yao Qi hadn't slept half of last night. He had certainly been imagining how the human fiend Xi Ping would persecute him. He had nearly spent the night in the outhouse. He had crawled to the Qiankun Tower first thing in the morning with all his guts empty, then saw this malevolent spirit once again floating toward him. Of course his reaction was a little outsized.

Perhaps he was too empty. When he clumsily stood up, he banged into the hard wooden chair with a hollow thump. Everyone was startled. All the private chatter among the provisional disciples suddenly quieted. Several gazes fell meaningfully on Yao Qi and Xi Ping.

Yao Qi wasn't used to being the center of attention. His face flushed at once. But Xi Ping had found his audience.

The Xi family's pampered son smiled carelessly and said, indecently, "It's too late, Ziming-xiong! You've slept a night in the same courtyard as me. Your purity is already gone."

Hearing this kind of ferocious talk, all of the disciples rocked the room with laughter. Little Young Master Yao didn't dare to believe that there could be such a shameless person in the world. He was dumbfounded, so ashamed he wanted to die.

"All right, all right." Just then, a handsome young man in a brocade gown came over to break it up. He pulled Xi Ping over and said, "Ziming is young, Shiyong, stop teasing him. Come sit here next to me. It's been some years since we've seen each other. We played together when we were little."

The young man was a little over twenty, with delicate features that bore a slight resemblance to Prince Zhuang's. This was the fourth prince Zhou Xi, issue of the Lin family's Virtuous Consort.

Xi Ping had to show deference to His Fourth Highness, so he sat next to him. Before he could open his mouth to make small talk, he heard an equivocal voice coming from the back door: "Pretty exciting here."

These were the childish tones of a boy whose voice hadn't dropped yet but who insisted on drawling his words out lethargically like an elder. Perhaps to demonstrate his great age, it also held the tremor peculiar to old men. It sounded very unpleasant, like an old eunuch who had been castrated too young.

The whole Qiankun Tower went silent. Those who were laughing all hurriedly stuffed their protruding teeth back into their mouths. Zhou Xi pulled at Xi Ping.

"Don't look," Zhou Xi quietly warned him. "Immortal Luo doesn't like people looking directly at him."

Xi Ping was all at sea. He thought, Can "Immortal Luo" be an unmarried lady whom it would be indecorous to look at?

He listened to the advice and held back from raising his head. After a moment, he heard the sound of rustling beside him.

At the center of the Qiankun Tower were forty or fifty steps leading up to a platform. From the top, you could look down upon all of the disciples' hair whorls. Xi Ping glimpsed the edge of a wide sky blue sleeve passing by him. The cuff hung down almost to the ground.

This Immortal Luo, waving the "water sleeves" that seemed to belong to an opera costume, unhurriedly mounted the platform, then roared in a high voice: "Which bastard took the straw child's hammer? Hand it over!"

Xi Ping's ass was firmly glued to the chair. He thought, Haha, take a guess.

As soon as he had the thought, something heavy hit him in the ribs, and the hidden gong hammer tore apart the front of his clothes and flew out, nearly smacking Xi Ping on the chin.

To avoid the hammer, Xi Ping abruptly tilted his head up, so he saw Immortal Luo on the stone steps—this Immortal Luo turned out to be a boy who looked no older than eleven or twelve, with his features drooping in displeasure, the same height as the two straw children fanning him!

No wonder his sleeves trailed almost to the ground.

Immortal Luo raised his hand to catch the hammer. Then his cold gaze fell on Xi Ping. “Kid, what’s your name?”

Next to Xi Ping, His Fourth Highness’s eye twitched slightly. His expression showed that this was a sight too awful to behold.

CHAPTER 16 - The Dragon Bites Its Tail (4)

Xi Ping thought it over, decided that he was already here, and the immortal probably couldn't throw him out over a hammer, so he openly gave his full name. Next, he saluted, and directly acknowledged his wrongdoing:

“Immortal, I'm sorry. I've spent all my life limited to Jinping. I've never seen such a unique gong. And the sect rules don't say you aren't allowed to take the straw children's hammers, so I borrowed it to have a look. I didn't expect that you would oversleep, too, and that I would almost make you miss morning class.”

Immortal Luo: “...”

You're the one who overslept!

Zhou Xi's teeth hurt when he heard this. He had seen this Viscount of Yongning ten years earlier at lao-san's side. At the time, the kid had been only the size of a bean, but he had already been a handful. He could make the Royal Tutor lose his temper twice in one day. He hadn't thought that after all this time, the ill-fated connection would find him, and they would once again be classmates; it was simply like returning to the imperial library in a dream.

Then he waved his “water sleeves” and ignored Xi Ping. Looking down on all the disciples from on high, he said, “I am Luo Qingshi. I have cultivated at the Latent Cultivation Temple for a hundred fifty years. You are the fifteenth class of mortal disciples who have been brought before me. Many of you are useless and relied on the blessings of your ancestors to get in, and I presume that you know it. Let’s be frank: for the road of cultivation, you must rely entirely on yourselves. Just because you’ve entered the Latent Cultivation Temple, it doesn’t mean you’ll necessarily be able to open your spiritual eyes.”

All the disciples’ families had some connections. They all knew that they must not offend the Latent Cultivation Temple’s “midget raksha.”¹⁴ Now the Qiankun Tower was silent; no one wanted to stand out and catch his eye.

“On the first day of class, I’d like to get familiar with your faces.” Luo Qingshi’s eyelids drooped. His eyes roamed over the disciples and fell on Xi Ping. “Let’s start with you—Xi-shidi.”

No sooner had he spoken than Xi Ping felt an invisible hand grab the front of his clothes and yank him forward. His hip nearly hit the corner of the table. Xi Ping twisted his butt at the last moment and narrowly dodged the stone table corner. Before he could curse, he had already been dragged onto a small platform at the foot of the stone steps.

Next, his vision swirled, and he was taken to a narrow path only wide enough for one person to pass through.

Luo Qingshi's and his classmates' voices instantly became muted, as though they had been cut off by something.

Xi Ping had been pulled into a mustard seed by General Zhi before at the Blissful Village. With that experience, he knew that it had happened this time as well. He thought that mustard seeds really did resemble their owners: even Great Immortal Luo's mustard seed was more spacious than another's!

Luo Qingshi said, "This is called a 'spiritual sense mustard seed.' It can test whether your sense is naturally sharp or blunt. The so-called 'spiritual sense' is the third eye between your brows that can distinguish between the clear and the turbid, observe matter and inspect energy. Today is my first time seeing all of you, so I'm going to use it to inform myself in order to be able to provide instruction according to your aptitude in the year to come.

“There are six forking paths inside the mustard seed. The first fork is a one in two choice, the second is one in four, and so on, until the final fork, which has sixty-four paths. You can only leave by one path—the path where the spiritual energy is strongest. If you go the wrong way, the spiritual energy will gradually thin out, and you’ll come to a dead end and have to turn back to choose again. There are also a few wrong paths that you have to be careful of. The turbid energy in them is thick, and you might encounter anything. If anyone has a dull spiritual sense and bad luck...” At this point, Luo Qingshi gave a cold laugh. “Then let’s hope you’re blessed with long life. Those who can’t get out within the burning of an incense stick are the ones with a naturally dull spiritual sense. You’ll have to come to morning class a shichen earlier than the others.”

Xi Ping: “...”

A shichen earlier than even mao hour three ke—did he want to organize them to get up and crow?

“Straw child, light the...” said Luo Qingshi.

“Excuse me,” His Fourth Highness spoke up loudly, “Disciple Zhou Xi is confused about something and would like to ask shixiong for guidance.”

Luo Qingshi raised his eyelids and glanced at him. He said, ambiguously, “I see, the fourth prince... Your Highness, what are your instructions?”

“There’s no need for that.” Zhou Xi straightened up and said, neither haughty nor humble, “Excuse me, Immortal, you just mentioned ‘spiritual energy’ and ‘turbid energy’ several times, and you said that we can only leave the mustard seed by finding the path with the strongest spiritual energy. But you haven’t yet instructed us on what ‘spiritual energy’ and ‘turbid energy’ are...”

Before he could finish, Luo Qingshi interrupted him in his young-old voice: “Young children don’t know how to speak and don’t know what ‘sweet’ and ‘bitter’ are, but they smile if they eat candy and cry if they lick medicine. You’re all people with given names, courtesy names, and positions in society. Are you telling me I need to teach you starting from how to dress yourselves and how to eat?”

Zhou Xi’s status was high. The Latent Cultivation Temple’s stewards were polite to him, and his fellow disciples all gave way to him somewhat. No one had yet been this rude to him. In spite of himself, his expression darkened.

“Light the incense stick!” said Luo Qingshi.

Xi Ping could hear what the people outside were saying, but he couldn't see them.

But to the other disciples in the Latent Cultivation Temple, it looked as though Xi Ping were inside a transparent glazed ball. His feet were standing on emptiness three chi off the ground, suspended in midair.

Inside the mustard seed, space and dimension were folded in on themselves. They saw Xi Ping taking steps as though walking forward, his stride quite long, but he remained suspended in place the whole time without moving. Only the path inside the mustard seed changed constantly. Soon, he came to the first fork in the road.

All this spiritual energy and turbid energy sounded like nonsense. Xi Ping, at any rate, didn't understand a word of it.

Since he wouldn't be able to work anything out by thinking it over based on nothing, it was better not to waste the mental effort, just put his head down and take a wild guess. If he guessed wrong, at worst he would go back.

So before Immortal Luo finished dragging the words "incense stick" out two li long, Xi Ping had already chosen the left hand path without any hesitation.

Seeing him so self-confident, the other disciples thought he had to know what he was doing. Only Zhou Xi, glancing at Luo Qingshi's malicious smile, thought: Xi Shiyong must have chosen wrong.

The midget demon was famous for his pettiness, and the spiritual sense mustard seed was entirely under his control. If he wanted to give someone a hard time, then likely the first wrong path would be the dangerous path with so-called "thick turbid energy."

Zhou Xi hesitated a moment and thought of Prince Zhuang. In fact, he suspected that his san-ge's hand and eye could reach to the Latent Cultivation Temple... Anyway, it was for the best if he and the Viscount of Yongning appeared to get along, so he wanted to say something to warn Xi Ping.

But circumstances changed faster than he expected inside the mustard seed. Before Zhou Xi could decide what to say, he saw Xi Ping stop in his tracks. Almost at the same time, the transparent mustard seed darkened without warning. Inside it, Xi Ping was swallowed by darkness!

Next, ear-splitting shouts came from the darkness. The disciples seated in the front row, taken by surprise, were so startled they nearly overturned the tables of the ones behind them.

Inside the mustard seed, Xi Ping only felt a horrifying chill hit him in the face. Before he could work out what was going on, a thick smell of blood surged up from the ground. In the darkness, a fierce, fanged head suddenly appeared, fully the size of a watermelon, its bloody maw open, wailing as it came toward him as if it wanted to take his head off in one bite!

On this narrow path, there was nowhere to dodge to either side!

The smile on Luo Qingshi's face became even more apparent. "I did tell you to be careful. Some people..."

The next moment, his words were interrupted by another bellow.

Xi Ping had a contrary disposition. When he was in a good mood and met someone he liked, he could perhaps occasionally let them have their way for once. When it came to a confrontation, he never gave way.

When he had been six years old, this kid had run into a vicious dog and had dared to pick up a stick and step forward—never mind now, when he was as tall as a house.

As soon as he saw there was no place to hide, Xi Ping simply shot forward a step and ran up against the evil head; he was knocked backward several steps.

The head had displayed its sharp teeth in an intention to bite him; how could Xi Ping agree to that? So he exerted all his strength and grabbed the lumpy skin of its cheeks!

The head's skin was ulcerated, all mottled with blood; it couldn't see anything clearly. This was the first time anyone had ever teasingly pinched its cheeks. It was dazed for a moment. Then, in a towering rage, it released a roar toward this great scoundrel.

Its roar seemed to be able to pour right into a person's brain. Getting roared at to his face, Xi Ping was dizzied by its voice for a time.

This time, Xi Ping didn't cover his ears with his hands. All he could do was open his mouth and absorb the ear-splitting roar, but he felt smothered and wanted to throw up.

So he simply let loose and returned the compliment—it was better to shout than to vomit, anyway.

These two huddled together and howled in pain for fully half a ke, with plenty of breath, the noise making the whole Qiankun Tower tremble. All the disciples were dumbfounded, not knowing what was happening inside.

Luo Qingshi was at the end of his rope. “Shut up, both of you!”

In answer to his voice, the head inside the mustard seed turned into a wisp of green smoke and vanished.

Xi Ping went forward from inertia and nearly hit the ground. His throat was parched. He coughed a couple times and found that he had returned to the very first forking path.

The mustard seed cleared once more, and Xi Ping reappeared before the eyes of the disciples.

Luo Qingshi shot a glance at the incense table and knew that this brat definitely wouldn't be able to get out of the mustard seed.

He sat down and closed his eyes. In a drawn voice, he “sang,” “Half the incense stick has already burned, and Xi-shidi hasn't yet passed the first fork...”

Inside the mustard seed, Xi Ping refused to listen. He quickly turned toward the righthand fork.

His legs were long and he ran fast. Soon he saw the second fork.

Xi Ping stopped and looked down at his feet thoughtfully—with his superb hearing, he had heard that the tone of his footsteps sounded different on the different paths: when he had been walking on the wrong path, his footsteps had sounded slightly heavy, as if they had an echo; but on the correct path to the right, his footsteps clearly sounded a little “cleaner.”

There was no time to think it over. Xi Ping decided to give it another try. He closed his eyes and quickly took a step into each of the four paths. As expected, there was a slight difference in the weight of his footsteps in each of the four paths.

Xi Ping chose the one where the sound of his footsteps was lightest and charged in. After this, he followed the same pattern with the other forks—just as Luo Qingshi had said, the spiritual energy of the wrong paths became scarcer and scarcer, and the spiritual energy on the correct paths became thicker and thicker. The further he went, the easier it became to distinguish the difference in the weight of his footsteps.

The disciples had seen how he had chosen the most dangerous path when he had a fifty-fifty chance of being right and had tragically wasted half his time at the outset, so they’d thought that what would follow would be even more horrifying. They hadn’t expected that, like a runaway donkey, he would reach the end on one breath.

As if he had taken the wrong road at the beginning in order to amuse them!

But Luo Qingshi thought that Xi Ping was a goner. He hadn't even opened his eyes. His speech was slow, so he hadn't even finished his previous sentence when Xi Ping ran through the final forking path.

Totally unaware, he was still putting on his one-man show: "...it seems that he wants to come beat the gong at the Qiankun Tower at yin hour three ke tomorrow."

Right after he spoke, he heard someone respond from the platform: "Oh, I've come out. Do I still have to go?"

As if someone had stepped on his tail, Luo Qingshi jumped up. He saw Xi Ping standing outside the mustard seed, safe and sound.

Xi Ping was normally very active. Though he had just run a big, terrifying circle, after he got out, he stood there for only a moment before evening out his breathing. A strand of hair, not tied up properly in the morning, fell loose. He pushed it back carelessly. Not only did he not seem hard pressed, he even had a unique sort of unrestrained air.

Luo Qingshi's round eyes glared so hard that their shape distorted. He seemed to want to bring heavenly lightning down on Xi Ping's ancestral tomb. Just then, Zhou Xi put in another timely line: “Shixiong, there are a few more people in this class of disciples than in previous years. If each of us has to have his spiritual sense tested, I think we should hurry up.”

Luo Qingshi pressed his lips together into a flat line. With a struggle, he restrained his temper, waved his sleeve, and swept Xi Ping back to his seat. He said, gritting his teeth, “Good. Good, Xi Shiyong. Interesting. No wonder you think pretty well of yourself.”

Then he pointed bitterly to a straw child. “First-class spiritual sense, record it. Next—”

The disciples who had been watching the fun lowered their heads in unison. The atmosphere became as sorrowful as though they were a group of filial descendants mourning their deceased elders.

As soon as Luo Qingshi extended his hand, the straw child next to him turned around with a rustle and handed him the disciple name list. Xi Ping’s name happened to be last on the list, so Luo Qingshi simply went back up the list starting from him. “Yao Qi, Yao Ziming.”

While Yao Qi stepped up, trembling, Zhou Xi took the opportunity to say quietly to Xi Ping, “Immortal Luo is around the middle established foundation stage. Even Heaven’s Design Pavilion has to view him as an elder when they meet. Shiyong, though he won't get into a serious fight with mortals like us who haven't opened our spiritual eyes yet, you still shouldn't use your natural talent to tease him."

Xi Ping understood the beginning of this, but he had no idea what His Highness meant by the last sentence and said, bewildered, "When did I tease him?"

Zhou Xi gave him an "as long as you understand" look and didn't speak to him again.

Just now, hearing Luo Qingshi announce "first-class spiritual sense," the way Zhou Xi looked at Xi Ping had changed—a natural "first-class spiritual sense" occurred in less than one in ten thousand people. They were the legendary people who could close their eyes when placing a bet and win a gamble. When it came to instinct, they might be even more accurate than ordinary half-immortals.

A person like this couldn't have chosen wrong at the first fork to begin with.

So Zhou Xi concluded: Xi Shiyong must have done it on purpose.

He had heard long ago that the Marquis of Yongning's son was brash and insolent. Zhou Xi glanced at Xi Ping's look of "fake innocence" and felt that seeing for himself was more useful than hearing—the man himself was even more arrogant than rumors made him out to be.

Meanwhile, Yao Qi had already gone into the spiritual sense mustard seed.

Perhaps because of his diarrhea the night before, Yao Qi's legs were shaking so hard it was visible from the outside of his robe. He was on edge as he walked, bent over, wishing to stick his belly to the ground and crawl. Each time he came to a fork, Yao Qi had to stop and mutter to himself for ages before finally making a decision. It was unclear whether he was casting a spell or praying for the protection of his ancestors.

But though he worked hard, his luck was truly poor.

He had just gone past the second fork when something happened inside the mustard seed; it went dark again.

If you said that Xi Ping had been punished by malice, then Yao Qi's bad luck was purely his own. Even Luo Qingshi hadn't thought that he would run into the black door.

Before Yao Qi could take a clear look to see what was happening, he instinctively turned and ran. But it was too late.

Soon, he was also swallowed up by a ball of black energy. Compared to Xi Ping's playful duet, this time, the sounds were far more tragic. First, an ominous sound of tearing silk came from the darkness, followed by a scream in an altered pitch interspersed with the sound of a sharp implement cutting through flesh... The disciples in the front few rows simply couldn't sit still any longer. One after another, they shifted their seats back.

Only when an incense stick had completely burned down did the pitch-black mustard seed spit him out.

The black energy scattered. Little Young Master Yao hugged the ground. His back seemed to have been torn up by a wild beast. Several claw marks had rolled back the skin.

Yao Qi, on his last gasp, lay on the ground, his face lurid as incense paper. Under their eyes, he breathed in without breathing out.

All the private conversations in the Qiankun Tower instantly fell silent.

Luo Qingshi pinched his nose and distastefully waved a hand. Two straw children stepped forward at the same speed and lifted Yao Qi. They put an elixir pill into his mouth. The elixir truly was an immortal product; as soon as it entered his mouth, the wounds on Yao Qi's back rapidly healed, and color immediately returned to his face. By the time he was put onto a stone chair, he had slowly returned to consciousness and could sit upright.

But as soon as he opened his eyes, he heard Luo Qingshi announce: “For tomorrow’s morning class, come to the Qiankun Tower a shichen early. Next.”

Hearing this tragic news, Little Young Master Yao’s eyes rolled up, and he fainted again.

Instantly, Xi Ping was surrounded by imploring gazes from all sides. For a time, he didn’t know which way to look. All he could do was lower his head and quietly share the answer: “Your footsteps sound heavier on the wrong paths. There’s an echo.”

The disciples, willing to turn to anyone in a crisis, quickly noted it down. But Zhou Xi frowned and put in a word: “Don’t just listen to what someone else tells you. Everyone’s spiritual sense has a different degree of acuteness. It’s easy to go wrong if you put too much faith into someone else’s experience. If you’re really lost, when you get into the mustard seed, you can try clearing your mind of extraneous thoughts, closing your eyes, and walking forward. I think that it won’t be too hard to pass levels meant to test the spiritual senses of mortal disciples like us. As long as you don’t panic, you should all be able to get out.”

Xi Ping thought that he was making good sense, so he nodded and chimed in, “Yes, that’s true.”

Zhou Xi gave him an unfathomable look—the reason that the “spiritual sense” was called the “third eye” was that it was of chaos, above all the senses.

Only a half-immortal whose spiritual eyes had opened could transfer his spiritual sense to sight, hearing, smell, touch, and taste. This was called “linking the spiritual sense.”

If he could already link his spiritual sense, what was he doing here? This Xi Shiyong was disrespectful toward his elders and got up to petty tricks; with his classmates, he blurted out boasts and intentionally misled them. He was a real piece of work.

Just as Zhou Xi had said, though Luo Qingshi looked peevisish, in fact, he didn’t deliberately make it hard on the disciples. When the difference between spiritual and turbid inside the mustard seed was small and hard to distinguish, there were also few paths, so it was easy to muddle through. Later, though there were more and more paths, the spiritual energy also gradually thickened. As long as the disciples were focused enough, sixty to seventy percent of them could feel their way out with their eyes closed before the incense stick had finished burning.

Apart from Xi Ping, who had been the target of malice, and Yao Qi with his unusual “luck,” no one else ran into the circumstance of the mustard seed darkening. The vast majority of the wrong paths only came to dead ends; all you had to do was turn back.

Among them, the steadiest were the Lin family’s direct descendant Lin Zhenfeng and His Fourth Highness Zhou Xi.

Starting from when he was six, Zhou Xi would be blindfolded and given spiritual stones to determine their grade. He walked easily into the mustard seed and closed his eyes. At each fork, he reached out a hand and felt around for a moment, and in a few breaths he would choose a path. He went through all six forks only once, not having to retrace a single step. In less than a ke, he was out. Among the marveling of the disciples, he gave Luo Qingshi a leisurely salute.

But Luo Qingshi didn’t so much as raise his eyelids. He waved a hand at him. “Fine, come down.”

Zhou Xi thought nothing of it. Wearing the appropriate smile, he returned. But before he had sat back down, he heard Luo Qingshi say to the straw child next to him: “Second class spiritual sense.”

The smile on Zhou Xi’s face instantly froze.

Luo Qingshi said, “That’s everyone tested. Those who haven’t qualified...”

Zhou Xi spoke: “Please instruct me, shixiong. By what standards do you separate spiritual sense into grades? If I know where I have fallen short, in the future, I’ll be able to make up through hard work what I lack in natural talent.”

“What I tested was inborn spiritual sense. It doesn’t matter that you’ve all trained with spiritual stones since you were little,” Luo Qingshi said impatiently. “But it’s good that you know you need to make up for your natural deficiencies with hard work. Continue in that manner.”

These words sounded like praise, but Zhou Xi felt unspeakably awkward.

As if he was afraid he didn’t feel awkward enough yet, Luo Qingshi, at this point, unable to resist, glanced at Xi Ping. “If you work hard for ten years or so, you’ll be able to make up for the inborn deficiency.”

Xi Ping: “...”

What did this person mean by sowing discord in broad daylight?

“I forgot to say, you have an allowance of spiritual stones at the Latent Cultivation Temple, three blue jades each month. Whether you clear your spiritual eyes later or control immortal tools, you’ll need to use spiritual stones. All of the Latent Cultivation Temple’s half-immortal stewards, as well as us instructors, have the right to apply rewards and penalties to your spiritual stone allowance.” Luo Qingshi shut the roster of disciples. “Each time you’re late for morning class, one spiritual stone will be deducted. Those of you who didn’t test up to standard for spiritual sense just now, I’ll see you tomorrow at yin hour three ke. Don’t be late.”

Then the sky blue figure flickered. Luo Qingshi’s voice lingered, but he himself had already arrived at the gate of the Qiankun Tower. He swaggered off.

Xi Ping was about to go talk to Zhou Xi, but he saw that His Fourth Highness had already turned away and gone to ask after Yao Qi’s health. He was close at hand, but he seemed to have suddenly gone deaf and didn’t hear Xi Ping calling him.

Xi Ping never put himself in a position to be snubbed. Sensing His Fourth Highness’s sudden estrangement, he didn’t ask for the reason but simply got up and left.

This Latent Cultivation Temple with all its finicky requirements—just three blue jades a month, and you could get them deducted over this or that.

“Some commodity.” Xi Ping didn’t take it to heart. “I have plenty.”

On average, the white jade proximal burned one blue jade every seven or eight days. When the spiritual energy ran dry, the blue jade would turn into a cloudy grey stone. The first time Xi Ping changed the spiritual stone himself, he had no idea what he was doing; he fiddled around for ages before getting it right.

After he finished changing the spiritual stone, Xi Ping let out a breath. He grabbed another one from the box and tossed it to the half-puppet.

Supposedly the dragon-taming chain was meant to be operated with your “consciousness.” Xi Ping hadn’t yet learned how to control this so-called “consciousness.” Each time he applied a drop of blood, he could get a reaction for about three or four days.

But apart from the first time he had accidentally rubbed blood on it, Xi Ping hadn’t used the dragon-taming chain again—he had always thought that “observation” and “control” went both ways. If you “chained” someone, would you still be free? The last thing he needed.

As long as the half-puppet didn't bite him, he didn't care where the little thing went or what he did... He only hoped that, like the old manuscript said, the little monster could grow up and learn to understand human speech quickly and work for him.

Before, when there had been a reaction from the dragon-taming chain, Xi Ping still hadn't been able to feel the difference between the little monster being hungry or full after he ate the spiritual stone, never mind now, when the reaction had vanished. He didn't know how much he ought to feed him. But even the brocade carp on the proximal changed color when its spiritual stone had nearly been burned up; the little monster was a living being, so naturally there would be signs when he was hungry. If he didn't mention it, there was probably no need to feed him.

Xi Ping closed the box of spiritual stones and shoved it in the cabinet, then went to morning class... He had always had people to look after him. He wasn't in the habit of locking cabinet doors after himself.

The upshot was that, that night, as soon as he opened the door, Xi Ping felt himself step on something. He looked down and saw an empty wooden box...a familiar one.

Wait!

Xi Ping immediately had a bad feeling. He charged quickly into the room. He saw the half-puppet lying on the floor, his belly swollen half a chi high, totally unconscious, radiating faint blue light.

Next to him, the cabinet door was wide open. The box full of spiritual stones was gone!

CHAPTER 17 - The Dragon Bites Its Tail (5)

The well-intentioned Chang Jun had just returned to the Qiu courtyard supporting Yao Qi when he heard the door of the north rooms, which Xi Ping occupied, slam open.

Xi Ping had a roll of bedding tucked under his arm. Without a word, he rushed out the door.

Chang Jun called to stop him: “Shiyong, what are you doing? It’s nearly dark, the courtyard gate locks at xu hour...”

Xi Ping’s furious voice came with the wind: “Then—I’ll—die—out—here!”

In his rage, Xi Ping had a mind to find a big stone and smash the half-puppet to pieces—if he hadn’t known that the half-puppet had originally been human, he would have done it already.

Actually, when it came to killing a human in anger, he didn’t think he would be incapable of it, but the half-puppet wasn’t only seemingly human, he was also a little thing the size of a fingernail. Toward a little thing like this, which he could have squeezed to death with a little effort, no amount of anger could burst out.

This lousy thing. He didn't know to make the bed, dress someone, do hair, or anything; apart from biting and rolling his eyes, he was also a glutton who had swallowed an entire box of blue jade in one go!

Swallowing gold? No, this was swallowing several luxury mansions in one go!

Pang Jian was so wicked it went all the way back to his ancestral tomb!

Xi Ping ran up along the mountain path, knocking a patrolling straw child into a spinning top. He charged directly toward Chengjing Hall midway up the mountain.

Chengjing Hall was where the Latent Cultivation Temple's stewards kept watch. When the disciples had a problem, they could go to Chengjing Hall to ask an open-eyed shixiong or shijie for help. The approximate location wasn't hard to find, but the little compound was tucked away amid a bamboo forest. Xi Ping was a stranger here. He saw the roof of Chengjing Hall from a distance, but he went around several times without being able to work out how to get in.

Overwhelmed with rage, he snatched up a straw child from the thicket, searched all over himself, and came up with a wrinkled guide talisman. He was just planning on “asking the way” when he heard a familiar voice behind him ask, “It’s already dark, what...oh, it’s you again?”

Xi Ping turned his head. A cool breeze swept over him. Next, the image of a sword at the green-gowned living legend’s feet turned to countless shards of light, and he landed on the ground without disturbing a grain of dust.

“Are you a reincarnated cat? As soon as night falls, you start running around.” Zhi Xiu fiddled with a bamboo leaf that had fallen on his shoulder. Then his eyes fell on the bedroll Xi Ping was holding. “What strong spiritual energy! What is this thing?”

One ke later, General Zhi was looking at the blue-jade-stuffed half-puppet on a little table in Chengjing Hall. He was silent.

On duty tonight at Chengjing Hall was an old half-immortal whose hair and beard were white. His name was Su Zhun. He was said to be in charge of the discipline hall at the Latent Cultivation Temple. Though he attended to punishments, Elder Su’s appearance wasn’t fierce at all. He was always smiling. He looked more like a genial old uncle from next door.

Su Zhun inspected the half-puppet. He looked up and asked, “How many spiritual stones did you just say this half-puppet ate?”

“Around ten jin,” said Xi Ping.

This was Elder Su’s first time hearing someone discuss spiritual stones in terms of jin. For a moment, he couldn’t quite make sense of the number.

General Zhi said sincerely, “Last time outside of Jinping City, I wanted to ask you—kid, does your family have a private spiritual stone mine?”

“No, actually,” Xi Ping answered honestly. “We have some jade mines and agate mines.”

Zhi Xiu: “...”

Elder Su: “...”

Where had this sprout of a young master with his detachment from worldly affairs come from?!

“That’s not important,” the sprout of a young master continued to issue his infuriating views. “He’s eaten all of my spiritual stones, so what am I supposed to use? How am I going to...”

Xi Ping had nearly let the truth slip out: “How am I going to write letters home?” Luckily, he remembered at the last moment that, on the surface, the Latent Cultivation Temple didn't allow disciples to contact their families. He forced his words into a different direction. "Anyway, that's how it is... Exalted, is there a way to make him throw them up?"

"You've entered the sect, so call me shixiong," Elder Su amiably corrected Xi Ping's overly formal address toward himself. "A half-puppet doesn't have a digestive system. Though we say they eat spiritual stones, it's different from the way we who haven't attained inedia digest food. He wouldn't be able to throw them up. But I don't think he'd be able to digest so many spiritual stones at once. If we break all of his arrays and block his spiritual pathways, we can cut open his belly and get some of them back."

Xi Ping: "..."

The spiritual stones had already split the seams of the little half-puppet's jarring pink jacket. Elder Su rolled up the ragged jacket a little, revealing his belly. Both sides of the half-puppet's waist and his spine were made of special wood and Moon Plated Gold; ring after ring of arrays on them had been activated by the spiritual stones and were faintly visible. The skin of his belly, however, was human skin, distended by the spiritual stones inside. There was also a crooked scar sticking out on his belly, still rising and falling with every breath...letting the half-puppet's warped and broken vitality leak out.

Elder Su put both hands in his sleeves and said to Xi Ping, as though humoring a child, “Go get shixiong that knife, Yingbi, hanging on the wall. I’ll cut him open for you, don’t worry, we’ll still be able to get some back.”

Xi Ping looked at the half-puppet, then looked at Su Zhun. “Exal...shixiong, doesn’t it say in the book that the lumber and Moon Plated Gold are equivalent to a human’s flesh and bones?”

Then wouldn’t this be the same as breaking his bones, cutting off his meridians, then disemboweling him?

Su Zhun nodded, the wrinkles at the corners of his eyes deepening. “Indeed.”

“No, wait...” Xi Ping’s expression twisted several times. Falling apart, he pointed to the half-puppet and said, “Will his appetite always be like this? If I planted him in the ground, would he even pick all of Xuanyin Mountain clean?”

Su Zhun had only been teasing him. Hearing him blab like this, daring even to make arrangements for the immortal mountain, he quickly said, “Hey, you can’t talk like that!”

General Zhi was still there!

Zhi Xiu smiled. “A grown half-puppet consumes about as many spiritual stones as a cultivator. He probably won’t eat you out of house and home... and jade mines. But this half-puppet’s luck has been bad. His original master probably didn’t feed him well, only gave him a bit of spiritual energy to sustain his life. He must have been starved over time, and that’s why he couldn’t resist swallowing your box of spiritual stones. If he isn’t starved in the future, he won’t eat like this again. Disciples have an allowance of three blue jades a month. Before opening your spiritual eyes, you won’t be able to use them up. If you give him one a month, that should be fine.”

“Three a month, and I still have to give him one?” said Xi Ping.

What do you mean I won’t be able to use them up?! The proximal goes through at least four a month!

“Indeed,” Elder Su said approvingly. “As I see it, this evil cultivator’s handiwork is no good. This half-puppet is bad quality. The box of spiritual stones he swallowed is enough to exchange for a whole barracks full of true puppets. What would you want him for? There’s no need for so much trouble. Cut him open, take back the spiritual stones, then buy a new one.”

He beckoned, and the knife Yingbi hanging on the wall yieldingly fell into his hand.

Su Zhun rolled up his sleeves and moved the blade. "I'm old, my eyesight is no good. Let me see where to cut..."

"Wait, wait..." Seeing the knife Yingbi's cold light falling on the half-puppet's belly, Xi Ping instinctively reached out to block it. "Shixiong, wait."

Elder Su said, "If we wait any longer, the spiritual stones will be all gone."

Hearing this, Xi Ping glared at the half-puppet, feeling that he got more annoying the more he saw of him.

But while he may have been annoying, Xi Ping couldn't have a child disemboweled like a piglet over some stuff.

So a breath caught in his throat. He couldn't spit it out or swallow it. After a long time, he swept his sleeves and fiercely said, "Forget about it!"

"What, forget about it?" Elder Su pretended to be surprised. "A hundred liang of blue jade, four or five thousand liang of gold, you don't want them?"

Xi Ping spent all his time hanging around the marketplace. He knew that in Jinping's southern outskirts, a single copper coin could buy a pair of mixed grain flatbreads the size of your hand, and he had heard that a string of copper coins was enough for anyone to live on for a month.

But while he wouldn't say anything as demented as "Why don't they eat meat if they don't have rice?", after all, he had never gone short. In fact, in his mind, neither a hundred liang of blue jade nor a thousand liang of gold were as urgent as "When I run out of spiritual stones in a couple of days I won't be able to write to my grandmother anymore."

He regretted it, but it wasn't bitter anguish; mostly it was irritation.

"I only said a few sentences to contradict Commander Pang that day...and it was about things he brought up! And he put this much effort into getting me in trouble! An old codger nearly a hundred years old, sinking to my level—he must have a lot of attention to spare!" Xi Ping peevishly pushed the half-puppet in front of Elder Su. "I'll donate him to the temple, you can order him around like a straw child or put him on display. I don't want him anymore, anyway."

"That would be good." Elder Su smiled. "This half-puppet has eaten so many spiritual stones at once. When he's finished digesting, he'll grow in intellect and size, and then maybe he won't be so useless. Shidi, you aren't donating a puppet, you're donating a mountain of gold!"

Xi Ping: "..."

No way, that's not fair!

For a time, he was caught in an impossible situation. Keeping this thing would be annoying, but if he donated it to the Latent Cultivation Temple, he would be a sucker.

What was all this rotten business? It was about to annoy him to death!

After a moment, Xi Ping stuffed the half-puppet under his arm and returned the way he had come.

Anger stoked up this useless Viscount's ambitions. He decided to work hard to improve himself. When he was powerful, he would stick Pang into a sack and beat him until he looked like a pig!

If he didn't get his revenge, then his name wasn't Xi.

Commander Pang wasn't on duty that night. He had some rare free time. He wiped his face, and his craggy countenance at once became average and unremarkable. He changed out of the sapphire blue robe, put on casual clothes, and went out to eat a late night snack. He went to the Phoenix's Perch Pavilion.

There was a wind on the Lingyang River, scattering quite a bit of the fog. As soon as Pang Jian sat down by the window, he sneezed twice in a row. He wiped his nose and looked up and just happened to see Cui Ji not far away.

Cui Ji was two hundred steps from the pleasure boat ferry crossing, its courtyard dense with ancient trees. There were no glazed tiles at the gate, and no big inscribed board. There was only an enclosing wall of dark grey stone, with snow-white gas lamps lighting the characters “Cui Ji” at the corner of the wall. Underneath was that commandingly wealthy little brocade carp imprint.

Those who had no property didn't even dare to look into that courtyard.

Pang Jian suddenly became thoughtful. He stretched his spiritual sense to its limit and felt a thread of enmity that referred to him by name floating over from the west—the direction of Xuanyin Mountain.

“Cursing me behind my back.” Commander Pang knew at once who it was and laughed carelessly. “Little devil, one day you'll be thanking Grandpa Pang.”

He had deliberately gone along with the tide and given the half-puppet to Xi Ping, and he had deliberately not warned Xi Ping to look after the spiritual stones.

Jade had to be polished to have value. Taking snacks to the Latent Cultivation Temple as though he were going on a spring outing—it was obvious the kid was planning to muddle through. If he hadn't made a bit of trouble for him, he may not even have opened his spiritual eyes a year later.

The osmanthus duck came. Pang Jian was just about to dig in when he heard a dispute downstairs.

He saw that a waiter was just driving off a teenage boy. “If you're not going to buy a whole duck, then you can buy half a duck—even half a young duck. Half a young duck is only two hundred coins, I'll speak to the manager and have them give you the duck's head for free. We've only heard of people who don't want the duck's head, never anyone who specifically bought the duck's head. Perhaps you could go somewhere else to ask about it?”

Though this boy was clean enough, his pant legs were already so short that they hung above his ankles. His impoverished appearance was at odds with the Phoenix's Perch Pavilion. The people around them, hearing that someone wanted to buy a duck's head, all laughed. Someone jeered: “Little brother, can you even grow a mustache? Isn't it a little early to be thinking about buying girls?”¹⁵

Pang Jian glanced over and saw that this “little brother” was actually a half-grown young woman.

The girl knew that she had revealed her unworldliness. Her face went red to the base of her neck. She straightened her neck and stubbornly said, “My family eats duck’s heads. There aren’t many of us, we can’t eat half a duck, all right?”

The waiter squinted at her hanging pant legs and ragged cuffs. “Half a young duck won’t even fill our manager’s cat’s belly. What royal lineage do you belong to, with such an aristocratic appetite?”

The girl unconsciously put her hands behind her back.

The waiter said, “If it’s not on the menu, we don’t sell it. If you really want to eat it, you can find someone who’s buying a duck and doesn’t want to eat the head, and ‘buy in’ with them.”

Just then, a busybody knocked on his table, laden with the leavings of his meal, and said, “I have a duck’s head here. Who wants it? You’re welcome to it.”

The girl became furious in her embarrassment. She stamped her foot and loudly said, “The Phoenix’s Perch Pavilion won’t give you your money’s worth!”

“Hey, what are you saying...”

“The Phoenix’s Perch Pavilion is a big business, so it bullies its customers! It won’t give you your money’s worth!” Seeing the restaurant’s security guard walk over, the girl turned and ran. She bumped headfirst into a customer. The underbred urchin didn’t even apologize. As she ran, she called out, “They just said it themselves! Half a duck won’t even fill a cat’s belly!”

“Oh, I’m so sorry, sir.” The waiter quickly held up the customer that the girl had sent staggering. “I don’t know where that lunatic came from at this time of night.”

The customer dusted off his lapels in revulsion. “In my opinion, we ought to restore the ancient system, lock the city gates as soon as it gets dark, don’t let anyone in! How wonderful Jinping City is, letting that bunch of rustics from the southern outskirts trample all over it like this!”

As soon as he said this, echoes quickly sounded in the Phoenix’s Perch Pavilion.

“That’s right! I heard a couple days ago that the refugees want to bring a complaint against the emperor. They’ve gathered up in a big group in the southern outskirts outside the gate!”

“What do they want?”

“It’s about that old business of the land expropriated to build the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon rails,” an informed individual among the seated customers said. “All these years, I don’t know why they’ve turned it up again... Ah, anyway, it’s a pity. I went out of the city the other day, and I saw that crowd of refugees laying out their makeshift beds beside the canal with flies and mosquitoes buzzing around them. My heavens, looking from a distance, it was like a mass grave.”

“I think there’ll be a big fuss this time. I hear the Crown Prince in the palace has submitted a petition pleading for forgiveness for the people. It drove the emperor out of his mind with rage.”

“What was he angry about?”

“He wants to spread the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon everywhere—lately someone came from the Chu to the west...”

The Phoenix's Perch Pavilion was an old establishment, not cheap, and the clientele were all somewhat wealthy—though they weren't major figures; even the butlers of major figures weren't so loose-lipped when they went out. Minor merchants and shopkeepers, managers of horses and carriages...and all that sort, what they liked best was to gather together to discuss major state affairs based on hearsay to draw attention to the breadth of their information networks.

Pang Jian let it go in one ear and out the other, thinking of something else. He slowly poured himself a cup of wine, a little lost in thought.

Just then, there was a clamor in the street. Someone cried out: "Quick, look, shooting stars!"

Pang Jian looked in response to the voice. Several meteors flew across the sky toward the horizon.

In the Latent Cultivation Temple's Chengjing Hall, General Zhi watched Xi Ping's figure recede, puffing like a train, and couldn't resist being amused. He took the cup of tea Elder Su gave him. "Pang Wenchang truly is wonderful."

Elder Su said, "I brought up Wenchang myself, I know him, he's very wild. If he looks down on a person, he'll go through the motions to their face, then turn his head and forget what they look like. If he didn't set store by him, he wouldn't get up to these little tricks—which family does this young master come from?"

To look at these two, they were grandfather and grandson. When it came to positions within the sect, Su Zhun was only an open-eyed disciple of the outer sect who had to politely call Zhi Xiu "shishu." But there was a certain relaxed ease to their conversation that made them seem instead like old friends of many years' standing.

"An upstart family with no roots, a simple background. Recently he got drawn into a case. I thought he hit it off pretty well with Xiao Pang. Heaven's Design Pavilion probably wants to reserve him in advance... He's really something. The inner sect hasn't even made its selections, and he already wants to pick," Zhi Xiu said, smiling. "So it was you who brought up that Xiao Pang. And here I was wondering why when I asked whether he wanted a reception order, his tone when he answered was exactly the same as your's when you were young."

Su Zhun's expression was a little odd. "You asked him whether he wanted a reception order... Listen, little shishu, isn't that going a little too far?"

Zhi Xiu was bewildered. "Huh?"

“Wenchang didn’t come up through the Latent Cultivation Temple, he opened his spiritual eyes because of an accident. I didn’t want his talent to go to waste and asked you to vouch for him with the inner sect in order to get him made a disciple of record and enter Heaven’s Design Pavilion.” Su Zhun didn’t know whether to laugh or cry. “You just scribbled down a letter and then forgot all about it, but that child had your voucher mounted and took it everywhere with him, so grateful he gave over his whole life to Heaven’s Design Pavilion. Several times when his life was hanging by a thread and he was snatched back by his colleagues and delirious with fever, he would clutch your voucher and say, ‘I didn’t let General Zhi down.’ Honestly, you do test a person’s feelings.”

Zhi Xiu was a little embarrassed. “How could I know we had that connection...? He didn’t say anything, and I don’t go peeking at other people’s histories without a reason.”

“What,” said Su Zhun, glancing at him, “is the rumor true? Will Xuanyin Mountain’s Four Great Pities lose one of their pillars?”

“What rumor? What Four Great Pities?” said Zhi Xiu.

“The rumor that you’re finally going to take a disciple, little shishu—the Dignitary of Fate High Elder’s direct disciple, Peak Master of Flying Jade Peak. All the sect’s sword cultivators are crying to be the head disciple of Flying Jade Peak. You're all right. After you took over Flying Jade Peak, you didn't open the mountain's seal, threw together a cottage for yourself at the foot of the mountain and lived there, never even brought up the subject of taking disciples. 'Little shishu doesn't take disciples' makes up one of Xuanyin's Four Great Pities, along with 'Master Lin doesn't make tools,' 'Peak Master Wen doesn't speak,' and 'Princess Duanrui doesn't go near colorful clothes.' Haven't you heard of them?"

"What are you talking about?" Zhi Xiu frowned. "Instruct them not to keep spreading these words around. I'm of no value, they can say what they like, but they shouldn't be disrespectful toward Duanrui-shijie."

Su Zhun asked, "What, are you really going to take a disciple? You don't want any of the sword cultivators with extraordinary gifts running all over the mountain, you want a blank piece of paper to teach from the very beginning?"

"I still don't understand heaven and earth for myself, how could I be qualified to expound wisdom and dispel doubts for others?" Zhi Xiu sipped his tea and waved a hand. "In a few days, Duanrui-shijie will be here to teach the disciples the Yô Xuan Jing."

"What? Princess Duanrui!" Su Zhun was startled and involuntarily sat up straight. "Apart from the established foundation shixiong in residence, the Latent Cultivation Temple only has us half-immortals to handle odd jobs. We're not significant enough to receive this forebear."

"I understand, I'll come ahead of time to await her arrival," Zhi Xiu said. "I was responsible for recruiting this class of disciples, it would be rude not to help entertain the guest of honor."

"Does the princess's Green Pool Peak have an eye on this class of new disciples?" Su Zhun said. "But I heard that she's been in seclusion to achieve a consummate ascended spirit?"

Zhi Xiu's gaze was slightly restrained. "Yes, she's come out."

"Well... She's been in seclusion less than a hundred years, right? Isn't this a little sudden?"

"She's acting under the force of circumstance, nothing to be done about it." Zhi Xiu shook his head. He wasn't accustomed to talking about people behind their backs. He didn't say much. After a moment of silence, he only said, "Mingyi, come to think of it now, it's a good thing you were so insistent on not entering the inner sect back then. You spent nearly two hundred years expelling evil and keeping the Way in the mortal world, and found a quiet place to retire in your old age..."

Su Zhun said, smiling, “Don’t talk nonsense, what do you mean I wouldn’t enter the inner sect? It was the inner sect that didn’t want me. If the inner sect had given me so much as a glance, I’d have packed myself up and shipped myself over... Ah, but on that subject, if you aren’t planning on taking disciples, why did you oversee the Grand Selection? It’s been so many years since an ascended spirit peak master left the mountain. Do you know that because you oversaw the Grand Selection, Luo-shixiong is terrified that it’ll harm your image if these disciples don’t perform well, and he’s planning to work them to death so they all open their spiritual eyes?”

“Oh...there’s no need for that. I only received the sect’s orders to go handle an evil cultivator, and while I was there I brought back the provisional disciples to save someone else a trip.” Zhi Xiu paused, then gave a rough description of the business of the evil cultivator “Tai Sui” at the Blissful Village. “This person’s arrival was momentous. It disturbed the Sea of Stars. He had to be eliminated.”

After hearing this, Su Zhun was shocked. “What did you say? Tai Sui? Tai Sui really exists? And you’ve seen him!”

Zhi Xiu stared. “What, you know of him?”

“I’ve heard of this title,” Su Zhun said hesitantly. “But...it wasn’t a person.”

“If it’s not a person, what is it?”

“It’s a...a totem, a made-up evil god,” Su Zhun said. “The evil cultivators in the mortal world have scarce resources. They stick together. You know that.”

Zhi Xiu nodded.

“They practice all kinds of paths, and when they gather together, it’s to each other’s mutual benefit and assistance. There’s rarely a leader that everyone obeys, so they’ll often concoct a god like the Queen Mother of the West or Grand Duke Tai Sui and worship that god when they get together... It’s a ceremony. When you’ve worshipped the god, it indicates that everyone is on the same path. When I was at Heaven’s Design Pavilion, I caught a group of evil cultivators who worshipped ‘Tai Sui.’”

“The conflagration burns on, the cry of the cicada is without end,” said Zhi Xiu.

“Right, that was the line!” Su Zhun said. “‘Tai Sui’ is an image of a deity carved out of wood! What, did they bring that image to life?”

The two of them exchanged a look, both their expressions rather grave.

Su Zhun asked, “You said he disturbed the Sea of Stars. What does that mean?”

The Sea of Stars was an abyss among the Xuanyin mountain chain; it was said that you could glimpse fate there.

But fate was so abstruse. A person peeking at heaven could accidentally end up caught inside and die where there was no place to be buried, so Xuanyin Mountain had issued an order forbidding its disciples from entering. Apart from the Dignitary of Fate High Elder, even an ascended spirit peak master, if he hadn't been summoned, was only permitted to go into the Sea of Stars once every ten years, and each time he went in couldn't exceed half the burning of a incense stick, and he couldn't glimpse his own fate.

Zhi Xiu said, “It was the Sea of Stars that summoned Zhaoting and pointed me vaguely in the direction of the Dragon Vein. When I came down with Zhaoting, I saw that there was turbid energy and instability near Jinping... meaning that there were evildoers. The instability wasn't strong. We thought at the time it must be an established foundation cultivator of the middle or late stage, but since this person had disturbed the Sea of Stars, there had to be evil practices going on. For the sake of security, my shizun told me to go have a look.”

“If it had, I certainly wouldn’t have arrogantly gone ahead on my own. My life is of no consequence, but the millions of lives in Jinping are no joke.” At this point, Zhi Xiu frowned again and said, “But ‘half a step from shedding his skin’ is too much. I’ve seen Duanrui-shijie, when instructing her own disciples, suppress her cultivation to the open-eyed level, and the established foundation disciples still didn’t stand a chance against her—but that evil cultivator was taken down by a sneak attack from Xiao Pang, a walker in the mortal world, along with a mortal child. But his cultivation was indeed of the late ascended spirit stage... The feeling it gave me was a little like someone whose cultivation has been propped up by elixirs.”

“Elixirs are sand. They can prop a chicken coop or a pigsty up to the sky, but they can’t roof a building,” Su Zhun said. “If elixirs could push you up to an ascended spirit, how many peak masters would Xuanyin have?”

“I know that...” Zhi Xiu was just about to say something when, suddenly, the fragmentary ringing of bells sounded in tranquil Chengjing Hall.

In the small courtyard, all the idling straw children moved on their own without talismans to command them. They all turned to face the window and tilted their heads back to look at the sky.

Meteors like arrows pierced the tranquil night sky.

“Why would there be shooting stars in the southern sky out of nowhere?”
Su Zhun murmured. “It’s an inauspicious omen.”

Author’s Note

The purchasing power of the currency and conversion system are approximately like this:

One copper coin buys two pieces of bread (unleavened, no meat), enough for a meal if you add water; if they aren’t all sold, they’re discounted in the evening.

A string of copper coins is 1,500 copper coins=one liang of silver.

Twelve liang of silver=one liang of gold.

CHAPTER 18 - The Dragon Bites Its Tail (6)

When the first shooting star fell, A-Xiang had reached the pleasure boat ferry crossing. She brushed shoulders with an ice-hauling cart.

The chill offset the greater part of the hot sweat on her forehead. She breathed out a heavy sigh.

A-Xiang was the nominal age of fifteen. Her father had died when she was young. Back then her family had had a few mu of barren land, but they'd had absolutely no ability to work it. A widowed old man and his frail daughter-in-law bringing up a child could work themselves to death all year without digging up a handful of grains, and they couldn't afford to hire people, so when someone came to collect land to build a factory, her grandfather had sold their land.

For the first few years, it hadn't been so bad. Working at the factory brought money in faster than farming. But the good days didn't last. The year before last, the factory had suddenly said they didn't want anyone fifty or over, so the family had lost its livelihood at once.

The money from selling the land back then had gone faster and faster, and an illness of A-Xiang's mother used it all up.

They had no more money and no place to live. Only the grandfather and granddaughter remained, relying on each other for survival. Laborers, waiters—in order to earn a mouthful, she did everything alongside her grandfather. In the Grand Selection Year, by chance, grandfather and granddaughter had come to Jinping in search of food and were doing temporary work in a factory in the southern outskirts.

Lately, A-Xiang had amassed a little fortune.

At first, there had been people voicing their grievance outside the south city gate. It seemed they were saying that when the rails for the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon had been laid, their land had been coveted by corrupt officials. They had nowhere to turn, so they had come to the capital to demand justice. Later, perhaps because no one was paying attention to them or something, for the sake of making themselves look more impressive, these people began hiring others to complain with them.

This work was simple. You only had to take a form for filing suit and wait by the roadside. When you saw a beautiful carriage going past, you would lift the paper and recite the words along with everyone else, and get fifty coins a day—while at the docks, the strongest and most able laborers could earn around thirty.

Her grandfather didn't let her go. The old man always had his own mysterious reasons. He said, "If you bring a false grievance when you haven't been wronged, you'll be threatening your luck." A-Xiang hadn't listened to him. She thought that, in the countryside, people got hired as "filial descendants" to help mourn at funerals, and she had done that kind of unlucky work; what was wrong with helping people bring a grievance? It wasn't an offense against heaven. Anyway, her grandfather thought that if you bought Golden Tray lottery tickets on even-numbered days, you could win the grand prize. He had wasted all their lamp oil money on that scrap paper, and he hadn't gotten a single coin back for it.

Jinping had warmed up early this year. Before the Dragon Boat Festival, the summer heat had already come. The heat cooked A-Xiang's grandfather into an illness. He didn't eat a thing for two days, but his belly swelled up like a pregnant woman's. After that, A-Xiang brought the grievance for three days, earned a hundred and fifty coins, and remembered that her grandfather had said that when they had come to work in the city before, the food their master had rewarded them with had included a duck's head from the Phoenix's Perch Pavilion, and he had never eaten anything better in his life. So, taking her money, she found the Phoenix's Perch Pavilion.

But it turned out that the best thing her grandfather had eaten in his life was a scrap they wouldn't sell on its own.

When A-Xiang closed her eyes, it was as if she could once again hear the laughter in the Phoenix's Perch Pavilion, like evil music.

“Little brother, stop running, aren't you hot?” Seeing her involuntarily following the ice cart, a stand owner selling cold drinks by the street saw an opening to solicit a customer. “Have a bowl of ice balls to cool off, even the immortals are satisfied customers!”

A-Xiang stopped in her tracks, turned, and saw the “ice balls” that the cold drinks stand was selling: the little balls rolled out of sticky rice flour were glistening and transparent, accompanied by all types of fruit and mint juices. Cold wafted off of them in the stifling night. She couldn't resist swallowing a mouthful of saliva.

Seeing that she was moved, the stand owner urged her: “Have a bowl to taste. Cools you down, and it's easy on the stomach, very pleasant!”

A-Xiang had been shaking her head, but when she heard “easy on the stomach,” she hesitated. “How much for a bowl?”

A moment later, she was holding a pot full of ice balls; she had cheered back up—the well-meaning stand owner had heard that she wanted to buy it to take home to her grandfather and praised her for her filial piety, so he had served her the ice balls in a porcelain pot and told her to bring it back for a refill when they had eaten all of it.

Weren't these beautiful ice balls better than some lousy duck's head?

She thought: When I'm rich, I'll buy out all the tables at the Phoenix's Perch Pavilion, order a hundred whole ducks, then feed all the meat to the dogs.

A-Xiang was afraid of letting the crushed ice melt. She ran like mad the whole way, holding the porcelain pot.

She ran through the busy area in the east city, cleverly dodged the carriages passing through, hopped and skipped in long strides across holes dug out for street repairs, then whistled to a girl selling flowers by the street. When the girl realized what had happened and went to spit at her, there was nothing to spit at; A-Xiang had already run out of the south city gate.

Outside the city to the south, it was still stinking. The vendors selling mixed grain flatbreads were preparing to take down their stands, and the bread had been discounted to three for one coin.

"Uncle, I'm not buying any!" A-Xiang called excitedly. "I have good stuff to eat today!"

She was too good at running, like a little wild horse. She didn't rest for a single breath, running the whole way back to the factory. Water droplets beaded on the outside of the ice cold porcelain pot. A-Xiang wiped her wet hand clean against herself, then suddenly found that the atmosphere in the factory district was unusual. There were many people around...each one of them carrying a sword; they were soldiers.

What had happened?

There was an uproar, and several people were dragged out by the soldiers, who cursed and hit them. They were all people A-Xiang knew. Her eyes opened wide. She was about to step forward when someone next to her held her back. It was Uncle Salted Fish, who usually liked to buy Gold Basin lottery tickets along with her grandfather.

Uncle Salted Fish had eyes many times larger than an ordinary person's, staring so hard they nearly came out of their sockets. He pulled A-Xiang aside and quietly said, "Don't go over there!"

A-Xiang said, "What's going on? Why are they arresting people?"

"They're saying those people bringing a grievance outside the south city gate are traitors, vilifying the court. They're going through the factories one by one to investigate... Hey, didn't you also go with them?"

A-Xiang was a half-grown child. All her ferocity was in her words. Hearing this, her heart began to beat wildly, slam-slam, her hands even colder than the pot of ice.

Just then, she saw two soldiers pulling someone out of the factory.

It was her grandpa!

The old man was sick. Held between two strapping soldiers, his feet dragged limply along the ground. He looked like a dying old dog.

Uncle Salted Fish had seen, too. He kept muttering, “Oh no, what a mess! What a mess! ...Hey, where are you going?”

A-Xiang, about to rush over, was dragged back by Uncle Salted Fish. “My grandpa! My grandpa didn’t go, he’s being wrongly accused!”

“The soldiers don’t care whether the people they arrest are wrongly accused, better shut up and behave!” Uncle Salted Fish grabbed the girl. “Or else they’ll take you along with him!”

Seeing another team of officers heading their way, Uncle Salted Fish was alarmed. Brooking no argument, he hid himself and A-Xiang inside a haystack.

The city guard soldiers' boots trampled over the muddy ground of the southern outskirts's factory district.

Shooting stars fell like rain.

“My lord.” A bailiff ran up in front of the capital overseer, wiped sweat from his forehead, and reported, “In the rabble-rousing outside the south city gate, over sixty of the disorderly individuals spreading the ‘man-eating Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon’ rumor have been arrested and are waiting to be tried, you...”

“Who are they waiting for? Go try them!” The capital overseer raised his eyelids irritably. “Who instigated them to vilify the court?! If they don’t tell you, beat them to death! The emperor issued an order in court today, requesting that we find the instigator behind this! If we don’t hand the instigator’s head over today, it’ll be our own heads we hand over tomorrow. Hurry up!”

The bailiff took to his heels and ran, startling an old crow into flight.

The inauspicious crow cawed, crying or laughing, and flew toward the west of the Lingyang River.

The black cat at Prince Zhuang Manor stared unblinking at the bird flying by, wiggling its butt excitedly as if about to pounce. Then the scruff of its neck was squeezed midway by an ice cold hand.

“Keep an eye on it, don’t let it put wild animals in its mouth. They’re filthy.” Prince Zhuang stuffed the cat into Bai Ling’s arms and sighed, half genuinely. “Hiring people to bring grievances outside the south city gate, this Lord Sun... Well, ready the carriage, I’ll go to the palace to intercede with the Crown Prince—oh, yes, has there been a letter on the proximal today?”

Bai Ling responded, “Not yet.”

“He agreed to report that he was safe and sound every day, and he’s only been gone a few days when he forgets his duty.” Prince Zhuang called servants to help him change into court dress. “Ungrateful scoundrel.”

Xi Ping the ungrateful scoundrel arrived back at the Qiu courtyard just as the gate was about to lock.

When he came into his room, he put the unconscious half-puppet aside. Then, holding onto hope, he searched through the nooks and crannies to see whether there were any “surviving” spiritual stones.

The upshot was that, never mind spiritual stones, this lousy half-puppet hadn't even left him a single grain of "spiritual sand."

After working hard to no avail, Xi Ping hated the half-puppet even more.

But when he had rolled up his sleeves and was about to take it up with the half-puppet, he found that in so short a time, the half-puppet had already grown a palm's breadth. The little jacket and little pants had become too small.

Because he was growing too quickly, something cracked in the half-puppet's body, whether bones or Moon Plated Gold. His legs twitched constantly.

Xi Ping carefully reached out to feel. Through the clothes, he could feel something chugging away inside the half-puppet's body like a steam engine at high speed, as if about to blow up at any moment.

Fine. Never mind beating him up, he didn't even dare to touch him now.

"If he really does blow up," Xi Ping suddenly thought, "then won't my box of spiritual stones have gone to waste?"

He thought it over. Then, grimacing, he pricked his finger and stingily squeezed out a drop of blood to rub on the dragon-taming chain. The drop of blood was quickly absorbed, and Xi Ping once again had that unusual sensation, as though he had grown a tail. Only then did he uneasily wash up and go to sleep.

He was keeping an eye out to “watch” so in case something went wrong with his “tail” in the middle of the night, he would know in time.

When the dragon-taming chain absorbed its master’s blood, the ice cold foil seemed to warm and encircle the half-puppet’s neck, neither loose nor tight.

Xi Ping put out the light. In the dark, the half-puppet opened his bloodshot eyes and moved them with difficulty, looking in the direction of the bedroom.

It was only his body that couldn’t move; actually, he had been conscious the whole time.

From the beginning of the half-puppet’s blurry memories, he had always been a half-human monster. His original master had never fed him spiritual stones, only ground up three grains of green ore a month, dissolved it in water, and given it to him to drink, so he narrowly scraped by. So he didn’t grow taller or more intelligent. He was ignorant and bewildered, with nothing in his head but hunger.

It was this that made his spiritual sense unusually acute, so he could locate places where spiritual energy was abundant for his master, acting as a “spiritual energy hound.”

Once, his master had gotten drunk and hadn't properly put away the two liang of jade stamps in his wallet. The half-puppet, emboldened by hunger, truly hadn't been able to resist; he had gobbled up the two liang of jade stamps.

His master had flown into a rage on waking, cut off his spiritual pathways on the spot, broke apart the arrays on his bones, sliced open his belly, and removed the two green stamp stones. A cold blade cut through his skin, and two rough hands searched through his organs.

In order to make him “remember,” his master had left him lying there with his scant flesh and bones, exposed to the sun for three sweltering summer days... He was a monster who couldn't even die under those circumstances; so why could he feel pain the same as flesh and blood?

Fortunately, the half-puppet's intellect was incomplete; he couldn't even go mad.

Since then, he had indeed remembered. When he saw the color of jade stamp green, he felt as though he were being torn apart. Even the spring colors of Jiangnan made him fearful.

Humans and animals alike became too bold to fear death when they were starving. His original master had given him a forceful “warning” against jade stamps, but he hadn’t taught him to fear blue jade.

Faced with a whole unlocked box of blue jade, the half-puppet hadn’t been able to resist making the same old mistake.

When Xi Ping had carried him to Chengjing Hall, the half-puppet, with his intellect that was no better than a cat’s or dog’s, understood that he had gotten himself into serious trouble. He was probably a goner this time.

Luckily, he didn’t understand what regret was.

He had lived only to eat. Now that he had eaten his fill, it was all right if he was torn to pieces.

But...why hadn’t he been torn to pieces?

The abundant spiritual energy in the blue jade scoured the half-puppet's long-stalled body. All of his rough and slipshod arrays were nourished. The half-puppet's body and intellect, like bamboo shoots welcoming spring rain, grew quickly. As his body grew taller as if breaking through a cocoon, many unclear things in his mind also suddenly became clear, so that when the half-puppet had the strength to open his eyes, he had worked out the whole story—someone had given up a hundred liang of blue jade to preserve his worthless, filthy life.

His radically changing flesh and bones tore apart bit by bit, then tore again before they could mend... This was a pain worse than death.

The half-puppet shook all over, bit another segment off his deformed tongue. His mouth filled with blood.

He was no longer aware of anything, only desperately struggling to live: his life belonged to that person.

When the final shooting star fell, the starry sky once again became silent. On this night, the land of dreams was desolate; there were people everywhere who couldn't sleep all night.

Outside of Jinping's south city gate, A-Xiang burst into her home. Uncle Salted Fish had said he was going to pull in connections for her, see whether they could bribe a couple of city guards and get her grandfather released. A-Xiang's grandpa had been sick for days and hadn't been out of the house. The factory's barefoot doctor could give evidence. She was the one they should have arrested.

But the problem was, what would they use for a bribe?

A-Xiang turned the little shack she and her grandfather lived in upside down. Apart from a string of coins barely sufficient for grandfather and granddaughter to eat mixed grain bread for half a month, there was only a pile of expired Golden Tray lottery tickets. There were gold and silver, jewels and pearls, auspicious clouds and colorful phoenixes garishly drawn on the waste paper tickets. There were thirty-one of them, each one a broken dream.

Her grandfather had piled the Golden Tray lottery tickets into paper ingots and placed them on the simple incense altar. There was no divine image on the tablet; it was only an empty protection amulet. This was supposed to be the amulet of Grand Duke Tai Sui. Her grandfather couldn't clearly explain what the grand duke's history was. He had picked this thing up somewhere and joined others in worshipping it. Every time, before he bought a Golden Tray lottery ticket, he would piously come pay his respects. But perhaps Grand Duke Tai Sui didn't do double duty as a god of wealth. It hadn't worked even once.

A-Xiang had exhausted her strength and come to the end of the road. By a mysterious coincidence, she also put together a paper ingot for Grand Duke Tai Sui and, willing to try anything in a crisis, prayed to the amulet.

It was too hot, and A-Xiang was overheated. When she lowered her head, her nose began to drip blood. As A-Xiang rushed to wipe blood off the “amulet,” she babbled, “Save my grandpa, Lord Tai Sui, I beg you, save my grandpa. If only you can save my grandpa, I’ll give you my life...”

The amulet was made of some special wood. As if it were cotton, it greedily sucked up every drop of blood between her fingers.

Pang Jian strode into Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s head office and directly asked a subordinate, “What’s going on with those evil cultivators’ wooden amulets?”

“Commander, look.” The blue-clotheser took out one of the reincarnation wood amulets they had seized from the evil cultivators. The ghastly pale wooden amulet was mottled with bloodstains, as if someone had awakened the evil spirit of the amulet. “When there was that meteor shower to the south earlier, it suddenly became like this.”

A freight steamship thundered as it left the dock, raising huge, foul waves that rolled over a fly looking for food by the canal.

The beam of a lighthouse went by and fell on the bright green surface of the water. It swept over the struggling and dying little insect and pierced the thin mist.

In the Latent Cultivation Temple, Xi Ping frowned as he rolled over, sleeping uneasily. His ears were full of crying and murmuring voices.

Someone was begging him to save some “grandpa,” someone was wailing, someone was shrieking miserably...

Amid the noise, he seemed to “dream” that in the next room, the half-puppet woke up, opened his eyes and stood, then went into his bedroom.

How annoying. Xi Ping covered his head with the quilt.

The half-puppet silently entered Xi Ping’s room and saw that he had been practicing some martial art in his sleep; he had uncovered his whole body and rolled up his quilt from the chest up, as if he had reached a dead end and wanted to hang himself with the brocade quilt.

The half-puppet squatted beside the bed for a while watching Xi Ping, then carefully reached out, wanting to dig him out of the quilt.

Suddenly, the half-puppet gave a start and took a big step back, his skinny back bending.

Xi Ping, who had been sleeping like a dead dog, had sat bolt upright in bed like a risen corpse!

He slowly unwrapped the brocade quilt wound around his neck. His eyes were as clear as if he hadn't been sleeping at all. He looked right at the half-puppet, then smiled strangely.

The hairs stood up on the back of the half-puppet's neck.

“Xi Ping” slowly twisted his neck, straightened his clothes and sleep-rumpled hair, then raised his hands in front of him and lovingly stroked and examined them. He sighed with deep feeling. “Truly the hands of someone raised in comfort and plenty.”

This was indeed Xi Ping's voice, but the pronunciation was completely different from his usual speech, so it made him sound like a different person. In the deep voice, there was a faint Ning'an accent!

“Xi Ping” stood up and walked a few steps. He extended a hand, and the half-puppet, as if strung up by invisible cords, hung in mid air, coming level with his line of sight.

“Little thing.” “Xi Ping” examined him for a moment, then laughed. “You’ve never had a chance to be a man. Don’t pick up a man’s habit of getting up to tricks, huh? You know what to say and what not to say?”

The half-puppet opened his mouth and displayed his deformed teeth and throat.

“I see, you can’t speak. That’s great.” “Xi Ping”’s cold finger passed downward over the half-puppets lips. The half-puppet gave a fierce start—this finger passed precisely over the places where arrays were carved on his body, sharper than the knife that had once cut open his belly, and colder.

“Talkative puppets get chopped into firewood, shoved in the stove, and burned up.” “Xi Ping” put a finger to his lips. “Shh—”

Then he snapped his fingers, and the puppet, as if he had been given a heavy shove, staggered back into the study.

“Xi Ping” turned and went into the small courtyard behind the rooms, waved a hand to set up a prohibition, then sat cross-legged under an osmanthus tree.

Pale moonlight reflected off the clouds and swept over the ground. It passed through the prohibition that was invisible to the naked eye and fell on “Xi Ping,” casting his shadow.

This shadow didn’t have a human shape. It was a pitch-black dragon.

CHAPTER 19 - The Dragon Bites Its Tail (7)

At the beginning of yin hour, before first light, a lantern went on in the Qiu courtyard. Yao Qi got up in humiliation.

Because he hadn't been able to exit the spiritual sense mustard seed, he had to go to morning class a shichen in advance. As soon as he left his rooms, the mountain wind slammed the door shut behind him, and dew flew in his face, as if branding the word "stupid" onto it.

Yao Qi raised his sleeve and wiped the water off his face. The rims of his eyes were bright red.

Xi Ping, who normally couldn't be woken unless he was struck by lightning, was startled by the sound of the door closing.

He sat up in bewilderment, narrowed his eyes and looked out the window, watched Yao Ziming go out holding up the lantern, then confusedly stared at his hands for ages—he must have slept in a bad position; his fingers kept shaking.

As he stared blankly, he happened to look up and saw a human figure appear at his bedside.

Xi Ping was caught unawares and nearly bit his tongue—the half-puppet who had eaten a whole box of blue jade had shot up about two chi overnight. He looked like a teenager.

His little round face had changed shape. As if his scant human skin was insufficient, it was stuck tightly to his bones, so pale it was ashen. The little jacket and little pants no longer met, and his shoulders had torn the seams. He silently stared back at Xi Ping; it was unclear whether he was demanding a life or repayment.

“You fucking...” Xi Ping recovered and couldn’t resist swearing. “If you scare me to death, there won’t be any more spiritual stones for you to snatch!”

As if feeling his own inferiority, the half-puppet retreated into the shadows.

Xi Ping stared at this countenance that had taken years off his lifespan, spent a long time getting accustomed to it, then at last crossly said, “Come here, get to work—first put away my quilt.”

The half-puppet went over obediently and put away the bedding.

It seemed that not only his body had grown up, but his intellect, too. Having digested several thousand liang of gold, he at last knew what he was supposed to be doing.

Suddenly, a breath came out of the half-puppet's throat. He picked a fresh leaf out of Xi Ping's bedding.

Xi Ping's pupils contracted almost imperceptibly.

The half-puppet pinched the leaf, his expression changing several times. At last he seemed to come to a decision. He turned and, as though going to a martyr's death, raised the leaf in front of Xi Ping's face.

But before he could raise his hand and gesture, the fickle young master kicked up a fuss out of nowhere. He burst out: "Where do you think the leaf came from? It's because of you, you little money-waster, making me run up the mountain in the middle of the night!"

The half-puppet was stunned by his blustery temper.

"Anyway, you owe me a hundred liang of blue jade!" Xi Ping said impatiently. "If you can't pay it all back, you'll have to work for me."

The half-puppet quickly reached out to grab him.

Wait, listen to me, you've been...

“Move, get out of my way!” Xi Ping angrily pushed him away. “I don’t understand your flapping. How can a mute have so much to say?”

Impatient “ha”s came out of the half-puppet’s throat.

Xi Ping’s scarce patience was exhausted. He pinched the dragon-taming chain on the half-puppet’s neck.

The teenager’s throat was instantly clutched by the dragon-taming chain. His limbs locked up. He couldn’t move a muscle.

Xi Ping said coldly, “I said move. Don’t bother me.”

Silver light flashed on the dragon-taming chain, then burrowed into the half-puppet’s neck.

“Go pick up the clothes and shoes I took off last night.”

The half-puppet was pulled by the dragon-taming chain. He mechanically picked up the brocade robe and boots Xi Ping had tossed aside.

Xi Ping glanced at him haughtily, then instructed him: “I don’t want the clothes anymore. Wash them and put them on yourself. Take off those grave clothes, don't go out and humiliate me.”

Then, the willful young master yawned and ignored the half-puppet. He strolled to the study, stretched, got out the white jade proximal, and started to write to his grandmother to report after the fact that he had been well yesterday.

When he had written a few words, he suddenly remembered something. He looked up. The half-puppet, already forced to the bedroom door, stopped in accordance with his thoughts.

“Oh, right, what's your name?” Xi Ping seemed to be asking casually. Without waiting for an answer, he despotically made his own decision. “Forget it, a name chosen by an evil cultivator won't be auspicious. Since you're my house slave, your surname can be Xi from now on... Oh, your name can be Xi Yue.”

When the white jade proximal lit up, Prince Zhuang had just returned to his manor—he had spent half the night kneeling at the palace and was carried home on a guard's back.

A page boy came up to bring him hot tea and pastries. He only picked up the cup and moistened his lips, then pushed the pastries aside without touching them.

Bai Ling appeared out of nowhere. He took out a small medicine bottle, emptied a pill onto a snow-white brocade handkerchief, and offered it to him.

A faint, refreshing scent came from the mouth of the bottle. It floated out the window, and a haitang tree at the window that had just put out buds sorrowfully flowered.

Prince Zhuang didn't look well, but he seemed to be in a good mood. Smiling, he shook his head and said, "Spring Sunshine Pills are rare, keep it to use for yourself. This thing won't make up for what's wrong with me... There's a letter on the proximal, bring it to me so I can read."

Bai Ling held out the pill, not moving a muscle, his expression grim.

There was nothing Prince Zhuang could do. He had to take the pill and put it in his mouth. "Tsk, a paper man like you, why do you have the personality of a rock?"

The mutual affection between His Majesty and the Crown Prince was such that it would take more than one or two conflicting political views to whittle it away entirely—when the heads of the Zhang family had rolled, it still hadn't spread to the Crown Prince's Eastern Palace. If he went to intercede on someone's behalf, full of affection and concern, His Majesty could use it as a step to come down.

Only if matters were forced to a new stage could the crack remain on the surface.

Anger and hatred were just like mutual affection; they had to be accumulated. There was no way to accomplish everything in one stroke. It had to be just enough at a time.

Also, His Majesty liked to see him having "profound sentiments."

Bai Ling said, stiffly, "I am only a paper man. I don't understand the ways of the world. But in the future, if Your Highness plans to injure himself to gain an enemy's confidence again, I would like to be notified, so as not to end up at loose ends and unable to find any elixirs."

Prince Zhuang pointed at him as if tolerating the black cat throwing a tantrum. He made to get up. "Never mind, I'll get it myself."

Only then did Bai Ling silently turn, pick up the white jade proximal, and bring it in front of him.

“God, why so long again?” Prince Zhuang scanned it briefly. He saw that on the proximal was another round of self-praise. Xi Ping had already been talking about his “first-class spiritual sense and unsurpassed natural gifts” for several days in different styles. The reams of pointless nonsense made Prince Zhuang’s eyes hurt. “Fine, take it away, clearly there’s nothing serious... wait.”

His gaze came to a halt on a corner of the proximal. He saw Xi Ping write, winding up: “The little half-human page Commander Pang gave me is ugly, can’t speak or write, and is very clumsy, nowhere near as good as Haozhong. But in the Latent Cultivation Temple, I have to make do with him, so I’ve named him Xi Yue, in the hope that he can pick up some wits.”

Prince Zhuang’s somewhat pallid fingers stroked the writing on the proximal. “Xi Yue...”

If he remembered right, Xi Ping had originally had a brother younger than him by three years. When he had been nearly a year old, he hadn’t held out. When the child had died young, a name had already been chosen for him. His name had been Xi Yue.

Why would he give the half-puppet this name for no reason?

Weren’t all his servants named after instruments?

Was it...that he missed home?

Prince Zhuang frowned—no, that couldn't be it. This cousin of his acted like he was a horse slipping its reins when he went traveling. If the Marquis of Yongning didn't cut off his allowance, he couldn't get that wild ass back to be tied up. He didn't have any tender feelings like missing home.

The brat had always only reported the good and not the bad. No matter how much trouble he had gotten himself into, he would come back and act like nothing was the matter. He wouldn't say a thing unless he had no way out. Something must have happened.

Prince Zhuang muttered to himself silently for a moment. "Didn't Princess Xincheng recently go to stay at Southern Sage Temple for a few days?"

"Yes," said Bai Ling, "she's on the outs with her husband."

"Go write a calling card," Prince Zhuang said. "I'm going to the Southern Sage Temple to pray for blessings...to request the peace and safety of the country and harmony between my father and brother. On the way I'll pay my respects to my aunt."

In the Latent Cultivation Temple, apart from Yao Qi and the others who had been unlucky enough not to pass the spiritual sense mustard seed, the others didn't have to go first thing in the morning to the Qiankun Tower to suffer—Elder Su had freed up some time to take them around to get familiar with the surroundings and to lecture on the sect rules.

The whole way there, Xi Ping listened to Chang Jun filling his ears with gossip; in this way, he learned that this kindly-looking old man was actually a remarkable figure.

“Elder Su was the previous General Commander of Heaven's Design Pavilion. He's experienced six reigns. He only went into retirement because he grew old. When the Lancang traitors surrounded Jinping and Heaven's Design Pavilion's elite were all thinking up ways to break out of the encirclement and get word to the sect, he was just starting out. He stayed back to guard the city with General Zhi, and they're close friends to this day. I hear that his spiritual bones are already complete... That means that he's in the consummate open-eyed stage, only a step away from an established foundation.”

Xi Ping, perhaps because he had woken up so early and wasn't very alert, was absent-minded. He didn't even listen very closely to what Chang Jun was saying. He casually returned, “So why doesn't he establish it?”

A voice behind him said, laughing, “You think you can establish a foundation just like that? For an established foundation, you first have to enter the inner sect.”

All the disciples hurried to step forward and salute. “Elder Su.”

Su Zhun wore a straw hat and held a bamboo cane, looking like an unprepossessing woodcutter.

He slowly walked up the stone steps. “An established foundation isn’t something that happens as naturally as water forming a channel. Sweeping your meridians and cleansing your marrow to complete your spiritual bones is only the requirement a human body needs to reach to establish a foundation. Apart from the spiritual bones, you must also find your ‘Way of the Heart.’ Me, though, I have no idea where to go looking for my Way of the Heart. I can’t enter the inner sect, so I suppose I’ll steep in the dust of the mortal world until I die a natural death.”

Zhou Xi followed up: “Elder, it must very hard to attain a Way of the Heart, right?”

“Naturally,” Su Zhun said, smiling. “Look at all living things. How many people spend every day with their heads down, struggling to survive? Those who know what they’re struggling toward and why they’re alive are few and far between. They may not know what they're about from the beginning to the end of one year, so how are they going to find a Way of the Heart to last thousands of years from start to finish?"

Another disciple asked, "So, Elder, can you establish a foundation as long as you find a 'Way of the Heart'?"

Su Zhun shook his head. "You have to proceed according to the rules. An outer sect disciple isn't permitted to establish a foundation. First you need to have a reception order personally signed by the one of the ascended spirit peak masters to reach the status of inner sect disciple, register under the name of the peak master who issued the reception order, have the peak master assign you a 'Hall of the Way' on the immortal mountain... Look, we've reached the Yanhai Building. The Yanhai Building is the Latent Cultivation Temple's library. When you have free time, you can come here to borrow ancient texts—though the valuable single extant copies have spells on them, so you can only read them inside the Yanhai Building. If you want to take them with you, you have to copy them out by hand."

Xi Ping had absolutely no interest in the towering Yanhai Building. He took a casual glance, then looked away and asked Su Zhun, "Elder, do you have to be on the immortal mountain to establish a foundation? What about the evil cultivators outside, how do they establish one?"

His question was like a thunderclap. The disciples, all whispering to each other, suddenly became quiet. Asking in front of the elder in charge of the discipline hall how evil cultivators established a foundation—this Xi Shiyong really knew just what to say. On average, he offended an immortal three times a day.

Su Zhun was silent for a moment. He looked at him. “You’re asking me... about evil cultivators?”

Everyone was waiting for the kindly Elder Su to explode, but instead he raised his bamboo cane and pointed to a passing straw child. “Record this—Xi Shiyong, add a spiritual stone point for this month.”

Xi Ping: “...”

Add a what now?

“Your monthly allowance is three blues jades, distributed on the last day of each month. If you collect ten spiritual stone points, you can go to Chengjing Hall and add them up for an extra blue jade spiritual stone. But if you get points taken away, then your monthly allowance will be deducted.”

Su Zhun leaned on his bamboo stick and continued his leisurely walk forward. “I gave him a spiritual stone point because he raised a good question. I know you’re all avoiding mentioning ‘evil cultivators’ like a taboo. In the mortal world, if someone has bad luck several days in a row, they say they’ve ‘picked up evil energy,’ touched something belonging to an evil cultivator. When a contagious disease spreads, people say it’s ‘an evil wind entering the body,’ and there must have been an evil cultivator passing by who let out a poison fart upwind. But if you don’t have a thorough understanding of ‘evil,’ how will you know what is ‘just’? Just because you don’t breathe a word and keep your mouths clean, it won’t mean the evil cultivators don’t exist.”

Zhou Xi was the first to bow his head and frown. “I have received instruction.”

“No need to be reserved, Your Highness.” Su Zhun waved a hand. “The reason that the sect wants disciples to enter the inner sect to establish a foundation is that Xuanyin Mountain is nourished by a spiritual stone mine. The ‘Halls of the Way’ given to disciples to use to establish a foundation have walls full of spiritual stones. Inside, you can draw in the purest spiritual energy to ensure your spirit remains clear and unpolluted. Evil cultivators are different from us. You know what the market prices for spiritual stones are outside. Without the support of a sect, an ordinary evil cultivator certainly can't afford them, so they often steal the world's spiritual energy to use for themselves.”

“Elder, what is the world's spiritual energy?”

“Flowers blooming, trees growing, all living things multiplying without end, all of it depends on the world's spiritual energy,” Su Zhun said patiently. “An open-eyed cultivator can only take in spiritual energy and use it temporarily. The spiritual energy won't stay inside their body long and will return to the world. But established foundation cultivators and onward are different. An established foundation cultivator already has a spiritual body. If they want to raise their cultivation, they must transmute the spiritual energy for their own use, keep the spiritual energy within their body. To give an example, suppose an early stage established foundation cultivator enters seclusion in the mortal world and doesn't leave for ten years. Within a radius of ten or more li from them, the earth will be barren, the people living there will be plagued with disasters and illnesses, and if there unfortunately happens to be a pregnant woman in the area, the child will either be stillborn or deformed. This is called ‘pilfering heaven's order.’ Our so-called ‘evil cultivators’ aren't called so for their deeds. They're cultivators who live by pilfering heaven's order.”

All the disciples frequently talked about “evil cultivators,” but this was their first time hearing what an “evil cultivator” actually was.

Xi Ping thought, I see, it turns out that established foundation cultivators are magic beasts that eat without shitting.

Zhou Xi blurted out, “Isn’t that bringing calamity on the people and the nation?”

Chang Jun suddenly saw the light: “No wonder Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s walkers in the mortal world can only be open-eyed cultivators!”

“Of course. Did you think that this enormous Xuanyin Sect couldn’t come up with a few powerful figures of the established foundation stage and over?” Su Zhun said, smiling. “In the past, in order to end the great chaos, Kunlun to the north, Lancang to the south, Lingyun to the west, Xuanyin to the east, and Sanyue in the center, the five great sects, came together to establish a rule for immortal sects: cultivation is a temporary resting place, but the just path values the world over all and won’t pilfer heaven’s order for its own private use. Luckily, heaven has left us a means by bestowing on us spiritual stones from the ancient past. These things have pure spiritual energy. They save time in cultivation, and they don’t harm living beings. We cultivators of the just path can only use the spiritual energy in spiritual stones. In the open-eyed stage it’s all right, but if an established foundation cultivator or above wants to leave the mountain, they must first report their plans to the sect and take their own spiritual stones when they leave.

Though they can take along a great quantity of spiritual stones in a mustard seed, it's still suspect and unsuitable to stay too long in the mortal world, so walkers in the mortal world are all open-eyed half-immortals.”

Xi Ping's focus was always different from that of others. “But then, if they encounter an established foundation or ascended spirit evil cultivator and get into a fight, won't Heaven's Design Pavilion get the worst of it?”

“There aren't so many established foundation evil cultivators. Ways of the Heart are already rare. The vast majority of people, even if they grow up in the mountains among spiritual stone mines, will only get as far as the open-eyed stage. If they're lucky and forge a Way of the Heart, then cultivate by means of pilfering heaven's order, there will be a great quantity of impurities and turbid matter remaining in their bodies. Those who can cross the barrier of the established foundation are rare. Even if your will is stauncher than the average person's, at most you'll reach the middle established foundation stage before becoming obsessed with distracting thoughts and throwing your mind into chaos.”

Xi Ping, having heard this much, began to feel doubtful: since established foundation cultivators were so rare, then didn't that mean that the vast majority of “evil cultivators” in the world were actually only half-immortals?

Since half-immortals couldn't keep hold of spiritual energy, then of course they also couldn't harm the environment.

Even Xuanyin Mountain's outer sect half-immortals could walk through the mortal world as they pleased, so why did half-immortal evil cultivators have to be wiped out? Couldn't you wait until they had established a foundation and lived up to their crime to kill them? If you were worried they would harm heaven's order, why not offer them amnesty in the immortal sect and lead them onto the just path?

Also...if most of them reached the middle established foundation stage and lost their minds, then what was going on with the ascended spirit "Tai Sui"?

Before he could ask, Elder Su had already begun enumerating the forty-eight sect rules of Xuanyin.

A pile of "do not"s poured into Xi Ping's left ear, and a bucket of "must"s seeped into his right ear. In sum, it was this: hard work and plain living, surviving off grass, studying hard night and day, and no fun!

Having heard this, he felt that his limbs were hollow; there was nothing left to live for.

After Elder Su finished reciting the sect rules in one breath, he exhaled gently, as if exhaling ten years of pent up frustration. A holy light shone in the old man's smile; deeply satisfied, he took the black-faced disciples to visit the Latent Cultivation Temple's Songchuang Great Hall, Chengjing Hall, the discipline hall, and other such places. They roamed in a big circle. When the sun had begun to sink, Elder Su, despite still not having expressed himself to the full, at last let them go eat.

But Xi Ping, who had always been the most eager to eat, lingered for a while without leaving. When the others had scattered, he followed Elder Su into the Yanhai Building like a shadow.

Elder Su removed his straw hat, and Xi Ping attentively came over to brush off the moisture and fallen leaves and hang it up.

"Is there something else?" Su Zhun said, smiling. "I'm a stingy old man. I'll only give one spiritual stone point, no more. Why don't you go find someone else?"

"I didn't come to beg," Xi Ping said. "Elder, there's something I'm extremely curious about, and I wanted to ask you."

"Oh?"

Xi Ping said, “You said that all evil cultivators go mad after establishing a foundation, but before I came to the Latent Cultivation Temple, I met an evil cultivator who claimed he was in the late ascended spirit stage, a near-shed skin. So, what, was he just blowing hot air?”

Su Zhun knew at once whom he was asking about. “At a certain level, an evil cultivator becomes a calamity. The inner sect will certainly send someone very powerful to deal with them. For you, the right thing to do is to focus on cultivating and working toward opening your spiritual eyes while you’re at the Latent Cultivation Temple. That first hand experience is your good fortune. Don’t ask too many questions about it.”

Xi Ping wouldn’t let it go. He followed up, “But what if something slipped through the net?”

“There’s an abyss in the inner sect called the Sea of Stars that can glimpse the designs of heaven,” Su Zhun said, smiling. “Haven’t you heard the saying, ‘the net of heaven is wide, but nothing slips through’?”

“But, Elder Su, that’s wrong. How come ‘the net of heaven’ didn’t say anything even when Southern He was marching north?”

Su Zhun: “...”

Elder Su had built up great power and influence in Heaven's Design Pavilion. After many years, he was once again reliving the awkwardness of being struck dumb by a kid knocking over a pot. After choking for a while he at last tactfully said, "The Lancang Sword Sect...was one of the five great sects at the time. They weren't evil cultivators."

Xi Ping was sometimes unreasonable and deliberately misunderstood what others were saying, but he did understand the implications here.

When Elder Su said this, he got it at once—the great sects operated independently as friendly rivals, coexisting in harmony. Of course the "net of heaven" wouldn't catch one for the other, because they were all "heaven."

Evil cultivators relied on pilfering heaven's order to cultivate, and each one had to be put to death; why would they harm others without benefiting themselves in this way? Because they had no spiritual stones.

The spiritual stones were all in the hands of "heaven."

"Using a cultivation method that harms the people and the nation" and "not part of a righteous sect" were in fact the same thing, but the former gave a little more courage to your convictions.

But this had always been the case. It was none of his business.

As soon as this thought arose, Xi Ping tossed it aside. He asked, “I don’t care about the rest, but...Elder, did that evil cultivator really die?”

“Naturally.” Elder Su pulled a slim volume from a small bookcase and gave it to him. “I’m not opposed to you understanding evil cultivators. If you wish to enter Heaven’s Design Pavilion in the future, it would be a good thing for you to read up.”

Then Elder Su patted him on the shoulder, took a book for himself, and left.

Xi Ping fixed his eyes on the book. There were three words written on the cover of the little volume: Evil Cultivator Record.

This was a product of Heaven’s Design Pavilion. It contained text and illustrations, describing the most heinous evildoers Heaven’s Design Pavilion had captured over the last five hundred years. Xi Ping scanned through it and saw that apart from a few open-eyed cultivators who had managed to preserve a human exterior, the others looked anything but human.

He even thought he had opened up some third-rate storybook about ghosts.

In the last five-hundred years, evil cultivators who had been able to reach the middle established foundation stage could be counted on one hand.

There were no ascended spirit cultivators among them.

According to what Elder Su had said, if that Tai Sui wasn't dead, the inner sect would certainly be able to detect him.

But...

The night before, Xi Ping had linked himself to the dragon-taming chain with blood, which amounted to leaving behind a bit of his awareness in the half-puppet. Then he had “dreamed” that the half-puppet had seen “him” stand up after going to sleep as if possessed and go into the rear court!

All the details in the “dream” had been too clear. He had been still scared witless when he woke up.

But what had confirmed for him that it hadn't been a dream had been the leaf that the half-puppet had found in his bed.

No matter what wretched things the half-puppet had done, Xi Ping had decided to forgive him—the little monster was really something. After being held by the neck and threatened, he still didn't care and wanted to warn him... He was just a little dim.

If the thing that had possessed him the night before was still around, wouldn't the two of them be done for?

So he had deliberately lost his temper a few times and interrupted the half-puppet, not daring to listen.

Calm down... He couldn't act out of the ordinary.

This was Xi Ping's repeated inward command to himself. He put Evil Cultivator Record back, then, seeming careless, flipped at random through a few other books, not one word in them making it into his eyes. He was considering using the dragon-taming chain to "observe" himself again tonight.

If worse came to worst, he would tell the Latent Cultivation Temple's stewards and have them take him to see General Zhi.

But when he was about to leave the Yanhai Building, Xi Ping froze.

He couldn't even blink!

Xi Ping watched helplessly as "he" turned around and retrieved Evil Cultivator Record, brought it before his eyes, and opened it again.

Into his ears...no, inside his head, there spoke a soft voice that made his scalp go numb: “Don’t put it away. I wasn’t finished reading yet.

“You’ve found me out so soon. Sometimes luck really is against me.”

CHAPTER 20 - The Dragon Bites Its Tail (8)

Xi Ping went numb all over.

Just then, there were footsteps behind him. Someone called, “Shiyong, why haven’t you gone to the dining hall yet?”

The newcomer was one of the Latent Cultivation Temple’s stewards, Princess Xincheng’s son Yang Anli.

Yang Anli had just finished being pestered by His Fourth Highness, whom he didn’t know very well, saying “cousin” this and “cousin” that while asking him about the trick to opening your spiritual eyes.

But what kind of trick could there be for this? The publicly accepted method among immortal sects was precisely Luo Qingshi’s idiotic one—steep in a pile of spiritual stones every day training your spiritual sense. As long as you calmed your mind and worked hard enough, even if your natural endowments were a little limited, in a year or two you would still be able to “train” your spiritual eyes open. Apart from that, though there were all kinds of ways to open your spiritual eyes, in summary they all amounted to the words “by lucky chance.” There was no way to learn from others.

Yang Anli had just muddled through somehow, then turned his head and saw Xi Ping and remembered that he had just had word from his mother. Princess Xincheng had praised Prince Zhuang to the heavens, all “high notions of his duty,” “profound feelings and affections,” leaving Yang Anli all at sea, not knowing what kind of magic potion His Third Highness had been feeding his mother.

The Latent Cultivation Temple was nominally cut off from the world, but the stewards couldn't be out of touch with reality. They guarded the barrier between the mortal and immortal year round, each one keeping his attention fixed in all directions. Yang Anli had been watching the changes at court in recent years from the sidelines, and he thought that His Third Highness, laying low and biding his time, wasn't as profoundly affectionate and harmless as he seemed. As for whether he wanted to make friends with Prince Zhuang, he hadn't yet made up his mind. But there was no harm in establishing friendly relations with the Viscount of Yongning. So he called an amiable greeting: “The Latent Cultivation Temple is austere. How about it, are you adjusting to it?”

I absolutely am not! I've been possessed!

Xi Ping's heart strove to act in place of his mouth and jump out of his chest to cry for help; it beat so hard his ribs hurt.

But his face wouldn't be controlled. On its own, it produced a smile and answered in slightly painstaking Jinping formal language: "My thanks, shixiong. Hello, Your Fourth Highness. The immortal mountains' spiritual energy is dense, far better than the foul atmosphere of Jinping. How could I not adjust?"

Xi Ping, "spoken for," was beside himself with rage: I don't drawl like that even when I sing!

Zhou Xi returned the greeting with a false smile. He had just seen Xi Ping talking to Elder Su from afar and had thought, So this Xi Shiyong isn't arrogant and rude, he's just a master of treating people according to their positions: he sees that Luo Qingshi is indifferent to everything, so he deliberately enrages him to attract attention; Su Zhun is a veteran walker in the mortal world, so he suits himself to his fancy and follows the old thing around asking for stories about Heaven's Design Pavilion expelling evil.

Just the type to come from a poor and humble family, full of indecent schemes, of common stock with that Imperial Consort Xi.

"It's good that you've adjusted. His Third Highness was uneasy and asked me to look after you." Yang Anli was fifteen or sixteen years older than Xi Ping and his class, almost a generation apart in mortal terms. He had nothing to say to him. After briefly asking after Xi Ping's well-being, he picked up a few books and left with Zhou Xi.

Xi Ping would have loved nothing more than to kneel and clutch Yangshixiong's leg, but his body politely retreated a few steps to make way, and he stood by watching as the two of them left.

The Yanhai Building fell silent, and Xi Ping lost hope.

His memory for voices was perfect, especially given this person's particular Ning'an accent. No matter what, he sounded like that great demon Jiangli and the others had dug up out of the coffin.

But hadn't the great demon been cut up by Zhaoting?

Hadn't that unhelpful Elder Su just said "the net of heaven is wide, but nothing slips through"?!

Xi Ping's "traitor" hand lifted and stroked his face and chin, making Xi Ping break out in gooseflesh.

That voice sounded in his head again: "Good, there are no more outsiders now. We can chat."

Xi Ping didn't want to chat with him at all, and he started racking his brain to bring up all the Ning'an curse words he knew.

“If you call my name in your mind, you can talk to me. Do you still remember me, kid?” the voice said. “You may address me as... ‘Tai Sui.’”

Though he had been prepared, hearing these words, Xi Ping's heart thumped against his ribs: Xuanyin Mountain's unreliable heavenly net really had let something slip.

There was only one ke left before evening class. In the enormous Yanhai Building, there was no help anywhere. He had been trapped in his own body by a great demon who had somehow come back from the dead, and all he could still control was his heartbeat...and the hairs standing up on the back of his neck.

Xi Ping had to force himself to calm down.

No parents would name their child “Tai Sui.” This had to be a pseudonym. In that case, it didn't matter what form of address he used, it just had to be addressed directly to him to work.

This person wanted to be called “Tai Sui,” so he wouldn't call him that. Xi Ping thought: Who do you think you are? Aren't you worried you'll lose your tongue if you talk so big?

So he tried calling to him in his mind: “This...Exalted? Immortal? Senior Demon?”

“You little devil. You seem reckless, but you’re rather clever.” As expected, Tai Sui had “heard” him. Laughing, he said, “There’s no need for ‘Exalted’ or anything like that. Those are exclusive forms of address for the righteous sects. I don’t like them.”

Fine, then it’s “demon.”

Xi Ping addressed him accordingly: “Senior Demon, you honor me with your presence. Please don’t hesitate to give me any instructions you may have. My, what’s-it...my natural endowments are dull, I couldn’t open my spiritual eyes even if you drilled a hole in my skull, so there really isn’t much I can do, but I’ll certainly spare no pains to carry out your wishes.”

“Don’t be scared, child,” Tai Sui said kindly. “I don’t eat human hearts.”

“Then what would you like to eat?” Xi Ping said.

Tai Sui was entertained. “That day at the Blissful Village, I was wounded by Zhaoting and nearly destroyed... That couldn’t have been done without your contribution.”

Xi Ping’s words came quickly: “You flatter me! I didn’t even know I could enter the Latent Cultivation Temple then. As a mortal, what could I understand? I was purely following along after Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s people and making a fuss. Ancestors above, I had no ill intentions toward you. I won’t conceal from you, I’ve been turning it over in my mind recently, and I keep thinking I shouldn’t have jumped into the battle without regard for the circumstances. Is Heaven’s Design Pavilion necessarily made up of good people? That assistant commander of theirs isn’t a nice person at all! How fortunate that your ill luck has turned to good, and danger turned into an auspicious circumstance...”

The great demon interrupted his nonsense: “You want to find out why I didn’t die, right?”

Xi Ping didn’t even stumble. “Absolutely not. Do I need to find out? It must be because heaven has eyes.”

Eyes that let the net of heaven leak.

Tai Sui said, “By coincidence, I entered the Latent Cultivation Temple with you. Though the Latent Cultivation Temple is part of the outer sect, it is near Xuanyin Mountain, and there’s a foundation of spiritual stones in the valley. The spiritual energy is plentiful. They plotted against me, so I'm using their spiritual stones to restore my vitality. That isn't going too far, is it?"

"Perfectly reasonable," said Xi Ping.

"Don't worry, I won't keep following you. In a year, you'll either enter Xuanyin's inner sect or return to the mortal world. Xuanyin Mountain has been established for millennia. It has a few old devils who would be hard to deal with. I'm not about to go looking for trouble there without a reason. There's no benefit for me in the mortal world, so naturally I won't follow you there. You and I are limited to one year together. You behave, don't inquire about my history, and don't make a sound, and I won't seize your body for no reason. While I'm borrowing you to stay at the Latent Cultivation Temple, I won't only teach you to fear. Naturally I'll instruct you, make sure you open your spiritual eyes before all your classmates, how about that?"

Xi Ping said, "Then I've run into great luck. Senior Demon, if you can teach me a few moves so I can give Heaven's Design Pavilion's Pang a good beating, I'll burn incense for you every day."

Tai Sui laughed quietly, raised Xi Ping's hand, and put Evil Cultivator Record back into the bookcase.

“I’ll return your body to you. Clever children know when not to get up to little tricks, right?”

No sooner had he spoken than Xi Ping felt as though he had missed a step while dreaming and fallen from a great height into reality. He clenched his fists tightly and seemed to spasm all over.

The demon possessing him said, “Hurry up, take care not to be late for evening class.”

Xi Ping complied and exited the Yanhai Building, his expression normal. As he walked, he kept asking questions nonstop.

For example: “What level of cultivation does Pang Jian have?”, “How many odds and ends are there in that junk seller’s bag of tricks of his?”, “How long do I have to train before I can beat Pang Jian’s dog’s head in?”, and so on... If it is said that there are three thousand paths to entering the Way—the way of the sword, the way of medicine, the way of toolmaking—then perhaps in the future Xi Ping would enter the “way of beating up Pang Jian”—he was especially persistent about this.

Tai Sui didn’t like “clever people,” but he was quite tolerant toward idiots. He answered every question good-naturedly.

“Commander Pang is in the consummate open-eyed stage, his spiritual bones already complete. No one below an established foundation could match him.”

“Haha.”

Just as he had finished listening to Xi Ping’s “lofty aspirations” and couldn’t help laughing, Xi Ping came to the Qiankun Tower’s gate. Luo Qingshi came out to meet him.

In the blink of an eye, before the tail end of Xi Ping cursing Pang Jian had faded from his mind, he pulled the tinderbox out without warning and was about to throw it at Luo Qingshi.

Xi Ping’s line of thought was very clear: calling for help definitely wouldn’t work. If he called for help and people came, the great demon would take over his voice to smooth it over.

But attacking his shixiong was different. When Elder Su had been reciting the sect rules, he had said that the Latent Cultivation Temple prohibited fighting, and disrespect toward elders was a serious offense. If he made an unsuccessful attempt to light Tall Luo on fire with his tinderbox, that ridiculous crime would definitely qualify to get him taken to the discipline hall for a soul-searching.

Time to risk it all!

This was a great demon half a step from being an evil god; it had taken the genius General Zhi to control him. So what about a little ant like him? Ants could only survive by risking it all.

In both timing and movement, Xi Ping's action of lighting the tinderbox was absolutely what was least expected.

But before the tinderbox could leave the front of his clothes, he once again lost his body.

Xi Ping heard Tai Sui give a cold laugh. Next, acute pain that came from his bones and meridians wrapped up his whole body.

At a certain degree of bodily pain, the brain would become blank.

Reasonably speaking, under this kind of torture, a mortal body should have fainted already. But his stolen body had lost that function.

Xi Ping's hand gently put the tinderbox back and patted him on the chest. Then he straightened his sleeve and executed a faultless salute toward Immortal Luo with a smile on his face. "Hello, Luo-shixiong."

Luo Qingshi gave him a glance, passed by him, and didn't notice anything.

In the midst of torture, Xi Ping found a trace of clarity. "Senior, Jiangli... Miss...Miss Chen traded...her life for mine..."

Tai Sui narrowed his eyes slightly. The fierce fire burning Xi Ping suddenly receded.

Xi Ping's body relaxed, and cold sweat streamed from him. He nearly lost consciousness. The insistent burning pain still remained in the cracks of his bones.

Dazed, he allowed Tai Sui to move his legs and take him inside the Qiankun Tower. The noisy greetings around him, "himself" answering...and whatever Immortal Luo said—not a word of it made it into Xi Ping's ears.

Not until the straw child at the door banged the gong did Xi Ping give a start and come back to himself.

A delicate scent flooded the Qiankun Tower. Breathing it in, his body and mind eased. At last the burning pain Xi Ping felt eased slightly.

Tai Sui said almost gently, “Just a little punishment to prevent future great offenses. Do you know what you should do now?”

Xi Ping, like a small animal scared out of its wits by a sudden beating, didn’t make a sound. Then, his body gave a shake, and he regained control over it.

This time he kept his mouth tightly shut and didn’t dare to make any other attempts.

“I’m glad you understand,” Tai Sui said gently. “Now pay attention to your...’honorable’ shixiong’s instruction.”

There were all kinds of spiritual stones piled up on the platform, the glow lighting up the inside of the Qiankun Tower like midday. Outside were mixed bird calls; egrets, cranes, peacocks, and larks all gathered outside the Qiankun Tower. The long feathers of the immortal blue luan swept past, leaving behind a tiny rainbow.

Immortal Luo watched from on high, letting off a faint green glow as though about to sprout buds.

At a closer look, it turned out that he was sitting on a chair made of jade stamp stones.

“Ha,” Tai Sui laughed.

The cultivators of the mortal world could fight to the death over a few liang of jade stamp spiritual stones. Here, they were only low grade impure stones that no one liked using. A mere established foundation cultivator dared to sit right on top of them.

Perhaps Immortal Luo sensed the gaze full of hatred. He shuddered for no reason. He looked around in total incomprehension for a moment. Perhaps thinking the jade stamp chair was a little cold, he stood up.

Luo Qingshi cleared his throat and drawled, “To be able to come to the Latent Cultivation Temple, you presumably have some family resources. White spirits, blue jades, green stamps, you’ve seen them all, so I won’t waste words. Who knows what use spiritual stones have apart from powering your downgraded trash?”

Zhou Xi said, “After we cultivators open our spiritual eyes, we can take spiritual energy from spiritual stones to sweep our meridians and cleanse our marrow. After we reach the established foundation stage, we can convert the spiritual energy in the spiritual stones for our own use and avoid harming heaven's order.”

“No need to talk about what comes after establishing a foundation. You're far away from that,” Luo Qingshi said impatiently, eyelids drooping. “Some idiots here may have breathed in too much dust and have completely blocked senses, with no ability to distinguish spiritual from turbid. It would be an insult to the stones to give them to you. For the next few days, I want to give you all an airing out before Chengjing Hall issues your monthly allowance.”

At this point, he waved his sleeve, and a roll of white paper and a set of writing materials appeared in front of each disciple.

“There's a picture hidden on each paper, drawn with secret ink with spiritual stone fragments mixed in. Your ordinary mortal eyes can't see the brushstrokes. Today, I want you to follow the spiritual energy on the paper and copy out the hidden drawing with brush and ink. It doesn't matter what method you use... Where are you looking at? It's no use looking at others. The picture hidden on each paper is different. Finish drawing within two incense sticks. Whoever takes first place will have an extra blue jade for this month as a reward.”

All the disciples buzzed—in a whole day, Elder Su had only given two or three people a “spiritual stone point” as a reward, and here was Immortal Luo giving a whole blue jade away as a raffle prize!

Before the happiness could appear on their faces, Luo Qingshi raised his eyelids and said, sternly, “What are you so happy about? Anyone who can’t draw a thing within two incense sticks will have two blue jades deducted, to spare the spiritual stones from being polluted by idiocy! What are you all staring at me for? Is there a picture of my face? Pick up your brushes!”

The disciples didn’t dare to waste any more time. Each one quickly bent his head over a page. There were some who held the paper up to the light, some who lay on the table like rats and sniffed, and one who tried licking the paper to taste it.

Only Zhou Xi smoothed a hand over the paper—there was a grey ornamental ring on his right thumb, the style so old-fashioned it was almost shabby, with a slight protrusion. The thumb ring gently rubbed the surface of the paper. Zhou Xi muttered slightly to himself, calmly picked up his brush, and began to copy the drawing right away. Among the crowd of disciples wishing to stuff themselves into the papers, he seemed unusually composed.

Xi Ping seemed not to have recovered from the earlier torture. He was staring blankly at the paper in front of him with his head down. Suddenly he found a faint pattern appearing on the paper... The pattern became clearer and clearer, the whole drawing reaching his eyes.

Whether by coincidence or predestination, the paper that had been issued to Xi Ping had a drawing of a dragon on it.

Wait, hadn't Long-legged Luo just said that the naked eye couldn't see the drawings on these papers...?

“A mortal's weak spiritual sense is above the five senses. Because of me, you can already link your spiritual sense...which means concentrating your spiritual sense in your ordinary senses,” Tai Sui explained dully. “No need to be astonished.”

Xi Ping froze. So last time, when he had been able to hear the difference in his footsteps inside the spiritual sense mustard seed, it had also been because of this, and nothing to do with his outstanding natural endowments?

Just then, a grim childish voice sounded beside his table: “Are you staring so helplessly at the paper to read its fortune? Will that tell you what's drawn there?”

Xi Ping felt his muscles tense. It was the demon warning him. All he could do was pick up the brush without showing a trace of oddity and slowly copy out the picture.

When he was done drawing the lines, he found that the dragon on the paper had become even clearer. There was a picturesque alternation of light and shadow on it.

Xi Ping didn't know what it would be appropriate to draw, so he diluted his ink with water and also drew the varying shades. Before his last stroke had left the page, a hand reached over and yanked away his drawing.

At the same time, His Fourth Highness spoke in a solemn voice: "Shixiong, I've finished drawing."

No sooner had he spoken than Zhou Xi noticed the sketch in Luo Qingshi's hand. The zealous smile on his face instantly took on half a pot of cold water and cooled.

Luo Qingshi reached out a hand without so much as looking up. The paper in front of Zhou Xi also floated over beside his hand.

There was a beauty drawn on His Fourth Highness's paper. But Luo Qingshi only took a glance at the drawing, then casually tossed it aside.

Without any comment, he said to Xi Ping: “You, hold out your hand.”

Xi Ping’s heart rate galloped. He’d been found out!

The all-saving Luo-shixiong had found out there was something different about him!

CHAPTER 21 - The Dragon Bites Its Tail (9)

Tai Sui sneered quietly: “A mere established foundation.”

Xi Ping’s heart sank at once.

Luo Qingshi felt his pulse for ages, raised his eyes, then spoke slowly: “Xi Shiyong. Interesting.”

Xi Ping nearly strained his eyes staring at him, waiting for his next enlightening remark.

But after saying this, Hard-working Luo withdrew his hand, straightened up haughtily, nodded enigmatically...

And left.

Xi Ping: “...”

Wait, no... “Interesting,” and then what? What the hell was interesting?!

Xi Ping had originally thought that with Luo Qingshi’s physique already being so determinedly unusual, he had to have hidden depths. But it turned out that his “hidden depths” were just a pretense of mysticism.

And the only line he had to pretend with was the word “interesting.” It wasn’t even an ancient saying!

Totally oblivious to the gaffe he had committed in front of a disciple, Luo Qingshi mounted the platform and extended a hand. A clear and glistening blue jade rolled onto Xi Ping’s table.

The venerable old fellow proudly raised his sharp little chin. “That’s yours. May you open your spiritual eyes soon.”

With this extra blue jade, if he was careful using it, the white jade proximal could hold out until the end of the month when the spiritual stones were issued. If he had gotten it the day before, Xi Ping could have shown all his gums in a smile. But now, he was in absolutely no mood to think about a trifle like whether he had enough spiritual stones.

Face grim, Xi Ping woodenly thanked Immortal Luo as if he had just wished him an early death.

“If you’re finished drawing, you can leave.” Luo Qingshi sat on the jade stamp chair and accepted tea from a straw child. “What are you still doing here showing off?”

“Shixiong.” Zhou Xi couldn’t hold back. He asked, “I finished practically at the same time as Xi-xiong. Could you point out in what way my drawing is inferior to his?”

Luo Qingshi glanced at Zhou Xi out of the corner of his eye. “On your papers, the drawings were made with high, medium, and low grade spiritual stone powder, and there was some inferior material mixed in. I didn’t count on you, who haven’t opened your spiritual eyes, to use your mortal eyes to see all four layers and draw them. But with the Hundred-year Rhino Horn Ring guiding you, Your Fourth Highness, shouldn’t you be able to see more clearly than another?”

Zhou Xi’s expression changed slightly. He involuntarily pressed the ring on his thumb into the palm of his hand.

“Testing your spiritual sense is to determine what you came out of your mother’s womb with, so that you understand your own abilities. It isn’t so you can rush to demonstrate to me in the short term that my ‘average talent’ assessment was wrong,” Luo Qingshi said, not sparing his feelings. “Your Highness, even if I admit I was wrong ten times, will you be able to open your spiritual eyes on that account? If you could, I’d abandon my dignity and get on my knees to kowtow to you.”

His Fourth Highness was noble and refined, with a habit of putting on the “unposturing” posture of a high-ranked man’s respect for worthy men beneath him, and of course others all played along and acted as the “worthy men beneath him.” How could he ever have received this kind of treatment? For a time, his face went ghastly white.

Luo Qingshi wasn’t finished yet. “I advise some of you to concentrate more on your own cultivation. You can start forming cliques when you return from the Latent Cultivation Temple to the mortal world and join one of the outer sects. What’s the point of currying favor everywhere now? Perhaps someone else will rise straight to the inner sect. As mortal and immortal are separate, he’ll have no connection with you.”

Xi Ping: “...”

Because His Fourth Highness had stepped in on Xi Ping’s behalf on the first day, Luo Qingshi seemed to have his eyes fixed on them. He was always publicly inciting antagonism. If the Queen Mother of the Western Heavens had had his mouth, she would long ago have talked the Cowherd and the Weaver Girl into breaking up; would there be any need to have Qi Xi every year?

Zhou Xi was clever enough. Of course he knew that Luo Qingshi was doing it on purpose, but knowing was one thing. Could he fail to be incited? The road to entering the inner sect was a single-plank bridge. What His Fourth Highness saw as a done deal for himself, how could he allow others to cast covetous glances upon?

Never mind this Viscount of Yongning, who was nearly a “family scandal.”

As soon as Xi Ping met Zhou Xi’s eyes, he knew that the friendship between them had died young before it could have a chance to “grow to adulthood,” and the death had been tragic. For a time he simply felt mentally and physically exhausted—if only Mighty Luo could transfer some of his skill in sowing discord to his cultivation, he wouldn’t be so sloppy and incompetent as to only be able to say “interesting.”

It was Xi Ping’s first time becoming the object of envy and hatred. If he hadn’t had an “unspeakable problem,” he would have fanned his tail feathers in satisfaction...but as soon as he thought that the reason he could be envied and hated by His Fourth Highness just happened to be because this “unspeakable problem” had helped him cheat, he couldn’t manage a smile.

He ignored the verbal dispute between Luo Qingshi and Zhou Xi. He slowly put away his things and stood up. The pain of the fierce fire burning him still seemed to be in his veins. When Xi Ping remembered that torture, he felt lingering fear.

Then, just as he had come to the gate of the Qiankun Tower, stifled sobs came to his ears.

Xi Ping turned his head and looked, thinking, Is it that bad? Even I'm not crying.

He looked around without finding where the sobbing was coming from, but he heard intermittent prayers mixed in with the sobs, something like "beg your blessing"...

It seemed to be a girl's voice.

The voice wasn't coming from around him...it seemed to be coming from the space between his brows!

Xi Ping pressed a hand to the center of his brow, closed his eyes, and concentrated his scattered mind there. Some blurry images suddenly appeared before his eyes... Blackened walls, alleys pressed between crude shacks, ground littered with garbage and metal scraps, moss thriving and spreading in greasy dirt...

However you looked at it, it looked like Jinping's southern outskirts.

Xi Ping stopped in his tracks and concentrated all his focus on seeing that blurry image. As his mind focused, the image became considerably clearer.

He saw a teenage girl, taking turn after turn through the narrow alleys at lightning speed.

It was hard to say how old she was. She didn't seem short, but she was so skinny that she was a bundle of sticks holding up a head, with wispy childish hair on that head that made her look like a little girl. Though her appearance was shabby, there wasn't a stitch out of place on her female garb; apart from being a little ill-fitting, her clothes could be called respectable.

There was a wooden amulet hanging around the girl's neck. No matter how she ran, the amulet remained fixed in the center of the image. So with reference to the amulet, the people and the background shook fiercely.

The shaking made Xi Ping dizzy. When he opened his eyes, the filthy southern outskirts vanished, and he was still among the ethereal mountains.

“Senior.” Xi Ping hesitated a moment, then tried asking in a stiff but polite voice, “Excuse me, did you ‘see’ that?”

Tai Sui gave a “yes.”

Xi Ping asked, “Who is she? A real person?”

“A pitiful person who’s come to the end of the line,” Tai Sui said lightly.

“The reincarnation wood is my associated material. She spilled blood upon the reincarnation wood consecrated to my name, swore to offer up body and soul. That is why I awakened.”

Xi Ping: “...”

Damn it, so it was because of her!

To start with, hearing someone cry—especially hearing a young girl cry—he’d figured he had to ask. But hearing the demon say this, Xi Ping no longer had any thought of asking.

“Whatever, let her die if she likes,” Xi Ping thought, calmly kicking away a stone. “So young, and her mind has gone so far to the bad. There’s no remedy. She’d better hurry up and reincarnate again.”

But while he could open or close his eyes, could choose to look at the immortal mountain and ignore the mundane world, he couldn’t close his ears. The girl’s broken babbling lingered in them constantly.

Xi Ping returned from the Qiankun Tower to the Qiu courtyard. The whole way, he heard her rattling on, unbearably annoying. So he said irritably, “Senior, excuse me, aren’t you planning on tossing out some magic power to help her?”

Tai Sui asked in turn: “You have a state ceremony on the first day of every year, where the emperor goes in person to pray at Southern Sage Temple; has the Southern Sage ever tossed out some magic power?”

“If you don’t want to help, then why keep listening to her?”

“I wish to help, but I am unable to. You’ll have to put up with it,” Tai Sui said. “It was her blood that woke me. If she calls for help in her heart, I must listen whether I want to or not.”

Xi Ping spent a full ke internally raining curses upon this evil cultivator who had proclaimed himself “Grand Duke Tai Sui” and the silly girl who would believe anything. He cursed until he couldn’t remember any more words, and the noise in his ears still hadn’t stopped.

Xi Ping completely ran out of temper. What was this girl trying to do, release his soul from suffering by reciting scripture?

The noise disturbed him so much he couldn't get anything done. There was nothing he could do about it. He had to close his eyes, focus on the center of his brow, and see what the hell her problem was.

A-Xiang had braided her hair and changed to female clothes—this was her only decent dress, sewn by her mother stitch by stitch on her deathbed. She had said she wanted to leave it behind for her to wear when she was married.

But A-Xiang had grown for a long time without reaching the age where she could get married. The dress she couldn't fill out hung empty on her. She looked like a child who had sneakily put on a grown-up's clothing.

Her mind was full of fear. As if to build up her courage, she had hung the Tai Sui amulet on her chest and taken it with her. A-Xiang gripped the wooden amulet and hesitated in front of Rat Alley, trembling, inwardly praying for the god to bless and protect her over and over.

But bless and protect her in what way?

A-Xiang couldn't say it.

Rat Alley was a dim alley squeezed out by some irregular shacks, gloomy and damp. The light of day was kept out of the dim alley by the eaves of ramshackle buildings and the bed sheets drying on bamboo poles, making it look like a rathole from far away and giving it its name. Every evening, aged and sallow women in disheveled clothing dragged their seemingly cumbersome bodies in twos and threes out of the “hole” to solicit customers. The customers, meanwhile, were mostly workers who did heavy labor at the docks and in the factories. They looked no more respectable than the women.

Her grandfather had already been under arrest for one day. Uncle Salted Fish had said, if they wanted to get in with the city guard, it would take at least twenty liang of silver...and he couldn't guarantee they could get him out.

Twenty liang!

If she and her grandfather worked night and day, didn't eat or drink for three years, they still couldn't save that much. Where was she supposed to get it?

Carpenters took old furniture, pawn shops took valuables, and Rat Alley took women.

A-Xiang owned nothing but the bare necessities. She had come to the end of the road. All she could think of was Rat Alley.

A hand reached over and grabbed her by the shoulder. A-Xiang was startled and struggled like a frightened bird hearing a bowstring twang. She saw that the newcomer was a middle-aged man with protruding knuckles, slightly deformed, blind in one eye, but dressed in a rather respectable-looking robe—in the factories of the southern outskirts, only the foremen who didn't have to do hard labor themselves wore robes like this.

“I haven't seen you before, little sister.” As if appraising some object, he looked A-Xiang up and down. His gaze was like a clinging insect. “How much?”

Before, Xi Ping had felt that there was something strange here. Now he finally understood what kind of place this girl had gone to. Hearing her shakily name a price, he frowned. “She was begging the Grand Duke to bless and protect her in smoothly selling herself for twenty liang? Why twenty? That's too cheap.”

“Twenty? You?” Hearing her, the man at the mouth of Rat Alley was surprised. “Damn, are you a princess from Guangyun Palace, or the empress herself?”

A-Xiang couldn't speak. Her hands and feet were frozen, but her face seemed about to burst into flame. She wanted to throw up a little. Under the hem of her skirt, her knees trembled involuntarily.

“If you’re fresh, I’ll inspect the goods and give you a thousand copper coins. If not, then you’ll have to give me a discount.” The man touched her face. “How about it? If that works, come with me.”

A-Xiang instinctively pushed his hand away.

“There’s not a single woman in the southern outskirts worth one liang of silver. I’m willing to give you such a price because I’m taking pity on your youth. That’s as much as you’re getting, don’t try your luck... Twenty liang? The famous flowers by the Lingyang River can’t bring in that much. Are you worth it?” The man grumbled and swore and made a grab for A-Xiang as he spoke. “That’s settled, come on.”

Just then, a sharp voice came from the alley. “Hey, here’s something new. Where did this little wild chick come from? Your feathers haven’t even all grown in, and you already dare to come here and snatch my mealticket out from under my eyes.”

The middle-aged man quickly drew back his hand and put a smile on his face. “Chunying-jiejie.”

A lanky figure slowly strolled out of Rat Alley. This was a woman of advanced years. But the dark night and thick makeup covered the wrinkles and signs of dropsy in her face, leaving only a hazy image. She seemed like she could just about amount to having some good looks.

The woman spat out two melon seed skins and rolled her eyes. “Beat it, whoreson. Who’s your jiejie?”

The man insolently drew near, calling “jiejie,” and was slapped away by the woman. Next, a hand with nail polish on the nails softly grabbed the man by the collar and delicately let out a string of filthy language. Cursing and hitting, it pulled him into the alley.

Only then did the woman called “Chunying” give a cold laugh. Her clinging, clouded gaze fell on A-Xiang.

As if a snake had slithered into her clothes, A-Xiang involuntarily clutched the Tai Sui amulet even more tightly and took half a step back, but her buttocks were pinched by a skinny hand.

“The chicken’s behind isn’t even enough for a meal.” Pinching her was another woman, with wrinkles reaching down from her nose to the corners of her mouth. Her nose was slightly crooked. She looked like a ghost going out haunting.

The “ghost” saw her cry out in pain and laughed so hard her nose became level with her cheeks. She drew near to A-Xiang. “Go home and drink some milk. Come back when you’ve put on some fat.”

A-Xiang pushed her away. “Go away! Ah!”

Several women appeared beside Chunying and grabbed A-Xiang. The skinny girl couldn’t match an adult’s strength. A-Xiang was soon pulled by the hair into Rat Alley by several women. She yelled from the pain. A damp and stinking smell hit her in the face. In the suggestive alley, reddish lantern light like blood flitted over the amulet hanging in front of her chest.

She gripped the amulet and despairingly called in her mind: Grand Duke Tai Sui! Grand Duke Tai Sui!

Xi Ping held his forehead, feeling that this sight was unbearable and wishing to stop her mouth.

A-Xiang was pushed into a little dark room. Before she could get adjusted to it, a lantern flared up. Someone slapped her. “Little slut.”

The woman’s long nails left small wounds. Her ears buzzed, and her cheeks swelled up. A-Xiang turned her head and returned fire: “Old sl...ah!”

Before she could finish cursing, her face was slapped several times. Someone pinched her. Obscenities rained down on her, filthier than the canal water in the southern outskirts.

Chunying came through the crowd and pushed her against the door, then spat. “Shameless, cheap little egg. If I were your grandpa, I would be shamed to death.”

A-Xiang’s head was about to explode. She didn’t think too closely about how this woman would know she had a grandfather. She blurted out: “He’s about to die, anyway!”

When Chunying heard this, she froze. She raised a hand to stop the giggling woman about to pour cold water over A-Xiang. She asked, “What happened?”

A-Xiang’s chest undulated fiercely. For a time, she couldn’t speak.

Chunying’s brows, trimmed into thin lines, rose very high. She said impatiently, “Stop wailing. Did your grandpa die doing the deed?”

A-Xiang found the strength somewhere to spring up wildly and throw off the women holding her. Her face so red it was purple, she headbutted

Chunying and sent her reeling. “Bullshit! My grandpa was arrested by corrupt city guards! He was wrongly accused! What do you know?! Don’t talk about my grandpa that way!”

Chunying’s back banged into a table. Teacups and melon seeds fell in a heap. The other women quickly stepped up to support her, but Chunying seemed not to care. She asked, “Taken by the city guards? What crime did he commit?”

The crooked-nosed woman seemed better informed. She explained the grievance of the farmers who had lost their land. “The city guard has arrested many people in the last few days. They’re saying they were hired to assemble and make trouble.”

Chunying asked A-Xiang, “Did your grandpa go hang himself because he thinks he’s lived too long?”

Hearing this, the fire about to blow the top of A-Xiang’s head off suddenly cooled.

Yes, she thought as though losing her soul, it’s because of me.

Seeing that this little girl was stupid and couldn’t be relied on, Chunying turned to the crooked-nosed woman. “How many people were arrested?”

“I don’t know, must be nearly a hundred.”

“That big a fuss?” Chunying muttered. “The city guard... Those city guard sons of bitches are so black-hearted, they’d scrape what they could off a coffin.”

Then she asked A-Xiang, “Who asked you for twenty liang of silver?”

At this point, A-Xiang at last caught up. “You...you know my grandpa?”

Chunying’s slightly protruding eyes flashed, her appearance once again becoming crueler. “Any more fucking nonsense and I’ll break your mouth.”

A-Xiang said, “...it was Uncle Salted Fish.”

“Ha!” Chunying laughed sharply. “When the old bum loses a bet, he’ll even dig his own mom and dad out of their graves and let them get fucked. You believed his crap? Did your brain get baked by fever?”

As she spoke, she draped an outer robe over herself, rummaged through a little box, gathered up shards of silver ingots and odds and ends of jewelry, shoved them into her clothes, and arrogantly said to A-Xiang, “Let’s go!”

A-Xiang realized something. Her eyes opened wide.

Seeing her stupid expression, Chunying's eye twitched. "Right, how old are you? Sixteen? Seventeen?"

"Fifteen..."

A-Xiang had hardly said this when her face received another firm slap. She tasted blood in her mouth.

"Fifteen, and you dared to dress up in this slutty way and come here."

Chunying pointed at her and spoke one word and a time. "You're done for! When you see your grandpa, he'll break you to pieces!"

A-Xiang stared blankly for a long moment, then burst into wails. As she cried, she slavishly followed after Chunying.

She was willing to die, willing to be slapped. She would even be broken in two, as long as her grandpa could be saved.

The Grand Duke had heard her prayers. The Grand Duke had sent someone to help her.

Xi Ping came back from the breathless story of prostitution and opened his eyes. For a time he was too bewildered to know what time and day it was. All he heard was the girl's heartrending crying... She thought that the god had already blessed and protected her, so she stopped praying. The crying gradually faded.

Night in the Latent Cultivation Temple was extraordinarily quiet. The sound of a straw child sounding the night watch came through the window. The courtyard gate had already been locked.

“Now what, senior? Can you still see them?” For a time, Xi Ping forgot that it was a great demon possessing him. He urgently asked, “With something so big happening in the capital's outskirts, there must be some major case behind it. A few shards of silver... What city guard would dare release him for so little? They won't be able to get him out! Senior, hurry up and tell them...”

Tai Sui coolly interrupted him: “My very existence was nearly wiped out by Zhaoting that day. Unless I have a piece of reincarnation wood, I can only watch.”

Without another word, Xi Ping went to rummage through his luggage.

But reincarnation wood was hard to come by. Its texture wasn't as good for carving as cedar, its smell wasn't as good as the smell of camphor, it wasn't as sturdy as mahogany, and it grew scraggly and slow. It was third-rate timber. Even in the mortal world, it was mostly used for burial objects and memorial tablets and other such not very auspicious things. Where would he find some?

Under the half-puppet's astonished gaze, Xi Ping turned his belongings upside down and came up empty...but he did turn up Jiangli's birthday stone.

“Senior, was Jiangli also like that?” Xi Ping squeezed the cracked piece of jade and asked, “Can you...tell me about Jiangli?”

CHAPTER 22 - The Dragon Bites Its Tail (10)

Tai Sui paused, then corrected him: “Miss Chen.”

Yes, her original name wasn’t “Jiangli.” “Jiangli” was a pseudonym of the kind given to girls by Overflowing Splendor, used to place them in a golden tray and sell them.

“Was she your disciple?”

Tai Sui was silent for a moment. “No. If it had been me, I wouldn’t have taught her.”

“Why not?”

“Didn’t your Xuanyin immortal teach you? When a person opens their spiritual eyes, all their meridians link to the universe. Miss Chen was born frail and entered that sort of place when she was young, consumed all kinds of harmful medicines, so her later development was stunted. Her meridians rotted long ago. For another person, opening their spiritual eyes would be a good thing, but for her it would have been fatal. Better to be a mortal subject to all illnesses and hazards.”

Xi Ping froze. “Then how did she open her spiritual eyes?”

“She didn’t. She only used the Stone Drilled in Bone technique to give herself a fake set of spiritual bones.”

“What technique?”

“Spiritual stones ground into a hundred twenty stone needles. When the needles are stuck in succession into the bone acupoints, the spiritual needles can establish ties to the whole body, amounting to creating a set of ‘spiritual bones’ inside a mortal’s body that can supply spiritual energy. After an ordinary cultivator opens her spiritual eyes and becomes a half-immortal, the spiritual energy passes through the spiritual eyes to circulate through the meridians. She must work bitterly hard to cultivate for over a hundred years in order to change her ‘mortal bones’ to ‘spiritual bones.’ But with the stones drilled into her bones, the spiritual energy doesn’t pass through the meridians. When successful, it immediately produces a complete set of ‘fake spiritual bones.’ If she can endure it, in the blink of an eye, she can have the cultivation of a hundred-year-old half-immortal.” Tai Sui paused, then added, “But when the spiritual energy in the needles is exhausted, she’ll be paralyzed and live no more than two or three years.”

Xi Ping felt a chill in his joints.

Jiangli...that girl named Baishao, hadn't she been a delicate young lady? Her skin could be rubbed raw by taking off an ill-fitting bracelet... What crazy hero was this ferocious person who had driven stone needles into herself and shortened her lifespan to create these spiritual bones?

For a time, Xi Ping almost suspected that the two of them were talking past each other, that they actually weren't discussing the same person.

The night wind shook the osmanthus tree's branches, tapping them now and again against the rear window. The great demon seemed very willing to talk to him about Jiangli. He tranquilly chattered away. Half a step to becoming an evil god, but not only did he put on no airs when chatting with a mere mortal, his discourse was even rather instructive. For a time, it made one forget his deranged malice at the Blissful Village, with all of Jinping in the balance.

“She was born to the Chen family of Ning'an Prefecture. The Chen family originally made its living growing medicinal herbs. In their sacrificial land, there was a not very rich green ore field...in other words, some formless residue of green ore. But for mortals, this land was precious.

“The ore field was less than one mu. In three years, it could grow two batches of Cloud Smoothing Grass—one of the components of the magic Nine Origin Pill. By the time Baishao's father was born, they had what could be called a prosperous business and a person at court. They had narrowly mounted to the rank of a ‘distinguished family.’ Sadly, Ning’an Prefecture is only a couple of days’ travel from Jinping, and it also has nobles everywhere. In front of nobles, this kind of ‘distinguished family’ is nothing... Viscount, you grew up in Jinping. Have you heard of the four great families of Xuanyin?”

In fact, Xi Ping had heard of them.

The power structure of Great Wan’s Jinping was in fact the state sect Xuanyin writ in miniature.

It was said that Xuanyin Mountain had thirty-six peaks. For generations, they had selected disciples from among the children of the noble and meritorious. Hundreds of thousands of years later, in the inner sect, the “four great families” had taken shape: Lin, Zhao, Zhou, and Li.

Among them, apart from the imperial family of Zhou, the other three great families all had shed skin ancestors overseeing the immortal mountains. Each family had some ascended spirit peak masters. Previously, affiliations through marriages had been even more complex...though now it seemed there were only three “great families” left—twenty-three years ago, there had been an internal struggle in the Xuanyin Mountains. It was said that its nature was the Zhao family joining hands with the Zhou family to struggle against the Li family.

The fates of all the great figures of that family in the inner sect when the Li family fell were unknown to mortals, but the families affiliated with the Lis had all scattered—this was the group of families that Emperor Taiming had seized when disposing of his wife’s relatives.

The reason that Xi Ping knew about these stories that had happened before he was born was that one of the houses seized in the series of confiscations then had later become the Yongning Marquis Manor.

When he had been digging up anthills as a child, he had dug up quite a few scattered spiritual stones. The spiritual stones looked like candy. He had bit one and knocked out a loose baby tooth. To cheer him up, the Marquis had told him the origins of the spiritual stone and the previous identity of the Marquis Manor as a story.

Bloody memories make the strongest impressions. Xi Ping to this day remembered the Marquis saying, “Those immortal forebears, the peak masters in the clouds, are the cornerstones of the great mountain. The direct descendant cultivator disciples are trees growing between the rocks, and the relatives that the great families leave behind in the mortal world are branches on those big trees. Those that depend on them through marriage alliance and by making up their retinue are dew on the twigs. Dew can refract images of rainbows, of the sun, moon, and stars—it's very impressive. But as soon as a wind comes, it still falls... When the time comes, even the mountain will fall.”

Tai Sui said, laughing, “What your honored father said is in fact rather interesting. The mountain will fall, but so what? Even a pebble sliding down from the ridge can crush a den of animals to death.

“Ten years ago, in the previous Grand Selection Year, all of Jinping's notables had their eyes fixed on a selection card. The immortal envoy overseeing the Grand Selection that year just happened to be from the Zhao family, a medicine cultivator in the middle established foundation stage who had just left seclusion. A collateral branch of the Zhao family in Ning'an wanted to get one of their descendants in and decided to bribe the immortal envoy, so they thought about what they could give to make themselves stand out...and they took a shine to the Chen family's green ore field.”

“Senior, didn't you just say that the green ore field was sacrificial land?” Xi Ping put in. “Great Wan law provides that sacrificial land can't be bought or sold. Even I know that.”

“Great Wan law.” Tai Sui laughed softly. “Viscount, Great Wan has four sets of laws. One for immortals, one for nobles, one for commoners, and one for ants. Which set are you talking about?”

For a time, Xi Ping was speechless.

“It wasn’t long before the head of the Chen family and Baishao’s father Chen Zhifu went to prison for ‘colluding with evil cultivators and oppressing the common people,’” Tai Sui said casually. “Less than half a month between arrest and trial, quick as cutting through a knot. Afterward, the family’s males were sent to penal servitude and the females were sold. All their property was confiscated. No need to think about where the confiscated property ended up. And ‘by coincidence’ the tribute that the court offered to the immortal mountain Xuanyin that year contained a green ore medicinal herb field that ‘by coincidence’ fell into the hands of that medicine cultivator surnamed Zhao, and the collateral branch of the Ning’an Zhao family had the eldest son of its senior branch enter the Latent Cultivation Temple, just as they had wished—what do you say, isn’t that a coincidence?”

Xi Ping was enraged at once. He struck a table and jumped up, blurting out, “And then what? What’s that Zhao bastard’s full name? Did he enter the inner sect or go to Heaven’s Design Pavilion? If it’s the inner sect, forget it, but if it’s Heaven’s Design Pavilion, I’ll...”

“You’ll what?” said Tai Sui.

Xi Ping opened his mouth and said nothing.

Even Emperor Taiming couldn't shake the Zhao family, so what could he do? Xi Ping was perfectly well aware that he couldn't openly offend a member of the Zhao family while bearing the name of Prince Zhuang's maternal family... At most he could secretly use some unworthy means to put a few obstacles in his path, and he couldn't let any person raise an eyebrow or any ghost let out a breath.

But his anger somehow managed to ingratiate him with the great demon. Tai Sui's tone became even gentler.

“The Chen family's young lady and I were total strangers. It was only a coincidence that she became acquainted with my followers. Like many hopeless people, she made offerings to me in search of support. Then some loose-lipped person let her know about the Stone Drilled in Bone technique. She was so young, but with a courage that few people have. She could carve her flesh and bend her bones to create a set of spiritual bones for herself. This kind of will and tenacity is many times greater than the good-for-nothings who pour spiritual stones into their spiritual eyes to open them year after year. If she hadn't been ruined by those people, she would have been a precious jade. Sadly, the lofty immortal mountain's thirty-six peaks can't be shaken by a mere 'open-eyed' cultivator. Though she burned up her lifespan, paid such a great price, she still couldn't break apart a single frivolous inscription.

“Such a great injustice...” Tai Sui said, sighing. “When praying to gods and buddhas gets no reaction, you can only submit yourself to an evil spirit.”

The sage sat meditating in the sweet mists of the southern mountains, untouched by a speck of dust. The “evil spirit” was still willing to sigh for her in the deep and silent night.

“Senior,” Xi Ping quietly asked, “how do you know?”

Tai Sui said, “I gave her a small amount of grace once, but she entrusted me with her life. Having no way to repay her, all I can do is remember her hatred and enmity.”

Xi Ping was steeped in the sound of his sighs, looking at the gently fluorescent calendar block at the head of the bed. In that instant, his vigilance toward Tai Sui seemed to have largely thawed.

“Senior,” he said quietly after a long time, “will you get revenge for her?”

Tai Sui said, almost solemnly, “My arrival in this world was for the purpose of exposing these gross injustices and clarifying them through the light of day.”

An obvious struggle flashed over Xi Ping’s face. He sat there in the still night for a long time. He said, “Senior, are you...are you really not going to hurt me?”

Tai Sui seemed to think it beneath him to answer this question. He only gave an indistinct laugh.

“Then how can I help you?” said Xi Ping.

Tai Sui’s voice was increasingly soft. “Your spiritual eyes haven’t opened yet. The spiritual energy I can borrow is limited. I wasn’t only being polite when I said I would instruct you in cultivation. Every day sooner that you open your spiritual eyes is a day sooner that I have help.”

“You don’t need to tell me that,” Xi Ping said. Then he remembered something else. “Senior, if someone has reincarnation wood, can you tell me? I’ll definitely find a way to get you a piece.”

“Ah,” Tai Sui said, voice like a feather, “thank you very much.”

Xi Ping’s actions were no slower than his thoughts. Once he had made a decision, he immediately sat up to practice meditation.

Before, he had been finicky and restless. After less than a ke of meditating, he would always complain that his legs were numb. Either his mind would be filled with racing horses that wouldn't be still for a moment, or else after sitting for a while he would fall asleep. But tonight, the length of time he held out was extraordinarily long.

In the dark, the evil god watched him, feeling that the words "man at his birth is good"¹⁶ were written on this Viscount.

This kid was soft-hearted and unexpectedly devoted to old friendships. Though he knew a few tricks, he wasn't at all shrewd.

Was he being clever and pretending to cooperate, bowing his head under duress after being taught a lesson, or was he truly moved...? It was clear at a glance.

But was he still "at his birth"?

At Xi Ping's age, he could establish a household anywhere, but he was still so childish. How absurd was this childishness! He could only have grown up like this in a great mansion, in a rich den with gold as his earth and jade as his fertilizer. Under the lightless dust, how many of the old and weak, the sick and crippled, struggled for their lives in the mud? But this noble residence had spoiled this healthy-limbed, sound-bodied man into an oversized infant.

All that was lovable was disgusting. Was there anything on earth more reprehensible than innocence?

Tai Sui looked on coldly as this lovable and disgusting Viscount of Yongning “changed his skin.” He saw him not only willing to work morning and night, but also to run to the Yanhai Building to voluntarily borrow books, showing signs of assiduous study.

After evening class the next day, Xi Ping was climbing a bookcase at the Yanhai Building when he heard a faint buzz.

“Oh?” said Tai Sui.

“Senior, what is it?”

Tai Sui was silent for a moment. “There’s reincarnation wood nearby.”

Hearing this, Xi Ping jumped down from the bookcase like a monkey and went downstairs to look around. He saw Elder Su leading a big group of stewards in rearranging the Yanhai Building.

Straw children followed the stewards, busy with this and that, scrubbing and washing and changing the Yanhai Building's decorations.

Xi Ping heard some disciples next to him discussing quietly:

“What great personage is going to come lecture?”

“What do you mean?”

“If one of the inner sect's thirty-six peaks wants to select new disciples, a member of the peak master's lineage...or even the peak master in person will come to lecture to inspect the disciples' talents. Who is coming this year?”

“Do any of you know the history of those decorations?”

“These...mostly seem to be ordinary objects.”

Xi Ping wasn't in the mood to guess. He called out directly to Su Zhun:

“Elder Su, who's coming?”

Su Zhun looked up and saw that it was him, then said, smiling, “Green Pool Peak's Duanrui-shishu will come to the Songchuang Great Hall to lecture tomorrow.”

All the disciples cried out. Xi Ping ran to the noisy main hall. While adding to the noise, he asked Tai Sui, “Senior, which of them is reincarnation wood?”

Tai Sui said, “Those little decorations on the western windowsill.”

Xi Ping tilted his head to look and saw a row of adorable karma beasts carved out of wood. The artist had perfectly captured the charm of the karma beasts. They were all different shapes, endlessly entertaining.

Xi Ping raised his hands and bowed to the karma beasts. “Hey, aren’t these my benefactors?”

Yang Anli said, smiling, “These were all made for fun by Duanrui-shishu in her spare time when she was cultivating at the Latent Cultivation Temple. She didn’t take them when she left, so they remained in the temple.”

Xi Ping’s eyes rolled smoothly. He watched the straw children arrange many similar wood and stone carvings. He thought, These are cleverly made. Is this princess of the toolmaking way or something?

Tai Sui said into his ear, “Don’t get any wild ideas. The Latent Cultivation Temple is the accumulated product of thousands of years. The Yanhai Building is full of inscriptions. Never mind a mortal disciple like you who hasn't opened his spiritual eyes, even an established foundation or ascended spirit cultivator who wanted to steal something from the Yanhai Building would have to think it over carefully.

Xi Ping gave an I see. "Senior, how much reincarnation wood do you need?"

"A bit of wooden shavings would suffice," Tai Sui said heavily. "That old monster Duanrui is the head of the Zhou family in Xuanyin. It's said that she is already a consummate ascended spirit. Don't act rashly under her nose, at least wait for her to leave. When the time comes, the stewards will order the straw children to take these things back to storage. I'll teach you a crooked spell to control the straw children, so you can take the opportunity to get some shavings from the reincarnation wood. Viscount, we'll see whether you dare to run this risk for the sake of some strangers from Rat Alley."

As he had expected, Xi Ping said without argument, "Sure, I'll try."

"You must be careful," said Tai Sui.

No sooner had he spoken than he saw Xi Ping step forward and simply say to Yang Anli, "Yang-shixiong, these karma beasts feel very dear to me. Could I have one of the wood carvings?"

Tai Sui: "..."

Yang Anli was also stunned. He blurted out, "This isn't an immortal tool."

"I know, I can't use an immortal tool. Do you think I'm that unreasonable?"

The "reasonable" Viscount Xi, acting absolutely familiar, drew close to Yang Anli and talked pure drivel. "I have a special connection with karma beasts. Before, Heaven's Design Pavilion's Exalted Zhao gave me one, and we got on great. It even saved my life... I really miss it."

Yang Anli was dumbfounded. He had never seen anyone mention this kind of request before. "Well..."

Xi Ping said, "It's all right if you say no. Duanrui-shishu is coming to lecture tomorrow, isn't she? I can ask her for it."

Yang Anli: "..."

Wait, no, what is this? Is Princess Duanrui your auntie or something?

"Let him take one. The old forebear left hundreds of these wooden carvings in the Latent Cultivation Temple. They were all things she didn't want.

Anyway, we can't set them all out." Su Zhun, passing by, waved a hand.

“She won’t make a fuss over this. Kid, don’t show it off all over the place, or else if everyone comes to ask, I won’t be able to handle it.”

Elder Su had heard of Xi Ping’s “heroic feat” in the mortal world. He had already known that he was a magic creature without any sense of reverence. He could blab even in front of General Zhi. He really might pull a stunt like asking Princess Duanrui for the carving... Zhi Xiu was amazing. Where had he turned up this weirdo?

Xi Ping took advantage of his forbearance: “Thank you, Elder Su! I want the fattest one.”

Tai Sui: “...”

How did that work?

Just then, someone said, “Elder Su, could you tell us if this is the legendary Determination Turtle?”

Zhou Xi stood gasping in admiration next to a stone platform. On the stone platform was a three-chi square big metal tray with strings hanging from it, some thick and some thin. From the strings hung a lifelike Moon Plated Gold turtle.

The disciples in the Yanhai Building surrounded it.

“Your Highness, what is it?”

“This thing is called the Determination Turtle,” Zhou Xi said. “The ‘turtle’ character is also read ‘rule’ or ‘track.’ The blueprints were drawn by Princess Duanrui herself. It’s said that it can answer all enigmas of the mortal world. Sadly, no one has ever succeeded in making it. Elder, is this an imitation or a statue?”

“An imitation,” said Su Zhun. “A downgraded immortal tool. There’s an array inside the Moon Plated Gold turtle. It can understand human speech. When you ask it a question, if the strings sound three times, it’s an affirmative, and if they sound once, it’s a negative. Naturally it can’t answer questions that are too complicated, but at your level, it should be able to answer. In the future, if there’s some cultivation matter you don’t understand and you can’t find any shixiong to ask, you can go through the ancient books and records, and you can come ask the magic turtle... Though, after all, this thing is only a downgraded immortal tool. It can only answer ‘yes’ or ‘no.’ Take care not to ask anything too confusing.”

As Elder Su spoke, he gently tapped on the gold turtle’s head. “Will there be eight treasure tofu soup in the late night snack the dining hall prepares for the stewards today?”

Thin white steam came out of the metal basin. The gold turtle moved. It waved its tail lightly, and one string hummed.

No.

“Wonderful.” It was unclear whether Elder Su didn’t like the “eight treasures” or didn’t like the “tofu.” At any rate, he let out a huge sigh of relief, then said to the disciples, smiling, “Do you all understand? You can ask your question aloud, and if you really don’t want others to hear, you can also think it to yourselves—but if you think it to yourselves, there must be no distracting thoughts in your mind. It will only work if your mind is concentrated.”

Someone asked, “Elder, what can you ask the magic turtle?”

“Anything at all. Anything you don’t understand about cultivation, daily trifles, even the health of your relatives in the mortal world,” Su Zhun said. “But you must not ask about the sect’s taboo matters. If you aren’t sure whether something is taboo, then make sure to only ask about yourself—don’t ask about other people’s business—for example, ‘Is Luo-shixiong in a good mood today?’ or things like that. That could touch his spiritual sense.”

Xi Ping put in a question: “Elder, what are the limits? Suppose I ask ‘Am I the one making the fastest progress in cultivation among my classmates, with the greatest hope of entering the inner sect?’—I’m asking about myself, but I have to be compared to others. Does that count as asking about others?”

The arrogance in these words was simply brazen. Zhou Xi’s eye twitched.

Elder Su said, smiling, “That’s actually all right, but if you mentioned some person in particular to be compared with you, that would count as asking about others—would anyone like to try?”

Xi Ping was about to speak, thought of something, and turned his gaze on His Fourth Highness. By coincidence, Zhou Xi just happened to be looking at him. Across the distance of a few zhang, the two of them held a quick confrontation with their eyes. Xi Ping gave an insincere smile and made a please go ahead gesture at Zhou Xi.

Zhou Xi coldly looked away. “I would like to try.”

As he spoke, he stepped up, glanced at Xi Ping out of the corner of his eye, concentrated, and inwardly said: “Am I currently making the fastest progress in this class of disciples?”

The gold turtle puffed steam. Under everyone's gazes, it lightly waved its tail.

Clang—

No.

Zhou Xi's features twisted, but he very soon adjusted himself and forced himself not to break his demeanor. He saluted Su Zhun and openly said, "I am without talent. What I asked just now was whether I was making the fastest progress, and the magic turtle said no. Indeed, I have not been diligent enough. I wonder which of my classmates is a step ahead."

No sooner had he spoken than several obvious or concealed gazes were aimed at Xi Ping—he was currently the only one who had received a spiritual stone from Luo Qingshi.

"Why don't you all come try, too?" Zhou Xi turned his head and smiled.

"Shiyong, don't stand so far away."

Mentioned by name, Xi Ping didn't shirk. He handed Chang Jun his book and stepped forward as asked.

Putting his hand on the gold turtle, he gave Zhou Xi an inadvertent-seeming look, then sloppily said, “The same question.”

Su Zhun was just about to warn him that downgraded immortal tools weren't so sensitive, and it was better to say his question clearly, when the gold turtle slowly moved on the strings, plucking three times.

It happened to be lying on the thinnest string. The sound of it was very sharp. The three sounds, for no apparent reason, made your scalp go numb.

Xi Ping slowly returned his hands to his sleeves. For a moment, his expression was blank.

But this strange expression lasted for only a flash, so brief it seemed to be an illusion. When Xi Ping looked around, he once again wore that look that was asking for several good beatings. He even nodded rather provokingly to His Fourth Highness.

However good Zhou Xi's self-restraint was, his expression still nearly crumbled on the spot.

Chang Jun quietly said, “It's all right to ask, but you could have just asked silently. You shouldn't have said it aloud! You've put His Fourth Highness in an embarrassing position.”

“Even if I had asked silently, he still would have known what I was asking. With Long-legged Luo’s provocation every day, if I so much as breathe it puts His Fourth Highness in an embarrassing position,” Xi Ping said carelessly. “Don’t fuss, they’re all lining up. If you don’t go now, you won’t get to touch it.”

Chang Jun gave an ah and, with no more attention to spare to speak to him, quickly went to line up.

Xi Ping took back the book he wanted to borrow, put the reincarnation wood carving he had begged for away in his clothing, and strode away as though nothing were the matter. Humming a tune he had composed himself, he returned to the Qiu courtyard.

No one knew that when he had just said “the same question,” in his mind he had asked a different question.

What Xi Ping had asked was: Can my body only be snatched after I’ve opened my spiritual eyes?

CHAPTER 23 - The Dragon Bites Its Tail (11)

Xi Ping liked going to his maternal grandfather's house for fun. Merchants traveled widely, and he sometimes managed to come along to see the sights. He had seen how Cui Ji's senior managers did business—it was precise and unambiguous: the amount of money, the quantity of goods, how the money was to be obtained, how the goods were to be transported...even whose responsibility it was to see that the goods got onto the ship and off the ship and how they were to be handed over—all of it had to be put down on paper, details fixed and contract signed.

His first uncle had told him since he was little that anyone who talked big and made grandiloquent boasts but didn't mention concrete arrangements was up to no good.

This "Grand Duke Tai Sui" that Xi Ping was carrying around spent all day fretting on behalf of the country and the people, always saying how he was going to improve the lives of the citizens, but he didn't say a word about the critical matters—up to this point, he had yet to say how he had come, when he was leaving, how he would leave, whether it would be harmful to his "host"; he had even brushed off giving a verbal guarantee of "I won't hurt you."

Xi Ping suspected that this evil cultivator took him for a rich fool who had seen nothing of the world.

Just now he had pretended to exert himself and flipped through several basic ancient texts in the Yanhai Building. He found that just as the evil cultivator had said, a mortal's "spiritual sense" was muddled, something along the lines of instinct, not something that could be linked to the senses the way he could do it.

In one text, it even said that "linking the spiritual sense" was the same thing as "opening the spiritual eyes."

So the question was, since he hadn't opened his spiritual eyes, why could he link his spiritual sense?

The Stone Drilled in Bone that the great evil cultivator had told him about had given Xi Ping some enlightenment—after a person opened his spiritual eyes, his meridians linked to the universe, like having a "road" that spiritual energy could travel; and supposing that he hadn't opened his spiritual eyes, he could use another method to open a different "pathway" for spiritual energy to pass through and obtain some of the powers of the open-eyed stage.

From this, Xi Ping deduced that his current ability to link his spiritual sense likely came from having just such a “pathway” in his body... This could explain why, when he had entered the spiritual sense mustard seed and Tai Sui had evidently not yet awakened, he had already been able to link his spiritual sense to his ears.

In other words, reasonably speaking, this “Grand Duke Tai Sui” who was possessing him could cycle spiritual energy.

So...why did the evil cultivator want to rush him into opening his spiritual eyes sooner? The way he told it was truly pitiful, just as if the magnificent “Grand Duke” could only pick up a bit of spiritual energy if he opened his spiritual eyes.

Elder Su had said that if you asked about someone else using the Determination Turtle, it would touch their spiritual sense. So Xi Ping had only asked whether his body could only be snatched after he opened his spiritual eyes.

The immortal tool had substantiated his guess...and now Xi Ping had it pretty much figured out.

This great evil cultivator was planning on stealing someone else’s nest for himself.

Xi Ping didn't lose his wits—at least, he wasn't as panicked as when he had discovered that he had been possessed by Tai Sui.

The pain of the bone-searing burning he had received yesterday at the gate of the Qiankun Tower seemed to have left remnants in his bones. Xi Ping's exceptional compliance afterward had made the great evil cultivator think that he had been forced into submission by pain; little did he know that it had instead aroused his ferocity.

People Xi Ping liked, if they gave him a pinch or a shove, it would be fine; even if he bristled at the time, he wouldn't take it to heart.

But that didn't go for others. The young master wasn't having any of the carrot and stick routine. Anyone who dared to pick up a stick and hit him, he would plant that person in the ground.

“Forgive me, Miss Chen,” Xi Ping thought. “I have to destroy this great evil cultivator all of you worshipped. If I manage to survive that, I'll look after your vendetta.”

But he couldn't be hasty about this business.

As if nothing were the matter, Xi Ping, testing Tai Sui, said, “Senior, I offended His Fourth Highness pretty badly today. I don’t think he’ll give up until he’s crushed me. How about you stop instructing me and simply cultivate in my place?”

Tai Sui coolly said, “Are you commanding me?”

Xi Ping acutely determined that he wasn’t particularly angry, so he continued on his path: “A direct bloodline member of one of the sect’s families like His Fourth Highness, he’ll have been training his spiritual sense since he was little, rushing to enter the inner sect. They have as many spiritual stones as they want, but after all these years of training, he still hasn’t opened his spiritual eyes. But your followers...disciples...or underlings, eh, whatever they are, each one of them seems so poor they rattle, but they’re so mighty. Senior, you must have secret books, right?”

“There’s no such thing as secret books in cultivation. Each person has his natural affinity,” Tai Sui said. “Don’t spend so much time reading stories about roaming cultivators.”

“Well, you’ve opened your spiritual eyes, so you know how it works. Wouldn’t you do it faster than me groping around blindly on my own? Senior, didn’t you say that I can only benefit you if I open my spiritual eyes?”

Tai Sui saw that after only a day of “exertion,” Xi Ping was ready to pack it in and turn to crooked and evil means to goof off. Then he remembered those roaming cultivators who would sell out their best friends and fall out with their families for the sake of the position of “disciple of record”; he was finding this brat increasingly offensive to the eye. He said impatiently, “Your spiritual eyes are part of your spirit and are linked to your body and mind. How could another cultivate in your place?”

Xi Ping gave a disappointed ah, but he was thinking: No wonder.

No wonder that this evil cultivator could control even his heartbeat and breathing but couldn’t simply snatch away his body and even had to expend so much effort on disciplining him.

In other words, supposing he lost his wits, went mad, or died, no matter how perfect a condition his body was in, the evil cultivator could only be a parasite on it and wouldn’t have a hope of snatching it.

And before that, he had no way to invade his spirit to observe his thoughts and feelings; he would only know what Xi Ping was willing to share.

Back at the Qiu courtyard, Xi Ping saw at once that the white jade proximal was lit up. He had a letter from home.

Xi Ping had something on his mind, so he didn't read carefully, only glanced at it absent-mindedly.

In just one glance, he saw that there was a character written wrong—the character “衣,” clothing, was missing a dot stroke.

The old lady had poor vision and had never studied. There was nothing unusual about her writing characters wrong. But she was always telling him to put on more clothes and eat more food. It wasn't very likely that she would get this character wrong... Among the people Xi Ping knew, only one would write the character “衣” missing a dot stroke: his san-ge Prince Zhuang. The Imperial Consort's given name contained this character, so he held it as a taboo out of respect for his mother.

Reading the note again, apart from the exhortations, there were also a few lines at the end. The general sense was “your old grandmother is senile and often forgets what she said the day before, so don't mind if she rattles on.” At a glance, there was nothing wrong with this. All old people liked to repeat themselves. But their old lady didn't know that she had this bad habit, because even if she had told the same story more than ten times over, the whole family by tacit agreement would pretend that they were hearing it for the first time.

The more Xi Ping looked at it, the more convinced he was that Prince Zhuang had written this letter.

San-ge had given him the proximals, so it was likely they weren't a pair but a set of three. San-ge had kept one for himself and could keep up with the letters he exchanged with the old lady, and could also contact him himself. Given Xi Ping's understanding of him, if he wrote a response now, his grandmother probably wouldn't read it.

Copying their grandmother's handwriting was child's play for Prince Zhuang. Going out of his way to add the note at the end must have been because he was worried the old lady would write another letter soon, and he was providing for that eventuality.

Xi Ping's thoughts worked quickly. He knew that his san-ge had picked up that something was wrong from him naming the half-puppet "Xi Yue."

His heartbeat quickened involuntarily. Then, afraid that Tai Sui would notice, he jumped up noisily and, flustered, called out to Xi Yue standing by in attendance: "You! In the future, don't spy on my proximal without permission, you hear me?"

His yell startled the half-puppet. Then he looked at him in doubt and incomprehension: this fickle master seemed to have forgotten that he couldn't read.

“Get out, get out. Honestly, the old lady...” Xi Ping waved a hand at the half-puppet, anxiously groping around for a brush while he quickly considered: What should he write? How could he tell his san-ge that he had been possessed?

But the moment he prepared to write, Xi Ping gave a start: No, wait, if san-ge had something to say, why didn't he say it directly?

Why would he copy their grandmother's handwriting, use such a secretive means of contacting him?

He remembered that with the gold turtle in the Yanhai Building, Elder Su had said that if you used that downgraded immortal tool to ask about someone else, it might seize on that person's spiritual sense.

In other words, downgraded spiritual tools weren't safe and confidential.

In a flash, Xi Ping restrained the notion of getting up to any little tricks.

He focused, acting as if he hadn't noticed that the letter was written by someone else, only babbled on as usual, acting cute for his grandmother, and as usual telling her about the strange people and odd events around him... Today it was mostly “strange people.” First he earnestly drew a horrifying-looking Xi Yue, then a Luo Qingshi next to him—rather lifelike he was, only half as tall as the half-puppet.

After writing his shocking letter, Xi Ping picked up the karma beast carved from reincarnation wood as if nothing were the matter. “Senior, how do I use this?”

But Tai Sui was silent for a moment. He said, “I think that in the future you had better not write malicious remarks about your shixiong.”

“Huh?” said Xi Ping.

“The white jade proximal is a downgraded immortal tool,” Tai Sui said.

“The reason no one likes making downgraded immortal tools is that these expensive pieces of trash are full of holes. Even an open-eyed half-immortal only has to use a bit of artifice to be able to spy on them as he likes. How easy is it for an established foundation cultivator? You drawing a caricature of Luo Qingshi on the proximal just now was no different from insulting him to his face.”

“...it wasn’t a caricature,” said Xi Ping.

Tai Sui ignored him.

“No, wait,” Xi Ping, suddenly “seeing the light,” said indignantly, “senior, why didn’t you tell me before?”

“People always need to be taught a lesson a few times before they’ll remember,” Tai Sui said coolly. “The immortal sect isn’t your mortal world. The great Way has three thousand paths. You can’t imagine the tricks and weapons others have. My first lesson for you is to be discreet in word and deed.”

Xi Ping didn’t answer. His expression was clearly unconvinced.

Tai Sui had looked on as he condemned himself and had deliberately not warned him because he had realized that the proximal communicating with Xi Ping this time wasn’t the same one as usual, so he had become suspicious.

But from how it appeared now, he thought he was being overanxious: this stupid young master had no idea what was going on. And the person on the other end had seen him ridiculing Luo Qingshi and hadn’t warned him. It seemed they also weren’t too familiar with the fact that you couldn’t write about your elders and betters on a downgraded immortal tool. Probably this was also a mortal unfamiliar with the rules of the immortal sect...perhaps a father or brother who didn’t feel comfortable expressing his concern.

Xi Ping used his inner qualities to play the part of the wronged young master with no one to complain to—in fact, he had used Luo Qingshi to test the great evil cultivator, and to secretly pass on a message to his san-ge, but he really hadn't deliberately drawn a “caricature” to insult anyone.

How could he deliberately insult him when he knew perfectly well he would be looking? Was he looking for a fight? He had obviously drawn an earnest portrait!

The more he considered it, the more he thought that the great evil cultivator didn't appreciate his talent. He toyed indignantly with the reincarnation wood carving.

All of a sudden, he felt a faint chill in his fingers squeezing the wood carving. Countless voices exploded in Xi Ping's ears. He gave a start and tried to withdraw his hand...but failed.

Tai Sui was controlling his hand, firmly holding the wood carving with it.

“Calm yourself,” Tai Sui said. “Focus. Didn't you learn how to meditate?”

Xi Ping struggled to ignore the noises in his ears. He closed his eyes and concentrated on the center of his brow. Various images flashed before his eyes. In an instant, Xi Ping met countless clouded or dim eyes briefly. Finally, he stopped on the slightly light-colored round eyes of a teenage girl.

He'd found A-Xiang.

A-Xiang passed Chunying a pot of water—Chunying had just cursed for half an incense stick without taking a breath, rooting out eighteen successive generations of the ill-intentioned Uncle Salted Fish's ancestors to sully each one in turn. The old gambler was hiding in a corner of the room, playing dead, not daring to make a sound.

But after letting loose such an unbridled stream of curses, neither of them felt any relief.

Chunying had taken the girl to run around for a whole day. Her social network was unbelievably wide. It seemed that she could claim a connection to everyone in the southern outskirts. But despite this, they had still come up empty. They had only found out that this matter was being personally supervised by the Capital Overseer. All those who had been arrested were already in prison.

Chunying had also gone to find a foreman surnamed Lü at the southern outskirts docks. He was always boasting that he had a brother-in-law in the city guard. This individual was known for his lechery. Seeing Chunying, his squinting eyes travelled up and down three times, looking her over. But when he heard her ask whether he could find someone to clear the way for them, he sprayed spit: “What are you talking about? With something so big happening in the factories, even senior managers will be punished. Don’t go getting yourself into that trouble, woman!”

Seeing it would be dark soon, Chunying bought A-Xiang a bowl of noodles. She didn’t eat herself, only sat next to her frowning and fretting.

Chunying seemed to be very familiar with everything about A-Xiang and her grandfather. She could casually mention her grandfather’s name and his nickname back home. She knew where the two of them lived. But A-Xiang had already been in Jinping for half a year, and she hadn’t known that her grandfather knew this person. So she couldn’t resist asking, “Auntie Chun, how do you know my grandfather?”

“None of your business,” Chunying said crossly. “Eat your dinner.”

When she was pretty much done eating, Chunying added, “Leave when you’re finished. You don’t have to worry about your grandpa’s business anymore. Go home and change out of those clothes. Since your grandpa raised you as a boy, you can keep being a boy—anyway, there’s no way to tell your sex from your ugly looks.”

A-Xiang didn't answer, not wanting to annoy her. She was grateful to this woman she had met by chance and didn't want to have any unkind thoughts toward Chunying, but this Auntie Chun was truly unreasonable. It would take the forbearance of a Buddha to remain good-humored while listening to her dog's mouth.

After she finished speaking, Chunying gave the noodle stand owner a line of coins, then remembered something. She turned and tossed a little silver bead in front of A-Xiang, then left without a word.

Long ago...she didn't remember precisely how many years, when she wasn't even as old as that little girl A-Xiang, her parents had died, and she had run from hunger, ending up in Ling County. That year, rarely seen heavy snow fell in the south, freezing heaven and earth. In order to survive, her older brother sold her for two liang of silver to be an old landowner's concubine.

The second young master of the old landowner's family was a scholar... He wasn't very clever. After toiling away at his studies for most of twenty years, he had no achievements to show for it. But he was sensitive. Encountering this business, the silly young master felt that his old father was behaving atrociously. So he gave his servant two liang of silver and an order to go "buy" her, and had her do a winter's worth of odd jobs to pay off her debt.

When spring began, the silly young master gave her back her indenture and said to her, “The old man will be dead soon, and my big brother likely won’t put up with me, so I won’t keep you. You’re quick-witted and a good worker. You can go to Ning’an or Jinping, work as a servant for a big family, and over time earn a respectable position for yourself. The maidservants of wealthy families are better off than the young mistresses here in the countryside.”

The second young master’s full name was Wei Pengcheng. He couldn’t memorize a single eight-line poem in a couple of months. The locals all called him Second Idiot Wei. The Second Idiot was clueless, but he had a pair of willow leaf eyes, with conspicuous red birthmarks on his brow and at the corner of his eye, very charming, and he had given Chunying the most comfortable winter of her life.

After many years, when he had asked her for directions in Jinping’s southern outskirts with those dim old eyes, she had recognized those two red birthmarks at once...but she hadn’t had the face to reminisce about the old days.

What bullshit were you spouting, Second Idiot Wei? How could it be so easy to earn a respectable position? Wasn’t the young master himself living in destitute misery in his old age?!

Chunying sent A-Xiang away, fixed her clothes, and went to knock on Foreman Lü's door again—to make it convenient to get to work, the foremen usually lived beside the canal and only went home once in half a month. They usually had a small courtyard, much better off than the laborers who slept in big multi-person beds.

Lü opened his door and saw her, and an evil light flashed in his eyes. “What is it, Chunying-jiejie, didn't you say you wouldn't have my business no matter how much money I paid?”

Chunying didn't answer, only smoothed her temples, smiling.

Foreman Lü remembered something. “I can't do what you asked me for this afternoon.”

Chunying slowly stepped forward and blew a breath toward his face.

“Really?”

“Really, I...”

Chunying put a hand to his lips. “What if I let you...flog my face?”

Foreman Lü's eyes glimmered for a long moment. He swallowed a mouthful of saliva, then moved aside to let Chunying in.

Creak. The wooden door shut out the waves of the canal.

In the street, A-Xiang curled up in a shady corner, gritting her teeth, nails almost digging into the reincarnation wood amulet around her neck.

Xi Ping opened his eyes, throwing off the lightless mortal world. “Senior, do you have a way to help? If you don’t, then let go of my hand. I’ll write a letter to tell my grandmother to explain to my dad...”

“Oh, and have you determined how you’ll explain it to your honored father?” said Tai Sui.

Xi Ping’s mind worked extremely fast. “I’ll just say I accidentally touched some immortal tool in the Latent Cultivation Temple and saw something. My dad is mortal, he doesn’t understand anything about immortal tools. If I just make one up, he won’t know whether it’s real or fake.”

Tai Sui thought: That must be the owner of the other white jade proximal.

“Don’t worry, senior, I’ve been making up lies to fool my dad since I was little, and I’ve never been seen through. Let me go, those two, they’re...”

“Shh.” Tai Sui sealed his mouth and forced him to close his eyes. “Don’t talk. Wait.”

Xi Ping couldn’t speak with his mouth, but inwardly he kept calling “senior.”

“What are we waiting for? Didn’t you say she was your follower? Senior! Senior! If you wait, both the grown-up lady and the little lady will be done for!”

Tai Sui ignored him.

On the other end of the reincarnation wood, A-Xiang once again began desperately entreating the god.

Thirty steps away from her, a man’s roars mixed with filthy language, the crack of a whip, and now and then some screams that couldn’t be held back came from the crack in a door.

All the gods and demons in the heavens looked calmly and benevolently upon her and didn’t respond, listening to her hopeless vows.

She seemed to hear an auditory hallucination: Your life while living, your body after death, what you have grown to this day, your future spirit and primordial being, will you give them all to me?

“I’ll give you everything,” she thought. “I’ll give you anything, just help me...”

But when she raised her head, she found that there was no one around her.

A-Xiang, pushed beyond her endurance, finally picked up a brick and smashed it against Foreman Lü’s door...

There was blood in the chaotic night, blood that smeared on the reincarnation wood amulet, imprinting the girl’s vow of “I’ll give you anything” on it.

As soon as the blood seeped into the reincarnation wood, Xi Ping felt a faint warmth from the wood carving. At the same time, a line of writing appeared on the amulet on A-Xiang’s chest.

The conflagration burns on, the cry of the cicada is without end.

The image in Xi Ping’s mind crumbled. A-Xiang was gone. He was looking into a man’s eyes.

This man was tall and broad, wearing the armor of the city guard. Before Xi Ping could react, ecstasy flashed over the man's face. He whispered toward him: "Tai Sui!"

"A man was recently arrested in the southern outskirts factory district, named Wei Pengcheng," Tai Sui instructed briefly. "He's one of ours."

The man said excitedly, "I understand! The conflagration burns on, the cry of the cicada is without end."

Next, the city guard soldier was also gone. Xi Ping now met the eyes of an old man with cataracts.

Tai Sui said, "Lü Zhen of the canal docks has insulted my follower. Kill him."

Cold killing intent crashed against Xi Ping's ears, startling him.

The next moment, Tai Sui let him go. The wood carving fell out of Xi Ping's hand. All the sounds and images vanished. In the quiet Qiu courtyard, there was only the sound of the wood carving rolling over the floor.

Xi Ping's fingers trembled slightly.

He had originally thought that he could get hold of some reincarnation wood, perhaps use helping that little girl get her grandfather out of jail as an opportunity to pass on some information...

“Senior,” he quietly asked at last, after some time, “if you’re so powerful, why didn’t you act sooner?”

“Miracles must come only when you’ve reached the end of the road and will give away all you have,” the evil cultivator said slowly. “If they were easy to come by, wouldn’t that be very unfair?”

CHAPTER 24 - The Dragon Bites Its Tail (12)

Xi Ping had no attention to spare for pitying others.

Right now, he had a marrow-chilling guess in mind—concerning why Tai Sui had possessed him.

That day in the Blissful Village, apart from him, all the walkers in the mortal world had been open-eyed half-immortals.

Xi Ping had picked up a considerable amount of common knowledge at the Latent Cultivation Temple. He already knew that Heaven's Design Pavilion's Exalted only seemed awesome to mortals. To a mighty ascended spirit cultivator, they were no different from mortals. That being the case, why hadn't Tai Sui simply chosen a "half-immortal" whose body he could snatch right away, instead of waiting for him to open his spiritual eyes?

What if he had been a "lucky stick" of an idiot who couldn't even link to his spiritual eyes?

In fact...from the circumstances back then, it hadn't even looked as though he would be chosen to enter the Latent Cultivation Temple.

This had been a problem Xi Ping had been unable to resolve no matter what, until now, when he had heard the great demon make A-Xiang swear.

Everything a follower had must be offered without reservation to the demon, so naturally Chen Baishao's life and body after death were no exception. Though her body had been created by her parents, she had only retained the rights to use it, being reduced to a "tenant."

So, when she had swapped her life for Xi Ping's with a drop of heart's blood, didn't that mean...that the swapped life also belonged to the great evil cultivator?

Tai Sui had nearly been turned to mincemeat by Zhaoting in the Blissful Village. He had only awakened when A-Xiang had by chance spilled blood on the reincarnation wood. It was likely he hadn't had any intention of choosing Xi Ping but had automatically "gone back where he belonged."

Xi Ping had originally thought that this great evil cultivator wanted to "steal someone else's nest for himself"; who would have thought that in fact he was only planning on evicting a squatting "tenant"!

What was all this? Who was he supposed to go to for a solution?

He couldn't hide the sudden tension in his body from the "landlord." The evil cultivator's snake's voice sounded in his ear: "What's the matter with you? What is making you uneasy?"

The night sky was caught in fog.

The smokestacks of the southern outskirts swallowed the anxious nightshift laborers to chew on them all night and spit out the residue only in the early morning. The people who lived there had long ago become accustomed to going to sleep to the sound of thunder.

Chunying covered the wounds on her face with her hair, lit an oil lamp, turned to look at the little girl, and rather kindly said, "The coroner has already been here. He died of a sudden attack of illness. If his family comes looking, I'll hold them off for you. What the fuck are you afraid of? Come and have some soup."

A-Xiang had a scrape on her forehead. Her gaze was vague. It was unclear whether she had heard or not.

She had charged into Foreman Lü's house holding a brick, prepared to fight to the death. But even giving it her all, she still didn't have much strength. Even though Foreman Lü didn't normally do any physical labor and was half-way hollowed out by alcohol, a little girl fourteen or fifteen years old was still no match for him.

So she was easily controlled and tied into a zongzi. Lü had just drunk two mouthfuls of wine, and his lust had become overweening from the bamboo whip in his hand. It had gone to his head. Ignoring Chunying shouting curses, he figured that since fresh meat had shown up, he certainly couldn't turn it down.

But just as he had reached out his greasy paw toward A-Xiang, an old crow had landed on top of the wall outside and let out a hoarse croak, pronouncing some sentence from the netherworld. With his hand still outstretched, Lü had frozen and hiccuped, and, just as if the Heibai Wuchang had called his name, his eyes had grown wider and wider, and when they had widened to their fullest extent, he had fallen over dead without a sound!

The dead man's face had been a hand's breadth from A-Xiang's face, branded onto her eyes... How Chunying had thrown herself toward her to untie the ropes, how she had called for help, how the two of them had been taken away, how the coroner had examined the corpse and said he had died of "paralysis of the heart" and they had been released... A-Xiang's impressions of all of this were blurred. The whole night was one deranged nightmare.

A-Xiang put a hand to her chest—she had hidden the reincarnation wood amulet in her clothes.

She remembered that there had seemed to be a voice in her ear. Then a line of writing had flashed over the “amulet.”

Had the Grand Duke...truly worked a miracle?

Suddenly, there was pounding on the shack’s door. A-Xiang shook with fright. Chunying put her arms around her. “Who’s there?”

“A-Xiang! A-Xiang, hurry, hurry...open the door! Your grandpa! Your grandpa!”

A-Xiang’s soul, floating around her head, staggered back into her body. She scrambled outside.

The old man looked hardly human, feet swollen to the size of boats, features buried in overturned flesh and blood. A few fellow workers had carried him back on a stretcher. The undulation of his chest was rapid and shallow. He didn’t wake when called. Any moment, he might breathe his last.

A-Xiang's mind buzzed, and her knees went weak. She was pulled up by the hair by Chunying. "Go get a doctor!"

Pang Jian walked out of the depths of the southern outskirts's fog and fanned away the choking dust and ash. Before he could closely examine his surroundings, a skinny figure charged out of a dim alley.

Pang Jian turned and dodged, but this person still stamped on his boot.

While Commander Pang's foot wasn't quite cast in reinforced steel, it was close enough. He was fine, but the person who had stepped on him went sprawling face first and twisted an ankle.

"Hey, are you..."

...all right?

This was a girl in her teens. She must have had urgent business. She spared no attention to say anything to him, only got to her feet, limping, and ran.

Pang Jian only thought she looked familiar. Because he could see she was a child, he didn't think anything of it. Using a piece of gauze with a karma beast drawn on it, he took out a reincarnation wood amulet.

The karma beast's fur was standing on end. On the gauze, it was constantly roaring at the reincarnation wood. Pang Jian took out a stick of charcoal and drew a flower on the brick wall next to him, letting the karma beast on the gauze climb onto the wall where the drawing was.

“The evil energy points to the southern outskirts. Please lead the way, sacred beast.”

The karma beast wagged its head, readied its hooves, and dashed off along the wall. Pang Jian followed at once, now and then casually drawing a few strokes on the wall to make a “road” for the sacred beast.

Meanwhile, blue-clothed walkers in the mortal world split up and landed in different places in the southern outskirts. Dozens of karma beasts ran back and forth over the crude and mottled walls, searching for evil energy with bitter hatred.

Lantern light and the glow of swords lit up the forces of evil dancing through the southern outskirts.

In the Qiu courtyard in the Latent Cultivation Temple, under the great evil cultivator's notice, even Xi Ping's breath stopped for a moment.

Suddenly, he charged out the door like an angry horse. “Xi Yue!”

Xi Yue had just drawn some water. Before he could set it down firmly, he was grabbed by Xi Ping.

Xi Ping cut open his fingertip and, brooking no argument, smeared blood on the dragon-taming chain.

The irascible young master said, coldly, “Starting now, without my order, you must not leave this courtyard, must not say one word, write one character, or make one gesture to the stewards in the Latent Cultivation Temple or the immortals from the inner sect.”

Xi Yue couldn’t speak. He could only open his eyes wide in astonishment, finding to his despair that his naïve master had been bewildered by evil.

But Tai Sui laughed. “Your half-puppet has that dragon-taming chain around his neck. There’s no need to be so nervous.”

“I haven’t learned how to use my consciousness to control it. A drop of blood only works for a few days.” Xi Ping looked at Xi Yue and, grim-faced, returned to his room. He said to Tai Sui, “That thing is sneaky and doesn’t make a sound when he walks. I’m always forgetting about him. I have to think ahead. Hey, listen, senior, what’s going on with you?! There’s a master coming from the inner sect tomorrow, how can you still laugh? Even I'm worried for you!"

Tai Sui said, "If you're uneasy, when you see the princess tomorrow, you can leave it to me to handle her. There's no need to be scared."

"No, wait." Xi Ping seemed to truly be anxious on his behalf. He nearly became rude. "Senior, can you take it? That princess is even more powerful than General Zhi! Are you sure she won't be able to tell anything? If it were really so easy, wouldn't people be sneaking into Xuanyin Mountain's inner sect every day?"

"Little devil." Tai Sui faintly felt there was a string in his words and coolly interrupted him. "Are you trying to teach me a lesson?"

Xi Ping choked for a moment, remembering the killing intent that had come through reincarnation wood earlier. He seemed to turn cowardly once more. "That's not what I meant, senior, I...I'm scared. Heaven's Design Pavilion grabbed Jiangli's...Chen-jiejie and the others' reincarnation wood amulets. We made such a commotion just now, it might have alerted Heaven's Design Pavilion already, so the inner sect must also know! And today at the Yanhai Building, I openly asked for the princess's reincarnation wood carving, so..."

Tai Sui, hearing that he was scared into babbling, softened his voice slightly. “Naturally I am not the same as others. Never mind Duanrui, even if Xuanyin Mountain’s old monster of the Office of Fate Zhang Jue, came, you still wouldn’t need to be scared.”

Xi Ping’s eyelashes shook faintly—a possession that couldn’t even be seen by those who read the stars had to be caused by swapping a life, didn’t it?

“As for Heaven’s Design Pavilion...” Tai Sui laughed aloud. “Let them come find me if they can. I’d like to see them find a needle in the ocean.”

After going through the southern outskirts, white clouds would turn at once to ill omens. Pang Jian felt that his nose had turned grey from the fumes.

His face grave, he respectfully sent away the sacred beasts that were so tired their tongue were nearly hanging out. Then he irritably turned to look at the “results” those sacred beasts had dug up—they’d caught a gang of grave robbers; picked up a few shops specializing in selling human blood mantou, corpse grease, and prohibited drugs; turned up the already rotting corpses of several prostitutes; and collected a bundle of infant bones in a doghouse...including several femurs, so the bones had to belong to more than one person.

All the southern outskirts were like a big quagmire that sheltered villainy. When a pebble rolled in, you couldn't find even a trace of it.

Pang Jian exhaled wearily and was about to speak when he heard a shrill scream from a nearby shack: "Grandpa!"

A half-immortal's hearing could catch the buzzing of an insect a hundred meters away. Pang Jian froze. He heard people sighing and groaning, saying "my condolences" and useless things like that.

Someone had died before daybreak...

As he thought this, he forgot what he had just been about to say.

"Clear out," Pang Jian said after a long moment, waving a hand. "Hand those...those people over to the city guard and let them see what needs to be done. I'll go report to the immortal mountain."

On the comfortable west bank of the Lingyang River, Bai Ling slipped into Prince Zhuang Manor's south study. The paper figure landed gently on the ground and turned into the pale, skinny man. He turned and reached out to sweep a hand over the inscription by the window. Silver light flashed over the inscription. The south study's windows were all wide open, but not a trace of what was said inside left the room.

But despite this, Bai Ling still lowered his voice cautiously. “Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s Assistant Commander Pang just sent a Heavenly Question to the immortal mountains. He must be asking for instructions concerning some great matter—the news I have received is that, for reasons unknown, there was some sudden change to the wooden amulets they discovered on those evil cultivators who coveted the Dragon Vein before.”

Prince Zhuang asked, “When did this happen?”

Bai Ling said, “On the night of the meteor shower.”

Prince Zhuang’s brow furrowed tightly—when Xi Ping had said he’d named the half-puppet Xi Yue, it had been the small hours of the morning on the day after the meteor shower.

That didn’t seem to be a normal time for him to get out of bed.

“Do you think that Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s business may have to do with the Viscount?” Bai Ling asked. “Your Highness, as I see it, there was nothing untoward in the Viscount’s response... But you ought to warn him not to mention the name of an established foundation master on a downgraded immortal tool. Aren’t you being...”

Too paranoid.

“He grew up with the old lady. He must have noticed that the letter was a forgery.” Prince Zhuang shook his head. “It contained my family taboo. If there really was nothing the matter, he would have used the fact that he’d ‘caught on’ to make trouble. Then there’s that Luo Qingshi, who clearly doesn’t like him. When have you ever seen him talk to his family about people he doesn’t get along with?”

Bai Ling: “...”

Putting it like that, it really was a little odd, in fact.

“He deliberately mentioned Luo Qingshi, probably to test whether the white jade proximal was safe or not... Luo already has an established foundation, and he’s a senior steward of the Latent Cultivation Temple. If Shiyong is willing to offend him, it proves that the brat’s stirred up trouble worse than he’d get from an established foundation cultivator.”

Bai Ling still thought he was making too much of it. Tactfully, he said, “Though the Latent Cultivation Temple only belongs to the outer sect, it’s still a critical location for the immortal mountain. They absolutely wouldn’t let any outsiders infiltrate it, not unless they’d snatched a body. But body snatching can only happen between cultivators. The Viscount had no previous contact with cultivation sects, and it would be very hard for him to open his spiritual eyes right upon entering the sect, wouldn't it?"

"It hasn't come to that," Prince Zhuang said. "He must have written the letter himself. The average person couldn't imitate his style of asking for a beating."

"But if it's only a primordial being possessing him, then that person is being too careless. A person whose body has been possessed by a primordial being has a separation between body and soul. Even I would be able to see there was something wrong, never mind the Latent Cultivation Temple, which is connected to the sect and might have established foundation cultivators...or even ascended spirit peak masters coming to lecture in person."

"That's the general rule." Prince Zhuang's fingers tapped now and again on his desk. "Before he received the selection card, his only contact with cultivation was that time at the Blissful Village. The reason General Zhi personally came down from the mountain must have been on account of that evil cultivator. An evil cultivator who disturbed Zhaoting itself, nearly provoked an earthquake, and likely even escaped with his life from Zhaoting... The great Way has three thousand paths, and there are too many knacks within those. Your 'general rule' may not apply universally."

“If it is concerned with the great evil cultivator at the Blissful Village, Heaven’s Design Pavilion must already be investigating. Your Highness, shall I find a way to secretly notify Heaven’s Design Pavilion of this?”

Without giving it any thought, Prince Zhuang declined at once: “No.”

Bai Ling froze.

“If you were the immortal sect and one of your young disciples had been possessed by this kind of dangerous individual, what would you do?” Prince Zhuang massaged the joints of his fingers, which could never seem to warm up. Frost seemed to form on his brow. “I don’t trust them.”

“Pardon me, Your Highness,” Bai Ling said quietly, lowering his head, “but if you want me to infiltrate the Latent Cultivation Temple without anyone knowing, I’m afraid that I...”

“I have no intention of making you infiltrate the Latent Cultivation Temple. Even if you made it in, it would be no use.” Prince Zhuang sat down. The more dangerous the situation was, the calmer his expression seemed. “The evil cultivator possessing him would certainly notice you before he did and kill him in an instant.”

Bai Ling gave up. “Please instruct me, Your Highness.”

“Wait. First let’s see what his next letter says.” Prince Zhuang tapped on the white jade proximal. “Before that, I want you to find out the full story behind that evil cultivator at the Blissful Village.”

Bai Ling had never questioned his orders. No matter how absurd, he would always carry them out meticulously.

But while he obeyed orders, he still thought this whole thing was rather ridiculous.

Perhaps even the most powerful people couldn’t resist measuring others against themselves. Prince Zhuang himself was full of watchfulness, so he thought that the spheres on other people’s shoulders all contained brains. Anyway, based on Bai Ling’s few encounters with that wastrel, he felt that the young master didn’t seem to be all that canny... If something had truly gone wrong, instead of relying on him to cooperate in saving himself, it would be better to send him a curse to ease his suffering.

Bai Ling thought that perhaps the Viscount had been careless and not read the letter closely. Wasn’t it very normal for a young and vigorous fellow not to have the patience to finish reading an old lady’s ramblings? He might not even have noticed that the letter had their prince’s family taboo in it.

As for the name he had given the half-puppet... Who knew what had gotten into his head? When the big black cat chased its own tail while yowling, there was also no reason for it.

“A false alarm,” Bai Ling thought. “I hope that’s... No, it must be a false alarm.”

Before leaving by the courtyard gate, he turned back to look at the south study. Lantern light cast Prince Zhuang’s shadow on the window, like thick, stagnant black clouds.

There was no friendship between Bai Ling and Xi Ping.

It was only that...there was no affection from his father the emperor, he was at odds with his brothers, and after that business, Prince Zhuang had been estranged from the Imperial Consort and had only gotten along with his maternal uncle’s family on the surface. In all these years, apart from some transient cats and dogs, the only living creature at his side had been Xi Ping, who had grown up following him around like a lackey.

Bai Ling sometimes thought that if that arrogant and disrespectful Viscount were gone, then perhaps His Highness’s last emotional tie to the world would vanish.

But on this day, Prince Zhuang waited without receiving Xi Ping's letter.

Princess Duanrui, having said she was going to come lecture, for some reason put it off. The disciples once again ended up in Luo Qingshi's hands.

Perhaps because Xi Ping's portrait hadn't been to his liking, Luo Qingshi was even more vicious than usual, glaring at Xi Ping and biting as if he had gone crazy.

Xi Ping was tossed into a training mustard seed and trapped there for a whole day. When the other stewards came to intercede, they had no success.

If not for the great evil cultivator thinking he still had some use and occasionally giving him a pointer, Xi Ping would nearly have had his face disfigured by the monsters and goblins inside.

When he finally made it to evening, Xi Ping, more dead than alive, was dragged back to the Qiu courtyard...and ran into Yao Qi at the courtyard gate.

“Why haven't you gone in, Ziming-xiong?” As a prime example of “broken in health but mean in spirit,”¹⁷ Xi Ping had to tease Yao Qi even with his last breath. “Were you so concerned about me that you waited...”

At this point, Xi Ping shut his mouth—past Yao Qi’s shoulder, he saw that there were two people in a little pavilion inside the Qiu courtyard, playing weiqi.

One man and one woman. The man was an acquaintance—General Zhi.

The woman was dressed all in white clothing and looked young, but each of her gestures had a particular kind of prudence. Hearing movement, she raised her eyes and looked over. Her eyes were like black frost, able to piece a mortal’s soul at a glance.

Xi Ping gave a start, making a faint guess as to her identity.

“You’re all back?” Zhi Xiu pretended not to know that Yao Qi had just nearly worn the steps of the Qiu courtyard flat with his pacing. He stood and beckoned to them. “Come over here and meet your Duanrui-shishu.”

The familiar sensation of shackles came from every joint. Without so much as a warning, Tai Sui had taken over Xi Ping’s body.

CHAPTER 25 - The Dragon Bites Its Tail (13)

As soon as he saw Princess Duanrui, Xi Ping's heart cooled by half—the princess wasn't the way he had imagined her.

He had originally thought that since, in one year in the Latent Cultivation Temple, this senior had somehow found enough time to do so much crafting and yet had still managed to get into the inner sect, she must have been one of those lazy geniuses, the kind that could get to be Number One Scholar without trying. The carvings and stuffed toys each showed a different manner, but all the old relics gave off a strong air of wit. Xi Ping had seen them and wanted to bow to her across hundreds of years in a show of admiration.

But as for this person in front of him, never mind “wit”—she simply didn't even have “air.”

To put it nicely, she seemed like an ice and jade carving of a goddess—the kind that oversaw the laws and commandments of heaven and showed no mercy.

If you were to put it plainly...she was like a mallet that had grown legs.

In the middle of the night last night, when Xi Ping had taken it into his head to silence the half-puppet, it was hard to say that he had been doing it purely for Tai Sui's benefit. In fact, there was a faint concern in his mind: in the current circumstances, could the evil cultivator easily be parted from him?

If he couldn't, and the immortal sect learned of this matter, would they prioritize expelling evil...or sparing him?

Xi Ping "watched" as Tai Sui, wearing his skin, went into the courtyard with Chang Jun and Yao Qi and fearfully prepared to bow. Whether anyone else saw a flaw in this performance, Xi Ping couldn't say, but he, at any rate, thought this demure appearance was extremely awkward. He thought: You've blown enough hot air to fill a whole room, but can you avoid slipping up?

What to do, what to do...

Just then, the princess looked his way again. Xi Ping's scalp went numb for a time. He thought that her expression looking at a human being was the same as if she were looking at an inanimate object.

In a flash, nameless fear spurted up in his heart. An intuition came out of nowhere straight into his mind: as soon as she found out there was a parasitic evil god in him, she would break him to pieces with one slap on the spot.

“Senior.” Xi Ping quickly came to a decision and said to Tai Sui, “Princess Duanrui is completely different from what I imagined. I would definitely take another look. Why are you keeping your head down? Do you know what you’re doing?!”

Tai Sui at once realized: yes, this kid had absolutely no common sense. He was bold enough to take on heaven. He didn’t care who the princess was; he had never “kept himself to himself”!

The next moment, Zhi Xiu’s gaze swept over, and Tai Sui, in a remarkably accurate imitation of Xi Ping’s manner, “thinking he was being circumspect,” dodged behind Chang Jun and “curiously” began to examine the princess.

Zhi Xiu smiled at him and briefly introduced the princess and her position—a forebear of the Zhou family going back many generations, more than you could count on your fingers. It seemed that she had a longer record than even the coiled dragon towers in Guangyun Palace. In a rare occurrence, Green Pool Peak had opened up to take new disciples, and as the princess had just left seclusion, she had come in person to see the disciples’ potential.

Xi Ping quickly said to Tai Sui, “I told you the inner sect must have heard the news—senior, you focus on dealing with her, give me back my mouth.”

Tai Sui lowered his eyelashes, eyes flashing.

“Hurry up, senior.” Xi Ping was urgent and became a little rude. “You lisp when you speak in Jinping dialect! You may not know it yourself, but how could General Zhi not hear it? If you want to get yourself killed, don’t drag me into it like a fetus dying with its mother, all right?!”

Tai Sui snorted. Then, he really did “give back” Xi Ping’s power of speech.

Xi Ping, taken by surprise, opened his mouth and choked on the cold wind. He couldn’t resist coughing a few times.

Zhi Xiu said, smiling, “Why are you coughing? Nervous?”

Xi Ping had just taken back his voice, but he had his words ready. He picked up without any gap: “Why would I be nervous? I don’t want to enter the inner sect, anyway. I’m nervous on others’ behalf. Shishu, the Latent Cultivation Temple doesn’t even let us talk to the female disciples, so the inner sect must be even more strict, right?”

Though there was a gulf of age difference between levels of seniority in the sect, most of these unaging, undying cultivators appeared to be in the prime of life. Supposing men and women were permitted to mingle, even if there was nothing wrong to begin with, something was bound to go wrong. In a place like Xuanyin Mountain, with rules and regulations a zhang long, there had to be an unspoken rule that a man and woman couldn't be master and disciple.

“Anyway, Duanrui-shishu isn't going to take male disciples while she's here.” Xi Ping, in a realistic performance, sighed. “I suppose some of my classmates thought they were sure bets for the inner sect, but it turns out that they went wrong in reincarnating... Ah, unjust, how unjust!”

“So you understand.” Zhi Xiu pointed to him. “Come over here.”

Xi Ping gave an oh and approached, bowing respectfully to Princess Duanrui, his mouth running like the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon: “Hello, Duanrui-shishu. I saw some of your genuine works in the Yanhai Building yesterday, and I was astonished by your talent. That Elder Su is very stingy. I begged for ages, and he only gave me one. Could you put in a word for me? I also want that cat with chicken wings.”

Princess Duanrui had only nodded her head in response when he had said hello. She didn't pick up the conversation.

However reticent a person was, having heard someone talk, she would still have some reaction. Even if her face were paralyzed, at least her eyes would blink. But Xi Ping felt that all his nonsense hit a wall, bouncing back the way it had come. Not one word entered her ears.

For a time, despite all his wordiness, he actually couldn't quite come up with what to say.

Duanrui said, "Your hand."

Xi Ping inwardly called to Tai Sui: "Senior?"

"It's fine," said Tai Sui. "Give it to her."

Xi Ping moved his eyes, rolled up his sleeve, and presented his hand.

"Shishu, if my natural endowments are no good, just don't tell me, I'm a frail..."

Princess Duanrui didn't touch him, only glanced at Xi Ping's palm. A formless chill immediately pricked the Place of Toil acupoint on his palm and, in the blink of an eye, traveled throughout his whole body, then slipped back out through his hand.

Half a beat late, Xi Ping shuddered.

As before, Duanrui's expression didn't move a hair. Xi Ping's heart tightened slightly. All his ability to read expressions lost effect in front of her.

But Princess Duanrui didn't say anything, only called over Chang Jun and Yao Qi to examine each of them in turn...as if she was rummaging through a crate of mediocre yams.

After all three of them had been examined, she gave Zhi Xiu an inscrutable look, then walked out.

Tai Sui said, "It's all right."

Only then did Xi Ping almost imperceptibly let out a breath. For a time, he couldn't say whether his heart had eased or sunk.

But when the princess reached the gate of the Qiu courtyard, she seemed to remember something.

She stopped in her tracks, looked back, and beckoned. Something broke through the window of Xi Ping's north rooms and nearly brushed his head as it flew over, landing in that hand that seemed to be carved out of ice.

The corners of Xi Ping's eyes tightened—what Duanrui had grabbed was that karma beast carved out of reincarnation wood!

The gazes of the two great ascended spirit masters fell simultaneously on the little wood carving.

Duanrui: "..."

Zhi Xiu: "Pfft..."

The heavy-browed, big-eyed karma beast, after only one day in Xi Ping's hands, had changed its appearance—Xi Ping had penciled its eyebrows, applied eyeliner, drawn red lips with cinnabar...and next to the bloody maw, he had even dotted a matchmaker's mole!¹⁸

Princess Duanrui briefly met the eyes of the arrestingly glamorous karma beast, then gave it to Zhi Xiu, turned, and left.

Zhi Xiu put the wooden carving on a small stone table next to him. He pointed at Xi Ping. "Look out in the future when you join Heaven's Design Pavilion. The sacred beasts will crawl out in the middle of the night and bite your toes."

Xi Ping, grinning cheekily, saw them out, savoring General Zhi's words.

“In the future when you join Heaven's Design Pavilion”—it seemed that these two top masters of Xuanyin Mountain had in fact been fooled... The great evil cultivator was the real deal.

He wasn't in the mood to chat with Chang Jun and Yao Qi. He picked up the karma beast and went back to his rooms.

“Senior, what way does Princess Duanrui cultivate? Why is she so creepy?”

“Word has it that it's the ‘way of clarity.’” Tai Sui was very satisfied with him. He said, mildly, “You didn't panic in the face of danger. It was well done.”

Xi Ping sighed. “If you hadn't been controlling my legs, senior, they would have been shaking—what kind of way is the way of clarity?”

“The way of clarity is also called the way of unfeeling,” Tai Sui said. “When you enter this path, you know no sensation from your five senses, are unmoved by the seven human emotions, see through the fate of humankind and common human relations, extinguish the six desires, and become one with heaven.”

Xi Ping understood. “In other words, chopping me up would be no different for her than chopping up firewood.”

Tai Sui laughed.

Xi Ping scrutinized the karma beast that the princess had made... So keen, as if it were alive, as if it could roll over and run off at any moment. “I didn’t think she would be so...”

Cruel.

“I thought she would be one of the seniors practicing the way of toolmaking or something.”

“The way you enter depends on what Way of the Heart you have,” Tai Sui said. “Do you think all Ways of the Heart are one’s own?”

Xi Ping: “...”

What...what else would they be?

Could you take one of these things out for a short-term loan?

The Latent Cultivation Temple's shixiong teaching them the basics had said, "Your heart must not be contrary to your Way of the Heart, and your actions must be steadfast."

The Way of the Heart that a cultivator believed in had to match his principles, be able to explain everything in existence. It had to be constantly refined, becoming more integrated day by day. When your Way of the Heart had no delusions, that would be the greatest success. But supposing that you developed doubts about your Way of the Heart in the process of cultivating, then most likely your cultivation would stagnate where it was.

Xi Ping, however, didn't understand why as perspicacious a person as Elder Su would say he had no Way of the Heart while Luo Qingshi could establish a foundation—he felt that Gentle Luo most likely cultivated the "way of abuse."

"Those who can feel out their own Way of the Heart are few and far between," Tai Sui said with a mocking laugh. "To use your Xuanyin's inner sect as an example, the vast majority of the established foundation cultivators' Ways of the Heart are copied from their teachers or left behind by mighty elders. If one of the present masters is taking disciples, you'll hardly have time to fight over the chance. How could you possibly pick which way to enter? The monster Duanrui was chosen by a peak master of the Zhou family who cultivated the way of clarity. The way of clarity is hard.

Up to now, there has yet to be a shed skin cultivator belonging to it. Her shifu stopped in the middle ascended spirit stage, but she is a near-shed skin now. How cold and ruthless must her temperament be? Ah, though you understand nothing, you still know what's good for you.”

Xi Ping was silent. He found that he was caught between two impossible alternatives.

In one direction, he might be taken by a ruthless lady immortal for the vessel of an evil cultivator and exterminated along with him.

In the other direction, he could only hold out until the last gasp, waiting for his body to be snatched.

He was still young, after all, far from having lived enough. In these desperate straits, Xi Ping only wanted to squat where he was.

For example...he could just never open his spiritual eyes and hold out until he left the mountain a year from now.

Working hard to succeed was a struggle for him, but he certainly knew how to slack off and shirk.

That was what he always did.

If the great evil cultivator stayed with him for the rest of his life, he...he would probably get used to it over time.

“For now, adjust your breathing and meditate. If you really can’t settle down, go find something else to do. Stop asking about that old monster,” Tai Sui said, for once kind. “With the power of a cultivator half a step from shedding her skin bearing down, even an established foundation cultivator might lose his mind on the spot. The abilities of the way of unfeeling are keen. If you keep thinking about her, take care that your mind isn’t damaged.”

Xi Ping felt that as soon as he thought of the princess’s cold eyes, he felt a chill coming up from the cracks in his bones, so he listened to this advice. He picked up the reincarnation wood carving and concentrated on the center of his brow. He wanted to have a look at how the grown-up lady and the little lady were doing. The outcome was that his eyes filled with funeral banners.

He stared blankly for a while, feeling extremely dejected, then went to sleep to the sound of the Soul Calling Melody.

Due to Princess Duanrui’s arrival, the atmosphere in Chengjing Hall was extremely severe. The stewards going in and out didn’t even dare to breathe loudly.

Su Zhun rubbed the tip of his nose. He kept thinking that his breath was freezing into frost as he exhaled.

“Don’t bring tea, she only drinks plain water,” Zhi Xiu alerted him quietly.

“Have everyone disperse. There’s no need for them to be so nervous.”

“We’re afraid of snubbing...” said Su Zhun.

“At her level of the way of clarity, she is no longer moved by external things. Whether you rain down curses or shower her with flattery, it’s all the same to her. She won’t care if she’s snubbed or not. You’d be better off acting a little more natural.” Zhi Xiu waved a hand and walked into Chengjing Hall. “Go about your business, stop running around her.”

Princess Duanrui seemed to be ready to enter meditation with her eyes open at any moment. When someone said something next to her, her eyelids didn’t even flicker. Only when Zhi Xiu had dispatched Su Zhun and the rest of the stewards did she speak without preamble: “There’s no problem with that disciple who had contact with the evil cultivators. His body and mind are one.”

Zhi Xiu said, “The carving he took yesterday was of reincarnation wood. Anything wrong with the wood?”

Duanrui said, “There are no inscriptions, and no air of blood.”

Reincarnation wood was third rate timber. It was indeed rarely seen among the wealthy, but it wasn’t an uncommon material in the south. The common people used whatever wood was available; they used reincarnation wood to build door frames, furniture, coffins, anything. There was nothing wrong with the wood itself.

For the evil cultivators to use it to communicate amongst themselves, they would either have to carve inscriptions into the wood to turn it into an immortal tool, or use some evil art to first establish a connection and then to send messages back and forth using fresh blood as a medium.

What the princess meant was that nothing had been done to the reincarnation wood carving in Xi Ping’s possession.

“Very well.” Zhi Xiu’s brow didn’t unknit. “My handling of this business was unsuccessful...”

Halfway through his sentence, he looked up and met the princess’s eyes, which were like ancient wells, and felt that he was apologizing to a tree hollow. He couldn't finish what he was saying. So Zhi Xiu paused, dropped his bureaucratic tone, and got down to business. "There are many suspicious points here. I wish to ask you for instruction, shijie. Even if this evil cultivator had created a primordial being, it would also have been destroyed by Zhaoting. How could he still be stirring up trouble? Shijie, do you think there's someone else behind it now, or that it's really as Su Zhun says—this is an evil god who can use the bodies of his followers to come back to life?"

Duanrui answered cautiously: "Stories of ghosts and gods are fabrications, but in my eight hundred futile years in the world, I have not heard of this one."

The mortal world would indeed call cultivators from immortal sects "deities" and "celestial beings" and things of that nature. Some very powerful shed skin cultivators had even been made into gods by the commoners and received offerings of incense during holidays—but actually that was just superstition.

Never mind mere incense ash, even if you lit Guangyun Palace on fire, the smoke still wouldn't reach Xuanyin Mountain. However strong a cultivator's spiritual sense, they would still only be able to perceive people and things with a karmic connection to them. They couldn't just "hear" any random person setting off fireworks and calling on their spirit.

Even the Southern Sage who was said in legend to have ascended to heaven was more symbol and ritual than anything else; at any rate, at her age, Princess Duanrui had never heard of him working a miracle.

Zhi Xiu asked, “But, shijie, didn’t my shizun say that the location in the Sea of Stars that was disturbed this time is identical to last time?”

Duanrui said, “Yes.”

Zhi Xiu’s brow furrowed tighter. “Shijie, I can’t understand that.”

“The Dignitary of Fate High Elder asked me to pass on that the mortal world has been tranquil for thousands of years, and many historical matters cannot be examined, but the traces of the Great War of Gods and Demons may not have been cleared away,” Duanrui said, mildly. “But if this truly is an ancient god or demon who has arisen, the Sea of Stars would long ago have been in an uproar. It’s absolutely impossible for it to show only some small waves.”

Zhi Xiu considered these words carefully. “What shizun means is that this person doing evil under the name of Grand Duke Tai Sui may only be some mad devotee who has found some ancient relic?”

Duanrui nodded and took out a small token. “The sect’s order—until this matter is resolved, you may leave at any time without need to report.”

“Thank you.” Zhi Xiu accepted the token and cupped his hand politely toward the princess. He stood up, then remembered something and asked, “Shijie, earlier, if you really had found that that young disciple had been possessed by a primordial being, what would you have done?”

Without hesitation, Duanrui said, “Expelled the evil.”

“But what if...the human and the demon couldn’t be easily separated?”

The prattling Xi Ping shut his mouth, meditating or sleeping, and Tai Sui’s ears were finally at peace.

The half-puppet Xi Yue, his steps lighter than a feather as usual, came in and picked up the boots his master had kicked away, then went out to clean them.

Suddenly, Xi Ping’s legs twitched. Tai Sui felt his heart rate speed up without cause. He must have been having a nightmare.

The great evil cultivator was unsurprised—it would have been unusual if the brat hadn’t had nightmares.

Human nature was utterly weak, especially that of a good-for-nothing like Xi Ping. Even if he had been moved for a time by righteousness, less than three days later, wasn't he beating a retreat, unwilling to put in hard work? Tai Sui knew that he had temporarily scared him into behaving, but relying on this type of person to act alongside him in Xuanyin Mountain, where danger lurked on every side, would be naïve.

Tai Sui would have dared to bet that if this rich kid found out that he was weaker than the immortals of Xuanyin, he would sell him out in terror.

It wasn't that he couldn't control him. It was just that being constantly on guard against him was annoying, so the Grand Duke had had to...use some tricks.

All of Xi Ping's functions—including heart rate and breathing, which he couldn't control himself—were under Tai Sui's control. His eyes were naturally no exception.

When they had walked into the Qiu courtyard in the evening, he had played a trick on Xi Ping's eyes.

A cultivator half a step from shedding her skin was already hard to look at directly. All he needed to do was add an embellishment of killing intent over the brat's eyes, then make his heart rate speed up, the hairs on his neck rise, and his feet and hands sweat, and he would feel like a frog being stared down by a snake.

Tai Sui had given Xi Ping the power of speech at the time because he hadn't been at all afraid of Xi Ping ruining things—he had known that Xi Ping wouldn't dare.

A mortal's body and heart were always one. Even though he hadn't yet succeeded in snatching this body, that didn't mean that he couldn't control this useless young master's thoughts.

Xi Yue brought back the boots he had knocked all the dust off of and pulled the quilt over his master.

When he bent his head, he saw that Xi Ping's brow was tightly knitted, but there was a peculiar smile on his lips. The half-puppet paused in spite of himself. After a moment, he closed the window and put out the lights, then silently withdrew once more. He curled up on a little couch in the outer room...and raised a hand to press down on the dragon-taming chain.

Light flashed over the dragon-taming chain, and he heard his master's roar coming from inside it.

“And he just used my face to smile! Did you see that?! Even Grand Mountain Luo didn’t touch my face, and now that fucking son of a bitch goes and disfigures it with that smile!”

Xi Yue had never spoken in his life. Though he didn’t need to use his mouth now, his reactions when it came to language were still slow. He didn’t have time to chime in. He could only quietly listen to Xi Ping cursing, struggling to remember some words in the hopes that next time he could echo him.

When Xi Ping had started to quake with fear out of nowhere on first seeing Princess Duanrui, he had at once faintly thought that something was off.

Though he in fact didn’t have any idea how frightening a cultivator half a step from shedding her skin, who could “make even an established foundation cultivator lose his mind on the spot,” was, Duanrui-shishu must have been holding back at the time—even Yao Ziming hadn’t lost control of his bowels on the spot, so how scary could she be?

Fortunately, Xi Ping had smeared blood on the half-puppet’s dragon-taming chain the day before, and there was still a connection.

So Xi Ping had quietly borrowed Xi Yue’s eyes and “looked” from another point of view: the princess was only not as amiable as General Zhi; she wasn’t covered all over in fiendish energy!

The evil cultivator could not only make him speak with a lisp, he was also trying to manipulate his emotions! Wasn't he trying to make it so he would have to do whatever he wanted?!

“Xi Yue.” Xi Ping took a breath and quietly asked through the dragon-taming chain, “Do you dare to do something for me?”

CHAPTER 26 - The Dragon Bites Its Tail (14)

At last Xi Yue found a chance to respond. Through the dragon-taming chain, he inexpertly expressed, “Remove...the prohibition, I’ll...report to... the immortals.”

Xi Ping was silent for a while. “Are you afraid of dying?”

At first, Xi Yue answered sincerely: “I am.”

But after considering it carefully for a moment, he thought that there was no sense in him being afraid; it was even a little self-important of him. So he changed his answer: “I’m not.”

“Oh?” said Xi Ping. “Is there an array in your head, too, or something? If it doesn’t work well, say the word, and in the future I’ll think of a way to get someone to fix it for you.”

Xi Yue: “...”

That didn’t seem like a compliment.

“Listen to me,” Xi Ping said, “not only can I not remove your prohibition, I’m going to have to strengthen it soon.”

The half-puppet was bewildered.

“Today the princess ‘scared me so much I couldn’t look after myself.’ When I wake up, I’ll definitely be in a panic. If I don’t even remember to strengthen your prohibition, it won’t seem right,” Xi Ping said. “If I ‘don’t remember,’ that old roundworm that calls himself a grand duke will remember it for me. The two of us put together don’t know as many things as he has at the back of his mind. Trying to match the old roundworm in tricks is just asking for death. So I can’t let him stay on his guard against me, or else he’ll give me hallucinations during the day and won’t let me sleep at night. Who can stand that? I have to steel myself and gang up with him, be even more paranoid than he is, be so paranoid even he’ll be annoyed.”

The half-puppet only understood some of this.

Then he heard Xi Ping suddenly stop, then murmur to himself, “Do you think I can trust General Zhi and the others?”

If expelling the evil was difficult, could he trust the immortal mountain to do their best to protect him?

A young disciple from the outer sect must be the most minor figure possible for Xuanyin Mountain...

Xi Ping had just entered the sect. He didn't know how the immortals operated—at any rate, he knew that if something like this had happened in the mortal world, then he would definitely be out of luck.

The half-puppet was even less familiar with immortal sects, though it was Zhi Xiu who had saved his life with a single sentence, so he stammered out his opinion.

This time, Xi Ping was silent for even longer. Xi Yue almost thought he really had gone to sleep.

“They can protect me if they like. It's their business. There's nothing I can do about it,” Xi Ping said. “If that bastard succeeds in snatching my body, he might do some wretched things under my identity that would implicate my whole family. But if I render a great service, then even if the immortals accidentally take me along when they're expelling the evil, they'll have to give the whole set of posthumous honors and compensation to the bereaved family. Let's be reasonable.”

Xi Yue was so anxious he stopped stuttering. “That won't happen!”

Xi Ping ignored him. “In Introduction to Spiritual Sense, it says that a master's spiritual sense can be touched by someone with a karmic connection to him.

Just now, I called on General Zhi's spirit a hundred eighty times. If that lousy book didn't deceive me, he must have been able to feel it. If tomorrow after I leave he brings people to search my rooms, then we'll...give the matter some further thought. If he comes by himself, you'll act according to what I'm going to teach you. Listen carefully, I know you have a good memory, you can hear a tune once and learn to whistle it. You have to get this exactly right..."

Tai Sui took the opportunity of his noisy and obnoxious "tenant" going to sleep and finally managed to concentrate his attention on cycling the immortal mountain's spiritual energy. He had just entered meditation when he was disturbed by Xi Ping sitting up like a risen corpse.

Xi Ping had had some kind of nightmare. Looking scared out of his wits, he threw off his quilt and got out of bed barefoot, then charged toward the half-puppet in the outer room. On his way he grabbed a decorative sword and slashed at his palm.

Luckily Tai Sui saw him sleepwalking and guessed what he was about to do. Before the blade touched his flesh, the great evil cultivator just barely controlled Xi Ping's hand and quietly called into his ear: "Wake up! Kid, you can't explain that big a sword injury on your hand with simple clumsiness."

Xi Ping tossed his head hard to clear it.

He heaved several large breaths, recovered, then carefully used the sword blade to make a small cut on his index finger. He squeezed out a drop of blood and smeared it on the dragon-taming chain, repeating the prohibition he had put on the half-puppet before.

Tai Sui thought he was pretty funny. “Didn’t you just do that yesterday? The prohibitions on that dragon-taming chain of yours don’t disappear so quickly.”

“It’s just in case.” Xi Ping’s gaze was still vague, anxiously wavering over the unlit room, as if Princess Duanrui was going to pop out at any time. “Until those two great personages from the inner sect leave, I have to apply the prohibition every day... Ah, it’s too much trouble to squeeze out blood every day, what if I cut some discreet place and keep a bowl...”

Tai Sui thought that things were going badly; the medicine was too strong. This good-for-nothing had already started to rave. “Blood dries when it’s left out.”

“Oh, that’s right.” Xi Ping froze. “True, true...”

Using every possible means of persuasion, Tai Sui coaxed Xi Ping back into the bedroom to lie down again.

In less than half an incense stick, when Tai Sui had just entered meditation again, Xi Ping once again leapt out of bed.

Tai Sui: "..."

This time Xi Ping seemed to have gone mad. He cut off a tuft of his hair and tied one strand of hair to every door and window crack.

"What are you doing now?" said Tai Sui.

"When I leave tomorrow and close the door after myself, this hair will pull tight," Xi Ping said bizarrely. "This door has to be opened slowly. If you use a bit of strength to open it, the hair will snap. This way, I'll know whether anyone's been here when I come back."

Fancying himself clever like a farmer's wife who could only imagine that the Crown Princess baked bread like she did!

Tai Sui sighed to himself and patiently said, "If an ascended spirit cultivator wants to investigate a room, he doesn't need to go inside himself...and he certainly doesn't need to break in. What are you thinking? Don't waste your strength. Anyway, there's nothing untoward in your rooms."

"...oh," said Xi Ping.

The third time the brat "kicked away the bed," Tai Sui couldn't take it anymore. Brooking no argument, he pinned Xi Ping to the bed and wouldn't let him open his eyes. "Aren't you finished?"

"Senior, how long do you think she's going to lecture? How can I get a bit sick and skip class? Ah...how frustrating, I haven't even had a cold in eight years. Do you think soaking in cold water would work? What could I eat to make myself get the runs like Yao Ziming? Would dirt work?"

Tai Sui: "..."

Tai Sui thought that if he exchanged another word with him, he would be infected with his idiocy. Therefore he forced Xi Ping's wild heartbeat to slow and suppressed his urgent breathing until it was deep and slow.

"Senior," said Xi Ping, "what are you doing, I...can't...breathe..."

His breathing wasn't free, and his head grew heavier and heavier. After a moment, unwillingly, he at last quieted down.

The next day, all means of resistance were of no avail, and Xi Ping was forced by the great evil cultivator to go listen to the princess's lecture—Tai Sui controlled his body the whole way. Otherwise, the brat would have fled at the last moment and perhaps gotten up to some other idiocy.

The Qiu courtyard fell silent. There was only the half-puppet Xi Yue, whistling a lonely tune as he cleaned.

At chen hour, when Xi Yue had just finished sweeping the courtyard within the rooms and had picked up Xi Ping's scattered clothes to wash, suddenly, his wooden hand froze inside the basin as he scrubbed.

Xi Yue slowly raised his head and saw that a tall and slim person had at some point landed in the courtyard and was just watching him attentively.

It was General Zhi.

On his own.

Xi Yue focused. He cautiously stood up and bowed.

“Just as I thought. You're not scared of me anymore now that I've changed clothes,” Zhi Xiu said, smiling. “Come and let me have a look. You've grown so tall in the blink of an eye.”

Xi Yue put his dripping wet hands behind his back and walked over as instructed.

With the nourishment of spiritual stones, the half-puppet had grown considerably. He actually looked like a real person. While the clothes he wore didn't quite fit, the materials were sumptuous, tastefully chosen, and scented. It was clear at a glance they belonged to the young master.

“Shiyong is treating you pretty well.” Zhi Xiu patted him on the head. “You can get back to work.”

After sending off the half-puppet, across a distance of several zhang, he glanced at Xi Ping's northern rooms.

There was a lot of junk, but luckily there was the half-puppet to clean it up for him, so the rooms were quite tidy. There was nothing particularly bad.

That was only right. If there had been anything, Princess Duanrui wouldn't have missed it. If there really was something so formless and untraceable, then it probably it had to be a legendary god or demon.

Zhi Xiu inspected the places where Xi Ping normally lived bit by bit and suspected he was overthinking things. But his spiritual sense had kept leading him here.

As Xi Yue worked, he whistled. Because of his deformed tongue, the sound of his whistling was very particular.

Zhi Xiu listened for a while, then asked him, “Has Shiyong been well lately?”

Xi Yue’s whistling paused. He didn’t answer, only toiled away scrubbing the clothes.

Zhi Xiu looked at the dragon-taming chain around his neck with golden light flowing through it and thought, There’s a prohibition on him not to reveal his master’s personal business.

The dragon-taming chain originated in Shu’s Lingyun Sect. Lingyun excelled in taming spiritual beasts. Spiritual beasts were cruel and headstrong and often had a certain degree of intellect. To take precautions against the spiritual beasts rebelling, beast tamers working with toolmaking masters had made the dragon-taming chain. Each dragon-taming chain only recognized one master, and the “keys” were the master’s mind and blood. They could bind even ancient mythical beasts.

If he had to break it by force, Zhi Xiu would be capable of it, but this half-puppet probably wouldn't live long... The golden light on the dragon-taming chain was very bright, which at least showed that the master's mind was clear.

“All right,” Zhi Xiu said to the half-puppet, “convey to your master that his shishus only find it inconvenient to leave the mountain often. We aren't the lofty and unfeeling ‘celestial beings’ of legend. You can just treat us like ordinary family elders. If you have some problem...or difficulty, you can always come to Chengjing Hall and see me.”

After listening to this, the half-puppet, whether he understood or not, kept scrubbing the clothes with his head down.

Zhi Xiu sighed and turned to go. Suddenly, behind him, the half-puppet blew emptily a few times as though he couldn't find the right pitch, his whistling running across several notes.

Zhi Xiu stopped in his tracks.

The weather at the Latent Cultivation Temple was fine and clear. Xi Yue had brought all of Xi Ping's bedding out into the sun. Inside and out, everything was clean and bright. When the disciples returned in the evening, he had just put away the quilt and was rinsing Xi Ping's writing-brush washer in the courtyard when he saw Yao Qi rush into the Qiu courtyard with his face bright red. Seeing Xi Yue, he glared at him, hating him by extension, then shut his door in inconsolable shame.

Xi Yue thought nothing of it—Young Master Yao was like this every day. He probably wasn't likely to hang himself.

A moment later, Xi Ping arrived right on Yao Qi's heels, joking and laughing with Chang Jun the whole way. When he reached Yao Qi's door, he deliberately blew a long, sweet whistle... He must have been getting up to some fresh wickedness.

When Xi Yue heard whistling, he couldn't resist imitating a couple of notes. Xi Ping seemed to be in a pretty good mood. For once he didn't berate him, even patted him on the head as he walked by. When he reached the study and saw that the proximal's spiritual stone was still going, he took a blue jade out of his clothes and tossed it to the half-puppet. "Here, my reward from Moneybags Luo during evening class. I have no use for it right now, go ahead and eat it."

Tai Sui looked on coldly: in the morning, this brat had all but clung to the doorframe, not wanting to go. Now he was pleased with himself.

Princess Duanrui's lecture in the Songchuang Great Hall was purely a one-person performance. She didn't look at the disciples below her at all. At first Xi Ping had found a corner to curl up in, and he had been as nervous as a conscience-stricken thief for a while. Later, seeing that the princess didn't pay any particular attention to him, he slowly relaxed, his thoughts loosening up once more—the female disciples that he hadn't seen at all since they had entered the mountain were at last listening to a lecture with them!

Though there was a bamboo screen between them, it was no match for the acuteness of Xi Ping's eyes and ears. He heard all the faint movements and whispers on the other side clearly. The talk and laughter of the young ladies seemed to be some kind of potent elixir. Tai Sui looked on as the trembling sick cat turned into an excited big baboon.

The big baboon's excitement lasted throughout the day. In evening class, he once again won a spiritual stone relying on cheating, and on the way back had caught Yao Qi to amuse himself. Even when he returned to his rooms to write home, he was still worked up. He wrote densely and quickly. There seemed to be a spring under his ass that might launch him into the sky any time.

Never mind being useless, he was also a clown and a playboy.

Tai Sui, who had spent all day being annoyed by him, took a rough glance at Xi Ping's letter home. He saw that half of it was describing the petty matter of Yao Qi running whenever he saw him. It was extremely dull. Therefore, putting it out of sight and out of mind, he went to cycle spiritual energy on his own.

As soon as the proximal lit up, Prince Zhuang picked it up. A letter he would normally have read at a glance, he read three times through. After muttering to himself for a moment, Prince Zhuang raised his head and said to Bai Ling, "Xiao Bai, go to Lord Yao's manor for me."

That night, when the grand scribe Lord Yao had already gone to bed, a few page boys cleaned the study, arranged each newly purchased books on the shelves one by one, closed the door, and left.

For a moment, the study was still and silent. Suddenly, one of the new books shook and shot out of the bookcase on its own. It landed on the ground and opened. A piece of paper fell out of it. After the paper landed on the ground, it turned into a man like a little puppet, who quietly picked up the book and returned it to its original place.

Bai Ling quickly scouted the study and found nothing. There was only a letter on the writing desk, held down by a paperweight. It was a few insipid sentences, only a report that the writer was safe and sound. The date was the fifteenth day of the fourth month. The signature was “your son Qi kneels to report.”

Bai Ling touched the letter and felt that the texture was very particular, something like oilpaper. He considered for a moment and remembered something. He slipped out of the lightly sealed window. Under the eaves by the window, he found a greenware¹⁹ fish hanging like a wind chime.

“So that’s it.”

The tool that the Yao family had given Yao Qi to use for sending messages was a transversal fish.

The transversal fish also came in a pair. Inside the fish’s bellies was special paper called transversal paper. Transversal paper was waterproof. After writing your letter, you soaked it in a mountain spring, pool, or some other outdoor body of water. The paper would dissolve in the water. When the water vapor rose to the clouds, it would float toward the location of the other transversal fish.

When it rained, the rainwater would once again coalesce into a letter inside the recipient’s transversal fish, and the greenware fish would spit it out.

The benefit of this thing was that it saved greatly on spiritual stones; one bean-sized green stamp was ample for one year. Its shortcoming was that only heaven knew how long it would take for the letter to arrive after it was written—it all depended on when it rained in the place where the recipient was.

Luckily, Jinping had entered the rainy season. They weren't short on rain.

But in all this time, Yao Qi had only written a letter on the day he had arrived at the Latent Cultivation Temple. Clearly his relationship with his family wasn't especially close.

Bai Ling took out a piece of paper and quickly folded it into the shape of a fish. He tapped it, and the paper fish became a greenware fish identical to the original one. Bai Ling switched it out for the real transversal fish, which he took away. Then he left the Yao manor through the rear court.

The night deepened. Far away in the Latent Cultivation Temple, the other transversal fish was held up by a pair of shaking hands.

Yao Qi had to get up a shichen earlier than others to go get “tortured” by Immortal Luo, so he didn't dare to stay up too late. He hastily washed up and crawled under his quilt. When he had just lain down, he felt some foreign object inside the quilt. He reached out to feel for it. Someone had slipped a note into his quilt—

The characters had perhaps been written with someone's foot. They were bent and crooked, horizontal and vertical strokes and left- and right-leaning strokes all hugging each other, very offensive to the eye.

But the contents were brief and to the point: Xi is going to get you.

CHAPTER 27 - The Dragon Bites Its Tail (15)

Yao Qi had absolutely no doubt that Xi Ping would want to persecute him. He believed it there and then.

As the Yao family saw it, the Imperial Consort Lady Xi was a demoness, and the Xi family was a nest of demons specializing in turning out monsters of all kinds. As for that Xi Ping, Yao Qi felt that his expression when he looked at him was like he was plotting something nasty!

Just last night, Little Young Master Yao had had a nightmare. He had dreamed that Xi had stuck a piece of straw into his head and sucked out his brains, and had even complained that they were unsweetened!

How could this mean anything good?

All of Yao Qi's ideas disappeared. He would have loved to charge into Chengjing Hall on the spot and call for help. But he couldn't do that. Since he was little, he'd been the kind who would sooner wet his pants than dare to tell his teacher he needed to use the latrine. Normally, just to ask the stewards and elders how they were, he needed to rehearse over a hundred times. How could he call for help?

The handwriting on the note looked like a child's scrawl. If he went to Chengjing Hall with this to make an accusation against his classmate of wanting to hurt him... Yao Qi thought it would be more dependable to become a fierce ghost and get revenge himself.

His belly burbled. He bent over in pain, once again feeling the call of the latrine.

When the cramping pain passed, Little Young Master Yao quickly inspected his windows. At last he gathered up his courage, opened the north window in the study a crack, and peered out. By some coincidence, Xi Ping was just pouring the dregs of his tea out the window at the foot of an osmanthus tree. Across half the length of the courtyard, their gazes met.

From a distance, Xi Ping smiled at him, showing all his threateningly white teeth.

Yao Qi banged the window shut, on the point of tears: oh no, the fox demon had started grinding his teeth!

"Tsk." Xi Ping finished pouring out the tea and tossed the cup aside. He picked up a green plum he had brought back from the dining hall and ate it.

But when he turned and saw the reincarnation wood carving on the desk, he suddenly seemed to become gloomy once again. Before he had even spit out the pit in his mouth, the smile in his eyes had evaporated.

“Senior, I think I saw A-Xiang’s grandpa die yesterday.”

“Yes,” said Tai Sui.

“Didn’t you say you were going to save him?”

“I had him released from prison,” Tai Sui said calmly. “This is the common fate of humanity. In all the southern outskirts, how many live past their fifth decade?”

Xi Ping didn’t debate with him. He snatched up the reincarnation wood, concentrated, and entered meditation.

All he saw were countless pairs of hopeful eyes, and what he heard was like a flood of wailing. Then, borrowing the evil cultivator’s eyes, his gaze dropped beneath the smoke and dust, and he saw A-Xiang.

A whole day had passed, and the fellow workers offering their condolences had left one after another. Auntie Chun had gone out to buy food. In the dilapidated mourning shed, only the orphaned girl remained, mechanically adding paper to the brazier.

When Xi Ping looked at her, A-Xiang seemed to sense it. Across time and space, she met Xi Ping's eyes.

She kept thinking she had heard a sigh, and out of nowhere she felt a sense of grievance. Her nose stung.

Just then, someone asked quietly behind her, "What did you sense?"

A-Xiang was startled. She jumped up at once. "Who's there?"

A man wearing a bamboo hat had entered the mourning shed at some point. There was a crow perched on his shoulder.

The man didn't answer. He respectfully lit incense for the deceased, then said heavily, "My condolences."

A-Xiang returned a salute automatically and inadvertently raised her eyes. She saw the face under the man's bamboo hat. A-Xiang turned pale and nearly threw up—half of the man's face seemed to have been burned by acid. On the left side of his face, there was only tightly stretched skin, no features. But the single eye remaining in this horrifying face was warm and melancholy. A-Xiang, meeting this gaze that was like a father's or older brother's, somehow wasn't so afraid anymore.

The man said warmly, "Child, did you just sense the notice of Grand Duke Tai Sui?"

A-Xiang was surprised. She clutched the reincarnation wood amulet on her chest. "You're..."

"That night, it was Grand Duke Tai Sui who led me to render you and your friend service," the man said. "Good child, don't cry. Tai Sui is watching you. You will accomplish great things in the future. What's your name?"

The girl didn't know whether she ought to trust him, ought to thank him. She said, haltingly, "A-Xiang..."

The man looked at the name on the memorial tablet. "Your full name is Wei Xiang?"

"...Wei Chengxiang."

The man seemed to smile. "Fine. Do you think I'm qualified to guide you?"

A-Xiang was dizzy. "To guide me where, uncle?"

“Underground, there to put on your feathers, climb onto the branch, and cry out against injustice,” the man said softly. “Remember these words: ‘The conflagration burns on, the cry of the cicada is without end. Better to die in frost than to forsake one's convictions.’”

Xi Ping frowned at once. The image in the center of his brow crumbled. “Senior, I don’t understand. That little girl hasn’t even grown in all her feathers. She doesn’t understand anything. What’s the use of taking her as a follower? It would be better to take the grown-up lady hanging around her.”

Tai Sui paused, then answered vaguely, “It wasn’t I who chose her. It was she who chose me—you should do your schoolwork.”

Xi Ping gave an unwilling sure, like a lazy donkey putting off pulling a millstone. Dawdling, he spent an age washing the cinnabar he had stained his hands with when he’d grabbed the reincarnation wood, then, idly, he removed the karma beast’s makeup, then asked for fresh tea, then ate fruit. Only when he heard Tai Sui’s snort did he unwillingly sit down in front of his desk and open the book their shixiong had told them to read.

Xi Ping was considering: the first day he had heard people speaking, the clearest voice had been A-Xiang’s calling “save my grandpa.” The old roundworm had claimed that she had been the one to wake him, and that was likely the truth.

There had to be something special about this little lady; if it wasn't her horoscope, then it was her physical makeup.

The great evil cultivator called himself "Tai Sui," and even said that reincarnation wood was his associated material. He might not be afraid of losing his tongue for talking so big, but Xi Ping didn't believe a word of it.

Reincarnation wood had existed since ancient times. It wasn't some new product brought in from abroad. But this evil cultivator... Based on his limited information, Xi Ping felt that he probably belonged to General Zhi's generation.

The old roundworm truly talked big. To hear him talk, he didn't attach any importance to mortals. He knew Zhi Xiu, but Zhi Xiu didn't know him; so when he had seen Zhi Xiu before, he had been "looking up." At least at that time, he hadn't been a cultivator. Zhi Xiu had fallen gravely ill in his youth and entered Xuanyin Mountain at around thirty. The old roundworm had seen him in the mortal world, so he couldn't have been born too late.

In fact, Xi Ping also felt that his birth wasn't very high, and that he must have lived in seclusion away from the world for a long period—every time he mocked “wanton excess,” he had to bring up the Phoenix’s Perch Pavilion. It was absurd.

This was why Xi Ping had dared to exploit an advantage and have the half-puppet pass General Zhi a message through “sweet notes.”

“Sweet notes” were a code for Jinping’s idle sons of the wealthy to send messages to each other, used to avoid their family elders when they had made trouble. They were divided into three types: “played sweet notes,” “whistled sweet notes” and “tapped sweet notes.” Of these, “tapped sweet notes” were messages passed by tapping a rhythm with your knuckles; they had the lowest threshold for use. There were quite a lot of people who used them, and it was easy for a secret to leak out, so their rules changed regularly. The played and whistled ones, on the other hand, didn’t change much. The night before, Xi Ping had tried to teach the half-puppet a few “whistled sweet notes.”

He didn’t know whether Zhi Xiu would be able to understand, but at any rate Tai Sui probably wouldn’t. If the evil cultivator had some method of spying he didn’t know about, he wouldn’t be giving anything away.

As for the note he’d had the half-puppet stick into Yao Qi’s quilt, Xi Ping had treated it as “a funny prank” and openly written about it in his letter home. The great demon had thought he was being dull and hadn't paid attention... This way, he could write something different in the notes later.

"I'm very sorry, brother. You can think of it as there being more merit in saving one life than in building a seven-tiered pagoda," Xi Ping thought. "After this, I'll stand in place and let you hit me to work it out."

But...who would have thought it—with Zhi-shishu's air like a gentleman out of an ancient book, he hadn't been proper at all when he was young.

With his mind full of evil schemes, Xi Ping casually muddled through his homework. Anyway, if his shixiong asked a question, there would be someone to help him cheat.

The next morning, Yao Qi saw the reincarnation wood carving arranged on Xi Ping's table in the Qiankun Tower. The "matchmaker's makeup" had been wiped off. Xi Ping had drawn uneven eyebrows on the karma beast and dotted freckles around its nose.

Yao Qi's blood instantly ran cold—he had uneven eyebrows and freckles!

After evening class, Yao Qi returned to the Qiu courtyard as though running away, and, quaking with fear, found a second note in his quilt.

When he got up in the morning, he found a third one in his shoe...

These corpse-littered scribbles would soon drive Little Young Master Yao mad. At last, he couldn't take it any more. He took out the transversal paper and, crying, wrote his family a letter asking for help. In the middle of the night, he stealthily put it in the little pond in the courtyard.

After placing the letter, Yao Qi went inside, and the half-puppet Xi Yue came out from behind a tree and carried the shoes he had finished cleaning back to Xi Ping's rooms.

Jinping had been overcast for several days. A welcome rain fell.

"He calls himself 'Tai Sui'?" Prince Zhuang rubbed the center of his brow. "You're saying that an evil god half a step from shedding his skin had his inscription for stealing the Dragon Vein destroyed by Shiyong using a fan?"

Bai Ling had his head very low and spoke without any confidence. "That's the information we received from our plant in Heaven's Design Pavilion. I also found it unbelievable and went out of my way to give the order to make discreet inquiries with Captain Zhao. I think I can say it's been confirmed."

Prince Zhuang frowned, not answering.

Bai Ling said, "I have been unsuccessful in carrying out my duties..."

But Prince Zhuang waved a hand and said almost inaudibly, "Actually, what you've said makes me think of someone from over there."

Bai Ling froze. "Do you mean the Impass... Who's there?!"

His shouted question was forceful. It broke right through the invisible screen set up by the inscriptions on the door and windows and reached outside.

Once the inscription screen broke, the sound of wind and rain swept into the room. Soon after, someone said loudly and clearly: "Assistant Commander Pang Jian of Heaven's Design Pavilion, come to beg an audience with His Highness Prince Zhuang."

Prince Zhuang raised his eyebrows and quickly exchanged a look with Bai Ling.

Bai Ling immediately started to turn into a paper man to hide. When he had turned halfway to paper, he was interrupted by Prince Zhuang. "No need, Commander Pang has a Barrier Dispelling Way of the Heart, already established. You can't hide from his eyes—Exalted, please come in."

Pang Jian passed through the courtyard wall in answer, put his umbrella down in the corridor, and waited for Bai Ling to open the door.

His face was impassive, but inside he was aghast: apart from General Zhi, to this day no one knew that his Way of the Heart was established. How had this Prince Zhuang, a mortal, seen it? And opened his mouth to blurt it out?

And then there were the inscriptions...

There was nothing impermissible about the inscriptions in Prince Zhuang Manor. In fact, they were all third-class inscriptions that Xuanyin Mountain conferred as a rule. Another walker in the moral world in his place may not have seen any problem, but Pang Jian just happened to know some things about inscriptions, and he saw the problem at once.

The full depth of knowledge about inscriptions could probably only be said to be understood by the great god Pangu, born in chaos, who had divided heaven and earth with his own hands. Some people even believed that inscriptions were the basis of the wind that moved the clouds and the force that made rivers flow into oceans in the mortal world.

The placement of an inscription character could swap winter and summer, make azaleas grow in the snow, settle frost beneath a blazing sun. Each stroke of an inscription had to be absolutely precise. Too long or too short by the smallest degree, and the results would be major. Even a change in the person carving it, or the time it was carved at, would cause changes to the form of an inscription.

Inscriptions required the transfer of the carver's essence; only a cultivator who had established a foundation could carve them. But for ninety percent of established foundation cultivators, never mind engraving them, they were already doing well if they had a general understanding of third-class inscriptions. Even a cultivator who specialized in studying inscriptions might not be able to carve even a simple fourth-class inscription after over a century of study.

The kind of third-class inscriptions used in the manor of a prince of the second rank needed to have a specialist calculate an auspicious time, have everyone temporarily withdraw, and lay down the inscriptions according to the strictest method and order. If the order a little off, it could blow a garden into smithereens.

But the order of the inscriptions in Prince Zhuang Manor's south study was completely wrong. Someone had clearly rearranged them!

With Pang Jian's knowledge, he couldn't tell how the disrupted inscriptions had been arranged. He only knew that just now, through two thin walls, he hadn't been able to hear a single sound from the south study.

Compared to this, the secret guard beside Prince Zhuang who, strictly speaking, was an “evil cultivator,” amounted to nothing.

Prince Zhuang saw him enter and didn't stand up. There was a thick blanket laid over his lap. Smiling, he said, “I've been frail since birth. My knees start acting up as soon as it gets rainy. Forgive me for not being able to rise to meet you, Exalted.”

Pang Jian quickly said, politely, “No need.”

Bai Ling silently prepared tea. Prince Zhuang gave Bai Ling a look and said meaningfully, smiling, “Coming here alone, Exalted, I presume you haven't come for the purpose of ‘burning paper.’ What did you want to see me about?”

With him not observing propriety, Pang Jian got right to the point as well. “I came because I received a secret order from the inner sect's Zhi-shishu. He told me to tell no one else but to come see Your Highness.”

Prince Zhuang's hands, lying on his knees, curled up. “Oh?”

Pang Jian said, “Concerning the matter of the Viscount of Yongning.”

The smile like a spring breeze vanished from Prince Zhuang's face. The look of his pitch-dark eyes put you in mind of bottomless wells.

“Has Xi Shiyong been getting up to mischief again in the Latent Cultivation Temple? There's no need for the sect to stand on ceremony. If he's done something wrong, by all means go ahead and give him a beating.” He took the tea Bai Ling offered him and softly, as feebly as if he were in unbearable pain, said, “Anyway, what can I do about him? You would be better off going to the Marquis of Yongning, Exalted.”

Pang Jian said, “Your Highness, it was the Viscount himself who told shishu this and said we should come to you.”

The cup and lid in Prince Zhuang's hands met with a loud click.

Prince Zhuang was silent for a moment. He smiled a little strangely, and, with emphasis, said, “He has...a lot of confidence in the immortal sect.”

“Yes. No matter what, we will protect Xi-shidi,” Pang Jian said. “Your Highness is very powerful. You even laid bare my Way of the Heart. Presumably you already know that this evil cultivator calls himself ‘Tai Sui.’ He is of the consummate ascended spirit stage. Though his cultivation level doesn’t match his actual strength, he has many strange methods at his disposal. With Xi-shidi in his hands, we don’t dare to alert that evil cultivator lightly. Shishu has already returned to the inner sect to request an immortal tool, but we must first find out that evil cultivator’s true name before we can know how to strip him away from Xi-shidi. Your Highness, if you have information, can you help us out?”

Prince Zhuang raised his eyes. “Exalted, everyone says the Way of the Heart is a cultivator’s lifeblood. Now that I know your Way of the Heart, aren’t you scared?”

Pang Jian’s expression didn’t change. He didn’t even stumble. “A Way of the Heart must be constantly questioned to begin with, constantly interrogated. It can only be fully integrated if it survives tribulations. If you are afraid of your Way of the Heart being questioned, it means you are afraid you yourself do not believe in it and are only attempting to fool yourself and others. I feel no threat.”

Prince Zhuang gave him a profound look. “Exalted, with your talents, it’s a pity you haven’t entered the inner sect.”

After saying this, he threw off the blanket on his legs, stood up, and finally returned Pang Jian’s salute. “On the day of the Grand Selection, owing to a slight indisposition, I did not go to Heaven’s Design Pavilion and missed the chance to see General Zhi’s elegant bearing, which has subdued our family’s fiend in human form. Since that bastard has made a clean breast of everything, then I have nothing to conceal...”

Before he could finish, there was a sudden peculiar sound of water outside the window.

Prince Zhuang paused. Bai Ling swiftly leapt up. After a moment, he brought back the flailing greenware fish. “Your Highness, there really is a letter!”

A transversal fish?

Pang Jian stared, thinking that this was very shabby. Had the half-puppet really eaten that brat into poverty?

Prince Zhuang had already spread the letter out. He scanned it quickly and gave it to Pang Jian.

As soon as Pang Jian saw the neat and cautious writing, he instinctively knew it hadn't been written by Xi Ping. He looked at the heading and found that the sender was a young disciple whose name was "Qi."

The letter babbled a request for help to his family, telling an incredible story.

"Qi" said that Xi Ping had a monster made of reincarnation wood that he had made up to look like the writer. It was very strange—as soon as he saw the wood carving, his chest hurt, and he couldn't breathe. An anonymous master had told him that this carving was used to control a person in his sleep. As soon as he opened his spiritual eyes, it would lead an evil monster to snatch his body. The Xi family had already employed an evil cultivator to establish an altar in the Blissful Village and was planning a conspiracy to murder the Crown Prince using him.

The evil cultivator had a name, wrote Second Young Master Yao, who would believe anything when scared: "Her name is Wei Chengxiang. She's hiding in the southern outskirts!"

Pang Jian: "..."

It made sense that Xi Ping would be able to contact Zhi Xiu. Pang Jian knew that he had the dragon-taming chain. Even if that Tai Sui were unusually meticulous, or Xi Ping was imprudent and allowed himself to be found out, with General Zhi there, he would do his best to take the consequences for him.

But how could that brat make a classmate who obviously didn't get along with him write a letter in his place?

And the person who had sent the letter was completely in the dark!

After reading the letter, Pang Jian couldn't resist looking at Prince Zhuang. He thought, There's more to the Marquis of Yongning than meets the eye.

Just as he'd thought. How could Emperor Taiming confer nobility on someone just because he was attractive? His Majesty wasn't a cutsleeve! Young Mistress Cui hadn't lost her head from lust; she had known exactly what was good for her!

Seeing the look in his eyes, Prince Zhuang knew that Pang Jian was getting carried away. "Shiyong lived here with me for a few years when he was little. Because he's my uncle's only son, and I was also young and impetuous at the time, seeing that he wasn't making progress, I disciplined him in place of his parents. These are all the cheap tricks he got up to in fighting me when he didn't want to study.”

“Your Highness is too modest.” Pang Jian quickly went over the letter and picked out the key terms: Blissful Village, reincarnation wood, body-snatched on opening spiritual eyes.

“Elders from the inner sect examined Xi-shidi and the reincarnation wood in his possession. They found nothing unusual.” Pang Jian was a straightforward person. He explained all the details about Tai Sui at the Blissful Village to Prince Zhuang, then said, “Zhi-shishu's guess is that this evil cultivator must simply be using his primordial being to possess him. The evil cultivators we caught before communicated amongst themselves by letting writing in fresh blood soak into reincarnation wood. As the evil god they worship, this ‘Tai Sui’ doesn't seem to need bloodletting to communicate with them. Your Highness, what do you think about it?”

Prince Zhuang didn't interrupt. Only after listening carefully did he slowly say, “First, this fake god must be a man, not too old, about the same age as General Zhi.”

Pang Jian stared—Zhi Xiu had also said as much.

“Second, this Wei Chengxiang in the southern outskirts is likely closely connected to the evil cultivator... At the very least, the evil cultivator must be able to observe her at any time. When your people investigate her, they shouldn’t get close, or else it will alert the evil cultivator. Third, at the Blissful Village, why did that evil cultivator choose Shiyong and not one of the half-immortals? From your description, it seems connected to that prostitute swapping her life for his. When you investigate Wei Chengxiang, don’t forget the prostitute.” Prince Zhuang paused, then said, “There’s another thing. Commander Pang, you just mentioned the ‘sleep paralysis imps’ and ‘soul-driving spice’ from the south... These two things disappeared from the black market many years ago, but this person can not only obtain them, he also knows the ‘secret art.’ I suspect this person has a connection to the south—the spiritual stone mines that once belonged to the Lancang Sword Sect are there.”

Pang Jian took a deep breath and decided to keep to his own judgment, not listen to Prince Zhuang’s nonsense—certainly there was more than met the eye to the whole Xi family.

“We’ll investigate. If you receive any other information, Your Highness...”

“I’ll deliver it to you at once, Exalted.” Prince Zhuang didn’t put on his painted-on false smile. “I’m entrusting Shiyong to you.”

CHAPTER 28 - The Dragon Bites Its Tail (16)

“This Wei Chengxiang is an orphan, only fifteen, originating in Ling County. She and her grandfather were left on their own. Her grandfather’s name is Wei Pengcheng. The two of them worked together in the southern outskirts. They’re purely mortal—there’s no association with cultivation in eighteen generations of their ancestors. The only unusual thing is that when there was a change in the reincarnation wood held by Heaven’s Design Pavilion, Wei Chengxiang’s grandfather had just been arrested by city guard soldiers.”

Heaven’s Design Pavilion worked very efficiently. It wasn’t long before they knew everything about A-Xiang’s history.

In front of an outsider, even if the sky collapsed, not even the speed Prince Zhuang blinked at would change.

But while he had originally been listening calmly, holding his tea, at this point, his expression changed for the first time. “Why was her grandfather arrested?”

“Recently someone hired a group of workers to cry a grievance in the southern outskirts and slander the court. It’s something like that... Your Highness must know more about it than I do.” Pang Jian gave him a strange look. “What’s wrong?”

Prince Zhuang quickly covered up his slightly unusual expression and waved a hand. “Nothing. Please continue, Exalted.”

“A few days later, Wei Pengcheng was released for no reason at all. It was said that a city guard had found out he had been wrongly accused. It sounded strange to me that a city guard would actually know the meaning of the words ‘wrongly accused’, so I found that particularly learned officer and had a karma beast search his residence. As expected, it found spiritual stones and immortal tools. The same night the old man was released, the little girl was involved in another case. A foreman surnamed Lü got drunk and became unruly. He intended to commit unlawful acts against her and another woman. He was unsuccessful and died of a heart attack in the process. After the coroner determined the cause of death, the girl and the woman were released. But Heaven’s Design Pavilion reexamined the body and found that it contained traces of spiritual energy—our guess is that someone shut the arteries in his heart to make it stop beating.”

Bai Ling cut in: “An evil cultivator accomplice received word and helped her?”

“Yes. That was the very day Xi-shidi begged a reincarnation wood carving from the Latent Cultivation Temple. Perhaps the evil cultivator could only communicate with his disciples then,” Pang Jian said. “Apart from that, another mysterious person has appeared beside Wei Chengxiang. This person is unusually alert. He has a crow we suspect of being a spiritual beast. We don’t dare to get close for the moment.”

Prince Zhuang asked, “What about Wei Pengcheng?”

“He’s dead.” Pang Jian paused. “He was elderly and weak, already sick in bed. He was beaten a few times in prison. He died the same night he was released.”

“I see,” Prince Zhuang said slowly. “In other words, that evil cultivator doesn’t actually care what happens to this Wei Chengxiang. He only wants to trick her into joining him. What can a fifteen-year-old orphan girl have that’s worth coveting? Does she have any connection to that prostitute from Overflowing Splendor?”

Peng Jian thought about it. “Wei Chengxiang’s hemogram is vermilion bird. Jiangli... Jiangli died without an intact corpse. We can’t be sure of her hemogram,²⁰ but it’s probably the same. Eight out of ten people in Ning’an have the vermilion bird hemogram. Wei Chengxiang’s horoscope happens to be ‘yin in all four pillars,’ and it seems that Jiangli’s is as well...but there are quite a lot of ‘yin in all four pillars’ people. Apart from this, the two of them are unconnected.”

“Hemogram, horoscope...” Prince Zhuang tapped his palm now and again. “Are their figures also similar?”

“The little girl hasn’t developed yet, so it’s hard to say. She seems to have a small frame, though her grandpa was of the tall and slender build.” Pang Jian froze, then caught up. “Your Highness, do you mean...”

“The spiritual image,” said Prince Zhuang.

“The spiritual image?” said Pang Jiang.

The two of them spoke almost simultaneously.

If different people carved the same inscription character and wanted to achieve the same result, they had to adjust the form of the inscription character. In the immortal sects, some inscription experts believed that this was caused by the cultivators having different “spiritual images.” But as for what a “spiritual image” actually was, how many types there were, whether different types had their own merits and drawbacks, or how they were determined, there were currently no conclusions—there were too few established foundation cultivators, and among them those who would carve inscriptions were few and far between. There was insufficient data for research.

There was only one commonly accepted conclusion: people with similar spiritual images had similar horoscopes, and they were often alike in physical appearance and disposition.

“I fought against that chief sacrifice Jiangli,” Pang Jian said. “She was inexperienced, but her cultivation was no worse than mine. At her age, even if she had opened her spiritual eyes in her mother’s womb, she still wouldn’t be able to clarify herself to the point of having spiritual bones. Anyway, if she had opened her spiritual eyes earlier, she wouldn’t have been reduced to prostitution.”

“Oh,” said Prince Zhuang, “then it may be the Stone Drilled in Bone technique.”

Pang Jian was already numb toward the extent of his knowledge. He sighed. “A fatal technique. I suspect she was tricked. Back then...”

Back then, apart from the Dragon Vein, Jiangli must have been just the sacrifice that Tai Sui wanted. Even if Jiangli and the others had succeeded in tricking a member of Heaven’s Design Pavilion into taking her place, in the end, the great evil cultivator still wouldn’t have let her go. He had only been pretending to take all possible means to avoid it in order to make her willingly offer up everything she had.

Prince Zhuang had no interest in the wrongs committed against an evil cultivator who had endangered the public. He interrupted Pang Jian's "back then." "A half-immortal can't perish without making a sound. Heaven's Design Pavilion likely has a record. First investigate whether there have been any similar evil cultivators who died for reasons unknown."

"I'll go look through the files." Pang Jian tactfully followed along with his change of subject. "From Renzong up to the present..."

"No," said Prince Zhuang, "start from the present and go backward. I think that this person hasn't been causing trouble that long."

Pang Jian paused, then understood what he meant—if it were otherwise, the Sea of Stars couldn't only now have given a warning. And even if the Sea of Stars had broken down, if there really had been an "evil god" hidden beneath the peace of the last two hundred years, then the support he had used to steal the Dragon Vein had been too shoddy.

Pang Jian thought, If His Highness Prince Zhuang became an evil cultivator, give him ten years and he might have infiltrated all of Xuanyin's inner sect.

Prince Zhuang watched him walk through the wall and leave. For a long moment, his eyes remained on the shady wall, unmoving.

Bai Ling didn't dare to disturb him. He stood there not making a sound.

After a long time, Prince Zhuang finally seemed to come back to life. He lowered his lashes. "Xiao Bai, do you believe in destiny?"

Though the lousy idea of hiring people to cry a grievance was something Lord Sun of the Canal Office had come up with on his own, making an issue of the farmers who had lost their land was in fact something he, Zhou Ying, had stirred up from the shadows. He had muddied the waters, made the Crown Prince "plead illness and stay home to recuperate" up to now, reaped the benefits of His Majesty's anger against land transport... He had thought that the plan was seamless, but who could have expected that the aftereffects created by it would have gone around and at last fallen on Xi Ping?

The constantly shifting evil flood dragon had opened its mouth to bare its fangs and bitten its own tail.

Bai Ling said, seriously, "Since the day Your Highness took me out of the Impassable Sea, I no longer believe in it."

“The Impassable Sea.” Prince Zhuang’s lips curved in a false smile. “How do you know that the Impassable Sea wasn’t the start of the fork in the road?”

Just then, the white jade proximal lit up. Prince Zhuang’s still clouded gaze fell on it—since Xi Ping had found a ready mouthpiece in Yao Qi, he had stopped writing anything proper on the proximal.

Handwriting showed the writer’s emotions. Xi Ping, this magical creature, had stirred the Peak Master of Flying Jade Peak, all of Heaven’s Design Pavilion, and even Prince Zhuang Manor into unease day and night, but he himself was eating well and sleeping soundly, feeling pretty pleased with himself. On the proximal, he praised the Latent Cultivation Temple’s green plums and bazhen cakes, then bragged smugly that he had recited his lessons well and received six spiritual stone points from Yang-shixiong; soon he would have gathered up enough points for another blue jade!

Prince Zhuang stared at the proximal for a moment with a strange expression, not knowing whether to laugh or cry: since he was little, Xi Ping had acted like making him memorize a lesson was butchering him. It was harder to make a few words stick in his head than to reach the sky. Could he have changed now that he was in the Latent Cultivation Temple? This brat!

Everyone was holding back for fear of harming him, but he was doing fine, using the evil cultivator to cheat his way to success!

In the Latent Cultivation Temple's Qiu courtyard, Xi Ping had just finished writing home. Before he could even stretch, Tai Sui suddenly asked, "Where is your half-puppet?"

Xi Ping's joints cracked.

Without waiting for an answer, Tai Sui controlled him and stood up, then strode out. He grabbed the half-puppet, who was just peering toward Yao Qi's rooms, and pulled him back. "Don't think I don't know what you made him do!"

Xi Ping's scalp tightened. In an instant, the cracks in his bones went cold.

But it was only an instant. Then he caught up—no, Yao Qi had already sent the letter. If the old roundworm had really noticed something, he couldn't have waited until now to flare up. He was trying to trick him.

So Xi Ping said inwardly, with justice on his side, "Senior, be merciful, senior, I made him...well, play a little trick, that's all. I wasn't playing it on you!"

Tai Sui dragged the half-puppet inside and roughly tore a wad of paper from his clothes.

Xi Yue quickly reached out to snatch it back. A finger blast hit his arrays, and the half-puppet fell to his knees without a sound.

Tai Sui kept feeling that something was touching his spiritual sense, but “Tai Sui” wasn’t his true name, so the direction the spiritual sense pointed in was very blurred. Seeing that Xi Ping’s half-puppet was always sneaking away toward Yao Qi next door, he had involuntarily become suspicious.

Xi Ping’s eyes became cold. He saw the great evil cultivator use his hands to quickly open up the wad of paper. A big worm the thickness of a finger pattered out and wriggled along the ground. There was a cartoonish face drawn on the unfolded paper.

Tai Sui: “...”

Xi Ping cried out: “It’s getting away! It’s getting away! Xi Yue worked so hard to catch it...”

Before he could finish, one of his legs lifted without warning and stamped the worm flat.

Xi Ping was pulled into a stagger by that leg. He screamed, “That’s disgusting!”

“You know what disgusting means?” Tai Sui tossed the paper aside and coldly said, “If you get up to these silly tricks again instead of focusing on cultivation, you’ll be in for another burning.”

Xi Ping: “...”

Aside from the words “cultivation” and “burning,” he had heard this sentence many times growing up.

“What’s the point of memorizing those ancient texts? Be reasonable, senior, do you make your own followers memorize lessons? Can’t they open their spiritual eyes without that?”

“The rogue cultivators of the mortal world have no formal teaching. They pay all kinds of prices to have people teach them. If someone were willing to read a legitimate ancient text to them, they would get on their knees and be that person’s dog!”

Xi Ping pressed his lips together. He couldn’t put himself in those people’s shoes at all.

The princess had finished lecturing and had left the Latent Cultivation Temple with Zhi Xiu. Perhaps the young master felt the danger was past. He had relaxed and was spending all day teasing his classmates or making mischief, not shrinking from any crime.

He seemed to have turned his head and tossed away his resolution to “work to redress the wrongs of people like Jiangli,” like the dissolute people of the mortal world who, after they were through lamenting the state of their lives, wasted no time in burying themselves in licentiousness.

He had also tossed the reincarnation wood carving aside and lost interest in it.

Oh, yes, the reincarnation wood carving.

Tai Sui had another thought—why had he suddenly stopped touching the reincarnation wood carving?

But before his suspicions could arise, Xi Ping casually grabbed the reincarnation wood carving and said, naïvely and unfeelingly, “I completely forgot, that little beauty you took in as a disciple, how is she doing?”

As he spoke, Xi Ping closed his eyes, concentrated on the center of his brow with practiced ease, and found A-Xiang. He was just in time to see A-Xiang take out a little paper bag, hesitate a moment while staring at the green powder inside, then pick it up, about to pour it into her mouth.

Seeing this, Xi Ping thought that she was depressed and planning to take poison. “Hey, don’t eat that!”

A-Xiang paused at once. She opened her eyes wide and searched all around—she thought someone had just called to her. “Who’s there?”

Xi Ping didn’t dare to speak again.

“Is it...Grand Duke Tai Sui?” A-Xiang jumped up and held the reincarnation wood amulet on her chest with both hands. Not hearing an answer, she prayed, “Bless me, Tai Sui, and let me smoothly begin my cultivation and be worthy of my shifu...and of this expensive spiritual stone powder. I’ll definitely avenge my grandpa, make lots of money, and take Auntie Chun away from here...”

Only then did Xi Ping understand that the bright green powder wasn’t pesticide; it was powdered jade stamps.

His eyes opened wide. A-Xiang’s prayers still echoed in his ears. “How can she hear me, too?”

Before, only Tai Sui could talk to his believers through the reincarnation wood. Xi Ping was only a tool; he could only close his eyes and follow along with the action. Why did it seem like the little girl had heard his voice just now?

“Well, there’s no harm in it for you,” Tai Sui said lightly. “Swallowing spiritual stone powder is common practice for rogue cultivators. There’s nothing to be shocked about. Outside, there aren’t the resources your Xuanyin immortal mountains have. If they want to do their best to squeeze out a bit of spiritual energy to nourish their meridians, they have to grind up inferior grade spiritual stones and swallow them.”

Xi Ping stared at the reincarnation wood in his hands, feeling a sudden sense of danger. “Senior, am I going to open my spiritual eyes soon?” said Xi Ping, pretending to beam with joy.

Tai Sui said, “If you aren’t so distracted, then perhaps...it’ll happen before the first leaves fall.”

Xi Ping’s heart missed a beat. It was the height of summer now, and the Latent Cultivation Temple was in the mountains. The cold came early. It would be only a few days, wouldn’t it?

But that was wrong! He had been completely feigning compliance the whole time!

When they trained their spiritual sense in the Qiankun Tower, Xi Ping pretended every day to be competing with His Fourth Highness to be first, rushing to open his spiritual eyes as fast as possible; when he “entered meditation to cycle his breathing,” what he in fact entered was the dragon-taming chain to pass the time chatting with the half-puppet; as for working hard...he hadn’t done a bit of hard work, only used his natural abilities to play the part.

How could he still open his spiritual eyes like this? And how could the old roundworm know how much progress he had made?

Xi Ping paused. Then he suddenly picked up Latent Cultivation Notes—everyone had one of these books. It contained the sect rules, information about the Latent Cultivation Temple’s stewards, and other such content.

“What are you looking for?”

“I’m looking for the record.” Xi Ping was so “excited” his heart was pounding. “Latent Cultivation Notes has a record of the first person in each class to open their spiritual eyes. Afterward, nearly all of them entered the inner sect. I vaguely recall that the record for the fastest person to open their spiritual eyes is five or six months... Ha! Senior, do I have those legendary innate spiritual bones or what?”

Tai Sui: “...”

You have that legendary “innate shamelessness.”

Xi Ping, deeply self-satisfied, said, “So why should I work hard? I...”

To guard against him floating into the sky and knocking down the moon with his self-proclaimed “innate spiritual bones,” Tai Sui splashed cold water on him. “Innate spiritual bones occur in less than one in ten million people. In the last thousand years, the only instance in your Xuanyin Mountain has been Duanrui. If you had innate spiritual bones, you would have caught the inner sect’s attention long before coming here. Stop gloating.”

“Hehehe,” said Xi Ping, “I don’t believe you.”

Tai Sui: “...”

A normal person couldn’t talk sense to an idiot.

So the next moment, it was as if Xi Ping had stepped into a bonfire. Burning pain leapt up his foot, burning up to his knee. At the same time, Tai Sui sealed his powers of speech, so he couldn't even scream. Xi Yue, however, immediately noticed something was wrong through the dragon-taming chain. He let out a sound and threw himself forward to support him.

Xi Ping waved a hand at the half-puppet and kept his footing on his own. All the color had gone out of his face.

In the small study, one couldn't speak, and the other didn't know how to speak. Stifling stillness filled the air. The evil cultivator's soft voice sounded in Xi Ping's ear... Perhaps it was his mistake, but the voice sounded closer than before.

“Every night when you're asleep, I do your breathing exercises for you and make you touch the reincarnation wood. With my powers running through you, naturally your spiritual sense is superior to that of others, and your spiritual eyes are looser than those of others. In the future, as soon as you open your spiritual eyes, your spiritual bones will also be easier to complete than those of others... That's because you've had the good luck to encounter me, encounter that stupid Chen girl who was willing to give up her life for you—there's no cause for you to think highly of your own accomplishments and slack off, understand?”

Xi Ping couldn't answer.

Having “scared” him, Tai Sui once again became gentle. “Making you work hard is for your own good. The reason you Latent Cultivation Temple disciples open your spiritual eyes slowly is a delicate choice on the part of your shixiongs. It's so that your meridians, your lungs and heart, your whole body can become fully soaked in spiritual energy, to prevent you from suffering when you open your spiritual eyes. Making progress too fast isn't necessarily a good thing. There have even been people whose meridians shattered the moment their spiritual eyes opened. Why don't you go to your Yanhai Building and read the records of failed spiritual eye openings?”

Xi Ping's mouth and tongue relaxed. He could talk again, but he didn't dare to make a sound. He could only nod obediently.

A little fawningly, Xi Ping said, cautiously, “Senior, what kind of suffering comes with opening your spiritual eyes? Those followers of yours...with no immortal mountains to rely on, what will happen to them? Will A-Xiang be all right just eating spiritual stone powder?”

Tai Sui saw that he had scared him, so he very patiently explained some common knowledge to him: “When you open your spiritual eyes, if your meridians haven't been fully soaked in spiritual energy, they may be destroyed by it. There are usually two ways rogue cultivators open their spiritual eyes. One way is by chance. If they live for a long period in a place with abundant spiritual energy, when they encounter mortal danger, their latent potential will erupt at the moment their life hangs by a thread..."

Xi Ping carelessly asked, "Like Pang Jian?"

"How did you know?" said Tai Sui.

"Heard it from someone before coming to the Latent Cultivation Temple," Xi Ping lied casually—in fact, he had felt it from the way Commander Pang talked. Heaven's Design Pavilion was the same as the inner sect; it had countless ties to Great Wan's court. Though each of the Exalted seemed like a celestial being with classic texts in his belly, Pang Jian didn't. Xi Ping felt that he wasn't very concerned with politics; he hadn't even known the full background of the Imperial Consort's maternal family.

"You could call him lucky. There was a mine collapse in the spiritual stone mines in the south. Hundreds of people died, but he survived." Tai Sui simply assumed all these sons of the aristocracy had their own sources of information and didn't think much of it. He sighed with emotion, then said, "The other way is like A-Xiang, eating spiritual stone fragments to make spiritual energy enter their meridians from the inside... Though that's always second best, and rather perilous when it comes time to open their spiritual eyes. Those whose bodies haven't been nourished by spiritual energy will often be injured and disfigured when the time comes. Or did you think that my followers looked hardly human on purpose?"

Xi Ping was stunned silent.

After a long moment, he said in agitation, "What? That little beauty is going to be disfigured?"

He thought: Commander Pang comes from the south? He became a cultivator because of a mine collapse? How does this old roundworm know?

Heaven's Design Pavilion's Exalted who came from among the common people didn't especially mention their origins, each more mysterious than the next, because strictly speaking, until they had entered the aboveboard path, they counted as "evil cultivators." This wasn't something you could talk about openly.

Xi Ping's mind worked quickly. He had an idea.

The next day, the Qiu courtyard's disciples all went to morning class. Xi Yue, who had been bent over cleaning, paused.

He seemed to be tired. He stood and strolled around the courtyard...
Unconsciously, he formed writing with his feet.

Xi Yue diligently memorized his steps. After a moment, he deftly climbed up an ancient cypress in the Qiu courtyard and took a sheet of transversal paper from a bird's nest in the canopy—he had snatched it from Yao Qi's rooms under the guise of a “prank” after getting a glimpse of Yao Qi's letter home.

Xi Yue drew out the characters he had just memorized by rote on the transversal paper: Pang is from the south.

Then, imitating Yao Qi, he quietly put the transversal paper in the pond.

“Good morning, Ziming-xiong!” Yao Qi was just copying out scriptures in the Qiankun Tower. Hearing this sound, his hand shook. He was so scared by Xi Ping's call that he left a big smear on his paper.

Zhou Xi was sitting next to him. Upon seeing this, he gently puffed out a breath.

But after a while, His Fourth Highness realized something was wrong—Yao Qi kept trembling. Even his sleeves were shaking. His face was ashen. He didn't seem startled; it was more like he was scared of something.

Zhou Xi slowly frowned: what had Xi Shiyong done to him?

CHAPTER 29 - The Dragon Bites Its Tail (17)

Xi Ping, having been punished by Tai Sui for making trouble, “obediently” went to the Yanhai Building as soon as he had free time.

But it turned out that Detailed Account of Meridians was poisonous. It knocked him out right from the start. Before he had turned the first page, Xi Ping’s upper and lower eyelids contracted lovesickness. The “lovebirds” were only broken apart when Tai Sui lightly burned him. He sat there enraged but not daring to speak, sulking. All he could do was pick out a specialized record of spiritual eye opening stories, yawning fit to bring down the ceiling.

This one he managed to read. It told all kinds of horrifying stories about opening spiritual eyes.

There was someone who must have had been very wicked for several lifetimes and had opened their spiritual eyes on the day of a thunderstorm, and spiritual energy had poured into their spiritual eyes along with the celestial lightning, roasting them from the inside out; there was someone who had let themselves indulge in a wild fantasy and taken established foundation grade elixirs, planning to ascend to immortality right away, not expecting that instead they would ascend to heaven; there was also one unlucky person who was said to have suffered from a rare disease that made their bones weak, who wanted to strengthen their body with the nourishment of spiritual stones, but instead had somehow opened their spiritual eyes, turning their bones to powder at once...

One bloody tragedy after another dragged Xi Ping right into wakefulness.

Tai Sui saw that the hairs on the back of his neck were standing up and said, "Opening your spiritual eyes is a little dangerous, but not everyone is so unlucky. The Latent Cultivation Temple has the backing of the immortal mountains' spiritual stone mines and is surrounded by auspicious beasts, and there's a crowd of stewards to look after you. It's not so easy to have an accident."

"Senior, those followers of yours seem to have boundless powers, so can't the wounds they receive while opening their spiritual eyes be healed afterward? I hear that Heaven's Design Pavilion's Exalted can break all their bones, and then be fine in no time at all."

Tai Sui said, "An open-eyed cultivator's body is far sturdier than that of a mortal. An ordinary wound does indeed heal quickly. But the wounds sustained during the opening of spiritual eyes can't be removed. These are brands that heaven leaves on those who have 'taken the wrong path.' They will only vanish if you can remake your body when establishing a foundation."

But if opening your spiritual eyes was perilous, establishing a foundation was usually a dead end, barring some lucky chance.

Xi Ping thought about it. Pointing to one case in the book, he said, “Look, senior, this person opened their spiritual eyes, but their meridians snapped. What’s going on there? Break the seal on a jug of wine, and the jug shatters?”

“Right,” said Tai Sui. “When your spiritual eyes link, they connect to the universe. If your meridians are destroyed at that pass, it means you are unable to ‘connect to the universe.’ It doesn’t count as opening your spiritual eyes—why do you think Miss Chen was unsuited to the immortal path and resorted to the path of ruin?”

Because you were egging her on, you old bastard, Xi Ping thought.

He closed the book, then picked up a few more and prepared to leave. His eyes scanned seemingly inadvertently over the fireproofing inscriptions all around the Yanhai Building. The inscriptions in the Latent Cultivation Temple, like the ones used by the nobility of Great Wan, came from Xuanyin Mountain, and must have been carved by the same set of people. The inscription characters seemed very similar to the ones in Prince Zhuang Manor.

As Xi Ping went down the stairs, he “walked” two fingers along the banister. The inscriptions on the wooden banister lit up the whole way following his fingers, as if scolding him for his idle hands.

He had already sent the information out. Zhi-shishu didn’t seem to be in the Latent Cultivation Temple, so everything was probably arranged. Then there was his san-ge and the people from Heaven’s Design Pavilion... Supposing that they couldn’t be relied upon, then Xi Ping couldn’t imagine who on earth was reliable.

But everything had a “what if.” However reliable they were, he wasn’t going to lie there waiting for others to make arrangements. Anyway, everyone had their own things to do. He wouldn’t interfere with anything.

There were over two hundred years from Renzong’s reign to the present. The wheel of reincarnation had turned countless times. Looking for one person was like looking for a needle in the ocean. He had to be ready for them not to make it in time.

Xi Ping thought that if he really did come to a dead end, he still had one last move, which was to think of a way to destroy his meridians when his spiritual eyes opened and leave the great demon a “broken jar.”

“While the green hills last, there’ll be wood to burn, no matter how bad it gets,” he thought to himself dauntlessly. “There are always more solutions than problems. As long as you have a breath left, can you let yourself die from holding back piss?”

Xi Ping walked out of the Yanhai Building and whistled a vulgar tune. He kicked a stone at a patrolling straw child’s head.

Bang—

The black cat knocked over Prince Zhuang’s brush stand. The blood jade brush stand fell onto the floor and rolled several chi away.

Prince Zhuang had hardly closed his eyes the night before. He had just had his head propped on his hand, eyes closed, dozing. Startled awake by the little beast, his heart beat like a drum. For a long moment, he couldn’t catch his breath.

Bai Ling floated in through the window like a snowflake, quickly tipped out a Spring Sunshine Pill to give to him, and moved the cat ancestor along.

“How is it?”

Bai Ling shook his head. “All the files about evil cultivators involved with ‘reincarnation wood’ for the last two hundred years within Great Wan’s borders have been looked through. They fill up a whole storeroom. Commander Pang and his people investigated each one in turn. But the so-called ‘Tai Sui’ in the files must only be a totem thrown together by the evil cultivators. He has no physical body. We’ve only started differentiating by hemogram in recent years. We tried investigating by horoscope and physical characteristics, but the records for the former are too few, while the latter are too vague...”

“You only investigated within Great Wan’s borders?” said Prince Zhuang.
“What about to the south?”

Bai Ling quietly said, “Your Highness, to the south...to the south is the Land of Turmoil.”

After Southern He and the Lancang Sword Sect were destroyed, there was no one to look after the former territory of Southern He. The immortals of each country had divided up Southern He’s spiritual stone mines, and each only looked after their own doorstep. After two hundred years, monsters ran wild and evil thrived; there was truly nowhere to start looking.

Bai Ling said, “Commander Pang sent me to ask whether another letter had come from the Viscount.”

Prince Zhuang shook his head. There hadn't been any rain in Jinping for a few days.

Even if it did rain, Xi Ping might not necessarily have much to say. Each and every one of his movements was carried out under the eyes of the evil cultivator. Every act was a knife edge struggle. Where there was an absolute disparity in strength, any number of clever schemes were only flourishes.

Flourishes were flourishes; using one once in a while, you might have a lucky win. If you used them too much, you were sure to run into trouble.

“Princess Duanrui couldn't see the possession by a primordial being, the Sea of Stars overlooked it.” Prince Zhuang stood up and slowly said, “Is the evil cultivator...really an evil cultivator?”

“Your Highness.” Bai Ling paused and lowered his voice until it was almost inaudible. “I know what you're thinking, but you only have a suspicion. There's no basis for it.”

Prince Zhuang didn't answer. He was silent for a long moment. He pinched the center of his brow. “I just dreamed that he was asking me to save him.”

Bai Ling said, “We have to take our time in this matter, Your Highness. We can’t mention over there. You know that as soon as that place is exposed, it will mean a change in Great Wan’s leadership. There will be no more peace.”

Prince Zhuang turned his head to the window. The greenware transversal fish swayed lightly outside the window with the breeze. It had only been hanging there a few days, but the fish had already taken on a layer of dust.

The greenware fish had become a pond loach, and there was murder in Zhou Ying’s eyes.

A wind blew by, the smell of earth rose, and dark clouds at last covered the sun.

A crash of thunder. Mountain rain poured down on the thick forest of the Latent Cultivation Temple. The disciples who hadn’t brought umbrellas covered their heads and scurried away, looking all over for straw children to ask for umbrellas.

The warm-hearted Chang Jun called out: “Ziming, Shiyong is sharing his umbrella, let’s go together!”

Yao Qi's eyes fell on Xi Ping, shoulder to shoulder with him, drew back, and quickly shook his head.

“Hey, let's hurry up.” Xi Ping pulled Chang Jun, deliberately not looking at Yao Qi.

He had overdone it tormenting Ziming-xiong over the last few days. Lately he had found that if he even said hello, Yao Qi would tremble, so he had been consciously avoiding him.

Xi Ping had only used Yao Qi to send a letter. After he had worked out how the letter sending immortal tool worked, he'd just had Xi Yue snatch some transversal paper. For one thing, Yao-xiong got sick as soon as he got nervous, and he was worried about doing him serious damage. For another, his ridiculous fabrication was full of holes; only Yao Qi could have believed it, and it couldn't go on too long.

Xi Ping mulled it over: not having received a response from his family, he definitely would have told Chengjing Hall already. That was all right; Zhi-shishu would help him smooth it over.

Yao Qi kept his head down and waited for them to leave, then touched his back—there was a big cluster of red blisters there, very dense, like a snake's scales. At night, it was as if there were needles poking under his skin, so painful he couldn't sleep.

He thought he had already been cursed by an evil art.

Xi Ping couldn't imagine how hard it was for Yao Qi to tell Chengjing Hall; it was easy for him to say. Every morning, Yao Qi gathered up his courage, but when he went in the direction of Chengjing Hall, his legs would always turn at the critical moment toward the Yanhai Building.

He could only tell himself day after day: I'll wait another day. Today I'll investigate ancient texts for myself to see what kind of evil art this is, so when I see a steward from Chengjing Hall, I'll be able to explain it all clearly... Otherwise, what if it isn't an evil art?

As soon as Yao Qi imagined the scene of himself saying something wrong in Chengjing Hall, he wished he could commit suicide on the spot.

But he came up empty in the Yanhai Building, and the blisters not only didn't take a turn for the better, they showed a tendency to spread, climbing toward his chest!

At home, it must not have rained lately or something. His letter had sunk like a stone into the sea. There was no word.

Yao Qi was utterly desperate.

“Ziming,” a voice asked behind him, “you’ve been listless lately, there are dark circles under your eyes, and you don’t pay attention in class. You haven’t been eating well in the dining hall, either. What’s wrong?”

Hearing these words, Yao Qi’s extremely tense heartstrings snapped. Before he’d had a clear look at who he was talking to, his tears began to fall.

“No, wait...what’s happened to you?” Zhou Xi, who had only been asking in passing, was startled. “Your back? What’s wrong with your back?”

The immortal mountains were full of spiritual energy. Even a chicken couldn’t catch the flu here. Because of this, there was no medical hall at all. If the disciples had minor injuries or illnesses, an elixir could take care of it. In one incense stick, Zhou Xi, brooking no argument, had taken Yao Qi back to the Qiu courtyard and pulled open his clothes to look. “If I can’t do anything, I’ll go to Chengjing Hall and get some medicine for you... Hm? I thought you had thrown out your back. Why does it look like you’ve caught the waist-winding dragon?”²¹

Choked with sobs, Yao Qi said, “What-what kind of evil art is the waist-winding dragon?”

“What kind of evil art?” Zhou Xi was bewildered. “It’s a kind of rash. My nurse got it and left the palace on that account. I snuck out to see her. She got better in a little while.”

The two of them stared at each other in dismay for a long moment.

Zhou Xi frowned. “The imperial physician said that people who get this rash are either elderly or have too much on their minds. Ziming, what’s going on with you? Who told you this was an evil art?”

Yao Qi hemmed and hawed for a long time without getting it out clearly. At last, he gave himself up as hopeless and took out the evil scrawls and cursed letters he had received recently.

Zhou Xi unfolded and looked at each one in turn. The more he saw, the more interesting his face became. Finally, he hit a table in indignation, turned, and went toward Xi Ping’s north rooms.

The half-puppet had been sent by Xi Ping to the Yanhai Building to return a book—after the two great ascended spirit cultivators had left, Xi Ping had not only “come back to life” himself, he had also relaxed the prohibition on the half-puppet. Apart from not letting him talk to others at random, he would occasionally let him run errands to get food and return books.

Hearing someone knock on the door now, Xi Ping had to go out and answer himself. When he opened the door and saw Zhou Xi, he froze for a moment. “Your Fourth Highness?”

“You’ve gone overboard this time, haven’t you, Xi Shiyong?” Zhou Xi pushed aside Yao Qi, who had come chasing after. Without warning, he tossed all the notes he had taken from Yao Qi onto Xi Ping and coldly said, “You’d better have an explanation, or else we’re going to Chengjing Hall to clear this up!”

Xi Ping was entirely unprepared. He knew that Yao Qi definitely wasn’t the kind to confront a person to his face. He had expected Yao Qi to write a letter home, to complain to Chengjing Hall... He absolutely hadn’t expected that Yao Qi, who normally didn’t talk to anymore, would tell Zhou Xi!

When he realized what Zhou Xi had thrown at him, Xi Ping’s scalp bristled.

His first reaction was to shut the door, but it was already too late.

Like a marionette, his movements and expression stopped stiffly. His backward steps suddenly came to a stop. He turned back.

Zhou Xi only saw “Xi Ping,” as if he had pulled a muscle, turn halfway, then turn back. He tilted his head slightly, his eyes falling on the notes on the floor. “Oh...”

In a slightly odd tone, he said, “What are these?”

“Xi Shiyong, you...”

“Xi Ping” leaned down and picked up a note. He looked up and smiled at Zhou Xi. For some reason, Zhou Xi found himself unable to continue. Next door, Chang Jun had heard movements and quickly came running over.

“What’s wrong? Shiyong, Ziming... Hey, and His Fourth Highness is here, too. If you have something to say, talk it out, don’t argue.”

“Xi Ping” looked at their three faces with eyes like a snake’s. “It’s nothing. I played a little joke on Ziming-xiong that went overboard. I’m very sorry. I’ll make Ziming-xiong a proper apology another day.”

Zhou Xi opened his mouth. Words came to his lips, but a chill ran up his spine, and he forgot what he was going to say.

But Chang Jun clutched his hair. “Shiyong, speak properly, why are you lisping all of a sudden?”

“Xi Ping” heard this and, a little clumsily, turned his head toward him.
“Really? Is it that obvious?”

There was another flash of lightning, its glare making Xi Ping’s familiar face deathly white. The rain fell harder.

Pang Jian was more punctual than a calendar block. He fell upon Prince Zhuang Manor almost at the same time as the rain. “Prince Zhuang, have you received...oh, there it is!”

The filthy transversal fish had “revived” in the rain. Flapping its tail, it spat out a pile of letters—most of them were nonsense.

“What’s this about ‘cursed by an evil art...blisters on the waist’... Listen, Your Highness, are these also code words you two have arranged? I can’t understand it anymore.”

Prince Zhuang quickly scanned the pile of unfamiliar handwriting. His eyes hardened. He grabbed the last letter.

The writing on this letter was a mess, three out of six characters written wrong, as if a dog had drawn them. Only looking at them from a distance could you work out roughly what they were. The writing said: Pang is from the south.

Pang Jian's pupils contracted. His expression went blank.

Prince Zhuang quickly turned his head to look at him. "Exalted, what have you thought of? Exalted!"

Pang Jian recovered. He clenched his teeth. "I was in fact raised in the spiritual stone mines in the south—in Great Wan's mining district. My father was a miner... But only the half-immortal steward at the mine who sent me back to Great Wan knows of this, along with a few old seniors in Heaven's Design Pavilion. Since the previous General Commander of Heaven's Design Pavilion Su Zhun-shixiong got me the position of disciple of record, it's been a hundred years, and no one has mentioned it again."

Prince Zhuang held him down. "We only investigated evil cultivators. We didn't investigate our own people. Right?"

"Impossible!" Pang Jian's instinctive first reaction was to deny it. "The mine supervisors and Heaven's Design Pavilion are both outer sects and have only open-eyed cultivators. Even if there was someone who went against the rules, at most he would be in the initial established foundation stage. How could he get within half a step of the shed skin stage without anyone finding out?!"

“But you also said that this evil cultivator’s cultivation and actual strength don’t match.”

Bai Ling put in a word: “If it’s a half-immortal from an outer sect, then his place of birth and horoscope will be recorded—half-immortals from the Renzong years must be coming to the ends of their natural lifespans by now. There won’t be many left alive.”

Pang Jian quickly pulled out a piece of talisman paper and quickly drew a talisman on it. He clapped it against the desk. The talisman at once turned into golden light, and the image of a name roster appeared on the desk.

“Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s Assistant Commander Pang Jian requests the outer sect name roster,” Pang Jian ordered. “Which open-eyed seniors were born in the Renzong or Xiaozong eras and were in the outer sect in the eighteenth year of Shizong Yongxing?”

The name roster opened. Countless people’s figures floated in the air.

Pang Jian glanced through them and saw that most were acquaintances.

“Those who are still living.”

“Originating in Ning’an or with a record of living in Ning’an in their youth.”

With each criterion he added, some of the figures evaporated.

“Ask about the hemogram and horoscope,” said Prince Zhuang.

Pang Jian said, “Vermillion bird hemogram...horoscope yin in all four pillars.”

The figures on the illustrated roster flew off in disorder. Finally, the dust settled, and only one person remained.

A tall, thin man of middle-aged appearance, looking out expressionlessly from the illustrated roster, cold and severe.

Prince Zhuang quickly raised his head. “Who is this?”

Pang Jian stared at this image for a long moment. With difficulty, he swallowed a mouthful of saliva. “My...superior.

“Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s current general commander, who’s been in seclusion for eight years.”

CHAPTER 30 - The Dragon Bites Its Tail (18)

“Liang Chen?” A flash of lightning lit up Su Zhun’s sunken eyes. He looked up in disbelief. “Liang Mianzhi?!”

“Liang Chen?” Zhi Xiu twisted his fingers, and the note paper dissolved. He vanished from the precipice above the Sea of Stars, leaving behind a mumbled sentence: “Why does that sound familiar...?”

“What going on with this General Commander Liang Chen? How did he get like this while being part of a perfectly good orthodox sect? Also, since he’s the general commander of Heaven’s Design Pavilion, when he wanted to steal the Dragon Vein at the beginning of the fourth month, why did he go by such a circuitous route? Couldn’t he have just ordered everyone to withdraw from the Azure Dragon Towers?”

In Jinping City, one blue and one white figure passed through the dim downpour faster than lightning, heading straight for Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s head office.

Pang Jian shook his head. “His position in Heaven’s Design Pavilion is in name only. He has no true power. Well, it’s a long story. He used to be a mine supervisor in the south.”

Southern He's spiritual stone mines had been divided up by the big sects. It was far from civilization, and the mines were an important place that needed to have specialists sent to oversee them. Therefore, starting in the time of Renzong, a special outer sect had been developed, called the "Mining Office."

"Lord Liang worked his whole life in the mines. His hard work merited great reward. He ought to have retired like my Su-shixiong. But some years ago, he was attacked while escorting a shipment of spiritual stones and sustained serious injuries. It was said that he might... He never married or had children. He had no wishes. When the discussion came up, his only regret from his youth, which he had always held onto, was not having entered Heaven's Design Pavilion. At the time, Su-shixiong was just about to retreat to the Latent Cultivation Temple. The superiors came and asked me whether I could let Lord Liang serve as assistant commander under me in name only. It would only be a few years, like compensation for injury. I said that Lord Liang was an elder, and he had once saved me during a mine collapse. Of course I couldn't let him be my subordinate in name, so they should just give me the real responsibilities. He was always in seclusion tending to his injuries, anyway, and couldn't be in charge. I have both the Heavenly Question and the Azure Dragon Seal. It makes no difference to my work whether I'm officially a full commander or an assistant commander."

Bai Ling had no time to compliment Commander Pang on the tastefulness of his actions. He followed up: “So you mean that since he came to Heaven’s Design Pavilion, he’s been in seclusion tending to his injuries and hasn’t showed his face?”

“Yes, that’s right. I saw him once when he first came. He was all skin and bones, looked like he wasn’t long for this world.” Pang Jian said “excuse me” and pinched Bai Ling, who had turned into paper, between his fingers, and took him through the wall into the innermost courtyard of Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s head office.

Inside this courtyard was a perfectly ordinary garden. The rockery was rough and slipshod, and the plants grew wild, untended.

But as Pang Jian stepped inside, Bai Ling’s eyes swam, and he found that there was a little world in the garden—inside it was picturesque scenery, with flowers and trees as far as the eye could see. A little creek passed through it, connecting scattered pavilions and little houses. At the entrance was a several-zhang high boulder with an enormous karma beast drawn on it. It was napping. When it opened one eye and saw Pang Jian, it rolled over and showed its belly as if begging for pets.

Bai Ling said, “This place is...”

“Where we live.” Pang Jian, knowing the way, carried the paper man through the sea of flowers. “The head office’s walkers in the mortal world and our colleagues who come to the capital to report all stay here.”

For a time, Bai Ling thought this was a little strange, because this “hidden land” like a paradise was obviously a mustard seed maintained by a superior array. However beautiful, it was still only a floating mirage.

Before he could think much about it, Pang Jian had crossed through a large expanse of inhabited houses like a strong wind, landing in a valley at the end of the creek.

In the valley, flower petals blown here by the wind lay in a thick layer, covering a path no one had walked for a long time, cushioning a single-entrance, single-resident little house, solitary and secluded.

Pang Jian called out loudly: “Pang Jian seeks an audience with General Commander Liang on an urgent matter!”

Xi Yue ran through the rain, tightly clutching a piece of wood to his chest. There was a third-class inscription on this piece of wood. He had just taken it from the Yanhai Building’s fireproofing wood column while returning a book.

Xi Ping had tested him concerning the position and form of the inscription six times at different intervals, exercising utmost caution, to guarantee that he absolutely wouldn't remember wrong. All the same, while he had been stealing the inscription just now, Xi Ping had still been uneasy and had watched him the whole time through the dragon-taming chain.

Inscriptions were a thing you absolutely couldn't fool around with. In all his life, Xi Ping had gotten into so much trouble, and his san-ge had never turned on him; the one and only time he had hit him had been when he was fourteen or fifteen and had carved out a part of the inscriptions at Prince Zhuang Manor.

That time, even the manor's secret guard had come out in alarm. Afterward, that secret guard-da-ge had told him that because the inscriptions on furniture and buildings needed to be dismantled, there was a special design called an "active inscription." It was the last to be put down and the first to be removed, and it was the only type of inscription that could be carved out by a mortal.

If you picked up the active inscription, it would immediately take effect.

Xi Ping's luck was good. Fireproofing inscriptions were the safest among third-class inscriptions, and a single one didn't have a strong taboo on the active inscription.

Xi Ping had picked one up with his own hands; that was why he had dared to send Xi Yue to “borrow” one from the Yanhai Building, in case it was needed.

Xi Yue had successfully taken the inscription under his observation and was on the way back. Xi Ping had just finished instructing him to put it away carefully and not let the tinderbox touch it when a guest had come at the other end of the dragon-taming chain. Xi Ping had said “wait a moment” and gone to open the door. Since then, there had been nothing.

Out of nowhere, the half-puppet had an ominous feeling and sped up involuntarily. He ran the whole way down the slope from the Yanhai Building. From a distance, he saw the stone wall of the Qiu courtyard. Then Xi Ping’s urgent voice came from the dragon-taming chain: “Come back, hurry!”

Xi Ping had calmed down in the blink of an eye. “Senior, let’s talk out anything we need to later. First send the three of them away, all right?”

Tai Sui ignored him.

Xi Ping went on: “It is what it is. If these meddlers stay here and keep getting in our way, it won’t do you or me any good. Even Yao Ziming is hardly a nobody, never mind that His Fourth Highness is also here. I can't make good on anyone's losses. If you damage one of them, even if you snatch my body later, you still won't be able to use my identity to infiltrate the orthodox sect..."

"The orthodox...sect." For some reason, these words made Tai Sui laugh. "Little devil, I slipped up before and underestimated you, but you shouldn't think yourself too clever. What use does your identity still have?"

Xi Ping's heart tightened—yes, the old roundworm had figured out that he had gotten the information out.

Why were those three still standing there staring? Your Fourth Highness! Where's your discernment, Your Forth Highness? Didn't you grow up playing with spiritual stones?!

Zhou Xi had in fact realized that something was off, so he raised an arm and pushed Yao Qi behind himself. He asked Xi Ping: "Why are you behaving so inconsistently?"

Xi Ping thought, Oh, heaven, you've finally worked it out! Now hurry up and run!

But His Fourth Highness, who had grown up playing with spiritual stones, righteously advised him: “Shiyong, you’ve already entered the immortal sect, so you must follow the established path, working hard to cultivate. Have you allowed your mind to be confused by some crooked magic?”

Xi Ping: “...”

He really would have loved to get down on his knees and kowtow to Zhou Xi—you’d be more clever than this if you’d grown up playing with bird shit! Either His Fourth Highness or his san-ge had to be adopted; it was impossible for them to have the same father!

Tai Sui laughed loudly. “Following the established path, hahaha, His Fourth Highness has learned his lessons well!”

Just then, a cord in Xi Ping’s mind moved. He felt the dragon-taming chain approaching. Xi Yue was back!

Xi Ping still remembered that when the secret guard-da-ge at Prince Zhuang Manor had put back the active inscription, his movements had been very gentle. The guard had said that the active inscription of a fireproofing inscription had no other taboo apart from not being able to come into contact with fire. If wood rubbed together too strongly, there would be sparks, and if a spark touched the inscription, the inscription would be activated. A solitary inscription character couldn't connect; once activated, it would leave the wood and "flow" toward whatever in its surroundings had the most spiritual energy; then things would go wrong.

Xi Ping had originally prepared this inscription character in case he unexpectedly opened his spiritual eyes—when a person's spiritual eyes opened, he would become a "spiritual energy vortex," pulling in all the surrounding spiritual energy. If you used fire to open up the inscription character then, the activated inscription character would "flow" into your spiritual eyes along with the energy. As long as he chose his time right, he should be able to shatter his meridians at once.

Though Xi Ping hadn't opened his spiritual eyes yet, it was near enough. With that evil cultivator on him, he had to be the focal point of the spiritual energy in this courtyard.

So he decisively ordered through the dragon-taming chain: "Tie the tinderbox and the inscription character together and throw them at me!"

Xi Yue had traveled all over with an evil cultivator. Of course he knew how powerful inscriptions were. He was startled. "No!"

The slow-thinking Zhou Xi heard the malicious laughter and finally felt a sense of danger—he suspected Xi Ping was losing his mind. So he said decisively to Chang Jun, “Go get a steward...”

Before he could finish, Tai Sui raised his hand and pulled Zhou Xi over.

Xi Ping shouted at the half-puppet through the dragon-taming chain:

“Hurry, don’t argue!”

Under the control of its master’s tyrannical will, the dragon-taming chain took no more notice of the half-puppet’s weak resistance. It irresistibly controlled Xi Yue’s limbs, making him run over.

Tai Sui had known all along that Xi Yue was approaching, but after closely associating with him for several days, he knew perfectly well how useless this little thing was; he wasn’t even as strong as these pampered young masters. So he took absolutely no notice of Xi Yue. He raised a hand to grip Zhou Xi’s neck.

Chang Jun let out a shout: “Shiyong!”

Yao Qi had been scared to his knees.

The dragon-taming chain dragged Xi Yue toward them. At a distance of three steps, it forced him to roll the inscription character and the tinderbox together, then throw them as hard as he could at Xi Ping’s back.

Xi Yue's eyes were red, but the dragon-taming chain around his neck dragged him behind a tree the moment the things left his hand.

The tinderbox hit Xi Ping's sturdy shoulder blade and burst into flame, lighting up the cotton bundle. The burning inscription character broke away from the wood at once and seeped into Xi Ping's back.

In the chaos, Xi Ping didn't even have time to feel pain.

Something pierced directly through his chest. It was as if it wanted to push all his organs out from between his ribs.

Oh, no! Xi Ping knew at once that he had underestimated the inscription character.

This wouldn't just rupture all his meridians. It would smash him to bits.

All these years later, Xi Ping finally understood that he had deserved the beating he'd gotten at Prince Zhuang Manor back then!

In that flash of time, everything seemed to slow down. Countless things passed instantly through Xi Ping's head. His mind was unprecedentedly clear. His senses were extremely acute; he seemed to be able to hear things outside the valley, and drumbeats and human voices from even further away. All the joys and sorrows of the human world turned into a vast wind and enveloped him.

He seemed to have become endlessly large, scattered across all living things; he also seemed to have contracted into a speck of dust, unable to distinguish direction, exiled in a world without bounds.

When Zhou Xi had knocked on the door, his mind had been in the dragon-taming chain, and his hand rubbing the reincarnation wood carving. He had brought it along with him when he'd gone to open the door. Through the wooden carving, he could see Tai Sui's ugly, humble followers without having to focus. With only a thought, he found A-Xiang.

Xi Ping had no time to speak. At the final juncture, he transmitted a thought:

Don't trust those goblins! Don't learn how to disfigure yourself with magic from them!

Then the jade crumbled and dust flew everywhere—

Pang Jian's talisman burst open the gate of the general commander's residence. Bai Ling was about to land when he saw Pang Jian pull a long bow out from his femur. An invisible arrow shot toward the emptiness in the residence. Where the arrow passed, the scenery of Jinping's high summer disintegrated, and a clammy chill blew Bai Ling two chi away.

The mask over the courtyard went to pieces, revealing the truth—there was nothing left alive in this courtyard. Withered grass lay on the ground giving off a deathly air, covered in a layer of frost. Some careless flower petals flew over the courtyard walls from afar and landed in the courtyard; before they landed, they had already dried and curled up.

The courtyard was piled high with layer upon layer of arrays, with the door of the house as their endpoint. For a moment, these two masters were dazed, unable to puzzle them out.

Before Pang Jian could look closely at the arrays, he sensed some change. He pulled out a reincarnation wood amulet.

He saw the amulet letting out a faint, ominous red light. Pang Jian touched it and instantly felt the cries of countless people calling out for “Tai Sui” race up his bones to his brain.

They didn't know that Xi Ping had been exposed. But while “Tai Sui” wasn't a real name, “Liang Chen” was a real name carved on his spiritual image. Heaven's Design Pavilion and Xuanyin Mountain had fixed on this person at the same time; of course Liang Chen's spiritual sense would be moved.

Bai Ling said, "He's noticed. There's no time to lose. Commander Pang, lend me your Barrier Dispeller Bow!"

Pang Jian had faced danger for many years. In battle, his reactions were incomparably fast. Before Bai Ling finished speaking, he already understood.

He stretched out a talisman paper and wrapped it around the reincarnation wood amulet. He drew his bow. "Brother, you'll have to run a risk."

Bai Ling curled up into a piece of paper and stuck to his invisible arrow. With a whistle, he pierced the group of arrays along with the arrow.

Meeting provocation, the arrays immediately exploded into fierce light. The invisible arrow from the Barrier Dispeller Bow forced its way through and only ran out of strength when it had come to the end.

The invisible arrow vanished, and Bai Ling was forced to land. A hurricane curled up at the tail end of the arrays, and within the hurricane, countless blades like a meat grinder pulled Bai Ling in. He seemed to have been pulverized; scraps of paper floated everywhere!

Pang Jian's pupil's contracted sharply, but the next moment, a piece of paper blown up by the wind landed by the door. After plastering itself to the door, it quickly stretched out and turned into a complete human figure. Bai Ling's feet didn't touch the ground; he drove a paper knife home. When the paper knife fell, it became a true blade and split open the group of arrays from within.

Pang Jian darted after him. The door to the general commander's residence was wide open. The two of them charged in one after the other...and froze.

Bai Ling said, "...Is this your general commander?"

Inside the room sat a man's...skeleton.

All his shriveled skin and flesh was stretched tightly over the bones. He was sitting cross-legged on a giant piece of reincarnation wood. His hair, beard, and skin all appeared to be the particular pale hue of reincarnation wood. At a glance, it was impossible to tell what was man and what was wood.

But his chest was still undulating slightly!

On the reincarnation wood pedestal, countless faces appeared and disappeared, all of them shouting something. This image was bizarre and shocking. But the “Grand Duke, the true god,” they were calling upon was hidden behind his amulets, looking more wizened than a corpse that had been dried out by the wind for hundreds of years. The smell of rotting wood came bubbling up from his whole body!

“His primordial being has left his body?” said Pang Jian.

Bai Ling raised his paper knife. “He must be in the early established foundation stage.”

“He’s in the early established foundation stage, but his primordial being is near-shed skin? So...the primordial being shunned the body and went flying off on its own?” After saying this, Pang Jian himself thought he was talking nonsense. “No, how could he have a primordial being in the early established foundation stage?”

Bai Ling said, “It doesn’t matter. There’s no time!”

As soon as he spoke, he drove the knife toward the man on the reincarnation wood.

The paper knife flashed coldly. With a clang, the blade that had cut apart the arrays slipped and fell onto the reincarnation wood pedestal. On the wooden pedestal, all the faces were infuriated, roaring at him in unison. The paper knife disintegrated, and Bai Ling went flying. He only avoided slamming into the wall by turning into paper at the last moment. When he landed, he spat out a mouthful of blood.

Among the densely packed faces on the wooden pedestal, a teenage girl's flashed quickly. Her expression was confused, standing out among the others.

A-Xiang watched as her companions around her screamed "Tai Sui" as though they had been cursed. She clutched the reincarnation wood amulet on her chest.

Why had her "vision" been different from the others...?

The Grand Duke seemed to have just called these people goblins!

CHAPTER 31 - The Dragon Bites Its Tail (19)

In the Latent Cultivation Temple, the direction of the wind shifted.

The south wind blowing through the valley turned around before it hit the cliffs and formed a vortex with the Qiu courtyard as its center. Where the circling wind passed, it touched the new buds and brought out the cries of the blue luan. White fawns looked in at the door as if coming to report good tidings. Ripples emerged on the pond and the little creek in the courtyard, spreading endlessly.

Xi Ping had been soaking in spiritual energy among the immortal mountains for months. On the brink of death, the fierce desire for survival opened his spiritual eyes. Here was the threshold to the shortcut between mortal and immortal, right in front of him!

Two figures landed one after the other in the Latent Cultivation Temple's Qiu courtyard.

Su Zhun waved his sleeve and moved the dumbfounded disciples away.
“Duanrui-shishu!”

The other person turned out to be Princess Duanrui, who had “left the Latent Cultivation Temple.” She seemed to come up from underfoot out of nowhere. An invisible talisman hit Xi Ping's back—in the place where the inscription character had seeped in.

Xi Ping was like a vase about to explode, frozen solid by extreme cold, narrowly remaining “intact” on the point of shattering.

The princess formed a complex hand seal in her palm. A transparent cocoon congealed around Xi Ping. She ordered: “Get back!”

Su Zhun didn't even think. He rolled up the three young men and one half-puppet, then ran.

Next, all the spiritual energy in the Latent Cultivation Temple came rushing in like a flood, hitting the “cocoon” wrapped around Xi Ping. The sound was so thunderous that everyone thought they had gone deaf. The buildings and rockery of the Qiu courtyard were instantly turned into a pile of ruins.

Only the princess's hand seal didn't move a hair, keeping the will of the whole valley out by force.

Zhi Xiu had once asked her what she would do if Xi Ping really had been possessed by a primordial being. Duanrui's response had been “expel the evil.”

What if the man and the demon weren't so easy to separate?

Duanrui's answer then had been: "I don't know. This isn't where my strength lies. You ought to avoid alerting the enemy and return to the inner sect to consult other masters."

Zhi Xiu said, "But right now, as soon as the disciple opens his spiritual eyes, his body will be snatched at once. There's something unusual about this evil cultivator. Before, 'wearing' a corpse, he was already half a step from shedding his skin. If his body snatching succeeds, I'm afraid you and I won't be able to take responsibility for the outcome."

The princess said matter-of-factly: "It's all right. If it really comes to that, I can temporarily block the spiritual energy in the Latent Cultivation Temple and wait for the inner sect to act. If there is truly nothing the inner sect can do, it won't be too late then to discuss how to proceed."

"But, shijie, rivers flow naturally into the sea, and a waterfall flowing upward is against nature. When a person crosses the border between mortal and immortal, the universe will pull him toward cultivation. You're planning to block all the spiritual energy in the valley with your own strength alone? How long can you hold out?"

“It will be eight centuries soon.” No matter what Princess Duanrui said, her tone always sounded as if she were ordering food. “This won’t be long.”

With these words, Zhi Xiu had handed the Latent Cultivation Temple over to her and returned to the inner sect to request orders.

For one zhang around Xi Ping, the rain went backward. The accumulated water already fallen on the ground turned back into drizzle and flew up to the sky.

The mountains rumbled as though ready to collapse. The auspicious animals who had just gathered all ran as far away as they could. Xi Ping was frozen. Amid the furious lightning and thunder, his shadow was now man-shaped, now dragon-shaped. The black dragon and the human shadow were tightly wound together, like a desperately uneven fight to the death.

To protect the disciples, Su Zhun allowed himself to be swept by the brutal spiritual energy. His headdress let his hair loose. He looked back in horror.

Before leaving, General Zhi had said to him that this Xi brat understood the situation perfectly. He was prudent in action and frequently exceeded people’s expectations. He had told him to keep an eye on him and not interfere too much. That was why Elder Su, seeing that half-puppet sneaking around the Yanhai Building, had turned a blind eye and let him go.

Good heavens, this truly did exceed expectations!

Was Zhi Jingzhai going senile? Was this kind of suicidal behavior what he called “perfect understanding”?

Tai Sui, trapped in the cocoon along with Xi Ping, laughed quietly. “Princess Duanrui, ha, it seems I’ve fallen into your hands. Who else is here? What about General Zhi? Had he gone to the mountain to ask for some magic weapon? Your Highness... Your Highness Princess Duanrui, this is the flood of the universe—you dare to hold it back with a single hand seal, but you can’t deny the will of the immortal mountains. You’ve taken your vanishingly rare innate spiritual bones along the way of clarity, stayed trapped in prison for eight hundred years. The Zhou family is truly grateful to you... Hahaha!”

It was as if the princess had heard a dog barking. Not even her eyelashes moved.

With Xi Ping’s eyes, Tai Sui looked greedily at the spiritual energy assuming physical form outside the cocoon—if only a sliver leaked in, if only...

“Your Highness, don’t you think this situation is very delicate?” With no care for Xi Ping’s body, on the point of collapse, he forced Xi Ping’s hand to lift.

At this movement, the shattering bones in that arm couldn’t hold out anymore. The joints pierced right through the skin.

Tai Sui raised the limp arm and pressed the bloody hand to the reincarnation wood Xi Ping had tucked into his clothes. “I am conforming to heaven’s will, while you are waging a hopeless struggle. Do you think I can only get the spiritual energy I need from the mountains?”

The princess’s eyes fell on the reincarnation wood in his hand. Finally, she frowned.

“I was unwilling to sacrifice so many lives. It was you who forced me to it, Zhou Xueru, you forced me—”

In the bizarre residence of Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s general commander, all the faces on the reincarnation wood pedestal contorted. The ugly, disfigured faces began to leak blood from the seven orifices of their faces. It was clear to the naked eye that they were being drained by something, just like Jiangli at the Blissful Village!

A-Xiang jumped up in fear, looking on as her “shifu” and her companions called fanatically for Tai Sui while blood ran from their faces as they held the reincarnation wood in both hands. Their skin dried, the color faded from their black hair...

Bai Ling turned his head swiftly. “Commander Pang, give me the reincarnation wood!”

Pang Jian quickly tossed him the piece of reincarnation wood wrapped in talisman paper that he was carrying. He saw Bai Ling fish out yet another paper knife. The point of the knife quickly carved a particular character into the wood.

Pang Jian’s pupils contracted—this was an inscription character that he had never seen before!

But this Bai Ling was clearly only an open-eyed cultivator, with cultivation not even as high as his own. He couldn’t have seen wrong!

An open-eyed cultivator didn’t even have a primordial being. What was he using to carve the inscription character?

But the situation was critical. This was no time for asking questions. Pang Jian quickly dug up all the spiritual stones he was carrying and tossed them over along with his purse. “Catch!”

Bai Ling caught them one-handed. As soon as the dozen liang of jade stamp stones touched his palm, their spiritual energy was immediately sucked dry. They shattered into powder through the purse, helping him carve the final stroke. The bones of his fingers had already twisted out of shape!

Once the inscription on the reincarnation wood amulet was complete, Bai Ling tossed it away, throwing it onto the reincarnation wood pedestal. “Break!”

The inscription character burst into blinding light. The connection between the master of the reincarnation wood and his frenzied believers was broken off. The bleeding faces on the wooden pedestal were frozen in place.

The sounds suddenly vanished from Tai Sui’s ears. He realized at once what had happened and flew into a rage. “Scoundrels!”

Pang Jian exhaled. “Bai-xiong, if you had this kind of magic power, why didn’t you use it before...”

“What do you...”

The faces frozen on the wooden pedestal slowly and with extremely difficulty began to move. The profound hatred and indignation on those faces was clear to see. The inscription character began to tremble.

Pang Jian was appalled.

In hardly any time, the inscription character was shaking harder and harder. Finally, like a thin and frail dike, it burst before the mighty current of myriad minds pushing on it.

The wooden amulet that the inscription had been carved on shattered. Bai Ling's strength failed at once. He turned into paper. If Pang Jian hadn't quickly grabbed him, he would have landed right on the blood-colored wood.

There was nothing left to obstruct the desperate believers who would hand over everything for the sake of a faint notion.

Tai Sui laughed heartily.

Just then, there was an enormous sound in the air above the Latent Cultivation Temple. Fierce light broke through the sky where night still lingered without any warning.

The tremors from the sound made fine cracks in the “cocoon” the princess had wrapped around Xi Ping. Xi Ping’s consciousness, which had nearly sunk into an abyss, was instantly called back to wakefulness.

The blinding light was a little bewildering to him.

Why would it be light now?

Was he really seeing tomorrow’s sun?

The sun was so big... Why hadn’t the rain stopped?

Before he could make sense of it, Xi Ping heard Tai Sui use his own voice. Gentle as a sigh, he said, “How fortunate I am to have merited the Bell of Tribulation.”

Su Zhun held back his colleagues, who had rushed over. “Stay away!”

The sudden light in the sky had forced Yang Anli to close his eyes. In the middle of the night, he raised his hand to shield them. He asked, “Elder Su, what’s going on? What was that sound just now? Why is it light?”

“It’s the Bell of Tribulation.” Luo Qingshi stood on the shoulders of two straw children, not worried that he would be forced to do the splits, finally succeeding in raising his head above everyone else’s. “One of the present four great divine tools, hanging for thousands of years on the Principal Peak under the charge of the Dignitary of Rites Elder. Without the unanimous consent of the three elders, no one can use it. A great demon must have emerged... It’s fortunate that this is the Latent Cultivation Temple.”

“Oh?”

“Well, it’s Xuanyin Mountain’s ironclad rule that the Bell of Tribulation must not pass the border between mortal and immortal. Otherwise, if it rang, it could cause a three-year drought in the mortal world.” Luo Qingshi would have loved nothing better than to extend his neck. “Is that Xi Shiyong in the courtyard? Interesting!”

“Enough with the ‘interesting’s, Luo-shixiong,” Su Zhun’s voice came from several zhang away. “Hurry—go—”

“Alas, you’re right.” Luo Qingshi’s “high perch” didn’t prevent him from turning nimbly. His pair of “high perches” ran away in his stead while he himself could still crane his neck and keep looking back, trying to see everything he could.

Dong—

Xi Ping's brain was nearly knocked out of his ears by that tolling. His mind cleared a little further.

“The Bell of Tribulation needs the true name carved on your spiritual image,” he heard Tai Sui say in a peculiar tone. In a whisper, he asked, “General, have you remembered who I am?”

“Liang Chen.” General Zhi's voice came from the clouds. The aftereffects of the tolling added a chill to his previously warm voice. “Current general commander of Heaven's Design Pavilion, member of a righteous sect who has engaged in evil practices. Do you know your crime?”

“And what else?” the fearsome and violent great evil cultivator asked. There was some indescribable impatience in his voice. Anyone could have heard the eagerness in it. “What else?”

Zhi Xiu frowned. He thought this was strange, but he didn't have time to get to the bottom of it—even if the princess could withstand the weight of the whole valley, Xi Ping's mortal body, only a thread away from collapse, wouldn't necessarily hold out.

“If you come out on your own, I can take responsibility for letting you live to await trial. Otherwise, at three tolls of the Bell of Tribulation, you will be destroyed, body and soul.”

Hearing this, Tai Sui was silent for a moment. Then he laughed. “Of course. You don’t remember. The nobility are so forgetful. General Zhi, there’s a criminal brand on my spiritual image. There’s no justification I can give for myself. Can’t you see that? Await trial, ha...”

As he spoke, he suddenly struggled, seeming to be planning on breaking through the princess’s prohibition by force. How could the young man’s brittle ice body bear this torment?

Zhi Xiu’s heart tightened. He had no choice. He had to sound the Bell of Tribulation again.

Dong—

The air above the Latent Cultivation Temple was harsh. Xi Ping’s mind filled with screaming.

The next moment, he realized these weren’t his screams.

His body suddenly relaxed. A beam of bloody light shot out from the top of his head. The false evil god possessing him had been locked onto by the Bell of Tribulation and pulled out of his body!

The great evil cultivator's demented laughter mixed intermittently with the screams, sprinkled all over the sky. The sound dyed the rain blood red, so sad and shrill it chilled you to the bone.

Dong—

The ruthless Bell of Tribulation tolled for a third time. The echoes of the laughter and screaming were both suppressed. The tolling carried through the valley for a long time, bearing witness to the cold will of heaven.

In the head office of Heaven's Design Pavilion, the densely packed faces on the reincarnation wood quietly vanished without a trace. The invincible skeleton split apart and rolled over the ground under Pang Jian and Bai Ling's panicked gazes.

The body that had still been drawing clear, shallow breaths a moment ago was like a spiritual stone with the spiritual energy sucked out. As soon as it hit the ground, it broke to pieces then and there. The dust that went up made the two men present back up several steps in dread.

Warm lamplight slanted in through the window, following the dust...the ashes of the dead as they wafted around quietly for a while, then, with nothing to rest on, fell to the ground.

Destroyed, body and soul.

After a long time, Xi Ping finally recovered from the tolling, but he found that he still couldn't move.

“Xi Shiyong.” A slightly deep female voice sounded in his ear. “You have been injured by the inscription. Your tendons and bones ought to have broken to pieces. I have used a talisman to keep you together.”

Xi Ping: “...”

In other words, he was a person made of sand now; even breathing was dangerous.

Princess Duanrui continued: “But your spiritual eyes opened in the moment between life and death. Now that the evil cultivator has been expelled, I will release the prohibition and allow the spiritual energy to pour into your meridians. Prepare yourself.”

What? Xi Ping thought. He couldn't stand up to a wind blowing right now, and she wanted to pour spiritual energy into him?

Why didn't she just take a pot of boiling water and steep him in it?! Maybe if she planted him in the ground, a little one would grow next year.

Zhi Xiu respectfully sent the Bell of Tribulation away and landed among the ruins along with the night. First he nodded to the princess. Then he said to Xi Ping, "Your Duanrui-shishu and I will keep your body from being destroyed, but when the spiritual energy passes through you, it will be hundreds of thousands of times more painful than for others. You must maintain spiritual clarity. If you can't endure it..."

Princess Duanrui interrupted him: "Enough. The longer we draw it out, the greater the danger becomes. I will let go now."

No! thought Xi Ping. Wait, can't you think of another way to rescue me...?

The princess had already uncompromisingly released the hand seal.

At once, all traces of the "cocoon" wrapped around Xi Ping were blown away by the mountain wind. Duanrui backed up three steps as if collapsing from exhaustion.

His ears hummed.

In that instant, every bit of flesh and blood in his body was torn over and over; the pain was more tumultuous than the spiritual energy surging like the tide. It drowned his mind at once.

He was only a somewhat bad-tempered young master, not some hero who had gone through a trial by fire. Apart from the suffering he'd experienced at Tai Sui's hands, the most serious injury he'd had in his life had been breaking his leg falling off a horse... These two had overestimated him!

If he'd really had that kind of strong will, he would have made something of himself by now. Could he still be put to sleep by a few pages of a book filled with unpronounceable words?

The princess quietly said, "I'm afraid this child won't make it."

Zhi Xiu's expression altered slightly. "Shiyong!"

But sounds from the outer world couldn't reach Xi Ping's ears. He seemed to be a small insect curled up on a leaf in the middle of a vast tidal wave; he couldn't even struggle against a splash.

Human strength has its limits.

However bold a sparrow is, can it fly over the peak of Mount Kunlun?

What if...what if he just dropped it?

Xi Ping thought that he had eaten well and played well, had lived in comfort for nearly twenty years, fully marinated in gold dust. He'd gotten his money's worth.

Racking his brain, he couldn't come up with any regrets, so he abandoned his pitiful resistance.

Let his spirit fade, his mind dissolve...

Suddenly, a weak voice passed through the storm: "Tai Sui! Grand Duke Tai Sui..."

The reincarnation wood was still stuck to his hand with blood.

To the south were innumerable pieces of reincarnation wood—trees growing in the ground, wood made into timber, memorial tablets placed in shrines... A-Xiang's constant calls pulled Xi Ping's drifting consciousness into the wood. As soon as he sank into it, he seemed to grow a vast body. The pain that had nearly killed him was considerably diluted.

Xi Ping shook, automatically clutching that distant call.

A-Xiang ran breathlessly through the alleys, darted into her house, and plopped down on the ground. She was frightened out of her wits when she remembered what had just happened.

She had become confused somehow, as if her mind had gone wandering, and had nearly gone mad along with her shifu and the others. A-Xiang remembered she'd had only one thought at the time: worship. If only she was sincere enough, everything she had lost would come back to her, all her wishes would come true.

If that "vision" hadn't woken her...

A-Xiang clutched the reincarnation wood in front of her chest. Still recovering from her shock, she thought: I must have been the only one to hear the voice of the true god.

So she earnestly thanked Grand Duke Tai Sui, who had saved her once again.

The grand canal's lighthouse indefatigably puffed out steam, striving to send its light far away through the pouring rain.

The swift rain fell all night, cleansing the skies of Jinping. A rare blue sky appeared.

Amid the girl's prayers, there was a hum as a steamship raised waves and slowly put into port. A crowd of workers in straw sandals ran over, shouting as they scrambled for work.

The wind in the Latent Cultivation Temple dropped.

CHAPTER 32 - The Dragon Bites Its Tail (Final)

“In all the history of the Latent Cultivation Temple, this was the greatest commotion caused by the opening of spiritual eyes, bar none.” Su Zhun walked into Chengjing Hall with his arms folded, looking fretful. “We may as well rename the Qiu courtyard the Gu courtyard,²² and the Hu courtyard next to it was also affected. Even the discipline hall has collapsed... Well, how is he?”

Zhi Xiu put down Xi Ping’s wrist. “Better than expected.”

Su Zhun said, “Not dead, not paralyzed, not maimed, and not an imbecile either?”

“Have some higher hopes.”

“Thank heaven and earth, he’s in one piece.” Su Zhun let out a big sigh of relief. “Good, we can hold him for ransom to make the family pay for the damage.”

Zhi Xiu added, “Only I’m afraid he’ll be down for some months.”

Elder Su gave an ah. His first reaction was, “But what about his schoolwork?”

“The schoolwork is no problem.” Zhi Xiu waved a hand. “Shijie, what do you think is going on with those spiritual bones of his?”

“Spiritual bones?” Hearing this, Su Zhun’s white beard nearly curled. “What spiritual bones? Him? He has spiritual bones?!”

Others sought for a hundred years to acquire a set of spiritual bones, and this brat had blinked his eyes and studied only two chapters of Detailed Account of Meridians; how could he have spiritual bones?

Su Zhun involuntarily looked at the princess. “Do you mean he has innate...”

“He doesn’t have innate spiritual bones, and the first-class spiritual sense was an error of judgment on Luo Qingshi’s part. This disciple’s inherent endowments are on the upper end of average,” Duanrui said. “Those spiritual bones aren’t his own.”

“Then-then whose are they?”

“That evil cultivator surnamed Liang’s,” said Duanrui. “We received word from Heaven’s Design Pavilion. This evil cultivator had no more than an established foundation. He shouldn’t have had a primordial being. If my guess is correct, what possessed this disciple was a set of spiritual bones. When Xi Shiyong gained these spiritual bones, while he couldn't use them for himself, his spiritual sense still took form in his senses.”

If anyone but Princess Duanrui had said this, Su Zhun definitely would have thought he was listening to a stupid ghost story. “How can bones possess someone?”

“Precedent does in fact exist,” Zhi Xiu said, standing. “I investigated it in the inner sect. When the ancient gods and demons still existed, there was once a demonic god who legend says was a long-time enemy of the Southern Sage. This person's cultivation path was extremely unusual. It is said that he passed through tribulations by ‘being smashed to pieces.’ With each boundary he crossed, his body had to die. This is known as the ‘way of death.’”

Su Zhun felt that this was even more unbelievable than “a skeleton possessing someone.” “A dead man came back to life? And he could cross boundaries?”

Unless you had ascended to the world above, then even if you were a master cultivator, you were in the end still human.

When a human died, it was ashes to ashes, dust to dust.

And the so-called “primordial being” wasn’t at all like the ghosts that the common people imagined, which could travel the world, freely haunting. The sturdiest primordial being could only survive snatching a body once. Otherwise, the cultivation sects would truly have become “ghost sects.” A primordial being still had to rely on a body. Even for an ascended spirit cultivator, when the body was destroyed, the absconding primordial being couldn’t withstand even the lightest tap from an open-eyed grade immortal tool. Once the body was destroyed, even if you succeeded in snatching another body, your progress along the immortal path would stop dead. You would have no way to take another step forward.

“‘Death’ is a metaphor, not true death,” Zhi Xiu said. “In the incomplete manuscript I found, it says that this master of the way of death cultivated a special set of ‘hidden spiritual bones’ that could be concealed among all things in nature. His true body was those hidden bones. Each time his bones and flesh parted, it was like ‘shedding his skin.’ The perfectly preserved hidden bones would grow another body...until those hidden bones were captured by the Southern Sage, and this ‘undying’ master at last passed away.”

“Never mind ancient stories. Many of the records are no different than ‘Nüwa Mends the Heavens’, even more fantastical than legends from the mortal world,” Su Zhun said. “Little shishu, what connection does this demonic god you’re talking about have with this child?”

Zhi Xiu raised his eyes. “By coincidence, this legendary master of the way of death’s associated material was reincarnation wood. That is where reincarnation wood gets its name.”

Su Zhun was stunned.

Princess Duanrui said, nodding, “After I cut off the spiritual energy in the valley, that evil cultivator wanted to go through the reincarnation wood to absorb people’s energy and blood to fill his spiritual eyes. It’s clear he could in fact use the reincarnation wood to carry out ‘supernatural’ activity. The legend about the hidden bones isn’t unfounded.”

“Xiao Pang says that over there they found the evil cultivator’s true body, and his bones aren’t spiritual bones. After only eight years, they’ve already rotted,” Zhi Xiu said. “It’s impossible that an established foundation cultivator wouldn’t have spiritual bones. So where did his spiritual bones go?”

Su Zhun broke out in gooseflesh. “In other words, it’s likely that Liang Mianzhi...by some coincidence obtained a portion of this ancient demonic god’s hidden bones, and after merging them with his spiritual bones, he left his body like a primordial being? No wonder no one could spot a primordial being on that child. Body and soul were indeed one.”

Hearing him say “Liang Mianzhi,” Zhi Xiu raised his eyebrows slightly. Then he said, “My guess is that body and soul being one also had to do with the life-swapping talisman of that young lady who performed the sacrifice at the Blissful Village. She must already have offered up everything she had in life and death to the reincarnation wood. Using the life-swapping talisman, she saved his life, but she also made him a target.”

The princess asked, “I heard that this evil cultivator surnamed Liang was very attached to those whose spiritual image resembled his?”

“Yes. There was a criminal brand on his spiritual image.” Zhi Xiu murmured to himself for a moment. “While I don’t know what his precise plans were, my guess is, he must have wanted to use some method to remove his criminal brand.”

Su Zhun felt that his two hundred plus years of cultivation had all been for nothing. His mind was buzzing now. “Little shishu, what is a ‘criminal brand’ on the spiritual image?”

“In the past, when Heaven’s Design Pavilion was first established, the outer sect system was incomplete. For the sake of defeating evil, many cultivators were recruited from among the common people. While these people were talented, they were often undisciplined. To prevent them from going astray, a master established the art of branding the spiritual image,” the princess said coolly. “This is an outmoded practice that was abolished over six hundred years ago. You young people have likely never heard of it. For the spiritual image brand, both sides must be willing, and afterward, the one bearing the brand may never betray their master. This brand is like a person’s name and follows them their whole life. Even if their primordial being inhabits another body in the future, they will still be unable to cast it off.”

Su Zhun’s scalp went numb. He blurted out, “As an official appointed by the court, why would he have such a thing? Who put it on him?”

“Yes, I also want to know that,” Zhi Xiu said slowly. “It also puzzles me that this person seems to have obeyed the rules his whole life, so where could he have gotten the relics of an ancient demonic god...and how could he have concealed himself in Heaven’s Design Pavilion for eight years without the Azure Dragon Towers or the Sea of Stars having any reaction?”

As he spoke, he lowered his gaze, and the other two’s eyes fell along with his on the unconscious Xi Ping.

Su Zhun unconsciously lowered his voice. “The Bell of Tribulation left Liang Mianzhi’s...half set of ‘hidden bones’ in this child?”

“He was wounded by the inscription before opening his spiritual eyes. To let the spiritual energy pass through his meridians, shijie fused his meridians and skeleton together... Luckily it wasn’t a ‘spiritual eye opening wound,’ or else no amount of spiritual energy could have repaired it. He would have been paralyzed for life. When the spiritual energy passed through his injured bones and sinews, they healed spontaneously. The evil cultivator’s remnants must have fused with his own bones.”

As Zhi Xiu spoke, he snapped his fingers across empty space. Xi Ping’s fingers, swept by gentle spiritual energy, let out a twang like a qin string and cracked a coarse pottery teacup by the bed. “Though they haven’t fully developed yet, they are in fact spiritual bones.”

Out of nowhere, the princess said, “If he were a girl, I would take him.”

Zhi Xiu understood her, hesitated for a long time, then sighed and said, “Fine. I’ll take him back to Flying Jade Peak.”

Su Zhun turned to him, gaping, as if he had heard the calendar block say it was going to rain blood.

“Good.” The princess nodded. “Then I’ll leave.”

Su Zhun quickly shut his mouth and stood up to salute her. When Princess Duanrui had vanished into thin air, he turned impatiently to Zhi Xiu.

“Jingzhai, are you really taking a disciple?”

“After I reported the evil cultivator’s name on the cliff above the Sea of Stars, shizun immediately sent word to the Dignitary of Rites and the Dignitary of Rule Elders and gave me the Bell of Tribulation. This is clearly no minor storm,” Zhi Xiu said rather heavily. “This little devil obtained this half set of hidden bones by coincidence and reached the consummate open-eyed stage in a single step—that’s not a good thing. As my disciple, he may not make anything of himself, but at least if he encounters those with unlawful intentions, he won’t be bullied too badly.”

Su Zhun dryly said, “Little shishu, in all fairness, I feel that you ought to discipline your disciple properly so that he doesn’t bully others too badly.”

Zhi Xiu laughed good-naturedly and gently put Xi Ping’s hand back under the quilt. Then he said, “I just heard you call Liang Chen by his courtesy name. What, were you friends?”

For some reason, perhaps because of the brand on his spiritual image or because of the hidden bones, there was a fog over Liang Chen’s history.

Even Zhi Xiu couldn't divine it.

Hearing this, Su Zhun looked at him strangely for a long time. "Jingzhai, I think you must actually be cultivating the way of clarity... You don't remember? Two hundred years ago?"

"Who can remember things that happened two hundred years ago?" said Zhi Xiu.

Su Zhun: "..."

"You...you... Fine." Elder Su pulled up a chair and sat down, sighing. "It was back when Southern He had fought its way to the foot of the capital's walls.

"All the able-bodied men sixteen and over went into battle then. Once, the two of us went past a team of temporary guards. I saw that there was a scrawny kid who seemed like he shouldn't be there. You snatched him up and questioned him, and it turned that he was a little bean not yet fourteen years old. You told the kid to run along and play and not cause trouble. The child cried and said he had come to Jinping to visit a sick family member, who'd died just as he arrived. After the funeral, he'd wanted to return. He didn't want to be trapped in the city. But he'd heard that his home back in Ning'an had been crushed by Southern He's iron heel, and things boded poorly for his whole family. The child was left with no one and nothing to rely on, not knowing what he could do. You took pity on him and kept him with you as a personal guard to run errands and pass messages and so on... Anyway, it wasn't clear whether he was guarding you or you were guarding him. That child was Liang Chen. You don't remember at all?"

Zhi Xiu blankly gave an ah.

With Lancang's masters surrounding the city and the Dragon Vein leaping, no one knowing when he might die, and him busy and fretting day and night, how could he have remembered all these trifles?

"And then what? How did he enter the Way?"

"You could say it was knocked into him in battle. That battle was so bitter, even you..." Su Zhun paused, then continued: "To resist the invasion, we used too many immortal tools. Not a single child was born within thirty li of Jinping the year after, never mind what happened to the soldiers stationed next to the immortal tools. Afterward, the immortal mountain allocated a special batch of elixirs to treat the wounds of the survivors. The majority of them took the elixir and were all right, but a dozen of them had their turning point because of this and unexpectedly opened their spiritual eyes. They had performed a service to the nation, so though they weren't part of a righteous sect, of course they couldn't be considered evil cultivators. But opening their spiritual eyes by means of that kind of elixir was too harmful to their conditions. None of that group of people had the aptitude to enter Heaven's Design Pavilion. Later they were all sent to the Mining Office. Liang Mianzhi retired eight years ago due to an illness following an injury sustained in the course of his work. That's why he returned to Jinping and went into seclusion."

After hearing this, Zhi Xiu nodded. "I see. The Mining Office is constantly stationed in Southern He. It seems that the problem likely arose from the Land of Turmoil."

Su Zhun looked at him, on the point of speaking.

"What is it?" Zhi Xiu said. "Is there something wrong?"

There was absolutely no problem. General Zhi's train of thought was clear. It never strayed from the point.

Su Zhun, looking at his face, which showed that he remembered absolutely nothing, finally shook his head—

Afterward... Hearing that General Zhi was seriously ill, Liang Chen had gone all around the south seeking medical advice and medicines. When he found something he believed would be useful, he would send it to Heaven's Design Pavilion and ask Su Zhun and the others to have a look... Of course none of it was any good. He had only stopped when he learned that Zhi Xiu had been taken in by Xuanyin Mountain.

From then on, Liang Chen had resolved to work hard to cultivate so in the future he could enter Heaven's Design Pavilion and offer his life for the people like the hero he worshipped. "Walkers in the mortal world" who rendered outstanding service would be registered with the sect, so perhaps he could see General Zhi again and tell him in person that he had lived up to his patronage.

But when your spiritual eyes had opened through elixirs, the damage would stay with you for the rest of your life. Su Zhun couldn't stand extinguishing the boy's aspirations, so when calling on his old friend, he had mentioned him to Zhi Xiu. General Zhi had given a casual encouraging "exert yourself," letting Su Zhun send those words to the boy far away beyond the southern border.

Henceforth, Liang Chen had had a courtesy name—"Mianzhi."²³

But when they'd met again, the message had vanished, along with that person's airy memories, and the solemn boy, just like his courtesy name, had been forgotten...in the vague depths of time.

Fair enough. It had been two hundred years, and he had changed beyond recognition. It wasn't General Zhi's fault his memory was so poor.

Zhi Xiu quickly turned his attention away and instructed, "Oh, right, Mingyi, don't forget to have Xiao Pang tell the child's family he's all right."

"I will, I'll go now." Su Zhun swallowed his sighs. "You're so considerate, little shishu."

"Thank you for going out of your way, Exalted." Prince Zhuang politely escorted out Pang Jian, who had come to report on Xi Ping's well-being. He also gave Pang Jian the Yao family's transversal fish and a small bag of blue jade. "If I may be so bold as to ask, could I trouble you to return this greenware fish to Lord Yao?"

Pang Jian was a slick customer. He understood at once and said smoothly, "Well, of course it was Heaven's Design Pavilion that borrowed it, why should Your Highness spend money to compensate them...? In that case, I'll be bold enough to thank you in Lord Yao's place."

Once the formalities were out of the way, Pang Jian put the blue jade into the transversal fish's brocade box and left carrying it, not saying a word about Prince Zhuang privately changing his inscriptions or employing a cultivator—a prince of the second rank had money and certainly wouldn't let a subordinate of his pilfer “heaven’s order,” which was full of impurities. Even if he were keeping an established foundation or ascended spirit cultivator around, he wouldn’t harm others. There were no unauthorized inscriptions, and it was on his own head if the roof came down; anyway, the courtyard of the prince’s manor was deep. If it got smashed up, it wouldn’t affect his neighbors—Lao Pang was a commoner; he wasn’t about to get involved in whatever schemes these nobles got up to.

Prince Zhuang saw Pang Jian out and heard someone behind him say, “Pang Wenchang is an old fox.”

There was a brocade box on the edge of the desk in the south study. The lid of the box opened on its own. Inside was a layer of dazzling white spirit stones. There was a paper pressed between the priceless stones, almost matching the color of the spiritual stones.

“Why are you coming out again?” Prince Zhuang drove off the inquisitive black cat, then put the cover back on the box. “Curl up.”

Bai Ling’s voice came from the box: “Your Highness, Liang Chen’s inscription that I broke in the general commander’s residence was a ‘gold-inlaid inscription.’ He and his reincarnation wood did indeed have an air of the Impassable Sea.”

Prince Zhuang raised his eyebrows. “What did I say? The Impassable Sea truly was the start of the fork in the road.”

“Pang Wenchang said that Liang was ambushed on the road while delivering spiritual stones eight years ago.” Bai Ling spoke a little faster. “Wasn’t that just when...”

“Shh.” Prince Zhuang knocked on the lid of the box. “Take care of yourself, don’t worry about it.”

As he spoke, he sat by the desk, picked up a qin, and put it on his knees. “I’ve done all that duty and humanity could ask of me in not attracting Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s notice to that place. The rest of it...is someone else’s problem.”

Inside the brocade box, Bai Ling heard him pluck out a tune with his own hands. It was full of rustic charm, but a little jarring; even the cat got irritated and ran off after listening for a while.

It really didn’t seem like Prince Zhuang’s style.

“Your Highness, is this the song the Viscount played eight years ago?”

“Yes.” Prince Zhuang held down the strings. There was a faint smile at the corners of his eyes. “I don’t know what shady person he learned it from. The lyrics are even more absurd. He filled my ears up with elopements with inferiors in that childish voice, so the first thing I had to do when I crawled back to the mortal world was to write a letter to his father to complain...

“Xiao Bai, thank you.”

“I can’t accept that praise. I was the Viscount’s own luck.”

The “lucky” Xi Ping stayed in bed for half a year.

He was occasionally woken by pain and would hear the sound of whistling, always the tunes he was usually modifying. Sometimes he would also hear a girl’s voice chattering on, telling how her shifu and her companions had all been captured by blue-clothesers, how she had been alarmed, but fortunately the Grand Duke had blessed and protected her, how she was still buying Golden Tray lottery tickets but still never won...and some other trifles.

Only when Jinping’s midwinter lay over the southern outskirts and a freezing rain was pattering down did Xi Ping finally stick together his scattered consciousness.

For a time, he couldn't remember whether he was dead or alive. He only saw that A-Xiang was working while calling out to him in her mind. He couldn't resist putting in a word: "Are you kidding me? How can you still believe in that thing?"

A-Xiang's hand was nearly crushed by the machinery. She quickly stood up and looked all around in shock.

"Stop looking, it's the wood, that piece of wood."

A-Xiang's heart began to beat wildly. Dazed, she found an excuse and slipped out of the factory. She squeezed the reincarnation wood. "Tai Sui?"

"You're Tai Sui, your whole family's..." The voice from the reincarnation wood stopped for a moment, as if remembering that A-Xiang's whole family was dead. He stiffly changed the subject. "Let me ask you, where are those goblins?"

"They were all caught by blue-clothesers. Thanks to your blessing and protection, Tai Sui, I..."

"Tai Sui" interrupted her: "Don't worry, you helped me out, too. We're even."

A-Xiang: "..."

No, wait, how could this Grand Duke keep accounts with his believers?

A pained groan came from the reincarnation wood. A-Xiang was surprised.
"Tai Sui?"

"I said don't call me Tai Sui, I'm not that old roundworm." The voice in the reincarnation wood cursed for a few sentences. "Hey, listen, couldn't you get anywhere making vows at the Southern Sage's big temple? Is that why you blindly believed in some knock-off god? He sold you out, and you still swore a blood oath and were all in a rush to be his meal. What's the matter with you?"

A-Xiang finally noticed something was wrong. "Who...who are you?"

"I'll tell you what's been going on, listen carefully. When I'm finished, I advise you to burn that lousy piece of wood at once. Otherwise, as soon as you call for 'Tai Sui,' I'll be able to see you. You're not a little girl anymore, don't you think that's inappropriate?"

Next, before A-Xiang could refuse, the slightly weak voice in the reincarnation wood methodically told the whole story from the beginning: from how the girl A-Xiang had woken the greedy evil cultivator with her blood, to how the evil god had looked on indifferently from the shadows, guiding her into offering up body and soul as sacrifice...

A-Xiang's lips trembled. Leaning back against the wall, she slowly squatted down.

In the immortal mountains, Xi Ping finished overturning his "sole believer"'s faith and suddenly seemed to be able to feel his own body.

He was pleasantly surprised and had no more time for A-Xiang. He took a deep breath. Unusually plentiful spiritual energy poured at once into his lungs.

Xi Ping opened his eyes.

BOOK 2 - Forming the Heart

CHAPTER 33 - Fragrant Jade Miasma (1)

Bang—Xi Yue had dropped a basin.

The half-puppet stared blankly at Xi Ping for a long moment, opened his mouth, then turned and started to run outside.

“Wait, come back!” The thought flashed through Xi Ping’s mind, and Xi Yue’s footsteps halted. He was pulled back by the dragon-taming chain.

Xi Ping was stunned: after so long, hadn’t the blood in the dragon-taming chain worn off yet?

He was confused and disoriented. He wanted to prop himself up in bed, but as soon as he exerted a bit of strength with his hand, he gasped.

His arm had cramped!

Xi Ping seemed at once to have returned to when he was growing taller at thirteen and fourteen. There had been some months when his height had spurted up too fast and his flesh couldn’t keep up with his bones. Every day he was woken in the middle of the night by his muscles cramping—but at that time, it had been only his legs cramping. Now it was his whole body.

At the same time, the pain also seemed to sharpen his senses. Xi Ping's eyes and ears had become unprecedentedly acute.

When he closed his eyes, he could hear the sound of accumulated snow breaking tree branches in the mountain forest a thousand zhang away.

Wait...accumulated snow?

As Xi Ping grimaced from the cramps, he turned his head to look out the window.

Outside was a vast expanse of white, big snowflakes swirling in the north wind and gathering together to come falling down. The number of snowfalls a person who had grown up in Jinping had seen in his life could be counted on one hand. Xi Ping stared at it, gaping, and thought, Who am I? Where am I? Am I still alive? How did I survive?

Just then, his ears caught the sound of a particular "snowflake" flying extremely fast, and going in a somewhat different direction from the other snowflakes—in an instant, it was in front of the house he was in.

The center of his brow itched slightly, and a thought flashed through his mind: Someone is here.

Indeed, the next moment, the door opened with a creak.

Zhi Xiu walked in holding Zhaoting. His cape was piled with fragments of ice. He pulled down his hood and, entirely unsurprised, said, smiling, “Awake?”

“Finally I can stop feeding him spiritual energy. Stop crying already, go get him something to eat.” Zhi Xiu patted the half-puppet on the head, shut the cold air outside, then instructed Xi Ping, “If you want to go out and play, dress warm. Flying Jade Peak doesn’t have much, but it has cold.”

Xi Ping nodded as if sleepwalking. Halfway through nodding, his head stopped.

What peak? Where’d you say this is?!

“Flying Jade Peak. It snows most of the year here.” Perhaps because he was in his own territory, Zhi Xiu was much more at ease than he had been outside. He undid his cape, sat down on a little couch spread with a snow-white blanket, crossed one leg over the other inelegantly, and got out a bag of pine nuts. “Do you want some?”

Xi Ping: “...”

Zhi Xiu had hardly ever seen him looking so utterly lost. He thought it was pretty funny. Ever since he had first seen this brat Xi Ping in the Blissful Village, he had thought he was full of ideas, and not very reliable in giving them play—sometimes they were good ideas, sometimes they were lousy ideas, but whether an idea was good or bad, you couldn't get a clue from his face; you had to wait for him to reveal it himself at the final juncture; it was even more stimulating than removing the lid of a dice cup in a gambling house—so he had a mind to tease him.

“Listen,” said Zhi Xiu without warning, snapping his fingers toward Xi Ping, “how about you enter the inner sect and become my disciple?”

Xi Ping had finally managed to ease his muscle cramps. His mind hadn't cleared yet. He blurted out, “No.”

Zhi Xiu: “...”

Though General Zhi was the legend of an era, he still only barely kept his expression intact.

The little house wrapped in heavy snow fell silent; there was a very awkward moment.

“No, wait, that’s not what I meant...” Xi Ping finally took this time to review his memories and quickly asked, “Let’s not talk about that right now—shishu, that, that who’s-it, he’s gone, right?”

Zhi Xiu uncrossed his legs and solemnly sat a little more upright. “If he hadn’t died by the Bell of Tribulation, we could have been living under a new regime by now. Don’t worry.”

Hearing his confirmation, Xi Ping relaxed all over. His spine became three cun shorter on the spot.

He threw himself at the quilt, remembered how he had been shocked at every step in the Latent Cultivation Temple, and felt that his pent-up frustrations were hard to express. Therefore he drew his voice out to a length worthy of Luo Qingshi and howled, “Ah! He’s gone at last! What sin did I commit?!”

Zhi Xiu forced down the corners of his mouth, which were tilting up.

Having recovered his freedom, Xi Ping would have loved to go out and run around. After acting out for ages, he finally remembered what he had just turned down.

“Shishu, did you happen to believe in someone’s ‘slander’? Let me tell you the truth, I didn’t do any proper work in the Latent Cultivation Temple. I relied entirely on cheating for my spiritual sense and entirely on the demon for memorization. I’d meant to eat enough to gain ten jin, but it turned out that the dining hall only serves two meals a day, and with the demon tormenting me every day... Ah, what do you want me for? I already told my parents, if I couldn’t open my spiritual eyes, I’d go to the young masters’ training camp...uh.”

As he spoke, he lifted the quilt and got out of bed. As soon as his foot touched the ground, he lost control and stamped a crack into the snow-white wood floor.

Xi Ping put his foot on the crack, pretended that nothing had happened, and gave General Zhi a cute smile.

Zhi Xiu waved his sleeve, and a cool breeze swept over.

Xi Ping quickly pulled his foot back onto the bed and sat on it. He saw frost appear on the place he had cracked. The frost instantly turned to steam, and the crack in the floor was gone.

“You forget,” Zhi Xiu said, pointing at him, “you’ve already opened your spiritual eyes.”

Xi Ping froze.

His loose hair slid as he moved, and Xi Ping found that he could distinguish the path of each strand of hair, could even determine in advance where they would fall. All over his body, he could fix on any part...including his organs.

He looked down and examined his hands backward and forward. He found that the faint calluses on them had all disappeared. His fingers moved slightly, and there was a twang, like a qin string.

Xi Ping was startled, not knowing what he had touched, looking around everywhere.

“Stop looking,” Zhi Xiu said, “the sound is coming from your fingers.”

He'd turned into a qin?

Puzzled, Xi Ping recalled the introductory text he had just barely managed to read—the book hadn't said that opening your spiritual eyes had after-effects.

“An open-eyed cultivator's physical condition is far superior to the average person's, but those who practice trivial martial arts out in the world still have to rely on external objects like arrays and immortal tools. Only when their spiritual bones are complete can an open-eyed cultivator be said to have their first power,” Zhi Xiu said. “For example, that bow your Pang-shixiong pulls out of his femur.”

Xi Ping didn't dare to move at random. He spread his fingers out wide, as if he had just put on nail polish. “Where would I get spiritual bones?”

“Picked them up.” Zhi Xiu briefly explained about the hidden bones that “Tai Sui” had left him with, then said in consolation, “It's because your foundation is unstable that you start making noise at a touch. In the future, when you've learned to control spiritual energy, it'll be fine.”

Xi Ping suddenly saw the light: “No wonder!

“No wonder that even though the great demon is gone, when that girl calls ‘Tai Sui,’ I can still see her!”

Zhi Xiu's brows knit, and he became serious. “What? You can see people calling on ‘Tai Sui’ through the reincarnation wood? You can see ‘Wei Chengxiang’ with your own eyes? When did that start? Can you still see her now?”

“Since the great demon woke up until now, I’ve always been able to, but I can only watch. If I want to communicate with them, I have to rely on the reincarnation wood... Hey, shishu, where is that ‘big-eyed lamp’ made of reincarnation wood?” From the Latent Cultivation Temple to Flying Jade Peak, Xi Ping’s clothes had changed long ago, and Xi Yue had of course taken the bloody reincarnation wood carving to be washed. It wasn’t on him. Xi Ping searched all over without finding it, then muttered, “Strange, the reincarnation wood isn’t on me, so how did I talk to her?”

“Tell it to me in detail,” said Zhi Xiu.

So Xi Ping explained it from beginning to end, starting from the first day he had heard A-Xiang begging for help, up to how he and A-Xiang had mutually helped each other, and how they were even now.

At first, Zhi Xiu had been listening with an increasingly grave expression. At the end, his expression became strange. “You told her the whole truth?”

“Not exactly,” Xi Ping said. “I didn’t tell her precisely who I am. We’re both Jinpingers. It’d be awkward if we ran into each other in the street.”

Zhi Xiu looked him over for a moment. “There are those who wouldn’t willingly step down from the shrine even if all that remained to them was their bones. That young lady bowed and prayed day and night. She must have sincerely worshipped you as a god... Why did you want to expose yourself?"

Xi Ping said, confused, "What benefit is there to me in being worshipped by a foolish little girl?"

Zhi Xiu raised his eyebrows; he had no retort. After a moment, he shook his head and said, smiling, "No wonder your Duanrui-shishu said she wanted you as her disciple. Your temperament does indeed suit her way."

"What? Duanrui-shishu?" Xi Ping gave a start. "I think...I think I'd rather not. If she became my teacher, wouldn't I have to cut something off first... ow!"

Zhi Xiu had flicked him on the forehead across empty space.

"Even the Southern Sage won't work miracles, and you expect me to do it?" Xi Ping covered his forehead. "That's all I need. I'm not doing it."

"This is Xuanyin Mountain. Please mind your mouth." Zhi Xiu glared at him, then sternly instructed, "Don't talk about this matter with anyone else."

“I’m not stupid.” Xi Ping waved a hand. “You just saved my rotten life, shishu, so I felt like I had better make a clean breast of it to you, to make sure there’s no more buried lurking danger that I don’t know about.”

“The way of death isn’t Liang Chen’s path. While he obtained half a set of hidden bones, in the end, he couldn’t grow himself a body from those bones like that demonic god. From the Blissful Village to the Latent Cultivation Temple, his plan was always possession and body-snatching.” Zhi Xiu considered, then said, “My guess is that in order to communicate with his believers, he would have relied on his spirit. He couldn’t control your spirit, so that’s why he needed the reincarnation wood... No wonder you made such fast progress. Spying on his believers along with him, it was as if you were opening up your spirit to him. He used that opportunity to draw a considerable amount of energy to ‘help you’ fill your spiritual eyes.”

Xi Ping: “...”

That fucking bastard!

“Now you have the hidden bones, and your body and soul are united, so you don’t need to use the reincarnation wood anymore,” Zhi Xiu said.

“Don’t look at those evil cultivators again, and don’t talk to them.”

“So what will I do when they keep coming to bother me?” said Xi Ping.

“It’s your own spirit. Of course you’ll learn to control it.” Looking at this young disciple who had entered the sect only some months ago and had yet to piece together his general knowledge, Zhi Xiu felt a little anxious, so he said, “My experience may not be as extensive as that of the other peak masters, and I may not necessarily be able to teach you anything. But those shixionsgs and shijies with mountains full of pupils don’t take disciples. If you went there, you would only be allotted a residence, then cultivate along with your shixionsgs from the same peak, say ‘peak master’ instead of ‘shifu.’ I’m alone here on Flying Jade Peak. I’ve never even opened the mountain seal. If you become my disciple, you’ll be the only one. All of Flying Jade Peak’s resources will be at your disposal. Won’t you consider it?”

If the inner sect’s sword cultivators with no lineage to inherit had heard this, they would have burst into tears. But Xi Ping very indecorously really did start to “consider”!

Actually, Zhi Xiu didn’t want a disciple. He thought it would be too messy having another person around. However easygoing, he was still a sword cultivator. How sociable could the disposition of a sword cultivator who had cultivated alone in the snow and ice for hundreds of years be?

Anyway, if he took a disciple, he would have to “give moral and practical instruction, dispel doubts.” Especially that “dispel doubts”—if he said anything wrong and misled his disciple, he would have to take responsibility for it. Just thinking of it made his brain hurt. It was only because after Her Highness Princess Duanrui had spoken, it would have been unsuitable for him not to respond, and because that brat Xi Ping wasn't disagreeable, that he had been reluctantly willing to make a "sacrifice" this once.

Who would have thought he would encounter this oaf.

Human nature is contrary. General Zhi found that he couldn't act contrary to common practice. With Xi Ping being reluctant, he instead ceased to be reluctant and really did rather want to have him for a disciple. So he added, "Your spiritual bones are no problem. When you're used to them, you can make up what you lack in cultivation, then consider establishing a foundation. I can pass my Way of the Heart on to you."

Xi Ping asked for instruction: "And what is your Way of the Heart?"

"I am a sword cultivator," said Zhi Xiu.

Xi Ping balked slightly. "Then wouldn't I have to train with the sword every day?"

Zhi Xiu said, smiling, "Don't worry, I'm very lax myself, so of course I won't be too strict with a junior. Three or four shichen of training a day is enough.”

Xi Ping sucked in a breath and said in a panic, “Thank you very much, shishu, I can’t learn that!”

Zhi Xiu said, curiously, “Don’t you want to become immortal and live forever?”

Xi Ping became even more panicked. “Live forever, too? Train with the sword for three or four shichen a day, and do it for eight hundred or a thousand years? Shishu, if I’ve done something wrong, just give me a beating. I feel that my crime can’t be that bad!”

His genuine panic amused General Zhi. “I only train with the sword because I like it. If you don’t like it, then it’s not absolutely necessary for you to go by that path. What do you like?”

Plenty of things...

Xi Ping thought over what he had said for ages and for a time actually couldn’t smooth out his thoughts. He liked good food, fine wine, lovely people, beautiful scenery—he was willing to try anything new; he liked roaming all over the place with a trade caravan, fooling around the whole way; he liked the snows of Northern Li, the mountains of Western Chu, the streets of Southern Shu full of exotic animals; he liked finding local specialities to bring back home, and then picking up a new box of rouge for his mom on the way back.

So he summarized it in one phrase: “Eating, drinking, and making merry.”

Zhi Xiu laughed.

But Xi Ping didn't laugh. With these recollections, his thoughts had cleared.

When General Zhi said he wanted you for his disciple, it was impossible not to feel giddy. The reason Xi Ping hadn't flown up into the sky on the spot was that he had been too surprised, so shocked he couldn't quite catch up.

But while he'd been secretly overjoyed, he had kept feeling that there was something faintly scratching at him, not letting him rashly agree. Only when he had talked it out did Xi Ping realize it all of a sudden: from the bottom of his heart, he wanted to go home.

However tasty the snacks at the Latent Cultivation Temple, however funny the auspicious animals running all over the mountains, he still thought that this was only an interesting journey, the kind he could brag about when he returned...but, after all, he would have to return.

So, for once serious, he said, “Shishu, actually, I don’t think I especially want to be immortal.”

Zhi Xiu raised his eyes. “You can’t give up the mortal world?”

“Of course I can’t give it up, but that’s not all it is.” Xi Ping looked out the window. There was snow as far as the eye could see on Flying Jade Peak, linking the mountains to the clouds. Houses and immortals, immortals and men, men and birds and beasts...all were as insignificant as a snowflake, without any difference between them.

If a mortal went out to walk in it, he would probably get snow blindness.

“Elder Su said that to establish a foundation and become immortal, you need a Way of the Heart. I don’t want a Way of the Heart. I think it’s just fine to burn incense at whatever temple you come to. Everyone takes their ‘Way’ and uses it to make inquiries of heaven and earth. If I were heaven and earth, I’d be sick of it.”

Zhi Xiu was slightly stunned. In that moment, his Way of the Heart seemed to move.

Xi Ping waited for ages without hearing a response from him, so he asked, “Shishu?”

“You’ve missed half a year of classes and obtained spiritual bones. You can’t even control your own spiritual energy. Letting you return to the mortal world would be asking for trouble,” said Zhi Xiu, recovering. “How about this? Make up the classwork you need to make up here with me, and then I’ll drop a word to your Pang-shixiong and have you go to Heaven’s Design Pavilion to learn some things from him.”

Xi Ping’s eyes opened wide.

“As my disciple, before establishing a foundation, you can walk freely through the mortal world,” Zhi Xiu said warmly. “You can find a Way of the Heart on your own, then come back to Flying Jade Peak when you’ve found it. If you can’t find it...your lifespan will come to its end. I won’t have anything more to do with you. How does that sound?”

Well, what could he say to that?

Though Xi Ping had always been quite confident in his own charm, he was still overwhelmed by flattery in spite of himself. His fingers bumped into each other, clattering, nearly playing a melody of “Flute and Drums at Sunset.” He carefully asked, “Shishu, when you were in the mortal world, you didn’t happen to leave behind...some illegitimate child who changed his surname to Xi, did you?”

General Zhi's self-restraint was exceptional. His smile didn't waver. "I see it's no good letting you keep that mouth. Why not give it to Xi Yue instead?"

And so, near the dead of winter, the Viscount of Yongning, who had still been picking out beauties with Jinping's ghosts in spring, became the head disciple of Flying Jade Peak, like a dream.

But half a month later, the dream of teacher and disciple getting along was broken.

"Shifu." Xi Ping, already accustomed to this form of address, dutifully warmed a pot of wine for Zhi Xiu while undutifully pulling a long face and saying, "I feel that your teaching isn't even as understandable as All Clear Luo's."

"...Don't make impertinent remarks about your shixiong behind his back," said Zhi Xiu.

General Zhi was also bewildered. He had seen other people's disciples: there were exceptionally thoughtful and clever ones; there were particularly understanding ones; there were ones who were uncommunicative but did whatever their teacher told them...even when he had been a disciple, he had been very respectful toward his shizun, revered him.

Where was there a disciple like this?

“Shifu, you’re really amazing. You’ve burned the pine nuts again.”

“Shifu, you’re so lazy. You stuck a mustard seed into a cottage and now you pretend you have a real house... I think you’d be better off just putting the mustard seed outside and taking down the cottage. The snow on the roof is about to bring it crashing down!”

“Shifu, this jar of wine tastes different from yesterday’s. Your brewing standard isn’t very steady.”

“Shifu, why is the food in the inner sect not as good as in the Latent Cultivation Temple?!”

“Shifu...”

This brat was too much trouble. How could he make such a fuss?!

“What don’t you understand?” said Zhi Xiu.

“I don’t understand anything,” said Xi Ping.

Teacher and disciple looked at each other in dismay. There seemed to be a barrier like the border between two warring nations between them. Neither could tell what the hell the other one used for brains.

That thing that had touched the peerless sword cultivator’s Way of the Heart like a brief glimpse of beauty on the day they had discussed immortality seemed to have been only a lovely illusion.

General Zhi was exasperated. He tossed aside Detailed Account of Meridians. “Forget it—how are you doing with getting used to your spiritual bones?”

“Oh, pretty well,” said Xi Ping. “I’ve found all the notes of the pentatonic scale.”

“Let’s go outside,” said Zhi Xiu. “Let me see.”

Xi Ping was confused, not knowing why they had to go outside so he could play the qin. But, after all, shizun had ordered it, so he wrapped himself up in a cloak and obeyed.

Zhi Xiu led him to the place where he normally trained with the sword. All around were boulders covered in ice and snow. Matchlessly keen sword energy had left scar after scar on them. Their harshness was evident.

Xi Ping had played at the House of Overflowing Splendor’s Flower Viewing Festival. He didn’t have the least bit of stage fright. He rolled up his sleeves and spontaneously played one of “Mr. Yu Gan”’s works that he was pleased with.

General Zhi, who had wanted to see what properties his spiritual bones had, was silent for a long moment after he finished listening. He asked, “What was that?”

“A song,” answered his head disciple. “It tells the story of a young mistress escaping a marriage and eloping with a stableman.”

Zhi Xiu didn’t say anything about it. He nodded rather patiently. “Quite well-practiced. Try another one.”

So Jinping’s famed specialist in elopements Mr. Yu Gan performed “The Immortal Lady Elopes with a Mortal,” “The Enraged Widow Smashes the Paifang,”²⁴ and other such masterpieces.

Listening to this, Zhi Xiu for the first time felt chest pain and shortness of breath in his own sword array. For the first time, he had the thought of kicking this brat off his peak.

CHAPTER 34 - Fragrant Jade Miasma (2)

At first, in order to protect Xi Ping, the fewer people who knew about investigating the business of “Tai Sui,” the better. In the Latent Cultivation Temple, Elder Su was the only one aware of what had happened, and in Heaven’s Design Pavilion, only Pang Jian, who had been in direct contact with Zhi Xiu, knew the whole story. The other blue-clothesers had only “received a secret order from the inner sect” and run errands for Commander Pang in total confusion.

Even more so, it couldn’t be publicized that they had at last tracked the evil cultivator to their general commander’s residence.

Fortunately, Bai Ling, the other eyewitness, was in no better a position than the desiccated corpse on the reincarnation wood pedestal; he also couldn’t be exposed to the light of day. Pang Jian wasn’t worried about him divulging the secret. He simply asked Zhi Xiu for a seal to plaster back over the general commander’s residence. When the matter of “Tai Sui” was thoroughly investigated, they could report it to the court under some guise.

Outwardly, he only said he’d had to ask the general commander for instructions on an urgent matter, so he’d had no choice but to burst in.

As for the “urgent matter”...everyone thought it had to do with Heaven’s Design Pavilion exercising its “substitute governance” authority, hunting down the remaining evil cultivators all over the city without restraint. It was said that just among the city guard, they had ferreted out seven or eight people, and the rear courts of the wealthy people of Dangui Lane were even more uncommonly “exciting.” For a time, the whole city was awash with activity and everyone on edge, and there were many peculiar little details that no one looked into.

The Yongning Marquis Manor was like the eye of the storm, caught in the heart of the wind and waves, so calm that not a bit of information blew in. When Xi Ping’s letters suddenly stopped, if not for Prince Zhuang’s obscure assurance of his well-being, the Marquis would hardly have known what to say to the old lady.

Half a year later, the white jade proximal lit up once more. Before the Marquis could relax, he got a clear look at what was written on it, and his vision dimmed.

That shameless wretch Xi Ping first praised himself to the heavens, then announced: because he was so good in this, that, and every other way, he had been carried off like a fine pearl by the discerning master of Flying Jade Peak to become General Zhi’s own disciple.

For pity's sake, the history books never said that General Zhi had eye disease!

The Marquis didn't sleep all night, and the lights in Prince Zhuang Manor's south study also stayed on until dawn.

Far off on the snowy mountain, Xi Ping knew nothing about his family's deep anxieties. After getting the proximal back, he had more to say every day.

“Because I've come here, an immortal beast comes to Flying Jade Peak every day to deliver meals (I found out later that the immortal beasts are immortal tools that need spiritual stones to run, so no wonder they don't sneak bites). The food in the inner sect has no oil, no salt, no taste, and no smell. Shifu says the inner sect puts cultivation above all and doesn't indulge in the vulgar desire for food, so no one cares about it. So I asked, wasn't it because all these mighty people practice inedia, so no matter how good the food was, there would be no one to appreciate it? Eating and drinking are everyday matters, but flattery rises above the mundane... Shifu punished me by making me go up on the roof to sweep snow.”

“Shifu is teaching me how to use my consciousness to undo the dragon-taming chain. It turns out that after you open your spiritual eyes, you can send out your consciousness. It's amazing! But shifu says that the mind is the same as the body. If you meet a powerful cultivator, sticking out your mind is no different from sticking out your head in front of them, it'll only spare your neck; where your body must not go, your consciousness can't go, either. It's only because the dragon-taming chain recognizes me as its master that I can enter it as I like."

"I learned to do it and undid the dragon-taming chain, but that idiot Xi Yue acted like his parents had died. I played a song to cheer him up...but he cried even more. At night, when I wasn't paying attention, he snuck off with the dragon-taming chain and put it back on. I think that idiot's intellect isn't all there, so I asked shifu how I could make him smarter. Shifu says that someone with higher cultivation than his original master has to alter the arrays on his puppet body. His original master wasn't that powerful, but arrays really give you a headache. Such a pain.

"Postscript: I also used my consciousness to peek at shifu's wine cellar. There's good stuff in there, another day I'll get some of it to taste."

"Respectful greetings, grandmother, I am well. Because I secretly drank a cup of shifu's Maze, I was drunk for five days. I won't say more, shifu is punishing me by making me go up and sweep snow."

"Today I didn't sweep snow. The cottage roof collapsed under me."

“Since the cottage roof collapsed, shifu had to open the mountain seal. It turns out there’s more to Flying Jade Peak than bare mountain and snow! There are all kinds of rare plants growing on the mountain because of its spiritual energy, and spiritual beasts everywhere. They’re very respectful when they see the peak master. There’s a green-faced lynx that even knows how to bow with folded hands. Shifu pointed it out in admiration and said it was much more sensible than his inferior disciple. Can you believe that! There are countless jade towers in the peak master’s palace, ancient texts piled up like mountains, and there are even more immortal tools and strange treasures collected by elders. I was ordered to make an inventory of all the treasures in the palace with my consciousness and compile a register so as to keep an account. I wasn’t having any of it—what’s the point of keeping an account? Shifu also wasn’t having any of it. He thought it was disgracefully messy. Xi Yue can’t read properly yet. After fighting over it for half the day with no result, the three of us had to seal the mountain back up and leave, then build another cottage.”

“Today shifu is teaching me how to activate talismans. Talismans are all very wonderful. Apart from talismans for exorcism and avoiding contamination, and other protective talismans, it takes only a drop of spiritual energy to activate them—won’t it be easy to sweep snow from now on? But these doodles are too picky. At a glance they all look the same, you can’t tell one from the other—how am I supposed to remember them? Shifu ordered me to study them on my own. I’m planning to buy them in the future, then arrange them carefully and label them with their names, so I can let them loose when I need to use them. What's the point of studying them?"

"...it's almost the eighth. Respectful wishes of good health and safety to my aunt. The Rose Gold Mind-Strengthening Pill that the white crane brought can soothe the nerves and strengthen the mind, dispel restlessness and promote sleep. I collected all the medicinal herbs used to make the medicine myself and asked a shixiong from Rose Gold Peak to refine it to send as a birthday greeting from afar to my aunt. Best wishes to her for good fortune, long life, and good health.

"PS: It's the dead of winter. San-ge, when you go to the southern mountains to light incense, be sure to dress warm and take care of yourself."

The eighth day of the twelfth month was Imperial Consort Xi's birthday. The immortal crane that Xi Ping sent brought a birthday gift, and also seemed to bring a breath of magic. The golden plum tree that had shown no growth in all the years since the old lady had planted it suddenly budded. Everyone said it was an auspicious omen.

The old lady was extremely pleased. She squinted her weak eyes for ages picking out the branch with the best blooms and told the Marquis and Madam Cui to take it to the palace.

Guangyun Palace was too big. The old lady's legs couldn't walk through it. Her memory had also been getting worse and worse in recent years. When the Imperial Consort in the palace was mentioned, the old lady was always confused. In her mind, her daughter still looked the way she had before she was married, even more tender than the golden plum flowers about to bloom.

The Imperial Consort stuck the flowers into a jade vase and said a few words to her brother and sister-in-law. The marquis didn't stay long. He wished her a happy birthday as a mere formality, passed along their mother's instructions, then left behind his wife Madam Cui and went to have an audience with the emperor.

Once the man was gone, the Imperial Consort ordered the gauze curtain removed, gave Madam Cui more of the new fruit juice Prince Zhuang had brought, and sent away all her servant girls.

Madam Cui said, "Has His Highness been here?"

"He came early," said the Imperial Consort, "and went to the southern mountains."

Madam Cui said, "His Highness shows filial piety."

The Imperial Consort smiled and made no answer.

Looking at their features, the Imperial Consort and the Marquis seemed to have been made in the same mold, but in motion, brother and sister looked nothing alike.

Though none of the wealthy ladies of Jinping's upper class had vulgar habits of movement and speech, few of them had this degree of restraint. She made hardly any extraneous gestures. Even her blinking and the movements of her eyes were regular, like a dummy with springs inside it.

Madam Cui seemed to have had her eyes scalded by the Imperial Consort's even, steady smile. She lowered her head at once to pick a topic up off the floor. Forcing a smile, she said, "Ping'er wrote to the old lady yesterday to ask whether the medicine had been good for Your Ladyship."

"Very good. He is a mindful child," said the Imperial Consort. "Of Xuanyin Mountain's thirty-six peaks, each has its influence. Only the Dignitary of Fate High Elder's lineage stands aloof among them. Now that Ping has been taken on as General Zhi's disciple, he will not only live forever, he will also be unvexed by petty matters. This is the blessing of our ancestors."

"Your Ladyship..."

The Imperial Consort gently raised a finger, interrupting Madam Cui.

In the tranquil palace, water roiled in the ceramic pot, and the chime clock let out a crisp click.

“It is a good thing,” the Imperial Consort said in a voice like floating clouds and mist. “My mother is healthy, the children are both well. What is there to be unsatisfied with? Jinjin, try to comfort my brother, tell him not to be depressed. His temper is stiff, and he’s a melancholy person. At his age, he still doesn’t understand. It’s good of you to be tolerant. Luckily Ping isn’t like him... If I had listened to him back then, I suppose our bones would all have disintegrated by now. How could we have this good fortune? Let’s not speak of it. For the distribution of free porridge to the poor outside the city this year, will your family help manage it?”

“...yes.”

“Good.” On the Imperial Consort’s dummy-like face, a slightly different smile finally appeared. “Thank you very much. That’s good.”

Because her birthday fell on Laba, Imperial Consort Xi went to distribute porridge to the poor²⁵ outside the city every year.

Beneath the white jade railings of the Sage's Road, before daybreak, big pots cooking Laba porridge appeared. Cui Ji, managing this business, did things in style. Only genuine, high-quality ingredients went into the porridge, and they didn't even stint to add sugar. They hired a few dozen strong laborers to stir constantly. At the start of mao hour, people began to line up. Today, all the mixed grain flatbread vendors left their stands and lazed around—there was no business to be done.

A-Xiang mixed in with the crowd and said along with the others: "Best wishes to Her Ladyship the Imperial Consort."

"Best wishes." The worker serving the porridge saw how skinny she was and put a whole ladle-full into her bowl. "Careful, it's hot."

A-Xiang said thank you and stepped aside, carrying the bowl in both hands. The rich rice and beans were a comfort to her insides, and the chilblains on her hands itched from the warmth.

In the sleet that fell like shards of ice, she ate a few mouthfuls, but somehow she became distracted and, holding the porridge, stared blankly into nothing.

Last year, at this place and time, it was this bowl of porridge that had kept her and her grandfather in Jinping.

They had just arrived and were strangers in a strange place. Seeing the factory district overflowing with people, the old and weak not necessarily able to find work, they had been hesitating when they had happened upon the porridge distributed by the Imperial Consort. A-Xiang had never eaten such good sweet porridge in her life. She had burned her tongue, leaving two blisters. Seeing her gluttony, her grandfather had said, "Let's stay here from now on. Jinping is full of nobles. If they scatter just a bit of food with their fingertips, it'll be enough for the two of us!"

Certainly if the nobles tossed just a bit of food, they would have enough to eat. But...if the nobles didn't watch where they were going, they could also trample them to death.

Suddenly, A-Xiang gave a start and came back to herself as if waking from a dream. She didn't know how she had just started dreaming with her eyes open.

Just then, someone yanked her backward, spilling all the porridge.

There was a whistle, and a Moon Plated Gold steam carriage nearly scraped her as it flew by.

These metal monsters had just become popular, and new roads had been put in on the east side of the Lingyang River—they weren't allowed to drive on the west side yet—but none of them were as level and wide as the freight-hauling road beside the canal. Lately, there were always wastrels going on joyrides in these things outside the city. There were no reins once they got going; there had been many accidents.

A-Xiang, recovering from her fright, found her footing and saw that there was some animal, maybe a dog or a horse, tied to the back of the Moon Plated Gold steam carriage. It must have been one of the exotic beasts from Southern Shu. A gold chain around its neck flashed with blinding light. It was foaming at the mouth as the carriage pulled it along. It overturned a fruit stand. The carriage's window opened. A hand reached out and tossed out a handful of money like sand at the wailing stand owner, then went off into the distance puffing smoke.

A-Xiang was scared of wasting food. She quickly lapped up all the spilled sweet porridge on her hands, and only then turned to thank the person who had pulled her out of the way.

The newcomer had a large frame, but his skin was dazzlingly pale. Even the color of his eyes was considerably lighter than other people's. Adding in the thick bandages around his neck...he simply looked like a woman dressed in men's clothing.

“Be careful,” he said indolently. As soon as he opened his mouth, it was obvious he wasn’t a woman. His voice was coarse and deep, and his breath smelled of alcohol. “There are lunatics full of ‘snow wine’ all over the street.”

It was said that unmined spiritual stones had tiny rock crystals adhering to them; for a distance, they looked like a covering of snow, so they were also called “rock snow.” They could be made into a special kind of “snow wine.” Drinking it would make a person immortal for a day, drunk enough to forget their troubles...and often also to forget their morals.

“Poor wretches get drunk and laid low, in the mansions they drink snow... Well, listen, little brother, let me ask you something,” the man said, “how do I get to the Canal Office?”

A-Xiang said, “Look toward the riverbank when you go into the city. It’s the most impressive building.”

“Oh, good. Hey, wait, one more thing.”

A-Xiang turned her head. “Hm?”

Without warning, the man drew close to her. Lowering his voice, he said, “Where do I find Tai Sui’s shrine?”

A-Xiang’s heart thudded. The yellowish-brown eyes stared at her. Soundlessly, the man mouthed distinctly: “The conflagration burns on, the cry of the cicada is without end.”

Xi Ping was just learning to fly a sword on the north slope of Flying Jade Peak.

Teacher and disciple had already abandoned Detailed Account of Meridians. Shizun had casually tossed it into the fire pit while roasting chestnuts.

Zhi Xiu said that this was like swimming or riding a horse. There was no use in scouring books. It was better just to go up and fly a lap.

In order to fly a sword, you had to adjust the spiritual energy as the wind changed. If you learned to fly a sword, then naturally cycling and transferring spiritual energy would become as familiar as the back of your hand.

Xi Ping looked down the slope. It was a vast expanse of white, further than the eye could see. “Shifu, what’s at the bottom of the slope?”

“Nothing,” Zhi Xiu said. “The north slope is prone to avalanches, so all the living things avoid this place. While you’re playing around here, do your best not to call out loudly. Pay attention, I’ll take you around.”

Then he patted Xi Ping lightly on the back. Xi Ping felt gentle spiritual energy from his palm pour into his meridians. The snow at his feet formed into an ice sword and swayingly lifted him two chi high.

“Concentrate. Remember how the spiritual energy passed through your meridians just now.” Like teaching a baby how to walk, Zhi Xiu patiently took him in a circle close to the ground. Seeing that he was keeping his balance, he said, “I’ll release the spiritual energy bit by bit, and you can try it for yourself. All right?”

Xi Ping said, “No problem!”

“Good, be bold,” said Zhi Xiu. “If you can’t fly steady, I’ll catch you. You won’t fall.”

But soon, General Zhi regretted opening his mouth. You couldn’t just say “be bold” to his head disciple!

“Come down here.” Zhi Xiu pulled Xi Ping down from the heights for the third time—if he only relaxed his hold slightly, the brat would shoot up like a firecracker. He couldn't control himself at all. "Don't you know how to take things step by step?"

"Shifu," Xi Ping bragged shamelessly, "I feel like I've learned how to... whoa!"

Zhi Xiu released the spiritual energy, and Xi Ping, who had "learned how to do it," felt the ice sword at his feet splinter. He stepped on emptiness and went tumbling down. He was only caught by Zhaoting a few chi off the ground.

Zhi Xiu looked down on him from on high. "You were saying?"

"Hehe." Xi Ping clutched Zhaoting with all four limbs, rolled over in midair, and awkwardly said, "My mistake."

A moment later, General Zhi was sitting on a boulder in meditation, training with the sword in spirit, letting Xi Ping go fool around on his own.

Zhaoting hung suspended about a zhang above him. If Xi Ping's head went above that height, it would fly over and smack him.

Xi Ping flew in patterns along the ground, fell seven or eight times without getting hurt, and gradually got the feel for flying a sword. He felt that he had it now and began to fly down the snowy slope.

At first he was still careful enough, maintaining a constant height of two chi off the ground. Zhaoting kept following him, utterly loyal to its post, to keep him from floating off.

The third time he returned to the top of the slope, Xi Ping raised his head and looked at Zhaoting. Suddenly, he smirked. Then, with one foot on the ice sword, he went leaping down to the bottom of the slope like a falling object.

The ice sword braked, took him in a circle like a whirlwind, then came to a sudden stop.

For a time, Zhaoting didn't react!

Xi Ping wanted to laugh aloud and only restrained himself by remembering that Zhi Xiu had said the north cliff was prone to avalanches.

Keep him from flying up, but couldn't he jump down?

Before Zhaoting could catch up, Xi Ping stepped up on the ice sword and continued going down. He flitted over the snow-covered pine forest like a gale, knocking the frozen treetops askew. On the way, he even leaned down to scoop up snow-covered pinecones and charged toward the pine forest with an exhaled breath—cultivation really was fun!

Under the pine forest, there turned out to be a precipice. Xi Ping felt absolutely wonderful. He charged over without slowing down in the least.

When man and sword had made their disgraceful way over above the precipice, without any warning, a familiar voice sounded in Xi Ping's ears: "Tai Sui!"

Xi Ping was instantly distracted. The ice sword at his feet split apart.

"Fuck!" He lost his balance at once and went hurtling forward with nothing to rely on.

Fortunately, Xi Ping was richly experienced in getting into trouble. While in midair, he didn't panic at all. Using his finger as a string, he quickly played an urgent melody.

The song suited his feelings and took shape at once. A whole piece of ice was "cut off" and rolled beneath his feet, turned over in midair carrying him, and narrowly steadied itself.

Xi Ping plopped down on the ice and snapped his fingers. He thought he was amazing!

Just as he was planning to fly back to work out what had been going on with that cry of “Tai Sui,” he heard an ominous rumble.

Thunder?

Xi Ping quickly raised his head and saw dust rising over the snowy slope, like thousands upon thousands of white horses charging down. Next, the snowy mountain began to tremble, making a sky-shaking sound.

Boom—

Oh no, an avalanche!

The toppling snowy mountain flowed down. Fragments of ice and rock scattered everywhere, all of them like flying knives.

Xi Ping’s vision dimmed. The next moment, Zhaoting swept down from the edge of the cliff like a meteor. General Zhi tossed out a length of straw rope left over from when they had built the cottage and rolled up his wretched disciple, then surged out, narrowly brushing the white flood.

By the time Xi Ping recovered, the whole north slope of Flying Jade Peak had changed shape. Half of the pine forest was gone.

The thousand-zhang deep abyss reverberated without end like a dragon's roars.

Xi Ping stared blankly. "Shifu..."

Zhi Xiu took a deep breath, feeling that tomorrow the news that "the peak master of Flying Jade Peak brought down the north slope of his peak in an avalanche while flying a kite" would be all over the Xuanyin Mountains!

"I think I lost a shoe," said Xi Ping.

Zhi Xiu: "..."

Kick him out! He absolutely had to kick him out!

"Oh, also, shifu, didn't you put a mind-clearing spell on my spirit?" Xi Ping said doubtfully, pressing down on the center of his brow and ignoring his shifu's ashen face. "Why did I hear someone calling for Tai Sui again?"

CHAPTER 35 - Fragrant Jade Miasma (3)

The original owner of the hidden bones who had cultivated the way of death had been practically a god. Never mind Zhi Xiu, even if the Southern Sage appeared, he wouldn't have been able to break the hidden bones' connection to reincarnation wood.

Therefore, what Zhi Xiu had put in place on Xi Ping's spirit was a mind-clearing spell, so he wouldn't lose his mind from irritation before learning to control his consciousness.

Mind-clearing spells were given to young disciples of unsteady temperament for the purpose of helping them ignore external things and concentrate on cultivation. Apart from A-Xiang and the evil cultivators who had been arrested in Jinping, Xi Ping hadn't had contact with any other "followers of Tai Sui." From his point of view, the "Tai Sui" they were calling on was Liang Chen, so they were "irrelevant voices" that would be filtered out by the mind-clearing spell on his spirit.

The only one who could get around the mind-clearing spell at present was Wei Chengxiang.

As Xi Ping concentrated on the center of his brow, he thought, Why hasn't she burned that reincarnation wood amulet yet?

In fact, A-Xiang hadn't listened to his advice. She was still carrying the reincarnation wood amulet.

Far from the evil cultivators and the hidden undercurrents, her life had returned to normal. The shrine was broken, but she still couldn't burn the amulet.

A girl of fifteen or sixteen, dressed as a boy, making her living alone under the noise and the smoke—she instinctively wanted to grab on to something constant. For example, the eternally unwinnable Golden Tray lottery tickets, the eternally foul-mouthed Auntie Chunying, and the wooden amulet that could occasionally contact another person.

She knew there was no god on the other end of the reincarnation wood.

It was all right if it was a person. She wasn't afraid of a person looking at her. After all, there were too few people who could "see" her.

Elderly people all said that evil objects were plagues, calamities, not to be touched. If you picked something up from them, it would never leave you. At first, A-Xiang had thought nothing of it—the doctor at the factory had said that plagues were brought by dirty air and water.

Now she knew at last that the old people's words experience of experience weren't as absurd as they sounded.

As she inwardly called for Tai Sui, she feigned ignorance. "What?"

The man looked at her with a false smile.

"You must be talking about the Southern Sage's shrine, right? It's easy to find. You go along the Sage's Road—the one around the mountain, flashing green. Keep going and you'll get there." A-Xiang pointed and avoided the man's eyes by lowering her head to eat the porridge. She turned and walked toward a crowded spot, vaguely saying, "Don't go today, the third prince from the palace is going to pray for the Imperial Consort's good fortune, this end of the Sage's Road is sealed..."

Her speech was choked off. The white-faced man wrapped in bandages had somehow appeared blocking her way in the blink of an eye.

The hairs rose on the back of A-Xiang's neck: this man was an evil cultivator!

She called "Tai Sui" over and over in her mind, but the reincarnation wood seemed to be dead. There was no answer.

“Don’t be nervous...little ‘brother’? Or is it little lady? I’m a friend of your teacher. We’ve lost many brothers and sisters this time. Alas, he must have known then that he wasn’t long for this world and went out of his way to send word to ask me to look after you before the end.”

A-Xiang backed up a step and said warily, “Who are you? What do you want? I have no teacher, and I don’t know you. If you keep pestering me, I’ll call for help!”

“Call who? Your grandpa?” the man said, smiling. His mouth split into a grin, but his eyes were open as wide as they could go. There seemed to be ripples spreading in his light brown eyes, pulling in the tensed A-Xiang.

In a daze, she seemed to return to that long night, her grandfather without a piece of healthy flesh on him, his breath stopping right in front of her, not closing his eyes even after he was dead.

Next, the images in front of her eyes were like time running backward scene by scene.

She saw her grandfather appearing at the door, carried in by fellow workers. It was unclear whether he recognized A-Xiang. He stared fixedly at his little granddaughter, struggling for breath, wanting to live.

Before that, it was A-Xiang watching the city guard soldiers taking her grandpa away, herself and Chunying with nowhere to turn.

Before that, her grandpa fell ill but wouldn't spend his hard-earned wages on medicine, instead buying Golden Tray lottery tickets. When he came up empty, he said sheepishly to his furious granddaughter, "god can't bully a person forever," "where there's a will there's a way; I'll win one day," and other such nonsense. The girl turned and went out the door, determined to go find a way to make her own money, taking that lawsuit form demanding that "corrupt officials return our land."

Before that, a slightly younger A-Xiang and her grandpa buried her mother. Her grandpa, stroking her little head, said, "Don't cry, A-Xiang, grandpa will take you all over the world. The finch flies through the sky, the flood dragon swims through the sea. I can earn my good little grandchild an inheritance anywhere."

Before that...

A-Xiang clearly saw her own destiny, like an ant whose nest had been toppled by a flood, sliding into a bottomless abyss. She couldn't resist clutching at the malicious thread of spider silk, greedily but vainly crawling upward in defiance of time.

Until a voice burst out in her mind: “Wake up! Wei Chengxiang!”

A-Xiang’s pupils contracted almost to the size of pinpoints. The false spider silk tore, and she rolled back to the bottom of the pit. For a moment, she almost hated that voice that had once again smashed her false consolation.

The next moment, her intellect recovered, and she saw a Moon Plated Gold carriage speeding toward her!

Xi Ping hadn’t meant to say anything—as long as he played dead convincingly enough, as a mortal with no exceptional talents, there would be nothing about A-Xiang that others would conspire for.

Even if that glazed White Face had taken a liking to her young body and wanted to kidnap her to sell her off or keep for his own unlawful purposes, he would still have to get her to a concealed location first. Xi Ping was keeping an eye on her location from the shadows and could have Heaven’s Design Pavilion get her back.

But White Face’s plot exceeded expectations. He used a soul-muddling spell to lead A-Xiang onto the canal road behind the factories.

Some obviously drunk wastrels were driving a Moon Plated Gold carriage there. The metal monster was racing at the speed of lightning, and A-Xiang, controlled by the soul-muddling spell, had run out into the middle of the road!

Xi Ping had no choice but to say something.

In a flash, A-Xiang threw herself forward and felt a keen wind scrape past her back. Loud laughter and cursing floated out of the carriage. A-Xiang's legs folded, and she went to her knees.

Weathered boots stopped in front of her. A hand as pale as death raised her head.

“As I thought.” The white-faced man stared at A-Xiang and stuck his hand right into her clothes, turning up the reincarnation wood amulet. “I knew you were here, Grand Duke Tai Sui. With an old friend here, how can you turn away?”

Xi Ping: “...”

That didn't sound like the tone of an old friend.

Next, the white-faced man pulled the reincarnation wood from A-Xiang's neck and put it into a little box covered in inscriptions. Xi Ping's vision went black. He could no longer see what was happening to A-Xiang.

Xi Ping abruptly opened his eyes.

Zhi Xiu twisted his fingers, and a note fragmented into light at his fingertips, flying in the direction of Jinping. “I’ve notified your Pang-shixiong—is this a remaining evil cultivator?”

“Doesn’t seem like it. He’s come with ill intent. He seems like a creditor to me.” Xi Ping clutched his hair in irritation. His hair was full of fragments of ice. “Shifu, do a divination for me, is it my fate to repay people’s debts? One by one they die, and each of them leaves me their debts. I have to repay the lady’s debt, and I have to repay the rotten old man’s debt. What for?!”

“Indeed.” General Zhi sighed meaningfully and patted Xi Ping on the head. “Who made you the reincarnation of a spendthrift?”

Xi Ping: “...”

Zhi Xiu wrote the name “Wei Chengxiang” in the snow in flowing script and tapped it with Zhaoting. Next to it, small writing appeared in the snow: southeast...

Before the rest of the writing appeared, an inscription character appeared in the snow, scattering the writing!

Zhi Xiu frowned slowly. “I am unable to glimpse her... This is a second-class inscription.”

The highest grade inscriptions that the immortal sects were permitted to let loose in the mortal world were third-class, more than enough to protect important places and people. There was no need to go higher.

Second-class inscriptions were too dangerous. Never mind that they were hard to design; once designed, laying down a small segment would nearly drain an ordinary established foundation master dry; it took an ascended spirit cultivator to carve them.

Correspondingly, the impact of second-class inscriptions was also of the ascended spirit grade. Had Zhi Xiu been in Jinping now, he could have broken through by force using a sword cultivator’s unparalleled keenness. But now his reach wasn’t long enough.

Meanwhile, Pang Jian received Zhi Xiu’s message and took people to the southern outskirts. He found a Moon Plated Gold chariot that had crashed into a tree lying upside down. The released karma beasts sniffed around everywhere, then chased their own tails in bewilderment.

When A-Xiang opened her eyes again, there was pitch-black darkness in front of her. Before her eyes could adjust to the dark, she smelled a powerful fragrance.

“Old Mud,” the white-faced man’s voice sounded in her ear, “I’ve brought her.”

A-Xiang gave a start. Next, something hit her. She scrambled to catch it and felt that it was the reincarnation wood amulet.

On Flying Jade Peak, Xi Ping sat up straight.

The white-faced man took out a luminous pearl. By the faint light, A-Xiang saw him talking to a shadow in the corner.

Before she could find the owner of the shadow, the shadow moved on its own!

It fell to the ground like mud, flowing all the way to A-Xiang’s feet.

A-Xiang froze in terror, letting the black shadow make a circle around her. Next, a dry voice sounded in her ear: “A mortal.”

A-Xiang whipped around, clutching the reincarnation wood, forcing Xi Ping to see the person behind her along with her. “What the hell!”

This man was stooped. He seemed about the same height as A-Xiang. The skin of his face was like an ill-fitting piece of clothing, pulled tight, unable to cover his teeth and pulling his nostrils wide. Two eyes that wouldn't close protruded. The irises and whites of the eyes were like beaten eggs, so it was impossible to tell where his gaze was aimed.

No wonder he hid in a shadow. With this dear friend's charms, if he went out into the streets of Jinping, it would be enough to scare a whole crowd of delicate marquises to death!

“Tai...um...” A-Xiang's ragged cotton-padded jacket was soaked with cold sweat. Her nails nearly dug into the reincarnation wood. Inwardly, she asked Xi Ping, “Who are they?”

“Bad news, anyway. Your rescuers are on their way, stay alert and tell me anything you notice.” At this time, the wicked Xi Ping casually took advantage: “You can call me whatever you like, any kind of uncle will do.”

While A-Xiang thought that his voice was a little young, it wasn't that uncommon for a thirty- or forty-year-old to have a young voice, so her suspicions weren't aroused. "Uncle, this place is a little damp, and there's a strong scent."

Damp and scented?

The place his shifu had divined was the southeast. To the southeast was the grand canal. Had she been taken onto a cargo ship?

Transporting perfume?

Before he could think about it carefully, "Old Mud" smiled at A-Xiang... though it looked like he was only baring his teeth. "Your Excellency Tai Sui, at last you've learned be circumspect. I cautioned you before not to be hasty. Well, wasn't I right? The blue dogs have put you in a tight spot lately, haven't they? Even Crow Two is in prison. A pity."

Xi Ping asked A-Xiang, "Was Crow Two your worthless shifu?"

A-Xiang struggled to stand firm and not let herself tremble. "He must have been. I heard others call him Brother Two."

Right, Jiangli and the others had all used numbers as code names.

This Brother Two's code name had a "crow" in front of it along with the "two." He must have had a high position among the evil cultivators.

These people obviously didn't know that "Tai Sui" was dead. Their information ended with Jiangli and the others planning to plunder the Dragon Vein during the fourth month. They had likely come in search of the evil cultivator called Crow Two, not expecting that Crow Two had been arrested and now might be dead or alive. That was why they had followed the traces and gotten their eyes on A-Xiang, who had been the last person to have contact with him.

A-Xiang said, "Uncle, what do I do?"

Xi Ping said, "Tell him it's none of his business. Tell him to state his business and cut the crap—describe the scent to me. Is it flowers? Or what?"

As A-Xiang kept her cool and conveyed his words, she carefully considered the strong fragrance around her. "Not flowers. It's very sweet..."

She swallowed automatically, and only then realized how she had been salivating. "Like tasty fruit."

Fruit?

Xi Ping was all at sea. Fresh fruits from the south were in fact transported to Jinping in the winter, but they usually had to be kept on ice.

What kind of fruit could still smell so delicious it made a person's mouth water after being put in cold storage?

“Old Mud” didn't get angry at A-Xiang's rude answer. Slowly as before, he said, “When ‘Piglet Number Five’ suddenly fell out of contact, we didn't know whether he'd had an accident or was deliberately avoiding us. Without him, we couldn't contact you, Tai Sui. We were truly concerned for your well-being. That's why we acted on impulse. I hope you can forgive us.”

Xi Ping's thoughts moved quickly—this “Old Mud” knew about Tai Sui's plot to plunder the Dragon Vein and must have found out through some indications that he had failed. He thought that Tai Sui was still hiding out near Jinping, keeping out of sight.

This so-called “Piglet Number Five” must have been one of Tai Sui's followers who had made long-term contact with these people. He had likely been affected when Tai Sui had sapped his believers' energy. He had either died or been caught by Heaven's Design Pavilion.

So...why would the evil cultivator Liang let these repulsive people who obviously weren't believers know about his plan to plunder the Dragon Vein?

Xi Ping raised his head and asked Zhi Xiu, “Shifu, are ‘sleep paralysis imps’ rare? How rare?”

Zhi Xiu said, “Before it was all right, but now they’ve been extinct for many years. As far as I know, not even Xuanyin Mountain has any living ones.”

Xi Ping slapped his thigh. “I’ve got it.”

“What have you got now?”

“The black market seller who sold the old demon the bugs is here. The old demon must have bought them on credit and not paid! Wow, shameless.”

Zhi Xiu sent a note reading “canal cargo ship, people suspected to be from the south,” then saw Xi Ping rolling up his sleeves and readying himself for battle. “I bet they weren’t using money for their transaction. Let me talk them around.”

Saying so, he muttered instructions to A-Xiang.

Zhi Xiu: “...”

No wonder Pang Jian had wanted to get this brat into Heaven's Design Pavilion from the start. A shit-stirring genius like this was truly wasted on snowy and unpeopled Flying Jade Peak. No wonder all he could do was pull down houses and blow up mountains.

A-Xiang had perhaps imprinted like a fledgling. She had a kind of unreasoning trust in the "uncle" who had told her the truth through the reincarnation wood. As soon as she heard his voice, she felt she was no longer alone and helpless. She became bolder. As Xi Ping instructed, she said to "Old Mud," "Friends, my Grand Duke Tai Sui says that he's indebted to you for your help last time, but he really hadn't thought that Xuanyin Mountain would send out that peak master. Even my shifu... I'm afraid everything currently points to disaster for Mr. Five. There's too much commotion. Can you grant us some more patience?"

"Old Mud" bared his teeth again. "Little sister, don't you know the price of living? We've spent over half a year being patient, waited from spring until the dead of winter, and that shipment of spiritual stones still hasn't arrived. Are we really supposed to go pilfer heaven's order? What crime have the common people committed?"

A-Xiang, who had nearly been run over by a Moon Plated Gold carriage, was choked by him saying "what crime have the common people committed?"

“Little girl.” Just then, the white-faced man who had been standing there without speaking opened his mouth. “Tell your Tai Sui that we know the difficulty of your position. Wuchang One has been beside Zhao for so long without daring to take him down. That must be because he’s worried you won’t have enough people, right?”

Zhao?

This was one of Xuanyin’s great surnames, Xi Ping thought. Who were they talking about?

“Let’s do this. We’ll help you out for free again,” the white-faced man said. “Have Wuchang One cooperate with us. Before the cargo ship leaves the Land of Turmoil, we’ll raid it and split the spiritual stones, ninety percent to us, ten percent to you. What do you say?”

Xi Ping ordered A-Xiang to haggle: “Tell him that’s no good. A fifty-fifty split, or negotiations are over.”

Meanwhile, he quickly recounted these words to Zhi Xiu. “Shifu, what are they talking about?”

After Zhi Xiu heard this, his expression became slightly grave. “At the beginning of each year, the southern mines send a spiritual stone shipment convoy north. Going by the date, the shipment must be going out soon. Do they really want to steal spiritual stones?”

CHAPTER 36 - Fragrant Jade Miasma (4)

“Damn.” Xi Ping was dumbfounded. “These two friends with their quaint skeletons came to Jinping all the way from the south just to divulge information to the immortal mountain! Shifu, are they our spies?”

Zhi Xiu looked at him. “They could be.”

This shit-stirrer was idle, but these people had come right to him. Maybe he really could get something out of them.

Xi Yue silently used snow boiled in an earthenware jar to brew tea, watching this teacher and disciple pair, having gotten through persecuting the north slope, put their heads together to persecute evil cultivators. He felt that Flying Jade Peak was indeed cold.

Zhi Xiu dipped his finger in water and wrote the key terms “Mining Office,” “spiritual stone shipments,” and “theft of spiritual stones from southern mines,” then gently tapped them with his index finger. The water droplets on the table began to roll around on their own, quickly forming line after line of small writing.

The immortals were gathered in the depths of the Xuanyin Mountains, but fundamentally they were all still of the mortal world. Only General Zhi was on his own, one of the rare people among the thirty-six peak masters who was truly tranquil. It had been a long time since he had inquired after worldly affairs. If not for the Sea of Stars, there might have been no way to dig him out of his frozen hole. He really didn't know what was going on at the Mining Office right now and had to make a hasty effort to inform himself at the last moment.

As soon as he performed the divination, he noticed that there was something fishy: the southern mines transported spiritual stones north four times a year, each type accompanied by a guard fleet comparable to a navy. The convoy ships were full of inscriptions and loaded with immortal tools.

When the fleet traveled, it would send a "foulness clearing water dragon" a shichen ahead to clear a path and warn passersby to keep out of the way. Never mind stealing spiritual stones, the cultivators of the mortal world were at risk of being mistakenly injured by the inscriptions if they even came close.

Though desperate criminals were a local specialty of the Land of Turmoil, and there had been people who'd had the idea of stealing spiritual stones, the disparity in strength was too great. The escorting personnel might suffer occasional casualties, but not one single spiritual stone had been lost.

Right up until these last few years...in other words, after Liang Chen had left office.

The new Mining Office supervisors had begun to have frequent incidents on the road while escorting spiritual stones—there were always thieves taking advantage of laxness from the guard on duty to strike, steal a small ship and run. None of the losses were big. Normally, when this kind of thing happened, in order to guard against the enemy luring them away from their main camp to attack it, the fleet would strengthen its defenses and not blindly chase after the thieves. Therefore, the burgled spiritual stones mostly weren't recovered.

As Xi Ping directed A-Xiang's dealings with the evil cultivators, he split off his attention to say, "If the new supervisors aren't particularly useless, then before the old evil cultivator left, he must have put his own believers in place at the Mining Office. As soon as he left, he was no longer the one responsible, so he began to control his underlings from a distance in pilfering, getting spiritual stones from the southern mines to provide to his believers... Shifu, where are Pang-shixiong and the others?"

Pang Jian had already reached the bank of the canal following General Zhi's directions.

It was nearly New Year, the time when goods moved fastest in Jinping City. Big and small ships were stopped by the docks like boiling dumplings, lining up for several li starting first thing in the morning.

Pang Jian tried sending his consciousness out to search. Unsurprisingly, he came up empty—General Zhi’s note had lacked details, which showed that even he couldn’t clearly divine the exact location. The enemy had to have something that could block the spiritual sense of an ascended spirit master.

“Commander, there are so many ships. How can we search them all?” a blue-clotheser asked. “The secret order from the inner sect told us to find a girl kidnapped by evil cultivators? What’s so special about this girl? How many evil cultivators have kidnapped her?”

Actually, Pang Jian was also puzzled.

He recalled Wei Chengxiang. Liang Chen had fixed his attention on her because her spiritual image matched his and had tricked her into joining the evil cultivators. But the girl had luck on her side. She had escaped in time without becoming either an evil cultivator or nourishment for an evil cultivator. The originator of the evil practices had turned into dust, and all the evil cultivators in the vicinity of Jinping had been put to death, so Pang Jian wasn’t planning on making trouble for a mortal. He had only left behind a karma beast to watch her for a time. Every day, apart from doing hard labor, Wei Chengxiang went to Rat Alley dressed in slovenly male attire help out, cook, clean, and do some carpentry for those listless women—every time she was seen by an old prostitute named Chunying, she would be shooed away like a fiend. She took no notice, going again the next day.

In summary, she was a little girl who could endure suffering and had good morals. Pang Jian had removed the karma beast and hadn't bothered her again.

It had been over half a year; why did General Zhi still have eyes on her? Could it be that the general had expected from the start that the remaining evil cultivators would come looking for this girl?

Ascended spirit peak masters up in the highest heavens truly were unfathomable!

“Don't be indiscreet about a secret order from the inner sect.” Pang Jian waved a hand. “Wait, I'm going to rustle the grass and startle the snake.”

Saying so, he took out a dragon scale and flicked it into the canal.

There was a crash as raging waves came out of nowhere on the peaceful canal docks. The scale turned into a water dragon as it entered the water and swam under all the ships. The surface of the grand canal rose sharply. All the ships were gently raised by the waves, then put back down at once.

A dragon's roar came from the water, rapping through every cargo hold and container hidden underwater.

“A foulness clearing water dragon,” Xi Ping heard “Old Mud” say seriously through the reincarnation wood. “Heaven's Design Pavilion's blue dogs are searching the water here!”

“Impossible, how could they know?” White Face said, stunned. “With the ‘prying ban’ inscription in place, never mind Pang Jian, even an established foundation cultivator wouldn't be able to find our traces!”

“Heaven's Design Pavilion has Xuanyin Mountain behind it. What do you know about the ins and outs of Xuanyin Mountain?! I told you that the situation had been tense lately.” A-Xiang combined the wording Xi Ping taught her with her own skills from years of haggling at the market. All at once, she said, “You can't even guard against the pursuit of Heaven's Design Pavilion, and you want to rob the spiritual stone mines? Hilarious. Let me ask you, who's been successful all these years? If you could, you'd have done it yourselves by now. Forget about all this fifty-fifty, ten-ninety, twenty-eighty. If you succeed, it's all yours. We don't want a single share! Listen, old uncle, the key to getting the spiritual stones lies with us, not with you. Even if we're short on manpower, we still have people willing to collaborate with us. You're the one who needs us. We don't need you. If you want my opinion, fifty-fifty is still too much for you!"

"Old Mud" said emphatically, "Indeed, we aren't as brilliant as others. We have no established foundations or ascended spirits to rely on. But we do have people with a Way of the Heart. Look up at that spotless Sage's Road and those wealthy mansions stinking of wine and meat! We seek spiritual stones and suffer hardship to cultivate for the sake of smashing those celestial statues and golden nobles pressing down on the heads of the common people, for the sake of winning a corner of the sky for people crawling in the mud! What do those scoundrels count for? Aren't you people always saying, 'better to die in frost than to forsake one's convictions?'"

Xi Ping immediately seized on the key point: the Land of Turmoil lived up to its name—it was full of turmoil. Liang Chen had indeed been an amateur, unable to match the hidden heartfelt feelings of a group of evil cultivators...and what did this person mean that they had no established foundations or ascended spirits to rely on? Did that mean others did have them? Who did he mean? Could it be that ascended spirit and established foundation evil cultivators were running around all over the place, and Heaven's Design Pavilion didn't know?

A-Xiang, however, was speechless. “Winning a corner of the sky for people crawling in the mud” had struck just right, raising a cloud of dust in her young but hardship-laden heart.

Just then, the dragon’s roar sounded again, closer this time!

Xi Ping gave a start. He had just asked Zhi Xiu what a “foulness clearing water dragon” was. Shifu had said it was an immortal tool that opened the way. When a water dragon passed by, it could raise the tide in the sea.

So in the canal, it must have made bigger waves. Why was the swaying here so slight?

Could it be that they weren’t in the water?

No, if they hadn’t been in the water, they wouldn’t have swayed at all.

Yes, the thing that White Face had taken out to use for light was a luminous pearl... At first, Xi Ping hadn’t taken notice. He only caught up now. Didn’t these evil cultivators have to live frugally to save up for spiritual stones? Did they have to be so ostentatious?

So he quickly asked A-Xiang, “That fragrance you’re talking about, is there some overripe lychee smell in it, and a bit of raspberry medicine smell?”

A-Xiang hadn't worked out what was going on yet. "...how does lychee smell?"

Xi Ping was speechless for a moment, racking his brains for a description. "It's like...overly sweet, but when you pay attention, there's a medicinal smell in it that's a bit sour, a bit bitter."

A-Xiang listened to him and silently took a breath, smelling. "I think there is a medicinal smell."

Xi Ping immediately raised his head and said to Zhi Xiu, "Shifu, I think they're on a ship transporting snow wine. There's a motionless cabin on it."

Snow wine was outrageously expensive, like liquid gold, and it was unusually fragile. Heat, gas, light, strong motion... It was said that all of it would make first-rate snow wine go bad. Within Great Wan territory, it was only permitted to sell snow wine from the southern mines. Transport by water was long. To keep the product from being shaken and damaged on the way, the cargo ships often had a special kind of downgraded immortal tool in them called a motionless cabin—a little like a mustard seed, but unlike a true mustard seed, it couldn't collapse spacetime. It was only a container that could hang suspended within the ship. Inside the motionless cabin, no matter how the ship's hull turned over, there would be almost no impact.

Zhi Xiu frowned, for once stern. "Have you drunk snow wine?"

"Oh, once. It didn't taste like anything, like tea dust on the third or fourth brewing. It's just expensive. When they asked me to come drink it afterward, I didn't feel like going," Xi Ping said. "Shifu, what's wrong?"

"Since it's not good, don't touch it again." Zhi Xiu didn't explain in detail, only said, "It's spiritual stone miasma. It damages the Way of the Heart and harms one's cultivation."

This time, he didn't even bother with a note. He simply snapped his fingers.

Pang Jian's eyes swam. The sleet in the sky quickly congealed into the words "snow wine," which flashed in front of his eyes, then once again broke into shards and fell to the ground.

Pang Jian's gaze was like lightning. In the space of a single breath, he looked over countless ships and precisely fixed on the precious downgraded immortal tool.

At the same time, A-Xiang heard Xi Ping say, “When Heaven’s Design Pavilion comes, pretend to be scared, don’t act like you were the one who called them!”

In the blink of an eye, the moment Pang Jian fixed on the motionless cabin, the two evil cultivators’ spiritual senses were stirred simultaneously. Old Mud, like a tub of dirty water, “splashed” onto the ground on the spot and instantly seeped into the floor and vanished. White Face meanwhile made a grab in midair—it turned out that the door to the motionless cabin was behind him!

A-Xiang saw her chance quickly. She held the reincarnation wood and squatted on the ground holding her head, crying, “Help! There’s a demon!”

The white-faced man was about to slip into the crack between the ship’s hull and the downgraded immortal tool, but he ran right into Pang Jian’s arms as the latter came in through the wall!

White Face froze abruptly—a talisman gun was pointed at his chin.

“Hey, what a special day,” Pang Jian said, smiling. “First thing in the morning, and someone’s throwing himself at me?”

Hypnotic ripples quickly appeared in White Face's strange eyes. There was no time for Pang Jian to look away.

A-Xiang, whose soul had been muddled once, saw that this blue-clothed lord had also fallen for it. She was hesitating over whether she ought to jump up and yell when Pang Jian asked doubtfully, "That's all? No other tricks?"

White Face: "..."

A-Xiang silently squatted back down.

"Where did such an unworldly evil cultivator come from?" Pang Jian expressionlessly pulled the trigger. "Your feathers haven't even all grown in yet, and you still dare come to Jinping to make trouble."

Talisman script coated that white face, then spread to the whole body. The white-faced man seemed to turn into a big white moth wrapped in a spiderweb.

Meanwhile, a number of blue-clothesers working together pulled out a big net full of talismans from the water, like fishing, scooping up Old Mud, who had melted out of his human shape.

Pang Jian casually stuck the talisman gun into the back of his belt and reached out to pull over the “big white moth.” “Take him back to the Quell for a soul-searching!”

No sooner had he spoken than a note from General Zhi nearly hit him in the face: “Beware the inscription.”

Pang Jian was startled. Then he saw a peculiar smile appear on the white-faced man’s face. Something dazzling flashed on his chest. Pang Jian had no time to think about it carefully. He abruptly flung the man away. “Out of the way!”

The white-faced man was tall and broad, but he was flung one-handed by Pang Jian like a pebble and went flying to the sky. Meanwhile, Pang Jian took out an umbrella. The umbrella’s canopy expanded boundlessly in his hand, covering nearly all the ships on the grand canal.

Those under the cover of the big umbrella only sensed darkness fall over them. Before they could see clearly what had gone up into the sky, there was huge sound.

The fierce second-class inscription had blown White Face to bits!

All the ribs of the enormous umbrella broke, and the torn canopy came fluttering down. Stronger waves than when the water dragon had passed earlier surged over the canal. Bloody rain came down from the sky.

In the net, “Old Mud”’s mouth was nowhere to be found, but he could still laugh breathlessly. “Ancients in their carven caves, called their shelters property... Their homes gave them...dignity, but...the dogs...of the rich...”²⁶

His laughter came to a sudden halt as he became a stiff paste of lime.

His protruding eyes were facing in A-Xiang’s direction. His blurred featured looked like something a child had hastily sculpted. Something seemed to clutch A-Xiang’s heart. She automatically squeezed the reincarnation wood amulet.

Then there was a puff as “Old Mud,” who had really turned into mud, split apart, bursting into powder, landing in the still surging canal.

Xi Ping abruptly struggled free of the image in the center of his brow and opened his eyes wide. “Shifu...”

Zhi Xiu had no need to look. He could already guess what the situation was over there. “They’re dead?”

Xi Ping had only thought he was having fun, like gambling with strangers. He had been treating those two ugly evil cultivators like opponents in a game. With the game over, he had been ready to put on airs and express his self-satisfaction, but the other side had suddenly put on a self-sacrificing show.

Zhi Xiu said, slowly, “Our government employs severe punishments against evil cultivators. Once captured, they’re put in prison and soul-searched. A soul-searching carves up part of your bones. Even if you don’t die, your mind will be damaged. Therefore, if they have the chance, they’ll kill themselves. In recent years, Heaven’s Design Pavilion has alternated set after set of immortal tools, yet they still can’t keep up with the evil cultivators’ endless tricks for committing suicide. There’s nothing to be done about it.”

For a time, Xi Ping was a little dazed.

In stories, bad guys were always uncouth and steeped in evil; those who laughed wildly on the way to execution were always heroes. When he had listened to operas with his grandmother as a child and complained about them all being the same, his old grandmother had said, “It isn’t that the story writers can’t come up with new ideas. Think about it. These evildoers are all doing it for selfish reasons. They always have to consider the gains and losses first. If you calculate enough, don't you become a vile person? Dying for loyalty and righteousness means you have heroism in your bones. Even if you turn into mud, your essence will still remain. The body is divided into male and female, old and young, tall and short, beautiful and ugly, but the temperament is always the same. You can recognize it without seeing the person.”

“Shifu,” he said, a little awkwardly, “with them meeting death so fervently, I feel like I'm the bad guy.”

The master of Flying Jade Peak looked at him with eyes that had seen two hundred years and suddenly felt that keeping him at Flying Jade Peak wouldn't necessarily be a good thing. A person brought up in comfort grew slowly. He hadn't even fully developed his emotional capacity; how could he seek immortality? He'd just be fooling around.

So Zhi Xiu said gently, “There are few evil people on earth, and those who die for justice don't necessarily do good things.”

Xi Ping: “...”

Why was it “few evil people” first, “don't necessarily do good things” later? Shifu was up to standard. Just like when he had been teaching Detailed Account of Meridians, he wasn't making any sense.

Zhi Xiu didn't continue talking about it, only instructed: "Arrange a statement with that girl so she can lay out the fact that the evil cultivators had accomplices in the Mining Office to Heaven's Design Pavilion. Don't let her expose you."

"Fine," Xi Ping agreed. He considered it, then said, "Shifu, can we ask Pang-shixiong to get that little girl a different identity? One evil cultivator found her, so there may be others. What will I do if they keep coming after her? That girl's so much trouble. She can get around the mind-clearing spell. It'll be no good if she causes another avalanche on the north slope."

Zhi Xiu: "..."

Who did this shameless wretch say had caused the avalanche on the north slope?

"Oh, right, that evil cultivator just now said that one of Tai Sui's remaining followers was next to someone named Zhao," Xi Ping said, remembering. "Who in the Mining Office is surnamed Zhao? Does that count as a lead?"

Zhi Xiu casually reckoned on his fingers. "Mining Office, surnamed Zhao... It must be Zhao Zhenwei."

“A relative of Exalt...of Zhao-shixiong in the capital?”

“Not really. The Zhao clan is too big. He must be from a branch family in Ning’an, your shixiong from the previous class. This person...”

Zhi Xiu divined something that made him frown. He stopped and didn’t say anymore. General Zhi had the manners of a gentleman and didn’t discuss people’s shortcomings behind their backs. Since he had come to a sudden halt, his next words certainly couldn’t have been anything good.

Xi Ping froze.

A shixiong from the previous class. In other words, ten years ago. From the Ning’an Zhao family...

“A collateral branch of the Zhao family in Ning’an wanted to get one of their descendants in and decided to bribe the immortal envoy, so they thought about what they could give to make themselves stand out...and they took a shine to the Chen family’s green ore field.”

Ho, another unexpected harvest.

“Shifu.” Xi Ping licked his canine tooth and began to scheme. He said, “There’s a remaining follower of Tai Sui in the Mining Office, perhaps more than one. All these leftovers seem to be in high demand, with all the evil cultivators lining up to use them to steal spiritual stones. It makes me worry...”

Zhi Xiu said, “If you have something to say, just say it. Does it have anything to do with you?”

“It does!” Xi Ping pointed to himself. “I am Tai Sui!”

CHAPTER 37 - Fragrant Jade Miasma (Final)

Zhi Xiu truly had excellent self-restraint. Hearing this grandiose statement, he actually managed to hold back from mocking him. He only calmly and good-naturedly shook his head. “No.”

Xi Ping began to boast shamelessly: “Shifu, I’m acting for the sake of the nation and the people—why can’t I go? Didn’t you say that an open-eyed cultivator out in the world had to rely on external objects...?”

Zhi Xiu corrected him evenly: “They rely on first-hand experience.”

“I won’t pick up any first-hand experience here with you, shifu.” His rebellious disciple was once again climbing onto the roof to pry up the tiles. “I think you’ve forgotten all your experience. Whenever I ask you anything, you always have to consult celestial phenomena before answering.”

Zhi Xiu: “...”

“Anyway, I also have spiritual bones...”

“You have the face to mention your half-baked spiritual bones? How many times have they done you any good?” Zhi Xiu sighed and spread his hands.

Xi Ping's vision swam. His shizun had tossed him into a mustard seed.

Xi Ping instantly felt a thousand jun weight hanging from his feet. He tried to lift a foot. Using all his strength, the height he raised it to wasn't enough to step on a rat. "Shifu, are you going to drown me in a lake?"

Zhi Xiu's voice came from "outer space": "Look up."

As soon as Xi Ping looked up, he saw seven candles hanging over his head, from near to far. The nearest was about a zhang away from him. "You've even got the mourning hall ready..."

"Enough nonsense. In this mustard seed, you can't climb, can't fly a sword, can't throw anything, and talismans, arrays, and inscriptions are all prohibited. You can only use your bone qin to put out the candles. When you can control the bone qin and put out seven candles with one note, then I'll let you off the mountain," Zhi Xiu said calmly. "Don't worry, Xi Yue will bring you food. I'm not going to starve you—of course, if you agree not to pester me with your absurd demands and cultivate properly on Flying Jade Peak, I can let you out any time."

Xi Ping: "..."

In Jinping's southern outskirts, Pang Jian retrieved the damaged immortal tool. Though he was already used to this, he still let out a gloomy sigh.

"It's cleaned up. Check if there are any casualties—little girl, you come with me," Pang Jian called to A-Xiang. Then he said to the blue-clothesers, "Inspect the snow wine on the ship... No, just in case, look into all the snow wine that's been on the market lately. If it's no good, retrieve it."

Of course Pang Jian wasn't about to make things difficult for a half-grown child. He was quite polite to A-Xiang. First he took her to eat, then kindly asked her a few questions. A-Xiang answered everything according to what Xi Ping had told her. In fact, as soon as he heard her, Pang Jian knew she was hiding something, but even General Zhi hadn't said anything; he had only told him to make arrangements for this girl. Presumably Flying Jade Peak was aware of whatever she was hiding.

There were times to be perceptive, but when vagueness was appropriate there was no need to rush to be clever. So Pang Jian let the anxious A-Xiang off lightly. He only said, "There are evil cultivators after you. In the future, this kind of thing will happen often. Stop messing around in those foul factories. Let's do this—go pack your things, and tomorrow morning I'll take you to the country and find you a position."

A-Xiang wasn't qualified to have objections. Carefully, she asked, "Exalted, what work will I be doing?"

"What can you do?" Pang Jian laughed loudly. "I'll find someone to adopt you, you'll be their daughter, change your name, live well, and in a few years find a nice man. Just be alert, and don't mention the past."

A-Xiang was stupefied, not daring to believe this kind of thing could happen.

She...wouldn't even have to be a worker?

A-Xiang wasn't afraid of doing physical labor for pay, and she could write and do arithmetic. She could learn how to use a new machine at once, she knew some basic carpentry, and she could handle a communal cook pot for dozens of people. Working for your food was pretty good.

But what kind of reputation did a "female worker" have in Great Wan? Just saying it sounded vulgar. Hanging out with a bunch of men day and night, living an unchaste life—it was hardly any different from being an unlicensed prostitute.

That was why her grandpa had made her dress in men's clothes.

A-Xiang opened her mouth and nearly cried from happiness.

Suddenly, she remembered something else and apprehensively muttered, “Exalted, can I bring my ‘mom’?”

“What mom?” said Pang Jian.

A-Xiang became nervous. The Exalted had said he was going to find someone to adopt her, so of course it would be no good if she wasn’t an orphan. But since her grandpa had passed away, she and Chunying had had no one but each other in the whole world. Could she just walk away and leave Chunying by herself in that place?

So she grit her teeth and, still not knowing what was good for her, said, “She’s...an auntie who’s always taken care of me, she’s...”

“As you like.” Commander Pang didn’t even finish listening, just carelessly waved a hand. “Do as you see fit. It’s all right as long as you don’t blab.”

Just then, a blue-clotheser walked over and whispered something to Pang Jian.

A-Xiang was young and had sharp ears. She vaguely heard this Exalted saying something about “snow wine...no good...many people...” and remembered that white-faced man telling her to be careful of people drinking snow wine. She thought, Have they been mixing something into the snow wine?

But she didn't think much of it. It was nothing to do with her, anyway. Sell her by the jin, and she still wouldn't pay for a cup of snow wine. If the wealthy got their stomachs upset from drinking it, it wasn't as if they would end up like her grandfather, with no money for medicine.

When Commander Pang finished listening, he walked away at a hurried pace. He only left a blue-clotheser to accompany A-Xiang home.

In the carriage, A-Xiang belatedly thought back over this frightening day, sobbed silently to herself, then put it aside.

You were already doing all right if you could live safe and sound. Why think so much? Take it one step at a time.

The blue-clotheser perfunctorily dropped her off at the south gate and took no more notice. "With such a big fuss on the canal today, the evil cultivators probably won't dare to come for a while. There's no danger. You can go home on your own."

A-Xiang tactfully thanked him and got out of the carriage, running off toward the factory district. Just before the shop closed for the night, she used her saved up food money to buy a Golden Tray lottery ticket. It didn't matter whether she won. She wouldn't be here long enough to hear the winner announced. She would save it as a keepsake.

She was planning to go to Rat Alley to see Chunying first. If she met one of the customers today, she would cheerfully curse at him. They were leaving this damn place anyway! A-Xiang wasn't very good at using market place curses on people. The grandpa who had raised her had been a scholar, after all. Afraid of getting excited and forgetting her lines when she was on the spot, she started preparing them on the way, hopping and skipping.

Someone must have had some urgent work—the smoke and dust over the southern outskirts were heavier than usual. A-Xiang involuntarily coughed a few times, thinking, It's nearly New Year. Why are they still working around the clock...?

Suddenly, she realized something was wrong. She heard wild yelling and cursing on the breeze.

A wind swept past, and the stench of burning hit A-Xiang right in the face.

The sky to the south changed color.

Someone let out a heartrending cry: “Fire in the factory!”

“Run! Hurry...”

Boom—!

An enormous sound. The ground shook so hard it made people stumble.

A-Xiang was a little stunned. Far away, she saw an enormous black cloud rise from the ground, form into the shape of a mushroom, and soar up toward the sky.

A person covered in blood ran toward her, staggering. “Don’t stand there watching! There’s an explosion over there!”

A-Xiang was jostled by people running wildly on all sides. She craned her neck and asked, “Where’s the fire? Where’s the explosion? What’s going on?”

Someone answered, “Don’t know, it started in the cotton yarn factory...”

Another explosion covered up the answer. A warm wind raised sand and stones, fiercely slapping A-Xiang’s face. She covered her burning cheeks.

Her ears hummed. She felt blood.

“The gold smelter is gone, too! The Moon Plated Gold gold smelter has exploded!”

The cotton yarn factory... Wasn't that very close to Rat Alley?

A-Xiang raised her foot to charge toward the blaze.

Xi Ping, trapped in the mustard seed, was just picking at his fingers in utter boredom while Xi Yue stood by.

The half-puppet was like a loyal little tail. When Xi Ping was playing, he played with him and always let him win; when Xi Ping was being punished, he joined him in the punishment and did most of the work. After bringing food, he didn't leave. While Xi Ping was practicing with the bone qin, the half-puppet picked up a tree branch inside the mustard seed and started writing on the ground in big characters.

“How rotten. Only a sword cultivator could think up this kind of sideshow acrobat's cheap trick.” It was as if there were nails under Xi Ping's butt. He alternated between puffing out his cheeks and blowing toward the sky, and craning his neck to bother Xi Yue. “Listen, Yue-bao'er, your handwriting... hss...”

Before he could comment, a heartrending scream exploded in his ears. In front of his eyes, flames soared up to the sky.

Xi Ping gave a start.

Alarm bells rang in Southern Sage Temple.

Heaven's Design Pavilion's blue-clothesers charged out of the city on their swords. The half-immortals transferred water directly out of the canal to throw at the blaze.

But this seemed to be the eternal fire at the end of the world, withstanding fierce wind and strong rain, dancing wildly, incessant. From the mortal clash of water and fire rose dense smoke that drifted toward Jinping City and created a many-layered canopy in the sky above it.

On the west side of the Lingyang River, concealed inscriptions gradually lit up everywhere. Prince Zhuang, who had been sleeping lightly to begin with, was startled awake by the faint light.

A piece of paper floated in through the window. There was a layer of ash even on Bai Ling.

“What’s wrong?”

Bai Ling coughed a few times and quickly said, “In the southern outskirts’s cotton yarn factory, the boss’s brother-in-law or someone got drunk on snow wine and set fire to the shacks where the workers live. The fire wasn’t contained at once and spread to the neighboring warehouse. The management of that warehouse is poor. A pile of silver powder²⁷ had accumulated there with no one to take care of it. It exploded as soon as it met the flames. A nearby Moon Plated Gold gold smelter just happened to be working extra hours. There was a chain reaction, and all the land in the southern outskirts has been shaken.”

“Help me dress.” Prince Zhuang knew he couldn’t sleep anymore tonight. He pushed away the covers and stood. “Snow wine? Doesn’t that stuff just make you giggle after a couple of cups? How could it drive someone mad?”

While helping him arrange his outer robe, Bai Ling said, “Today some evil cultivators snuck into Jinping on a snow wine cargo ship. Heaven’s Design Pavilion promptly arrested them, but some goods had already flowed into the market before that. This snow wine uses double the rock snow, making it stronger. The unusual sweetness makes it more tempting to overindulge. The shopkeepers selling the snow wine have inspection techniques no worse than Heaven’s Design Pavilion. They all knew what had happened, in fact, but they went along with it because business was good, even raised the price because it ‘wouldn’t get you drunk’... If a person drinks too much of this especially strong snow wine, his speech and actions will indeed be no different from a sober person’s, but it’ll damage his reason. He’ll often become reckless. This must be the root of there being twice as many carriage accidents in the southern outskirts as usual.”

Prince Zhuang’s thoughts moved extremely fast—the overflowing factory shacks of the southern outskirts, the warehouse containing “silver powder” in need of disposal that hadn’t been disposed of—there was no way the factories could avoid a charge of mismanagement. Never mind the headache for the capital overseer, those factories probably all had close ties to the water transport department.

But behind the largest supplier of snow wine in the capital was the Ministry of War... There was something worth tearing at there.

Just then, the white jade proximal Prince Zhuang had put on a small bedside table lit up.

Prince Zhuang turned his head and glanced at it. There was a line of writing on it without preamble: How is everyone at home? The smoke is too heavy, san-ge and grandmother absolutely must not go out!

“He just has to get into everything. Doesn’t he have enough to worry about...?” Prince Zhuang was in the process of considering a thousand people and a thousand things. He didn’t read closely, only smiled among his many concerns.

But before his smile had faded, Prince Zhuang froze: how did he know?

Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s walkers in the mortal world flew here and there, guarding the Dragon Vein, fighting evil cultivators. No one could have guessed that a crowd of half-immortals would be put into such a tight spot by some fireworks let off by a few wastrels.

There were too many combustible and explosive things in the southern outskirts’s factory district, and the direction of the wind was unfavorable. When a single spark fell, it sent everything around up in flames!

All the steamships on the grand canal urgently made way. Half of the canal water went to cover the factory district. It took a full shichen for the conflagration to stop.

The rain brought over by the walkers in the mortal world had yet to cease.

Xi Ping’s point of view was limited to what A-Xiang saw. He couldn’t see the full state of the south of the city. He looked from A-Xiang’s view of Jinping to the white jade proximal to check for an answer and back. His eyes could hardly keep up.

The survivors' faces were all painted, their identities impossible to tell. A-Xiang stumbled around, stopping everyone who looked similar to someone she knew. No one thought she was being rude. Everyone wandering through the ashes had lost someone; their expressions were as desolate as hers.

Wailing floated over from somewhere, chasing her as she wandered toward Rat Alley.

Standing at the mouth of Rat Alley, A-Xiang was almost stunned for a while, suspecting she had found the wrong place.

The dark, damp little alley in her memories was gone. The view had become clear, all the way to the grand canal.

A few city guard soldiers cleaning up the aftermath rudely pushed her aside, plowing at random through the ruins while holding their noses.

“Here’s one... Fifty-four.” When they found a body, they would call out the number. “Come give me a hand.”

“Fifty-five, fifty-six, fifty-seven—these are all stuck together, let’s say fifty-seven... Hmph, these unregistered prostitutes really get around.”

“Fifty-eight...fifty-nine!”

At first the soldiers had lifted the bodies. Later, there was more work than they could handle, and they lazily dragged the burnt bodies all over the ground. Some official had told them to count the number of casualties, so these curled-up bodies each had a number.

A female corpse called “sixty” was thrown at A-Xiang’s feet. Her face was burnt. She was facing upward with her mouth open, catching the rain.

She must have been thirsty when she was alive.

She might have been Chunying, or she might not have been.

The canal water was filthy, so the rain falling from the sky was also filthy. There was a foul reek everywhere.

A-Xiang went no further. In the rain, she followed the corpse’s gaze, looking up at the sky, squeezing the reincarnation wood amulet.

Xi Ping called to her a few times, and she didn’t answer.

Xi Ping turned his head fretfully just in time to see Xi Yue's anxious face and the ground covered in his messy writing.

Xi Yue had been writing his name. There were too many strokes in "Xi"; he couldn't manage to get it right. The ground was littered with characters with their heads separated from their bodies, like the burned corpses at the mouth of Rat Alley.

There was no response yet on the white jade proximal.

When the women had struggled to survive in the dim alley, he had looked on indifferently; when the people who had come to the end of the road had bowed to an evil god, he had resented their passivity; when the evil cultivator who claimed a righteous cause had cried out his views, he had been confused and uncomprehending.

But the ground littered with remains and charred corpses at last gave the young master a sense of fellow feeling.

A-Xiang looked up, and Xi Ping saw along with her the inscrutable, inexorable fate hanging over the heads of all living things.

An old beggar covered in dust walked over beating a board, indistinctly singing: “Lingyang guard us, Lingyang guard us. Blessed clouds are flying high, silver moon sinks from the sky. In the mansions they drink snow, poor wretches get drunk and laid low... Everybody, grant me a couple copper coins, I’ll raise a longevity tablet for you... Grant me a couple copper coins...”

“Move aside.” An overworked officer stepped forward to drive him off, sending him reeling with a kick. “Where’d this old beggar come from? They get everywhere. How come you couldn’t have burned up in that fire last night? What bad luck!”

The old beggar agreed blindly. The officer spat and hurried away.

“Grant me a couple copper coins...” The old beggar’s face was in the mud and his back to the sky. He knelt on the ground, bowing with his hands in front of him as he mumbled, “In the mansions they drink snow...poor wretches get drunk and laid low...in the mansions they drink snow...”

A-Xiang heard these familiar lines and slowly turned her head. Through the rain, she met the old beggar’s empty eyes.

“A-Xiang,” the “uncle”’s voice came from the reincarnation wood. For the first time, he spoke kindly to her. “There’s something wrong with that man.

He's with the evil cultivators. Heaven's Design Pavilion is nearby cleaning up. Call for help, quick!"

A-Xiang stared at the old beggar without blinking. After a long time, she quietly said, "Uncle, that Lord Pang said he wants to take me to the country to get a new identity and live a good life."

"I know..."

"But I don't want to go anymore. What's the point of changing my identity? The sky above my head will still be the same sky... It's useless."

"Wei Chengxiang, what are you thinking? Didn't you learn anything from last time?! You've seen what these evil cultivators are like. If you mix with them, beware of getting your face disfigured like that 'Old Mud'! Do you want to be like a rat in the sewer, chased by Heaven's Design Pavilion until they kill you? Those fuckers might have been the ones who blew up your home!"

"I have learned something, really," A-Xiang whispered. "Uncle, even if they were the ones who did it, I can only get revenge by becoming like them."

Travelers walking beside the mud always had to worry about being splashed by it...unless they jumped into it themselves.

Anyway, it wasn't like she could be a blue-clotheser. Better to jump.

“Wei Chengxiang!”

“Uncle, you're right. Even the Southern Sage doesn't work miracles. There are no gods on earth.” A-Xiang decisively put the reincarnation wood amulet away in her clothes, no longer chanting the name of her imagined god. For a time, Xi Ping saw nothing.

He was indignant and anxious. He pounded on the ground. The bones of his fingers let out a brief, sharp cry like tearing silk.

Twang!

Zhi Xiu, meditating on the cliff, suddenly opened his eyes. A moment later, he landed beside the mustard seed at the door of the cottage.

There was a furious crack in the mustard seed. It had broken open.

Xi Ping landed abruptly on the snow and only just kept his footing. “Shifu! I...”

Zhi Xiu took back the mustard seed and waved a hand at him. He touched the crack on the mustard seed and suddenly became aware of something. Frowning, he looked at the clear and frigid sky over Flying Jade Peak.

The pre-dawn sky informed him of the hell that was Jinping's southern outskirts now. A shadow passed over Zhi Xiu's face.

A while later, he finally turned his head and said to Xi Ping, "Your family is well. There are fireproofing inscriptions buried under the west side of the Lingyang River."

Hearing this didn't make Xi Ping feel better.

They were proof against fire, but what about water? What about earthquakes?

When Lancang had marched north, hadn't the whole city suffered, without any inscriptions doing any good?

He couldn't rid himself of the sight of those burned corpses. Supposing he had been in A-Xiang's place... Xi Ping didn't dare to think any further.

"I know why your bone qin works sometimes and doesn't work at other times," Zhi Xiu said. "With your bones as your qin, what you play is the sound of your heart. If your heart is unmoved, the strings are also unmoved.”

Just so, when a sword cultivator plucked the “strings,” what he played was sword aura.

Xi Ping himself was heartless most of the time. When he plucked at his bone qin at random, he could only disturb the locals.

When others completed their spiritual bones, their vital weapon emerged. Xi Ping’s vital weapon was concealed in the bones of his fingers and wouldn’t come out; it was probably waiting for his Way of the Heart.

Flying Jade Peak was frozen all over. You couldn’t develop your heart out of nothing.

“Northern Li’s Kunlun Sect is famed for the way of the sword. The disciples go up the mountain to begin rigorous cultivation before they’re ten years old. The way of a sword cultivator can be walked without thought or heart.” Zhi Xiu put his hands behind his back and stood. For a moment, this man who hardly ever raised his voice was as sharp and solitary as the marks of the sword on the surrounding stones. “If you entered the way of the sword, your bone qin would probably become a qin sword. A sword is like a beacon. It can isolate you from external things. You have no need to attend to the affairs of others, no need to turn your head. You can spend your whole life in sole pursuit of a sharper, deeper sword aura, until you pierce the dome of heaven, pierce the void—Shiyong, are you determined not to follow my way of the sword?”

Xi Ping missed the deeper meaning in his words. He asked, very practically, “If I become extremely skilled with the sword, can I protect my family and friends?”

“Family and friends.” Zhi Xiu smiled. He turned his head to look at his young disciple. The look in his eyes was obscure. There was a bit of tenderness in his voice. “Shiyong, the Great Way leads to heaven. There are no family and friends on that road.”

“Then why would I walk it?” Xi Ping said decisively. “Shifu, just teach me something useful. I want to leave the mountain and kill that bunch of evil cultivators!”

Zhi Xiu looked at him. Bizarrely, he felt that he was looking at himself many years ago.

“Fine.” He sighed. “Come with me.”

Zhaoting carried its master up Flying Jade Peak. Xi Ping froze, then quickly used his newly learned ability to fly a sword to dodderingly follow. He heard a faint sound. His shifu had opened the mountain seal.

“An open-eyed cultivator can only use open-eyed grade immortal tools. You can’t control high level ones. Take a mustard seed, pick out some tools that suit you. Among immortal tools, there are ones that get along and ones that are at odds. Take care when you’re picking them out so they don’t start fighting in your bag in the future. And don’t take more than five.”

“Only five...”

A pinecone rolled down and hit Xi Ping on the head.

Zhi Xiu’s voice came from the top of the mountain. “Do you think just anyone can be like your Pang-shixiong, carrying around all kinds of odds and ends without getting mixed up? He has the accumulated experience of a hundred years of mortal peril. An amateur like you, you’re doing well if you can operate four or five immortal tools. If you take too many things, then when you really run into trouble, you’ll waste time picking an immortal tool. You can come back for more when you’ve picked up some skills.

“You need an established foundation to carve inscriptions, but you have to be able to recognize common inscriptions. Take a book and read it on the way.

“You can treat arrays as low-level inscriptions. They only need spiritual stones, and they’re easy to modify. They also aren’t as powerful as inscriptions. But while the functions and rules are different, the general principles are similar. There are no shortcuts in cultivation. You have to memorize.

“As for talismans, sword cultivators don’t often draw them. I’m sloppy about inscriptions. You take the Talisman Dictionary and copy from it when you need to use one. If you forget, look it up again. If it fails, then you haven’t succeeded in controlling your spiritual energy. Try a few more times, and you’ll learn. It’s easier to draw on talisman paper. When you’re more proficient, you can simply draw it out of nothing.

“Then there’s this. Catch.”

Hardly had Zhi Xiu spoken than all the hair stood up on the back of Xi Ping’s neck.

The next moment, a beam of sword energy came toward the center of his brow. Half of Flying Jade Peak began to tremble.

But that matchlessly scornful sword energy didn't harm him at all. It only entered the center of his brow and melted into his bones.

Xi Ping looked at his hand in surprise.

“Take this sword energy and join it with your bone qin. When you encounter danger, you can play it to bluff your way out. But a half-immortal doesn't have an essence, and the scant spiritual energy in the mortal world can't support ascended spirit sword energy. You need two white spirits every time you play it. Save up, don't strip all your family's mines.”

Xi Ping: “...”

This made even a cousin of Cui Ji go weak at the knees.

“I haven't handed back my token to leave the mountain yet. Take it and say I've sent you to investigate the remaining evil cultivators,” Zhi Xiu said.

“Shiyong...”

He seemed to have some other instructions, but in the end they dissolved into a sigh.

Jinping City was still in the dark. On Flying Jade Peak, the rising sun had already dyed the vast fields of snow red.

CHAPTER 38 - Demon Country (1)

The twenty-eighth year of Taiming had opened with the joyous occasion of Xuanyin's Grand Selection. No one had expected the auspicious air from the immortal mountains to dissipate so fast. It didn't even last until the year's end.

On the night of the eighth day of the twelfth month, a fire in the southern outskirts shook all levels of society. The dense smoke lingered for days.

The following night, in the cotton yarn factory that was the source of the fire, its primary owner hanged himself from a roof beam in his house. The words "blood calls for blood" were placed at his feet.

Two days later, the water transport department's Sun Yuqing was attacked outside the city on his way to pay respects to his ancestors. Though his guards risked their lives protecting him, Lord Sun was overwhelmed with fright and fell fatally ill. An explosive array was drawn on the outside of the Canal Office building. It failed—while burying jade stamp stones for the array, the evil cultivator was discovered by the Azure Dragon Towers. He blew himself up when Heaven's Design Pavilion arrived.

Discontented voices rose among the people. Evil ran wild. The walkers in the mortal world had more work than they could handle. Every branch of Heaven's Design Pavilion reported frequent injuries.

Emperor Taiming was furious. He indiscriminately threw several major figures in the Water Transport Department into prison, startling four peak masters of Xuanyin Mountain into sending a joint inquiry into the circumstances.

On the fifteenth day of the twelfth month, in a great court assembly, Emperor Taiming issued an order. Crown Prince Zhou Huan was to lead the inspection of the disaster of the snow wine; Prince Zhuang Zhou Ying was to make a thorough investigation of the exploitation of workers by factories along the canal, to leave the capital at once before the New Year.

When this order was given, even the Crown Prince and Prince Zhuang themselves were stunned. In a rare occurrence, the two of them looked at each other in dismay for a moment, both thinking: What is the old man doing? Testing us?

When the assembly broke up, Emperor Taiming said a few words of encouragement to the Crown Prince, then told him to go and consider a solution, leaving Prince Zhuang alone with him.

Prince Zhuang was unsurprised—the matter of the snow wine wasn't actually hard to investigate. There was no need for the Crown Prince to direct it; there would already be a scapegoat ready. All he needed to do was ready a feast and celebrate the New Year. But the waters were too deep at the Water Transport Office, never mind that His Majesty wasn't only aiming at the southern outskirts. He showed signs of wanting to go on campaign throughout the nation.

“There was snow fungus and pear soup cooked today, no? Go and bring lao-san a bowl,” Emperor Taiming instructed a eunuch. “Pick out the snow fungus. This kid is so picky, he won't eat it.”

“No need to trouble yourself,” Prince Zhuang said to Emperor Taiming, smiling. “At my age, I've ceased to be a picky eater.”

“Talking about your age in front of your father!” Emperor Taiming pointed at him. “What a disgrace!”

The emperor wasn't really angry, so Prince Zhuang apologized half-jokingly and waited for him to discuss the inspection tour of the south.

The old emperor's thunderous rage during the court session seemed to have been a mask. Leaving court, he took it off and once again became the kindly and amiable “old father.” He didn't mention serious business. For some reason, he talked to Prince Zhuang about family matters. After going on interminably about trifles, he finally mentioned Xi Ping.

“I hear that Zhengde’s kid caught General Zhi’s eye and entered the inner sect ahead of schedule?”

“Zhengde” was the Marquis of Yongning’s courtesy name. Prince Zhuang agreed. “No one expected it. My uncle’s family is overwhelmed with flattery, but also worried that being in the inner sect, with so little sense of the gravity of things, he will irritate the peak master.”

“General Zhi is famous for his good disposition. Of course he won’t argue with a junior.” The old emperor remembered something and added, smiling, “I remember that little rascal. When he was so little he couldn’t even walk properly yet, the first time I picked him up to have a look at him, he dared to pull my mustache. So bold... You can see the man in the child. I said then that he might have great fortune in the future.”

The eunuch offered the pear soup and silently withdrew. In the heated room kept spotless by the protection of inscriptions, only father and son remained.

From the bottom of his heart, Prince Zhuang didn’t want to talk to him about Xi Ping. He joined him in a laugh and changed the subject, but Emperor Taiming continued: “At first, you even wanted to remove him from the alternate roster. How fortunate that the immortal envoy wrote him back in by some coincidence. As I see it, General Zhi was already drawn to him by fate then.”

How did he know? Had the Zhao family given it away?

Prince Zhuang’s fingers stopped rubbing the porcelain bowl, but his expression didn’t waver by a hair. As if nothing were the matter, he said, “My grandmother is old and didn’t want to be separated from her grandson. My uncle also thought he was lazy and would never make anything of himself. He was afraid he would make trouble if he went to the immortal mountains. That’s why he asked me to think of a way to remove him from the roster.”

The old emperor watched him closely, the laugh lines deepening at the corners of his eyes. He said no more, only urged Prince Zhuang to eat the pear soup while it was hot.

Prince Zhuang ate two mouthfuls, then put the bowl down. “Imperial Father, about the inspection tour of the south...”

“There’s no rush. We’ll talk about that soon. First come and appraise this new painting I’ve put up.” Like a naughty child, Emperor Taiming excitedly called Prince Zhuang over to admire the painting with him.

Prince Zhuang could only be patient and comply.

For the New Year, in keeping with the occasion, a Welcoming Spring painting had been hung up in the heated room. This was an ancient painting, the style a little immature. It didn't look like the work of a master, but the use of color was very lively and bold. Though it had faded a little over the years, the child chasing a butterfly and the brilliant early spring still came through the paper vibrantly.

“Well, whose authentic work do you think this is?”

Great Wan's aesthetic was simple elegance and reserve. It didn't actually care for anything too flamboyant or showy.

Prince Zhuang saw that the signature was “Carefree Old Man” and felt that the artist was no older than fifteen. He thought, Is this child's scrawl worthy of being called an “authentic work”? Would anyone really bother imitating it?

“That's hard to say. It has a unique style. It seems to have something of the look of the south.”

So busy it made your eyes hurt.

“Wrong! This person is a born and bred Jinping figure,” the old emperor said, smiling. “I bet you wouldn’t think that this painting was left in the palace by Princess Duanrui in her youth.”

Prince Zhuang froze.

Princess Duanrui?

The Zhou family’s forebear in Xuanyin Mountain...the one who cultivated the way of clarity?

“According to legend, this forebear was lively and mischievous in her youth, very spoiled. She often dressed in male clothes and went out with her father and brothers, and was skilled in calligraphy and painting. When she was around ten, at the birthday feast of the Empress Dowager Ren’an, she glued on a mustache and disguised herself as an actor. She imitated the storytelling of marketplace performers and made the whole room fall over laughing. Only when the empress dowager asked her to present herself to be rewarded did she recognize her.”

For a time, Prince Zhuang suspected that the old man’s vision was going, and he had read the names wrong while reading a whole series of unofficial histories. He wasn’t in the mood to indulge in this idle chatter with the old codger, so he got the conversation back on the right track: “Indeed, I didn’t think it. Imperial Father, the inspection tour...”

But Emperor Taiming changed the subject back. He said, “She was like you. Innate spiritual bones.”

Prince Zhuang’s pupils contracted abruptly.

“Xuanyin Mountain permits the Zhou family to occupy the imperial throne, so they certainly won’t permit a shed skin cultivator surnamed Zhou. She had to enter the way of unfeeling and clarity. If she wants to go forward, she must become a plant without thought or self, entirely forget the name ‘Zhou Xueru.’ Otherwise, she can only allow herself to be tormented by endless trivialities, cultivate the way of clarity without finding clarity, go no further than the ascended spirit stage all her life...but she’s still a little more fortunate than you.” The emperor looked up at the childish painting and said, softly, “She only had innate spiritual bones. She wasn’t born with a paramount spiritual sense. She wasn’t as sensitive to the many distracting thoughts of those around her as you are, so she was able to have a happy and carefree childhood. She wasn’t as burdened as you.”

The heated room at once became deathly silent.

Prince Zhuang gently pulled back the corner of a piece of white paper sticking out of his sleeve and adopted a stance of “I don’t know what His Majesty my Imperial Father is raving about, but any bullshit the emperor says is right.”

“Enough, stop pretending. It’s been so many years—aren’t you tired? Only your mother would think you were 'sentimental and frail.' She doesn’t know anything.” The corners of Emperor Taiming’s mouth drew out in a strange smile. He waved a hand and allowed himself to appear elderly. “Ying, Our issue is six sons and five daughters, but none of them resembles Us...apart from you.”

Prince Zhuang stood upright and calmly responded, “That is my good fortune.”

Emperor Taiming asked, “Xi Ping is your uncle’s only son, and his entrance into the immortal sect would be a great benefit to you—so why would you want to prevent it?”

Prince Zhuang’s lashes like a crow’s plumage lowered. He was silent for a moment, then said, “Your Majesty presides over all; everything under heaven is a game piece for Your Majesty. I was born with nothing, and for over twenty years, I have had nothing but a few cats and dogs at my side. I am unwilling to take them out for show. This is inferior. Pardon me, Your Majesty.”

“It isn’t up to you, and it isn’t up to me, either. There is nothing humanity can do about fate.” The old emperor’s slightly clouded eyes were frighteningly bright. He sat sturdily and said, “We have ordered you to make an inspection tour of the south. Do you know what that means?”

“My wits are slow,” Prince Zhuang answered in a businesslike manner. “Please elaborate, Your Majesty.”

“We want you to spare no effort.” The old emperor tore away the clinging mask of the “old father” and grimly said, “Investigate those pot-bellied demons who fill iron furnaces with men, gut those animals with their bottomless greed, no matter who the master behind them is. Can you do that?”

Prince Zhuang answered, “I will strictly abide by Your Majesty’s orders and make a thorough investigation of this matter. I will await Your Majesty’s appraisal.”

Even if you cast me out, can you come out of it clean?

When the old emperor had made his big production over twenty years ago, he had reaped the benefits of the internal strife among the immortal mountains' thirty-six peaks. This time, Xuanyin Mountain wasn't about to give him tacit approval.

Emperor Taiming was silent for a moment, then said with emphasis, "The wound has already festered. The limb must be amputated to save the patient. Ying, We are giving you the knife."

Prince Zhuang frowned, not quite understanding what Emperor Taiming was getting at.

What, was His Majesty plotting a rebellion?

"The sky is about to fall. The Crown Prince is too kind and gentle. He...he can't shoulder this. Only you are ruthless enough."

Perhaps it was only because it was what he expected to see, but Prince Zhuang thought that there was madness in his Imperial Father's smile.

Emperor Taiming said, "The Xi family's boy has entered the immortal sect and joined the Dignitary of Fate High Elder's lineage. Princess Duanrui must have had a hand in this. Ying, the immortal sect has already chosen you."

Prince Zhuang thought, So what?

Supposing for the moment that Xuanyin really preferred him, could that bit of preference make them countenance this kind of provocation?

Had the old codger also been drinking the extra strength snow wine?

But Emperor Taiming said nothing more, only instructed, "You may leave. Do not disappoint Us... Remember to see your mother before you leave."

Only when the evening lanterns had been lit did Prince Zhuang leave Guangyun Palace. As soon as he got into his carriage, the inscriptions blocked the smoke and dust outside. Bai Ling, as a piece of paper, slipped out of the sleeve of his court dress. "Your Highness, His Majesty just now..."

"Don't fuss." Prince Zhuang waved a hand and pressed down hard on his temples. "Give me some quiet."

Bai Ling didn't make a sound. He took out a bottle of Spring Sunshine Pills and put it beside Prince Zhuang's hand, silently waiting on him.

The carriage drove slowly toward Prince Zhuang Manor. Outside the inscriptions there was a scattering of snow, like the ashes of the dead spread over the sky.

Prince Zhuang kept his eyes closed until they reached the manor. Before the carriage had come to a full stop, he heard a qin playing.

His brow, furrowed the whole way, relaxed. He asked, “Where is the music coming from?”

Bai Ling listened in. “It seems to be coming from the manor...”

Before he could finish, Prince Zhuang had already pushed open the door and nearly jumped out of the carriage.

Bai Ling flew up and stuck to his sleeve as paper. The servants were frightened, hastily following with an opened umbrella. “Your Highness, it’s snowing! Take care not to catch cold! Your Highness!”

Prince Zhuang walked rapidly into the courtyard. As soon as he looked up, he saw on the roof of the south study one man and one cat—a pair of enemies.

The big black cat was suspiciously circling the newcomer. It came close and sniffed at the hems of his robes. Probably it was thinking that he smelled familiar, but that there seemed to be something wrong.

And this person who had been parted from him for almost four seasons raised his head and smiled at Prince Zhuang. “San-ge, I’ve come to cadge a meal again!”

Just as if he had never left.

Prince Zhuang exhaled gently. His shoulders relaxed. He left the shadow he had brought back from Guangyun Palace at the door.

First he wanted to smile, but when the corners of his mouth had lifted halfway, he forced his expression to harden again. “You’ve spent most of a year in the immortal sect, and all you’ve learned is how to climb the roof and tear up the tiles? What a disgrace! Come down here at once!”

“All right!” Without warning, Xi Ping tucked the black cat under his arm. Accompanied by the cat’s scream, he jumped down from the rooftop holding it.

The black cat instantly remembered this fiend. Its new hatred combined with old enmity. Its fur stood on end, and it tried to claw Xi Ping’s face.

But the old enemy had changed. As if he were walking on air, Xi Ping's figure flashed, and he landed lightly behind Prince Zhuang. He stood on tiptoe and pulled a face at the black cat.

Prince Zhuang: "..."

Fine. It turned out that in the terrifying episode at the Latent Cultivation Temple, only other people's hearts had been terror-stricken; Xi Ping himself had no heart.

"Shifu sent me down from the mountain to take care of some stuff." Xi Ping walked into the study of Prince Zhuang Manor as if walking into his own home and familiarly brewed tea himself—the green jade cup he always used was still in its original place on the little tea tray. "I've just stopped by at home. I wasn't going to come see you so late at night, but I heard my dad say that His Majesty was sending you far away... Listen, is His Majesty your father or not? How can he order you around like this? He won't even let you stay to celebrate the New Year!"

Prince Zhuang could only wave a hand and send the servants away. He thought that General Zhi lived up to his reputation for having a good temper—he had spoiled this brat even more thoroughly!

Once the servants were gone, Xi Ping looked around and called a greeting to Prince Zhuang's sleeve: "Hello, secret guard-da-ge!"

Prince Zhuang froze.

Bai Ling, whose hiding place had been identified, could only float down and change to human form. He chattily said, "Viscount—Flying Jade Peak does indeed have a profound wealth of knowledge. You only opened your spiritual eyes half a year ago, and you've already surpassed most of Heaven's Design Pavilion."

Xi Ping said, "Of course."

Bai Ling: "..."

He didn't know how to respond to this.

Fortunately, Prince Zhuang came to his rescue. He asked, "Since when have you known that Bai Ling wasn't mortal?"

"I've known since I was little," Xi Ping said. "This secret guard-da-ge even taught me about inscriptions once. I felt that he was around most of the time, but before I couldn't hear him at all."

The paperman's concealment was exceptional. Bai Ling's psyche barely withstood the fact that he had been detected by a mortal. "How did you know that I was around? How did I give myself away?"

"You didn't," Xi Ping said. "I knew by looking at my san-ge's expression."

Prince Zhuang squeezed his teacup and softly asked, "Didn't you think it was strange that I would have a cultivator as my secret guard?"

Xi Ping looked at him in confusion, his expression plainly saying "What does it have to do with me?" "Oh, right, san-ge, let me show you something good."

"You..." Prince Zhuang saw what he had taken out and froze. It was a white jade ornament the size of a finger pad. Following the natural bit of green in the jade, it had been made into an openwork carving of a budding snow lotus.

Xi Ping didn't touch it with his hands. A little inexpertly, he used a layer of spiritual energy to take the white jade ornament out of his mustard seed and, beset by peril, placed it in Prince Zhuang's hand.

When the jade ornament touched him, the small snow lotus slowly opened. Prince Zhuang instantly felt a refreshing breeze sweep through his body.

The tight pain he'd felt in his chest for several days diminished considerably.

As if afraid of startling the flower, Bai Ling lowered his voice. "This is...the legendary Heart-Protecting Lotus carved by Master Lin Chi himself?"

"Yes. Shifu ordered me to take a few immortal tools from Flying Jade Peak before I left. I saw this and asked for it at once. This jade has been soaking up spiritual energy on Flying Jade Peak for over a hundred years. It's thoroughly marinated. Even without a cultivator to help it along, it's still enough for it to bloom for a hundred years. Carrying it on you dispels illness and avoids filth, wards off all poisons... Anyway, you could drink three jin of extra strength snow wine without any problem."

Prince Zhuang heard the words "snow wine." "Was it General Zhi who told you about what happened in the factory district in the southern outskirts?"

"Sure." Xi Ping nodded as if he wasn't too concerned about this matter. He changed the subject so quickly it was a little unnatural. He looked down and took out a thick stack of talismans. "There are also these... Oh, no, that's wrong."

He flipped through them and saw that the ones he'd drawn incorrectly had also gotten mixed in by accident. He pulled out more than half of them.

"Use the ones on top as much as you can, the ones on top are the good ones. The ones on the bottom all have some problems, but they'll still do something."

Bai Ling looked at them. "They're all talismans for avoiding contamination."

"That's the only one I've learned so far." Xi Ping grumbled, "My shifu isn't good at anything but the sword. He tossed a talisman dictionary at me and told me to look them up myself, as if you could look one up and learn it like an unfamiliar character in the *Shuowen Fiezi*²⁸. It's not that easy!"

Prince Zhuang squeezed the Heart-Protecting Lotus in his hand for a time. He seemed to be feeling faintly ill at ease. He said, "I have Bai Ling with me. I'm not short on talismans to use."

Without even thinking, Xi Ping said, "That's different. I drew these."

As if it was self-evident that talismans drawn by him were more meaningful than those drawn by someone else.

Prince Zhuang was speechless for a moment. He held his forehead and said, smiling, "What else have you learned? Go ahead and flaunt all of it."

“There’s also the qin,” Xi Ping said, flexing his finger. As if there was an invisible string, his finger made a clear and melodious sound.

Bai Ling said, “Flying Jade Peak truly does have a profound wealth of knowledge. What treasure is this? I haven’t heard of it.”

“This is a ‘bone qin.’” Xi Ping didn’t explain further. “San-ge, you probably haven’t been sleeping well the last few days. I’ll play a song for you.”

Prince Zhuang was afraid of his songs. He quickly said, “There’s no hurry. Let’s dine first. You can play when you’ve eaten.”

His original thought had been that Xi Ping would eat and drink his fill and forget about this matter, but it turned out that he had his heart set on performing today. Prince Zhuang didn’t know what General Zhi had been thinking giving him a qin. All he could do was put his ears at risk. He adjusted his posture and prepared to give his full attention to Mr. Yu Gan’s work.

But Xi Ping didn’t play one of his bewildering love songs. He sat and lightly moved his fingers, playing a “Spell of Lucidity and Calm.”

Prince Zhuang listened. This “bone qin” of his must have been an immortal tool used for healing. Its sound was mild and peaceful. It passed through the manor's courtyard walls, spreading far outward. Jackdaws and sparrows landed all over the wall outside the south study, and the black cat that hissed as soon as it saw Xi Ping had slipped in at some point, found a corner of the study, and curled up with its ears pricked up.

In the middle of the song, the playing paused for a moment. Bai Ling, who was practically about to enter meditation, came back to himself and saw Xi Ping raising a finger toward him.

At some point, Prince Zhuang had fallen asleep with his head propped on his hand, looking as if he had no cares at all.

Bai Ling quietly stepped up to place him on a small couch and cover him with a quilt.

The calming spell continued.

A-Xiang—Wei Chengxiang arrived in the ruins left by the fire in the southern outskirts near dawn. Starting from the former mouth of Rat Alley, she walked fifty paces south, lifted a burnt plank, and as she expected found a pouch.

The pouch was full of blue jade.

She bit through her finger and spilled blood on it. The blue jade in the pouch flashed and sank into the palm of her hand. Wei Chengxiang had a traveling bag on her back—inside were two memorial tablets, one reincarnation wood amulet, a stack of mixed grain flatbread, a handful of coins...and a Golden Tray lottery ticket for a lottery whose winner had yet to be announced.

Then she walked to the ferry crossing. A boat was waiting for her there.

There were already five or six raggedly dressed people crowded onto the boat, all in the prime of life, all left with nowhere to go after the fire in the southern outskirts. All their faces wore the same blank numbness.

The punter just happened to be the old beggar who had beaten a plank while singing in the ruins of the fire. He waved his pole, and ripples spread from the boat, as if he were taking the boat full of people over the Wangchuan River that separated mortals from ghosts.

After leaving the ferry crossing, they switched to a steamship. Someone came down from the steamship to welcome them.

Wei Chengxiang looked around and saw several similar boats stopped nearby. She knew that there was more than one boat worth of people who had been attracted by these evil cultivators.

The greeter who had come down from the steamship silently saluted each person on the boat. When Wei Chengxiang's turn came, the greeter met her eyes and involuntarily froze—it was as if a living person had been mixed in with the ghosts.

Wei Chengxiang smiled at him unwaveringly and took a step forward. Lowering her voice, she said, “The conflagration burns on, the cry of the cicada is without end.”

The greeter said in astonishment, “You're...”

“Before Old Mud died for the cause, he was negotiating the matter of the spiritual stones with my Tai Sui. Unexpectedly, the blue-clothesers burst in to arrest him.” Through her bundle, Wei Chengxiang tightly hugged the two memorial tablets. These tablets were her blood and soul.

“My number is sixty. Tai Sui has ordered me to travel with you to the tumultuous southern border.”

CHAPTER 39 - Demon Country (2)

On the seventeenth day of the twelfth month, Prince Zhuang went south.

His Third Highness's health was poor. He didn't normally leave the capital. No one was clear on what approach he would take. They only knew that sickly people generally came in two types: either they were frail and anxious from their illness, or they were fickle and disagreeable from their illness. They didn't know which type he was.

But soon they found that while Prince Zhuang had left in some hurry, he didn't proceed quickly. Before he had even left Jinping's city gate, his journey's itinerary had already been made public, giving everyone enough time to prepare.

Officials and merchants everywhere breathed a sigh of relief—Prince Zhuang was a decent person.

Decent was good. A decent prince meant that subordinates had the latitude to be proper; these two positive qualities would combine, and that would be to everyone's pleasure and satisfaction.

“As expected, the Crown Prince has started smoothing it all over.” The ship was rocking too hard. Prince Zhuang couldn't read, so he was having Bai

Ling read all the secret dispatches aloud to him. “His Majesty has made no indications.”

“I see.” Prince Zhuang nodded a little sluggishly. “That’s not unexpected.”

For some reason, in a rare occurrence, he couldn’t quite get his bearings.

Though there was hidden turbulence between Emperor Taiming and Xuanyin, there was also a delicate sort of tacit agreement that he couldn’t entirely get a handle on.

Zhou Ying was used to hiding behind the fog and seeing everything clearly. Now, pushed unexpectedly onto the stage, he had a faint sense of losing control.

Bai Ling checked his expression and changed the subject. He said, “The Viscount left the capital with Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s Commander Pang today. The Azure Dragon Towers have temporarily been handed over to Zhao Yu. They didn’t say what they were going to do.”

Prince Zhuang, who had been resting his eyes, opened them, considered, and said, “They’re probably going to the Land of Turmoil.”

“To investigate the Liang Chen business?” Bai Ling caught up. “Traveling with Commander Pang and under the notice of Flying Jade Peak, there shouldn’t be any danger on the way. But the Land of Turmoil can’t be compared to Great Wan. The Viscount will get experience.”

Prince Zhuang rubbed the center of his brow. “I don’t think that General Zhi sent him. What would be the point? Pang Wenchang holds a Heavenly Question. He could contact the master of Flying Jade Peak at need.”

Bai Ling said, “So...”

Prince Zhuang said, “He must have made a fuss about leaving the mountain to play.”

Bai Ling was about to say, “how could that be, what a disgrace,” but he soon remembered what an odd person the Viscount of Yongning was and swallowed his words—this was the kind of stunt he would pull.

“General Zhi became a sword cultivator beside the Sea of Stars and reached the ascended spirit stage in less than two centuries. His heart for the sword is stronger than iron and stone. I’m not sure Shiyong will be able to inherit his Way of the Heart. That kid takes cultivation as play, fooling around with magic tricks...” Prince Zhuang stopped talking and involuntarily grasped the snow lotus blooming at his neck. After a long moment, he sighed. “It will be a good thing for him to go there and see with his own eyes what becomes of the powerless.”

In the Land of Turmoil, a squadron of passenger steamships passed over a still river, humming, puffing out thick, rolling smoke.

The sides of the ships were inlaid with copper reliefs of all kinds of flowers surrounding two rows of cannons with the heads of beasts. Below were row upon row of fourth-class inscriptions. At a glance, it was clear these were government ships of Great Wan.

At mao hour two ke, before daybreak, the morning shift had begun to swap with the night shift. Each member of the crew wore armor. There was even a troop armed with hand cannons on the ships.

It turned out that these weren't ordinary government ships. They were Great Wan's border patrol headed to relieve the garrison in the Land of Turmoil.

After Southern He had been destroyed, it became the so-called “Land of Turmoil” and was split up by the four nations—mainly they divided up the spiritual stone mines. The demon-infested places had little oversight—the euphemistic name for this was “common rule.”

Each country had its area of jurisdiction, with its own courier stations and garrisons in that area to aid the transport of spiritual stones, make arrangements for their country's traveling merchants, and so on. Outside the areas of the spiritual stone mines, mortals who stayed here too long were likely to damage their health, so the garrisons used a rotating system. Great Wan relieved its garrison every two months.

While the Land of Turmoil was dangerous, it also had many priceless treasures, especially some exotic plants that were said to be able to invigorate yang, which were very popular among the idle rich in Jinping. Merchants who cared for money and not shame went in search of profit. They pulled in connections, then paid to get guest cabins with the garrison relief squadron, borrowing the garrison's ships. It was a little expensive, but at least it was safe.

But the end of the year was coming up, so there weren't many people going out on business. All the passengers traveling with the squadron were on a steamship at the end of the line.

At the beginning of mao hour, a light went on in the guest cabin in the furthest corner of the third deck.

A servant as light-footed as a leopard cat opened a window and let the morning wind in. He turned and looked at the bed, where his master was covering his head with a quilt. His expression became exasperated.

As though it was haunted, a scroll was floating in midair, constantly poking at the head under the covers.

The head wrapped in the quilt played dead up to the hilt, not moving no matter how much the scroll poked.

Refined methods had failed to get him up, so the scroll rose three chi and prepared to thrash him. The person on the bed seemed to be an experienced maggot; each time the scroll nearly hit him, he twisted away exactly the right amount.

The servant sighed, raised the bed curtain, and respectfully invited the scroll out.

A piece of paper fell out of the scroll. It was full of incomplete arrays. There was a line of small writing on it: A test on yesterday's lesson. Complete the arrays on the paper—Xi Yue, do not do it for him.

The servant—Xi Yue—held down the invisible dragon-taming chain on his neck and transmitted the test paper to the head of the maggot on the bed.

A moment later, a warm paw reached out of the covers, blindly felt around for a while, and grabbed Xi Yue's hem.

Good Yue-bao'er, do it for me, said Xi Ping.

Young master, said the half-puppet, this is your lesson. The peak master says I can't do it for you.

The young master stayed buried in the quilt, not answering. The hand clutching his hem swayed around.

Xi Yue refused righteously: The peak master will definitely punish you if he finds out. Get up, quick, young master!

The big maggot named Xi Ping, wrapped in the quilt, burrowed into the bed, indicating that just looking at arrays made him want to hurl. Beat him or kill him, he still wouldn't get up.

Xi Ping had left the mountain, but his lessons had pursued him relentlessly.

Zhi Xiu himself never slept, and he didn't let his disciple sleep. Every day around the start of mao hour, he would send him a small scroll. If he was a little slow to accept it, it would start beating him up.

The scroll explained his lesson for the day and included a test on what he had learned before.

Studying every day, taking a test every day—it was demented.

If he had known it would be like this, he would sooner have buried himself in Flying Jade Peak than made a fuss about leaving the mountain.

Xi Yue couldn't stand up to his wheedling. He could only obediently do the work for him.

His useless master, having succeeded in his evil scheme, stuck his head out, rolled over in satisfaction, and went back to sleep. He also had a beautiful dream: it would be good if Xi Yue learned to alter his own arrays in the future and Xi Ping didn't have to do anything himself. The half-puppet could become a grand master on his own.

Xi Yue remembered everything he saw. Though he hadn't completely learned to write yet, he was pretty fast at drawing arrays. In less than an incense stick, he had completed all the arrays on the test paper. But before he could put his brush down, a line of small writing appeared at the corner of the paper: Pour in spiritual energy.

Xi Yue: "..."

Oh, it needed spiritual energy, too. He couldn't pour in spiritual energy.

So the half-puppet went to Xi Ping with the test paper. Before he had come up to the bed, the even-tempered line of instructions disappeared and was replaced by a line of wild cursive: I knew it! Rebellious disciple!

Xi Yue's current puppet body hadn't yet reached a high enough level for him to be able to use spiritual energy like a cultivator, so he hadn't noticed the invisible array on the back of the test paper. It combined with the arrays he had completed. Because he hadn't promptly poured in spiritual energy to stop it, the array paper immediately went out of control in midair and rolled up into a paper sword. A beam of spiritual energy sliced toward the dreaming Xi Ping.

The half-puppet: "..."

Pang Jian, who was meditating, sensed spiritual energy flying around next door and knew that General Zhi was once again disciplining his disciple.

The matter of Tai Sui was still a secret, and they were going to the southern mines to deal with traitors. Therefore, Pang Jian had taken Xi Ping to Great Wan's border in secret, disguised as traveling merchants, and had gotten a place on a garrison relief ship—it had been mostly Pang Jian who was in disguise. Xi Ping could do what he wanted. No one knew him, anyway, and he didn't look like any kind of respectable person.

Though steamships traveled fast, it would still take a few days to cross the Land of Turmoil to get to Great Wan's mines. So every morning, Commander Pang got to observe a chaotic show.

The situation between teacher and disciple could be described as "evil advancing a zhang while good advances a chi." Their struggles were marvelous, well worth watching.

The spiritual energy in the paper sword had some magic power. It only chased after living things. When it touched the door, window, walls, or cabinets, it gently rebounded. The rebounding spiritual energy didn't disperse. As soon as it turned, it joined the force pursuing the rebellious disciple. The more Xi Ping dodged, the more it bounced; the more it bounced, the more there was.

Xi Ping, with his hair loose, was sent hopping and skipping by the room full of spiritual energy. He stroked his palm. A string like silk appeared in his hand and reached out like a snake's tongue, dispersing three or four beams of persistent spiritual energy at once.

This was one of the five immortal tools Xi Ping had picked out at Flying Jade Peak. It was called “spirit-winding silk.” It was bonelessly soft and slender as hair. A single strand of the thread was almost invisible to the naked eye. It didn’t hurt to be hit with, but it was specifically useful for breaking up spiritual energy.

Shizun had said that this thing was like an iron wire lockpick; it was useless just lying there, but when it fell into the hands of a master thief, it could become a magical weapon for housebreaking. It had many functions, which depended entirely on its owner. If the owner was no good, he wouldn’t even be able to hang himself with it; but if the owner was sensitive enough to spiritual energy and precise enough in his attacks, this open-eyed grade immortal tool could go pilfering spiritual energy in the midst of a battle involving established foundation cultivators or better.

Xi Ping obviously wasn’t very good yet. There was too much spiritual energy chasing him. A dabbler like him, who had just learned to fly a sword, hadn’t reached the level of a “master thief.” He was soon overwhelmed.

Pang Jian took pleasure in his misfortune, listening in from next door. Hearing occasional sucked in breaths, he knew Xi Ping was getting a beating and simply wanted to clap and exclaim “well done” in admiration—he’d never seen someone sleep in after opening their spiritual eyes; he deserved to be hit.

Xi Ping had been chased and beaten by the spiritual energy until his head swelled. Hearing a quiet laugh from next door, he was instantly filled with anger. He thought, Laughing at me? Just you wait.

He shook the spirit-winding silk, destroyed the beams of spiritual energy right in front of him, and took advantage of the gap to pull out another immortal tool—this was a decorative seal made of field-yellow stone, carved with “Hither and Yon,”²⁹ by an unknown artist. Xi Ping had taken a fancy to it as soon as he’d laid eyes on it.

His first thought had been to nickname this thing the “absconding stamp.” It was used like this: place a seal on Point 1; then, before the spiritual energy in the first seal had dispersed, place one at Point 2. As long as Points 1 and 2 were within one li of each other, this stamp could tie them together.

When Xi Ping had been going around observing the lay of the land yesterday, he had taken the opportunity to leave his Pang-shixiong a stamp.

“Since shixiong is so pleased...” Xi Ping leapt up nearly to the ceiling. The dense spiritual energy brushed past him, hit the wall, and doubled as it rebounded. He didn’t even look back as he landed. He stamped “Hither and Yon” on the wall.

The magic stamp took effect at once. The two rooms were instantly connected.

Xi Ping said, "Then you're welcome to share, hahaha!"

Pang Jian had just been "watching" the fire across the river, not expecting that he would be taken "across the river" by a stamp. The raging "spiritual energy arrows" came right toward him.

Damn it!

In a flash, Commander Pang showed that it wasn't for nothing that he was number one below the established foundation level. He retreated instantly behind the door and pulled out a sword.

The body of the sword hummed as it blocked the spiritual energy. The veins on the back of Pang Jian's hand stood out. He brandished the sword, and the spiritual energy coming toward him was rolled up. Spiritual essence from the sword cultivator of Flying Jade Peak had a natural affinity for the sword. It wound around the blade, coating it with petrifying frost, then disappeared.

Pang Jian took a deep breath and returned the sword to its sheath, then saw that at the place where the absconding stamp connected, that scoundrel Xi was grinning at him. “Morning, Pang-shixiong. My gift of peerless sword energy. No need to thank me!”

Hardly had he finished speaking when the stamp’s spiritual energy ran out and the two rooms each returned to its original position.

Pang Jian: “...”

That kid!

Commander Pang wasn’t going to put up with him. He put the stuff inside the room that had been disarranged by the spiritual energy back in place, rolled up his sleeves, walked through the wall next door, ready to take care of that little whelp.

Xi Ping had his outer robe draped over his shoulders and was having the half-puppet do his hair as he flipped through Zhi Xiu’s new lesson with a show of propriety. Seeing Pang Jian charge in, he didn’t panic one bit. He pushed the scroll forward and said, smiling, “Shifu told me to thank you for your help, Pang-shixiong.”

Pang Jian fixed his eyes on it and saw that the first line of General Zhi’s neat script on the scroll said: You have become familiar with the use of the Spirit-winding

Silk and Hither and Yon, so I have sent you the spiritual energy. If you are unable to handle it, you can go to your Pang-shixiong.

Pang Jian: "..."

Before Pang Jian could manage to put a smile on his murderous face, the ship came to an abrupt stop, and the water on the table splashed out.

Xi Ping deftly picked up the scroll. He heard a quiet roar.

It was not yet daybreak. The morning star hung alone, and there was still mist over both banks of the river. Xi Ping stuck his head out of the ship and saw an enormous figure in the depths of the morning mist, crossing the grand canal.

This giant creature was shaped like a pangolin, with a sharp head and a long tail, its back covered in golden scales. Its four limbs glided unhurriedly through the water. The part outside the water alone was practically the same height as the garrison relief ships!

A group of boats traveled alongside it, undulating as the creature raised ripples. The boats had special fog lamps on long poles that let out a gentle, milky light in the night, lighting up the giant creature's back, graceful as an unbroken mountain ridge.

Looking from the ship, this scene was like some bizarre dream.

Xi Ping heard people talking outside. Presumably it was the other passengers, startled by the sudden halt, coming out to ask what was happening.

A garrison relief soldier on board responded, “This is Shu’s encampment. You often encounter them herding spiritual beasts here. Our boat has fourth-class inscriptions bestowed by the immortal sect for expelling beasts and avoiding miasma. You’ll be all right as long as you don’t get too close.”

Shu’s state sect Lingyun was skilled in the arts of controlling beasts.

Xi Ping had gone with Cui Ji’s caravan to Shu’s capital, Zhaoye City, and all the “spiritual beasts” he had seen had been the size of ordinary cats and dogs. This was his first time seeing such a magnificent sight.

“You’re talking about pets for entertaining children that peddlers breed, with a drop of exotic animal blood. They aren’t ‘spiritual beasts,’” Pang Jian said after listening to him. “The dragon-taming chain comes from there and is used to control spiritual beasts. Think about it, do you need such a grand immortal tool to bind a cat or dog?”

A boy could be pleased for half a month after getting a good horse. There were few who didn't like exotic animals, and Xi Ping was no exception.

He nearly stuck his whole upper body out the window and asked Pang Jian a series of questions: "Pang-shixiong, what is that big spiritual beast called? It seems to be very docile, how smart is it? Can it reason? Actually, doesn't Shu have enough space? Why do they have to bring their spiritual beasts all the way over here to raise..."

Just then, the carefree and content creature turned its head toward him.

Xi Ping's eyes lit up, but before he could get a close look, the creature suddenly opened its bloody maw and snapped at a boat next to it!

Its mouth was full of sharp teeth more than a zhang high. A chilly gleam passed through the morning mist, and man and boat were eaten up in one bite. Xi Ping was taken unawares. His ears, covered in spiritual sense, instantly caught the sound of the big teeth piercing flesh and blood!

"It isn't that they don't have enough space." Amid the flesh-creeping chewing, Pang Jian stood by the window with his hands behind his back and calmly said, smiling, "It's that the 'manpower' in the Land of Turmoil is comparatively cheap."

Xi Ping caught up half a beat late. His hands abruptly tightened on the window lattice.

Pang Jian held him back by the shoulders. “We are in another country’s encampment, and this is a government ship of Great Wan. What are you doing?”

One light after another went on in the steamship’s guest cabins. In spite of the inscriptions, the soldiers on deck still quietly raised their hand cannons.

The spiritual beast, like a goat chewing on a leaf, unhurriedly finished eating the man, then continued swimming forward. The boats followed as before, as if nothing at all had happened just now.

Only when the fog lamps had gone far away did Great Wan’s steamship squadron blow a whistle and continue on its way.

“That spiritual beast is called the gold-armored zheng.³⁰ Every part of it is a treasure. Nearly half of protective immortal tools use its scales. Its flesh and blood can be used as medicine. It’s very costly,” Pang Jian said slowly.

“Actually, it isn’t especially violent. Apart from occasionally eating people, it’s all right in other ways. And it’s been two hundred years since Lancang was destroyed and Southern He was dissolved. The Turmoilers don’t especially count as people.”

Pang Jian let him go. “Welcome to Demon Country, young man.”

A beast’s roar startled awake Wei Chengxiang, who had fallen asleep not long ago. She opened her eyes, adjusted to the sunlight, then looked through the ragged carriage window at a colossus passing by in the distance. This big animal had golden armor on its back, glittering in the morning sun.

“That’s a gold-armored zheng. They’re raised in Shu’s encampment. There are many spiritual beasts in this area. Those animals spare no one when they go mad. Everyone take care,” a man said, then looked through the carriage window at Wei Chengxiang. He dragged away a corpse that had gone cold beside the carriage and nodded to her with a false smile. “The Indignant Cicadas have some tricks up their sleeves.”

Wei Chengxiang didn’t respond—she had a spiritual stone in her mouth.

The spiritual energy in this blue jade had already been exhausted, and the stone had turned to soft dust, shattering as soon as her tongue pressed down on it. She didn’t waste it, swallowing the stone dust. Then she reached out to touch the damaged array inside the carriage.

The “uncle” in the reincarnation wood had said that while she had made up her mind to follow these evil cultivators, she still couldn’t be the same as those nameless refugees. These evil cultivators swept people back and forth as if sweeping fallen leaves with a broom; if anything went wrong, they were sure to throw these people out to live or die as luck treated them. She had bought so many Golden Tray lottery tickets without winning a single copper coin, so where would she find the good fortune to save her life?

She had to pretend, pretend to have backing, to have accomplices, make it so no one knew what her actual situation was. If she didn't know what to say, she should say nothing at all, and if she really couldn't hold back, she could secretly talk to the reincarnation wood.

She was a "guest," not a believer. As expected, these evil cultivators who called themselves the Exonerators were fairly polite to her. On the ship, Wei Chengxiang had had a single-person cabin, and when they reached the shore in the Land of Turmoil, others slept in the open, while she had a carriage... There were quite a few arrays hidden inside the carriage.

From what Wei Chengxiang guessed, arrays were perhaps an independent branch of learning. At any rate, the uncle in the reincarnation wood called himself a "sword cultivator" and didn't especially understand these things, either.

When she'd gotten into the carriage last night, the uncle had spent half the night painstakingly going through a book before he had a rough understanding of what the arrays in the carriage actually were—there were ones to watch her and ones for attack. The latter hadn't been connected and activated; they were probably being kept in reserve just in case.

With so many “eyes” in the carriage, these evil cultivators would certainly test her. The uncle had asked whether she dared to modify the arrays in the carriage according to his instructions. A mortal who hadn't opened their spiritual eyes, even if they made an array, it would have limited effect. They could only use ready-made ones.

The uncle had said that with his weak foundation in arrays, he would simply tell her as he learned; he couldn't guarantee that the arrays would work. If he messed up, there would be no need for anyone else to act; he might blow her to bits along with the carriage.

“Why wouldn't I dare?” Wei Chengxiang thought.

Was there anything she wouldn't sacrifice?

In the middle of the night, the two of them, one talking and one acting, had reworked the arrays in a hair-raising process. Then Wei Chengxiang had clenched her teeth as though gambling with her life and put spiritual stones into the arrays.

Blue light quietly flowed through them. They didn't explode and kill her on the spot.

In the morning, the altered arrays broke and gave her two corpses. The spiritual stones the arrays had used had now gone into Wei Chengxiang's stomach.

Outside the carriage, several of the refugees sleeping in the open had died. It was said they had been ambushed by Turmoilers last night.

Wei Chengxiang didn't look closely at the two bodies that had died by her hand, and she didn't take the time to sob for her fellow travelers, whose lives were cheaper than dirt.

While the evil cultivator was removing the bodies, she made the most of her time, leaning against the carriage and conserving her strength.

She had dragged herself through another day.

CHAPTER 40 - Demon Country (3)

In the Land of Turmoil, corpses had to be dealt with as soon as possible, or else they would attract things unknown.

A few dozen Turmoilers corpses were piled up and dissolved using corpse-dissolving liquid. Nearly all of them had been killed by the three “Exonerators” leading the way.

The neither quite male nor quite female “Sixty” in the carriage hadn’t looked out all night.

The Turmoilers who had raided them were short and skinny, with deformed limbs, but they moved extremely fast. Each had a bladed weapon in hand and stabbed anyone they saw, like mad dogs. All the new believers had come from Great Wan. Great Wan was prosperous and well-ordered, and the locals were generally delicate. Where would they have seen lunatics like this? They had been stunned silly at first sight.

Last night, a few Exalted had risked their lives to protect them. But there had been too many monsters, and it was unavoidable that the Exalted would have too many things to attend to. They had let two monsters slip in. Before the new believers could get a clear look at what was happening, one of their companions was gutted. Though the terrified new believers were on average taller by a head and twice as strong as the Turmoilers, their first reaction had been to scatter. Someone had run out of the Exonerators' protective ring in a panic and had been bitten to death by the Turmoilers.

Those two Turmoilers, as if lured by something, had killed people on their way while heading straight for "Sixty"'s carriage. Some well-intentioned person was just about to call a warning when they saw that as soon as the Turmoilers approached the carriage, two rays of chilly light shot out of it, nailing the two ruthless monsters to the ground.

Quick and tidy. Even the Turmoilers were shaken to a standstill.

No wonder this "Sixty" had a carriage to ride in. What skills! Killing monsters more easily than killing chickens, all the while sleeping soundly in the carriage as people died.

At first, seeing that she was young and shy, people had approached her to start conversations. Having gone through this battle, the Exonerators' new believers all spontaneously kept away from her.

There was only one fellow named Zhang Da-lang who still had no reservations. He went over and knocked on the carriage, saying, "The Exalted want to take us to give our departed companions a send off. Are you coming?"

Wei Chengxiang quietly opened her eyes.

She remembered this Zhang Da-lang. He spoke with a Ling County accent, the county of her birth. He was loyal and warm-hearted. Even in this sorry state, he still spent all day fussing over people; the whole way, he had been trying to take care of practically everyone around him. He was a lot like her grandfather, who had always been sticking his nose into other people's business.

When she heard him speak, she dimly returned to her childhood, when her home hadn't been broken up and her grandfather had still been alive.

But she didn't answer. Zhang Da-lang knocked a few times, got no response, and went off on his own.

The Exonerators put the bodies of the new believers on some open land and held a simple funeral.

For each one of their companions who had died for the cause, Wei Chengxiang heard an Exonerator say who they were, what their name was, where their place of birth was, what regrets they had in the world and what cares. Then he led all the believers in reciting the deceased's regrets and cares with him two or three times. He knelt to adjust the posture of the body, spilled special perfumed water onto it, then said, “Go in peace. We will remember you.”

The scent floated on the wind. Wei Chengxiang warily soaked her sleeve and covered her nose and mouth.

She looked on with detachment. These new believers were at first panicked and dazed, on the point of collapse, but as they recited the gratitudes and resentments of others time after time, a resonance seemed to arise between the living and the dead. As if bewitched, accompanied by the perfume, they gradually entered some kind of inexpressible ambience of sorrow.

Supposing she hadn't known where the bottle of snow wine behind the big explosion in the southern outskirts factories had come from, she would nearly have been taken in as well. Which of these people who had never had a name could refuse the sense of belonging that came from having someone to recite your joys and sorrows?

Of the three Exonerators, two were currently taking spiritual stone powder; they were probably cultivating like her. There was also another one who'd kept his hood up the whole way, covering his face, occasionally flying on some object. He was evidently an open-eyed half-immortal.

She had seen the abilities of half-immortals with her own eyes. To a mortal, even if they weren't all-powerful, they were close enough. However monstrous the Turmoilers looked, in the end they were still human. A half-immortal could exterminate them with a wave of the hand. If not in order to test her, how could those Turmoilers have been allowed to slip by? As long as you weren't looking for a place to put your trust, you could have doubts in your heart. Another look at these people, and they were full of holes.

Indeed, as long as you didn't fool yourself, there was no need to be too smart.

The Land of Turmoil had been desolate for hundreds of years. Only traces remained of the public roads, with no one to look after them. They had been broken up by wildly growing trees. According to the old custom of Great Wan, the new believers sang the Soul Calling Melody in chorus.

Go to the West—go to the West—

Wei Chengxiang had another spiritual stone in her mouth. According to the methods her no-good shifu and the senior in the reincarnation wood had taught her, she entered meditation and frantically rammed spiritual energy into the mortal shell she had used for over a decade.

Every day earlier that she opened her spiritual eyes was a day earlier she could stop getting trampled on.

In the evening, Great Wan's garrison relief squadron took on provisions at the boundary between Southern Shu and Chu. There was a small dock there to put in at, belonging to Western Chu. There was a government post at the dock where you could come on shore and rest for a night. The garrison relief troops notified each ship in turn, telling the passengers that they must not leave the dock and the post, or they would be responsible for their own life and death.

Foreign posts didn't accept Great Wan's cash coins; it had to be gold or silver. A bowl of tasteless, rotten noodles you wouldn't pay five copper coins for, and they wanted to sell it for two liang of silver.

It was simply ridiculous. You wouldn't spend that much to buy a feast at the Phoenix's Perch Pavilion!

"If you won't eat it, there's nothing else, unless you've brought it yourself." An old trader who was traveling with them, being rather experienced, took out the dry provisions he had brought to soak them in water. "This is the Land of Turmoil."

Xi Ping asked, "Then what do the locals usually eat?"

The table went quiet. Pang Jian kicked him under the table. “Eat. Don’t ask stupid questions.”

Xi Ping: “...”

He immediately understood something. He looked at the noodles floating like corpses in the soup and found them even more unappetizing.

Just then, a sharp whistle came from a distance.

Knots of Great Wan garrison relief troops stood up throughout the post. Next, a spiritual beast’s roar sounded. There was a loud rumbling, and all the gas lamps in the station began to shake along with it!

Great Wan’s garrison relief ships issued an order, telling all the relief troops and passengers to board the ships at once.

All the inscriptions on the steamships lit up, the reflections making the copper relief flowers change color. Soldiers in full battle array stood ready beside the mouths of the beast-headed cannons.

“They say it’s coming from the Shu encampment’s spiritual beast pool,” Xi Ping heard someone say quietly. “Spiritual animals are the base materials for all immortal tools. There are always evil cultivators trying to steal them.”

“Such a major disturbance? How bold are the evil cultivators in the Land of Turmoil?”

“I heard that a ‘silk dragon’ just arrived.”

“Oh, no wonder...”

A silk dragon!

After encountering the gold-armored zheng in the morning, Xi Ping had borrowed a spiritual beast record from Pang Jian to read. Just before it got dark, he had read up to this type of spiritual beast.

It was said that this was a water-dwelling spiritual beast. Its horns, if ground up, could be used to treat dim sight disease.

An adult dragon could grow to over three zhang long, but its heart was only the size of a walnut. An adult silk dragon’s heart had the texture of stone or metal. Like a powerful cultivator’s essence, it could constantly absorb and store the spiritual energy in its surroundings. It was one of the essential components of the established foundation elixir. Each one was worth over ten thousand gold.

At the same time, it was a magical tool for “pilfering heaven’s order.” Using a silk dragon’s heart, you could pilfer heaven’s order and use it directly for powering downgraded immortal tools without expending a single spiritual stone. It was the beast of evil cultivators’ dreams.

“Go back to the ship,” Pang Jian said quietly, giving Xi Ping a push. “I’ll go have a look.”

Xi Ping didn’t catch on at first. “It’s another country’s encampment. What does it have to do with us?”

Having witnessed the scene of the spiritual beast grazing first thing in the morning, his slight positive impression of Zhaoye had completely evaporated. He was pleased to hear that the Shu were having bad luck.

Pang Jian glared and said sternly, “It is everyone’s duty to punish evildoers. Tsk, you’re so young. How can your views be so narrow?”

Xi Ping: “...”

For some reason, he sensed that under Pang-shixiong’s righteous expression, the look in his eyes was like that of a weasel that had caught a whiff of chicken. He didn't look like he was going to uphold justice; he looked like he was going to profit off of others' misfortunes.

A silk dragon's horn could treat dim sight disease...

Xi Ping grabbed Pang Jian. "No, shixiong, haven't you heard that you'll get diarrhea if you hoard all the good food for yourself?"

Pang Jian: "..."

"Xi Yue, go back to the ship and don't come out," Xi Ping instructed excitedly. Eagerly, he said, "Take me with you, Pang-shixiong."

Pang Jian gave him a strange look. "A mighty son of the nobility like you, don't you think it's beneath your station to go do this kind of petty pilfering with a bumpkin like me?"

Xi Ping didn't think so at all. He thought that Pang-shixiong's lack of bother about trifles was very manly.

"Fine. Did you bring any tools for disguising yourself?"

Xi Ping did in fact have one. Apart from the heart-protecting lotus, the spirit-winding silk, and the hither seal, the fourth immortal tool he had brought was called the “thousand old skins”—it was a mask that, as its name implied, changed your appearance into that of an old man. What this open-eyed grade immortal tool covered wasn’t only your name; it could also change your aura and spiritual image. Established foundation cultivators and below couldn’t see through it.

Under cover of night, two figures crossed the border between Chu and Shu, flying on swords in the direction of the spiritual beast pool in the Shu encampment.

On the way to the Latent Cultivation Temple, Xi Ping had already discovered that Pang Jian, a rather steady person when walking on the ground, seemed to become possessed as soon as he stepped onto a sword. He turned into a white stripe on the waves.³¹

He swiftly rode the wind, fast as lightning, not waiting for his little shidi who had just left the cottage.

In no time at all, Xi Ping, who had learned to fly a sword not long ago, had fallen behind.

Xi Ping cursed silently. He was just struggling to discern direction when Pang Jian descended from the heavens and jeered, “Hey, listen, how come you fly a sword like a fine lady walks? Will your face powder come off if you mince too fast or something?”

Then he once again deliberately shook him off, leaping up like a runaway horse.

Xi Ping: “...”

In fact, he felt that his skills were imperfect, and he was very ashamed, but he also felt too embarrassed to ask his shixiong to wait for him. So what could he do?

He could only strive to follow. At the same time, he got out the spirit-winding silk and lightly tossed it.

The spirit-winding silk was faster than a sword. It silently caught up to the sword at Pang Jian’s feet and abruptly twisted downward!

Most of the spiritual energy in the sword at Pang Jian’s feet was instantly twisted off. Before his self-satisfied smile could fade, he had gone plummeting along with his sword.

Pang Jian quickly held a breath, bent almost double in midair, flipped over and grasped the sword hilt, threw off the spirit-winding silk, and when he had fallen nearly to a zhang above the ground, he was once again steady on the sword.

Xi Ping said, “Beautiful! Nicely done!”

Pang Jian: “...”

Little bastard!

Just then, as if sensing something, Xi Ping quickly turned his head and saw a faint bonfire in the thick forest.

“Traveling traders.” Pang Jian caught up and looked in the same direction as him. “The ones with connections travel by ship, the ones without connections run a risk.”

Xi Ping frowned—he had sensed Wei Chengxiang’s reincarnation wood.

So those so-called “Exonerators” had come here.

Strange. Not far ahead was the Chu encampment. Despite their price-gouging, at least they didn’t have man-eating spiritual beasts running around all over the place. Why did these people want to sleep in the open in a spiritual beast pasture?

Weren't they worried about becoming fodder?

Meanwhile, Wei Chengxiang's throat had gone dry.

When the whistle had startled her, she'd had a bit of an ominous feeling. Then she heard someone knock on the outside of the carriage window a few times. The open-eyed Exonerator said softly, "Miss Sixty, your sect is paying a call on the Shu encampment tonight. Why didn't you give us word ahead of time? How distant you're being. If we hadn't seen the mark of your Indignant Cicadas, we would have missed it. May I venture to inquire who has come tonight?"

What was the mark of the Indignant Cicadas?

Wei Chengxiang slowly reached for the reincarnation wood. Uncle, it's over, I've run into real ghosts while playing at being a ghost!

Xi Ping had just landed along with Pang Jian in the woods beside the spiritual beast pool. He let his mind wander and stepped on something soft.

His spiritual sense felt danger at once. There was no time to react. Coming to a rapid decision, without even turning his head, he jumped toward Pang Jian.

Pang Jian cut toward him backhanded. Xi Ping lowered his head and passed below the edge of the sword and only looked back when he had rushed over a zhang away. He saw that Pang Jian's sword had pierced through an animal four or five chi long.

“Lurking zheng,” Pang Jian said. “Excels in ambush and concealment, moves as fast as lightning, claws that can pluck out a person's heart. Pretty quick reaction, kid.”

Saying so, he pulled out a talisman gun and casually shot a stealth talisman at himself and Xi Ping. Their figures immediately blended with the surroundings. “Come on. Stay on your sword, and don't touch anything in the woods.”

Xi Ping split his attention, flying his sword after him as he glanced at the distant fire, narrowing his eyes. He told Wei Chengxiang, Wait. We're going to take care of the real ghosts.

CHAPTER 41 - Demon Country (4)

Wei Chengxiang swallowed a mouthful of saliva, and a thought slipped through her mind—what did that mean? Who was going to take care of whom? Was the nameless “divinity” in the reincarnation wood really nearby? Who was he, anyway? Could he be relied upon?

The Exonerator was waiting outside. There was no time for much thought. She asked, “What should I say?”

Xi Ping didn’t even think about it. “Say they’re fake.”

Wei Chengxiang gave a start. “Is that true? How can you tell they’re fake?”

Xi Ping said matter-of-factly, “You’re real, so naturally they’re fake.”

Wei Chengxiang: “...”

No, wait, senior, aren’t you going a little too far?

You’re a fake who’s run into the real thing, and not only are you not thinking about how to stay away, you also want to seize the nest for yourself! And you assert that they’re fake as if justice is on your side! Who gave you the self-confidence?!

Wei Chengxiang urgently said, “But what if they see through me?”

“They haven’t seen through you yet,” said Xi Ping. “We’ll talk about it when they do. At worst you can smear them as traitors.”

“Miss Sixty?”

The sound of the knocking on the carriage was as persistent as an ulcer on the bone. In her anxiety, with her head full of “real or fake,” Wei Chengxiang blurted out, “Fake.”

The Exonerator was stunned. “Fake?”

Wei Chengxiang: “...”

She was done for. How could she have said it just like that?

But at this point...there was no help for it.

The young girl made a desperate resolution: let whatever the fuck happened happen. She had already gone from a female worker in Jinping’s southern outskirts to a ghost in the Land of Turmoil. It was ten thousand li too far—was this one extra li any worse?

“The mark is fake.” She licked her lips and heard herself say in an extraordinarily calm voice, “I have not heard that Tai Sui directed an operation for tonight. These must be imposters.”

She paused. Then fortune seemed to bless her wits, and she outperformed herself: “The true god hides, the demons run wild. Anyone at all will dare to go about as an imposter now. They go too far. I will be sure to notify my companions of this.”

Through the fire and chaos, Xi Ping praised her from afar.

He and Pang Jian were hiding high up and looking down on a panoramic view of the Shu encampment’s huge spiritual beast pool—the spiritual beast pool was perhaps as big as Ning’an’s famous Longevity Lake and showed clear traces of being manmade. A long corridor led to a pavilion in the center of the pool that had long fallen out of repair. While it was dilapidated, the elegance of the carved railings still remained.

Mist curled in the center of the pool, making the figures of the enormous spiritual beasts appear indistinctly. Roars like an elephant’s and also like a lion or tiger’s undulated along with the waves.

A spiritual beast whose whole body was white as the moon was wrapped in a big net and struggling nonstop. At a glance, it looked like a python that had eaten too many blue jades, but on its head were two azure horns.

Two groups of cultivators flew high and low, battling fiercely.

One side had their faces covered and were dressed in black; these must have been the evil cultivators who had come to do some illegal fishing. The others hadn't concealed their faces and all wore Shu-style clothing with tight sleeves and pant legs; these were presumably the spiritual beast herders.

Pang Jian heard Xi Ping grumble that he "couldn't tell who was who," then saw him take a pair of glasses from his mustard seed... Actually, they were pretty well suited to his current vulgar old man disguise.

Looking at them made Pang Jian's eyes hurt. He asked, "And what the hell are those?"

Xi Ping said, "These are called unseen glasses. When I put them on, for anyone below an established foundation cultivator, as long as their cultivation isn't higher than mine, no matter how they're disguised, I can see the true name on their spiritual image."

Pang Jian was bewildered. Why do you need to look at their true names? he thought. Are you going to set up a marriage interview?

Only now that he was close up did he find that the sword at Xi Ping's feet wasn't any kind of immortal tool. It was purely decorative. The sheath was covered in completely unnecessary carvings and set with a pair of precious stones that Lao Pang couldn't identify. On the hilt, a sumptuous brocade carp indicated this object's nature—this sheath was men's "jewelry" made by Cui Ji.

Paired with Xi Ping's current appearance, it made him look like a sly old lecher.

As for the "pulp" inside the sheath, it was probably a piece of scrap metal that had been thrown in for free.

"What did you bring from Flying Jade Peak?" Pang Jian couldn't resist saying. "Is there anything decent?"

"I brought a piece made by Lin Chi-shishu," said Xi Ping.

"Where is it?" said Pang Jian.

"It's for treating illness. I'm not sick. I gave it away."

Pang Jian: "..."

"I did want to take some awe-inspiring precious sword or bow." Xi Ping sighed in exasperation. "But immortal tools have their own properties. Each and every one has such a temper. After I took the spirit-winding silk and the abscond...the hither seal, all the immortal tools on Flying Jade Peak avoided me. What could I do?"

Saying so, he put on the unseen glasses. "You always have to make choices in life...huh?"

Wei Chengxiang's racing heart was about to break her ribs, but she didn't dare to gasp for air and spoil her "lofty" image. After talking nonsense, she had to hold back and keep her face expressionless.

The open-eyed Exonerator drawled a long ah and said, "So that's what happened. Even I was taken in by them. If not for that, we would have been camping in the Chu encampment tonight."

Wei Chengxiang carefully exhaled.

It seemed she'd muddled through...

“No need to be angry, Miss Sixty,” the Exonerator said, smiling. “I’ll contact your companions in your stead.”

What?!

Wei Chengxiang’s heart stuck between two ribs.

“It’s a funny coincidence,” the Exonerator said slowly. “I traveled through the south in my early years and got to know an ‘Indignant Cicada.’ Though our beliefs are different, our goals are identical. We’ve stayed in contact. This friend is still in the south now, waiting to hear from me.”

Perhaps because she had been eating spiritual stone powder lately, Wei Chengxiang’s senses had become considerably more acute than before. Through the carriage, she clearly heard the sounds of the Exonerator folding a piece of paper, and the paper flying away.

Cold sweat soaked the back of her clothes.

One of the spiritual beast herding cultivators used some kind of magic power. A bolt of lightning fell from the clear sky.

Xi Ping pulled the unseen glasses down the bridge of his nose, looked out over the frames, then looked through the glasses again.

“My mouth is truly magic,” he thought. “These people really are fake evil cultivators!”

The reason Xi Ping had taken the unseen glasses was so he could investigate Tai Sui’s remaining followers in the south—he didn’t know any of them. Even if he removed shifu’s mind-clearing spell, he could still only hear a babble of voices. He couldn’t tell who was who. If one of the remaining followers came and personally danced around in front of him, he still wouldn’t necessarily be able to recognize them.

Not unless Xi Ping could concretely identify that person.

It was like his shifu using the Bell of Tribulation against Liang Chen—by finding the true name on his spiritual image.

Many evil cultivators had disfigured faces; their own parents wouldn’t necessarily recognize them. They also used aliases and code names among themselves. If he wanted to know their true names quickly, with his current level of cultivation experience, he had to rely on an immortal tool.

Xi Ping had glanced over and seen the true names of the black-clothed people who were stealing spiritual beasts. But when he tried to fix on these people with reincarnation wood, he found that there were no such people recorded in it!

Even more bizarrely, there was one person among the black-clothed people whose name didn't appear in full; there was only a blurry "Lin" character.

If he couldn't see this person's true name with the glasses, it meant that their cultivation was higher than his...but there was one character, at least, so the difference wasn't much. It was just a little higher.

"Pang-shixiong." Xi Ping tugged at Pang Jian and handed over the unseen glasses. "Can you see for me what the name of the black-clothed person leading the others is? That person has higher cultivation than me, I can only see his surname."

Pang Jian was just considering how to reap the benefits from this fight. He took the glasses and casually put them on. His pupils contracted sharply.

Xi Ping sensed his relaxed body tense and couldn't resist giving him a questioning look.

Pang Jian was startled and concerned. He automatically took off the glasses and inspected them, suspecting that these things were broken.

He was startled and concerned on two points: first, for the person Xi Ping had pointed out, he could also only see the character “Lin,” so this person was likely an established foundation cultivator. Pang Jian himself was only one reception order from the inner sect away from an established foundation, so it wasn’t surprising that he would be able to see an established foundation cultivator’s surname while wearing a superior open-eyed immortal tool. But wasn’t Xi Ping a young disciple who had only started cultivating half a year ago?

Second, among the names he could see, there were many he recognized... If he recalled correctly, these people were mine supervisors from the southern mines!

Pang Jian’s first thought was: could these be the evil cultivator traitors from the mines?

But he didn’t say anything.

Pang Jian turned his head and looked at Xi Ping through the unseen glasses—he could see Xi Ping’s name, but it was very blurry. Only half of the character “Ping” appeared. “What level is your cultivation at?”

Xi Ping raised his eyebrows, catching up with startling speed. “So you also can’t see that Lin person’s full name? Is he really an established foundation cultivator?”

Pang Jian was astonished. “Do you really have innate spiritual bones?”

Xi Ping met his eyes for a moment. Without blinking, he said, “Sure.”

Hearing this, Pang Jian truly wished to indulge in some chest-beating and foot-stomping—the chest he wanted to beat was Xi Ping’s.

No wonder such an unreliable person could be accepted by Flying Jade Peak without even studying for a full year in the Latent Cultivation Temple!

No wonder General Zhi had dared to let him leave the mountains and run around when he couldn’t even fly a sword properly!

Innate spiritual bones! Innate spiritual bones that would give you the cultivation level of someone who had worked for a hundred years as soon as you opened your spiritual eyes!

They might not appear once in a thousand years. How could this wretch have been born with them? Where was divine justice?!

Xi Ping watched his face change color and played it up even more. He casually gloated, “When I just entered the Latent Cultivation Temple, Luoshixiong judged that I had a first-class spiritual sense.”

“Bullshit!” Pang Jian said. “With innate spiritual bones and a first-class spiritual sense together, if you didn’t become a demon, how could a mortal body withstand it? If you’d really had both, you would have died in your mother’s womb twenty years ago and wouldn’t be here now to show off!”

Xi Ping was shameless, anyway. Having overdone his gloating, he brushed over it with a smile and asked, “Shixiong, can’t established foundation cultivators ‘pilfer heaven’s order’? Why would he need to steal a silk dragon’s heart?”

Pang Jian was silent for a moment, then said, frowning, “I think there are deep waters here. You can stop thinking about taking this opportunity to scrounge something—keep away from the established foundation cultivator. Don’t think that having spiritual bones means you’re half a step from an established foundation. The difference between established foundation and open-eyed is like the difference between heaven and earth.”

Xi Ping was very agreeable. “Yes, whatever you say.”

“Lend me the glasses,” said Pang Jian. “Look after yourself. Wait here and don’t mess around. I’ll go over and have a look.”

The established foundation cultivator surnamed Lin hadn't even gone all out, and the battle in the spiritual beast pool had already gone in favor of one side—Shu's spiritual beast herding cultivators clearly couldn't compare.

The whole Lingyun Sect focused on taming beasts, and the outer sect cultivators were the same. On the battlefield, the better part of their fighting force relied on spiritual beasts. Now, something had gone wrong with the spiritual beasts in the pool. Each and every one was looking sickly, unable to even walk straight.

Only when Pang Jian came close did he find that the roars seemed more like cries of woe.

Evidently, these black-clothed people had some weapon or drug for subduing spiritual beasts... Pang Jian knew of a few types, but they were all wildly expensive—if they could subdue spiritual beasts, then naturally they were more expensive than the spiritual beasts themselves.

So the question was, if they could get something so expensive, then why would these rich and overbearing black-clothed people come here to steal a few spiritual beasts?

Wasn't this like using a golden net to catch river crabs?

Moreover, since they could control spiritual beasts, why hadn't they come quietly, taken what they wanted, and left? Why did they have to kick up such a big fuss?

Looking through the unseen glasses, Pang Jian's eyes once again fell on those familiar names.

The waves in his mind had calmed. He considered it carefully and only thought that this matter was increasingly odd: assuming that these people really were the cultivators he knew from the mines, they would also all be nobility. How could they associate with destitute evil cultivators? That didn't make sense.

Just then, a Shu cultivator missed his footing and fell into the spiritual beast pool. A spiritual beast wearing a dragon-taming chain was so dizzy that it actually took a swipe at the cultivator with its tail. A chilly gleam flashed over the dragon-taming chain. The cultivator flew away, and the beast let out a dying wail.

Seeing that things were going badly, the Shu cultivators blew another long whistle.

The whistle circled in the air over the encampment. Dozens of figures arrived on swords. After landing, they quickly formed an array.

The established foundation cultivator surnamed Lin gave a long cry and stopped holding back. The net that had been holding the silk dragon suddenly expanded, as if it wanted to scoop up the whole spiritual beast pool.

Pang Jian hid nearby and counted the Shu cultivators: thirty-seven, thirty-eight...

How many cultivators could there be in the whole spiritual beast pasture?

He understood: these black-clothed “evil cultivators” hadn’t come to steal spiritual beasts. They had come to make a commotion and gather together all the Shu cultivators in the spiritual beast pasture.

Luring them away to attack their base?

Wei Chengxiang leaned against the carriage, nearly collapsing, and seized the reincarnation wood. “Uncle, this Exonerator actually knows one of the Indignant Cicada evil cultivators. I’m going to be exposed!”

Xi Ping was just sitting cross-legged on his precious sword, narrowing his eyes and wondering why Pang Jian had borrowed his unseen glasses. He himself had the hidden bones left by Tai Sui and needed them to see the true names of Tai Sui's remaining followers.

So what had Pang-shixiong wanted to look at when he borrowed the glasses?

From his reaction just now, there were certainly names he recognized among the black-clothed evil cultivators.

Then there was the established foundation cultivator whose name he couldn't see clearly...surnamed Lin. That was one of Xuanyin's great surnames.

Could it be...?

Xi Ping said to Wei Chengxiang, "You won't be exposed. These evil cultivators really are imposters."

"If you know that, why didn't you say so earlier? I was scared to death..."

Wei Chengxiang grumbled. Then she quickly said, "No time for that now. Uncle, the Indignant Cicada he's in contact with wants to see me!"

Xi Ping said, "Nothing strange about that. 'Tai Sui' has kept silent for half a year, so they've all turned into headless flies. You've suddenly appeared saying you've received orders from Tai Sui, so naturally they want to come interrogate you."

"Should I see him?" said Wei Chengxiang.

"Can you run?" said Xi Ping.

"No, the Exonerator watching me is an open-eyed cultivator."

"Then what the hell are you talking about? See him," Xi Ping said. "Hang the reincarnation wood around your neck. I'll keep an eye out for you."

He had conspired at the death of Tai Sui himself, so what did his remaining subordinates count for? The young master was open to all comers.

Wei Chengxiang felt that this senior was sometimes reliable, sometimes not—it had taken him ages to get a single sentence out when he was teaching her how to alter the arrays, as if he were having birthing pains, and he had kept getting flustered. He had nearly scared her to death. When urging her to join him in deception, his voice was as strong as if he had been doing this all his life.

She focused, hung the reincarnation wood around her neck, and got out of the carriage.

The Exonerator had already drawn an array on the ground and placed a jade stamp spiritual stone at each of the four corners. In the middle of the array, which flashed green, a very ordinary man's face appeared. He had the kind of features you would forget as soon as you saw them. This was a common means of disguise for cultivators concealing their faces.

The man greeted: "The conflagration burns on, the cry of the cicada is without end."

Wei Chengxiang cleared her dry throat. "Better to die in frost than to forsake one's convictions."

"My code name is One." The man looked A-Xiang over, seemed astonished by her age, and quickly said, "Little Sister Sixty, may I ask who your teacher is?"

So this was the "Wuchang³² One" she had heard of.

Wei Chengxiang lifted her chin and clenched her fists to prevent anyone from seeing that her hands were shaking. As Xi Ping had instructed her, she proudly said, "I have no teacher, although Grand Duke Tai Sui once ordered Mr. Two to look after me for a while, so you could say he initiated me."

Mr. Two had long since gone to see the kings of the underworld with his birdcage; a dead man couldn't testify. Wuchang One said, "So it was him—you say that Tai Sui contacted you. Is that true? Is he doing well?"

Wei Chengxiang said, with a cold smile, "Thank you for your concern. He isn't doing very well. He has ordered me to ask you for enlightenment: he left so important a stronghold as the southern mines in your hands, and is this how you all go about your business? Why are Xuanyin's lackeys from the mines making a sneak attack on Southern Shu's spiritual beast pasture tonight under our name?"

The Exonerator maintaining the array was stunned when he heard this. He thought, Those "fake cicadas" attacking the spiritual beast pool were from the Great Wan mines?

There truly was an oddity every year, and this year there were especially many... Court-appointed officials dressing up as "evil cultivators" and going to a neighboring country's pasture to pilfer!

Wait. This little girl had been in the carriage the whole time, not even sticking her head out. How did she know? As expected, the Indignant Cicadas' mysterious Tai Sui had cunning means.

After hearing this, Wuchang One was in fact startled. He had no more attention to spare for doubting Wei Chengxiang's identity. He blurted out, "Shix... Tai Sui, they're looking for 'that place'!"

Xi Ping rubbed his chin.

Interesting—he'd worked it out. Those fake evil cultivators really were their own people.

Where was "that place"?

Apart from putting together a group of believers in the southern mines, had Liang Chen also turned traitor to a foreign nation and made illicit transfers with Shu?

Then there was this Wuchang One...the first of Tai Sui's believers. He was indeed different from the others. He seemed to know Liang Chen's true identity.

Wuchang One knew that he had been indiscreet. He looked quickly at the Exonerator and went on, "Half a year ago, many of our brothers were exposed, and those people took over the old contact signals for their own use. Of course the lackeys couldn't make a night raid on Southern Shu in the name of Xuanyin's outer sect. Presumably they thought passing themselves off as us would be safest..."

"No." While A-Xiang was inwardly quaking, mentally pursuing Xi Ping and howling "Senior, have you gone mad?" three times over, she still said, as Xi Ping had instructed her to say, "Heaven's Design Pavilion has kept the truth closely concealed, so it's normal that you wouldn't know. Jinping's wolf dog...has already seen my true body."

Wuchang One's expression instantly let Xi Ping know that he not only knew what Liang Chen's true identity was, he also knew what condition Liang Chen's "true body" was in.

Next, this "Mr. One" closely examined Wei Chengxiang's physical appearance and suddenly "understood" something.

He lowered his voice and said, "So Tai Sui is now...here with us?"

Wei Chengxiang nodded, her expression steady. "That's right."

Inwardly, she asked, "What does he mean?"

Xi Ping calmly said, "He thinks that rotten old man Tai Sui is possessing you. You won't have to dig out arrays in the middle of the night anymore.

Better get ready to enjoy the evil god treatment.”

“What?!”

Then she heard Wuchang One say to the Exonerator, “Miss Sixty is a holy woman of my sect. Thank you, Brother Exonerator, for escorting her here. I’ll send someone to receive you at once.”

Having finished persecuting the evil cultivators, Xi Ping turned his head to look at the spiritual beast pool, which was nearly boiling. He was still hung up on the silk dragon horn. His eyes spun, and his troublemaking heart said: Since these are shixions from Xuanyin’s outer sect, then they shouldn’t have any objection to me coming along for the ride and picking up a souvenir, right?

He had come all this way.

CHAPTER 42 - Demon Country (5)

Xi Ping searched around inside the mustard seed he was carrying and turned up a set of stealth clothes. He had taken along a complete assortment of all kinds of clothing. Never mind long robes and sets of jacket and pants, he had beggar's clothes and stealth clothes, all you could want of each country's distinctive apparel...and he had even brought burial robes; it was anyone's guess what occasion he was planning to wear them to.

He put on the stealth clothes, covering up the white hair and wrinkled skin, making himself look about the same as the group of black-clothed people below.

Xi Ping considered further, put away his flashy sword, and, preparing for any eventuality, stamped a "Hither and Yon" on the back of a big tree—if things didn't go well, he could slip away in time.

Then he felt he was absolutely safe. Excitedly stepping on a tree branch, he passed out through the thick forest, rushing toward the spiritual beast pool.

He had just caught up with the number one Indignant Cicada believer, made up a "holy woman" out of nowhere and convinced them to invite her in, and now he was going to impersonate the black-clothed people who were impersonating the Indignant Cicadas—it was too stimulating.

In the future, when he had become powerful and eliminated the evil cultivators, he would have to write an elaborate record of this story so later generations could sing its praises far and wide.

Xi Ping, beside himself with self-satisfaction, flew away and didn't see that in the place where he had just stamped a spiritual seal, the branches began to move on their own without a wind. Shortly, a little spiritual beast in the form of a lizard gradually appeared.

The little spiritual beast had just seen someone sneakily leaving something on the tree and crawled over curiously to investigate. It didn't find anything. It was a little suspicious and reached out its paw to scratch the tree trunk. This little thing was clearly only palm-sized and looked adorable, but when it extended its paw, a half-chi nail popped out of it, like a sharp blade, cutting a nick over a cun long into the tree trunk!

The spiritual seal immediately leaked spiritual energy and was sucked up by the spiritual beast's long extended tongue. The seal script characters of "Hither and Yon" flickered on the tree trunk, then vanished.

The spiritual beast let out a satisfied burp.

Xi Ping didn't know yet that a "lizard" had made off with his retreat. He had already made his way to the edge of the spiritual beast pool.

The two groups of cultivators had sent the water in the spiritual beast pool boiling high. A stench assaulted the nose. A black-clothed person had just been brought down by the Shu cultivators' talismans and was about to fall onto an array beside the spiritual beast pool.

Xi Ping's spirit-winding silk quietly left his hand and hooked the array lightly. The unimpeded spiritual energy in the array instantly went astray, breaking the jade stamps next to it and ruining the array.

Xi Ping picked the right moment to step forward. He lightly borrowed power from the ruined array, reached out to scoop up the injured black-clothed person, and quietly said, "Careful, shixiong."

The black-clothed person heard his pure West Jinping accent and, in the dark, didn't suspect him for a moment. He only said, "Thank you, go help out at the kan position of the array."

Xi Ping thought, All right, no problem.

Like a swimming fish, he took his chance and joined the battle, blending into the group of black-clothed people without a trace.

Putting on a show, he casually loafed around and arrived beside the big net.

There were too many spiritual beasts caught in the big net. The silk dragon was squeezed into the very center and unreachable. Xi Ping attempted to haul on the big spiritual energy net. He had just pulled on it when a cold and sharp gaze came his way.

No good. Randomly touching the spiritual energy net would touch the established foundation senior's spiritual sense.

A Shu cultivator was just coming toward him with a knife raised. Xi Ping dodged quickly and let his attacker's knife fall on the spiritual energy net and rebound, pretending that he had accidentally bumped into the net while "arduously resisting the enemy."

In the night, the almost invisible spirit-winding silk silently wound around the sword at the Shu cultivator's feet. The fiercely charging Shu cultivator felt himself standing on emptiness, and the constantly circulating spiritual energy broke off. He stagnated in midair, then plummeted down. Xi Ping took the opportunity to pluck the knife from his hand and waved it around with a "hi-ya!", putting on a rather convincing performance of "summoning all his courage."

Only then did the gaze that had fallen on him withdraw.

Xi Ping let out a breath and thought, I'm too obvious on the surface. I'd better try going down.

So he took a deep breath. When yet another Southern Shu cultivator came toward him, before he could make contact, Xi Ping grandly threw himself backward and fell into the spiritual beast pool, "brought down."

The Southern Shu cultivator, having encountered an insurance scammer, was stunned. Before he could work out what was going on, a talisman sent him flying.

Pang Jian hadn't rushed in without thinking. He hid in the shadows, carefully studying precisely what moves these familiar names had—after an open-eyed cultivator had their spiritual bones, they would acquire a unique magic power, like Pang Jian's ability to walk through walls and Bai Ling's to turn into paper. These powers didn't come out of nowhere. When cultivators could only rely on external objects, they would display different preferences, have affinities for different immortal tools. These preferences couldn't be covered up even if you hid your spiritual image.

The longer he looked, the more he thought that these "evil cultivators" were in fact people from the Mining Office. He was just hesitating about whether to contact Great Wan's Mining Office when he suddenly saw a familiar name through the glasses.

Pang Jian: "..."

When had that son-of-a-bitch Xi Shiyong gotten mixed in?!

Xi Ping jumped into the water and squeezed through the cracks between the dizzy spiritual beasts. He saw the fangs of a big spiritual beast he couldn't identify and couldn't resist idly touching them.

Some of the spiritual beasts had been caught in the spiritual energy net, and others were floating around randomly, bumping into each other. As expected, they blocked Xi Ping's way firmly.

He stepped on the back of a spiritual beast, got a fix on the spiritual energy net, quietly pulled out the spirit-winding silk, and sent it through a hole in the net.

The silk dragon's heart was like a natural spiritual energy pump. The spirit-winding silk quickly locked onto it. The soft, thin strand passed through the closely packed spiritual beasts and lightly hooked the silk dragon's tail.

Like pressing down on instrument strings, Xi Ping held down the spirit-winding silk to steady it, cutting off the bit of spiritual energy that the spiritual energy net had placed on the silk dragon without anyone knowing. He pulled the dragon down—

Just then, someone raised the spiritual energy net. Xi Ping clicked his tongue and was just about to give chase when the Southern Shu cultivators dropped talismans in unison, sending the net flopping back into the water.

The spiritual energy net couldn't handle this much pushing and pulling. It tore at once. All the big spiritual beasts caught in the spiritual energy net fell right on Xi Ping's head.

To avoid being squished to death by spiritual beasts, Xi Ping casually grabbed the thigh of a one swimming by and hid under the beast's belly.

The water in the spiritual beast pool was so muddy that Xi Ping couldn't see anything clearly for a time. Luckily, an open-eyed cultivator wasn't like a mortal. It was nothing to stay submerged underwater for half a shichen on one breath. He paddled around groping blindly for ages before finding that the leg he was holding was covered in gold scales—looking up along the big, thick leg that was like a column, he saw that this was actually a half-unconscious gold-armored zheng.

This gold-armored zheng was half the size of the one he had seen in the morning. Perhaps it was a zhenglet.

It must have been dosed with something. Its eyes were half-closed as it looked blankly at Xi Ping, the “animal” holding its thigh.

The man-eating one on the canal may have been its dad or its mom... Xi Ping thought, Doesn't matter which, let the child pay the parent's debt.

He snickered, pulled out the spiritual knife he had snatched out of the Southern Shu cultivator's hand, and abruptly stuck it into a crack in the zheng's golden armor. At the same time, he poured spiritual energy into the wound!

The animal that had been about to turn over and float belly up gave a start and let out a furious roar.

Pang Jian hadn't yet had time to find where that brat Xi Ping had fallen in when he saw a huge furious beast arch out of the water like a carp, jumping right out. It indiscriminately opened its bloody maw and snapped toward the two sides of cultivators mingled in the fight.

The cultivators, like dandelions blown by a strong wind, instantly flew everywhere. Even the spiritual energy net shook and loosened at once!

The silk dragon immediately entered the water. The spiritual energy wrapped around it had already been broken off, so it slipped through the gaps between the other spiritual beasts.

Next, it paused, and its slide took an unnatural turn, as if an invisible cord had pulled on it.

The furious gold-armored zheng flopped around in the spiritual beast pool like a natural disaster. Meanwhile, a figure passed like a flash of lightning through the waves it had stirred up.

In the instant the figure passed by the silk dragon, one horn on the miserable silk dragon's head became a segment shorter.

He had it!

Xi Ping tossed the dragon's horn into his mustard seed.

The next moment, the all-encompassing spiritual energy net came after him. He tossed out all the spirit-winding silk he had. The half-transparent spirit-winding silk flickered in the light off the water. He seemed to have become a jellyfish that had suddenly unfolded.

The dense spirit-winding silk threads suddenly wrung a hole out of the spiritual energy net. Before the gaze of that established foundation senior could come his way again, Xi Ping had already vaulted out of the hole. He sank to the bottom of the spiritual beast pool as if there were lead attached to his feet.

All the spiritual beasts being kept in the pool were amphibious. The water wasn't too deep, only about four or five zhang.

As soon as Xi Ping landed on the bottom of the pool, he didn't delay any longer. He pressed the hither and yon seal right to the bottom of the pool and prepared to abscond.

But...nothing happened.

Xi Ping: "..."

He didn't have time to think carefully about the reason. The gold-armored zheng he had just stabbed had been forced back into the water by the two sides of cultivators working together. It came smashing toward Xi Ping.

Xi Ping quickly vaulted out of the way, but the spiritual beast was clever!

The wretched gold-armored zheng recognized at once that the jerk who had just passed by it was the attacker who had stabbed it earlier. The big animal was unbelievably nimble underwater. It turned abruptly and snapped its teeth toward Xi Ping.

No good, the injured victim had come to demand repayment.

Xi Ping wished he could grow a fish's tail.

He turned and shifted in the water, practically swimming out a whole "Free and Easy Wandering."³³ Several times he felt the huge beast's sharp teeth brush past his back.

But just then, by coincidence, the spiritual energy net he had broken came chasing after.

Xi Ping had been wandering around without restraint all night and had nearly forgotten his own name. Now it could be said he was encountering retribution.

In a moment of desperation, when Xi Ping had once again been forced to the bottom of the pool by the enormous beast, he stamped another "Hither and Yon."

The two hither seals were less than a hundred paces apart. The two seals connected, and the space at the bottom of the spiritual energy pool instantly warped.

Because it was only an open-eyed grade immortal tool, after the two hither seals connected, the space where they met was very limited, just about enough to allow a few people to pass from one place to another. A dear friend of the gold-armored zheng's size certainly couldn't pass through. Xi Ping wanted to use this opportunity to throw off the four-legged man-eating fish.

But instead, there was a rumble, and an ominous silver light flashed over the bottom of the pool. Xi Ping's eyelids twitched: what kind of invisible inscriptions were there at the bottom of the spiritual beast pool?

The hither seal had joined two points, and it had also brought the inscriptions from those two points together. The mysterious inscriptions that Xi Ping had never seen before were agitated at once. An enormous flow of energy screamed up from the bottom of the pool, coming right in the face of the relentlessly pursuing gold-armored zheng and disfiguring it.

Xi Ping rolled away, using all four limbs. Suddenly there was emptiness at his feet—it turned out this lousy pool wasn't solid!

As soon as the inscriptions exploded, it began to leak!

A hurricane rose above the spiritual beast pool. An enormous whirlpool opened in the water. Not only the spiritual beasts in the water, but also the artifacts of Southern He on the surface, the plants and rocks beside the water, as well as the cultivators in midair...they were all pulled in.

For a time, neither the black-clothed people nor the spiritual beast herding Southern Shu cultivators had attention to spare for fighting. All of them scattered in terror.

There was an established foundation cultivator present, as well as several dozen people fighting like thunder and lightning, but none of them had made as much of a disturbance as he, Xi Shiyong, had made on his own.

Pang Jian was overwhelmed with admiration. The admiration wasn't aimed at Xi Ping; he admired the Marquis of Yongning and his wife—how extraordinarily gifted they must be to have brought such a thing up for twenty years without going bald! If they weren't reincarnated deities, he wouldn't believe it!

Just then, a bunch of fireworks leapt up in the western sky. There was a team of flying horses coming against the wind. From a distance, someone loudly called: “We are cultivators from the Western Chu encampment, come to aid a friendly nation. What evildoers have imprudently come here?”

Pang Jian frowned. Why had the Chu also come to get in on the action? It was getting messier and messier.

He hesitated, then leapt into the chaotic spiritual beast pool, plunging toward the depths of the big whirlpool.

For a time, Xi Ping could neither see nor hear. He only felt that he was being stretched out by the enormous attractive force beneath his feet. If not for the fact that an open-eyed cultivator’s body was far more resilient than that of a mortal, he figured he would already have been pulled in two.

He tried to play the bone qin, but while the veins stood out on the back of his hand, the qin notes that had brought down half of Flying Jade Peak were so weak that he himself couldn’t hear them—he couldn’t gather any spiritual energy, as if his meridians had been broken again.

This was wrong...

Xi Ping suddenly realized that it wasn’t that his meridians had broken, it was that wild spiritual energy was surging all around, pouring toward his insufficiently wide meridians like a flood. He couldn’t control himself.

Suddenly, the pull dragging him down disappeared. Xi Ping was swept up by the current. He tumbled forward along with a bunch of spiritual beasts just as confused and disoriented as he was. Covering his head, he dodged the tail of a spiritual beast that was sweeping toward him. He closed his eyes and made a grab, steadying himself with the spiritual beast's weight.

After some more time, the current gradually slowed down.

Only then did Xi Ping find that he had once again grabbed onto the gold-armored zheng—its nose was still crooked.

Shameless as he was, he still didn't know how to react at first. He could only smile at this Brother Zheng.

The gold-armored zheng couldn't understand why this person was doing everything he could to bring disaster upon it. Enemies walked a narrow path. It turned its head to chew on him.

But before the huge beast's big mouth could clamp down, its upper jaw was pierced by an invisible metal arrow.

The huge beast knocked into the stone wall beside it. The blood gushing out sprayed all over Xi Ping.

Xi Ping was picked up by the scruff of the neck and hauled away.

When Xi Ping turned his head, he saw Pang-shixiong's indignant face. Before he could say hello, Pang Jian waved a big hand and slapped him on the back of the head.

Xi Ping spat a big, round air bubble into the water. He was dragged by Pang Jian through the stone wall next to them.

He didn't know how many times he went in and out of the stone. The pangolin Pang walked in and out of stone walls as though walking on level ground, going on until Xi Ping couldn't get his bearings. In about an incense stick, his ears popped, and he was pulled out of the water by Pang Jian. The two of them had come to a cave with signs of being manmade.

Despite being a half-immortal, he had still nearly run out of air. A mouthful of long-awaited air filled Xi Ping's lungs, and he coughed fit to shake the earth.

“Pang...cough-cough...shixiong, you were choking me...”

Pang Jian said with a sneer, “If I could have strangled you to death on the way, the nation might have built a living temple dedicated to me out of gratitude.”

Xi Ping’s words came quickly: “And then, during the holidays, everyone would come worship and pray for Master Pang to give them pretty wives and beautiful concubines, two children in three years, and the healing of all ills—sincerity guarantees results.”

Bastard!

Pang Jian truly couldn’t resist. He grabbed him and gave him a beating.

When he was finished, Commander Pang himself thought it was unbelievable. This brat Xi Shiyong always had a way of bringing other people’s intelligence down to his own level, making each person who had decided not to “sink to his level” give way. He said, “Come here, I won’t hit you anymore.”

Xi Ping didn’t buy it. In his dripping stealth clothes, he circled around the cave’s ceiling like a bat and wouldn’t come down. He said accusingly, “You’re bullying the weak... I’m only so casual with you because we get along so well. You don’t appreciate my good intentions.”

Pang Jian said in surprise, “You’ve only known me for a few days. Why are you being so familiar?”

Xi Ping put out his old but crafty head and stuck his tongue out at him. “Back there, when I accidentally broke the bottom of the spiritual beast pool, why did you come after me, Pang-shixiong?”

Pang Jian scoffed. “Don’t flatter yourself. I was doing it for your shifu. I was afraid you’d die back there, and I wouldn’t be able to account for myself to General Zhi.”

Xi Ping said, “No wonder my shifu likes you so much. He’s always saying ‘ask your Pang-shixiong’ and ‘tell your Pang-shixiong to take you.’”

Pang Jian: “...”

For a moment, this unruly, undisciplined man whose mouth was sharper than an arrow bristled and jammed. He nearly began to stutter. “You... you’re...”

This brat definitely wasn’t some kind of innocent and artless loose-tongued pampered child. Pang Jian knew that perfectly well. He was a manipulator full of bad intentions, deliberately keeping to the boundary between “rude” and “direct,” specifically looking out for people’s soft spots.

Pang Jian said, “...Did your shifu really say that?”

Fuck, he'd hit the spot just right.

“So now...hss!” Xi Ping leaned back and carelessly hit something hard with the back of his head. Swearing, he felt around behind himself and broke something off from the wall. “What the hell is this?”

With a half-immortal's vision, there was no need to light a lamp in the dark.

Xi Ping recognized that what he had broken off was the base of a bracket light, rather old-fashioned—it had been a long time since anyone had used this kind of oil lamp. This base wasn't made of Moon Plated Gold and was a little rusty. You could still see that the engravings were complex and exquisite, almost sumptuous.

He brought the lamp base closer and sniffed it. He smelled a faint floral fragrance.

Before the immortal sects had bestowed Moon Plated Gold, the mortal world's level of metallurgical arts had been unable to sustain machinery. Back then, workers had mainly done handicrafts. Southern He in particular had brought handicrafts to the highest pitch. There had once been countless skilled artisans here. Now, of the ancient works in the collection of the Ministry of Works, half originated from Southern He.

It was said that Southern He's imperial family had used a special kind of lamp oil, called moon melting perfume. When a bowl was lit, the aroma in the palace wouldn't disperse for hundreds of years. Moon melting perfume candles had once been popular in Dangu Lane.

Relying on the bit of geography he had crammed before leaving, Xi Ping remembered that the Shu encampment seemed to be in the former location of Southern He's capital.

“Shixiong, why is there an antique from Southern He times here?”

Pang Jian took the lamp base and looked at it. After hearing him describe the incredible inscriptions at the bottom of the spiritual beast pool, he roughly calculated their location and mumbled, “Could it be a secret passage from the old Southern He palace...?”

“Ah?” said Xi Ping.

“The spiritual beast pool is the former ‘Glimmer of Jasper Lake’ of Southern He's imperial family's palace away from the capital... My god, how can you be so ignorant?” Pang Jian said. “We just passed through the bottom of the spiritual beast pool, pushed east by the current the whole way.

I've calculated it, and we ought to be close to the former imperial city of Southern He.”

Xi Ping immediately remembered Wuchang One saying “they’re looking for that place.” “No wonder they—I mean, those shixiongs from the mines disguised as evil cultivators tonight—no wonder they made such an uproar in the spiritual beast pool. They were searching the Shu encampment! What were they looking for? Could it be this place?”

Pang Jian narrowed his eyes. “How did you know those black-clothed people were from the mines?”

Xi Ping said, “I guessed it by looking at your expression. I went over and tested it, and, as expected, they all spoke Jinping dialect.”

Pang Jian asked, “Then how do you know that they were drawing attention away from their real target and searching for something in the Southern Shu encampment?”

Xi Ping didn’t stumble. “Heard it when I mixed in with them—anyway, given the background of our Mining Office shixiongs, how could any of them be interested in a few lousy spiritual beasts?”

Pang Jian's instincts told him that he wasn't being entirely straightforward. This brat mixed absolute truth with total nonsense without any trace of a transition between the two. It was impossible to take precautions against.

He glared at Xi Ping and asked, "Weren't you also interested in those spiritual beasts? I haven't questioned you yet. What were you doing getting mixed in?"

"I was looking for this." Xi Ping opened his hand and showed Pang Jian the segment of silk dragon horn he had put away in the mustard seed earlier.

"Pretty, huh? As if it were carved out of blue jade."

Pang Jian: "..."

Pretty my ass! You destroyed the whole spiritual beast pool for the sake of this thing?

Commander Pang took a deep breath and warned himself: Lao Pang, you're over a hundred years old. You have to behave properly. You can't lose your temper at a little brat.

He slowed his speech down as much as he could, steadied his tone, and asked, "What did you want the silk dragon horn for?"

“A silk dragon horn can treat dim sight disease,” Xi Ping said. “I just read about it in the book. I’m bringing it back to treat my san-ge’s illness.”

Pang Jian had to think for a while before he realized who “san-ge” was. He thought, Treat what illness? Isn’t that brat Zhou Ying faking it?

“The silk dragon is rare, but what’s mainly rare is the heart. It changes its horns once every hundred years. They aren’t that hard to come by,” Pang Jian said. “If Prince Zhuang wanted to use a silk dragon horn, couldn’t the imperial palace get one? Is there any need for you to run a risk?”

“Well, it’s not like I wanted to run a risk, but I was already here, so I was just picking up a gift on the way. That was an accident just now.” As Xi Ping walked forward following the bracket lights, he said, “As for whether there was any need for it, we’ll see about that—you’ve met my san-ge, shixiong. He’s reserved and care-laden. You can only get him to talk a little more by making sure he knows you’re thinking about him. Otherwise, I’m afraid he’d close himself off so much it’d make him sick.”

Pang Jian had nothing to say to this. He could only respond with a sneer.

As they talked, the two of them quickly passed through the secret passage. The further they went, the wider it became. But after walking roughly a hundred zhang, they came to the end of the line—a dead end.

But with Pang Jian there, dead ends were nothing to fear.

“It wasn’t deliberately designed like this. The passageway must have collapsed. It’s been blocked for many years.” Pang Jian knocked on the wall a few times, determined that there was no spiritual energy fluctuation from inscriptions or arrays on the other side, then grabbed Xi Ping by the shoulder and took him through the wall.

As soon as Xi Ping landed, he heard a crack beneath his feet.

At the other end of the collapsed passageway were several skeletons. He had just stepped on and broken a set of ribs.

“Pardon me, pardon me.” Xi Ping quickly moved his feet and bowed toward the skeleton with folded hands. “I’m truly sorry, I really didn’t see. It’s all Lao Pang’s doing.”

Lao Pang kicked him. “These people must have wanted to run away through the secret passage when the four nations besieged the city, but instead they were trapped here.”

Xi Ping asked, “They didn’t have immortal tools to escape with?”

“They’re all mortals,” Pang Jian said. “There were no downgraded immortal tools back then...and moreover, there were ascended spirit masters of the four great sects in the siege. If there had been a fluctuation of spiritual energy, wouldn’t they have noticed at once?”

The two of them avoided the skeletons and walked down along a small flight of stone steps. Their field of vision widened.

There was an underground hall here, a hundred meters high. Though half of it had caved in, the remaining space was enough to hold a thousand people.

Dust was piled more than a cun high. The grandeur of the carved railings and the murals on the walls hadn’t decreased in the slightest. The ones in Guangyun Palace were far inferior.

In the ruins of the underground palace was half of a feast that hadn’t been cleared away—the other half had been buried by boulders coming down in the collapse.

The guests at the feast had all turned to bleached bones. Some had even been crushed beneath rocks.

When everything had come to an end, the Southern He nobility had fled disaster up to this point, but they had been trapped here by a cave-in.

In that hopeless situation, some people had crowded at the exit, trying to no avail to dig out a means of survival. Others, meanwhile, had arranged a feast here.

Xi Ping saw a broken qin amid the ruins: on the point of death, these people must have danced and sung about the good times in the collapsing underground hall. Throughout the feast, people were being crushed to death by falling stones...and the string accompaniment continued until the qin broke.

In the center of the feast was a stone platform that must have been a stage for dancing. There, a statue was arranged like an offering. It was in the form of a kneeling man with a dozen kinds of torture performed on him, vivid and lifelike. There was bloody writing all over the statue. Not even all the years of dust could obscure the obvious hate and rage. It made your blood run cold.

Xi Ping couldn't read Southern He's writing, so he asked, "Pang-shixiong, what does that writing say?"

CHAPTER 43 - Demon Country (6)

Pang Jian frowned, staring at the bloody writing for ages, his expression turning strange.

Xi Ping said, "Oh, you can't read it either."

"Piss off." Pang Jian didn't so much as raise his eyelids. "It says 'Moon Plated Gold eats people.'"

"Huh?" Xi Ping was surprised. "There was Moon Plated Gold back then?"

"And here is the first Moon Plated Gold gold smelter in the mortal world. Construction began in the fourth year of Xiaozong Kangning. Please take a look, Your Highness!"

Accompanied by the Suling prefect, the Ling County magistrate, and a group of major and minor local officials, the elegant president of Ling County's chamber of commerce led the way while spraying spit as he explained Ling County's glorious history, doing his best to ingratiate himself with the young third prince.

"In that year, Great Wan had two happy events: General Zhi went to the immortal mountains, and Moon Plated Gold came down to the mortal world,” the Suling prefect cheerfully cut in. “With a stroke of the brush, Master Kangning gave the first gold smelter to us here in Ling County. Since then, this obscure little place has become the Land of the Golden Moon. It is the grace of heaven.”

Prince Zhuang nodded courteously. Standing on a high step, he glanced down from on high.

He saw that there was no one around the gold smelter. The body of the smelter and its base were covered in complicated arrays. Countless gears were constantly turning, propelled by the arrays, changing one smelter load after another of ordinary iron into Moon Plated Gold, which could raise mortals to the skies or take them burrowing into the earth.

Prince Zhuang lightly covered his nose and mouth and absentmindedly asked, “Are the fireproofing and dust-settling arrays all activated? The trouble with the southern outskirts’s gold smelter happened because the arrays weren’t fully activated.”

“How could they not be activated?! Wouldn’t that be playing with human lives?” Ling County’s magistrate spoke with a sense of righteousness. “It’s those petty, grasping law-breakers trying to get lucky, doing it for the sake of saving a few spiritual stones. Not only do they have no regard for human life, they’ve even made Your Highness have to rush around and work when the New Year is coming up. They ought to be seriously punished as an example to others!”

“Our Ling County’s Magistrate Zheng has always been known for loving the people like his own children,” the Suling prefect said, smiling. “I heard that recently the common people even wanted to establish a longevity tablet for him and only dropped the subject when he turned it down again and again.”

The Ling County magistrate quickly said, “How could I overstep my authority like that, how could I dare...? The workers’ lodgings are up ahead. Your Highness said you wanted to see the actual situation, so we deliberately didn’t notify them in advance. Ling County’s fields are infertile. These workers used to farm at home and couldn’t even get enough to eat. When the factories were built, they all went to them, and they all said that finally they could live well! They work in the factories when they’re young, and when they get older, the factories look after them in old age and arrange for their burials. If their children and grandchildren display aptitude, the factories put up money to send them to study and take the imperial examinations... Everyone says that they’ve received the benefits of Moon Plated Gold!”

Prince Zhuang lowered his eyes and said half-jokingly, “In the southern outskirts, everyone says that Moon Plated Gold is a man-eating demon.

How is it that in Ling County, it's become a divine being that aids the needy and relieves distress?"

The president of the chamber of commerce quickly picked up, answering at once, "But of course. Wind and rain, thunder and lightning are all bestowed by the heavens. Whether they are punishments or blessings depends entirely on mortal virtue! This way, please, Your Highness."

Prince Zhuang said "good" and followed their lead, making a superficial inspection of the workers' dwellings, appreciating the realistic performance of "lasting tranquility and well-being."

As he turned the corner, there was a wind. A small piece of paper flew out from the shelter of his wide sleeve and stuck to the president's shoe.

"Have you been to Ling County before, Miss Sixty? I hear some Ling County accent in your speech." In the Land of Turmoil, while the leading Exonerator didn't understand the riddles Sixty and Wuchang One had been speaking in, he knew now that this young lady had a superior position among the Indignant Cicadas and had become more polite toward her. He had voluntarily suggested that as the Shu encampment was unsafe, they should go stay the night at the Chu post.

Wei Chengxiang had been a village girl and a female worker. Now that she had suddenly been made a “holy woman,” she had no experience to rely on. She was as guarded as a hedgehog and replied only when she had no choice. If she could respond with just one word, she wouldn’t say two. She only said, “I have relatives in Ling County. I lived there in my childhood.”

The Exonerator said, smiling, “Ling County is a good place, the Land of the Golden Moon, the place where Moon Plated Gold came down to the mortal world. Have you seen the first gold smelter, Miss Sixty?”

Wei Chengxiang had seen it. Because the arrays used up too many spiritual stones, the factory substituted manpower wherever it could be substituted. People were cheap, anyway. Her grandfather had worked as a smelter-turner. This work took a great deal of strength, and you breathed in smoke and dust all day and ended up sickly. When people fell ill and weakened, they would be kicked out by the factory.

The look in her eyes turned cold, but she said, “I haven’t.”

“Fair enough. There’s nothing worth seeing about a smelter that eats human flesh,” the Exonerator said. “Do you know what year that gold smelter arrived?”

Wei Chengxiang didn't answer. Next to her, Zhang Da-lang couldn't resist cutting in: "Everyone in Great Wan knows. It was the fourth year of Kangning."

"Precisely. Six years after the destruction of Southern He," the Exonerator said, sighing. "If Southern He hadn't been destroyed, Moon Plated Gold couldn't have come to the mortal world."

Zhang Da-lang asked, "Exalted, why is that?"

Wei Chengxiang forced herself to hold back and display curiosity. When someone else asked, she pricked up her ears to listen.

She heard the Exonerator say with a sneer, "Moon Plated Gold is awesome. The Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon can cover all of Great Wan in a few days, bring fresh fruit still bearing dewdrops from the south to the plates of the wealthy—but how many spiritual stones must be spent to make this Moon Plated Gold? If there were no southern mines, how could Xuanyin have permitted Moon Plated Gold to come to the mortal world?"

Few of the new believers were literate. Hearing him telling a historical tale, they all gathered around to listen.

“Know that the Gold Imitation Technique was an ancient method to begin with,” the Exonerator said. “It was eight hundred years ago that Xuanyin’s Lin Chi in his youth developed it along with another. That person was named Hui Xiangjun, originally from Chu. She was expelled from the Sanyue Sect for departing from orthodox practices, then traveled to Southern He. The people of Southern He had been skilled at wicked crafts since ancient times. Relying on her unfathomable toolmaking arts, Hui Xiangjun became a disciple of record of Lancang...until she met Lin Chi, and the two of them created the Gold Imitation Technique and came to grief.”

A new believer asked, “Exalted, would the Gold Imitation Technique cause them to come to grief?”

“There were no steam engines then, but the original purpose of Moon Plated Gold was to conduct spiritual energy, so mortals could also have ‘immortal tools’ to use. Eight hundred years ago was very different from the present—and even now, in the north, downgraded immortal tools are still taboo. Back then, the mighty people of the immortal sects were outraged. If mortals could use immortal tools, wouldn’t it destroy the distinction between mortal and immortal? They thought these two people were sullying cultivation, committing the worst offense. Lin Chi was a member of Xuanyin’s Lin family’s main branch. He was confined for a hundred years and then released. But Hui Xiangjun had her spiritual bones removed out and her meridians broken. She was reduced to a mortal and passed away not long after. Xuanyin Mountain and Lancang joined hands to seal away the Gold Imitation Technique, forbidding their toolmaking cultivators to mention it.

“Until a talented individual in Southern He made a strange steam engine.

“At that time, Great Wan had reaped the benefits of the canal and become rich and prosperous. Gold and silver were flowing north like water.

Southern He was its neighbor, and its lifeblood was nearly sucked dry by that canal. The domestic price of silver soared. Half a string of copper coins couldn't buy two jin of low-grade grain. Even spiritual stones were flowing outward. For the national economy and the livelihood of the people, Emperor Xiaohuai Yang Zou conspired with the Lancang Sword Sect to steal the Gold Imitation Technique—the factories you see all over Great Wan today all began in Southern He.”

Zhang Da-lang asked, “In that case, why did Southern He invade the north back then?”

The Exonerator gave a peculiar laugh. “Ha, that's just what the orthodox sects won't tell you.”

All the believers asked him to tell them. Hearing his diction, Wei Chengxiang sensed that he was about to start pouring evil doctrine into the believers' ears again. She became wary and simultaneously passed the information along through the reincarnation wood.

The Exonerator's voice echoed in the wilderness of the Land of Turmoil. "It was because when Southern He had had only a few years of prosperity, and domestic businesses had just reached a favorable balance of trade, they found that within the country—especially in the area of the Lancang Mountains—the land and the fields showed signs of heaven's order being pilfered. Within a few years, there were a number of great pestilences in succession, and there were more and more infants born with deformities. First they thought there were monsters wreaking havoc. Lancang sent a master down from the mountain to investigate thoroughly and came up with nothing. The immortal sect couldn't understand what was happening. The sect leader personally tested the veins of the earth...and found that when the spiritual energy of the mortal world drained away, it surged toward the Lancang Mountains. It wasn't others pilfering heaven's order; it was the immortal mountains."

"Why was that?"

"Spiritual energy mines aren't inexhaustible. Southern He had previously lost many spiritual stones, and Moon Plated Gold consumed a great quantity as well. The immortal mountains had a deficit of spiritual stones. Past a certain critical point, a spiritual energy mountain range will draw spiritual energy from the mortal world.” Slowly, the Exonerator said, “There wasn’t enough spiritual energy in Southern He...so what could they do?”

“Five great immortal sects was truly too many. What if there were only four left? The extraneous spiritual energy mines would take at least several hundred years to burn through, and perhaps by that time, Moon Plated Gold wouldn’t need so many spiritual stones.”

No sooner had he spoken than a scream came from nearby. All the believers crowded together in fear, but the Exonerator unhurriedly tossed out a talisman.

There was a screech, and a winged spiritual beast with a mouth full of sharp teeth was sent reeling by the talisman. It ran away, staggering. The body of a Turmoiler was left behind on the ground... This Turmoiler had sparse hair and a build that seemed to belong to a child twelve or thirteen years old, but the face was crisscrossed with wrinkles, creased as a walnut. There was no way to determine the Turmoiler’s age or sex.

Once the spiritual beast ran off, two Turmoilers charged out, one big and one little. They cried mournfully beside the deceased. They seemed to be a family. It made the ragged figures crouching on the ground look more human.

There were believers who couldn't stand to see this and were about to say something, but then they watched in terror as the older Turmoiler, wailing, extended sharp teeth and claws, tore a piece of flesh off the body, and swallowed it!

Wei Chengxiang quickly returned her gaze to the inside of the carriage. Her stomach rolled.

The horrifying sounds of chewing echoed in the wilderness. The Exonerators' new believers stared dumbfounded as the two Turmoilers, one big and one little, quickly divided up the corpse and picked it clean. Only bloody remains were left on the ground.

“They...they're not human...”

“Not human? These are the extra humans from the feet of the extra spiritual energy mines.” The Exonerator snapped his fingers, and the jade horse began to pull the carriage, rumbling forward. “Moon Plated Gold soars to the clouds, plunges into the sea, and cuts through mountains; it creates gold, creates silver, and creates ships; and it eats people. Ha!”

Wei Chengxiang on the surface and Xi Ping in the underground hall simultaneously broke out in gooseflesh.

They went far away, and the bloody smell still floated into their noses on the night wind, which also brought a small, shrill, tender childish voice. They couldn't make out the indistinct lyrics, but the tune was the Soul Calling Melody they had sung at the funeral for their companions.

Do not linger, a lifetime's joys and sorrows are like illusions.

Go to the West...

“Great Wan was rich and prosperous then, and the price of spiritual stones was considerably lower than in other places. Lancang's sect leader had asked Xuanyin for aid. He was willing to share the profits from Moon Plated Gold with Great Wan in exchange for spiritual stones. Xuanyin angrily denounced Lancang for privately using a forbidden technique and betraying our trust, and refused to work together. Yang Zou was demented. The following year, he launched a large-scale invasion of the north.” Pang Jian knocked on the statue. “This must be a carving of Southern He's Emperor Xiaohuai, Yang Zou.”

Xi Ping had “heard” the mourning song of the Turmoilers from Wei Chengxiang. “But later, didn't we also...”

“Later, the Lancang Mountains became spiritual stone mines, and all the nations took up the Gold Imitation Technique they had long coveted. Once the flood has broken through the dam, it can’t be taken back. If you’re too slow, someone else will get there ahead of you, and a hundred years later, you end up the way Southern He did,” Pang Jian said. “You think that when Southern He marched north and was able to cut contact between the immortal mountains and Jinping so easily, the other three countries didn’t have a hand in it? Come on, let’s go find an exit.”

Xi Ping didn’t move. Pang Jian thought that the naïve young master was crushed by the immortal sect’s filthy history, so he impatiently scoffed, “The cub has left the den and finally knows there are tigers and wolves outside, huh? When a country lacks resources and the state sect isn’t strong enough, you may be an aristocrat today, but your parents, brothers, and sisters will be Turmoilers tomorrow. If General Zhi hadn’t been there then, Guangyun Palace would be like these ruins at your feet. If you have time to cry for others, you’re better off going back to put in more work. Xuanyin Mountain is the foundation on which Great Wan’s people build their lives. Don’t dawdle!”

Xi Ping suddenly asked, “Then has my shifu been to the Land of Turmoil?”

Pang Jian paused briefly.

On Flying Jade Peak, the snow had nearly covered the sword platform. The spirit of the sword-bearing person meditating in the center moved slightly, and the sword aura instantly dispersed.

Zhi Xiu opened his eyes and looked south. There was a boundless field of white there. It was unclear what he saw.

His mind only wandered for a moment. Then he averted his gaze from distracting matters and once again continued alone along the limitless way of the sword...

Making inquiries to his heaven and earth, which failed to understand so many things.

After saying this, Xi Ping didn't speak again. The atmosphere became oppressive.

The two of them each thought of their own business as they picked their way through Southern He's imperial palace. They went this way and that among the traces of the past, from time to time stepping on skeletons.

Suddenly, Xi Ping, who had been letting his mind wander, paused; both the half-immortals' spiritual senses moved at once—there was a wind!

They had left the sealed off area of the collapse.

Xi Ping quickly noticed that something was off. The air was so rich with spiritual energy, nearly as much as Xuanyin Mountain!

He remembered the boundless spiritual energy he had encountered when he had broken through the spiritual beast pool... That must have been the dense spiritual energy that had soaked the complex underground palace for many years, sealed inside the secret passage and accumulating. So he asked, “Shixiong, have we reached Shu’s mines?”

“Lancang had close ties with Southern He’s imperial family. Their palace was indeed built against the immortal mountains.” Pang Jian was also frowning. He muttered to himself, “But it was like the Latent Cultivation Temple, the barrier between mortal and immortal. Why would the spiritual energy underground be so thick?”

Xi Ping said, “We’ll know if we go look.”

“Hey, wait!” Pang Jian held him back. He took out the talisman gun and silently shot talismans at Xi Ping’s eyes, ears, and hands.

Having the muzzle of a gun pointed at him, no one could be unmoved. Xi Ping instinctively shuddered, then resisted and didn't dodge. He quietly grumbled, "Shixiong, why didn't you even warn me? If I get used to you hitting me with a talisman gun and later you fire at me for real, won't I not know to dodge...? What kind of talismans are these? Why have I never seen them before?"

"Bone-sharing talismans. They're uncommon. If you didn't have spiritual bones, these talismans would be no use—for three ke, I can share half the power of my spiritual bones with you. You can walk through walls yourself. I won't have attention to spare for you," Pang Jian said. "In a place where there are many spiritual stones, the guard will be heavy. Remember to hold your breath when you walk through walls and suppress your heart meridian with spiritual energy. Do you know how?"

Xi Ping nodded.

No wonder he'd felt like he was going to stifle to death when he'd been taken through walls by Pang-shixiong before. It turned out he had been forced to hold his breath.

"Mind your mouth, and don't make a sound. Sound moves faster and farther through walls. If you encounter something within the walls, don't just touch it. Follow me closely.” Pang Jian waved to him and took the lead in slipping into the stone wall.

Xi Ping took a deep breath and followed. This time he didn’t have the feeling of being pressed flat that being taken through walls had given him before. Only now did he learn that Pang Jian could open his eyes inside the walls and under the ground. For Pang Jian, solid walls were like a half-transparent passageway. There was slightly more resistance moving through a wall than there was in water. You could vaguely see what there was outside the wall.

The two of them walked through the walls, following the spiritual energy. Soon, they vaguely saw the white light of gas lamps. This was an underground storehouse, with a sentry every three paces and a patrol every five, guarded strictly enough for an imperial palace.

The corner of Pang Jian’s eye twitched: the encampments and mines had many storehouses. What was being kept in this underground storehouse?

CHAPTER 44 - Demon Country (7)

This place was full of peculiarities. If Pang Jian had been on his own, he would have gone ahead to scout it out without a second thought, but he had brought along an encumbrance.

While Xi Ping claimed to have “innate spiritual bones,” having the cultivation level didn’t mean he had the skills; the number of established foundation cultivators Commander Pang had gone above his grade to kill couldn’t be counted.

In the eyes of an old walker in the mortal world, someone with innate spiritual bones who had begun cultivating half a year ago was hardly any different from a baby holding a hand cannon. If he didn’t shoot himself when he met trouble, that would count as keeping his cool.

But before Pang Jian could finish hesitating and reach a decision, Xi Ping, seeing that he wasn’t moving, simply went around him and pushed forward.

Pang Jian pulled him back and glared at him ferociously: Where do you think you’re going?

Hiding in the walls didn’t necessarily mean you were safe. Pang Jian wasn’t the only cultivator in the world who could use some means to pass through walls, and even Prince Zhuang's south study had inscriptions to prevent walking through walls, never mind this kind of place where mysterious spiritual stones were hidden. Pang Jian pointed warningly at Xi Ping and walked forward himself.

As expected, as the spiritual energy became plentiful enough to soak the stones, the Shu guard outside became stricter and stricter. Dense inscriptions blocked their way.

Looking out from the wall, the inscriptions looked like light shining through from the other side of the wall, sinking in without weakening, forming a grating.

They couldn't get through this way. They had to turn back, unless they could shrink to the size of beans.

If only Bai Ling were here, Pang Jian thought.

Outside it was all Shu sentry posts. They couldn't go that way, either.

Xi Ping looked at Pang Jian: Shixiong, do you have another magic weapon in your pocket? Don't keep it hidden.

Pang Jian really did have one. He considered and, from his pockets that contained absolutely everything, took out a karma beast the size of a thumb.

Normally, the karma beasts that accompanied Heaven's Design Pavilion on official business were all like drawings on paper; they moved around on walls. Now that Xi Ping and Pang Jian were inside the wall, the karma beast became three-dimensional.

Seeing a three-dimensional living karma beast for the first time, Xi Ping saw that this big-eyed lamp's buttocks were rounder than its head and couldn't resist trying to touch them.

But the karma beast recognized him. Seeing him about to invade its territory, it jumped up and tried to bite him. Pang Jian quickly grabbed the sacred beast by the scruff of its neck while batting away Xi Ping's paw, separating the two of them.

Xi Ping was very regretful and gesticulated: How can this beast harbor resentment against me?

Pang Jian rolled his eyes. All the karma beasts in the world are avatars of one sacred beast. You don't have a chance to clean up your act. Better be careful when you go to Heaven's Design Pavilion.

He put his hand over the karma beast's eyes and silently mouthed something. Xi Ping saw Pang Jian's eyes become identical to the sacred beast's.

Then Pang Jian took out a jade stamp stone and gave it to the karma beast. The little sacred beast picked the stone up in its mouth, wagged its tail at him, then cleverly wormed its way into a crack in the inscriptions.

Xi Ping carefully observed Pang Jian's eyes. He saw the reflections of changing inscriptions constantly flashing through them and knew that Pang-shixiong could borrow the karma beast's eyes to scout ahead.

Pang Jian's vital weapon was called Barrier Dispeller; he himself could walk through walls and burrow into the earth, see all barriers as emptiness. If he knocked on a wall, he would know whether there was spiritual energy surging on the other side... All his powers seemed to add up to the words "dispelling barriers."

Shifu had said that spiritual bones you cultivated for yourself would often correspond to your Way of the Heart. Whether Pang-shixiong was using a bow or a knife, it was always with the notion of indomitably pressing forward, undisturbed by all evil spirits.

Xi Ping was different. He had someone else's spiritual bones, and the original owner had suffered bitterly and been full of profound hatred. He had been an old lunatic of a demon who liked to smash himself up periodically... There couldn't be anything more unsuitable. Xi Ping wondered whether there would be a chance to swap them out later.

As his thoughts were wandering, Pang Jian narrowed his eyes automatically; his beast's pupils contracted sharply as though they had been swept by a strong light.

The karma beast had passed through the inscription area!

Xi Ping poked Pang Jian: What do you see?

Pang Jian muttered to himself for a moment, then wrote the words "spiritual stones" on the back of his hand.

The glow of the spiritual stones had been dazzling enough to make the karma beast's pupils contract? How many must there be?

Pang Jian hesitated a moment, then shook his head—he couldn't be sure for the moment, either.

Behind the protection of those heavy inscriptions was an astonishingly large storehouse full of white spirits, stacked up like bricks as far as the eye could see. If you ran into someone who liked counting things like General Zhi, on seeing this sight, he probably would have counted himself numb on the spot.

The blue jade was arranged much more carelessly, never mind the jade stamps, which were piled up at random, the rock snow on them not even cleaned away.

Miners handling spiritual stones definitely wouldn't be this slipshod. All the big spiritual stone mines had very strict oversight for the extraction of spiritual stones—there were rules for how to handle the stones, for how to see if they were up to standard, for how to weigh and inventory them. There was layer upon layer of checks, with no room for error. Moreover, there were people who came to collect rock snow; the miners usually turned a blind eye to this. The rock snow was the miners' income. No one was going to turn their nose up at money.

So where had these spiritual stones come from?

Just then, the karma beast shook its head, as if sensing something, and began to run again.

With countless priceless spiritual stones over its head, it slipped between the inlaid inscriptions for maintaining temperature, maintaining humidity, and fireproofing. It ran for a full li, then stopped.

There was big pit. The ground was recessed by a full hundred chi. The bottom of the pit was a perfect circle dozens of zhang in diameter, polished bright, clearly manmade.

Apart from abhorring evil, karma beasts, because they moved around in writing and murals, were also unusually sensitive to arrays.

This was a secret...array?

Pang Jian frowned—arrays were driven by spiritual stones. Putting an array in a spiritual stone storehouse amounted to putting a tinderbox in a barrel of oil. Ordinarily speaking, in a major spiritual stone storehouse, you couldn't have anything but some specific types of inscriptions.

What was this tinderbox...this array for?

The little karma beast ran down along the rim of the pit and cautiously made a big circle around the bottom, from time to time carefully avoiding something. Then it seemed to understand the invisible array. Measuring its steps, it walked to the center and spat out the jade stamp in its mouth.

The karma beast was passing through the ground. The jade stamp it spat out was as good as inlaid directly in the floor. The array activated at once.

Next, a beam of light so fast neither man nor beast could react pierced the karma beast's body. It instantly vanished into thin air.

Pang Jian's vision swam, but soon after, the karma beast was released once again—it had just been caught in a transport array.

Pang Jian only had time to take one look when the karma beast came out of the array before his link to the sacred beast was cut off because of the distance. His beast's eyes changed back to human ones. Pang Jian shuddered.

Xi Ping had never seen such an expression on Pang-shixiong's face before. There was something indescribable mixed in amidst the confusion. For a moment, he even thought that Pang Jian's soul had departed!

But before he could ask him about it, Xi Ping's spiritual sense sounded an alarm. Perhaps because the little karma beast had touched the array in the storehouse, the inscriptions in front of the two of them were alerted. The inscription characters surged.

The guards at the storehouse door abruptly became vigilant. Across the wall, they turned in unison toward the place where the two of them were hidden.

Xi Ping grabbed Pang Jian and ran for it.

Behind them, blue light bubbled up from the inscriptions like the tide coming in. The light surged in pursuit of them, pointing out the thieves to the guards.

The guards gathered on the other side of a thin wall and tossed talismans and weapons at the wall as though they were free.

Pang Jian had just gotten his soul stirred by some wild fox demon; he allowed himself to be pulled along by Xi Ping. This was Xi Ping's first time experiencing such an event. Seeing the guards surround them, he instinctively ran deeper into the wall and stumbled over something—a stone hidden inside the wall that had an inscription carved on it. It trapped the two of them in place like a vine.

Almost at the same time, a rumble went outward from inside the wall. The sound quickly went from low to high, as though a Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon were coming their way. Xi Ping turned his head in that direction and saw a huge black figure fully a zhang tall rolling toward them.

The corners of his eyes twitched, but his feet were trapped. He couldn't do anything.

With lightning speed, Xi Ping turned over his hand and took out the hither seal. Then he extended his arm, hooked his wrist backward, and, in the direction the black shadow was coming from, placed a stamp in the middle of the wall—when they had encountered the first Southern Shu guard, he had left a stamp in the wall like this, in case of future need.

This time it worked!

The two seals joined. The black shadow was just approaching—it was a big statue with a human head and a scorpion body. It was jostling through the wall, its face savage.

The crisp sound of bone breaking called Pang Jian back to himself. He abruptly turned his head and saw that Xi Ping's hand, which he hadn't had time to withdraw, had been crushed to bits by the statue.

Next, the statue hit the spiritual seal and was transported right to where the other seal was.

And the young master really didn't make a sound!

So fast his hand nearly became a blur, Pang Jian threw out a handful of talismans, temporarily suppressing the inscription on the ground. Then he scooped up Xi Ping and escaped the trap, flying in the direction the statue with the human head and scorpion body had gone.

Just then, three ke passed. The talismans on Xi Ping abruptly lost effect, and he once again returned to the state of being unable to see or hear and being forced to hold his breath as Pang Jian pulled him through the wall. When he saw the light of day again, they had come to the border between Southern Shu and Chu's encampments.

Xi Ping came up out of the ground, staggered, and fell onto Pang Jian. His back was soaked with cold sweat.

Pang Jian stuck a spiritual stone into his mouth, put him over his shoulder one-handed, cast a stealth talisman on the two of them, then flew back to Great Wan's government ship like a swallow. He landed right on the third deck and passed through the wall.

Before he had steadied himself, a figure came toward them, snatched Xi Ping away, and pushed Pang Jian aside.

Xi Yue ordinarily looked appeared to be a delicate-featured youth. Now, as soon as rage appeared on his face, it instantly took on a monstrous cast, sharp teeth seeming ready to pierce his lips...before Xi Ping's gasp startled him into retracting them.

Xi Ping lay powerlessly in the half-puppet's arms, wave after wave of black passing in front of his eyes. Despite this, he still spat the spiritual stone into his remaining intact hand to take a look at it. Almost inaudibly, he whispered, "...a jade stamp. So damn stingy."

Pang Jian, frowning, inspected Xi Ping's crushed hand. "Doesn't your hand have spiritual bones? What's going on? Are they this brittle?"

Xi Ping's spiritual bones were hidden bones attached to his real ones, and these hidden bones saw breaking the real bones as a good thing. With a bitter smile, he said almost inaudibly, "Maybe they...they...have a taste for this..."

Spiritual bones all had their own peculiar tempers. It was like a birthmark on someone's ass; however well you knew a person, it was still unsuitable to insist on asking about the details. So Pang Jian didn't follow up. He rummaged in his mustard seed for elixirs.

He heard Xi Ping curse. He seemed to go into convulsions—these pestilential hidden bones had begun putting on a performance of “the dead coming back to life.” Growing the bones back hurt more than having them crushed had in the first place!

For a while, Xi Ping’s consciousness cut off. Then he was woken by the pain. He crushed the spiritual stone in his mouth with his tongue; at some point, it had already turned to powder.

Xi Yue, wearing the dragon-taming chain, didn’t need him to speak an instruction. He immediately took out a white spirit and fed it to him, then quickly put him on the bed.

Like a distressed cub, Xi Yue pushed Pang Jian’s hand away. He let out a sharp hiss.

Fine. Before, he’d trembled as soon as he saw Pang Jian and didn’t even dare to move. Now he dared to scratch him. He hadn’t grown taller for nothing.

Pang Jian didn't squabble with the half-puppet. He clicked his tongue, withdrew his hand, and stood still with his arms crossed. He said to Xi Ping, "You're doing pretty well, kid. You haven't even cried. Plenty of guts."

"Damn it...hss... If...if my mom were here...I guarantee...I'd be howling so loud that n-no rooster would dare to crow within three li." Xi Ping, clenching his teeth, pulled out a towel and wrapped up his injured hand. "What...what would be the use of crying to you? Ah...Forebear Yue, have a heart. You want me to comfort...you, in my condition?"

Hearing this, Xi Yue clenched his teeth and forced back his tears.

Xi Ping's gaze was unfocused from pain, his breath coming too short to pass through his throat. He rambled as though raving, "Too unreliable...you're too unreliable, Lao Pang... Next time I go out pilfering, I'm not taking you..."

Pang Jian: "..."

Apologies for holding up your business.

In about an incense stick, the lump of crushed bones and flesh at the end of Xi Ping's wrist at last had the bare outlines of a hand. The sharp pain was over. He gradually adjusted and could finally take air into his lungs.

Xi Yue helped him drink half a cup of clear water. Xi Ping drank two mouthfuls, then shook his head and dodged. “I don’t want that, pour me a cup of wine—listen, Lao Pang, what the hell did you see back there?”

Pang Jian paused. The cynical smile evaporated off his face.

He covered the door and window with anti-eavesdropping talismans, appropriated Xi Ping’s wine, tossed it down in one gulp, and only then slowly began: “The people impersonating evil cultivators last night to sneak into Shu’s encampment were from Great Wan’s Mining Office. You already know that. Because you got involved, and because the Chu encampment overheard the disturbance and came to get in on the fun, they probably withdrew in haste without reaching their goal.”

Xi Ping blinked sweat off his eyelashes. “What were they looking for? That underground spiritual stone storehouse covered in inscriptions?”

“That storehouse is full of spiritual stones that have been very crudely handled. The rock snow wasn’t even wiped clean,” Pang Jian said gravely. “I didn’t see an exit in the storehouse. I only saw a transport array.”

“A transport array? Connected to the origin of the spiritual stones?” Xi Ping’s thinking had been pared incomparably keen by pain. He asked at once, “So the karma beast went into the array to investigate? Where do the spiritual stones come from?”

“The karma beast lost contact with me as soon as it left the array. I only took a glance. But even at a glance, I couldn’t fail to recognize that place... It had been taken to the southern mines.” Pang Jian looked up and said with emphasis, “There are people in the spiritual stone mines selling us out to another country, secretly conveying large quantities of spiritual stones to the Shu encampment.”

Great Wan’s southern mines were truly full of activity. Not only were the evil cultivators hung up on them, there were also neighboring countries eyeing them covetously.

But more than these affairs of state, what always interested Xi Ping before anything else were the expressions and tones of voice of the people around him. He found that when Pang Jian said the words “southern mines,” they were said between his teeth.

What kind of a place could a person take a hurried glance at and be unable to fail to recognize?

If he didn’t go home for three months and some of the potted flowers in the Marquis Manor’s rear court changed, he still couldn’t guarantee that he would recognize it at a glance.

Xi Ping suddenly remembered Tai Sui Liang Chen inadvertently revealing that Pang Jian was the son of a miner from the southern mines—his whole family had died in a mine collapse!

He gave a start, temporarily set aside even his injured hand, and asked, “Can you just steal spiritual stones from the mines? Aren’t they counted?”

“They are.” Pang Jian’s expression became even more grave. “There are often impurities in spiritual stones, and rock snow unevenly distributed. If you only make an inventory and record weight, it’s easy for there to be discrepancies. In order to prevent embezzlement in the mines, the volume of extracted spiritual stones is reckoned by the state of the spiritual energy surge—the activity level of the spiritual energy in the mines has to match precisely with the volume of spiritual stones that leaves the mines. There’s no way to fake it. If even a single low-grade jade stamp is missing, it has to be investigated... There’s only an exception in one circumstance.”

Xi Ping had a premonition of what he was going to say.

Pang Jian said, “A mine collapse.”

During a mine collapse, the mine caved in, the spiritual stones bounced around, and surveillance lost effect.

Xi Ping held his breath. “Do mine collapses happen often?”

The corners of Pang Jian’s lips twitched in an unsuccessful sneer.

“Occasionally.”

Spiritual stone mines weren’t like other places. Apart from a great array, comparable to something from Xuanyin’s inner sect, there couldn’t be any other arrays placed in the mines. Even inscriptions had to be used with the greatest caution. Safety measures for miners were in fact not even as good as those for the factory workers beside the Moon Plated Gold gold smelting furnaces—supposing that the factories were willing to activate the arrays.

If a miner hadn’t experienced a handful of mine collapses, he wasn’t worthy of being called an “old miner.” All they could do was carry all kinds of protective talismans, do their best to hold out if a minor mine collapse occurred... If they encountered a major catastrophe, it would be up to fate.

Despite this, every year large quantities of laborers dreamed of going south to work in the mines. The selection process was strict enough for a military exam. The mines paid well, and adding in rock snow to subsidize household expenses, you could buy a house and settle down after working there for a few years. Even if your luck was bad, and you died in a mine collapse, your wife, children, and elderly relatives would have support in the future...

Moreover, in the Land of Turmoil, Great Wan's miners counted as "superior people." Even if you could get the same salary working in a street stall listening to people's overbearing shouts, how could it compare in dignity to holding a bowl of noodles in the mines and pitying the Turmoilers?

But looking at it now, how many of those occasional mine collapses had been naturally occurring, and how many had been man-made?

From outside the window came a crew member's shout. The garrison relief ships were leaving the Chu post.

CHAPTER 45 - Demon Country (8)

The steamship gave a muffled sigh, and Pang Jian came back to himself. He suppressed his chaotic emotions and waved a hand at Xi Ping. “I will explain this matter to the sect. You leave it alone. Your shifu sent you to investigate the remaining evil cultivators.”

Xi Ping immediately said, “Shixiong, do you mean that the people colluding with the Shu aren’t evil cultivators?”

Pang Jian: “...”

No good. He’d let his attention wander and said too much.

Taking a child along wasn’t scary. He rather liked young people, and in fact didn’t mind if they were a little mischievous; after all, he wasn’t very solemn himself.

But this type of brat—the kind who could snatch at a flaw in anything you said without careful consideration—was truly too annoying! It was appropriate for this Xi Shiyong to be traveling with a mute.

“You...” Pang Jian was speechless for a long time, then said in exasperation, “There’s no need to catch on so quick when you don’t have to be clever.”

Arranging this matter according to normal lines of thought, the most suitable explanation for it would be this: the evil cultivator Liang Chen, who styled himself Tai Sui, had been a mine supervisor on the surface and a traitor to the nation in reality. For many years, he had not only committed evil acts, he had also caused man-made mine collapses and colluded in secret with a foreign nation. Eight years ago, Liang Chen had for some reason left the southern mines to enter seclusion, leaving a trusted associate—the unidentified Wuchang One—back in the mines. This person had continued to act as a traitor, secretly conveying spiritual stones to the underground palace in the Shu encampment.

The karma beast could serve as evidence for all of the above.

This way, if they only captured Wuchang One, the head of the remaining evil cultivators, this horrifying case of spiritual stone theft that had spanned hundreds of years would be revealed. It would be clear at a glance which evildoers ought to be punished and what evil ought to be expelled. There would be justice for the souls of the victims of hundreds of years of mine collapses floating over the southern mines.

But evidently, Pang Jian wasn't prepared to accept this "suitable explanation."

“I understand. Embezzling spiritual stones on such a large scale and creating man-made mine collapses longterm without anyone getting to the bottom of it—that couldn’t have been done by a small handful of evil cultivators. If that really were the case, the rulership in Jinping would have changed by now,” Xi Ping said quickly. “Also, as I see it, the vast majority of those evil cultivators are paupers. When they attract new followers, they only give them some green ore dust to eat, so all their subordinate cultivators look hardly human. If the evil cultivator Liang had the ability to get his hands on so many spiritual stones, would he have had any need to mess around with those thugs?”

Pang Jian’s expression hardened. He called him to a stop. “You understand nothing. Don’t talk blindly.”

Xi Ping continued: “The strangest thing is that, last night, the Mining Office people impersonated evil cultivators and went to scout out the Southern Shu encampment. It’s simply unbelievable. If you said it, even the evil cultivators themselves wouldn’t dare to believe it. If the theft of spiritual stones really had been done by a few evil cultivator traitors, the Mining Office could easily get them under control. First investigate the thieves in their own house, then go to the foreign nation for an explanation. Why would they need to expend so much effort, ignore what was right in front of them and go far afield?”

Pang Jian said, "Shut your mouth!"

Xi Ping said, "So the ones colluding with Southern Shu must be people they don't dare to investigate openly."

The two of them said these final sentences almost simultaneously. Pang Jian's expression looked as if he had been dealt a staggering blow right after getting over a hangover. Pointing at Xi Ping, he couldn't get any words out for ages. "...Have a heart, spare me some trouble."

Xi Ping cradled his crushed hand to his chest and once again became selectively "impervious to reason," eyes lighting up like the stars that Jinping was unworthy of, full of the aura of fearless youth.

It made Pang Jian remember that he had only just come of age.

Pang Jian looked at him, and his tone involuntarily became somewhat warmer and steadier. He said, patiently, "Shiyong, there are some things in the world that aren't as straightforward as catching evil cultivators. If anyone commits atrocities against heaven and reason, you catch them, and everyone has a simple and straightforward battle... It's not that easy to be a walker in the mortal world."

“I know. If you find out that someone like Liang Chen, who has no background and no connections, has done something wicked, it’s to everyone’s satisfaction. You can just arrest him, and neither the sect nor the court will have anything to say about it. But other people...” Xi Ping’s eyelashes lowered to screen his gaze. “...for example, those Zhaos and Lins, that won’t do for them. Everyone has to get involved, there have to be a hundred or more immortal meetings and conferences, and then you have to go ask the Sea of Stars. When the stars, the moon, the gods, the immortals, and the mortals have all given the nod, you can finally put a lid on it.”

Pang Jian said, “...Why can’t your shifu control you?”

Xi Ping asked, “Shixiong, what are you planning to do?”

Pang Jian wasn’t a talkative person who liked explaining himself. He hadn’t been planning on telling Xi Ping anything in detail. But what General Zhi had entrusted to him was a stray dog without a leash that could get up to anything at all if you took your eyes off him for a moment. He had to explain himself plainly: “I’m going to investigate this to the end and keep it a secret.”

Investigating it to the end was in service of his barrier dispelling Way of the Heart; keeping it secret was in service of the bigger picture.

He was the commander of Heaven's Design Pavilion, not the little victim who had survived a mine collapse a hundred years ago.

“Then I will explain matters to Xuanyin Mountain and leave it to the sect to make a ruling.”

Xi Ping asked, “And if the sect's ruling is improper?”

“Be sensible. I know you can.” Pang Jian's temper was nearly worn away. He paused, then said almost in perfect sincerity, “Shiyong, when I was your age, I also thought that I was the most public-spirited, the most reasonable. But actually, Xuanyin's thirty-six peak masters, the cultivators of the established foundation level and above, all have Ways of the Heart. The Way of the Heart is innocent, and those that go against it receive punishment from heaven and earth. Immortal sects...naturally have their own reasons.”

“I see,” Xi Ping said perfunctorily. “I've got it, Grandpa Pang.”

“If a day comes when the justice in your heart goes against your nation and your sect, goes against your parents and your teacher, what will you do?”

Pang Jian sighed. “Behave yourself, don't go making trouble. If there's something you really can't resolve, write to ask your shifu... I've practically become your mom. It looks to me like your flesh and bones will grow back in a day. Rest up, don't drink wine."

Then he stood up and was about to return to his room. When he reached the door, he remembered something else. "Right...that miserable little wretch from the southern outskirts factory who's been plagued with evil cultivators—that girl named Wei Chengxiang—do you recall her?"

Xi Ping: "..."

Of course he recalled her. She had just set out for the evil cultivators' main headquarters as a holy woman.

Pang Jian didn't notice his suddenly stiff expression, only said, "General Zhi entrusted me with getting her settled. Because of her youth, I wanted to find a family to adopt her in Jinghua Village—oh, you may not know about Jinghua Village. It's the territory of the walkers in the mortal world, a little village created with a mustard seed. Cultivation is lonely, and the burden of a family is heavy. Some walkers in the mortal world pretend to be mortal and get married, and their spouses and children all live there. It's easy to defend. You could call it...a place for the walkers in the mortal world to catch their breaths. But then, just that day, there was the explosion at the southern outskirts factories, and Heaven's Design Pavilion was running around everywhere. My subordinate was inattentive to his duty and lost her. I've sent people to look for her.”

Without displaying anything unusual in his expression, Xi Ping said, “It’s all right. If you can’t find her, forget about it. Maybe she went back home to find her relatives.”

If Wei Chengxiang had had a single decent relative, whether they were old or sickly or crippled, she wouldn’t have ended up making her way alone in the southern outskirts, going to reeking Rat Alley every day in search of warmth.

Pang Jian was sharp as a whip. Reasonably speaking, he should have immediately noticed that something was off. But when he heard this, he only nodded and said feelingly, “She still has relatives? That’s pretty good.”

Xi Ping watched him leave and thought, Pang-shixiong’s runaway soul hasn’t come back yet.

A half-immortal... Accommodating the Way of the Heart of the immortal half alongside the big picture ultimately made the heart unsettled.

His injured hand twitched. Xi Ping drew in his breath with a hiss. Then he saw Xi Yue run over carrying an old book without a cover. He opened it to the middle and pointed out a monster to him. This monster had high, broad shoulders and a pair of blades where its hands ought to have been. Its face and scalp were covered in arrays, crowding out the features and leaving no room for them. There was an explanatory note next to it: Sword-bearing half-puppet, can travel a thousand li in one day, knows no weariness, will go until the last gasp and fight the enemy without end.

Xi Yue said, I want to become like this. I've memorized all the arrays. You only need to follow along with my thoughts in the dragon-taming chain, young master.

Xi Ping waved a hand. "Piss off."

Xi Yue entreated him, I want to become a little useful.

Xi Ping sniffed in contempt at the half-puppet's aspirations. He himself was a person who was interesting but useless, and he didn't understand at all why anyone would insist on becoming "useful."

"Steam engines are extremely useful. I can send you to a factory to blow hot air. Ah, I told you to look up how we can get you to be able to talk, to grow a little taller, to look a little more human. Instead you went and looked up how to become a monster!"

Xi Yue didn't respond. He didn't want to talk at all. There was no need to talk to others, and he could "talk" to Xi Ping through the dragon-taming chain... He kept suspecting that as soon as he could talk, Xi Ping would take the dragon-taming chain away and destroy it.

Xi Ping said, "If you dare to turn into that, I'm abandoning you."

Xi Yue slammed the book shut and fearfully put it behind his back.

Xi Ping wanted to smile, but halfway through the smile changed shape from pain. The crushed bones of his fingers were starting to put themselves together.

The fingers connect to the heart. His trembling fingertips seemed to have extended to link to his whole body's sense of pain. Even his back began to go numb. But he still did his best to hold out and not make a sound, because Xi Yue was there.

As he saw it, Xi Yue was a little thing whose intellect hadn't fully developed. Apart from when he was lazing around in bed to the point of unconsciousness, the young master wanted to save face.

He clenched his teeth and made his breathing gentle and slow, leaning against the bed and dozing. Sometimes he remembered last night's quick tour of hell, and sometimes he thought of his shifu.

Mao hour had passed long ago, and shifu hadn't sent him an assignment. He must have known he had been in the underground palace at the Shu encampment then. Xi Ping thought, Shifu's consciousness can reach to this...crisis-ridden, demon-spawning, awful place.

This person who had spent so many years alone in the ice and snow practicing the sword was now occasionally sending his gaze to the Land of Turmoil, watching everyone fight and scheme for the spiritual stones that were made of the Turmoilers' flesh and blood... How did he feel when he saw it?

Xi Ping suddenly felt a twinge of regret. He shouldn't have been in such a hurry to leave the mountain. He should at least have stayed on Flying Jade Peak to celebrate the New Year with shifu.

Just then, Xi Ping's spiritual sense moved. He sensed Pang-shixiong next door sending off a Heavenly Question, which went in the direction of the Xuanyin Mountains.

If a day comes when the justice in your heart goes against your nation and your sect, goes against your parents and your teacher, what will you do?

Xi Ping thought over Pang-shixiong's words. He thought that Pang-shixiong looked like a bandit, but in reality he was unbendingly upright; it made a person admire him.

But admiration was one thing; he still wasn't convinced—if he went against heaven and earth, against his sovereign, his family, and his teacher, wouldn't that mean becoming an evil cultivator?

In that case, he might as well get up to evil cultivator business.

For example, he had come here to take care of that Zhao person. A little thing like this, was there any need to publicize it so the whole world knew? As he saw it, there was no need to bring this matter to the sect to ask for justice, and certainly no need to ask for redress from the court... Anyway, never mind survivors, Miss Chen's family's ashes couldn't even make up a double handful. Who would benefit if he went through every possible trouble looking for justice?

He only had to determine that this Zhao Zhenwei was the source of the injustice, the primary debtor, then quietly get rid of him and put the blame on the evil cultivators when he was done.

In the underworld, the whole Ning'an Chen family had waited respectfully for a long time. If there were any unsettled accounts in this world, let them go settle them themselves.

“Ugh...” As crooked thoughts went through his mind, another finger came together without warning. Xi Ping felt as if he had been whipped from shoulder to hand with an iron whip. He curled up from pain. “Xi Yue...Xi Yue...”

Xi Yue heard that his voice sounded wrong and stood there helplessly, wanting to touch him but not daring to.

Xi Ping said almost inaudibly, “Get me some wine.”

Xi Yue hesitated. I think that Commander Pang said just now...

Xi Ping pounded on the bed with his good hand. Is he right, or am I right? Are you on his side or on mine?

Xi Yue was afraid he would move too much and disturb his injury. He quickly took the hand Xi Ping was pounding the bed with and hurriedly nodded. You're right, you're always right, I'll get it for you.

He rushed off to get a small pot of wine. Only when he had handed it over to Xi Ping did he dimly realize that there was something wrong—who was right and whose side you were on...were those the same thing?

Xi Ping finished off half the pot of wine in one gulp. His blood, warming suddenly, seemed to open his pain-numbed meridians. He let out a long breath, and confusion arose in his mind: why had Pang-shixiong remembered A-Xiang just now?

After sending the Heavenly Question, Pang Jian emptied his head of all distracting thoughts and entered meditation.

Of the eight hundred legendary hallucination arrays, not one could trap Heaven's Design Pavilion's Pang Jian. Because the way of dispelling barriers was to always seek the truth, never to be trapped by bewildering barriers. The barrier dispelling Way of the Heart was forged by throwing off illusions time after time while beset by perils.

The sea of thought in which he forged his Way of the Heart was full of confusion, hallucinations growing wild...like the accumulated fragrant jade miasma that had been lingering in the southern mines when he had opened his spiritual eyes.

When there was a mine collapse in the spiritual stone mines, the spiritual energy bouncing between the stones would often activate the rock snow and form a particular miasma, which was called fragrant jade miasma. Before the raw materials of that priceless snow wine had been processed, they had hallucinatory properties, stronger than any snow wine.

Actually, Pang Jian didn't count as a "survivor" of a mine collapse. When the caved-in spiritual stone mine had buried the mining station underneath it, he had just gone with a companion to the docks to meet the merchant ships. He hadn't been inside.

The unprecedented mine collapse had raised a small mountain of fragrant jade miasma. The miasma hung around for over a month, while the precious and fatal spiritual stones continued to slip down. Not even the mine's half-immortals dared to approach. Only he, as if he had gone mad, charged inside while the supervisors weren't looking.

At first, he still knew to cover his mouth and nose with wet cloth as he searched hopefully for people in the miasma and the ruins.

But when he found them he was exhausted, his fingers worn bloody. He only pulled out one twisted corpse after another, all people he had known when they were living.

When the teenage Pang Jian dragged out his parents, who no longer looked like themselves, he finally couldn't resist crying aloud.

Just then, he heard a weak cry for help: “Da-ge...”

Pang Jian gave a start. He had a little sister two years younger than him who was slower to grow tall than other girls. At thirteen, she still looked like a child. Because she was small and skinny, she had been trapped by a doorframe and a rock in a corner that an adult couldn't reach and so had survived.

The surviving girl gave him strength. Pang Jian turned at once from a despairing, bereaved boy into a big brother who could move heaven and earth. Beneath stones that could come crashing down at any time, he spent two full days calmly and patiently using his hands to dig her out.

The fragrant jade miasma had by now turned into a bewildering barrier. People outside couldn't get in, and people inside couldn't get out.

Pang Jian said, “It's all right. However big the miasma is, it'll break up one day, and I'll take you out of here. Mom and dad are gone, so I'll take care of you in the future. In two months, I'll be of age, and I can work in the mines... All the supervisors know me, they'll definitely take me.”

Along with his little sister, he fought desperately to survive, desperately looked for food among the ruins. In hardly any time, there wasn't even a single grain left. The boy went behind his sister's back and quietly cut meat off the bodies of those who had died in the mine collapse and brought it back to eat, pretending it was animal meat... In the fragrant jade miasma, the bodies didn't even rot.

Finally, they were even running out of bodies, and the miasma still hadn't broken up. Pang Jian was just at his wit's end when he found a live deer that had somehow run inside.

He took out a bow and arrow. He was dizzy from wild joy on top of hunger, so he didn't carefully consider where the bow and arrow had come from. He drew the bow and shot the arrow smoothly, brought down the little deer in one shot, and happily shared one of the deer's legs with his little sister.

That night, for the first time, he saw a faint, blurry moon in the fragrant jade miasma and optimistically thought, If a living thing could get in, the miasma must be about to break up.

Pang Jian's premonition was right. The fragrant jade miasma that had continued for two months was at last about to be absorbed by the spiritual stone mine's great array.

Two days later, cultivators wearing miasma-repelling talismans and masks charged in. Someone soon found him and cried out, "Look, quick, there's someone here! There's a living person!"

“No...” Pang Jian thought vaguely, “there are two.”

They all babbled something about “fragrant jade miasma pouring his spiritual eyes open,” and someone had put an elixir in his mouth and was constantly asking him questions, what his name was, who his parents were, what other family he had, telling him not to be confused, to maintain his spiritual clarity.

Pang Jian didn’t understand what “spiritual clarity” was. He only knew that the elixir was so bitter it made the root of his tongue go numb. He swallowed it with difficulty, and the elixir began to expel the miasma that had accumulated in his body. The distinctive fruit fragrance of rock snow poured out of the seven orifices of his face.

The fragrant Pang Jian grabbed the hem of the person questioning him.

“My little sister...”

“What?”

“My little sister...she’s here, too...she’s little, Exalted, save her first, she’s over...”

When the mine supervisor heard this, his expression altered. After a moment of peculiar silence, he stammered, “Don’t...don’t worry, my colleagues have already...”

His words came to a sudden stop, because just then, two miners who didn’t understand the situation lifted out a tiny body, which came right to Pang Jian’s eyes—and by now, the cruel immortal pill had already blown away the sweet dream blinding his eyes.

The little girl’s body had stiffened long ago. Her head had been crushed out of shape, and there was even a spiritual stone inlaid in her skull. But the rest of her was perfectly preserved. Her clothes could even be called tidy. Someone had been taking care of her as though she were a living person... except that the body was missing a leg.

Next to an extinguished fire, there was a clean leg bone laid out. A human one.

It turned out that his little sister, the little deer, and the bow that had hit in one shot...had all been a dream inside the fragrant jade miasma.

Waking from the dream, his spiritual eyes linked to heaven and earth, and he swore from then on not to be confused by any illusion.

But today he nearly failed. After entering meditation, he couldn't get out of the miasma in his spirit no matter what. Just as Pang Jian was beginning to feel fretful, the sound of a qin suddenly pierced the fog before his eyes.

It was a rather unlucky Soul Calling Melody.

Following the sound of the qin, Pang Jian opened his eyes, but he didn't move. He sat there quietly, listening to the music next door, which could penetrate a person's spirit.

Night fell, the hull trembled slightly, and the small window of the cabin was swept by a lighthouse beam. They had at last reached the Great Wan encampment.

Meanwhile, Wei Chengxiang's party, traveling by land, also reached the Great Wan encampment—Great Wan's trade routes were well-developed, and it had the most merchants traveling to the Land of Turmoil. The encampment seemed more like the human world than any other place. Near the docks, a bustling little town had nearly come together, and many of the guesthouses had seasonally hung up Spring Festival couplets.

Though it was nowhere near as good as in Great Wan itself, it was still pretty decent... At any rate, Wei Chengxiang had never stayed at such a good inn before.

The mysterious person who came to meet her set her up in a single-person room. Tea and fruit were even set out in the guest room.

She investigated for a long time before finally working out how to peel the fruit, but as soon as she bit into one, she spat it out.

The taste of snow wine—she knew it; this was lychee.

CHAPTER 46 - Demon Country (9)

The mountain was timeless. Only when a bright red “fortune” character fell out of the assignment his rebellious disciple had sent back did Zhi Xiu realize that the twenty-eighth year of Taiming was about to come to an end.

In the big assignment scroll, there was no need to look at any of the proper things—the precise arrays and the neatly copied inscriptions had certainly been done for him by Xi Yue. That brat Xi Ping had nails under his buttocks. If you wanted him to sit still for one shichen, you first had to break his lousy legs.

Zhi Xiu roughly flipped through the assignment, then noticed there was something stuck in it. He pulled it out to look and unexpectedly encountered a karma beast stamping with fury on a paper card.

The karma beast was trapped on the paper card and had inflated into a furry ball from anger. It was roaring silently, baring a pair of little triangular fangs, when the waste paper over its head was unexpectedly lifted, and it saw Zhi Xiu. The little beast instantly settled down, the fierceness in its eyes vanishing without a trace. It wagged its tail appealingly and sat down.

Zhi Xiu knew without having to touch it that there was an invisible array on the paper card. This array was extremely peculiar. It wasn't anything standard; it was actually something original.

It wasn't that arrays couldn't be created. It was just that every classic array had undergone revisions from countless masters since its creation before being handed down to posterity. It had to be precise, simple, and subtle in order to conserve spiritual stones to the utmost degree. Blindly altering an array, you wouldn't necessarily blow up if your luck was good, but you would definitely waste money.

Looking at Xi Ping's superfluous spiritual threads made Zhi Xiu's head hurt. He thought, If you wanted to activate this thing, wouldn't you need to burn up a white spirit?

"Can't even crawl and you already want to run. It's pure waste. You ought to be beaten..." Zhi Xiu sighed and asked the karma beast, "What did he want you to show me?"

The karma beast motioned for him to put the card down on the snow, then indeed spat out a white spirit. Seeing it made Zhi Xiu's eyelid twitch.

The array on the card only activated half a beat late. It went halfway, then stuck and stopped. The karma beast looked at Zhi Xiu in dismay for a moment, also seeming very helpless. It ran back to the middle of the array and put down a blue jade.

Zhi Xiu: "..."

He had actually underestimated how wasteful this kid could be.

This time, the array at last came to life. The dizzying spiritual threads tangled together, and fragmentary flames burst from the card.

Its prohibition vanished, and the karma beast immediately leapt onto another piece of paper. Then there was a faint whistle, and a dazzling fireball ran counter to the snow in the sky like a shooting star. It broke through the hazy sky and exploded into glittering fireworks—it was a crooked picture of a brocade carp.

Next, another fireball flew out of the array. A karma beast with a face that was nothing but eyes, a Zhaoting sword, a bust of the peak master of Flying Jade Peak that made Zhi Xiu clench his fists.... The rich colors of the fireworks splashed on the pure white snow, bright and grand, appearing in the sky above Flying Jade Peak for half an incense stick.

Finally, a line of big, vigorous cursive wound it up: Happy New Year, Shizun!

Zhi Xiu put his hand on his forehead. There was a rumble, and another corner of the north slope collapsed.

Cultivators passing by heard the commotion and without exception stopped to observe. The karma beast had nowhere to hide. It buried its face in its front paws and cried.

“Hey, don’t cry. That monkey’s brought the perfectly good north slope down twice now, and even I haven’t cried.” Peak Master Zhi stroked the paper where the karma beast was hiding and gently consoled it. “I’ll go wrap up a red packet for him and put in a beating as a New Year’s gift.”

The sacred beast couldn’t take this. It crawled up the auspicious embroidery on Zhi Xiu’s sleeve and wouldn’t come out.

Zhi Xiu picked up the expensive array paper and saw the blue jade turned to powder and the dim white spirit; it was painful and ridiculous. Pinching the edges, he carefully put the paper card levelly into his mustard seed for safekeeping, unconsciously wearing a faint smile. He didn’t want to train with the sword anymore. He called Zhaoting back and was planning to return to the cottage to warm a pot of wine and have a drink.

Just then, Zhaoting moved on its own, pointing to the northern sky.

Zhi Xiu abruptly turned his head and frowned—a corner of the thick clouds dropping snow tore open, revealing a few unusually bright stars.

The Sea of Stars was calling.

The Sea of Stars was in the depths of the Xuanyin Mountains. It was an abyss like a wound. No matter what the weather was in the mountains, above this “wound,” the sky was always cloudless, always showing a clear thread of starry sky. The Sea of Stars took its name from this.

Looking down from beside the precipice, there was dense fog in the abyss. When the mountain mists passed through, it let out an echo like a large bell ringing, like the rambling warnings of fate.

When Zhi Xiu arrived, nearly all thirty-six peak masters had assembled.

Apart from the lineage of the Dignitary of Fate High Elder, no one dared to go down into the Sea of Stars casually. Therefore, everyone was only waiting beside the precipice.

There were eight or nine people who had the surname Zhao or were connected to the Zhao family, enough to put together two card tables; the Lin family valued quality over quantity; the few remaining peak masters of the Li family stuck together, keeping a clear distance from the Zhaos and the Zhous; the rest were unremarkable, standing together because they were in the same situation.

Rosy Cloud Peak³⁴ was Flying Jade Peak's neighbor. Peak Master Wen Fei beckoned to Zhi Xiu, gave him a derisive look, and waved a fan in midair. A line of small gold writing flashed on it: Just watched your fireworks. Very exciting.

Zhi Xiu sighed. "If you like excitement, why don't you take him? I'm all right, but Flying Jade Peak won't be able to handle much more."

As he spoke, he looked around. Suddenly, he frowned. There were two people who weren't associating with anyone else: there was no need to mention Princess Duanrui; she had never been approachable to strangers. The Zhou family members were all gathered not far from her but were maintaining a careful distance. Standing almost directly opposite from Duanrui was a man in convict's clothes, of middle height, with fine features, so delicate he was a little feminine.

Zhi Xiu lowered his voice. "Lin Chi-shixiong is here, too?"

In the mortal world, the common people might not necessarily be able to say who the high elders of Xuanyin were, but they definitely all knew Lin Chi—member of the Lin family's main branch, peak master of Moon Plated Peak, creator of Moon Plated Gold, the unprecedented and unequalled genius of the toolmaking path, born with the golden touch. But though they were both peak masters, Zhi Xiu could count on one hand the number of times he had seen this Master Lin. Lin Chi was always in seclusion. If someone requested an immortal tool, he handed the task over to his disciples without exception. He had even more “clarity” than Princess Duanrui.

Wen Fei shook his head, and another line of writing appeared on his fan:
When all thirty-six peak masters gather, nothing good will come of it. Last time so many of us assembled, it was the time Li Yuelan's spiritual bones were removed.

Zhi Xiu said, “Crow’s mouth...crow’s fan.”

Just then, all the ascended spirit cultivators raised their heads simultaneously. A cluster of white frost floated out of the Sea of Stars. It flew with the wind to the precipice, landed next to Zhi Xiu, and turned into a man.

The man had his eyes closed and seemed like he was made out of frost himself. Unless a cultivator came to the end of his lifespan, he normally wouldn’t show any signs of aging, but this person had deep wrinkles on his brow; he was so haggard that he seemed middle-aged.

As soon as this person appeared, the sound of the wind in the deep valley calmed for a moment. Then the mountain wind swirled and rose, tearing open a thread of sky over the Sea of Stars. It was raining all around; only above the heads of the peak masters did the stars extend forever, so clear they seemed to be right before their eyes.

Everyone greeted: “Dignitary of Fate High Elder.”

Zhi Xiu said, “Shifu.”

The Dignitary of Fate High Elder pricked up his ears and turned in Zhi Xiu’s direction. He gave him a very faint smile, and the notches in the center of his brow became shallower for a moment. But soon they knotted back up.

He didn’t make small talk, simply said, “The Sparkling Deluder stands guard, the Imperial Star is dim—the twenty-ninth year is ill-omened.”

Before the change of date at midnight, the Dignitary of Fate High Elder’s words meant there was no way to celebrate the New Year.

The High Elder turned to Duanrui. “What does the Zhou family say?”

Duanrui said, “The Zhou family has always put the state first.”

“In ancient times, the Zhou family fed demons with their own bodies and sealed the Impassable Sea, creating thousands of years of tranquility in the mortal world. Bear the common people in mind.” The High Elder of the Office of Fate nodded slightly to her. “The Zhou family is good.”

Then the Dignitary of Fate High Elder turned back to Zhi Xiu. “Strange manifestations appear in the Sea of Stars. Disaster brews in the south.”

The corner of Zhi Xiu’s eye twitched. “In fact, a Heavenly Question flew up the mountain from Heaven’s Design Pavilion recently, saying they were concerned someone in the southern mines was colluding with Shu and embezzling spiritual stones. This has yet to be verified... Can it be connected with this matter?”

The peak master of Nine Questions Peak, who was an expert in arrays and inscriptions, immediately said, “I will request a talisman to leave the mountain and send people to tour and inspect the great arrays at the southwest border.”

The Dignitary of Fate High Elder shook his head and said, “Please prepare yourselves, peak masters. A miasma has come up from the Sea of Stars. There is a great tribulation on the way. I fear it will not only be a bit of discord on the border.”

All the peak masters looked at each other in dismay. The clang of a clock striking came from a distance—

The change of date at midnight. The twenty-ninth year of Taiming had begun on schedule.

The Sea of Stars sighed.

Prince Zhuang was startled awake by the New Year's firecrackers. His heart beat like a drum, but it was soon slowed by the snow lotus on his chest. The paper man silently appeared beside his bed and poured him a cup of water.

Prince Zhuang raised his eyebrows, and Bai Ling quietly reported: "I went to the place Your Highness indicated. I was in haste and only found some fragments..."

"I see," said Prince Zhuang. "Tell me about it."

"Last year alone, Suling's factories had a dozen and more accidents big and small, all of them hushed up. In the worst case, a human life was repaid with only two liang of silver. The number of casualties is unknown, though at a conservative estimate it was over a hundred people. Witnesses and physical evidence can both be found. Suling is a near neighbor of Jinping, and matters are already so bad, so never mind those places that are far from the capital..." At this point, Bai Ling hesitated, then said, "Your Highness, you really ought to have taken Mr. Wang along on this trip. These political affairs are outside of my realm of expertise.”

“No need. These are not complex matters,” Prince Zhuang said indolently. “They’ve only put a piece of paper over the head of a bald man. Lift it, and you’ll know how many lice there are at a glance.”

Bai Ling lowered his head, wanting to speak but holding back.

“What is it?” said Prince Zhuang.

Bai Ling said, softly, “I also went by a ‘Village of the Living Dead’ today. It used to be a graveyard, but now it has been occupied by the living. These old or crippled laborers have nowhere to go. They sleep beside the tombs, living off of sacrifices to the dead...”

Prince Zhuang listened absent-mindedly, eyelashes drooping very low, as if he was about to fall asleep. Bai Ling stopped talking.

Only when another round of joyful firecrackers sounded did Prince Zhuang frown as if disturbed. Somewhat wearily, he said to Bai Ling, “How is it that in the years since returning to the human world, you’ve learned to be sentimental?”

Bai Ling sighed to himself and changed the subject. “Your Highness, the power networks behind the factories are complex. Once you begin to investigate, it will inevitably implicate Xuanyin Mountain. In this inspection tour of the south, the difficulty isn’t in investigating, it’s in how to close the case and report it. By convention...”

“By convention, I should choose a sufficient number of scapegoats, pick out a few other problems, apply a bit of pressure, and move on. If you were to ask Wang Ziqian, he would arrange a name list for you this very night—which to help up, which to take down—analyze everything neatly.”

Prince Zhuang said carelessly, “Nothing new about it at all. If it were so dull, wouldn’t that disappoint His Majesty?”

He stood and opened the window. The smell of firecrackers floated in on the wind. “Do you know how the air above Suling looks to me at this moment?”

Bai Ling quietly said, “No one on earth has a spiritual sense like Your Highness. What you see and hear, we have no way to fathom.”

“Resentment so thick it can’t be dissolved. There are at least two or three groups of evil cultivators mixed in, ready to drag people down into their mire. I think a single spark would be enough,” Prince Zhuang said.

“Tomorrow I’ll leave Suling Prefecture, and before leaving, I’ll give Ling County’s sham factories a commendation and bring everyone to hear it.”

Bai Ling thought in astonishment, Are you deliberately fanning the flames to aggravate the people’s resentment...?

“Do you know why I took you with me instead of Wang Ziqian?” Prince Zhuang said.

“Please instruct me, Your Highness.”

“We went out to fan the flames. Why would I take along a useless, delicate scholar?” Prince Zhuang turned. “Let them have their last meals tomorrow. The next day, before zi hour, I want the heads of that chamber of commerce’s arrogant president and County Magistrate Zheng separated from their bodies.”

Bai Ling was startled. “On what charge, Your Highness?”

“What are you saying? What charge? Evil cultivators are running amok. What reason do they need to assassinate court-appointed officials?” A peculiar smile appeared on Prince Zhuang’s face. “The evil cultivators in the factories have been idle too long. It makes even me anxious on their behalf to see it, So I’m going to give them a demonstration. These evil cultivators' nests are obvious at a glance. I'll tell you where to find them, and when the time comes, you'll divide up the bodies, give equal shares of the credit to those people. Remember to be fair and impartial. Don't play favorites."

Bai Ling: "..."

"It's annoying to investigate these trifles. His Majesty has lost his mind, and I don't feel like joining him in his madness. I'm also not planning on going about the arduous and thankless task of bringing balance all over the place... Since the people are resentful, then let the 'people's resentment' deliver the punishment."

What could the immortal mountains say about it? At worst they would blame him for being incompetent—as a chronic invalid who had hardly ever left Jinping, wasn't it normal for him to be incompetent?

Prince Zhuang laughed cheerfully. "Only I don't know whether these evil cultivators who feed off the people's resentment can handle the heroic office of ridding the people of a scourge."

For a moment, Bai Ling looked at his profile that seemed to be carved out of jade and suddenly thought, His Highness isn't actually concerned about the nation, and he doesn't care about the people's livelihoods and hardships.

He hates everyone.

Wang Jian and those others followed him around cautiously and conscientiously and put forward plans for him, all thinking that Prince Zhuang was burning with ambition, that he was shrewd and profound, and that if they did well in assisting him, in the future perhaps there would be imperial honors for them... Only Bai Ling sensed that whether His Highness was shifting his ground or sowing discord, none of it was for the sake of inheriting the throne.

All he wanted was to see the world sunk in chaos. He found new ways to torment his father and brother, created farces, and obtained a brief bit of pleasure from it, like a person drinking himself into a stupor on snow wine.

What had His Majesty released from the capital?

Just then, a beam of soft white light slipped by the corner of Zhou Ying's eye. The two of them turned simultaneously and saw the white jade proximal light up—since opening his spiritual eyes, it had been easy for Xi Ping to control the downgraded immortal tool. His white jade board connected to two others, and he could contact either one whenever he wished. It wasn't like before, when anything he wrote would appear on all three boards.

On the white jade board was a joyful series of auspicious phrases; from all the way across the border, it was still possible to sense the writer's tail sticking up ingratiatingly. As expected, the final sentence brought up the main topic: I've used up all my spiritual stones. Send emergency aid, san-ge!

Prince Zhuang: "..."

Bai Ling watched his lord's expression change several times. He seemed to be about to open his mouth and curse. Before he could speak, he was cut off by another firecracker and choked the words back.

After a long moment, the din calmed, and His Highness forgot what he had been about to say. All he could do was helplessly wave a hand and say, "... send him some through a transport array."

Xi Ping had failed six or seven times before working out the array with Xi Yue's help. It was only at times like these that he regretted not working harder. As soon as the array was activated, a big brocade box popped out of nowhere and crushed his half-baked array.

Abundant spiritual energy at once swept through the room. Xi Ping leaned back and heaved a sigh of relief. "Finally I'm back in business. Hss...oh, my back..."

He spent money without keeping count, and he spent spiritual stones without keeping count, too. Injuring his hand had accelerated the looming crisis in his financial affairs.

Although...

Xi Ping looked down at his healed left hand. The sensation in this hand was different from before. It was very subtle—before, the bone qin had felt like a qin that was attached to him; though he could play it by curling his fingers, it had been like the evil cultivator Liang Chen, always external, separate from him.

The newly-grown left hand was entirely his own, as if he had brought it out of his mother's womb.

Yesterday he had tried it out and found that his left hand could now play a kind of silent music that only Wei Chengxiang could hear. And when she heard the music, her heart moved with the strings. She had originally been tossing and turning somewhat from being alone in a strange place. Hearing the faint comfort in the music, she had quickly settled down and fallen asleep... Though perhaps some people were naturally sensitive to music. If he had an opportunity, he would have to try it on someone else.

There was a gentle knock on the door of his guest room. Someone respectfully said, “Viscount Xi, the Mine Governor has requested to see you and Commander Pang.”

CHAPTER 47 - Demon Country (10)

Pang Jian had originally planned to operate covertly. He hadn't wanted to alert the Mine Governor as soon as they arrived at the southern mines—he had been worried that the evil cultivators planning to loot the convoy wouldn't dare to act if he alerted them.

But now it was clear that what he had to investigate wasn't the small matter of the evil cultivators.

“Don't babble,” Pang Jian exhorted Xi Ping ahead of time. “You're a junior who's just joined the sect. Mind your mouth, just act like you don't know anything no matter what they ask you. No one is going to go after you making inquiries. When we see the Mine Governor, just say that because of evil cultivators running wild and brewing calamity in the southern outskirts, Heaven's Design Pavilion received orders to go south to investigate the snow wine trade and verify the identities of the miners in order to prevent evil cultivators from infiltrating the valuable spiritual stone mines.”

On the surface, Xi Ping said “fine,” putting on an obedient “whatever shixiong says” expression, but he was thinking: The evil cultivators know what we've come here to do—I revealed it to them.

This Wuchang One was very interesting. First of all, he wasn't really a "Tai Sui believer," because he not only knew Liang Chen's true identity, he also knew that Liang Chen had the hidden bones and could possess other people's bodies. If he knew so much about "Tai Sui"'s background and could still remain a believer, Xi Ping would salute him for being quite the fellow—he seemed more like Liang Chen's partner.

At the same time, Wuchang One also obviously knew about the traitors who were colluding with a foreign nation and stealing spiritual stones from the mines.

In other words, in Great Wan's southern mines, there were three groups of people with ulterior motives: first, the "thieves inside the house" who were creating mine collapses and colluding with Southern Shu. These were well-established thieves who had long-standing power in the mines, deep-rooted.

Second were the people who had realized something was wrong and were furtively investigating the thieves inside the house; in other words, those "fake evil cultivators" who had been scouting out Southern Shu's encampment by night. While these people had an established foundation cultivator among them, they had been forced into doing an unseemly thing like that; it was clear their foundations were shallow.

The third group consisted of Tai Sui Liang Chen and his remaining followers. There was no knowing about the others, but Liang Chen and Wuchang One evidently also belonged to the “thieves inside the house” faction; at the same time, they had certainly drawn no profit from this. Never mind going around buying things on credit, they had also become disloyal and begun to have dealings with bumpkins like the Exonerators.

Xi Ping had gotten mixed up in this, planted Wei Chengxiang among the evil cultivators, and, at the same time, had given Wuchang One two pieces of information: one was that Tai Sui Liang Chen’s identity had been exposed within Heaven’s Design Pavilion, and Pang Jian had come with ill intent; the other was that the “fake evil cultivators” had already grasped the outlines of the situation and had begun to secretly investigate the “thieves inside the house.”

Would Wuchang One reveal the latter piece of information to the “thieves inside the house”?

Xi Ping believed that he was certain to: if he had been Wuchang One, he wouldn’t know that Pang Jian had found the transport array by a mysterious coincidence; he would only know that Heaven’s Design Pavilion had come looking for him. So he would certainly reframe Pang Jian’s purpose in coming as “Heaven’s Design Pavilion has come to investigate the theft of spiritual stones,” then let the “thieves inside the house” treat this as an existential threat and deal with Heaven's Design Pavilion, concealing himself.

Right now, the most ignorant people in the game were the “fake evil cultivators.” The “thieves inside the house” were facing an existential threat. The “real evil cultivators” thought they had everything under control and were prepared to sit tight and watch the other two go at it.

Also, beneath the Bell of Tribulation, Liang Chen had said that there was a “criminal brand” on his spiritual image. Shifu had later explained to him what a “criminal brand” was; could this be connected with the thieves inside the house who were stealing spiritual stones?

The Mine Governor commanded all of the southern mines. Did they belong to the “thieves inside the house,” or to the helpless “fake evil cultivators”?

And what party did Zhao Zhenwei, who was getting ready to escort the spiritual stones north, belong to?

As Xi Ping circled the game board in his mind, he followed Pang Jian, asking about everything left and right like a pampered young man who had never been out in the world and thought everything he saw was fresh and new.

The Mine Governor's manor had a rather "southern" flavor. It didn't have courtyards as deep as those of Jinping. As soon as they walked through the gate, there was an unrestrained sea of wisteria, growing unusually rampant in the warmth of the south. A narrow path passed through, and inside were gardens within gardens, the butterflies so busy they didn't know where to land. Xi Ping was keeping count: since they had come in through the gate, Pang-shixiong had sneezed three times.

He thought to himself, Is this Mine Governor obsessed with flowers?

Then, when he saw the Mine Governor in a garden of peonies, Xi Ping thought, Bah, the flowers don't deserve it.

The Mine Governor was a female cultivator. Her lightly made-up face made the whole hall of flowers look dismal... Anyway, Xi Ping, who cursed young ladies and turned down famed courtesans, who made the Marquis so mad he chased him through the streets, suddenly turned polite.

Even the bandit-like Pang Jian became somewhat more reserved. He lowered his voice three notches and respectfully greeted her, "Your Highness Anyang."

Xi Ping had a moment of realization: Oh, she's from the Zhou family.

As expected—there was an eight or nine out of ten chance that any shijie he met in the outer sects would be a princess.

Great Wan had many restrictions on women. Though recently female workers and merchants had begun to appear, they were all taken by renowned scholars as signs of “the decline of public morals” and “the decay of society,” and all of them had to struggle against rumors and slander. It was as if after a woman grew up, the only two types of work she could do were being a wife and being a prostitute, and anything else was only a shoddy coverup for being a prostitute.

This was also why any walkers in the mortal world who couldn’t stand the loneliness had to hide their names and make do with mortals in a mirage. It was practically impossible to find a cultivation partner among their colleagues—selection cards were so hard to come by that there weren’t even enough to go around for the sons of the wealthy; how could there be a share for the wealthy young mistresses? They had to stay behind to make brilliant matches. Xuanyin’s female disciples were very rare. If they weren’t so extraordinarily talented that they immediately went into the inner sect, then they were of extremely lofty birth; how could anyone be a suitable match for them?

Actually, Xi Ping had a vague feeling that the title “Anyang” sounded familiar...

“Lord Pang, you have traveled a long way and gone to many pains,” Princess Anyang said politely. Then she looked at Xi Ping. “And who is this?”

Xi Ping put on his most proper-looking smile and gravely stepped forward to salute her. “Hello, shijie, I am...”

Before he could finish, Princess Anyang saw the sword he was wearing and said, “Your surname is Xi. Are you Shiyong?”

Xi Ping’s brows moved. He thought, Has my good name spread so far?

So he put on an even more active show of propriety. “Shijie has heard of me? Ah, to be spoken of to such venerable ears, whether the speech was good or bad, is a blessing upon me for three lifetimes.”

Where no one was looking, Pang Jian glared at him: Mind your manners!

Then Princess Anyang suddenly smiled. The whole peony garden faded. She said, “Wow, it really is you. You’ve gotten so big! Is Jinjin well?”

Xi Ping: “...”

“Jinjin” was his mother Madam Cui’s given name. This beauty wasn’t just making conversation. He had an ominous premonition.

Princess Anyang said, smiling, “When I was young, I went out incognito to visit Cui Ji. I took a liking to a hairpin. When I asked, it turned out that it was a coming of age gift Cui Ji had made for the family’s young mistress. I was arrogant and willful in my youth and insisted on buying it. Jinjin came to collect it just then, and we became instant friends. She let me have the hairpin along with the whole set of hair ornaments. She’s an exceptional talent, with a very good disposition. We got along very well when I was young.”

Xi Ping suddenly remembered: “Anyang” was a princess of the first rank—she was the present emperor’s full blood older sister!

The princess smiled kindly and said, “So you can stop calling me ‘shijie.’ Just call me Auntie Qing.”

Before the smile Xi Ping considered “elegant and unrestrained” could fade, he was hit in the face with this “Auntie Qing.”

Pang Jian bent his head; his shoulders began to shake.

After a moment, Xi Ping, having nothing left to live for, accepted the princess's presents on the occasion of their first meeting: a small bag of spiritual stones and a lock of longevity.³⁵

Was there anything in the world that was a better antidote to lust than a lock of longevity?

In fact, there was. The princess wrapped the damn thing up in a red packet and said it was a New Year's gift.

Xi Ping followed Pang Jian, contemplating the illusory nature of the sensual world, listening to these two "elders" discuss the explosion and the evil cultivators in the south and sighing about the hardships to the common people caused by the evil cultivators running rampant.

"Forget about the rest," Pang Jian said calmly. "If there are traitors among the miners and the crew members of the convoy ships, then there's a problem."

"Ah, you've said it. What a headache." A person's mind and manner would often change along with the age of their appearance. Zhou Qing had the face of a girl, and when she grumbled, there was an indescribable air of naïve coquetry about her. There was no way anyone could have imagined that she had a brother whose hair had all gone grey.

Pang Jian said, “Are you in some difficulty, Your Highness?”

Zhou Qing said with a bitter smile, “I won’t conceal it from you, shixiong. Since I was transferred to the southern mines twenty years ago, I’ve always been in difficulty. They all said my natural endowments were insufficient and I couldn’t enter the inner sect, and I only got made Mine Governor because my surname is Zhou. My natural endowments are weak, and I’m a woman. On the surface, the ten senior mine supervisors are polite to me, but when something really comes up, never mind obeying my orders, they don’t even consult me.”

Pang Jian and Xi Ping exchanged a veiled look.

This oppressed Mine Governor who had come here only twenty years ago didn’t sound like she belonged with the deep-rooted “thieves inside the house.”

“I’ve always said that while snow wine is a good thing, rock snow causes hallucinations, and the mines ought to strictly control it, but they said I didn’t understand the plight of the common people and wasn’t making allowances for the hardships of the miners,” Zhou Qing said, sighing. “Since Liang-shixiong left office, there have been frequent incidents with the convoy ships. They tell me I’m incompetent, and then they block me from stopping shipments and performing a thorough investigation. They say, ‘The spiritual stone shipments must be made at the right time, and they may not be delayed.’ The next shipment is about to go north... Ah, perhaps I really am incompetent. I should go back to the Latent Cultivation Temple to repair straw children.”

Pang Jian considered, then said, “In fact, there’s no need to delay the shipment. Let Shiyong go with the escort, and I’ll stay in the mines to help Your Highness investigate the traitors.”

“Very well.” Zhou Qing had no objections to the latter part of this sentence. She only glanced hesitantly at Xi Ping. “Sending Shiyong on his own... Can he handle it?”

Xi Ping gave a dry cough and automatically sat up straight.

Zhou Qing bit her lip and took out a talisman. She snapped her fingers to light it up and said, “Commander Zhao Zhenwei of the escort team, Head of the Guard Lü Chengyi-shixiong...and Mine Supervisor Lin Zhaoli-shixiong, please come and see me.

“Lin-shixiong is the only one of the mine supervisors willing to help me,” Zhou Qing said. “But he’s advanced in years, and recently he showed signs of reaching the end of his lifespan due to injury, so he had no choice but to establish a foundation by force in the mines. Now the inner sect has sent a reception order after the fact, and he ought to be leaving the southern mines. I'll ask him for one last thing—to go with the shipment. In troubled times, no matter what, it will be safer to have an established foundation master to oversee matters. He can also take care of my old friend's son for me.”

Xi Ping: “...”

Anyway, the princess thought he was unreliable.

But an established foundation cultivator surnamed Lin... Wasn't that the head of those black-clothed people who had drawn fire beside the spiritual beast pool that day?

So it would seem that Princess Anyang was part of the “fake evil cultivator” group.

“Matters must not be delayed,” Pang Jian said to Princess Anyang. “I want to go to the mines and have a look. A little later, can Your Highness lend me a register of miners...including those already dead, a log of the supervisors' comings and goings from the mines, and a full log of the quantities and other properties of spiritual stones leaving the mines?”

As a mine supervisor, Zhou Qing was truly hopeless. Hearing this, she frowned. “I’ll do my best to ask all the mine supervisors. If they decline and give me excuses...”

Pang Jian said, “Just say Heaven’s Design Pavilion is investigating a case and anyone who obstructs us will be judged to be an accomplice of the evil cultivators.”

Zhou Qing’s eyes lit up, like a little girl who had been given the imperial sword. “Then I’ll rely on shixiong for everything!”

“You flatter me.” Pang Jian cupped his hand. “Also, Your Highness, please permit the karma beasts to follow the southern mines’ great array to search out evil energy.”

Zhou Qing agreed at once: “No problem.”

Heaven’s Design Pavilion and the Mine Governor who found herself elbowed out of her own territory came to a ready agreement; everything was going unbelievably smoothly.

But Xi Ping secretly frowned: he was afraid it wouldn’t be that easy. The princess was in the dark, but the “thieves inside the house” must already have received Wuchang One's warning; they would certainly have cleaned up their tracks by now.

Then, as Zhou Qing led them to the southern mines, she said, "When I first heard what had happened in Jinping's southern outskirts, I sent someone to investigate the snow wine merchants. I didn't expect that I would be a step too late. The evil cultivator who tampered with the snow wine had already run off. He had counterfeit identity documents from the start... Evil cultivators have endless tricks for disguise and concealment. There's really nowhere to start investigating once they've snuck in."

"It'll be easy to identify them," Pang Jian said. Before Xi Ping could stop him, he pulled out the "unseen glasses." "These glasses can observe the name on a person's spiritual image. We'll know at once when we check that name against the one on their identity documents."

Xi Ping: "..."

Dear shixiong! "Unseen glasses" can't be seen. If you reveal them to the light of day, how am I going to secretly investigate the evil cultivators' true names?!

But this was his greatest secret right now. He couldn't say it. So there was no way Xi Ping could stop Pang Jian.

Just then, Wei Chengxiang's voice came through Xi Ping's spirit: "Uncle, can you control the reincarnation wood?"

Xi Ping's eyes flashed.

There was a middle-aged man sitting in front of Wei Chengxiang. He was an Indignant Cicada who had received orders from Wuchang One to get her settled in.

This man called himself Old Nine. He looked like a leavened bun. He wasn't necessarily using his true face. There was an evil light flashing in his little eyes. He said respectfully and politely to Wei Chengxiang, "Since Tai Sui ceased manifesting, we have also been unable to use the reincarnation wood to send messages amongst ourselves. Even to contact you, the holy woman, we had to rely on outsiders."

Xi Ping immediately said, "I don't know how to make it work, drop the subject—just say...can they contact the holy woman as they like? They are unworthy."

Wei Chengxiang was already used to his tyrannical attitude of marching in and taking over. She put a chilly expression on her small face and didn't respond, haughtily scrutinizing the pasty-faced man in front of her.

Old Nine's eyes moved. He said ingratiatingly, smiling, "We are naturally unworthy of speaking to the holy woman without being summoned. But Senior One is in the mines and can't come and go easily, and he often has urgent matters to report to Tai Sui and the holy woman. Could we ask Tai Sui to give him a special pardon to allow him to use the reincarnation wood to communicate with the holy woman?"

This couldn't be refused with "you are unworthy."

Wei Chengxiang clenched her teeth in secret, racking her brain to think of how she should answer.

Then she heard Old Nine say, "Senior One said that Tai Sui knows him and is certain to agree."

Wei Chengxiang: "..."

Xi Ping: "..."

Tests always came without warning.

Wei Chengxiang's throat went dry. She involuntarily avoided the pasty-faced man's eyes. "Tai Sui says..."

Just then, Xi Ping's left palm warmed slightly, and he called Wei Chengxiang to a stop: "Wait."

He raised his head and looked around. He saw three men coming their way.

At the same time, through the unseen glasses, Pang Jian saw that the name of the man in the lead was a blurry "Lin." This was the established foundation cultivator from that day at the spiritual beast pool.

Of the other two, one was very young—not only his face. He was impressive, giving off an air of luxurious living. Loyal to their post, the unseen glasses revealed his name: Zhao Zhenwei.

The last one was dressed like a scholar and showed signs of nearing the end of his lifespan. His skin was slack, and he appeared middle-aged.

For a time, Xi Ping had no attention to spare to examine Zhao Zhenwei. He met the middle-aged man's eyes directly. The man smiled easily at him, and the feeling in Xi Ping's left palm became more evident.

What did this mean?

Xi Ping's thoughts moved rapidly. He said to Wei Chengxiang through the reincarnation wood, "Tell this Old Nine that when Wuchang One has finished dealing with Heaven's Design Pavilion's people, I'll make my own arrangements."

Wei Chengxiang composed herself and passed this on. Old Nine was surprised, and the doubt in his eyes instantly faded. He asked almost humbly, "Holy woman, how do you know that...Mr. One has gone to scout out Heaven's Design Pavilion?"

Wei Chengxiang learned by analogy. This time, not waiting for Xi Ping's instructions, she put on the "you are unworthy of knowing" expression on her own.

At the other end, Xi Ping only managed to keep from showing anything unusual in his expression by pressing the tip of his tongue to the roof of his mouth—got you, Wuchang One.

"Lin-shixiong!" Zhou Qing quickly stood up to introduce everyone.

When she came to Zhao Zhenwei, Xi Ping smiled as brilliantly as if he were reuniting with his own brother after being separated for many years. When she came to the middle-aged man, Xi Ping was like an orphan who had roamed the world for half his life finding his father.

“This is Lü-shixiong,” Zhou Qing said, “one of the old hands here at the mines. He has always accompanied the shipments.”

“You flatter me. I am Lü Chengyi. Greetings to you two representatives from Jinping.”

Xi Ping gently curled his left hand and thought: “Lü Chengyi.”

The next moment, a peculiar point of view appeared in the center of his brow—Xi Ping as “Tai Sui” seemed to become a pair of eyes behind Lü Chengyi’s back, loftily observing the clueless “believer” from another angle.

Author’s Note:

Madam Cui: As long as you’re good-looking enough, I’ll give you anything, go through any difficulty or danger. If you weren’t the wrong sex, eloping would also be feasible!

CHAPTER 48 - Demon Country (Final)

Before Wei Chengxiang could relax, there was a sudden knock on the door. She nearly collapsed on the spot. Her head and her expression went blank at once.

But the empty look in her eyes made Old Nine's sweat trickle faster: this was the look of a ghost or a god!

Old Nine felt the ice cold gaze of the divine coming from the girl's completely emotionless eyes. For a time, he felt unbearable regret toward his own attempt at cleverness. He quickly bowed his head respectfully, then stood and went to open the door.

The newcomer was the Exonerator who had brought Wei Chengxiang to the Land of Turmoil.

The Exonerator came in smiling brightly and said, "Hello, Brother Nine—I hope that your holy woman has rested well. Is she finding it comfortable here?"

Old Nine couldn't let Tai Sui think he was both reckless and useless, so he forced himself to concentrate and once again become a sly operator hidden in the southern mines. "She's doing well, thank you, Brother Exonerator."

“The Indignant Cicadas cry out against injustice, and the Exonerators correct unrighted wrongs. We are fellow travelers. There is no need for thanks.” After this brief small talk, the Exonerator got right to the point. “It’s like this. My lord heard that the holy woman has arrived and has gone out of his way to arrange a feast in the Looking South Building to welcome her. Will the holy woman be able to attend?”

Wei Chengxiang instantly came back to herself—the master of the Exonerators... Wasn’t that one of the people responsible for turning the southern outskirts into scorched earth?

Old Nine didn’t dare to take the initiative. He looked back to ask Wei Chengxiang for instructions with his eyes.

Wei Chengxiang’s hands, hidden under the table, tightened. This time, she didn’t consult the opinion of the senior in the reincarnation wood. She only said to Xi Ping, Uncle, I must go see this person.

“Cover your face. Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s people have seen you, so avoid being spotted by accident.” Xi Ping kept his eyes on Lü Chengyi and said to Wei Chengxiang, “Go ahead, I’ll cover for you.”

The unlucky Lü Chengyi hadn't expected that he would be completely exposed at first sight. He only felt something touch his spiritual sense with no warning and suddenly had a feeling that a master was watching him.

This powerful sense of danger came from behind him. It wasn't one of the two people from Heaven's Design Pavilion in front of him.

Xi Ping saw his back stiffen and his consciousness quickly scout around within a small range—yes, Xi Ping could sense his consciousness, even though Lü Chengyi's scouting consciousness didn't touch a single person.

No wonder that even when Liang Chen had only a skeleton remaining to him, he had still insisted on lying on the reincarnation wood pretending to be a god.

So this was what “divinity” felt like.

In Xi Ping's eyes, each and every one of Lü Chengyi's movements was infinitely magnified. Xi Ping could look up and see him head-on, but when he lowered his eyes, in the center of his brow he could “see” everything about Lü Chengyi: his slight gestures, where his gaze fell, his scouting consciousness...he could even faintly “see” the direction of the spiritual energy flowing through all of his meridians.

To Xi Ping, it was both novel and astonishing. At the same time, a terrifying thought rose in his mind: this Wuchang One...had he known that he was under Liang Chen's surveillance?

He must not have known.

As long as he was human, he couldn't endure this kind of observation, even if these two old men had been having an affair.

Right now, Wuchang One thought he had everything under control. He didn't know that someone else had him completely in his hold.

So...were there true ghosts and gods in this world? Who was watching him at this moment?

Thinking about this too deeply could simply make a person lose his mind. Luckily, Xi Ping was naturally light-minded and quickly put it aside—he didn't worship gods or believe in ghosts anyway.

He tried withdrawing his mind, calming himself, suppressing the excitement of capturing Wuchang One. As expected, Lü Chengyi could soon no longer sense him and hesitantly relaxed.

Then Xi Ping saw him draw back his consciousness and faintly look at someone.

Oh?

Under normal circumstances, at a time like this, shouldn't he check Lin Zhaoli's expression? After all, an established foundation cultivator had a strong spiritual sense. If it hadn't been his mistake just now and there really was an unknown master nearby, the established foundation cultivator would have been the first to perceive it.

But...why had Wuchang One glanced at Princess Anyang?

In fact, it was likely that the glance had been inadvertent. After all, the princess was in command at the southern mines, and she looked good enough to be a magnet for the eyes. It was normal for a subordinate to look her way when he felt uneasy.

But for some reason, Xi Ping suddenly thought that there was something wrong here.

So he asked, "When did you start traveling with the shipments, Lüshixiong?"

Lü Chengyi suppressed his unease and answered, "It's a long story. Nearly two hundred years now."

"Wow." Xi Ping sighed with emotion and "carelessly" turned to ask Pang Jian, "Shixiong, isn't that the same record of service as our General Commander Liang?"

Lü Chengyi tensed. He looked up just in time to meet Pang Jian's eyes, which were like two blades. He couldn't resist taking another look at Princess Anyang.

But even a dog could learn to scheme after living two hundred years. A human would naturally become shrewd.

Lü Chengyi took the unexpected hit from Xi Ping, but he only paused. Then, not giving anything away, he said with a smile, "You flatter me. Liang-shixiong was part of the first group of mine supervisors at the southern mines and made sacrifices for the country in his youth. My endowments are poor, and my cultivation is humble. How could I be worthy of being compared to him? Liang-shixiong was transferred back to Jinping some years ago. Has he been well recently?"

Pang Jian laughed meaningfully. "Thank you for your concern. I went to see him just a few days ago. He was doing quite well."

There were hidden currents surging under their small talk, but the bystanders didn't know that Liang Chen had already been disposed of by the Bell of Tribulation. Zhao Zhenwei said fervently, "As soon as I heard Her Highness's summons, I knew that the lords from Heaven's Design Pavilion had come. I've already booked a feast at the Missing North Building to welcome the two of you. The mines aren't going anywhere, Lord Pang, Viscount Xi. We half-immortals don't practice inedia, after all. Food is of paramount importance, right?"

Princess Anyang said jokingly, "It seems that I have been inconsiderate."

Zhao Zhenwei knew all the necessary tricks. Without a stumble, he picked up the princess's joke and took care of everything in a few words. Pang Jian had already sent out the karma beasts and had no choice but to follow along with the general plan. He took off the unseen glasses and allowed Zhao Zhenwei to take the lead, heading for the Missing North Building.

"Not even the birds come here to the Land of Turmoil, but we in the Great Wan encampment have our own civilization," Zhao Zhenwei explained as he walked. "The Looking South and Missing North Buildings are particularly well known. They both serve Southern He specialties prepared according to single extant copies of ancient texts—the Looking South Building is a little more authentic, while the Missing North Building has been slightly improved to accord with our Great Wan tastes. Many people from other countries scheme to get passports to come to our mines because they want to taste the old flavor of the south... Ah, here we are, shixiongs.”

In the mines’ bustling little town, there were two restaurants not far from the docks. One faced south, and one faced north; there was a street between them.

The turned up corners of the two buildings’ eaves were opposite to each other, and their terraces faced each other. The scent of wine floating out mixed together—it was the legendary flower wine of Southern He.

Just then, Xi Ping’s spiritual sense moved. A carriage was just passing by them at the intersection.

Wei Chengxiang had a spiritual stone in her mouth. She was using every free moment to meditate and practice breathing when she suddenly heard the senior in the reincarnation wood say, Look out of the carriage right now. Careful not to show your face. Look at a middle-aged man wearing a grey robe.

Wei Chengxiang was startled. She immediately opened her eyes and lifted a corner of the carriage curtain according to instructions.

But the first thing to meet her eyes was a young man in brocade robes. Though she only saw him in profile, his features were almost dazzling. This person was completely at odds with the gloomy and defeated Land of Turmoil.

Wei Chengxiang blinked involuntarily and thought, “Where did such a handsome nobleman come from?”

But the thought only flashed by in a hurry. She carried a blood feud, and there was terror at every step. The romantic wind that could easily crease a girl’s heart had already passed by like fleeting clouds. Wei Chengxiang quickly moved her gaze away from the young man and searched for the middle-aged man in the grey robe.

Lü Chengyi, walking at the end of the line, felt the reincarnation wood he was carrying heat up. His expression unwavering, he turned to look and met the eyes of a teenage girl.

Wei Chengxiang smiled at him, and Lü Chengyi nodded almost imperceptibly, acknowledging their respective identities.

The carriage and the people passed by each other.

“Uncle,” Wei Chengxiang excitedly asked Xi Ping, “is that person in grey you?”

“Bullshit.” Xi Ping felt that he had received a colossal insult. “The person I told you to look at is Wuchang One! Remember that face—that’s his true face.”

Wei Chengxiang: “...”

Why didn’t you say so before? I smiled at him for nothing.

Old Nine saw the “holy woman” replace the curtain, the smile quickly disappearing from her small face as it stiffened back into its icy manner. In spite of himself, he trembled with fear. He thought, “The holy woman is only a mortal now, but if she hadn’t lifted the curtain just now, I wouldn’t even have noticed that Senior One was nearby... Tai Sui is truly with her!”

He became increasingly deferential. When they reached the door of the Looking South Building, he jumped out of the carriage first and made a step with his hands to help the holy woman alight.

Wei Chengxiang simply stepped on him to get out of the carriage and heard the Exonerator meeting them at the door say quietly, “The Looking South Building belongs to our brother. It's safe. The private room is already prepared. Please enter.”

The carriage blocked Wei Chengxiang's skinny back. Across the street at the Missing North Building, the manager himself came out to receive the honored guests.

Zhao Zhenwei explained, “Our Mining Office anonymously supplies the funds for the Missing North Building. It's our territory. If we want to use it, no outside customers are accepted. There will be no interlopers here.”

With a street between them, the immortals faced south, and the evil cultivators faced north.

In the street, people came and went.

Traveling merchants brought goods and sold them on the spot, then took away exotic goods from the south. Because of this, there were stalls set up everywhere. Not far from the Looking South and Missing North Buildings, there was also a stage. Two Turmoilers in an iron cage were doing all they could to tear at each other. But the locals no longer found anything novel in this. Few people stopped to look. The fee-collector yawned from boredom.

The miners' children had found a kite somewhere and were running wildly holding the string. But the kite still sank and fell on a laborer cleaning river mud. The laborer was carrying a heavy weight and didn't have time to dodge. The kite knocked off his filthy hat and revealed a deformed face—he was also a Turmoiler. Thirty percent of Turmoilers were like witless mad dogs as soon as they were born; the rest, though they didn't look human, still more or less counted as human. They could voluntarily pull out their teeth and nails and go to the various nations' encampments to do hard labor...or herd spiritual beasts.

The urchins of the mines were used to seeing Turmoilers. They weren't afraid. They snatched the kite back and sent the laborer stumbling. The laborer cowered and didn't make a sound. Only when the urchins had run away did he cautiously pick up his hat and put it on. His gaze fell on the iron cage where the fight had already been settled. The laborer met the eyes of the heavily-breathing victor for a moment, then numbly put the stuff on his back again and continued shuffling forward.

The delighted voices of the urchins sounded along the street: "Untouchable! Untouchable!"

"Ah, that crowd of undisciplined wicked children." A waiter in the Looking South Building said solicitously to Wei Chengxiang, "Careful on the steps, miss."

Wei Chengxiang ignored him, walking up with her eyes fixed ahead of her. Someone opened the door of the private room for her, and surging spiritual energy poured out. The four walls, the floor, and the ceiling all had complex arrays drawn on them. They instantly put an end to the dull heat of the south.

A rather portly man stood up to welcome them and said, smiling, “Indignant Cicadas, we have been friends in spirit for so long!”

The Exonerators respectfully bowed their heads and saluted, calling him “my lord.”

“I am White Amaranth,”³⁶ the portly man said. “Mr. Nine, Miss Sixty, please sit down.”

Old Nine made small talk in the holy woman’s stead, saying, “Mr. White, a cup of your snow wine intoxicated all of Jinping City and added some very festive fireworks to this year’s New Year celebrations. What scope, what daring!”

“It’s not worth mentioning.” White Amaranth laughed and waved a hand again and again. “Not worth mentioning—you’ve had a long trip, Miss Sixty, escorting my disciples all this way south... Since time immemorial, the heroes have come from among the young. Is your Tai Sui well?"

Wei Chengxiang's eyes opened wide. In a daze, through the pampered man in front of her, she saw a burnt woman's corpse with a mouth that wouldn't close.

Like rusted carriage wheels, the girl's features under her veil slowly formed a...somewhat ghastly smile. "Thank you. Tai Sui has asked me to give you his regards, Mr. White."

And to send you on your way to the underworld.

In the Missing North Building, Xi Ping became Zhao Zhenwei's brother in a few words, exchanging eight hundred stories about "Little Immortal Luo behaving badly," lamenting that they hadn't met sooner.

After the two of them had put their heads together to bemoan the misery of cultivating at the Latent Cultivation Temple, Xi Ping casually leveled a false accusation against Prince Zhuang: "I always said I wasn't cut out for this kind of thing. It was all my cousin. He insisted on getting me into the Latent Cultivation Temple."

Zhao Zhenwei naturally went along with his subject, shaking his head and sighing. “I have no doubt you’re better off than me, Viscount. I’m the one who isn’t cut out for this. It’s only that my father truly exhausted his means to get the immortal envoy to look at me during the Grand Selection. He collected famous plants and hunted everywhere for green ore fields... I spent a whole year sleeping in a spiritual stone bed and had nightmares every night, afraid that the immortal envoy wouldn’t approve of me and I would let my parents down.”

Hearing this, Xi Ping poured a cup of wine, lowered the mouth of the cup, and ardently touched his cup to Zhao Zhenwei’s. “Ah, shixiong, we truly are in the same boat! Fate has brought us together!”

We both owe the Chen family a life. Don’t you think that’s a coincidence?

The dishes full of Southern He flavor flowed like water to their table. Xi Ping sipped flower wine, listening on one end to Princess Anyang bemoaning how long the southern mines had been plagued with evil cultivators, and on the other end to White Amaranth spouting empty rhetoric about the social ills of the day.

Zhao Zhenwei stood up to make a toast. He expressed that this would be the first shipment of the year and also his first time accompanying a shipment north since he had been transferred to the southern mines; he was absolutely petrified and would rely entirely on Lin-shixiong and Viscount Xi. The charlatan Xi Ping had his social graces; he took advantage of the moment to toast Lin Zhaoli, expressing that he was only going along to make up the numbers.

Princess Anyang also sighed and said, “With Lin-shixiong leaving, I’ll really have no one to rely on... Let me give a toast to Lin-shixiong, too.”

Upon hearing this, Lü Chengyi quickly stood up to accompany her: “The mines really can’t do without you, shixiong.”

Propped up high by the whole crowd, including a matchless beauty like Princess Anyang, Lin Zhaoli was utterly befuddled from self-satisfaction. Taking himself very seriously, he said, “Set your mind at ease, Your Highness. I’ll go to the inner sect to take care of the formalities, then request a token to leave the mountain. No matter what, I’ll help you arrange matters appropriately at the mines before leaving again.”

Then he set about passing judgment on all major worldly affairs.

Xi Ping lowered his eyes and listened as on the other end the Indignant Cicadas’ Old Nine said to White Amaranth, “This shipment will be more strictly guarded than prior ones, and there will be an established foundation master coming along to escort it.”

White Amaranth's smile became somewhat shallower. "Does Mr. Nine mean that we shouldn't attack this shipment but should take our time making plans?"

"No," Old Nine said gravely. "Senior One told me to ask you, Mr. White, whether you dare to seek riches amidst danger."

"What do you mean?"

"The southern mines' outer sect dogs are fighting amongst themselves. That established foundation cultivator Lin is haughty and self-important. He has offended someone without being aware of it." Old Nine said with emphasis, "There is someone who wishes him to die in transit."

The corner of White Amaranth's eye twitched.

"If you're bold enough, Mr. White, we can cooperate inside and out and catch a very big fish while the waters are muddy." Old Nine looked south, as if he could see through the walls to communicate with Wuchang One. "The spiritual stones we obtain will be split up proportionately according to the terms Tai Sui negotiated with you before, to be attested by spiritual covenant. If the collaboration goes well, we Indignant Cicadas may well swear brotherhood with the Exonerators."

As if the cloying sweetness of the flower wine was too much for him, Xi Ping gulped a mouthful of tea and glanced out of the corner of his eye at Lin Zhaoli, just delivering his pompous harangue. He thought that Linshixiong's nose was truly remarkable. He said inwardly, "In these two buildings right across from each other, there's a whole handful of people who want you dead, brother. How come you aren't sneezing?"

He had offended someone without being aware of it—in other words, Lin Zhaoli was investigating the traitors in the mines, but one of the "thieves inside the house" was evidently someone he didn't expect.

Someone who wished him to die in transit—he had been appointed by a certain person to escort the spiritual stones...

Just then, the karma beasts Pang Jian had sent to search the mines returned. A dozen avatars combined into one and climbed up along the design on the sheath of Pang Jian's sword.

Commander Pang had some discussion with the sacred beast. The karma beast shook its head in vexation, then disappeared.

Xi Ping was entirely unsurprised. These people had even settled on how to dispose of Lin Zhaoli; it seemed that the incriminating evidence had already been cleaned up.

When he lowered his eyes, he “saw” in the center of his brow as Lü Chengyi obscurely looked toward Zhou Qing. This time, Zhou Qing’s gaze happened to meet Lü Chengyi’s.

Princess Anyang lowered her eyelashes slightly, nodding with her gaze.

This gaze was extremely icy. There was absolutely no sign of being “at a loss.”

Xi Ping had a sudden realization: so that was it.

Since his mind had cleared after being muddled by her beauty, he had kept thinking that there was something wrong about Princess Anyang. Now at last he knew what it was—there was a contradiction in what Zhou Qing had said.

Liang Chen and the rest of the first group of mine supervisors had been placed in the southern mines only because their meridians had been harmed and they were unable to enter Heaven’s Design Pavilion. They had set the tone for the southern mines from then on—though they were both outer sects, the Mining Office was a rung below Heaven’s Design Pavilion.

A crowd of mine supervisors like this, even if they all went mad and got up the guts to collaborate in squeezing out the princess, would Zhou Qing put up with them for twenty years?

If so, her temperament was too weak and easily bullied; it didn't match the unruly princess she had described, who insisted on having anything she liked.

She had been only too anxious to agree to let Pang Jian search the mines. It wasn't that she had been oppressed for so long; it was that she had prepared everything and knew she had nothing to fear.

So Lü Chengyi's two glances at the princess earlier could be explained: the first time, he had noticed that a master had caught sight of him and suspected that Heaven's Design Pavilion had brought along another assistant, so he had asked the princess with his eyes how many people had come.

The second time, he had heard them mention Liang Chen without warning and had once again looked at the princess's expression; he had been concerned that Heaven's Design Pavilion had shared their purpose in coming and exposed his lie.

Xi Ping ate a mouthful of the meat of some unknown animal and felt that there were hardly any dishes on this table that weren't sweet. It was so cloying it made him lose his appetite. He no longer felt like eating and picked up a piece of lotus pastry to give Princess Anyang. He said appealingly, "My mom likes this kind of thing, but she doesn't dare to eat too much because she's afraid that eating too much and not moving enough will make her belt too tight. Auntie Qing, you work hard looking after the mines every day, so you should eat up."

Zhou Qing accepted with pleasure and asked in passing after everyone at the Yongning Marquis Manor.

Xi Ping used the skills he normally employed to please his mother, making the princess so happy she beamed.

Auntie Qing, you'd have been better off not mentioning this connection and sticking to seduction.

CHAPTER 49 - The Mountain Falls (1)³⁷

In order to put on an act for the inexperienced royal personage from Jinping, Ling County's thundering machinery stopped for several days. The chimneys shut their mouths. When snow fell, it instantly produced a clear blue sky.

The twenty-ninth year of Taiming, early morning on the second day of the year. The starry expanse had faded, leaving only the morning star.

The rising sun spilled a bowl of blood over the east. It was as much of a sham as the arrays on the gold smelter. Its light was cold; where it shone on the ice and snow, the ice and snow were completely untouched.

Ling County was the last stop in Suling. After he left here, Prince Zhuang would go to Guzhou. Before leaving, His Highness, as though fulfilling a social engagement, picked out a few little problems with the water transport office and the trading companies and let them change them or not as they liked, then praised the openness of Ling County's chamber of commerce, proclaiming: Good and righteous merchants form a reservoir of beneficence for their hometowns.

Ling County's magistrate and all the major figures in the chamber of commerce were beside themselves with joy. They wanted to have these words put on a decorative plaque that very day.

Who would have thought that extreme joy would bring tragedy? The decorative plaque was never hung.

That very night, the bodies of the Ling County magistrate and the president of the chamber of commerce were cut up into mincemeat, all mixed together, loath to part. Their blood was splashed over a whole street in the factory district.

In some sense, the “reservoir of beneficence” had in fact been realized.³⁸

Reasonably speaking, neither of the two men who died had been average people. Their homes practically had more guards than the county yamen³⁹ had bailiffs, never mind the arrays for preventing incursion and expelling evil all around their houses, which were active day and night—they were far more hardworking than the arrays on the gold smelter, anyway.

Magistrate Zheng’s manor even had unauthorized inscriptions.

But both arrays and inscriptions were tidily broken by the unknown assassin with a single slash of the sword; there was no other trace of a bladed weapon. Never mind the servants and guards; Magistrate Zheng had fallen asleep after fooling around with his concubine that night, and even she had no idea what time the person sleeping beside her had gone missing.

Were these mortal means?

While there were always evil cultivators active in the mortal world, the people had never before fought with officials. The Xuanyin Mountains hadn't fallen, and these evildoers dared to run rampant like this!

For a time, all the high officials and wealthy merchants of Suling were in a state of anxiety. The Suling Prefecture magistrate was furious and sent his subordinates to ask the local branch of Heaven's Design Pavilion to perform a thorough investigation. The sacred beasts quickly sniffed out traces of evil cultivators. But when Heaven's Design Pavilion went to arrest them, the evil cultivators had been warned ahead of time and fled.

The "heroic" story quietly passed by word of mouth among the commoners. People who normally would have handed over their own heads for a few copper coins unanimously kept silent.

The silent people gradually understood the truth:

Were the grand dwellings protected by immortals really so impregnable? Not at all. It turned out that those magical inscriptions could be broken.

Were these high officials with their roots so deep that even a prince couldn't shake their trees really so untouchable? No. It turned out that when heads were rolling everywhere, it didn't matter how tall your hat was.

These two people's deaths were quickly illustrated in pamphlets, which circulated among the not especially literate common people.

When everyone in the vicinity was willing to be an accomplice to evil cultivators, forget about some mere unauthorized inscriptions around the house; even the great array of Xuanyin would tremble.

At any rate, Suling's notables were in a panic.

On the night of the third day of the year, the bailiffs began going home by home and family by family making raids, searching for supporters of the evil cultivators. If there was a trace of suspicion, they would take people in without regard for the facts.

When the kings of the underworld lost their heads, of course the little devils would run wild. On the surface, the bailiffs were justly enforcing the law; in secret, they took the opportunity to reap benefits. They released those who could pay them and put those who couldn't pay in prison; they arrested even seventy-year-old greybeards and ten-year-old children as “murderous evil cultivators.” Mournful wails shook the sky.

The people’s fury, which had been one spark away from exploding, at last boiled over.

On the fifth day of the month, a group of workers in rags took up iron rods, shovels, and so forth, and charged into the homes of the county magistrate’s assistant and the patrol commanders.

No one had expected this—everyone had some protective immortal tool or array around the house. These things were more useful than any guard. Lions and tigers would be cooked, so what about mortals, who were no better than beasts of burden?

But when good advances a chi, evil advances a zhang—those bold evil cultivators mixed in among the workers and helped them break the immortal tools and arrays.

This time the beasts of burden had turned on their masters.

By the time the troops from the provincial seat of Suling arrived, not one of Ling County’s three patrol commanders was still alive. The fires in the factories reached the sky, and Great Wan's first gold smelter had reopened for the New Year.

Sometimes, all that's missing is a single hole in the dam, the first knife daring to fall for the whole country.

With someone to open the way, what follows can't be held back.

Prince Zhuang, who ought to have gone to Guzhou, mysteriously disappeared. All the branches of Heaven's Design Pavilion had too much to worry about. Even Xi Ping only received a brief "all's well" from Prince Zhuang.

Xi Ping was at this time already aboard ship.

He shut the white jade proximal and gasped for breath—in order to pick out Tai Sui's remaining followers, he had long ago removed the mind-clearing spell Zhi Xiu had placed on his spirit. Before, Xi Ping had already been able to control his consciousness, having made his first steps toward "being unmoved by external things." But in the last few days, for some reason, many more people had been calling for "Tai Sui."

The noise didn't stop day or night. Even if he removed distracting thoughts and meditated, wave after wave still battered his spirit, making him distracted and irritable.

“No good. I’m about to die from being cooped up. I’m going out to get a breath of fresh air,” Xi Ping told Xi Yue, then went out on deck.

The setting sun had fallen into the west, and the calls of the water dragons were audible on deck. A faint salt scent hit him in the face—they had reached the sea.

The spiritual stone shipment took a rather different route going north than the one Xi Ping had come by. After leaving Great Wan’s encampment, they had gone a short way north, then turned onto the Chunqiu River, going east directly to the sea. When they reentered Great Wan territory, they would put in at port and return to the canal in the interior by a runoff channel.

First, this was because the convoy was practically a navy. Adding in the water dragons to lead the way, once they entered the river, no one else could pass. Apart from their own country’s territory, no one would clear the river for them.

Also, when government ships transported spiritual stones, packaging, counting, stowage...every stage was extremely strict—this wasn’t like Prince Zhuang sending Xi Ping spare change and neither of them caring if ten or twenty percent of it was used up by the array. If the quantity of spiritual stones was a bit off, all the cultivators and crew aboard the convoy ships would be blamed. Going through rivers in the interior was unsafe. Even if no one set up cannons on land and lay in wait for them, while passing through another country's territory, they wouldn't even be able to handle someone burying an array under the riverbed.

“Viscount.” A page boy delivering food solicitously greeted Xi Ping. “The ship has been rocking since we entered the sea. Are you seasick? Should I bring you a cup of southern grape wine?”

Xi Ping quickly waved a hand and said, “Spare me. If you don't give me something salty to eat, enough acid will come up from my stomach to support a factory—is that for Lin-shixiong?”

“Oh, yes!”

“Then hurry up,” said Xi Ping. “He'll get mad at you guys again if you're late.”

Lin Zhaoli had just passed the established foundation boundary, and his state was unsteady. He also hadn't attained inedia yet. This gentleman was unusually picky. He only used the tableware he had brought himself; the bowls, chopsticks, trays, and dishes had to be put in fixed places; and the food had to be brought at exactly the time he said, neither a little early nor a little late would do. The only thing he hadn't stipulated was how many grains of rice should be in his bowl.

Xi Ping suspected he was cultivating the “way of fussiness”—this way had no benefits apart from making it easy for people to poison him.

When Xi Ping passed by the page boy, he slightly curled his left hand, hidden in his wide sleeve. The page boy's eyes went blank for a moment, as if his soul had been temporarily removed.

Using the skills he had learned gambling with dice as a teenager, Xi Ping quickly palmed a talisman and swept it over the food. The talisman disappeared in his hand. Next, thin white steam came up from the tea on the tray and vanished in midair.

These movements took only a moment. The page boy's vacant gaze quickly focused. He shook his head and muttered, “What was that sound...?”

Then he continued walking forward, having no idea what had just happened.

Xi Ping idly leaned on the railing, looking out over the sea. He “heard” the page boy pray to Tai Sui in his mind: “Bless me, Tai Sui. Let this go smoothly.”

Xi Ping thought, Nope, I’m not protecting you. I even have to curse you.

While there was still nothing he could do about the noise, if he met a Tai Sui believer face to face, his once-broken left hand was extremely effective. He could catch each one precisely. On this shipment convoy, apart from Wuchang One Lü Chengyi, all the other Indignant Cicadas were mortals. Xi Ping had tried a few times and found that the music made by his left hand could only affect mortals—once when there had been a musician at a feast, he had taken the opportunity to try plucking a string in Lü Chengyi’s mind, and the outcome was that not only had he been unable to affect his consciousness, he had instead touched Lü Chengyi’s spiritual sense.

Xi Ping deduced that this was because his own cultivation wasn’t high enough.

Fortunately, Lü Chengyi had a foot on two boats now and was ready to flee or die. He wasn’t planning on letting a single person in the convoy return alive, so he hadn’t been willing to bring along the other cultivators among the Indignant Cicadas.

Lin Zhaoli opened the door for the page boy bringing his food and glanced at Xi Ping, who was being buffeted by the wind not far away. Presumably he had heard Xi Ping mocking him just now; Lin Zhaoli didn't grace him with a smile.

This old brother was indifferent toward everyone. At any rate, in this shipment convoy, no one, not even Commander Zhao Zhenwei, was worthy of him so much as rolling his pupils down from checking the weather—he only cared about Princess Anyang. Before leaving, he had repeatedly consoled Zhou Qing, ardently guaranteeing that he would certainly come back as soon as possible. He wouldn't leave Her Highness all alone in the southern mines.

Xi Ping had looked on from the sidelines at this moving parting. He simply wanted to sigh: Within just three days of setting off, this weak and helpless good princess of yours arranged for you to be drugged twice. She's terrified that you'll come back.

Clearly there was a reason that Lin-shixiong, an established foundation cultivator and direct descendant of the Lin family, couldn't even look after the southern mines. As Xi Ping saw it, it was a pity to leave this kind of talent in the mortal world; he would be better off going back to the inner sect to cultivate in peace as soon as possible.

The detoxifying talisman he had used was a special kind of miasma clearing spell—the name alone told you that Pang Jian had taught it to him.

Pang-shixiong had said that toxicology was a broad and deep area of knowledge; you could forget about becoming an expert to save yourself at the last minute. If you wanted to guard against the plots of others, you only had to remember one thing—a mortal couldn't poison a cultivator. Ignoring whether the poison would work or not, as soon as the stuff was brought in, it would immediately touch the cultivator's spiritual sense.

If you wanted to poison a cultivator, you needed another cultivator to use spiritual energy to fabricate a toxin.

He didn't need to worry about what kind of poison it was. He only needed to use the miasma clearing spell to break up the spiritual energy in the poison. With a cultivator's constitution, swallowing arsenic or heartbreak powder would be no problem.

At first, Xi Ping had been pondering what kind of lie he could make up to reveal the information he had overheard to Lao Pang. But on the night of the one-day tour of the Missing North Building, Pang-shixiong had walked through the wall to see him, stared at him as he practiced the miasma clearing spell until he was good at it, then instructed: "Remember to use this on anything from Anyang."

Xi Ping: "..."

Fine. This Commander Pang had nearly cultivated to spiritual enlightenment in Jinping City; any problem obvious enough for Xi Ping to see, the old fox would have sniffed out long ago.

Though the two of them were always goading each other, they had quite a good tacit understanding when it came to presenting a united front toward the outside world; they could communicate with a single look.

Pang Jian said seriously, “I suppose your shifu gave you something to protect yourself with?”

“Yes,” Xi Ping answered, also solemnly, “a technique for wasting lots of money.”

“Piss off.” Pang Jian kicked him, then said, “Lin Zhaoli is an idiot, and that Zhao Zhenwei only thinks about having a good time. Neither of them is reliable. You were the one who turned my attention onto Lü. I don’t know how you figured it out, but I think your idea is right.”

Xi Ping sat up straight and heard Pang Jian say, “I looked into his background. He grew up in the mines, like me, then became a miner himself when he came of age. He must have a naturally good spiritual sense. Spending all his time in the spiritual mines, he opened his spiritual eyes by chance. Though quite a few mine supervisors became cultivators like this, it isn't a good thing when a miner opens his spiritual eyes—the superiors will first suspect that he's been embezzling. They'll hold him and subject him to strict investigation several times. Only when he's proven that he's done nothing wrong can he remain in the Mining Office as a disciple of record... As for whether you get soul-searched and turn into an imbecile or go on to be a half-immortal, it mostly depends on whether there's anyone with influence in the mines to protect you. The person who protected Lü Chengyi was Liang Chen. Generally speaking, that kind of gratitude is heavier than a mountain. It's within the realm of possibility to regard such a person as an adopted father. But the strange thing is, these two didn't mix afterward."

They had both spent most of two centuries in the southern mines, and their relationship had been as distant as ordinary colleagues. The spiritual mines' logbook even showed that of the ten senior mine supervisors, Lü Chengyi and Liang Chen had the smallest number of interactions. It was as if the two of them had been deliberately avoiding suspicion.

"If Anyang really is involved in this, this trip may be dangerous," Pang Jian said. "Look, find an excuse to stay at the mines with me..."

As soon as he heard this, Xi Ping wasn't having any of it. He thought, Then wouldn't I have come for nothing?

“Riches come in the midst of danger. Maybe I’ll be able to get to the bottom of their scheme,” Xi Ping said. “Shixiong, this is a serious matter. Practically all your subordinate walkers in the mortal world come from noble families. Their backgrounds are all deep-rooted and complex. If even Princess Anyang is involved, who can you trust now?”

Pang Jian: “...”

In fact, there was no one he could use.

“I think you’ll have to rely on me.” Xi Ping licked his lips. “Don’t worry, shixiong. No one knows about my natural spiritual bones. Even if they’ve heard that I joined Flying Jade Peak, it’s been hardly any time at all. None of them will take me seriously. If I’m really hard up, I can always peddle my charms. I think you’ll acknowledge that I’m better off in that respect than you, right?”

Pang Jian said, “What are you showing off for, pretty boy?”

He frowned and thought about it over and over. There really was nothing else to do.

“If Anyang really is involved in this, I don’t know what she could want. Great Wan is her and her family’s own home. Why would she go crazy and collude with others to steal her own things...?” Pang Jian frowned again. “We already know that these ‘thieves inside the house’ are colluding with Southern Shu.”

Xi Ping caught up quickly: “If they needed foreign aid for something, they would certainly want to use Southern Shu’s power.”

“Southern Shu isn’t a problem. You’ve already caused one calamity for them. It gets easier the second time.” Pang Jian waved a hand. “I’m going to warn you to look out for Chu and Northern Li—especially the Chu. They were involved that day by the spiritual beast pool.”

Xi Ping knew absolutely nothing about international politics. He gave a confused “oh.” “Why?”

“Because Southern Shu doesn’t have a border with us, you total ignoramus!” Pang Jian slapped him on the back of the head, resenting him for being unable to improve at once. “While that bunch of beast tamers at Lingyun aren’t necessarily good people, they certainly don’t want to see domestic upheaval in Great Wan. Southern He has become the Land of Turmoil, and Southern Shu has no strength with any hope of winning against Chu's Xiang family—you can study on the way, young master! You must at least know some history within the last two-hundred years?"

"Well..."

When Xi Ping thought of the word "study," it was as if some spell had been worked on him. All his lazy muscles ached again and again. He leaned against the railing for ages like a dead dog. Today the sea was all water, with nothing worth looking at. The evil cultivators on board the ships had also calmed down. All he could do was idly loiter back to his cabin and take out the Notes from a Progress to the West that Pang Jian had given him.

While he was going through his mustard seed, he paused—there was a pile of stuff in there.

Snacks, specially made rouge, little trinkets... These were things Princess Anyang had given him to take back to Madam Cui.

Very distrustingly, he had already inspected the items. There was nothing wrong with them. At Xi Ping's brief glance, the colors of the rouge were the ones his mother generally preferred. Because he had casually mentioned lotus wine, Zhou Qing had ordered several big cases of it packed up for him at the Missing North Building.

Before leaving, this princess had even gone out of her way to stop him and instruct, “Your Lin-shixiong needs to consolidate his cultivation. He isn’t likely to show his face unless something major happens. Just listen to your Lü-shixiong on the way. He’s spent his whole life traveling with the spiritual stone convoys. He knows everything.”

Xi Ping sighed. Zhou Qing hadn’t been making it up. She really must have been friends with Madam Cui when she was young. She had told him to “listen to Lü-shixiong” because she thought Lü Chengyi was one of her people.

She even thought she was pointing him toward safety on that ship of murder.

“Auntie Qing.” Xi Ping had been unable to resist then. He had tested Anyang, saying, “You aren’t happy here at the mines. You’re all oppressed. Just go back to the Latent Cultivation Temple. Be a steward for a few years, then go into the inner sect. This place in the middle of nowhere is unworthy of you.”

Zhou Qing’s smile had faded. Age had suddenly appeared on that girl’s face. She was silent for a moment, then finally said, “This empire bears the name of Zhou. His Majesty is still working hard, so how could I abandon him and flee into the deep mountains myself? It’s only that my abilities are limited, and there isn't much I can do to help him... You're a child. You don't understand."

So you're "helping" him by colluding with a foreign nation, robbing your own spiritual stone mines?

In fact, Xi Ping didn't understand. When he thought about it, he was at a complete loss.

He casually flipped through the book without really looking, then once again "heard" one of the people on the ship that he had marked out as a Tai Sui believer praying for divine protection. He used his spirit to "look" that way.

He heard the believer say to Lü Chengyi, "Lin has already taken the second dose of Mirage Powder. The final dose will be the day after tomorrow. It will take effect immediately. We'll have just reached the Resurrection Vortex. Our brothers are ready."

CHAPTER 50 - The Mountain Falls (2)

Xi Ping abruptly sat up straight and concentrated on the center of his brow. The whispers of all the evil cultivators in every corner of the convoy came to his ears.

“...the fourth watch...”

“...allies responded to confirm there was no mistake. The Shu will be disguised as evil cultivators...”

“Time to give them a taste of their own medicine...”

“The foulness clearing water dragons will...”

“When the Mirage Powder flares up...”

“Don’t worry, we can control the water dragons...”

“The inscriptions and the great array...”

Here it comes!

Xi Ping tapped on his knee, considering what he ought to do.

The bone qin in his hands was a little more useful than before...but only a little.

Apart from that sword energy of shifu's that was so expensive you couldn't buy it with your life, his bone qin only worked well when he had intent. For example, the music had only had the drive to cut through stone when he had been in mortal peril. Normally, if he wanted to use the music to hit a target, it would be hit or miss.

There were only the fingers of his left hand, which could play a silent string directly in a person's spirit that would produce the handy-for-kidnapping effect of confusing a person as soon as he touched the string. But this was also limited: first, the target had to be an Indignant Cicada who had spilled their blood on reincarnation wood; next, the target's cultivation had to be lower than his. Mortals...and perhaps cultivators who had just opened their spiritual eyes, he figured he could take care of those, but anyone with an especially high natural spiritual sense, or an old half-immortal with decades of experience, he definitely wouldn't be able to control; finally, his music could only affect one person at a time.

In others words, in dealing with Lü Chengyi, the "junior Tai Sui" Xi Ping's most effective weapon was trickery.

And in this convoy, apart from Wuchang One, there were about a dozen other Indignant Cicadas among the crew and entourage, dispersed among different freight and guard ships. Xi Ping could perhaps seize an opportunity to get up to a bit of sabotage when they struck, but he couldn't control the whole operation.

Apart from that, Xi Ping knew that he had one other disadvantage: though he believed he had been working very hard lately, he still wasn't as familiar with the inscriptions and arrays on the guard ships as those old half-immortals—the daily lesson papers covered in mistakes circled by his shifu were enough to help him dispel any illusions and act accordingly.

So all he could do was...abscond.

On the evening of the following day, Xi Ping accurately calculated when Zhao Zhenwei would be patrolling the main ship and started to warm up wine in his cabin. To the wine he added a drop of Maze that he had brought from Flying Jade Peak.

The ordinary wine immediately became exquisite. The fragrance made everyone who passed by his door unable to resist swallowing a mouthful of saliva. As expected, it lured Zhao Zhenwei in. Zhao Zhenwei was keen on making connections with everyone. He had already decided to make friends with the Viscount of Yongning. He started a conversation with “smells delicious,” was invited by Xi Ping to join him, and joyfully put aside his duty at once to go drink.

“You’re asking about the Resurrection Vortex.” Zhao Zhenwei smacked his lips over the taste of the wine and, very pleased with himself, said, “It’s a big area of whirlpools in the sea caused by the tides. When it begins to swirl, the sea can fill up with hundreds of thousands of revolving abysses. The biggest can be up to a hundred zhang—terrifying and magnificent. But we won’t see it. When we ship spiritual stones north, we have masters to calculate an auspicious time—not the way the almanac says when it’s suitable to start construction, break ground, or something. It’s when the Resurrection Vortex is calm.”

As Xi Ping encouraged him to drink, he said casually, “Then why don’t we just avoid that area altogether?”

“If we could avoid it, we would. There’s nothing to be done. The location where the whirlpools appear isn’t fixed. The range is very large. There’s no way to go around. Anyway, this is the Land of Turmoil. Where are we supposed to go to resupply?” At this point, Zhao Zhenwei shook his head. “Actually, sometimes I think, well, men are men. We can’t struggle against heaven.”

Seeing him begin to sigh, Xi Ping knew that the wine had gone to his head. He calmly poured him another cup and said naïvely, “Zhao-shixiong, I don’t like listening to this kind of demoralizing talk from you. Doesn’t everyone say that man is sure to triumph over heaven?”

Zhao Zhenwei waved a hand. “You’re still young.”

Xi Ping adopted a posture of requesting instruction.

Zhao Zhenwei had no authority in the southern mines. On one hand, he had to call everyone shixiong or shijie; on the other hand, none of his subordinates obeyed him. Having for once run into someone younger than him who wanted to consult his experience, he immediately developed an itch to be paternal.

“Man is sure to triumph over heaven?” He laughed a few times and downed a cup of wine without noticing. “Let me tell you—a man, once he comes out of his mother’s womb, there’s basically no suspense about how his whole life will go. Heaven decides whether he’ll be rich or poor. In my opinion, it’s best to let things go as they will—let’s say for example those commoners. A butcher’s son grows up and becomes a butcher, marries the carpenter’s daughter next door, lives on steadily for some decades, and then it’s over, and everyone is happy. I envy that. If you insist on ‘triumphing over heaven,’ concealing spiritual fields, hiding evil cultivators...or simply becoming an evil cultivator yourself, turning yourself into a monster, what's the benefit of it to this mortal world?"

Xi Ping was just peeling grapes. Perhaps he used too much force; he splashed his whole hand. Then, as if in a fit of temper, he tossed the grapes aside and didn't touch them anymore.

Xi Yue looked at him and silently took the fruit tray, peeled the grapes for him, then used a sliver of wood to pick out the seeds.

Xi Ping, with his eyes fixed on Zhao Zhenwei, said, smiling, "Zhao-shixiong, do you mean you can still run into evil cultivators while at the southern mines?"

"Ah, of course I've run into them, and not so long ago, just...just last year, an evil cultivator came after my home." Zhao Zhenwei was already starting to slur a little. "My...hic...my home, it's in Ning'an Prefecture, at the emperor's feet. Weren't they bold!"

"Wow," Xi Ping said, "astonished," "I had no idea something like that could happen!"

"And their cultivation wasn't low, must have been late open-eyed stage. Luckily, a shixiong from the inner sect had come to harvest the medicinal herb field that day and was staying with my family... Oh, you may not know about medicinal herb fields. They're green ore fields scattered all over the mortal world, of no use to us, but medicine cultivators often use them for planting medicinal herbs. There's a green ore field in Ning'an, it belongs to a forebear from our Zhao family." When speaking of his family's status, Zhao Zhenwei couldn't avoid some appearance of bragging. He said exultantly, "That evil cultivator was strong enough to force our inner sect shixiong to use an immortal tool that the sect had bestowed on him. The immortal tool gutted them, and they still kept coming. Finally they were carried away by their own accomplices. Fierce, no?"

When he wasn't paying attention, Xi Ping poured out the wine in his own cup and muttered, "Truly fierce. Must have been crazy?"

"Obviously." Zhao Zhenwei slapped his thigh and sighed. "What is this world coming to!"

Xi Yue put a small dish of cleaned up grapes in front of Xi Ping and carefully checked his expression.

Xi Ping didn't look at him. He conveyed a thought through the dragon-taming chain: I'm not angry.

Xi Yue pushed the dish forward again. If you're not angry, then eat something.

There was nothing Xi Ping could do about him. Expression unwavering, he took a deep breath and ate the grapes... They were cloyingly sweet, choking.

“Shidi, where did you get this wine? It’s great!”

Xi Ping said, smiling, “A family elder made it. If we weren’t going into the Resurrection Vortex tomorrow and I wasn’t worried about holding you back from your duties, Zhao-shixiong, I would certainly invite you for another round of drinking until we drop.”

“It’s nothing.” Zhao Zhenwei waved a hand, slurring. “Six water dragons are going into the water tonight, all the protections on the guard ships have been turned on. Even the Dragon King would have to make way if he showed up. There’s nothing to keep the two of us from drinking.”

“Good,” Xi Ping said, enunciating clearly, “then it’s settled. I’ll be waiting for you, shixiong.”

Assuming you survive the night.

A full moon rose over the waves on the sea. A figure silently entered the great water dragon array on the first guard ship.

The foulness clearing water dragons leading the way over the sea were different from the one Pang Jian had tossed into the canal by the docks. Once they entered the water, they were no different from the mystical dragons in ancient legend. The dragons' roars could make sharks, whales, and sea monsters within thirty li avoid them. Six water dragons dispatched at once and circling around would even let the convoy pass smoothly through a tsunami or a tempest.

Right now, there were two water dragons leading the way and four still in the great array. They were frisking around together in the three-zhang-square array like carp.

Lü Chengyi stood beside the array, reciting a spell. A pitch-black talisman gradually took shape in his hand.

The water dragons began to move restlessly. They opened their mouths and roared silently at the ill-intentioned man outside the array.

Lü Chengyi didn't so much as raise his eyelids. He abruptly pressed the talisman down. The water dragon array shook, all its spiritual threads trembling like ripples. The four water dragons first struggled fiercely. Then mist rose over their clear eyes, which gradually clouded over. A moment later, the water dragons stopped moving.

Lü Chengyi let out a breath, bit through his finger, and wrote on the reincarnation wood: “All goes smoothly.”

The writing was quickly absorbed by the reincarnation wood, then came to a stop in Xi Ping’s spirit—this was another thing Xi Ping had had Wei Chengxiang help him test.

He didn’t know how Liang Chen had had his believers use the reincarnation wood to send messages between themselves before, but Xi Ping, having fixed on a particular believer, could not only pick out that person’s prayers, he could also receive the messages they wrote in blood on the reincarnation wood. Once he had read the message, he could transmit it in its original form to another believer’s reincarnation wood.

In this way, Wuchang One communicated with the “holy woman,” with Tai Sui as a courier.

Right now, the “holy woman” was accompanying Old Nine and the Exonerators, acting as point of contact for the two sides. The Exonerators were already lying in wait. This message from Lü Chengyi was to give the “holy woman” a status update.

Xi Ping was arm in arm with Zhao Zhenwei, making a spectacle on the deck. Both of them were stumbling—even singing.

Lin Zhaoli looked outside and muttered “what a disgrace,” then slammed his door shut. The crew members passing by didn’t dare to say anything, either. All they could do was carefully stay by the railings to make sure these two nobles didn’t go overboard.

Luckily, these two showed no intention of swimming off their wine. Singing wildly off key, they went down into the ship’s hold.

The moment Lü Chengyi’s message touched Xi Ping’s spirit, Xi Ping, having reached a place in the ship’s hold that no one could see, without any hesitation dragged Zhao Zhenwei toward a wall. At the same time, he stamped a hither seal on the wall.

On the guard ship, a spiritual seal he had left behind earlier in a little corridor outside the water dragon array was instantly activated.

The two places immediately connected.

Xi Ping pushed Zhao Zhenwei in. There wasn’t a trace of drunkenness left on his face. He watched as Zhao Zhenwei and the spiritual seal disappeared together from the main ship.

Then he fixed his gaze on Lü Chengyi through the center of his brow. He saw Lü Chengyi, having just finished secretly tampering with the water dragon array, leave the water dragon cabin. Before he could even take a breath...he walked right into Zhao Zhenwei, reeking of wine.

Both of them froze.

“Hey,” Xi Ping said to himself, “you’ve been caught in the act now.”

Keeping calm, he said the name “Wei Chengxiang” in his mind and conveyed Lü Chengyi’s message. He casually said, “Don’t worry, he’ll be sending you another message soon.”

Wei Chengxiang opened her eyes. The spiritual stone in her mouth had already turned to powder. She sucked in a breath and grimaced, moving around, swallowing the powder along with blood.

At first she had kept quiet because she was scared of saying the wrong thing. Now she didn’t want to talk even when there was no need to hold back—having spent so long holding spiritual stones in her mouth, the roof of her mouth and her tongue were always being rubbed raw, healing, then being rubbed raw again. They were about to start festering. Never mind giving a long-winded speech; even when she drank a mouthful of water, she wished she could tear open her throat and pour it right in.

In the eyes of Old Nine and the others, at any rate, the holy woman became increasingly enigmatic.

Before Wei Chengxiang could answer, the roots of her ears suddenly caught a sound—perhaps because her spiritual eyes were loosening, she had recently begun having a faint sense of her spiritual sense gathering in her five senses. Her hearing and vision had been increasingly sharp.

As soon as the person at the door approached, she could hear who it was. She quickly folded up her out-flung legs, straightened her crooked hips and waist, and adopted a frosty posture.

A moment later, there were three knocks at the door. Old Nine quietly said, “Holy woman.”

Wei Chengxiang knocked once on the table, indicating for him to come in.

Old Nine came in with his head bowed, not daring to look the holy woman directly in the face. He said, “Holy woman, in a display of good faith, Mr. White’s side has already signed a spiritual covenant. I have read the contents. Take a look, holy woman. If this is good, could I ask you to sign the spiritual contract as Tai Sui's representative?"

Saying so, he took out a ball of "gold thread." When Old Nine stretched it out, it seemed as though line after line of golden writing was written on transparent paper. They leapt into Wei Chengxiang and Xi Ping's eyes. They saw that the writing listed how the two sides would collaborate, how they would divide up the spoils, and so on.

Wei Chengxiang skimmed it and came to the final ghastly term: If either party violates the contract, their spirit will shatter.

Wei Chengxiang said, Uncle, what is this?

Xi Ping: "..."

He had vaguely heard someone mention a "spiritual covenant" before, but there had been too much information at the time, and it had been too jumbled. He hadn't taken note.

Xi Ping quickly asked Xi Yue through the dragon-taming chain: What is a spiritual covenant?

Xi Yue, who studied in his place every day, quickly responded: It's a kind of contract written on the spiritual image. When both sides have given voluntary consent and shown good faith in the form of their heart's blood applied to the contract, the spiritual covenant is formed.

Xi Ping said, Can it be broken off? Violated?

Xi Yue said, The contract can't be broken off. Whether the terms can be violated depends on the arrangements. In lighter cases, the violator's meridians will be damaged or broken. In more serious cases, their spirit will be extinguished and their cultivation destroyed. Even if one side dies, if the spiritual covenant doesn't provide that it will dissolve upon death, the obligation won't disappear. The other side still has to honor it.

Xi Ping: "..."

Wei Chengxiang: "..."

Oh no. Why hadn't he taken precautions against this kind of thing?

Just then, Xi Ping's spine went cold. His spiritual sense had been touched. He gave a start and followed where his spiritual sense led him. To his shock, he found that Lü Chengyi and Zhao Zhenwei hadn't performed according to his script.

Zhao Zhenwei mumbled, "...Lao Lü?"

Having been bumped into on the scene after tampering with the water dragon array, Lü Chengyi didn't panic. He slapped a talisman to Zhao Zhenwei's forehead.

Zhao Zhenwei quickly tossed his head and sobered up.

"What's going on?" Lü Chengyi said grimly. "Weren't you patrolling the main ship?"

"I...was..." Zhao Zhenwei was confused for a moment, then realized something. "Did you just finish with the water dragon array?"

The two of them looked at each other in dismay, then said at the same time, "Oh no!"

Damn it, Xi Ping thought, I didn't expect this. Zhao isn't an evil cultivator, but he's still one of the thieves inside the house!

CHAPTER 51 - The Mountain Falls (3)

“Xi Yue!”

Xi Yue had been cleaning up the aftermath of the drinking party. When this shout came through the dragon-taming chain, the half-puppet was startled and broke a glazed cup.

Two figures—Lü Chengyi and Zhao Zhenwei—swept like a tornado from the first guard ship to the main ship. One headed for the lower levels of the ship’s hold while the other rushed straight to Xi Ping’s guest cabin.

The Indignant Cicada crew member who had been trying to poison Lin Zhaoli and bringing him food in the meantime was just passing by. To his astonishment he saw Lü Chengyi, who had always been mild and courteous, arrive at Xi Ping’s door, glance in with his consciousness, then break the door down without so much as a heads up.

“Senior... Exalted Lü, what’s wrong?”

Lü Chengyi ignored him. He stood grimly at the door—Xi Ping’s room was completely empty. There was only a broken cup on the floor, the aroma of wine still hanging around it.

Could this be coincidence? A bored young man using an immortal tool to make mischief, just happening to send Zhao Zhenwei to the guard ship?

The corner of Lü Chengyi's eye twitched over and over.

But if that was the case, why would even his mute servant be gone, without even having taken the time to clean up the broken cup?

Lü Chengyi turned abruptly and pursed his lips in a whistle. One of the water dragons leading the way in front of the convoy leapt out of the water. Lü Chengyi took a talisman between his fingertips and wrote "Xi Ping" on it. Then he tapped the talisman. It broke into a beam of light and dispersed into the sea, rushing toward the water dragon.

The water dragon roared, dove back underwater, then turned and headed back toward the area of the convoy.

"As soon as that brat Xi Ping realizes he's been seen through," Lü Chengyi thought, "his first response will definitely be to hide in the water. I have to keep him on the ship."

Xi Ping had already taken out the emergency "water-repelling pearl" Pang Jian had given him—when the pearl was thrown into the water, it could hold two people and stay submerged for a year and a half with no problem.

The pearl had already left his hand when he heard the roar. Xi Ping reached out to scoop the water-repelling pearl back up.

Damn it! That bum Lü!

His spiritual sense was touched once more. Part of it was the dragon-taming chain, part of it was a reaction from his left hand—Xi Yue was nearby and had run into one of the Indignant Cicada traitors.

The half-puppet Xi Yue had been originally made to hunt down spiritual objects for his master; he was unusually sensitive toward spiritual energy, so he could easily avoid the cultivators on the ship. But the crew were all mortals, and his luck wasn't very good. When he heard footsteps coming around the corner, he was trapped in a narrow corridor.

He couldn't be seen. Xi Yue wanted to go back up on deck at once, but the ship's hull surged fiercely, and the deafening roar of the water dragon came from the direction of the deck.

He had no way out.

Just then, the crew member stopped in his tracks.

The next moment, a familiar aura quickly approached. Before Xi Yue could turn around, he was scooped up. Xi Yue's vision swam. He was stuck under this person's arm and flew through the narrow passage like the wind, brushed past the dumbstruck crew member, and squeezed into a storage closet.

In about the space of a breath, the crew member's footsteps sounded once again. The Indignant Cicada crew member had no idea he had been hypnotized by the junior Tai Sui's "sleepwalking song." He kept walking forward without even changing the frequency of his footsteps.

Xi Ping abruptly let out a sigh of relief and caressed the back of Xi Yue's head. You were nearly a goner.

Feeling his hand, Xi Yue went cold. Young master, what's going on?

Xi Ping's head was buzzing. He first instructed Wei Chengxiang: Don't sign it, A-Xiang. Stall for time, I'll think of something.

Then he said to Xi Yue, Wuchang One just tampered with the water dragon array. I sent Zhao Zhenwei there. I didn't think that Zhao would be one of Anyang's people.

Xi Yue was stunned.

Xi Ping evened out his breathing. This damned shipment convoy. The commander is a traitor, the head of the guard is a traitor among traitors... Ugh, my tongue is about to tie itself into a fucking knot.

Lin Zhaoli thought he had caught the traitors in the mines by the tail and was prepared to lay down his life to eliminate this evil for Princess Anyang, but he didn't know fuck all. He was on the "bottom rung" of the complex southern mines.

Anyang herself was the head of the thieves in the house. She must have been very moved to receive this kind of fawning from him, both funny and irritating, and had casually arranged for Lao Lin to take a sumptuous cruise to the Western Heaven. But she was still only on the "middle rung," because she also hadn't thought that the person she had dispatched to send Lin Zhaoli to his death was a genuine article evil cultivator who had already made plans with his co-conspirators to finish off the established foundation Lao Lin and make off with all the goods—Lü Chengyi, as Wuchang One, was on the "top rung" of this dog-eat-dog game.

Xi Ping had succeeded in infiltrating the real evil cultivators' central altar and pretended to be a god, receiving sacrifices while listening in on their secret plans. He had thought he was sitting above them all, with a commanding view. But instead he had floated up too high, and his vision had been obstructed.

He said to Xi Yue, This is my fault. I've been negligent. I thought that if I kept an eye on the Indignant Cicadas, I'd have it all under control. I ought to have expected this. Anyang has everyone in the mines deceived and has to put on an act in front of Lin Zhaoli every day. If that idiot Lin could bear to put her to the trouble, I figure she'd have infiltrated them and been investigating herself—a genius like that couldn't possibly send Lü Chengyi as Lin Zhaoli's sole executioner.

Xi Yue had never seen Xi Ping so fretful. Even at the Latent Cultivation Temple, when he had been ready to smash himself to pieces and had ordered Xi Yue to go steal the inscription, he had still acted as though nothing were the matter, making Xi Yue think that there really wasn't anything the matter and nearly making him live the rest of his life full of remorse.

Xi Yue made an upright proposal: Why don't we just go out and face them directly?

Xi Ping held his head down. I don't need any lousy ideas from you.

Wasn't it stupid to think about saying to Idiot Lin "Zhao Zhenwei and Lü Chengyi are both Anyang's people, and they're sharpening their knives getting ready to sink you"? How could the old boy's heart bear that naked truth? He was sure to be shamed into anger. Anyway, he had neither witnesses nor physical evidence. It wasn't as if he could say "I guess I am Tai Sui"... But the other side might well have evidence.

Since Zhao Zhenwei was Anyang's man, what about the other cultivators on board? Xi Ping didn't know.

Playing tricks was like playing with fire while facing the wind; if you got slightly distracted, it would backfire and burn you. Xi Ping had learned this lesson at the Latent Cultivation Temple. But back then, it had only been him. Being smashed was no big deal. He'd gotten better after half a year in bed and forgotten the pain once the injury was healed. This time, he not only had Xi Yue with him, he had also gotten a little girl trapped in a den of evil cultivators.

That Lü Chengyi hadn't worked it out yet, but soon...

"A-Xiang," he called impatiently to Wei Chengxiang through the reincarnation wood, "listen to me, forget about it, we can take revenge together later—I'll help you. Things have gone badly, escape as fast you can now!"

As Wei Chengxiang pretended to carefully examine the contents of the spiritual covenant, she secretly said to him, “Uncle, we aren’t on a ship, did you forget? We’re in the Exonerators’ immortal tool, under the sea. Where am I going to escape to?”

Xi Ping closed his eyes and bit the tip of his tongue to force himself to calm down, then focused on Lü Chengyi.

He saw that the water dragon’s movements had alerted Lin Zhaoli, too.

“What’s going on?” Lin Zhaoli’s cabin was next door to Xi Ping’s. He came out and saw Lü Chengyi standing in front of Xi Ping’s door with a strange look, then frowned and said peevishly, “What’s the matter with that precious Viscount now?”

Lü Chengyi looked up at him.

Lin Zhaoli was short-sighted and full of himself, but he was still an established foundation. Between open-eyed and established foundation, a “half-immortal” became an “immortal”; the distance between the two was like a chasm. It wasn’t everyone who had the abilities and natural endowments of Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s Pang Jian; Lü Chengyi and Zhao Zhenwei put together wouldn’t be worth a wave of Lin Zhaoli’s sleeve.

Lü Chengyi put on a reluctant expression and said, deliberately ambivalent, “I’m not precisely sure what’s happened myself, but the Viscount of Yongning has an immortal tool that I think is somewhat improper. I wanted to ask him about it.”

Lin Zhao said, “What immortal tool?”

“Something like a transport array,” Lü Chengyi said awkwardly. “Transport arrays are prohibited on the convoy ships, but this is the Viscount’s first time here, so he may not know the rules. He was joking around with Commander Zhao and used something that transported Commander Zhao right to the first guard ship. Commander Zhao thought this improper, so he told me to come ask.”

Just then, Zhao Zhenwei ran over, head covered in sweat, just about to tell Lü Chengyi that Xi Ping was gone, and unexpectedly met Lin Zhaoli’s eyes, which were like stars on a winter night. He had a guilty conscience and was so scared his legs went weak on the spot.

But Lin Zhaoli gave him a cold look and said, “Sobered up?”

Zhao Zhenwei stuttered and didn’t dare to answer.

Lin Zhaoli snorted. “Where are the two transport points? Take me to look at them.”

The hither seal’s spiritual seals had vanished, but it was only an open-eyed immortal tool, after all. An established foundation cultivator could still catch a sliver of leftover aura.

Lin Zhaoli passed a hand over the leftover aura of the spiritual seal and thought it was familiar... He seemed to have sensed this aura somewhere else recently—where was it?

On the way, Lü Chengyi and Zhao Zhenwei exchanged a veiled look. Lü Chengyi said, “Commander Zhao, when you were transported, did you notice anything wrong on the first guard boat?”

Zhao Zhenwei stuttered, “N-no, I was scared sober at once...”

Lin Zhaoli paused: right, the water dragon array was on the first guard ship, and the water dragons were going to enter the water tonight!

He turned toward the water dragon cabin, pushed aside the good-for-nothing Zhao Zhenwei, and charged in.

He saw that the four water dragons in the array, which had previously been lively, seemed to have been bewitched; the four dragons were head to tail, going in circles mechanically.

Lin Zhaoli rolled up his long sleeves. When one of the water dragons swam by the edge, he made a grab in midair and picked it up.

The water dragon left the array and spasmed. Then a fierce look appeared on its face. It attacked indiscriminately, snapping its jaws toward Lin Zhaoli!

Lin Zhaoli grabbed the water dragon by its weak spot; at the same time, he gave a quiet rebuke and placed a talisman on the water dragon.

The water dragon arched stiffly. Then, black gas spurted out of its mouth, the stench assaulting the nostrils. The water dragon's body relaxed. The shadow in its clouded eyes dispersed, its eyes once again became clear, and it looked at Lin Zhaoli in confusion.

Lin Zhaoli, his expression grave, threw it back into the array. The other three dragons seemed to think some foreign creature had come and immediately stopped circling, surrounding the clean water dragon, full of hostility. Before they could attack, Lin Zhaoli abruptly slapped the water dragon array, "cleaning" the mud from the heads of the other three dragons as well.

After the water dragons entered the sea, their bodies would grow up to a hundred zhang long, their roars turning to rain, their breath turning to mist. If these water dragons had been released into the sea after being tampered with, they would have capsized the convoy.

This wasn't mischief. This was extreme malice!

Lü Chengyi put on a show of shock, saying, "What...what is this?"

"A hypnotic art from Shu, used for large-scale hunts of spiritual beasts living in groups," Lin Zhaoli said coldly. "They can make spiritual beasts attack each other. Before being subdued by the Southern Sage, the water dragons also amounted to spiritual beasts."

"How would a kid just out of the cottage know of a hypnotic art from Shu?" Lü Chengyi first muttered to himself, then said, "Wait, I think that servant of his wears a dragon-taming chain on his neck!"

Hearing this, Lin Zhaoli frowned. Then his expression changed abruptly—he had just remembered what that familiar aura from earlier was.

On the night he had led people to scout out Southern Shu's encampment, he had been responsible for attracting the notice of the Shu and sent his subordinates to search for the spiritual stones that had gone missing from the mines. When his subordinates had been about to find the way, the spiritual beast pool had collapsed and even attracted the Chu, who had only wanted to see more chaos.

At the time, there had been a faint, peculiar aura at the overturned bottom of the spiritual beast pool, identical to what he had sensed just now!

It was Xi Ping who had collapsed the spiritual beast pool. He had been working with the Shu!

Lü Chengyi took the opportunity to add, “Lin-shixiong, Shu’s Lingyun Sect often resorts to insidious tricks. You’ve been staying next door to the Viscount of Yongning these past few days. Have you felt unwell?”

Hearing this, Lin Zhaoli was startled. He quickly sank his consciousness into his flesh and bones and inspected himself from top to bottom several times, inwardly reciting a miasma clearing spell three or four times. Seeing that there was nothing out of the ordinary, Lin Zhaoli finally relaxed.

Maintaining his haughty pose, he sneered, “How could I be unwell? A kid who’s only just begun to cultivate—even if I stood here and let him scheme against me to his heart’s content, what could he do to me?”

Xi Ping, witnessing this scene: “...”

I'm begging you, sir, don't brag.

Xi Ping had never felt so oppressed in his life. Idiots were just like the limited edition products Cui Ji put on its shelves—you had to fight for them. First come, first served, and if you didn't snatch one up, someone else would get there before you!

“Thank heaven.” Lü Chengyi exchanged another look with Zhao Zhenwei and said, “How truly fortunate...”

When a low level cultivator poisoned a master, it would only work if the target was unprepared. In the early stages, Mirage Powder had no symptoms, and an ordinary person wouldn't scan his own body with a miasma clearing spell for no reason. Once the drug took effect after three doses, no medicine would work against it. But supposing the established foundation cultivator was paranoid and thought people were always trying to kill him, and checked himself for poison daily, he would certainly be able to detect a toxin created by an open-eyed cultivator.

Reasonably speaking, Lin Zhaoli ought to have taken two doses of Mirage Powder by now. Saying that there was nothing amiss with him meant that he had never been poisoned at all!

Given the Venerable Lin's idiocy, he certainly couldn't have avoided the poison on his own. Someone must have removed the toxin for him—in other words, ever since boarding the ship, Xi Ping had known what they were planning!

Zhao Zhenwei simply didn't dare to think about it closely. As soon as he thought about it, he felt his guts about to tear; the good-for-nothing could hardly keep his innards together. There was only one thought left in his mind: "It's over, it's all over."

Lü Chengyi, meanwhile, thought, "That Yongning Viscount is such a profound schemer, yet he couldn't tell that that good-for-nothing Zhao was like me, one of Anyang's people. That shows that Heaven's Design Pavilion doesn't understand what's going on in the southern mines. From beginning to end, they've only had their eyes fixed on us Indignant Cicadas."

But where had the leak been?

How could there be such a coincidence? He had just finished tampering with the water dragon array when Zhao Zhenwei was tossed onto the first guard ship. It was as if someone were watching his every move...

Lü Chengyi narrowed his eyes. He had only revealed the information to one person: Miss Sixty, their new holy woman.

That little girl knew too much. And, starting from the day he had told Old Nine to mention it, he had been able to communicate with her through the reincarnation wood. These were certainly Tai Sui's methods. It must be true that Tai Sui's consciousness and hidden bones were attached to her.

But they had all overlooked the fact that she hadn't opened her spiritual eyes yet, so her body couldn't be snatched. She had her own mind...

The "holy woman" had perhaps already betrayed them.

Though he didn't know how a mere mortal like her could do that under Tai Sui's nose, it was clear that under these circumstances, that was the only reasonable explanation.

Heaven's Design Pavilion, Pang Jian, Xi Ping... What excellent methods.

But who said that god only helped good people?

Lü Chengyi turned and said to Zhao Zhenwei, "Commander Zhao, please give the order for the whole convoy to stop and hunt down the evil cultivator."

Zhao Zhenwei said, "I..."

“Wait,” Lin Zhaoli said, interrupting him. “That’s wrong.”

As soon as Lü Chengyi frowned, he heard Lin Zhaoli continue, “I mean it’s wrong of you to say ‘evil cultivator’—you’re too distant from the sect and perhaps haven’t heard. This Xi Ping was originally a disciple from this year’s class at the Latent Cultivation Temple. Apart from him, the other new disciples are all still there. He was able to leave the mountain ahead of schedule because he was chosen by the inner sect.”

Lü Chengyi’s heart stuttered.

Zhao Zhenwei simply said, dumbfounded, “Th-the inner sect? Which peak?”

Lin Zhaoli expelled a breath through his nose, seeming exasperated and bewildered. “Flying Jade Peak, General Zhi—I don’t know whether this person was bad to begin with and got into the inner sect by using some evil art to bewitch General Zhi, or whether, as a young disciple with no experience, he was targeted by evil cultivators after leaving the mountain... Anyway, I’ll first use my consciousness to locate him. You two control him. Don’t harm him. Wait until I write a report to the sect and to Heaven’s Design Pavilion.”

No sooner had he spoken than the consciousness of an established foundation cultivator covered the whole convoy. The water dragons at the bottom of the sea came up uneasily. Under this absolute force, Xi Ping instantly had nowhere to hide!

Lin Zhaoli tossed out a talisman and fixed on Xi Ping, then calmly drew back his consciousness. "Go get him."

Zhao Zhenwei immediately turned his head to look at Lü Chengyi: We're dead. What should we do?

Lü Chengyi ignored him. He lowered his head and accepted Lin Zhaoli's orders.

Then Lü Chengyi turned quickly and personally took some people to get Xi Ping. As soon as he was out of Lin Zhaoli's sight, his hand, hidden in his sleeve, pulled out a talisman and tossed it into the water without anyone knowing.

"There's nothing to be done," Lü Chengyi thought. "We'll have to bury these people here ahead of schedule."

Meanwhile, Old Nine, waiting for the holy woman to inspect the spiritual covenant, felt the communication tool that he carried heat up slightly.

Surprised, he thought, “Isn’t Senior One already in contact with the holy woman? Why would he contact me in private?”

To keep the holy woman from getting paranoid, Old Nine excused himself and left Wei Chengxiang’s room. Outside the door, he quickly took out the immortal tool and looked at it. After just one glance, he gave a start.

It said: I suspect the holy woman of betraying us. Force her to sign the spiritual covenant and attempt to alert Tai Sui.

CHAPTER 52 - The Mountain Falls (4)

Before Lin Zhaoli's consciousness reached him, Xi Ping had already come to a decision. He gave Xi Yue his mustard seed and left himself a small bag of spiritual stones.

Xi Yue immediately realized what he was planning and abruptly took a step back. But before his foot could land, the dragon-taming chain held him in place.

Xi Ping said, Hide in the water-repelling pearl, jump into the sea.

Xi Yue said urgently, No! Young master, I won't...

But the dragon-taming chain had stripped him of the right to say "no." All Xi Yue could do was watch as he was forced into the ocean like a real puppet. He resisted with all his might, but with the dragon-taming chain around his neck, he couldn't even look back.

For a moment, Xi Yue hated himself, hated the dragon-taming chain that he had personally taken back, even hated Xi Ping.

The water-repelling pearl gently wrapped around the half-puppet's body and continued to sink into the water. It stuck to the bottom of the ship and disguised itself as a big swath of barnacles, hidden among all the others.

At the moment, Xi Ping could only protect the half-puppet's life. He had no time to attend to the little devil's feelings. When the water-repelling pearl entered the water, Lin Zhaoli's belligerent consciousness had already reached him. Next, Xi Ping was firmly nailed in place by a talisman.

The talisman wasn't very polite. Xi Ping felt like a fly caught in a spider's web. Even his internal organs were wrapped up. He paid no attention to it. He closed his eyes and ignored Xi Yue's enraged babbling. Through the dragon-taming chain, Xi Ping sensed a water dragon swimming past the bottom of the ship. The dragon's beard nearly brushed the water-repelling pearl.

The water dragon seemed slightly suspicious and circled Xi Yue's hiding place a few times. The dragon's huge eyes fixed on the water-repelling pearl.

Xi Ping's hands and feet were stuck fast by the talisman and wouldn't move, but he could still move his fingers. He already had the ascended spirit sword aura on the string.

The next moment, the voices of the people coming to arrest him sounded. The water dragon turned its head and swam away without interest—it was a foulness clearing water dragon, and Xi Yue wasn't foul. This wasn't the person it had been ordered to find; there was no match—it took Xi Yue inside the water-repelling pearl for seafood on the bottom of the ship.

Xi Ping's fingers abruptly relaxed. He set half of his worries at rest.

It was fortunate that Xi Yue was very cautious and reserved, and ordinarily had little contact with outsiders. Everyone on board thought that the mute half-puppet wasn't all there. Apart from his face, which looked human, he seemed about the same as the straw children in the Latent Cultivation Temple. No one took him seriously.

Xi Ping took a glance at the talisman on him. It wasn't that he couldn't use the sword energy to destroy the talisman and escape. It was just that if he did so, Lin Zhaoli would certainly split off his attention to hunt him down. The Shu allies and the Exonerators were still waiting nearby. It would be very unprofitable for them to have an internal conflict. Anyway, one person's head was only so big. If Xi Ping was devoting attention to dealing with pursuers, he wouldn't have time to attend to Wei Chengxiang—she was in more danger.

Lin Zhaoli wouldn't dare to kill him, anyway. His ultimate defensive move had to be used only at the critical moment.

While making arrangements for Xi Yue, Xi Ping had kept his attention on Lü Chengyi from start to finish. Just then, he glimpsed the private exchange between Wuchang One and Old Nine.

His worries, eased due to Xi Yue's temporary safety, were renewed.

This was bad. That old fox Lü Chengyi had caught on faster than he had anticipated!

Before he could think about it carefully, through the reincarnation wood, he had already seen Old Nine return to the room with a strange expression.

Though Old Nine was still as respectful as before toward the holy woman, his hands were hidden in his sleeves.

In fact, as soon as Old Nine had exited, Wei Chengxiang had known things had gone wrong—not because her spiritual sense was good and her instincts were accurate, but because the senior in the reincarnation wood had just called her “A-Xiang.”

When this senior spoke to her, it was “you” this and “you” that.

Occasionally he would bring out her full name and call her “Wei Chengxiang.” Every time he called her “A-Xiang,” it meant something was wrong.

But she didn't panic.

When she was little, her grandpa had said that a person's temperament determined their manner, and their manner would also in turn influence their temperament, so he hadn't let her fight and curse like the country children, saying it would "change her temperament." She didn't believe it. She hadn't dared to do anything in front of her grandpa, but behind his back she had made quite a lot of trouble. Only now did she suddenly find that while the old man's words had been pedantic, there was some sense in them. It turned out that manner really could influence temperament. Before, she had acted like a child and had a child's temperament; now she had a mouthful of blood and was putting on the act of holy woman, cold as ice. After long enough putting on that act, it seemed as if it had grown on her, steadying her soul.

A hundred zhang under the sea, encircled and watched by demons, Wei Chengxiang wasn't uneasy. She had calmed her mind and read the contents of the spiritual covenant just now. She determined that this must have been drafted by the Exonerators.

The Exonerators were afraid that they would be used and then dumped. Their primary point of concern was after the fact—how they would divide up the spiritual stones, that neither side would betray the other, and other such terms were precisely stipulated. But as for how the operation was to be accomplished, the spiritual covenant skimmed over it. It only said “both sides will exert all their efforts to cooperate from within and without” and so on and so on—robbing Great Wan’s shipment convoy couldn’t be done without exerting all their efforts. The Exonerators took it for granted that in this section, everyone’s interests were aligned, and they would all naturally pull together.

Old Nine walked in, beaming, and said, “Holy woman, have you finished reading the spiritual covenant?”

Before Wei Chengxiang could answer, the senior in the reincarnation wood urgently warned her: Wuchang One just sent a private message to Old Nine, telling him to force you to sign the spiritual covenant.

Wei Chengxiang’s pupils contracted slightly. She inwardly asked Xi Ping, “What does Wuchang One suspect me of?”

Xi Ping said, “He suspects that though you’ve been possessed, because Tai Sui can’t snatch your body, you’re exploiting that advantage right under his nose to sell him out to Heaven’s Design Pavilion—I’ve let you down this time. I messed up.”

Just then, the cultivators pursuing Xi Ping charged in but didn't dare to approach. They first overcautiously tossed a dozen immortal tools to suppress spiritual energy at him—there were enough to tie up a gold-armored zheng!

Xi Ping's hands were bound behind his back, and every finger was strapped down by thin threads like silk. If he only moved a finger slightly, these sharp threads would cut into his bones.

Wei Chengxiang: "..."

There's no need for you to admit it so openly.

An evil cultivator who could crush her with one finger was watching her menacingly, but oddly, Wei Chengxiang wasn't nervous at all. Instead, she rather wanted to laugh.

She thought it was miraculous. The senior in the reincarnation wood certainly wasn't any sort of good person who treated others with sincerity. Every time he instructed her in swindling people, it was as if he had brought those skills out of his mother's womb; when he chatted, his mouth ran like a Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon. But for some reason, on critical matters, he had never put on an act with her. For example, the first time he had spoken to her, he had simply unmasked Tai Sui's shrine, having no intention of tricking her into worshipping him as a god; now that she had been exposed out of nowhere, as soon as she felt a bit of suspicion and before she'd had a chance to think of blaming him, he had already neatly carried off the blame.

Why? Did he think there was nothing worthwhile about tricking an inexperienced country girl?

Perhaps it was because of this that she had dared to go on the road alone with a reincarnation wood amulet. She was a wanderer with no roots at her feet. For her, the human world was a never-ending tempest. Fate always pointed in the direction of "sudden events."

Only this piece of reincarnation wood was real.

It was the only fixed point in her unsettled exile.

"Since you've finished reading it, why haven't you signed it yet, holy woman?" Old Nine said, smiling, his hands hidden. "Each and every term was negotiated by you according to Tai Sui's own instructions. What, does he have some other misgivings?"

The atmosphere became a little dangerous.

The smile at the corners of Old Nine's eyes disappeared. He lowered his voice and said, "Don't make our brothers the Exonerators wait too long. The sea is vast, and we're relying entirely on their immortal tool...for our survival."

Wei Chengxiang met his eyes without dodging, saying to Xi Ping, "If there's no way around it, I can sign."

In the spiritual covenant, there were very few stipulations in the part about stealing the spiritual stones. There were many loopholes to take advantage of. It wouldn't impact her ability to lure the evil cultivators onto the wrong path. As for later, when she killed White Amaranth and received the backlash from the spiritual covenant... Never mind.

She was willing to walk this road of revenge: the ill-intentioned evil cultivators, the lackeys who bullied men and tyrannized women, the water transport office that kept everyone in the dark, the heavens pressing down on the heads of all living things... She would go as far as she could. If she exerted all her strength and could only get this far, then she would acknowledge it. If she could really drag these demons to their deaths, that would also be good.

"Nonsense." Xi Ping had read the clauses of the spiritual covenant even faster than she had. As soon as he heard her, he knew what she was thinking. He scolded, “Sign your ass. Put that knife down!”

Old Nine smiled. “The holy woman does indeed still obey Tai Sui.”

Xi Ping was pushed out onto the deck with brute force. He staggered and nearly went to his knees. He said angrily, “What’s wrong with all you women? Don’t you understand ‘while the green hills last, there’ll be wood to burn’?⁴⁰ Why do you all love walking the road to ruin so much?”

Wei Chengxiang’s gaze fell on the flashing spiritual covenant. “While I don’t know who you’re talking about, my guess is...it may be because we never had ‘green hills’ to begin with?”

Xi Ping froze.

Just then, Zhao Zhenwei came down flying his sword and landed precisely in front of Xi Ping. This coward who had been so scared he couldn’t straighten his knees after the earlier incident saw Xi Ping, and his cowardice instantly fermented into violent rage. If he hadn’t had scruples on account of Lin Zhaoli, Xi Ping sensed that he might have come over and stabbed him without any hesitation.

Through the reincarnation wood, Wei Chengxiang calmly explained to him, “A woman always has fewer roads. It’s possible that with just one slip, all she'll have left is the road to ruin. It's no wonder my grandpa always made me dress as a by."

She had always been angry at him for making her look so plain. She hadn't really understood.

For some reason, Wei Chengxiang's voice for a moment didn't seem like that of a sixteen-year-old girl. It sounded a little deep, like a weary singer who had once again spent all night singing beside the Lingyang River.

Many thoughts swirled in Xi Ping's mind like a windstorm. In the moment his eyes met Zhao Zhenwei's, he had a sudden thought and silently mouthed to Zhao Zhenwei: Traitor to the nation. The evidence is undeniable. You're done for.

The inside of Zhao Zhenwei's mind roared. The already strained string snapped, and his reason collapsed.

He stepped forward and pulled on the immortal-binding cords holding Xi Ping. The cultivators around them were caught unawares.

Xi Ping nearly folded back at his attack. Bloody light appeared around Zhao Zhenwei's hands as they were carried along by his momentum. He grasped Xi Ping's neck and at the same time fiercely kicked Xi Ping's knee—his kneecap broke at once!

Meanwhile, Wei Chengxiang lowered her hand toward the blade—

In an instant, Xi Ping's left and right hands curled at the same time. The left hand played a "silent string," the right hand's bone qin let out a sharp note, and the silk threads pressed close to his hands cut into the joints of his fingers like a sharp knife slicing through grease. Wei Chengxiang felt her mind shaken by a huge noise. For a time, her whole body was paralyzed. Her hand, pressed to the knife, wouldn't move down one bit.

At the same time, the sound of the qin also disturbed the others. Lin Zhaoli flicked Zhao Zhenwei aside with a wave of his sleeve. Xi Ping went to one knee. There was a new red mark on his neck.

From the cracks between his eyelashes, which were full of cold sweat, Xi Ping looked at Zhao Zhenwei. Perhaps because he was too anxious, he didn't notice the pain at first. He only smiled at Zhao Zhenwei, who was full of incompetent rage, succeeding in turning Zhao Zhenwei's face ghastly pale.

"Jiang...Wei Chengxiang, I'm not dead yet. How did you accidentally end up with only a road to ruin?" Xi Ping said with distinctly. "Do what I say."

Old Nine watched the holy woman pick up the knife, then suddenly go rigid—she wasn't voluntarily not moving. All the muscles in her body were being locked at once by an external force, so she couldn't move. Next, Wei Chengxiang began to tremble, her jaw extremely tense. She seemed to be struggling to throw something off, her whole body a contest of strength. There were two forces fighting to the death in that one body, one side trying to put down the knife, the other trying to press her hand to the blade. The girl's originally not very evident veins all stood out.

The sight petrified Old Nine. "Holy woman?"

Clank. The knife fell to the ground. Wei Chengxiang stepped on it.

In the space of a moment, she seemed to have been scooped out of the water. Her whole body was covered in sweat.

Wei Chengxiang raised her head. The look in her eyes had changed, as if she had removed a mask. She smiled at Old Nine. "I'm sorry, your Tai Sui's orders...don't have much sway with me right now."

Receiving the news, Lü Chengyi was startled—Tai Sui was so weak that he couldn't even fully control a mortal!

No wonder that little bitch could contact Heaven's Design Pavilion under his nose. This was a perfect explanation!

It seemed that the destruction of his true body had done far more harm to Tai Sui than Lü Chengyi had imagined. Those damned blue-clothed dogs! What the hell had they done to him?!

Now, they not only couldn't kill that little bitch, they also had to protect her body, or else Tai Sui's frail hidden bones might not be able to withstand another upheaval.

Old Nine looked down at the girl he had squeezed unconscious. He was caught in a dilemma—he hadn't dared to squeeze with too much strength, afraid that that fragile neck would snap if he squeezed too hard. There was nothing to be done about the spiritual covenant. It had to be signed by her personally in order to be imprinted on her spirit. With the girl unconscious, even if he bled her dry and smeared the blood on the contract, it still wouldn't take effect.

“Senior One, what do we do?”

“Don't panic, I'm thinking.” Lü Chengyi had also broken out in sweat all over. “Don't alert the Exonerators. Wake her up in a little while and fill her up with spiritual stone powder and elixirs. Give her as much as you have. Force her to open her spiritual eyes and make way for Tai Sui!”

After passing on these instructions, Lü Chengyi silently cursed that good-for-nothing Zhao for ruining things and hurried off in pursuit of Lin Zhaoli.

Xi Ping let out a sigh of relief—his second weak spot was also temporarily safe.

At last he could devote all of his attention to dealing with the people in front of him.

You want to think about it? Xi Ping glanced at Lü Chengyi rushing over and thought, It’s a no-go.

Lin Zhaoli took one look at Xi Ping’s wretched state and frowned, glaring fiercely at Zhao Zhenwei.

But now was no time to settle accounts with his useless colleague. He strode forward, slapped seven or eight talismans toward Xi Ping, and didn’t detect anything out of the ordinary.

Lin Zhaoli’s expression involuntarily became grave. He examined Xi Ping and coldly said, “Do you want me to perform a soul-searching, or will you tell the truth?”

One of Xi Ping’s kneecaps was broken. He leaned rudely on the cultivators dragging him, acting very familiar. Emboldened by their support, he smiled at Lin Zhaoli. “I’ve heard that if a half-immortal is soul-searched, he won’t end up an imbecile, but it’ll damage his spirit. If his spirit is damaged, he won’t be able to take another half-step forward in cultivation... Tsk, that’s so scary. I’m my shifu’s only direct disciple, and he’s just passed his Way of the Heart on to me. His lineage will be broken—Lin-shixiong, can you take responsibility for that?”

Lin Zhaoli: “...”

Lü Chengyi: “...”

Lü Chengyi had been prepared to block all kinds of self-justification from him and couldn’t react at first. The song they’d arranged for him to sing was “an accusation that’s hard to explain away,” so how had it turned at the last moment into “bullying others with his position”?

Lü Chengyi’s background as a low-level roaming cultivator had limited his imagination—were all inner sect disciples this overbearing?

“Hey, don’t be mad.” Xi Ping adjusted the position of his rapidly healing kneecap and, cool under pressure, said, smiling, “You’ve already established a foundation, and you certainly have a great future ahead of you in the inner sect. You should maintain self-restraint in front of your fellow sect members.”

The corner of Lin Zhaoli’s eye twitched. No matter how upright he was, he could still hear the threat in these words. He immediately said with a cold smile, “What, are you telling me that with your conduct, if I went to report to the inner sect, General Zhi and the Dignitary of Fate High Elder would still be able to shield you?”

“What have I done?” Like a scoundrel, not waiting for Lin Zhaoli to accuse him, Xi Ping simply laid it out: “Did you sense something on the first guard ship, Lin-shixiong? Wow, that remaining spiritual energy is so familiar, where did you see it before...? What place was it now?”

Lin Zhaoli: “...”

Right, it also wasn’t so easy to explain why he had privately impersonated an evil cultivator and gone to Southern Shu’s encampment.

Xi Ping continued: “Or are you saying I stole something? May I ask where the spoils are? At any rate you have to catch the criminal with the spoils,

no?”

“You...you’ve sold out to the...evil cultivators.” Lin Zhaoli was nearly stuttering. “You ruined the spiritual stone convoy’s great water dragon array with unlawful intent. What punishment does that merit?”

Xi Ping didn’t so much as blink. “Who saw it?”

Lü Chengyi instinctively felt that things were going badly and took a step back. Xi Ping glanced at him, and a trace of a cold smile appeared at the corner of his eye: Don’t be scared. I’m not after you, you old fox.

Then his gaze fell directly onto Zhao Zhenwei.

“Your witness is Zhao-shixiong?” Xi Ping licked the blood that had spilled in his mouth when he had taken a hit in his fall earlier. “Right... When did Zhao-shixiong see it?”

Zhao Zhenwei had a guilty conscience. Under Lin Zhaoli’s gaze, his calf muscles cramped. In a panic, he could only say what Lü Chengyi had told him to say: “I-it wasn’t me who saw it, it was Lin-shixiong himself who found out...”

Xi Ping stared directly at him. “Then why are you shaking?”

Lin Zhaoli froze.

Xi Ping lowered his eyes, his gaze falling on his injured leg. He said meaningfully, smiling, “Here I was thinking Zhao-shixiong wanted to kill me so I couldn’t reveal that we were working together.”

Zhao Zhenwei said, “Malicious slander!”

Lin Zhaoli frowned, his suspicious gaze falling on Zhao Zhenwei.

True, that crowd of traitors in the mines had everyone deceived. He couldn’t be sure that none of their people were aboard the convoy ships. This Zhao Zhenwei...was in fact acting very strangely.

Xi Ping laughed softly. “Lin-shixiong, you can’t take responsibility for performing a soul-searching on me, but performing a soul-searching on this...Supervisor Zhao of the Mining Office outer sect shouldn’t be a problem for you, right?”

Who didn’t have weak spots?

Only his weak spots were all dear to him, whereas Mr. Wuchang One’s weak spots...

CHAPTER 53 - The Mountain Falls (5)

No one would dare to punish the disciple of the peak master of Flying Jade Peak out of hand. If Lü Chengyi had known of this before, he wouldn't have alerted Lin Zhaoli just now and turned this into a deadlock.

He had already had Zhao Zhenwei contact their Southern Shu allies to signal that they were carrying out the plan ahead of schedule. But now they were still some distance away from the place where they had determined to strike, and the other side must also have been caught unawares and needed time to reach them.

Over there with the Exonerators, there had been a last-minute problem with the holy woman and Tai Sui...

If this went wrong, it would go wrong because the mine's outer sect was too far from Xuanyin, and he didn't know the most crucial information. Curse that Zhao Zhenwei. He was more trouble than he was worth. After spending all his time fooling around and drinking with that "dear shidi" of his, he didn't even know whether he belonged to the inner or outer sect!

Lü Chengyi's original plan had been: first tamper with the water dragons, taking down the convoy's "shield in the water"; then wait for the Mirage Powder to take effect and weaken Lin Zhaoli, the established foundation cultivator they couldn't defeat. When the ambush set up by foreign aid from Southern Shu, which Zhao Zhenwei's party was colluding with, had taken down Lin Zhaoli and his subordinates, better than half of the convoy's fighting force would be gone. That would be when Zhao Zhenwei and the others would be at their most relaxed and unguarded, so he could have the Exonerators come over and give this farce a perfect ending.

But now it was clearly not going to work. Lin Zhaoli hadn't been poisoned at all, and he had easily dispelled the water dragon spell!

Lü Chengyi came to a prompt decision, resolving to abandon the spiritual stones—relying solely on the Shu, there was no way to kill Lin Zhaoli.

He had originally wanted to stall for time and distract Lin Zhaoli by questioning Xi Ping, giving him the opportunity to resolve matters with Tai Sui. When the Shu arrived, he would trick White Amaranth into coming here ahead of time—as the head of the Exonerators, White Amaranth was also a genuine article established foundation. Only in a three-way battle would Lü Chengyi have an opportunity to make a stealth attack and escape safely with Tai Sui.

Who would have expected that this pampered young master who had grown up in Jinping wouldn't behave according to the script? Abruptly faced with an accusation, he had admitted it openly, then splashed it all over anyone he could grab!

Lü Chengyi, watching Zhao Zhenwei's disgraceful behavior, knew that he couldn't control this situation anymore. He silently crushed a stealth talisman so he wouldn't be noticed. Zhao Zhenwei wouldn't be able to stand up to questioning. A soul-searching... No, perhaps there would be no need to wait for a soul-searching. He might get so scared he exposed everything himself! How was it that these two were both pampered young masters, but the one he'd been stuck with was this piece of trash?

Now it seemed that the Shu couldn't arrive yet. There was nothing to be done...

Xi Ping was half-lame now, and tied up, but his expression was the calmest. Zhao Zhenwei's eyes were spinning, and his head was covered in sweat as he looked for Lü Chengyi; his vision was confused by the stealth talisman, so he couldn't find him, and he was in such urgency it was as if he hadn't pissed in three years. Lin Zhaoli's expression was cold, showing that he didn't trust anyone. The three of them were standing in a triangle, looking at each other in pairs.

Nearby, a crew member seemed to have some business. He trotted toward Lin Zhaoli, muttering something.

The crew were all mortals. What urgent business could a mortal have? Lin Zhaoli didn't even spare him a glance.

But just as the crew member passed Zhao Zhenwei, there was a sudden change. Without warning, he pulled out a hand cannon, and before anyone could react, he aimed it at Zhao Zhenwei's back and pulled the trigger!

Zhao Zhenwei was just looking all over the floor for his guts. He didn't realize what had happened at first. Only Xi Ping's left hand, the fingers of which had already been cut to the bone by the threads, moved gently.

At his note, it was as if the crew member had been hit directly in the face. He froze in place. Lin Zhaoli, catching up, pushed away the crew member assassin. The hand cannon fell to the ground and spat out a silver fireball. It turned out that this was a rare downgraded immortal tool of the type used to inflict casualties.

When the crew member assassin's attack failed, he bit through the poison pill in his mouth without any hesitation. The poison pill took effect at once. His breathing had stopped before he hit the ground!

Zhao Zhenwei's legs went weak, and he toppled over onto the ground. Lü Chengyi's heart plummeted: no good!

Xi Ping's gaze bypassed the stealth talisman and shot toward Lü Chengyi as if he were an all-seeing divinity. He said meaningfully, "Zhao-shixiong, someone is afraid you'll reveal something. They want to silence you."

The stealth talisman lost effect as soon as it was exposed. Lin Zhaoli abruptly realized what was happening and gave an angry shout. He swept his hand out like a knife, chopping toward Lü Chengyi.

Lü Chengyi's business was escorting ships. He hadn't spent a single day in the Latent Cultivation Temple, and he certainly didn't have a long tradition of family learning. If cultivators had been divided into "civil and military" like mortals, he certainly would have been a "frail scholar." At such close range, he absolutely couldn't dodge the attack of an established foundation cultivator.

But just as Lin Zhaoli's chop was about to cut him in half, Lü Chengyi's figure flickered.

The next moment, the powerful chop cut through the place where he had been. Lü Chengyi...had vanished into thin air.

Lin Zhaoli was surprised. Even Xi Ping was stunned.

That an established foundation cultivator hadn't sensed a fluctuation of spiritual energy showed that whatever he had used hadn't been an array or an immortal tool; because of the reincarnation wood, Xi Ping could sense that Lü Chengyi was nearby, but...he couldn't fix on him.

Something had cut the connection between Lü Chengyi and the reincarnation wood!

Then the foulness clearing water dragon that had been calmly circling the convoy received some provocation and leapt out of the water, nearly capsizing several guard ships that didn't have time to dodge. The water dragon's eyes were open wide with rage and its long beard was trembling. It let out an earth-shaking roar, bringing down lightning.

The people on deck were nearly deafened by this roar. Even the Exonerators heard it.

Hundreds of zhang under the sea, an enormous "cuttlefish" was carefully trailing after the shipment convoy, maintaining a distance of about one li. Faint jade stamp green flashed in the eyes of this colossus; it was an immortal tool.

The ill-intentioned evil cultivators were hidden inside the belly of the cuttlefish.

Old Nine was about to transport the spiritual covenant to Wuchang One when he heard the sound. For a time, he was petrified. He felt the communication tool he was carrying heat up and quickly took it out to examine it. The horrifying news on it was: “Things have gone badly. I have been exposed. Take Tai Sui and go. I will meet you.”

Old Nine didn't dare to delay. He picked up Wei Chengxiang and stuck his hand into the mustard seed he carried with him. Before he could pull out the emergency immortal tool and talismans, the door behind him slammed open. White Amaranth, standing at the door, shut a fan. “Sir, madam, something is wrong...oh? What's happened to the holy woman?”

Old Nine couldn't avoid him. All he could do was salute him and say, “Mr. White, I'm truly sorry. There's been an incident aboard ship, and the holy woman has been injured. Senior One has been exposed ahead of time. We're going to...”

Before he could finish, an even louder dragon's roar sounded in the sea.

This time it wasn't only a dragon's roar. Even the sea was disturbed!

On the surface, when Lü Chengyi disappeared, the water dragon circling the ships became somewhat uneasy; before Lin Zhaoli could work out what was happening, another water dragon that had been guarding up ahead became wildly agitated, roaring in warning.

Lin Zhaoli looked around in shock and saw an ominous haze surging up in the sky to the north. A reeking wind hit him in the face.

“Let me go, idi...” Xi Ping belatedly remembered that this was his shixiong and perfunctorily swallowed his insult. “Shixiong. Those are the Shu!”

Sadly, an established foundation cultivator’s ears weren’t so easily fooled. Lin Zhaoli turned his head and glared at him.

Xi Ping figured that he had caught up by now and said in all sincerity, “Hey, shixiong, as the saying goes, a sweet and fair maiden is a good match for a gentleman. We don’t mock a person for being captive to love. Wouldn’t it be miserable if you never fell for a honey trap in your life...?”

Lin Zhaoli brought down his hand. “Shut—up!”

All the immortal-binding cords on Xi Ping dropped off. The filaments had broken halfway through the fingers of his right hand, which hung down covered in blood. But there was some magic about his left hand; the filaments had only cut through a bit of skin and slipped off the bones—it turned out that this kid had been able to move one of his hands from start to finish!

In the time it had taken to have this exchange, the “ominous clouds” to the north had already flown over their heads. Xi Ping, dragging his miserably injured leg behind him, raised his head with difficulty and saw that what had flown over was actually an enormous bird. In front of that huge bird, the water dragon looked like a snake under an eagle’s beak. No wonder the Shu had arrived so quickly.

Lin Zhaoli’s pupils contracted. “A great roc...”

The great roc, like the water dragons, wasn’t an extant living creature. It was also an animal spirit that had been subdued by the ancient elders and forced into an array—it had been left behind by Ancestor Tianbo of Southern Shu’s Lingyun Sect. Princess Anyang, having made up her mind to kill Lin Zhaoli, hadn’t even cared to use the slightest concealment.

But...why?

Xi Ping abruptly turned to look at Lin Zhaoli. “Lin-shixiong, what was it that you actually found?”

If Lin Zhaoli had known, he wouldn't have ended up being sent running in circles by all the thieves and traitors on board. "Have all the water dragons go underwater! Guard ships, activate the great array! All cultivators..."

Before he could finish, Xi Ping, who had been beside him, had turned into a blur, standing on his sword with one foot as he slipped away. Lin Zhaoli's consciousness followed him closely, and he saw Xi Ping catch a crew member and uncompromisingly plaster a talisman to him. The crew member was a mortal who had no means of resistance. He was firmly tied up by the talisman.

Lin Zhaoli got a clear look. The bound crew member was familiar—he was the one who delivered food to him every day!

Xi Ping seemed to have already known who the traitors were. Without any hesitation, he tossed out talismans on his way, "plastering" even those who had seen that the tide was turning against them and hidden in storage closets.

Lin Zhaoli was horrified. He passed word to him: "These people are all traitors? How do you know?"

Xi Ping, collapsing, said, "Da-ge, the foreign enemy is in front of us, can't you just question them yourself later? If I got any wrong, I'll kowtow in apology!”

No sooner had he spoken than there was a sharp cry. The great roc dove.

When the giant spread its wings, it could nearly cover the whole convoy with them. The people on the ships had the impression that the sky was falling.

The guard ships tightly surrounded the ships carrying the spiritual stones. The activated arrays instantly shot out fierce light. The bird came toward them abruptly, its sky-blotting wings brushing past the edges of the array. Two water dragons leapt up, snapping their jaws toward the great roc’s wings.

The great roc’s dropped feathers were like small ships... No, there really was a ship among the feathers.

The ship approached quickly. Dozens of black-clothed figures came from it on their swords.

On the sea, lighting flashed and thunder rumbled. The great roc and the six water dragons mixed in a terrifying clash.

Xi Ping had just ferreted out the last of the Indignant Cicadas. Seeing this battle, he turned and ran—impressively, he could still keep his balance flying his sword with one foot, and he even looked rather elegant.

He “elegantly” hid behind Lin Zhaoli like a streak of smoke. “I’m no good in a fight. Go ahead, shixiong.”

Lin Zhaoli: “...”

This kind of rubbish could inherit General Zhi’s heart for the sword?!

Lin Zhaoli gave a loud cry and pulled a sword as tall as a man from his palm. Where the sword pointed, it produced a roar like a wild beast’s. This haughty established foundation master did nothing to organize the other cultivators on board to resist the enemy. He simply raised his sword and went out to join battle himself.

Xi Ping sat on his gaudy decorative sword, rotating two white spirits in his left hand like walnuts. To his right, one leg and one injured hand dangled. His consciousness was scanning the surroundings without a moment’s pause.

Lü Chengyi... Wuchang One, where was he hiding...?

One stroke of Lin Zhaoli's sword cut a "rift" in the ocean, reaching the Southern Shu ship. The protective array on the ship took this attack and was immediately near to collapse. Before they could move, Strongman Lin cut three strokes in a row, hitting the same spot each time without the slightest error.

The noise of the huge sword made the roots of Xi Ping's ears go numb. He felt that this Lin-shixiong was truly held back by wielding a sword; someone ought to give him the axe that the god Pangu had used to split the heavens!

There was a loud, clear sound. The protective array on the enemy's ship was smashed apart by his series of slashes. With one stroke, Lin Zhaoli waved away the Southern Shu cultivators coming to surround him. Before the sword's momentum could dissipate, he turned it around. The sword stroke hummed, paring the wind and breaking the waves, splitting the enemy ship right in two—animal spirits like the great roc and the water dragons were controlled using arrays and couldn't go too far from them. A half-immortal could only get up to a few tricks, but an established foundation sword cultivator could simply break the array.

The enemy ship broke, but the great roc fighting with the water dragons didn't disappear.

The array wasn't on the ship?

Lin Zhaoli froze. Then he heard Xi Ping passing word to him: “In the water!”

Next, the sharp sound of a flute pierced the surface of the sea. A big fish like a steamship leapt out of the water. There was a black-clothed person standing on the head of the spiritual beast.

The big fish crashed against Great Wan’s main ship. The protective inscriptions on the ship activated at once; it nearly overturned.

The newcomer was an established foundation beast-taming cultivator!

Without any hesitation, Xi Ping jumped down from his sword and into the water, dragging his injured leg behind him. He reached out to scoop the water-repelling pearl off the bottom of the ship, narrowly avoiding a hit from the big fish.

Xi Yue pounded fiercely on the inside of the water-repelling pearl, glaring furiously at him.

Xi Ping said, “Among the talismans Pang-shixiong gave me, was there one that could turn a person into a white streak on the waves? Hurry, hurry, give me one, and give me the mustard seed, too... Oh, right, were you cursing at me before?"

Xi Yue couldn't resist baring his teeth at him.

The half-puppet clearly used a good deal of strength. He pulled out a stack of talismans Xi Ping didn't know the purpose of, quickly pulled out three, and shoved them all into the mustard seed.

When Xi Ping reached into the water-repelling pearl to take the mustard seed, Xi Yue took the opportunity to bite him with relentless accuracy.

Xi Ping: "Hss..."

Amazing! The little brat was revolting!

But the tilting main ship was about to overturn. There was no time for him to discipline the half-puppet.

"Just you wait!"

Xi Ping pulled out his hand, now with toothmarks on it, and didn't even look at the contents of the talismans—he wouldn't recognize them, anyway. He raised a hand and activated them with spiritual energy.

It turned out that these were three small-scale foulness clearing water dragons. They left his hand and went into the sea, turned, and worked together to push the ship that was about to overturn back upright.

Talismans transformed into water dragons lasted for a limited time, and they were very small. For now he would have to make do.

Xi Ping pointed at the big fish spiritual beast that the beast-taming cultivator was riding. “Fuck it up!”

Two water dragons threw themselves over on his order.

The last one became his steed.

Xi Ping himself could stay underwater for a shichen on one breath, but he was worried that Xi Yue would drown, so he didn't let him out of the water-repelling pearl. He twisted the water-repelling pearl into the shape of a bag to make it more convenient to carry. Amidst the half-puppet's rage, Xi Ping picked up the water-repelling pearl and jumped onto the dragon's back.

A sword cultivator was a sword cultivator. Within his own grade, he would be the best fighter. Brandishing the big sword, Lin Zhaoli sent the other side's established foundation cultivator and a crowd of open-eyed half-immortals flying all over. Xi Ping watched him and thought that he was very heroic; no wonder Lü Chengyi and the others had wanted to drug him first.

Just then, his spiritual sense suddenly alerted him. Wei Chengxiang had woken up.

Wei Chengxiang quietly controlled her breathing and continued pretending to be unconscious. She contacted Xi Ping.

It wasn't very easy pretending to be unconscious under the nose of a cultivator. Fortunately, no one was paying attention to her now.

White Amaranth's eyes glowed with villainous light. "Of course nothing ever goes perfectly. There are always incidents. Since we're here, we may as well make the best of it...and seek riches amidst danger."

He snapped his fingers, and the spiritual covenant Wei Chengxiang hadn't had time to sign turned to dust in his hand. "But please notify Tai Sui that we'll be relying entirely on our own efforts, without depending on your cooperation, so the distribution of spiritual stones we arranged earlier can't be seen as valid."

The big cuttlefish passed over the bottom of the sea as fast as lightning, avoiding the battle between the great roc and water dragons, wildly floating up through the seawater full of scattered spiritual energy.

Wei Chengxiang felt herself nearly pressed to the ground. The next moment, the cuttlefish with its bellyful of unexpected guests appeared on the battlefield out of nowhere. Its belly opened, and a row of spiritual cannons took aim at the two groups of grappling cultivators, unexpectedly opening fire.

Boom—

Xi Ping and the water dragon parted ways. The water dragon dove to the bottom of the sea, carrying Xi Yue, while Xi Ping flew up on his sword.

Lin Zhaoli and the Southern Shu assassins were all taken unawares. The flute music of the beast tamer on the big fish went off tune, and Lin Zhaoli's big sword slipped out of his hand.

Though this sword was his vital weapon, which he could call back with a thought, in just that moment, a cloud of white fog wrapped around him. Lin Zhaoli quickly held his breath, but it was already too late. His arms and legs were instantly paralyzed.

Lin Zhaoli was appalled. A half-immortal couldn't have powers like this. Another established foundation!

In the depths of the white fog, a long hook came right toward the top of Lin Zhaoli's head. The Exonerator White Amaranth's smile was sinister.

“Hunting a sword cultivator...is so satisfying!”

Meanwhile, Southern Shu's big fish turned over nimbly in the water, taking the opportunity to seal off Lin Zhaoli's retreat.

The huge fish cast a big shadow on Lin Zhaoli. His vision went blank. No good, he thought, this is the end of me!

Just then, a figure came out of nowhere and landed beside him. Before Lin Zhaoli could distinguish whether this person was friend or foe, he heard the sound of an instrument string being played.

In an instant, the established foundation sword cultivator's spine began to tremble. The matchless sword aura in that note nearly brought him to his knees. He felt a kind of despair, as if he would never be able to lift his sword again.

Two white spirits turned to powder at the sound, shaking the heavens—

Xi Ping went numb all over. All his meridians seemed to explode. If not for the fact that his newly grown left hand's bones were much sturdier than before, he would hardly have been able to play a single complete note. The vast sword aura gushed out, and the two great established foundation masters, along with the colossal spiritual beast, all turned into ants. The big fish and the beast controller on it were both cut in two. Bloody rain fell over the sea.

“White Amaranth” turned into “Red Amaranth.” This secretive evil cultivator chief had over a hundred protective amulets on him; when the ascended spirit sword aura fell, all of them turned to dust, and he fell headfirst into the sea.

The roc array in the spiritual beast’s mouth broke, and the great roc that was pecking the six water dragons into a frenzy instantly disappeared. The sword energy fell into the water, and the sea, which ought to have been in a calm period, was stirred into a big vortex.

Xi Ping: “...”

He had to kneel before his shizun. He had actually been considering using this sword aura to break the immortal-binding cords and escape... He had truly been ignorant.

Was this sword aura for saving his life?

This was for causing mountain-toppling, sea-overturning havoc!

CHAPTER 54 - The Mountain Falls (6)

Cold light flashed over Zhaoting. The snow falling around the sword halted. It disturbed the master of Flying Jade Peak, who was immersed in the sword aura.

Zhi Xiu abruptly opened his eyes. His expression was somewhat bewildered: the sword energy he had placed on Xi Ping had been given play... pure and complete ascended spirit sword energy—even he hadn't used it in the mortal world!

In fact, the sword energy Zhi Xiu had given Xi Ping amounted to a protective talisman. Normally it would exist within his spiritual bones. At Xi Ping's cultivation level, with the help of two white spirits, he could probably set off a bit of sword aura. Provided his opponent was unprepared, it was possible for him to go above his grade and restrain an early established foundation cultivator, giving him enough time to escape with his life. He had plenty of money, anyway, so he could use this move over and over. As long as that brat didn't go take on the other three great sects all on his own when he left the mountain, the sword energy could last three to five years.

But just now, the sword energy that ought to have persisted for three to five years had been shot out all at once!

How could that be?!

Never mind using it, if Xi Ping hadn't picked up an ancient demonic god's relic, an ordinary open-eyed cultivator's spiritual bones wouldn't even have been able to contain ascended spirit sword energy.

To use an analogy, for a half-immortal, Zhi Xiu's sword energy was like a mountain. With his back to the mountain, a half-immortal could quarry stone and chop wood; if he had the skills, he might be able to use those things to build a maze and put on a show to make himself seem more impressive...but who had ever heard of someone picking up the mountain and pounding a person with it?

Zhi Xiu stood up abruptly—no, there was no point now in thinking about how the kid had done it.

Completely unrestrained ascended spirit sword energy was enough to cause a local earthquake in the mortal world; it wouldn't be hard for it to bring down mountains and crack open the earth... Was Xi Shiyong still living?

His rebellious disciple was amazing. How could he always manage to bring about disasters beyond his expectations?!

With a wave of his sleeve, a beam of sword energy hit the clouds, making a crack in the thick cloud layer that was letting down snow. Starry sky flashed out. Zhi Xiu quickly began to divine Xi Ping's location. Astonishment gradually appeared on his face—he couldn't divine it.

At the Sea of Stars, the Dignitary of Fate High Elder Zhang Jue frowned as he looked into the depths of the abyss: a fog was rising.

Xi Ping was still living, but he wasn't far from the “moment of parting.”

The reason this had all gone wrong was that the bones of his right hand had been broken, so he only had his left hand to use.

When the real bones of his left hand had been smashed and grown back through the power of the mysterious hidden bones, it had perfectly suited the ancient demonic god's “way of death”...and apart from the demonic god himself, no one understood that way of death.

The left hand that had grown back by means of the hidden bones could “play” directly in another person's spirit. Xi Ping had tried this out with a ship full of Indignant Cicadas. He was a broad-minded person; he had just thought “my left hand is more useful than before and has an added function,” and the rest didn't matter. If a senior had found out about this, they might have flipped—even when Liang Chen had possessed him, he hadn't been able to invade his spirit; he could only wait for him to open his spiritual eyes so he could snatch his body. Music that could cloud a person's intellect could only be played by a god or a demon; the effect was only so limited because of his cultivation level.

But the sword energy that Zhi Xiu had placed in his spiritual bones wasn't "limited"...and even more unluckily, for reasons unknown, this area of the sea had struck up a resonance with his left hand.

Ascended spirit sword energy was like a natural disaster. It had disturbed the legendary Resurrection Vortex that could swallow all things.

The vortex grew bigger and bigger as it spun, and the sword aura lingering in the area continued to hover around; even the sea breeze turned into blades.

The water dragons that had been pecked full of wounds by the great roc turned quickly and attempted to guard the convoy.

The Southern Shu assassins, the evil cultivators, Great Wan's shipment convoy...not one of the three sides that had just been embroiled in conflict had any more attention to spare for each other.

When Lin Zhaoli recovered, he gave a long whistle, ordering the convoy to retreat at full speed.

Miserable and distressed, he flew several dozen zhang up, turned his head, and found that the “sea monster” Xi Ping who had stirred up the East Sea was still standing in place, unmoving, watching his reflection in the water and having some kind of marriage interview with himself. Lin Zhaoli shouted to him, “Xi Shiyong, stop preening! Hurry up!”

“Lord Lin!”

Once the Resurrection Vortex started to spin, there would be more than one whirlpool. The water dragons were desperately holding off the largest of the whirlpools, but rapidly moving little whirlpools quickly began to spin in other places; their danger zone was no less than that of the big whirlpool. A spiritual stone freight ship that had had its protective inscriptions scraped off by the great roc had been sucked into a small whirlpool.

In the whirlpool was lingering sword energy that quickly cut shocking gouges in the ship’s hull. Lin Zhaoli had to go save the ship before anything else.

When he took another look after putting aside his many other pressing problems to rescue the freight ship and surround it with the few surviving guard ships, Xi Ping was gone.

Xi Ping had been blown off his sword by the storm raised by the whirlpool.

His outsides seemed completely intact, but inside, his meridians had all collapsed into some unknown state. He had truly become a paperman who could be blown away by a puff of wind. He couldn't move a single finger—not even of his left hand; his arm wouldn't take orders.

By coincidence, there just happened to be a whirlpool where he landed. It swallowed him whole.

The scattered sword energy immediately broke his white jade hair crown. Fortunately, the sword energy had been stored in his bones for a long time and “recognized” his aura. When it touched him, it suddenly turned gentle.

The “big cuttlefish” that had been sucked into the same whirlpool as him was much less lucky. In just this short time, countless sword slashes had cut through the immortal tool, so dense it was as if it had been lattice cut before being deep-fried.

The cuttlefish's master White Amaranth was gone, and the immortal tool had gone out of control. The Exonerators on board had to save themselves.

Wei Chengxiang wasn't pretending to be unconscious anymore. In the high-speed swirling whirlpool, she couldn't even open her eyes. The sword aura surging all around seemed to be resonating with her spirit, nearly boiling her brain.

She kept her teeth firmly clenched, maintaining a line of clarity.

In the chaos, Old Nine rifled through his mustard seed for a long moment, pulled out a water-repelling pearl, considered, felt unsafe, and added an extra protective array to the outside of the water-repelling pearl. He grabbed Wei Chengxiang and stuffed her into the water-repelling pearl, then escaped from the big cuttlefish.

But as the saying goes, luck isn't equivalent to virtue. When bad luck came, neither the righteous nor the evil could escape it.

Old Nine's luck evidently wasn't any good.

As soon as he left the cuttlefish, the water-repelling pearl crashed firmly into a beam of sword energy. The mere open-eyed grade protective array disintegrated on the spot, and the sword energy poured into the water-repelling pearl, cutting Wei Chengxiang's ankle.

Wei Chengxiang felt sharp pain leap up from the injury. The sword energy seemed to have burrowed into her body, splitting open all her meridians and blood vessels.

At the same time, as the water-repelling pearl went to pieces, ice cold seawater poured ruthlessly into her nose and mouth.

Old Nine quickly reached out to grab her, but just then, yet another beam of sword energy flew over from somewhere. Old Nine scurried away like a frightened rat, but the whirlpool pulled Wei Chengxiang, who had no power to resist it, down toward the bottom of the sea!

At the critical moment, a hand appeared out of nowhere in the whirlpool and pulled Wei Chengxiang to a halt—it was Lü Chengyi, who had vanished earlier.

Lü Chengyi held Wei Chengxiang with one hand and gestured to Old Nine with the other. The two half-immortals swam toward the surface at full speed.

All of Wei Chengxiang's senses were numbed by the rapidly swirling water. Her consciousness gradually dimmed. Many people's faces flashed before her eyes: her mom, her grandpa, Auntie Chun, the heavily made-up women of rat alley, her fellow workers with their faces covered in coal dust...

Strangely, none of their expressions were pained. They were all faintly smiling at her, as if they had come to take her away from worldly suffering.

But worldly suffering wasn't prepared to let her go.

Just as Wei Chengxiang was about to take the hands of her nearest and dearest, a figure struggling in the water appeared in her peripheral vision.

Wei Chengxiang's slackening consciousness instantly returned. All the friendly faces disappeared abruptly—she had seen White Amaranth.

The sword energy had cut off half of White Amaranth's arm. His established foundation had been destroyed, but all those protective immortal tools hadn't been bought for nothing; in the end, they had let this great evil cultivator escape with his life.

Wei Chengxiang's eyes nearly popped. He wasn't dead? How could he dare not to be dead?

Why was it that the innocent could only obey the mandates of heaven, while evildoers could always escape calamity? Was it because good people were worthless, and each batch would be replaced by another when they died?

There was a crisp sound in her ears, as if something had broken.

Spiritual energy mixed with sword aura poured into her bones, bursting open the tender skin beside the girl's eye and on her cheekbone, then following her cheek and tearing down to her lower jaw. She wanted to scream from the pain, but the seawater was covering her nose and mouth, pressing down on her heart and lungs, not letting her cry or scream. All she could do was futilely breathe out the last mouthful of air in her lungs.

Boom—

The raging waves beat against the shore. The overpowering seawater surged desperately toward the land, reshaping the originally low-lying land that had allowed countless people to tread on it.

Earth and stone cracked, the veins of the earth severed, and at last mountains burst from the level ground.

All the spiritual stones Wei Chengxiang had eaten seemed to turn into fuel, trying to burn up her mortal body all at once. Her spirit suddenly became clear and spacious, like the former location of Rat Alley when it had been flattened—

Her spiritual eyes were wide open.

She opened her eyes in the deep sea. The skin on nearly half her face that had been burst open by the spiritual energy was still oozing blood. Her burning gaze met Lü Chengyi's.

Naturally Lü Chengyi couldn't miss sensing an event as big as the opening of spiritual eyes. Undisguised joy immediately appeared on the calculating old fox's face.

A beam of sword energy came their way, and Lü Chengyi pulled Wei Chengxiang aside without any hesitation, using his own back to block it, just as decisive as he was in killing witnesses. Though the sword energy only brushed past him, it still cut into his back hard enough that the flesh tore. Blood spurted out. Lü Chengyi clenched his teeth, trembling, and squeezed out a smile. As if in consolation, he patted his imagined Tai Sui on the back of the hand.

The next moment, his eyes opened wide. First he leaned back. Then he looked down at the person he was protecting in disbelief.

The moment he had thrown himself toward her, Wei Chengxiang had pulled out the defensive knife at his waist. She stabbed the open-eyed grade weapon into his belly.

Lü Chengyi opened his mouth.

Liang-shixiong, you...

But he only gulped mouthful after mouthful of salty and bitter seawater. It seemed to be the taste of retribution.

Wei Chengxiang didn't want to know what last words the evil cultivator had. She held the knife with both hands and fiercely cut upward, disemboweling the great evil cultivator, cutting all the way from the base of his abdomen to his neck. Then her hands were knocked away by the damaged array on the knife, and she left the knife with its curved blade in Lü Chengyi's throat.

She felt neither fear nor remorse.

With one stroke, the half-immortal whose last breath had been squeezed out by the bottomless abyss was separated from the trembling, terrified girl.

The water was clouded with blood and air bubbles stirred up by the whirlpool, but the eyes of vengeance can always see their foe.

Before Old Nine could react, Wei Chengxiang exerted all her effort to escape the whirlpool and burst out. There was plentiful spiritual energy in the place where the three parties of cultivators had fought, still unceasingly pouring into the newborn half-immortal, giving her the strength to escape fate.

The weak of Jinping's southern outskirts rested; the one who couldn't close her eyes took on the regrets of the slumberers.

She didn't turn back to look at Lü Chengyi as he was pulled into the abyss.

The bloodstains on Wei Chengxiang were quickly washed away by the restless seawater. She approached the head of the evil cultivators, who was on his last gasp.

White Amaranth, who called himself an Exonerator, had dozens of identities in the Land of Turmoil. He had smuggled spiritual beasts, traded in illicit snow wine...made enough money that even a good-for-nothing like him could safely pass to the established foundation level and support nearly a hundred pretty girls. Whenever this was mentioned, he spoke as if he had no alternative, saying something like "there's no way around it, when you have dealings with important people, you have to follow their customs," sighing that a true gentleman who had been noble and benevolent all his life had simply been forced into debauchery by beautiful girls.

White Amaranth had used up all his strength now. He couldn't even dodge the sword energy that was everywhere in the whirlpool. When he saw his “ally” swimming toward him, he was overjoyed.

Miss Sixty! Holy woman!

The holy woman smiled at him and pulled him by his remaining arm.

He would be saved.

White Amaranth relaxed, nearly going limp in her arms: after this, the Exonerators and the Indignant Cicadas would be brothers who had gone through mortal peril together. The Exonerators would share everything with them...

Then a beam of sword energy swept through the whirlpool. The weak and frail “Miss Sixty” held his head down with all her might. Before the happiness on White Amaranth’s face could vanish, his intact skull was held to the beam of sword energy by Wei Chengxiang!

The peerlessly keen sword energy pierced the center of his brow. Its fury didn’t abate, and it stabbed right through Wei Chengxiang’s palm. She was covered in blood, in so much pain that the corners of her eyes twitched, but she didn’t care at all. She let go and tossed this corpse into the abyss as well.

Old Nine was stunned by this sudden change. For a time, this old half-immortal whose cultivation was clearly stronger than hers was terrified. When he met Wei Chengxiang's gaze, Old Nine didn't even have the strength to fight. He turned and fled.

Before she could chase after him, the heedlessly fleeing Old Nine was hit across the midsection by the damaged Southern Shu ship that had gotten mixed up in the whirlpool. Confused and disoriented, he rolled over, and a beam of sword energy skewered him and the damaged ship.

Wei Chengxiang stared for a moment. Then she clasped the reincarnation wood in front of her chest with a bloody hand and surged toward the surface.

"Uncle." Seawater flowed past her wide open eyes. "I've taken my revenge, but I don't feel happy. I..."

The reincarnation wood was silent.

"...uncle?"

Xi Ping only had time to give Xi Yue an order through the dragon-taming chain: "Get onto the main ship, don't approach the shore, don't leave the ship!"

Then he was pulled down into the whirlpool amid Xi Yue's heartrending cries and knew nothing more.

The Resurrection Vortex dragged both the living and the dead to the bottom of the sea, then tossed them out.

The strange thing was that the bottom of the sea was calm.

Xi Ping was suspended in the water, drifting with the current. After a moment, he bumped into his old acquaintance Lü Chengyi.

These two people whose battle of wits had caused the East Sea to flare up had been completely neutralized. They bumped against each other peacefully.

During the collision, Xi Ping's left hand suddenly gave a light shake. Lü Chengyi's corpse lowered its head toward his left hand. A savage brand appeared on the ghastly pale face. Next, silver light slowly came from the center of the corpse's forehead. After floating clear of the body, it dropped toward the bottom of the sea and was caught in Xi Ping's disheveled hair.

The dazzling silver light dispersed... It turned out to be a finger bone.

Something at the bottom of the sea let out a faint sigh and drew that bone down. The finger bone was wrapped in Xi Ping's seaweed-like hair, so it had no choice but to carry this big encumbrance down with it.

The moment the bone touched the bottom of the sea, an amazing sight appeared: an enormous inscription, too big for the eye to take in, was exposed.

Had a cultivator proficient in inscriptions been present, they would certainly have been dumbfounded—because this wasn't any kind of inscription that existed on earth!

Xi Ping and the finger bone sank to the center of the inscription; then, as if something were pulling them in, they both disappeared.

Far away in Guzhou, Prince Zhuang's spiritual sense was suddenly touched. It was as if his right thumb had been burned.

Prince Zhuang frowned and tucked his thumb against his palm... Strange. It had been eight years since his spiritual sense had been touched by over there.

CHAPTER 55 - The Mountain Falls (7)

For his spiritual sense to be touched, only a person with an intimate karmic connection to him could be involved. There were truly few people like that.

Prince Zhuang raised his head, and Bai Ling landed beside him like his shadow.

Without preamble, Prince Zhuang asked, “When you sent him the spiritual stones last time, where was he?”

Bai Ling said quietly into his ear, “He had already reached the southern mines.”

Prince Zhuang massaged his thumb: counting the days, the spiritual stone shipment convoy would indeed have reached the East Sea, but wasn't the Resurrection Vortex in a calm period?

And also...why would it only be his thumb?

He waited patiently for a moment, but there were no other indications.

It was as if that moment just now had been his mistake.

“A little later, go ask where our Viscount is now,” Prince Zhuang instructed Bai Ling. Then he pressed down on the center of his forehead and stood up. “Let’s go.”

The two of them were currently in a forest that had just been cut down. On the ground were leftover ruts and wooden stakes of all sizes. There were dry twigs and withered leaves everywhere. It looked like a land of stumps.

When night fell, many people gathered here. There were workers who ought to have gone to work the night shift, and refugees and beggars who had lost their jobs and their homes. There was a ring of coffins laid out all around.

Some had clearly been recently buried and then dug back up. The dead inside them probably hadn’t fully rotted; they gave off a putrid netherworld smell. Some coffins were old, already decayed, the dregs of the rotten wood mixing with fragmented skeletons. They looked truly shabby laid out and had to be covered with rags.

With an old moon-white cloak draped over his shoulders, Prince Zhuang walked among the dead ghosts and the living ghosts, like a specter looking on from the sidelines.

A man in mourning clothes was standing on a new coffin, shouting out an accusation: "...First they occupy the farmland. When they've occupied the farmland, they occupy the graveyards, leaving the living with nowhere to shelter and the ancestors to become wandering spirits! To calm the people's resentment, they come up with another sinister plan. They dress it up by calling it a designated patch of wilderness for folks to move their graves to, but in secret they're pushing us to occupy land whose fengshui is at odds with tombs! Everyone, everyone! Open your eyes and see who are your brothers and who are the jackals!"

Sobs rose among the crowd. Some people stepped over the coffins to shake hands and make peace, and some burned paper. A wind blew, and paper money filled the sky along with the ashes of burnt paper. Sparks lit the eye sockets of the skeletons, like in some grotesque ritual.

People carrying coffins kept gathering. Prince Zhuang, with his hands behind his back and his face turned toward the fluttering paper money, walked out against the flow of the crowd.

He and Bai Ling both had talismans on them. Ordinary people couldn't see them. There were only a few cultivators mixed into the crowd who calmly glanced at them, nodded, and made way, indicating "we walk the same path and have no ill intent."

Prince Zhuang wasn't on the "same path" as anyone. He kept his eyes focused straight ahead. Only when he had left the crowd did he say to Bai Ling, "I hadn't thought that these 'roaming common cultivator friends' would be so rampant in Guzhou. If Guzhou is rotten, then everything is rotten down to the roots."

The traditions of Guzhou were conservative. The common people were very superstitious and had always especially shunned evil.

In the eighth year of Xiaozong, a few errant monks had come here, just as an epidemic was spreading. Because their certificates of ordination were incomplete, they had been taken for evil cultivators by the terrified villagers and beaten to death.

Similar events came one after another. The history books recorded that in Renzong's reign alone, over a hundred people had been captured and handed over to the yamen on suspicion of practicing "nightmare spells," bringing about countless disputes and tragic cases of sentencing on false charges. Out of concern that some people would use the common people's fear of evil to frame others, Heaven's Design Pavilion had specially established two branches in Guzhou, one in the north and one in the south, in order to make it easier to operate.

In the local parlance, the worst curse you could call someone was a “child of filth,” meaning “a monster’s progeny.”

Prince Zhuang pinched a piece of paper money that had flown onto his shoulder. Wishing only to see the world in chaos, he said, smiling, “Only five generations, and the people of Guzhou who would have loved to bathe in incense ash are standing on the coffins themselves, waiting for the children of filth save them in their time of need. How exciting.”

Bai Ling said, “According to your instructions, I have already disseminated the instructions for dismantling some common standard inscriptions... But Your Highness, the greater the commotion gets now, the less Heaven’s Design Pavilion will be able to deal with it. If Xuanyin Mountain gets word of this, the part we have played in it cannot be hidden.”

“That is no problem. Xuanyin Mountain won’t dare to interfere,” Prince Zhuang said calmly. “The people’s resentment has risen. Now they can only pretend to be ‘immortals unconcerned with mortal affairs,’ turn a blind eye, and afterward hold their noses and come out to bury all their families’ unfilial descendants.”

Bai Ling said in surprise, “How come? Only for the sake of reputation?”

Never mind Xuanyin's inner sect, even its half-immortals could crush a pile of ordinary people with one hand. Would they care about a bit of resentment from the people? As for their reputation, it would all depend on how conscientiously they whitewashed it. If the immortal sect cared, couldn't they just bring out some high-sounding justifications?

Prince Zhuang laughed. "You can only blame the Southern Sage."

On each of the rare occasions he was willing to discuss the history of the immortal sects, Bai Ling always felt that he was the better for listening. He unconsciously began to focus.

"Thousands of years ago, the structure of the immortal sects had yet to be established. Masters floated everywhere like clouds. Of the shed skin cultivators who could control the elements, some became sages who cut through mountains and established lineages, enjoying the sacrifices of hundreds of generations; and some became 'demonic gods,' their bodies and souls destroyed, sunk forever in the Impassable Sea." As Prince Zhuang spoke, he looked at the distant crowd. Flames leapt angrily in the distance. He asked dully, "Do you know why that was?"

Bai Ling hesitantly said, "Perhaps because their skills were inadequate, and history is written by the victors?"

“At their level, it’s no longer a war of arts and skills,” Prince Zhuang said evenly. “An ‘ascended spirit’ breaks free of mortality, a ‘shed skin’ ascends to heaven, and beyond the ‘shed skin’ is the ‘full moon.’ At the full moon level, you become a god, become a sage, dominate the spiritual mountains.

“When the shed skin masters were fighting over the divine full moon positions, it was a war of Ways of the Heart. In the end, only five people rose above the crowd, and they created the five sects of Xuanyin, Kunlun, Lingyun, Sanyue, and Lancang, and with this split the territory into five nations—among those five sages, there was a specialist in taming beasts, a scholar of arrays, a master of the sword... In summary, the techniques they were skilled in were different, but their Way of the Heart was the same.”

Bai Ling asked, “What was it?”

Prince Zhuang smiled with a trace of ridicule. “To bless and protect the common people.”

For a moment, Bai Ling suspected he was reciting from the history books of the orthodox sects.

“It’s true, not whitewashing by immortal historians.” It was as if Prince Zhuang had eyes on the back of his head. He had no need to look to know what Bai Ling’s expression was. “The Way of Heaven is universal. It has its own equilibrium. Before the shed skin stage, cultivation depends on the individual. Past the shed skin stage, it's no longer a matter of cultivation. If you want to attain the full moon stage, your Way of the Heart must merge with the universe, be accepted by the Way of Heaven. I suspect that among the three thousand ways, only the one that 'looks to all living creatures' is qualified to reach the full moon stage."

Bai Ling trembled. "So nonentities are born and die in an instant while all the immortals consider them beneath their notice, but the immortals must still rely on their holy sages' sects, and those holy sages were determined by the strength of those multitudes of nonentities!"

"Correct. The Way of the Heart cannot be violated. If the Way of the Heart is broken, cultivation is destroyed. I sometimes think it's hard to say whether the five sages back then 'dominated' the spiritual mountains, or whether they were detained in the spiritual mountains as collateral, to reach the final unsullied level of cultivation and be released only when there was peace in the mortal world," Prince Zhuang said. "Xuanyin's foundation is the Southern Sage's Way of the Heart. The four high elders, the thirty-six peak masters—while on the surface they all have their own Ways of the Heart, Xuanyin makes up their roots, from start to finish—in other words, a part of all their Ways of the Heart is inherited from the sage. Normally those shed skin and ascended spirit cultivators fight over power and influence for the sake of resources. When the people's resentment boils over, do you think that they would dare to disobey the sage's Way of the Heart for the sake of protecting some nobodies from their own families?

“All they can do is watch the flames burn higher, hoping that the wind will be weak and the fire will go out soon.” Prince Zhuang looked into the distance and murmured, “I think now that Zhou Kun was scheming against me. The old fool knew from the start what I was going to do and deliberately let me out to start the fire.”

Zhi Xiu glided down from Flying Jade Peak wrapped in ice and snow. When Zhaoting flew past Green Pool Peak, he saw mists hanging over the always lush peak, firmly covering all the green waves on the mountain.

Green Pool Peak was sealed... Her Highness Duanrui was in seclusion?

Now?

There was no time to think about it. Zhaoting swayed, and Zhi Xiu landed on Xuanyin Mountain's Principal Peak, in front of Shouxin Hall.

The inner sect disciples coming and going in Shouxin Hall were startled to see General Zhi. One after another, they stood in place and called out “shishu.” Despite the colossal urgent business he was on, Zhi Xiu didn't forget to be polite. He nodded in response to each of them. “Is the Dignitary of Rites High Elder here? I want to request a token to leave the mountain...”

Before he had finished speaking, he saw someone flying a sword land hurriedly. He was flying too quickly and stumbled when he landed. Zhi Xiu held him up from a distance, and the newcomer quickly said, “Thank you, little shishu.”

Zhi Xiu saw the mark of Dim Mist Peak embroidered on this disciple’s clothes—Dim Mist Peak was one of the peaks that belonged to a direct descendant of the Lin family. He said, “What has you in such a hurry?”

The disciple said, “An outer sect disciple who had just joined my peak, originally a mine supervisor in the southern mines, is currently escorting a shipment north, on his way to leave office and enter the inner sect. He just sent a Heavenly Question to the mountain. He says that the spiritual stone shipment convoy was attacked in the Resurrection Vortex. A gold-winged great roc of Southern Shu appeared and disappeared. Convoy Commander Zhao Zhenwei and Head of the Guard Lü Chengyi were colluding with a foreign nation. Lü has vanished.”

Zhi Xiu was startled. “Convoy Commander Zhao Zhenwei?”

When Xi Ping had asked, he had casually performed a divination on this Zhao Zhenwei. He had seen that he was from a collateral branch of the Ning'an Zhao family. His family's traditions weren't particularly upright. They had used some dishonorable methods the year he had taken part in the Grand Selection. Apart from that, there had been nothing else. How could he have failed to divine as major a matter as colluding with a foreign nation?

Just then, another Heavenly Question flew over. The Dim Mist Peak disciple grabbed it and saw what it said: The convoy has escaped and withdrawn outside the Resurrection Vortex. Zhao Zhenwei has been soul-searched, without result. There is a criminal brand stamped on Zhao's spiritual image. His spirit has collapsed.

Lin Zhaoli was soaked in salty seawater, his robes cut to rags by the remnants of the ascended spirit sword energy, his hair nearly soaked enough to extract salt from it. In this sorry state, he glared at Zhao Zhenwei, who was like a pile of mud—he was still breathing, but his spirit had collapsed and couldn't be repaired. All that remained of him was an empty sack of skin.

Lin Zhaoli pounded his fist against the wall of the ship's hold.

The convoy commander and the head of the guard had been involved in a conspiracy; who could be behind them? The Mine Governor? In all the southern mines, who was clean?

The cultivators beside him saw Lin-shixiong's expression change several times. At last, to their surprise, he began to laugh quietly, savage and distraught, frightening them so they didn't dare to make a sound.

Very few sword cultivators came out of the Lin clan, and Lin Zhaoli hadn't obtained his Way of the Heart from his family.

In the inner sect, his family had always valued quality over quantity. They were very harsh when it came to picking among juniors and descendants; they wouldn't take anyone with slightly insufficient endowments. Lin Zhaoli's disposition was unsociable and indolent. He didn't like social graces, was too lazy to heed others, and he had no ambition. At any rate, everyone in the southern mines respected him somewhat. There had been nothing wrong with muddling through life...until he met Anyang.

Anyang...

Being "captive to love" sounded like an even more humiliating spectacle than raping and pillaging. Lin Zhaoli had always taken the position that all women captive to love were fools, and all men captive to love were worthless...and his arrogance had brought his punishment upon him.

Anyang was his punishment.

When a member of the Zhou family had dived in and snatched away the Mine Governor position that he ought to have had sewn up, he hadn't grumbled at all. Instead, Anyang's seemingly joking words had given him a strong prod: "Forgive me, Lin-shixiong. I've robbed you of your office. Don't worry, I'll probably only be here a few decades before returning to the Latent Cultivation Temple."

True—for the most part, the girls of the Zhou family would ultimately enter the inner sect and become lady cultivators he was unworthy to associate with.

So he had begun to madly cultivate his spiritual bones, searching everywhere for an ancient master's Way of the Heart. Perhaps because he had so few wishes, when he occasionally raised a request to heaven, his luck had always been good. Over twenty years had passed, and just before he came to the end of his lifespan, he had completed his spiritual bones and filled up a great vacancy with the vital weapon of a master sword cultivator—and obtained the Way of the Heart within it.

Lin Zhaoli hadn't even waited for the inner sect to issue a reception order. Because the end of his lifespan was nearing, his face was slack, his hair was turning white, and the faint reek of age was already upon him... He had felt a sense of inferiority about this and hidden from Anyang for five full years. The day before Princess Anyang's birthday feast, he had impatiently violated the rules and established his foundation. Even if the inner sect were to punish him, he had wished too much to go in person to wish her a happy birthday in person, see her dressed in splendid regalia.

The instant he had succeeded in establishing his foundation, his consciousness had blanketed the whole of the southern mines—and just that night, those thieves stealing from the mines had activated their transport array. The secret array had crashed against the unauthorized established foundation cultivator, and both secrets had been exposed without warning.

The thieves in the house had worked through the night to move the array. By the time he went to investigate, there wasn't a trace. The lovestruck sword cultivator learned only then how deep were the waters of the southern mines. He hadn't known that he was a blind fool with his eyes open.

He had immediately notified Anyang and seen her beautiful face turn pale. His heart had instantly filled with heroism. He would rather help her clean up the southern mines than join the inner sect, even if it meant dying here as her watchdog.

It turned out that he had been flattering himself.

How ridiculous. She must only have thought that this unsuccessful love affair was standing in her way, right?

In the princess's manor, the sea of flowers in the garden was in full bloom. Purple mist nearly spilled from the wisteria pergola. Princess Anyang Zhou Qing sat on a swing, the hem of her dress trailing a zhang on the ground, her jewelry and ornaments so ceremonious it was as if she was about to attend a palace feast.

She looked down at her own palm. Dozens of criminal brands flashed in her white hand. Three of them—Liang Chen's, Lü Chengyi's, and Zhao Zhenwei's—had been crushed. The assassination of Lin Zhaoli had failed—she had known even before Lü Chengyi that Heaven's Design Pavilion had come with ill intent. From the day Liang Chen had died, she had known that this day would come sooner or later.

It seemed that every arrangement she had made only constituted a dying struggle; she couldn't overcome fate.

“You've also prepared yourself, haven't you?” Zhou Qing sighed gently and took out a gold butterfly hairpin.

Pang Jian kicked down the gate of the princess's manor, pushed aside the irritating sea of flowers, and saw the swing swaying lightly in the wind. There was a smile at the corners of Princess Anyang's lips and a gold butterfly in the center of her brow, looking like it was fluttering its wings preparing to take flight—she had stabbed the butterfly pin through her spirit, taking all her secrets with her, not leaving a single word.

Pang Jian stared blankly for a long moment, then suddenly remembered: the year that Zhou Qing had ridden the flying horse carriage to the Latent Cultivation Temple, he had also been the one escorting the disciples.

He was a little face-blind to start with, and a grown man had no business looking closely at a female disciple. He had seen her for a brief moment forty years ago and hadn't remembered what Zhou Qing looked like. But bizarrely, he remembered that butterfly hairpin.

Just before the provisional disciples had gotten into their carriages, a teenage boy had rushed over and put that butterfly hairpin into the hands of one of the female disciples. Someone else had told Pang Jian that that teenage boy was the fifth prince...the present Emperor Taiming.

Others were jubilant on the way to the Latent Cultivation Temple, full of curiosity and excitement. When they reached the sky, they never listened to an old man's advice; they insisted on sticking their heads out the windows and only dropped it when they got dizzy from looking. Pang Jian didn't know how many classes of disciples he had escorted, but only that girl, clutching the butterfly hairpin, had cried the whole way. It was a far cry from her carelessness in death.

It was as if at eighteen she had already foreseen the wrong path that would take her here.

“I don't believe it can all be over and done with just because she died.” Pang Jian casually sealed the manor with a talisman and released karma beasts onto the carved walls. He turned abruptly and said to a group of dumbfounded mine supervisors, “Starting now, I am confiscating the Mine Governor's seal. Martial law will be imposed on all the ports in the southern mines. No one may go in or out. I want records of all mine collapses beginning from the opening of the southern mines.”

In front of Shouxin Hall on Xuanyin Mountain's Principal Peak, practically on the heels of Lin Zhaoli's message, Zhi Xiu received a Heavenly Question from Heaven's Design Pavilion.

Pang Jian's writing was about to take flight: Shiyong went north with the shipment convoy, his fate is unknown, and Princess Anyang has committed suicide!

Xi Ping, whose fate was unknown, heard whispers filling his ears.

There were male and female voices, old and young. He was dazed for a long time, gradually regained a bit of consciousness, and felt that the “bed” under him was unpleasantly hard.

Wait...what bed?

Hadn't he fallen into the sea?

Xi Ping abruptly opened his eyes and found to his astonishment that all the water on him had dried.

He was in a forest of reincarnation wood. The coiled and knotted branches were interlaced, woven into a hammock wrapped around him. There were also unknown vines carefully stabilizing his injured leg and hand. Seeing him move, they somewhat reluctantly let go.

His injured hand and injured leg were actually mostly healed. This place was as full of spiritual energy as Flying Jade Peak.

Even his meridians, nearly blown apart by the ascended spirit sword energy, were much better. Xi Ping tried moving—he could shift himself.

Xi Ping took a backup sword from his mustard seed, pushed aside the branches that wanted to block his way, and jumped down.

“Hss...”

If the vines hadn't sped over to catch him, he would nearly have broken his still not very nimble leg again.

“What's going on?” Xi Ping, recovering from his shock, hugged the vines and thought, “I can't fly a sword?”

Next, he also found that he couldn't activate a talisman, couldn't control an array... He could still play his bone qin, but it was no different than playing an ordinary qin that cost three liang of silver on the market—in this place with its unusually plentiful spiritual energy, he couldn't use a single sliver.

Where is this? Xi Ping thought blankly, throwing back his head to look at the ancient trees that reached to the sky.

Xi Yue, Xi Yue?

No response. He couldn't sense the dragon-taming chain that was tied to his mind.

Xi Ping then focused on the center of his brow and called to Wei Chengxiang...still no response. But this time, he felt his voice bouncing around the reincarnation wood trees around him.

Just then, something fell out of his hair and slipped down his collar into the front of his robes. Xi Ping reached in to take it out and have a look, then nearly threw it away. “W-w-what the hell!”

It was a small segment of finger bone!

But when he squeezed that segment of bone and considered it for a moment, his spiritual sense was faintly touched... He thought that the owner of this bone had some connection to him. Xi Ping hesitated, then carefully put the bone away. He picked up a piece of straw and carelessly tied up his hair, then began to go in circles in the reincarnation wood thicket.

The reincarnation wood forest must have been hundreds upon thousands of years old. It was dense enough to shut out the light. Xi Ping couldn't resist muttering, “What a hindrance...”

Before he could finish speaking, something miraculous happened. All the reincarnation wood trees collectively wriggled their heavy, clumsy trunks, leaning and swaying, making an empty space about a zhang in circumference as if afraid of annoying him.

Xi Ping was shocked. These things were more obedient than Xi Yue.

He hesitated a moment, then tentatively said, “Where is this place? Can you point the way for me?”

The reincarnation wood trees continued to push and shove at each other. If not for the fact that the trees couldn't leave their roots, they would have walked a few steps aside on their long beards. After a moment, a clear path appeared in the thicket.

Xi Ping walked a few li along this path and left the reincarnation wood forest. His field of vision suddenly widened—

He was in an enormous valley. The bottom of the valley was full of ruins, like an ancient battlefield. The cliffs all around were full of caves. He couldn't see clearly what was inside, but he heard the wind passing in and out of them, carrying terrifying sobs.

The cliffs and the ground were covered in inscriptions, not one of which he recognized.

In the cracks between the inscriptions, Xi Ping saw a line of footprints and boldly attempted to walk up. Nothing happened. So, walking on tiptoe, he followed the footprints upward.

At the end of the footprints was a tall and upright sacrificial altar.

Xi Ping threw back his head and looked up at the altar, thinking, Oh, mother...

The sacrificial altar was full of human skeletons, seated or standing. The skeletons were all different, their postures almost elegant, the spiritual energy upon them oppressive, so it was impossible to tell at first whether these were real human bones or bizarre statues carved out of white spirits.

In a moment of resourcefulness, Xi Ping suddenly pulled out the unseen glasses Pang Jian had given back to him before he'd left and looked up through the lenses.

He saw that the skeleton closest to him, standing, had a name: Zhou Ye.

He looked to the next ones: Zhou Suxin, Zhou Li, Zhou Qi...

Zhou Qi?

That name was familiar. Who was it, now?

Also, why were all these skeletons surnamed Zhou?

Xi Ping walked in a circle around the altar. Suddenly, he saw a skeleton sitting upright, its head in its hand. For some reason, this skeleton's posture gave him a sense of utter familiarity. Xi Ping's heart jumped for no reason.

Then he saw the name of these bones: Zhou Ying.

CHAPTER 56 - The Mountain Falls (8)

How miraculous. There's a dead man here with the same name as my san-ge.

Xi Ping said to himself: Such a fated meeting. Should I pay my respects?

But for some reason, he couldn't bring himself to do it.

His feet seemed to be set into the ground, and his heart beat faster and faster. A thin layer of sweat rose on his back. He couldn't even avert his gaze from that skeleton.

The skeleton had his head slightly tilted, the index and middle fingers of his left hand curled and held together, supporting his cheekbone; the thumb was laid against the edge of his jaw. An exasperated gaze seemed to be coming from those empty eye sockets, looking at Xi Ping across a distance of several paces; he seemed to be alive.

Xi Ping practically had the feeling that any moment this skeleton would open his mouth and say, "What trouble have you gotten yourself into now?"

He abruptly averted his gaze and bit down fiercely on the tip of his tongue, turning away so he couldn't see the skeleton. He sat down crosslegged on the ground and focused, his mouth full of blood.

What was he thinking...? There was something strange about this damned place!

Luo-shixiong had taught them that the senses arose from the body and were easily invaded by illusions, so you had to avoid acting rashly when you were agitated and unsettled. First you had to seal your eyes, ears, nose, tongue, and body, concentrate inward on your spirit, examine everything you had just thought, and remember that the origins of many illusions were only want or fear. “Want” didn’t concern him; he had never known the pain of wanting something he couldn’t have in his life. What about fear?

Right—Xi Ping quickly found a reasonable explanation for his “hallucination”: it must be because he had heard that there was trouble brewing everywhere lately, and he had always been faintly uneasy about Prince Zhuang on his inspection tour of the south.

Thinking of this, Xi Ping relaxed slightly—not long before he had fallen into the sea, he had received san-ge’s report of his own well-being.

Since he had opened his spiritual eyes, it had been easy for Xi Ping to distinguish the aura of the person writing. Though the handwriting was similar, Xi Ping could tell at a glance which letters san-ge had written himself and which he had made Bai Ling write for him out of laziness.

The bare “all’s well” had certainly come from him directly—Bai Ling-da-ge would at the very least have written some plausible-sounding exhortations.

Somewhere among the inscriptions that covered the ground, there had to be ones for illusions. Sadly, he didn’t recognize a single character. He wished Xi Yue were here.

Though Xi Ping had “worked out” that this was all an illusion, for some reason, he still unconsciously avoided that skeleton named “Zhou Ying.” He turned his head to inspect another skeleton next to him.

This skeleton was named “Zhou Qi.” The figure was tall, with broad shoulders and a narrow pelvis. Xi Ping sensed that it was likely this person had been a man in life. The skeleton was standing, its skull tilted down slightly, silently “looking” at Xi Ping sitting at his feet. For no reason, he gave Xi Ping a feeling of gentleness and sadness.

This place was truly strange. How could a pile of bones be so full of emotion?

Xi Ping met his eyes for a moment and couldn't resist touching the skeleton. He felt very faint spiritual energy flit across his fingertips, then scatter in the wind like fine sand.

Then a deep masculine voice sounded in his ear: "A-Qing, Kun, er-ge is going now. You two, be well..."

When he spoke, the dimly flickering radiance around the skeleton that seemed carved of white spirits dispersed, revealing the ghastly whiteness of ordinary bone.

As if the dead man had let out his very last breath. Ashes to ashes, dust to dust. That sense that he was alive had also vanished altogether.

But these seemingly ordinary last words were like a bolt of lightning out of a clear sky, frightening Xi Ping, who feared neither god nor man, so much that his face turned ashen—Princess Anyang's name was "Qing," His Majesty Emperor Taiming's name was "Kun"...

He thought he knew who "Zhou Qi" was now!

In a panic, Xi Ping pulled the Notes from a Progress to the West that Pang Jian had forced him to read from his mustard seed. This wasn't a proper book. It was a history primer for young cultivators used in Great Li to the north, using the style of travel notes to describe the sights and traditions of each country and incidentally mentioning each country's great events and important people in recent generations.

Xi Ping quickly flipped to the Southern Wan chapter and consulted the record of imperial kinsmen in the appendix—because this book was somewhat old, it only recorded up to Emperor Taiming's generation...

Qi, second son of Xianzong, died young in Wan's twenty-fourth year of Zhaoxi, posthumously conferred the title of Prince of the First Rank Rui in Wan's second year of Taiming Prince Rui Zhou Qi was His Majesty's full blood older brother who had died young.

Emperor Taiming waved a hand and somewhat wearily said, "Withdraw."

"Your Majesty! Guzhou is in a state of emergency. Today, a mob besieged the yamen of Guzhou's Yunshan County. They've staged an uprising. Without a tiger tally, the commanders of Suling and Guzhou don't dare to act on their own authority. This matter..."

"We told you to withdraw." The emperor abruptly looked up. The slack skin of his eyelids folded into sharp arcs, as if he were an old wolf king who still had his influence and his underlings. “The court will discuss this tomorrow.”

The old courtier scraped his head against the ground. Seeing His Majesty unmoved, he ultimately didn't dare to repeat himself. He withdrew in silence. On leaving, he looked at the Marquis of Yongning, standing upright off to one side, keeping himself to himself. The courtier all but sprayed the word “sycophant” from his eyes to plaster it onto the Marquis's face.

Ancestors above, look at the situation! How could His Majesty still be in the mood to drink and make merry with this old boy toy?! Granted that Xi had once been a renowned beauty among men, what charms could he still have at his age?

It was simply unbelievable!

The Marquis of Yongning stood there composedly, acting as an ornament, and didn't so much as raise his eyelids.

Having dismissed the interlopers, Emperor Taiming closed his eyes and massaged his temples for a long time. Then he permitted the Marquis of Yongning to take a seat.

The Marquis sat when he was told. He wasn't the least bit apprehensive. He didn't even take the time to counsel His Majesty with a perfunctory “serious matters should take precedence.”

The eunuchs brought warmed up wine, then withdrew from the heated room—every year on the eighteenth day of the first month, His Majesty spent half the night drinking with the Marquis. At such times, he didn't let anyone disturb them.

In past years, there had been much gossip and slander about the relationship between the emperor and his subject. When tainted with imperial power, it seemed that anything could turn into a palace scandal and provide people with a subject to chew over with relish for a long time.

But the old personal servants knew that His Majesty had never been interested in men, and the Marquis of Yongning was no standard sycophant, either. He wasn't even very good at complying in order to please. Good looks aside, he was a dull and taciturn middle-aged man—and anyway, however charming he had once been, that had been a couple of decades back. Once a mortal passed his fifth decade, he could be called a Pan An⁴¹ as long as he had hair and no belly.

When these two drank, it was purely drinking. They didn't even exchange any meaningless pleasantries. And their drinking was very restrained. The two of them would split a single small jar. Once they had finished drinking, it was “This subject requests leave to withdraw. Take care, Your Majesty.” It was like this every year. No one knew what kind of ritual this was. It passed the understanding.

But this year, the rules of the “ritual” had changed slightly.

After dismissing the eunuchs, Emperor Taiming took out a brocade box, which he gave to the Marquis of Yongning. There was a set of hair ornaments inside, with a big, brilliantly colored pearl arranged in the center. Apart from the pearl, the Marquis of Yongning knew at a glance that the rest had been produced by his wife’s family, and that they were somewhat antiquated one-of-a-kind products. Even he had never seen them. They had been very meticulously preserved.

“What is...”

“I’ve heard that now, this set could be exchanged for a big mansion on the west of the Lingyang River.” Having dismissed the attendants, His Majesty’s tone relaxed considerably. “These were recently sent back by Anyang. My si-jie was extremely arrogant and willful when she was young. She got up to quite a bit of the wretched business of snatching other people’s treasures. Now that I think about it, she really shouldn’t have done that. You can take these things back to your wife. Si-jie asked me to have them returned to their rightful owner and compensate for the fault in her place. She encountered this pearl in the East Sea. She valued it tremendously and could never bear to have it set. She sent it as a form of apology.”

How could someone ask the emperor compensate for a fault? The Son of Heaven was always right.

The Marquis of Yongning didn't know what had gotten into him. He could only say, “Your Majesty and the princess overwhelm my humble wife with flattery...”

Emperor Taiming waved a hand. As though half-grumbling, he said, “This wasn't the only thing she sent back. She wanted me to deliver each one in turn... Alas, at our age, many old acquaintances are no longer living. Where should I go to deliver them? It puts me in an awkward position. But what can I do? In all her life, her only happy years were when she was a young girl. She wanted to make arrangements for her cherished memories before she went. I had to agree.”

Hearing this, the Marquis of Yongning was startled: what did he mean? These words sounded extremely ominous.

Then he saw the emperor narrow his dim eyes and look toward a corner of the heated room. “Today, those peonies in the heated room that haven't shown any growth in years suddenly bloomed. Do you think that peonies can bloom in the first month? So I knew...that Anyang must be gone. This is her coming back to have a look at me.”

The Marquis of Yongning looked in the direction of his gaze and saw that there was indeed a potted peony bush that had bloomed. Beside the big, bleak desk clock, the peonies were unsuitably colorful.

It was just reaching the full hour. The desk clock tolled to report the time, and the flowers shook gently at the sound of the tolls, making an observer tremble with fear for no reason.

As if senile from age, the old emperor gazed at the peonies and murmured, “You also chose today, the same as er-ge. Were you worried that I was too old and wouldn’t be able to remember so many dates?”

The Marquis of Yongning’s thoughts moved quickly: did he mean that Princess Anyang was dead? But she was a half-immortal, still far from the end of her lifespan. And in the southern mines, there was no need for her to spend all day contending in wits and valor with evil cultivators... What had happened?

“Your Majesty...”

But before he could ask, the old emperor interrupted him again. “Oh, yes, the Imperial Consort has been somewhat unwell the last few days. Go and have a look at her when you have the time.”

The Marquis of Yongning said, “Of course, I will have my wife come to the palace tomorrow to pay her respects to the Imperial Consort. Your Majesty, just now...”

“I said you. I didn’t say your wife.”

The Marquis of Yongning was silent for a moment, then respectfully said, “Though we are brother and sister, men and women must still keep a distance. Take it as avoiding suspicion.”

What would be the point of having a look? He wasn’t a doctor. Wouldn’t the best thing for her be to drink a little less snow wine? When he went into the palace, nothing would happen apart from the two of them staring helplessly at each other; they had nothing to say. Then she might go and get herself dead drunk from the stress of holding back. One of these days, she might drink herself into a living corpse, and that would be the end of it.

“At your age, what suspicion are you avoiding?” the old emperor said. “Xi Zhengde, you old fool... Tell the truth, seeing her upsets you—you can’t forgive yourself. I know, I know... We’ve all been there.”

The Marquis of Yongning's heart jumped. He felt that the topic was sliding in a dangerous direction. What the hell had happened to Princess Anyang to upset the old emperor like this?

Then the old emperor said, "After all these years, you're the only one laosan has a good relationship with. It's because he knows, too."

The Marquis frowned: His Highness Prince Zhuang? What did he know?

"He knows that you colluded with an evil cultivator from Northern Li, brought your family to the brink of ruin, planned to betray your country and flee," Emperor Taiming said with emphasis. "You would rather have taken your whole family, young and old, into exile in the Beijue Mountains, let him die in the womb, than languish on a bed of riches bought by the spiritual bones of an unborn child."

The Marquis of Yongning's face instantly went blank.

For a time, no one spoke inside the heated room. Only the radiator and the desk clock went on clamoring obliviously.

After a moment, the Marquis of Yongning flexed his stiff knees and slowly knelt beside his seat.

“You really did silently pierce the sky. Today’s brats, they all bluster to their heart’s content, but which one among them can measure up to your ruthless decisiveness back then?” Emperor Taiming waved a hand. “Get up already. It’s been over twenty years. If I had wanted to investigate you, would I have waited this long? Back then, I...actually wanted to let you go. Xi Zhengde, you have courage. You did what generations of us have dared to think without daring to do.”

The Marquis of Yongning said, expressionlessly, “I am petrified.”

Emperor Taiming gave a laugh. “It’s true that a sister’s son takes after his uncle. When I exposed your nephew’s secret, his display was just the same as yours is now.”

The Marquis of Yongning, undaunted, considered: Prince Zhuang already had his independence, anyway, and Xi Ping was in Xuanyin’s inner sect, part of the Dignitary of Fate’s lineage. Could the old emperor still choose this moment to settle old accounts? Even if the emperor had gone crazy in his old age, he could only take it out on him. He didn’t believe that the emperor would dare to make a big fuss and drag in his whole family.

In that case, the Marquis had nothing to fear. He was too lazy to even think up the words needed to go through the motions of admitting his guilt and quibbling. He simply obeyed the imperial command, stood up, and even poured himself a cup of wine.

Indeed, Emperor Taiming didn't accuse him of rudeness. He sighed softly and said, seeming very regretful, "But in the end it was Ziyi who backed out at the last moment. Because of this, you haven't said a single word to her in private ever since, am I right? Hey, why are you drinking on your own? Give me a refill."

Accordingly, the Marquis of Yongning poured him a cup. Emperor Taiming picked it up and downed it in one gulp. He quietly said, "Stop blaming her. She wasn't weak. It was because a new month had started just then, and the palace's half-immortal private physician told her that her child not only bore spiritual bones, he also just happened to have an inborn paramount spiritual sense. Being like a half-immortal the moment you open your eyes...isn't something a mortal body can bear. If one of those things wasn't removed, he wouldn't have survived."

This time, the Marquis of Yongning was truly shocked. "What?!"

"She never told you, right?"

"Why did she..."

If it had been for the sake of protecting the child, then it was a whole different matter. Did Xi Ziyi have the spirit of a mouthless bottle gourd? Never mind anything else, how could she have concealed this, too?

Emperor Taiming was watching him with interest. “If she had told you, what would you have done?”

The Marquis was a little blank. He pondered for a moment, then said frankly, “Followed my original plan. If it was possible to save the child, we would have saved him. If not, then he would have reincarnated wrong. Children who are sick in the womb not surviving is in accordance with nature. Anyway, there are secret arts there. There could be masters in the north who would have known how to remove the spiritual bones. If he had begun cultivating when he grew up, we would have given them back to him. If he didn’t make anything of himself, we’d have used them as an ornament to repel evil. At least it would have been clean.”

Emperor Taiming clapped his hands and laughed. “Betray your country and flee with innate spiritual bones that not one in a hundred million people has, then use those spiritual bones to repel evil. Xi Zhengde, you’re as stubborn as a smelly rock in a latrine. You really are something else...but your sister is an ordinary mortal. She was worried about her old mother going into exile in the wilderness in her failing years, worried about what to do if the child who might not even live turned from a child of royalty into an evil cultivator betraying the nation, worried about the future of your whole family.”

The Marquis of Yongning didn't laugh. His unease grew stronger and stronger: while he couldn't approve of the Imperial Consort's preoccupations, he still thought she could be excused for having them. Blood is thicker than water, and he wasn't an absolute despot like Emperor Taiming. Why hadn't she explained herself over two decades later?

Something must have happened afterward to make her regret abandoning their original plan.

The Marquis couldn't resist asking, “Your Majesty, I have never heard of innate spiritual bones and a paramount spiritual sense being united in a single person; may I ask, Your Majesty, what happens to such a person if he survives?”

Emperor Taiming said softly, “A connection will remain between the spiritual sense and the spiritual bones even after they are parted.”

The Marquis of Yongning was shaken. He knocked over his wine cup.

“The possessors of innate spiritual bones before him didn't know that they were that generation's sacrifice for the Zhou family. They only thought that they had been born frail,” the emperor said. “Only Ying... A first class spiritual sense is comparable to being a half-immortal, but a paramount spiritual sense—it’s said that it can naturally see through all things, perceive the energy of all creatures—I’m not sure. Ying has never told me how the human world appears in his eyes. A person like that, even when his spiritual bones have been removed, will still be connected to those bones in thought if not in body. In other words, for over twenty years, while his body was in the mortal world, his mind...half of it was always held far below in the Impassable Sea.”

As the old emperor spoke, he poured himself more wine, three cups in a row, knocking back each in one gulp. On the strength of the alcohol, he seemed to recover a bit of boyish spirits. “You’re right, Zhengde. Even if the child had gone to herd sheep at the feet of the unpeopled Beijue Mountains, dragging around a sickly body—even if he had spent his whole life as a wanted criminal—even if he had never been born—he still would have been better off than as a child of royalty in Jinping.

“Innate spiritual bones are a curse passed down from our forebears. Originally, they occurred only once every few hundred years. Later, they began to appear practically once every generation... Do you know why that is?” Before the ghastly pale Marquis could speak, Emperor Taiming answered himself, smiling, “Because again and again a useless full blood brother of the one carrying innate spiritual bones would be chosen to be the next Crown Prince. The bloodlines converged. With generation after generation chosen like this, the innate spiritual bones increasingly became an ulcer on our bones... Those whose spiritual bones were carved out could only eke out a living with false bones substituted by a secret art. Virtually none of them lived to the prime of life. My mother was the daughter of a fifth-rank official. Under this throne of mine lie the flesh and blood of my own full blood brother.”

The Marquis of Yongning picked up his toppled wine cup and set it heavily on the table. He said, coldly, “Forgive my rudeness, Your Majesty, but if just one generation had wanted to be rid of that ulcer, it wouldn’t have been handed down to the present.”

CHAPTER 57 - The Mountain Falls (9)

“Seas run dry, mountains wear away. How can a country remain eternal? Even the plants rotate across the four seasons. Isn’t Great Wan fed up with being named Zhou?” At this moment, Prince Zhuang’s spirits were rather high. “With turmoil in Great Wan, discounting Southern Shu for the moment, Chu and Northern Li are bound to be unable to restrain themselves. Xuanyin is presumably also eager to see a foreign invasion in order to take back popular sentiment... Before, Zhou Kun only provoked internal strife in Xuanyin by stealing a heart demon. This time, as his son, I will perform my filial duty and give him a free lesson in how to bring about an immortal war empty-handed—oh, right, don’t forget to ask that brat Xi Shiyong where he’s run off to.”

Bai Ling silently took out the white jade proximal and sighed to himself.

This was a natural born evil spirit of chaotic times, like the legendary child born of dragon’s saliva, who would only laugh on seeing the sky full of burning war beacons.⁴² The heart-protecting lotus made by Master Lin’s hand couldn’t improve his vitality as much as a bloody conflict.

But who could criticize him?

At any rate, Bai Ling's life was his. If he wanted to become an immortal, Bai Ling would become a step up to the heavens; if he wanted to become a demon, then he would simply become a soul-burning lamp.

Prince Zhuang looked at him. "Why are you sighing?"

Bai Ling quietly said, "I was only thinking that when the world falls into chaos, the lives of the people are hard."

Prince Zhuang said, smiling, "When the canal connected north and south, when the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon began to ride the mists, did the lives of the people cease to be hard? If they aren't hard, then where has this turmoil come from?"

Bai Ling hesitated, then said, "Your Highness, since Xuanyin does not dare to resist the people's resentment, why don't you simply step forward and petition on the people's behalf, personally lead them in demanding justice? It would save them from being used by those evil cultivators."

"If I petition on their behalf, what are they going to do? If I lead them to demand justice, do you think I'll know what 'justice' they want?" Prince Zhuang said calmly. "I don't know of the people's suffering, and they don't know of my grievance. You say that the lives of the people are hard—in what ways are they hard? Have you lived the life of an unemployed laborer?"

Since you haven't, you're only an onlooker judging others against yourself. Why should I take someone else's business into my own hands? Who am I to act as a savior to others? Are they sheep, not men?"

Bai Ling was at a loss for words.

"Even if they would rather be sheep, I am no shepherd. I am but a demon from the bottom of the Impassable Sea." Prince Zhuang massaged the thumb of his right hand. "Instruct Shiyong to return to finish his business and hurry back to the immortal sect. Tell him not to run around outside in this turmoil."

Bai Ling accordingly bowed his head to write the letter.

Fine. In the end, this "demon" had a tether holding him to mortal desires.

Xi Ping nearly tore the pages of the book as he turned them.

He compared the skeletons around him to the names of the deceased in the book one by one: Zhou Ye, seventh son of Shizong; Zhou Li, posthumously conferred the title of Princess Changping in the second year of Xianzong...

In the book, it said that this Princess Changping had been only eight years old when she died, so the spiritual bones set here were also very small. She had her hands propped behind her, sitting on a stone step with her feet dangling; she seemed to still be a mischievous imp. Xi Ping gently touched her skull and heard a little girl's tearful voice calling out "Mother"... She seemed to be in a great deal of pain.

He passed among the skeletons, endless lingering spiritual energy sweeping by his ears, hearing the unheard last words of the owners of these spiritual bones that had been trapped at the bottom of the fathomless sea.

Xi Ping's scalp prickled. What was all this? What the hell was it?

It certainly wasn't an illusion. Illusions arose from the heart; no illusion would use things he didn't know and had to look up in a book to solve the riddle!

At last, he clenched his teeth and stood in front of the skeleton named "Zhou Ying."

The muscles of Xi Ping's calves nearly began to twitch faintly.

Only close up did he find that this skeleton's right hand thumb and index finger were each missing a joint, but he had no time to consider this minor detail now. All the names of the skeletons around him that he had looked up belonged to members of Great Wan's imperial family who had died young...and the Zhou family's members almost never shared names with their ancestors.

But what if...

What if when san-ge had been named, the Board of Rites had made an oversight? After all, there had been so many generations. Or what if there had once been an amorous emperor who had given birth to an illegitimate child he hadn't entered in the record of family names?

Clinging to a last thread of hope, he fiercely squeezed his wrist, held his breath, and reached out a hand toward that skeleton.

When he tested the spiritual energy, he would know... He would certainly hear more last words that had nothing to do with him, right?

Having written the letter, Bai Ling suddenly frowned—there was no flow of spiritual energy in the proximal. In other words, the connection between the two proximals had been broken.

What was going on? Had the immortal tool been damaged? Or had the young master used up all his spiritual stones yet again?

He couldn't have used them up so quickly, could he?

“Your Highness, I can’t seem to contact the Viscount.”

Prince Zhuang clicked his tongue. “That big spender. He’s run out of spiritual stones yet...”

But before he could finish speaking, it was as if Prince Zhuang had been stabbed. His right hand trembled, and Xi Ping’s horrified, distraught face flashed before his eyes.

On the nameless altar, Xi Ping gathered his courage and took the right hand laying by the skeleton’s side. But unlike the other skeletons, the spiritual energy didn’t scatter. Instead, it flowed toward the place he had touched. The glow of the dense spiritual energy made the bones seem even more like a statue carved from white spirits... Xi Ping didn’t hear last words from this skeleton. The moment he touched the skeleton, all of his spiritual sense was suddenly concentrated between his brows, in his spirit. There, he met a pair of familiar eyes.

Through the spiritual bones, the spiritual senses of these two people whose connection through the white jade proximals had been cut off collided without warning.

Bai Ling saw the languor from earlier vanish entirely from Prince Zhuang's face. He put a hand to his forehead. An inscription flashed dimly on his brow. This "demon who wouldn't be a shepherd" instantly reverted to an ordinary mortal and asked one question after another, almost babbling: "Where are you? How did you end up at the bottom of the Impassable Sea, all alone? How did you get in?"

Xi Ping's legs went weak, and he went right to his knees at the feet of the seated skeleton. "...san-ge?"

There was a thin layer of spiritual energy on the bones. They could absorb the spiritual energy hovering around them. Xi Ping was at any rate a half-immortal, and he had learned some general knowledge at the Latent Cultivation Temple. He knew what this was—only spiritual bones could absorb spiritual energy.

Supposing that these spiritual bones had belonged to a cultivator, even an open-eyed one, his cultivation level would have had to be at the peak of the open-eyed stage. For Xi Ping, this would have been someone with a cultivation level similar to his. Through the unseen glasses, the name should have been blurred and incomplete. But on this skeleton, the name "Zhou Ying" had been so clear that he couldn't avoid seeing it even if he wanted to. That meant they had to be the bones of a mortal...the legendary innate spiritual bones.

Innate spiritual bones like those of Princess Duanrui, the likes of which had only appeared in Xuanyin once in a thousand years.

Bai Ling gasped. “The Viscount is at the bottom of the Impassable Sea? He isn’t a member of the Zhou family. How did he get in?”

Once the initial shock was past, Prince Zhuang immediately remembered how his right thumb had been touched out of nowhere. “He must have had my thumb bone.”

Bai Ling said, “But the Viscount grew up with you and has a profound karmic connection to you. If he had touched one of your spiritual bones, you could not have been unaware.”

“Yes, so someone else must have had that thumb bone before.” Prince Zhuang’s thoughts were extremely quick. He hurriedly connected the sequence of events. “One of my spiritual bones was stolen and I didn’t know about it—that must have happened after I broke my connection to the bones eight years...nine years ago. You took my finger bone then, and the thief must have conjectured that a finger bone could safely bring a person out of there, so they imitated you. Nine years ago...nine years ago... Didn’t that traitorous former general commander of Heaven’s Design Pavilion go into seclusion nine years ago?”

Bai Ling said in surprise, “There was indeed a whiff of that place about him. Can it be...”

“Nine years ago, during the big earthquake that provoked a rare tidal wave throughout the Resurrection Vortex, we opened the seal on the Impassable Sea and took advantage of the chaos to escape. It’s likely that Liang Chen fell to the bottom of the Impassable Sea by bizarre coincidence then and borrowed my finger bone to free himself. That bone must later have fallen into the hands of his accomplice, and Shiyong went to investigate the remaining evil cultivators in the southern mines and came across it...” In an instant, the clear sequence of cause and effect was exposed before Zhou Ying’s eyes. For a time, he couldn’t catch his breath, only felt that he was like an ensnared insect; it seemed that no matter what, he couldn’t escape the venomous web of fate. “Damn it!”

“Your Highness!” Bai Ling grabbed his fist, which he had slammed against the wall.

Prince Zhuang took a deep breath, quickly restrained himself, and calmed down. “Shiyong, listen to me carefully...”

“Who...” Xi Ping interrupted him, his voice so strained it nearly tore his throat. “Who did this?”

“I can’t explain it properly in a few words. You can’t stay in that place for long. I’ll explain everything to you when you come back, okay? Listen to me. The wind hasn’t risen yet in the Impassable Sea. Right now, take the finger bone that brought you there, return to the place where you came in, and find the inscription there. Remember this.”

He projected an image of an inscription into Xi Ping’s spirit. “Find this. When you find it, use that finger bone to pass through. Hurry.”

Xi Ping didn’t move. Half-kneeling, he held the skeleton’s hand, his gaze not leaving the skeleton. His expression was somewhat blank. He asked, “What happens if the wind rises? I think there is a wind.”

This brat was truly full of curiosity. If he wasn’t satisfied, he definitely wouldn’t drop the subject. All Prince Zhuang could do was say, “Not that kind of breeze—raise your head, look at the cliffs on either side of the valley.”

Like a puppet on strings, Xi Ping raised his head. He saw that in the ring of towering cliffs around the valley, the countless pitch-black caves looked like one malicious eye after another, covetously eyeing his flesh and blood body. When he looked into the caves, the frenzied warning from his spiritual sense pricked his eyes almost painfully.

“Suppressed there is the demon host.” Prince Zhuang’s speech was somewhat faster than usual. “When the wind rises, the demons in the caves will be shaken awake. There’s no way to determine when the wind will rise or fall in that awful place. The demon host might wake at any moment. There’s a ten point⁴³ demon seal there. With your current cultivation level, you won’t be able to control spiritual energy inside it. Don’t delay any longer!”

“Right, I understand.” Having listened to this, Xi Ping nodded very firmly. “Then you’ll just have to put up with being in my mustard seed for a while.”

“Wha...” Sparks nearly flew from Prince Zhuang’s spiritual bones. To Xi Ping, his voice actually sounded flustered from agitation. “Don’t fiddle with my...my spiritual bones! Can’t you see that I’m securing the demon seal? Don’t you understand that the people who came before you only dared to take a small finger bone? Aren’t you...”

Before he could finish, the two of them simultaneously heard the sound of the sobbing wind in the valley change its tune slightly.

Prince Zhuang’s expression changed abruptly. “Xi Shiyong, get out of there right now!”

Xi Ping remained motionless. “How powerful are these demons? Are they like the ones in the legendary Great War of Gods and Demons?”

Prince Zhuang nearly had a heart attack at his question—when he was studying, this brat couldn’t learn a thing even if it was taught eight times. He’d been nicknamed the “teacher’s headache.” But when there was no need for him to be clever, he could always hit right on target. At the moment, all Prince Zhuang could do was vaguely say, “Something like that. Since you know they’re powerful, hurry up and leave.”

Xi Ping said, “I don’t believe it.”

Prince Zhuang: “...”

Was Xi Shiyong the wrath of heaven sent directly to him from the highest clouds?

The “wrath of heaven” slowly said, “I’ve listened to shizun’s lessons about the Great War of Gods and Demons. Your shed skin forebear only sealed the demon host in the Impassable Sea by exhausting his cultivation and feeding his body to the demons. San-ge, even though you have innate spiritual bones, you’re still a mortal. The demons shut up in here can’t be of the grade of the demonic gods of antiquity...”

Prince Zhuang's head was about to split. "Whatever grade they are, they can still crush you..."

"There's nothing impressive about crushing me. Even a gold-armored zheng raised by the Shu could crush me just by sitting on me. But the Xuanyin Mountains have four high elders and thirty-six peak masters." Xi Ping was paying absolutely no attention to the increasingly wrong pitch of the wind. "I don't believe that taking your mortal skeleton can release the demon host suppressed here and leave all those mighty people at a complete loss. Before you, the most recent spiritual bones belonged to His Highness Prince Rui. Don't lie to me, I looked it up in a book. You hadn't been born yet when His Highness Prince Rui passed away. Even if they took your spiritual bones before you were born, there would still have been nearly twenty years in between. The demon seal was all right even with no one to secure it for twenty years?"

Prince Zhuang: "..."

He had never expected that at such a time he would hear of Xi Shiyong reading a book.

There was a wail, and a bone-chilling laugh came on the wind. It was sharp and thin, echoing in the valley. The ground began to tremble faintly. The inscriptions that had been carved into the ground popped up. A rancid smell spread, the sky clouded over, and a bloody mist rose.

“The seal couldn’t have been missing someone to secure it for twenty years, but it wouldn’t have been a problem for an offering. I suppose these demons wouldn’t starve to death in twenty years.” At the moment, Xi Ping could be described as so furious that he was brave enough to do absolutely anything. He turned a deaf ear to the laughter that could have scared a dozen Zhao Zhenweis into pissing themselves. He took his backup sword out of his mustard seed. “Who’s been raising demons in this damned place? Who took your spiritual bones and left you here as collateral? I’m going to get out of here and kill them.”

“You know it’s an offering and you still want to pull the tooth from the tiger’s mouth? Xi Shiyong, you...” Before Prince Zhuang could finish, the spiritual sense linking him to his spiritual bones abruptly cut off—he had done what he could to escape the connection between himself and his spiritual bones nine years ago. It was only because Xi Ping, a person with a profound karmic connection to him, had touched them that the link had been reestablished. Now that it had broken off again, it meant that that bastard Xi Ping, not listening to a single word he said, had simply stuffed his spiritual bones into his mustard seed!

The moment that Xi Ping “seized the spiritual bones by force” from the altar, the weather in the valley changed. Ear-splitting roars sounded. The starving demon host at the bottom of the fathomless sea was enraged.

Xi Ping’s expression didn’t so much as flicker—even if the sky fell today, he still had to get these spiritual bones out of here.

The sky in Jinping was so heavy it seemed ready to come crashing down on people’s heads. Dense clouds rose above Guangyun Palace. Suddenly, an unseasonal bolt of winter lightning fell, the light giving all the auspicious animals on the palace walls and eaves a malevolent look.

“We can’t stop.” Emperor Taiming slowly shook his head. “The Zhou family can’t stop now.”

The Marquis of Yongning said derisively, “The Zhou family’s forebear gave up his body to feed the demons and used himself to build the Impassable Sea—a meritorious deed persisting for generations. Are you saying that you not only couldn’t shield your children and grandchildren, you also had to turn ‘feeding demons with your own body’ into a family calling? If you hadn’t been willing, I don’t believe that Xuanyin would have publicly demanded that you place your own children into the Impassable Sea—Your Majesty, are you all so attached to that throne that gives you no freedom?”

Emperor Taiming was stunned. Then he stroked his chin and said, smiling, “Zhengde... Zhengde, you really are...just as upright as your name.”⁴⁴

The Marquis of Yongning stared.

“The war of gods ended long ago, and the structure of the five great immortal mountains...oh, there are only four great ones left now...the structure is already established. The world is clearly divided. All the ancient demonic gods have fallen. What kind of evil creatures can there be that my Xuanyin’s thirty-six peak masters couldn’t get rid of and would need ordinary mortals to stand guard over? After being held at the bottom of the Impassable Abyss for thousands of years, the demonic gods, too, ought to have starved to death.”

The Marquis of Yongning faintly realized something, and chills went up his spine.

“This throne that gives us no freedom—you’re right,” Emperor Taiming said quietly. “Since ancient times, my family has been a family of demon subduers. For thousands of years, a hundreds generations of my ancestors have taxed their ingenuity for the sake of this country, working night and day. Back then, it was my family that gave up the Xuanyin Immortal Mountains to the Southern Sage, gave up our bodies to fill the Impassable Sea. It is fitting and proper for us to rule this country, but now we must hold ourselves back on point after point for the sake of those so-called ‘great families’ of Xuanyin.

“Eight hundred years ago, Princess Duanrui with her innate spiritual bones was born into this world, and the whole family was wild with delight. They thought that the Zhou family would at last have its proper place in the immortal mountains. But what was the outcome? What has the Zhou family amounted to? A dog that Xuanyin uses to control the mortal world?”

“The immortals have forgotten that demon subduers must have a means to control demons. All antidotes grow beside the poisons they treat.” At this point, the old emperor’s face took on a somewhat deranged expression.

“The Impassable Sea is the only place that Xuanyin’s Sea of Stars cannot penetrate. It is the foundation of my family’s rebellion against the Way of Heaven... Since Anyang has already made her arrangements, it shows that Xuanyin has already learned of the deficit of spiritual stones in the southern mines... Where would you guess those spiritual stones have gone?”

The Marquis of Yongning was dumbfounded. After a long time, he met Emperor Taiming’s bloodshot eyes. “Have you all gone mad?”

“The ‘innate spiritual bones’ offerings of previous generations only learned of their fates on the point of death—that was for their own good. At any rate they could be happy in the mortal world for a brief time. Even if they had known that they had the deep Impassable Sea pressing down on them, they would still have been unable to breathe a word about it to outsiders. Wouldn't that have been too painful? That pain has been borne by us...us despicable wretches who hold the throne on the basis of our nearest and dearest's flesh and blood. We can only carry on bearing the sin of murdering our own family members, or else their flesh and blood would have gone to waste."

Like a sigh, Emperor Taiming said, "Ying has no full blood brothers. Can you guess why that is?"

CHAPTER 58 - The Mountain Falls (10)

“Because the curse on my family has at last come to a head,” Emperor Taiming said. “In the war of gods, the victors became sages and the defeated became demons. The corpses of the beheaded masters fell forever into the Impassable Sea, their bodies dead and their cultivation eliminated, but their resentment did not dissipate. This is what gave birth to the countless true demons at the bottom of the Impassable Sea. And the head of the demon host is...”

The Marquis of Yongning saw His Majesty’s lips move, but after the final words left his mouth, it was as if they had been swallowed by the air. Not even a sound of breath came to his ears.

Emperor Taiming paused and said, smiling, “As expected. We are both mortals. I cannot say that name.

“This ‘head of the demon host’ feeds on demons. As soon as he emerged, the stars fell into turmoil, the sages working together were unable to snuff him out, and at last it was a forebear of the Zhou family who gave up his body to establish the ten point demon seal, scattered that great demon at the bottom of the Impassable Sea. Since then, the Impassable Sea has been impervious to surveillance by the immortal sects, and no one but a member of the Zhou bloodline can enter. Xuanyin Mountain betrayed us. Emperor Gaozong risked himself, passed through the Resurrection Vortex and went down into the Impassable Sea. At first it was because he wanted to raise a private army there, but instead he found, contrary to his expectations, that the scattered demon seeds at the bottom of the Impassable Sea were still alive. They couldn't flourish, but...they carried some of the aura of that great demon. Emperor Gaozong, that old lunatic, did something that pulled a hundred generations of the Zhou family into a nightmare—he ordered a cultivator who was his trusted aid to remove his spiritual bones.”

The old lunatic was calling someone else an old lunatic...

The Marquis of Yongning didn't know how to react at first. “Gaozong was the son of Princess Duanrui's full blood brother, so he also had natural spiritual bones?”

“Yes. Their branch of the bloodline seems to have reverted to type. Gaozong saw his aunt's fate with his own eyes and was unwilling to enter Xuanyin. He removed his spiritual bones at the prime of his life and from then on was plagued with illness. He died two years later, leaving a bone altar at the bottom of the Impassable Sea,” Emperor Taiming said. “The demon seeds were like waste discarded by the universe. They were the remains of the demon. Unlike other living things, they couldn't receive the nourishment of spiritual energy, except through marrow made of spiritual energy in the spiritual bones of the family of demon subduers... Don't you think it's very mysterious, how the Way of Heaven leaves all living things one last gleam of hope?”

In the heated room that was as warm as spring year round, the Marquis of Yongning’s old rheumatic legs ached faintly as Emperor Taiming spoke.

“A cultivator only attains spiritual bones at the consummate open-eyed stage, and Xuanyin would be certain to know if a cultivator’s spiritual bones were removed. Fortunately, my family has innate spiritual bones. These spiritual bones, as soon as they’re born...even before they’re born, are separated from the body and end up at the bottom of the Impassable Sea, to constantly absorb spiritual energy, form spiritual marrow, nourish the demon seeds. The demon host is constantly renewed from the demon seeds, then is swallowed into the void and becomes nourishment for the head of the demon host. With the blessing of the southern mines, since Renzong’s time, the demonic energy at the bottom of the Impassable Sea has been making daily strides.”

Hearing his diction, The Marquis of Yongning felt a chill surging up from his guts. “Your Majesty, when Southern He invaded the north, was it truly because the sect leader of Lancang Sect lost his mind?”

“It truly was,” Emperor Taiming said. “Southern He’s greed knew no bounds. They selfishly brought Moon Plated Gold into the mortal world, until they had hollowed out their spiritual mountains and were harming heaven's order for the common people. Had Lancang's sect leader not gone mad, rather than being kicked out of the five great established sects, being led into injustice to the point that their Ways of the Heart were crushed, being condemned by the whole world...instead, they could in fact have brought themselves back from the brink of destruction, circulated spiritual stones from other countries for a high price, slowly recuperated. But...a shed skin great master like the Lancang sect leader should have had a Way of the Heart as steadfast as iron—why would he have lost his mind?”

“Why?”

“Because in that year, Princess Jiade died. Jiade was the offering of Renzong's generation. She was weak and sickly and had never married. She always lived in seclusion deep within the palace. But there are rumors that say she didn't die from illness, but died in childbirth—that was when Renzong's oldest son was born. The child of this illicit relationship between brother and sister was the next generation's possessor of innate spiritual bones.”

What was all this... The Marquis of Yongning's ears were ringing from the wildly throbbing pulse in his own neck.

“Suppressed by the ten point demon seal, the demons are unable to leave the Impassable Sea. Only when a new offering sinks down and the demon host rejoices will the demon seal loosen... Ha, perhaps it’s our forebear being enraged by his unworthy descendants. When Renzong sank the spiritual bones of his eldest son into the Impassable Sea, he took advantage of the seal loosening to take away a heart demon seed, which he planted in the Lancang Mountains.” With a sigh, Emperor Taiming said, “It wasn’t the Lancang sect leader who was mad. It was Renzong.”

The Marquis of Yongning sat there in a daze for a long time, feeling that if you poured out the black filth of the Zhou family, it would stop up the Grand Canal for half a year. In comparison to the others, the one in front of him seemed open-minded and reasonable. “...I hardly recognize the word ‘benevolence’ anymore.”⁴⁵

Emperor Taiming quietly said, “It was brought about deliberately.”

“What?”

“Not long after I was born, my mother passed away. Anyang was only two. Motherless babies in the palace are usually given to the empress or another consort or concubine to look after, but Anyang and I were practically raised by our older brother. When he left the palace to set up his own household, his manor became our home. Or else how could Anyang have had so many opportunities to leave the palace to go strolling around in her youth?” Emperor Taiming said. “In the palace, the children of a single mother will indeed be a degree closer than others, but they wouldn’t rely on each other the way we did. That unusual closeness was something the previous generation deliberately promoted.”

“Why?”

“In order to perpetuate the bone altar. The Zhou family hasn’t produced any renegades like you, who would rather let the dead die for nothing and take your whole family into exile if it meant scraping that ulcer off the bone. Each one of us, since learning the secret from the previous generation, were already sinners. We could no longer leave that bone altar... In a thousand years, only Ying, feeling the pain of the demon host absorbing his marrow since birth, has known the whole truth. Though the Impassable Sea has kept his mouth shut, left him unable to speak to an outsider of this secret, he was still determined not to be manipulated in this way. How do you think the Imperial Consort’s later children died?” Emperor Taiming sighed.

“Truly a demonic star from the heavens... What a coincidence. With him, the hundredth generation of bones, the great demon has at last taken shape. Nine years ago, the tidal wave in the Resurrection Vortex was caused by the great demon opening his eyes. At that time, half of the demon host was swallowed by him. Xuanyin Mountain must have been very nervous lately, because the Sea of Stars has been predicting calamity for no apparent reason... The demon seal is about to break. Zhengde, don't you think that is heaven's will?"

"Your Majesty, forgive my rudeness, but if there truly was such a thing as heaven's will...if heaven truly had eyes, it should have brought punishment down upon the Zhou family long ago."

Emperor Taiming laughed quietly. "Heaven does have eyes..."

In the depths of the valley in the Impassable Sea, the altar began to shake. The joints and teeth of the skeletons on it clicked together in time with the tremors. Next, the peculiar laughter turned into a shriek, droning—an astral wind appeared out of nowhere in the valley.

This wind seemed to be able to pierce a person's ears. Xi Ping had just put away the spiritual bones when he was blown right into the air.

Instinctively, he played his bone qin, like the time he had been dangling from the north slope of Flying Jade Peak. But while the urgent sound of the qin echoed in the valley, it didn't move the inscription-covered cliffs a hair. He couldn't even resist the wind.

The tyrannical wind threw him fiercely at the cliff face. At the same time, in the cave facing him, a pair of blood red eyes appeared. The eyeballs were one chi square, maliciously waiting for the wind to blow this snack their way!

Fortunately a half-immortal's body was far more resilient than a mortal's. On the impetus of that wind, Xi Ping abruptly turned around in midair and drew his sword. There was a clank as his sword hit something hard.

The owner of the blood red eyes was an enormous lizard with the head of a man. Its thick and heavy body was covered in scales; on its neck was a head the size of a table for four.

Xi Ping's sword had jabbed that "person"'s face; it was as if he had sliced at a rock. Propelled by the force of the gale, the blade scraped against the demon's face, sending up sparks. Next, the ordinary iron was defeated, and the sword snapped. Xi Ping was catapulted to the cliff face next to the cave!

When it moved, the demon was also just as swift as a lizard. In a blink, it threw itself out of the cave and swiped its sharp claws toward Xi Ping's middle. Xi Ping pulled out the spirit-winding silk and, ignoring everything else, aimed it at the inscriptions on the cliff. The spiritual energy flowing through the inscription character was momentarily blocked by the spirit-winding silk, and the cliff supporting the inscription immediately collapsed. Spiritual energy spurted out like the tide, blocking the demon's claws and slowing the wind!

When the wind paused, the floating “kite” Xi Ping rolled down along with the cliff. On the cliff face, countless demons reached out of the caves. Some had human forms, some were shadows, there were monsters you’d have to fill a whole page to describe...

Amid the shaking, all the skeletons slowly turned toward him. Opening and closing their jaws, they seemed to be furiously saying: Ignorant boy, how dare you shake the foundation built here by a hundred generations of resentful ghosts!

Xi Ping took only one look, then averted his gaze, his eyes hard. He thought, “What’s it got to do with me? Save your resentment.”

He narrowly avoided a series of hands and claws and fixed on a boulder where there seemed to be fewer inscriptions. When he had rolled to that point, he grabbed the boulder to stop his fall. He raised a hand and stamped a hither seal in a crack between the inscriptions.

Before going to a strange place, Xi Ping would stamp a spiritual seal in the place he set off from out of habit, whether or not he had a use for it later.

Inside the demon seal, while he couldn’t use spiritual energy himself, it seemed that the spiritual seal still worked!

The two seals instantly connected. Xi Ping, raising his half-snapped-off sword, threw himself in one-handed. Just then, a twiggy paw grabbed his ankle and pulled him down!

Xi Ping looked down. Below him were countless bloody maws waiting to split him up and eat him. In the space of only a few breaths, the bottom of the Impassable Sea, where the wind had risen, had become congested with bloody fog.

The demons' evil eyes seemed to have floated up from the depths of nightmare. A look could sway your spirit.

But Xi Ping looked directly into those eyes unwaveringly and thought, All these years, san-ge's spiritual bones have been here with these things?

He clenched his teeth fiercely and, backhanded, used his broken sword to cut through his own ankle. "You can have it, motherfucker!"

The strength of a half-immortal neatly sliced through the bone. His flesh and blood fell along with the demon. The wind swirled the blood spurting from the wound all over Xi Ping. Wrapped in bloody rain, he passed through the hither seal and fell back into the reincarnation wood forest.

The reincarnation wood forest seemed to be disturbed by his flesh and blood. The ancient trees began to tremble.

A number of demons gave chase before the spiritual seal vanished. Xi Ping had no more strength left to grip the broken sword. It slipped out of his hand. He was soaked in sweat, as though he had been scooped out of the water. His vision went black again and again. “Help...help me out...”

The reincarnation wood trees dropped a vine and scooped up this blood-covered person, making the demons throwing themselves at him come up empty. Then, the vine tossed Xi Ping into the dense forest behind them, right into the embrace of another vine.

The furious roars of the demons echoed throughout the reincarnation wood forest. The towering ancient trees were brought crashing down by the sharp claws.

Xi Ping felt that he had never concentrated so hard in his life. And it turned out that when you concentrated up to a certain degree, you really could weaken pain.

Ever since he was little, he had thought there was something strange about san-ge and the Imperial Consort. No matter how he tried, he couldn't understand it. Once he had secretly asked his mom, and she had looked as though she was going to cry, so he hadn't dared to ask again.

Now, it seemed he had finally caught sight of the secret undercurrents his relatives, distant and close, were hiding. He had made some faint guesses, but he didn't dare to think any more carefully about them.

Xi Ping remembered that when san-ge had been in his early teens, he had often left the palace, but it wasn't because he had been very fond of play... He got tired so easily doing anything, he couldn't have played even if he had wanted to. He had only gone under the name of visiting his grandmother to spend a whole day sitting in old Madam Xi's rear courtyard, listening to the opera pieces he had heard a hundred times before, drinking tea so weak it had less taste than water, seeming more elderly than his grandmother in her seventies.

Xi Ping thought, No wonder he would rather spend a whole day weeding the garden with the old lady than return to Guangyun Palace.

No wonder that at only fifteen, not waiting to come of age, he had left the palace early to set up his own household and taken only a dog with him.

Xi Ping licked his dry lips, casually pulled an inner robe from his mustard seed, tied it tightly around his wound, and stamped another spiritual seal under cover of the forest in case he needed it later.

He had to leave this place with san-ge's spiritual bones today; even if he died, he'd have to find another opportunity to die when he got out, or else san-ge wouldn't be able to stay with the Xi family afterward. How could he go drink tea and pull weeds in the old lady's garden again?

If he couldn't even go to the old lady's garden anymore, where could he go?

Xi Ping wiped the blood on his hands off against his clothes, reached into the mustard seed, and gripped Prince Zhuang's spiritual bones. "San-ge, how many of those inscription exits you mentioned are there?"

"Only one." At this stage, Prince Zhuang had no more time to scold him. Anything but helping him escape as soon as possible would be pointless. "But the location isn't fixed. It's tied to the Resurrection Vortex and related to the circulation of the water in the vortex. It's a good thing you've only been there a little while. The longer you delay, the farther the exit will move."

Before he could finish, his connection to Xi Ping was broken off again. Unnoticed, a demon like a shadow had appeared, the demonic energy extending from it like hair wrapping around Xi Ping, growing tighter the more he struggled. Xi Ping tossed out the spirit-winding silk and began to rummage around with brute force, making a hole in the “hair.” When he fell to the ground, he stamped another hither seal.

As he passed through the spiritual seal, it was as if the reincarnation wood trees behind him were of one mind with him. The moment he vanished, they toppled over, holding down the demon that wanted to give chase.

Xi Ping threw off the demon chasing him, squeezed out of the spiritual seal he had left before...and ran right into a “person.”

This “person” was tall and graceful, with a smile at the corners of his lips, sitting on the trunk of a chopped down reincarnation wood tree, a pair of eyes as warm as jade looking his way, as familiar as could be.

San-ge?

Xi Ping came to an instant halt. The obedient reincarnation wood vines immediately wrapped him up and pulled him back in a cautious retreat of over a zhang.

“Oh?” This “Prince Zhuang” was slightly astonished. “You’re a perceptive little brat. Have you also got a first-class spiritual sense or better? You actually saw through me at a glance.”

Xi Ping thought that if his ge had been here in person, he would have boxed his ears by now. Would he be smiling at him? As if.

At the same time, he looked and listened in all directions and found that all the demons that had just been chasing after him like an avalanche, snapping their jaws, were roaring nearby; it seemed that they didn't dare to chase after him rashly. He instantly became even more wary. "How kind of you to say so."

This "Prince Zhuang"'s face slowly changed. The muscles of the cheeks became slightly plumper, the traces of the bones became fainter, the distance between the brows widened... With a faint change to the features, he no longer looked like Prince Zhuang. There was a feminine look to him. Xi Ping was distracted and instantly saw the traits of many people he knew in that face where masculine and feminine mixed together.

"I am called a heart demon," the "person" said candidly. He curved his eyes in a smile at Xi Ping—those smiling eyes were identical to his mother's.

"Don't be afraid, you're too young. You've yet to know the hardships of life or taste its flavors, and your spiritual sense is sharp. I'm the one who's afraid of people like you."

"Really?" Xi Ping didn't hesitate for a bit. "Then I won't bother you. Maybe we'll meet again."

No sooner had he spoken than the reincarnation wood tree tossed him several zhang away. Another vine reached over and caught him. His second time leaping through the trees, the previously obedient reincarnation wood tree got something into its head. The vine abruptly twisted around Xi Ping's neck, trying to wring him. Xi Ping all but heard the sound of his bones dislocating—

The next moment, there was a scream in his ear, and a black shadow was pulled out of the reincarnation wood tree by the heart demon and swallowed right up.

The reincarnation wood tree's vine gently brought Xi Ping with his missing foot down to the ground and stopped moving.

“That was a ‘parasite.’” The heart demon had his hands behind his back, looking at him calmly. “At the bottom of the Impassable Sea, these things are everywhere. Are you sure you can get out on your own?”

For a moment, Xi Ping couldn't speak. He only probed his dislocated shoulder with difficulty and pushed it back in place.

“I'm an old acquaintance of Zhou Ying's. If you don't believe me, ask him. I'm the one who taught him about inscriptions.”

Xi Ping froze—this heart demon knew that he could contact san-ge.

The heart demon laughed. “Nine years ago, when the Impassable Sea was unstable, it was I who helped him escape with his little friend... He was the one who let me down. It’s truly heartbreaking.”

Without waiting for his prompting, Xi Ping had already reached into the mustard seed to ask Prince Zhuang.

Prince Zhuang said, “The heart demon speaks nothing but lies. Don’t trust it.”

But the heart demon put in a timely word: “A-Ying, you’re speaking ill of me right now.”

Prince Zhuang, hearing this, frowned.

The heart demon said, smiling, “Don’t be so nervous. I only want to discuss a transaction with the two of you... A-Ying, this little brother of yours, he can’t use spiritual energy, he can’t even walk. His condition couldn’t be more tragic, and he doesn’t even have a loyal and devoted paper friend beside him to help. Do you want him to escape from the mouth of the demon seal on his own?”

Prince Zhuang's spiritual bones were inside the mustard seed. Only when Xi Ping was touching him could he hear the voices in the Impassable Sea through the intermediary of Xi Ping. He couldn't see anything. Hearing this, he was startled. "What happened to you?"

Xi Ping said, "I'm fine. Cutting down any number of prattling little pretty boys is no problem."

CHAPTER 59 - The Mountain Falls (11)

The heart demon clicked his tongue a few times and deliberately said nothing.

Prince Zhuang said, “Xi Shiyong!”

Xi Ping didn’t answer. He found the elixirs Pang Jian and Zhi Xiu had given him in the mustard seed. Both of them had been absolutely orthodox in what they gave him. Apart from a small bottle with an established foundation pill that open-eyed cultivators regularly carried as encouragement, the elixirs the two of them had given him were practically all of the mind-calming and wound-treating sort that a mortal could also use. They wouldn’t cure an illness, but they wouldn’t kill you, either. Therefore, there were no prohibitions on using them.

Xi Ping grabbed a handful and munched them like candy.

The products of Rosy Cloud Peak were out of the common run. The elixirs dissolved as soon as they were in his mouth, and the effects were instantaneous.

As they slipped down his throat, Xi Ping’s spirit cleared at once. Then, a shallow-rooted shadow was pulled out of his spirit by the mind-calming pills.

The unsteady emotional state he'd been in since he had come to this damned place settled rapidly. Xi Ping calmed down.

It turned out that at some point the heart demon had already gotten to work on him.

His spiritual sense, which had been crowded out by emotion so much that it couldn't operate, recovered and all but grabbed Xi Ping by the neck and shook him, warning him that the man-shaped monster in front of him was dangerous.

The heart demon wasn't in the least bit embarrassed, looking at him with Madam Cui's soft, smiling eyes. "Don't misunderstand. My heart demon seeds can't be removed by an open-eyed grade pill. The vast majority of this world's worries are what people have imagined for themselves, but, alas, they always want to blame me."

"How true," said Xi Ping with a false smile. "Blame the pillow when you can't sleep, blame the heart demon when your six roots of sensation are unclean—anyway, you can't be the problem. How worthless of them."

This heart demon was different from that crowd that would bite you as soon as look at you. He was glib-tongued and looked at a glance like bad news; he gave Xi Ping the impression of being a person. Xi Ping just happened to be the type who would always play to an audience. When no one was watching him, if his temper went to his head, there was no telling what kind of suicidal stunt he might pull. But if there was an outsider present, however much he was falling apart, whatever impulses he had, he could still quickly piece together his wavering reason.

“A general in the field needs no permission to meet an emergency.” Xi Ping pulled back his severed ankle. The elixirs had temporarily eased the pain. He leaned the injured ankle against his intact leg. “It’s no use for you to provoke him. He’s not here in person, and I don’t do what he says. Come on, let’s chat.”

Prince Zhuang: “...”

This scoundrel. He hadn’t been punished enough as child. All of this hadn’t been knocked out of him, and he’d gone to ruin.

The heart demon narrowed his eyes and examined Xi Ping for a moment, then said, “If I’ve guessed right, the Resurrection Vortex ought to have been in a calm period. The Impassable Sea isn’t connected to the outside world during calm periods. Since you got in, it means that something has gone wrong during this one, right?”

Xi Ping—the chief culprit in agitating the Resurrection Vortex—nodded without hesitation and played dumb. “We were escorting a spiritual stone shipment north. Naturally we calculated to make sure that the Resurrection Vortex would be in a calm period before we set off. But as soon as we got there, an evil wind came out of nowhere, and suddenly there were whirlpools in the perfectly calm sea. And as if that weren’t enough, we ran into some evil cultivators trying to steal the spiritual stones, and somehow I got carried down here.”

Meanwhile, he quietly wrote on Prince Zhuang’s spiritual bones: Can you contact Pang? In the southern mines.

Prince Zhuang said, “I can think of a way to contact him, but I can’t speak of the Impassable Sea to outsiders.”

Having calmed down, Xi Ping’s mind began to work once more. He wasn’t surprised by this—his san-ge wasn’t some kind of silently enduring punching bag. If he hadn’t said a single word in all these years, it had to be because he couldn’t say anything, whether directly or by suggestion.

Moreover, neither he nor Prince Zhuang knew Pang Jian well enough to have a perfect tacit understanding. How could they get the word out...?

Xi Ping wrote: Try asking him to send a “Heavenly Question” telling my shifu not to withdraw the sword energy.

Prince Zhuang: “...”

Fine. Now he knew why whirlpools had arisen in the Resurrection Vortex during its calm period.

Bai Ling saw an expression of disbelief momentarily appear on the prince’s face.

Prince Zhuang sighed and muttered, “It seems he isn’t the wrath of heaven sent to punish me, he’s the wrath of heaven sent to punish the whole Zhou family... When Zhou Kun spared the Xi family, did he forget to check whether their horoscopes accorded with his?”

Saying so, he took out a piece of paper and successfully wrote down Xi Ping’s words at once. But no matter what, the words “do not withdraw the sword energy” wouldn’t remain on the page.

“Won’t work,” Prince Zhuang said. “The demon seal can’t be tricked by your clever little games. Think of something else.”

Xi Ping cursed inwardly. Before he could consider it closely, he heard the heart demon say, sighing, “As I thought—he is returning.”

“Who?” said Xi Ping.

The heart demon waved his sleeve and scooped Xi Ping up. “A-Ying can’t speak of this secret. I’ll take you to see.”

Unexpectedly lifted by him, Xi Ping was swept by that long sleeve up into the canopy of the ancient trees. His field of vision instantly widened. From high up, Xi Ping saw a small mountain made of heaped up spiritual stones. The spiritual stones, not carefully handled, still had rock snow on them. The surging spiritual energy mixed with the murderous energy exhaled by the Impassable Sea’s demon host; it was like the smell of agarwood mixing with body odor, making it so that you didn’t know whether to inhale or not.

Just then, a demon lying on the cliff met his eyes and turned its head to shout at him. But the next moment, Xi Ping watched as the demon, as if held down by an invisible hand, was pressed tightly against the cliff, struggled a few times, and then...vanished into thin air!

Xi Ping’s eyes opened wide.

Where did it go?

The heart demon said quietly into his ear, “Look into the valley.”

Xi Ping followed his gaze, looking toward the valley. Countless demons that had lost their offering were turning impatiently around the altar, greedily sniffing and licking the already dead spiritual bones, gathering into a heap. But sometimes, a demon would get halfway through squabbling with another demon, then disappear for no reason, leaving behind only its bewildered opponent...as well as Xi Ping, who thought his eyes were deceiving him.

“The ones who disappear have been swallowed by him.” The heart demon sighed. “You cannot see him, but he is omnipresent. The whole Impassable Sea is merely nourishment to meet his unlimited demand—this is what Great Wan’s Zhou family has spent nearly eight centuries rearing...the head of the demon host that was once scattered by their ancestor. Little master, are you ready to hear the story of all the bones of the dead that lie beneath your Lingyang River?”

Prince Zhuang couldn’t resist saying something to distract Xi Ping: “This miserable business—you can guess most of it without him needing to say anything...”

Xi Ping squeezed his wrist bone.

Prince Zhuang said, “A heart demon seed can shatter the Way of the Heart of an ascended spirit or shed skin master. I’m telling you not to listen to his lies!”

It doesn’t matter, Xi Ping thought. I don’t have a Way of the Heart.

In response to his mood, the reincarnation wood forest made an anxious rustling. Xi Ping raised his head and said to the heart demon, “Go ahead.”

Meanwhile, Pang Jian was rapidly scanning all the records of mine collapses.

He was like a born hunting dog; he could sniff out the clues between the words at top speed—in the records of mine collapses, there was no need to look at the causes of the mishaps; they were all excuses. What he was chiefly concerned with was the mine supervisor who had been in charge of the affected area at the time. He quickly arranged two hundred years of mine collapses according to the person responsible.

He quickly caught a trace: the numbers of dead and wounded in the mine collapses had no connection to the scale of the collapse, but the connection to the person responsible for the affected area was great.

When Liang Chen and the other early mine supervisors who had opened their spiritual eyes due to the defense of Jinping had struck, no matter where or how big the collapse was, the casualties among the miners were very small. But when it came to Zhao Zhenwei and the others like him, while they had spent less time at the mines and handled fewer mine collapses, the casualty numbers were appalling.

No...

Pang Jian frowned. It wasn't that the casualty numbers later were high. Gold and iron mines also had mishaps, and given Pang Jian's understanding, the later casualty numbers were the normal ones; it was the ones from before that were wrong.

And among all the records, the records of the mine collapses Liang Chen had handled in particular were the strangest: there had only been one big mine collapse in the area he was responsible for—precisely the time that the whole Pang family had been buried in fragrant jade miasma.

And after that, while there had been cave-ins in the mine Liang Chen was responsible for, not one single person had died. This was because after that big mine collapse, the mine he was responsible for had a strict work and rest schedule; every time a cave-in occurred in a working area, the timing was after the miners had stopped working.

What compassionate spiritual stones.

Pang Jian read these records carefully and found that in the most extreme instance, a few miners who were after rock snow had prolonged their working period without authorization and had gotten spiritual stone ore dropped on them by a cave-in. They had actually ended up caught between the ore and survived completely intact.

If they had this kind of luck, why were they still working as miners? They ought to have gone to buy a Gold Tray Lottery ticket and set up house!

Pang Jian read these bizarre records several times, then shut them abruptly. Distant memories floated up from some corner—when he had been lifted, confused, out of the fragrant jade miasma, the cultivator who had stayed by his side, full of so much genuine emotion that it was hard to say which of the two of them had been bereaved...he thought that had been General Commander Liang...Supervisor Liang.

Pang Jian simply wanted to sneer. He smashed the record of mine collapses against the table with a thump—so this was how the thieves inside the house had quietly consoled themselves, causing mine collapses while protecting the miners...what, did they have consciences, too? When they went too far and brought about tragedies, could they also feel profound responsibility, be heartbroken from grief?

He suddenly remembered something else and went to flip through the records of all the cultivators in the mines who had opened their spiritual eyes as miners. He quickly sifted out those among them who had been vouched for by Liang Chen—there were quite a few, starting with Lü Chengyi; it was nearly forty percent in all.

And these people, Lü Chengyi included, who had been brought into the sect by the false Tai Sui Liang Chen, had all been sent to run errands like escorting the shipment convoys; not one of them had been responsible for mining.

Liang Chen had actually been protecting these juniors, not letting them stain their hands with the lives of the miners.

“For hundreds of years, only members of the Zhou family have been able to enter. There were members of the main bloodline, and members of collateral branches. All carried criminal brands on their spiritual images, making them keep the secret like the dead. They used special immortal tools to hide in the Shu encampment, stealthily arrive here, deliver the spiritual stones, and leave their allies a ‘toll fee.’” At the bottom of the Impassable Sea, the heart demon was closely watching Xi Ping’s blank expression. He twisted a loose strand of Xi Ping's hair and carefully rubbed the blood off of it.

This heart demon seemed to know that the young man's faith in the whole world had collapsed. He seemed unusually tender. "These people were very cautious of me. Before entering the Impassable Sea, they would use the secret technique of the demon subduers to seal off their minds and spirits, turning themselves into marionettes, only acting rigidly according to prearranged plans. Many people were unlucky and came just as the wind was rising in the Impassable Sea, and were broken here—how did the little paperman at A-Ying's side come here? A half-demon born because a succubus seized a human body. The poor child...he came into the world by prying apart his father's organs and belly. From the moment he was born, he was trapped in this lightless place. Honestly, he would rather run the risk of being dismembered by the demons than talk to me."

Xi Ping came back to himself and snatched back his hair, dodging the heart demon's paw, which was stroking his face.

The heart demon laughed, taking no notice. "Apart from you, the only other bearer of a different family name was the previous owner of those hidden bones you carry. He got in by mistake nine years ago, during the earthquake in the Impassable Sea, when A-Ying and the little paperman escaped and the ten point demon seal just happened to be unstable."

Xi Ping said, “Why didn’t you run away back then?”

The heart demon shrugged. “Ask that ingrate brother of yours.”

Prince Zhuang said, coldly, “The heart demon can control a person’s spiritual sense. If there’s the slightest crack, he can invade the spirit through the spiritual sense. He agreed back then to force the spiritual sense attached to my spiritual bones into a single finger bone, let Bai Ling break off that finger bone, and take it out of the Impassable Sea. If he had only wanted to take advantage of the demon seal loosening to escape the Impassable Sea, that would have been one thing, but his greed is bottomless. He attempted to invade my spirit. Otherwise, Bai Ling’s sneak attack wouldn’t have succeeded. Reap what you sow—whose fault is that?”

While the heart demon couldn’t hear him, he seemed to know what he was saying. “A-Ying, you correctly predicted that I couldn’t nimbly slip out of the crack in the demon seal like that little half-demon. You deliberately lured me into using your spirit to escape, then had that little devil launch a sneak attack against me... Look at your whole family—that wretched old however-many-times great-grandfather of yours took my heart demon seed for a plot to snatch another country’s spiritual mountains. When your father brought you here, he also took along a seed in passing—I don’t know who he wanted to use it to harm. And you, when you had nothing else to do, you used me to relieve your boredom and secretly learn about inscriptions. You enticed me into helping you, then turned around and stabbed me. It's no wonder the Zhou family is a family of demon subduers. You're filthier than the demons."

Prince Zhuang said, "There's not much to choose between the two of us."

Xi Ping put in a word: "And later, that old demon...Liang Chen, didn't he get out, too? Why didn't you take the opportunity to be a parasite on his spirit?"

The heart demon sighed. "Oh, him. Don't mention him. The quality of his bones was too poor. He was approaching the end of his lifespan without even completing his spiritual bones. I wanted to ask him to take me along, but I only said a few words to him, and his Way of the Heart shattered. Once the Way of the Heart shatters, the spirit also goes to ruin—who would have thought that a person who didn't even have spiritual bones would have a Way of the Heart? Anyway, you ought to blame A-Ying. If he hadn't wounded me to begin with, I wouldn't have been so agitated and slipped up like that."

Xi Ping froze. Liang Chen had had a Way of the Heart, which had shattered at the bottom of the Impassable Sea.

For some reason, he suddenly remembered the demented questions and laughter of that pitiable man who had taken the wrong road, on the point of death.

He had fought for the nation and the people, come back from the brink of death, unexpectedly opened his spiritual eyes, received the courtesy name “Mianzhi” that had floated down from the distant immortal mountains... What had his Way of the Heart been? When he had taken on the criminal brand, done those filthy things for the Zhou family, had he believed that he was making sacrifices for some great cause?

There was no way to know.

At any rate, the moment he had seen the heart demon, he had known the truth behind that war two hundred years ago, known that his lifetime of strife and sin had been only a joke in the palm of someone else’s hand.

And his inspiration no longer remembered him.

Xi Ping, his expression unwavering, said, “But when I saw Liang-shixiong later, he had already established a foundation.”

“Thank heaven and earth.” The heart demon seemed to be genuinely relieved on Liang Chen’s behalf. “It seems that the half-skeleton of hidden bones he took from this forest brought about a fortuitous occurrence. That's worthy of the relics of an ancient demonic god. Here I thought that person had been destroyed as a consequence. I've been conscience-stricken for a long time."

That person had in fact been destroyed as a consequence.

Xi Ping raised his head and looked at the sky of the Impassable Sea, letting out a long breath. The desire to kill rose in him... That war two hundred years ago had impacted more than one person.

He had used his shifu's sword energy to stir up the whirlpools in the Resurrection Vortex. With such a major incident befalling the convoy, shifu would likely come down from the mountain in person to see what was happening. Perhaps he was already above the Resurrection Vortex now.

Xi Ping calmly thought, I absolutely can't let this heart demon leave.

The heart demon likely never would have thought that an open-eyed ant hardly different from a mortal would dare at this moment to indulge in a wild fantasy, examining him with the gaze of a hunter. This wasn't even a snake wishing to swallow an elephant; this was an ant wishing to slaughter a dragon.

“He will be awake soon. Until he is restored, the demon seal won’t break, keeping us all trapped here. But as soon as he returns, we will be his nourishment. It’s so hard to be a demon with a mind. Luckily, heaven hasn’t abandoned me. It has brought you here. I’ll take you out, and you’ll help me escape—how about it?”

Xi Ping said, “I don’t know how to break the demon seal. You could count the number of open-eyed arrays I’ve managed to memorize on one hand. I don’t even know how I got in here. Sir, aren’t you overestimating me?”

“I don’t need you to break the seal.” The heart demon smiled very sweetly. The curve of his smile was Jiangli’s. “You’re a living person. I like living people best... I only need you to let me attach myself to your spirit for a moment.”

Xi Ping stared at his smile, thinking of something unknown. He slowly said, “I don’t think I can say no to that.”

Hardly had he said this than he heard the sound of rustling below him.

Xi Ping looked down and saw that at some point countless demonic figures had come to surround the base of the tree. Now they simultaneously raised their heads. On each and every one of the different grotesque faces was a smile identical to the heart demon’s.

Xi Ping nearly threw up. He closed his eyes at once. “If you insult the dead again, I’ll die right here and leave you without a ride.”

The heart demon said, smiling, “I don’t believe that. If you could stand to leave A-Ying’s bones behind, you wouldn’t have brazenly snatched food out of the mouths of the demon host.”

“Don’t even think about it. If your spirit is polluted by the heart demon, the best that can happen to you is becoming a walking corpse,” Prince Zhuang said to him quickly. “Listen to me, think of a way to bring that heart demon to the demon host. When he’s not expecting it, throw my spiritual bones at him. Even the heart demon can’t suppress instinct. The starving demon host will fight to the death over the spiritual bones. You can control the reincarnation wood trees, right? When the time comes, use the opportunity to escape. The shipment convoy has encountered an attack, Xuanyin Mountain will have to pay attention to it. Hold out for a while, I’ll think of a way...”

Xi Ping, eyes closed, finished listening to his ideas, then said to the heart demon, “That could work, too.”

Prince Zhuang: “...”

The heart demon looked at him, smiling brilliantly. “A-Ying has no objections?”

“Well,” said Xi Ping, putting “a general in the field needs no permission to meet an emergency” into practice, “he wants me to throw out his spiritual bones. Didn’t I say before that I don’t do what he says?”

Bai Ling saw his lord’s veins all stand out. He clutched his chest, so angry that he couldn’t even manage to cough.

CHAPTER 60 - The Mountain Falls (12)

Author's Note

Friendly hint that this chapter can be read along with the following one.

In the showdown between the three great liars, three people have four chat rooms open. I've looked back, and up to the present not one of them has told the truth.

Zhaoting skimmed over the chaotic surface of the sea and stopped in the air above the Resurrection Vortex. Looking down from high up, the whirlpools of all sizes looked like malevolent eyes. From time to time, cold, oppressive light stabbed through the “eyes.” This was the sword energy that had turned the water upside down.

Zhi Xiu's consciousness scanned the whole area of the Resurrection Vortex, noting the sunken ships and the corpses. His search took him to the shipment convoy, which had miserably withdrawn from the neighborhood of the whirlpools. Lü Chengyi's body, with the criminal brand standing out on it, had been drawn down to the bottom of the sea. The mutilated remains of Shu's spiritual beast and beast tamer, though dismembered, still had an aura—when an early established foundation cultivator passed away, their aura would linger for at least half a month.

The only thing he couldn't find here was Xi Ping.

As Zhi Xiu sent out a Heavenly Question to notify Pang Jian of the approximate situation of the East Sea at present, he frowned: for better or worse, that disciple of his was a half-immortal with spiritual bones. How could he have disappeared entirely?

Just then, his consciousness found a tiny living being in the vast ocean.

Wei Chengxiang was holding onto a piece of driftwood, narrowly maintaining her balance in a gap between the whirlpools. After opening her spiritual eyes, she had enough strength. As long as she stayed alert, she could dodge the sword energy in the whirlpools; it would be no problem for her to float here for half a month. For the moment, she wasn't in mortal danger; she was only very confused and didn't know where she could go.

Her mind and body alike were floating aimlessly amid the vast ocean waves, and the person she had thought would guide her had disappeared.

Suddenly, it was as if something had pricked the center of Wei Chengxiang's brow. She quickly raised her head and saw a man in an old-fashioned grey gown fly down on his sword and land in front of her like mist. The simple, unadorned sword was notched all over with old scars. The man on the sword had his back to the light, obscuring his features. As soon as he landed, even the bluster of the Resurrection Vortex was suppressed. The crashing and jostling sword energy gently brushed his swaying hems and obediently circled his old sword.

Wei Chengxiang's eyes widened slightly. This grey-clothed immortal was different from any cultivator she had seen before. Supposing that, as she had imagined in childhood, there truly were celestial beings in the world who could grant the wishes of mortals, they would presumably look like this.

But Wei Chengxiang didn't make a wish. She tightly clutched the driftwood, arched her back, and warily stared at the grey-clothed immortal.

She was no longer a mortal. She was an evil cultivator.

But the immortal didn't seem to notice anything wrong with her. He only very politely asked, "Miss, might I make inquiries with you about a certain person's whereabouts?"

"Who?"

“The person who has always spoken to you through the reincarnation wood. Where is he? Can you contact him?”

Wei Chengxiang was startled. She thought, How does he know? Who is he?

Involuntarily, she sank most of the way into the seawater, leaving herself exposed only from the nose up. She dryly said, “Tai Sui goes where he pleases.”

“He’s no Tai Sui,” the grey-clothed immortal said. He sighed. “You also can’t reach him, right? Fair enough. He wouldn’t have tossed you into the sea on your own if he could help it.”

Hearing this, Wei Chengxiang’s nose stung out of nowhere. All the hurt in her heart surged up. But then the grey-clothed immortal’s eyes fell on the left side of her face. Wei Chengxiang was startled and instinctively wanted to cover her face—from the corner of her eye to her lower jaw, the left side of her face had a scar like a tear stain. It was a scar left behind by spiritual eyes opening too urgently. If she hadn’t struggled day and night, not forgetting to keep a spiritual stone in her mouth even when she slept, nearly swallowing up the whole bag of blue jade the senior had given her, she would probably have taken even more damage.

“A half-immortal’s body is far more resilient than a mortal’s. As long as it isn’t fatal, an ordinary wound from a knife or sword will slowly heal—apart from an eye-opening wound. That will be with you for the rest of your life, unless you can smoothly establish a foundation in the future,” the grey-clothed immortal said slowly. Though he was standing on a sword, suspended in midair, he didn’t at all give you the impression that he was gazing down loftily. “Only that step is even harder than opening your spiritual eyes.”

Wei Chengxiang was already in enough trouble not to care about covering up. In a deep and gruff voice, she said, “That’s right, I’m an evil cultivator. Are you going to put me away?”

The grey-clothed immortal’s gaze was very gentle. There was even a trace of indescribable sadness in it. He asked, “Do you know what pilfering heaven’s order is?”

Wei Chengxiang didn’t understand anything. Fearless and ignorant, she shook her head.

“Then why would I put you away?” the grey-clothed immortal said.

“Though an autumn insect won’t survive the winter, when it lets out a wail, if there is an echo, one cry may have a hundred answers. But walking the vast immortal path, you will only have yourself. Child, when you grow up, will you regret it?”

Wei Chengxiang was fearless with youth. “Of course I won’t regret it. I’m going to kill all my enemies!”

The grey-clothed immortal seemed to smile. “All right. This meeting was fated. I will give you something.”

Before Wei Chengxiang could react, the immortal snapped his fingers and made a beam of light that entered the center of her brow. The girl leaned back, feeling a book appear in the center of her brow. When she closed her eyes, she could clearly see the writing in the book and turn the pages as she liked.

She opened it in amazement and saw that the book described how ranks of cultivation were distinguished, how to manipulate spiritual energy, what each of the three great systems of talismans, arrays, and inscriptions were, and so on... This was common knowledge that the sons of the wealthy learned at the same time they learned to talk, but Wei Chengxiang had never heard of it.

It was as if she had gained the most precious treasure. In spite of herself, she floated out of the water.

The grey-clothed immortal said, “Going deeper are the ancient classics of the immortal sects. You’ll have to go work those out for yourself. I’m limited by the sect rules and cannot give them to you.”

By a series of coincidences, Wei Chengxiang had ended up on the wrong path, but in essence she was a child from a good family. Seeing that this person had no ill intent, she became polite. “Thank you...thank you, Exalted. Do you also know the uncle in the reincarnation wood? Did you come to find him?”

Hearing the form of address she used, the grey-clothed immortal stared. Peculiar exasperation appeared on his face. He vaguely said, “That scound... I mean, I have some connection to him.”

Wei Chengxiang said, “Before, he was always there, but suddenly he stopped talking. I’m very worried.”

“When was this?”

“Right after the whirlpools in the sea started.”

The grey-clothed immortal considered it, then asked her, “Can you help me out?”

First Wei Chengxiang nodded. Then she said, “It has to be something I can do.”

“It’s nothing hard,” the grey-clothed immortal said. “You can call him directly through his spirit with the reincarnation wood. If he has only a sliver of clarity, he’ll be able to hear your voice. I’ll send you away from here, and you help me out by calling to him a few times, is that all right?”

Even if he hadn’t instructed her, Wei Chengxiang still would have done this. Naturally she wouldn’t turn him down. Then the immortal gently tapped the water. The water arched obediently like sandy soil, then froze, freezing out of nowhere into an ice boat. Wei Chengxiang had never seen magic like this. She was dumbfounded. Then, she floated up out of the water as lightly as a feather and landed on the ice boat.

“Go on.” The grey-clothed immortal waved a hand. The ice boat made of congealed seawater dashed straight through the Resurrection Vortex. The formerly scattered sword energy obediently pulled all the big and little whirlpools out of her way. The boat went faster and faster, carrying her toward the boundless land.

When Pang Jian received Zhi Xiu’s Heavenly Question, he didn’t at first have time to read it closely. He was chasing some Turmoilers in the southern mines.

In the name of Heaven's Design Pavilion, he had detained a whole crowd of suspicious individuals. While investigating the people he had arrested, he had found to his surprise that some Turmoilers were furtively watching.

The people in the southern mines were used to taking the Turmoilers for dimwitted, unfeeling animals and didn't pay much attention to them. Pang Jian didn't say anything. Unnoticed, he stuck some talismans onto the backs of the Turmoilers. He saw them gather and walk south together. After walking through a dazzling maze forest, the Turmoilers reached a little hidden village.

The Land of Turmoil had been split up among the four countries, but most places had no one to mind them. Even in Great Wan's encampment, which was the most flourishing, there was only the town that had taken shape around the southern mines and the canal docks, no more than a thousand mu, and the rest was still wasteland.

This little village had a temple brimful of the distinguishing characteristics of Southern He. At the temple gate, the other Turmoilers in the village surrounded the ones who had returned and started talking all at once in a jumble of Great Wan official language and Southern He's local dialect.

Pang Jian had grown up in the southern mines and was reasonably familiar with this hybridized Southern He dialect. From far off, he heard that these people were discussing the cultivators in the southern mines being arrested. From their speech, they seemed to be very reverent toward some of these cultivators. In spite of himself, Pang Jian was faintly surprised—these Turmoilers were dressed in rather clean and dignified clothing and had a permanent habitation in this village; they even seemed to have a division of labor among themselves... If not for their deformed features, they simply would have been no different from ordinary commoners.

One of the Turmoilers, who had the look of a village head, said, “For many years, we have been granted the caring attentions of those Exalted. From now on, I’m afraid we won’t have it easy. Alas, what has the world come to? Why does it always go after the good people?”

Another Turmoiler said, “What must we do now?”

The head Turmoiler was silent for a long time. “All we can do is pray for divine aid.”

Pang Jian thought, Pray to whom? He thought that before Southern He was wiped out, they had worshipped Lancang’s Sword Sage... Was this village’s temple a Sword Sage Temple?

But then, he heard the Turmoilers' quiet, garbled prayers for protection; it turned out that these villagers worshipped "Grand Duke Tai Sui"!

Pang Jian stared: since becoming "Tai Sui," Liang Chen had secretly housed Turmoilers and even instructed his subordinates to take care of them?

Before he could finish marveling at Liang Chen's kindness, he saw a rather familiar figure stroll out onto the little village street. When he got a clear look at the newcomer, a layer of gooseflesh abruptly came up on Pang Jian's back—this was Lü Chengyi!

Wait, hadn't he just read...

Pang Jian quickly took out the Heavenly Question to verify: General Zhi had confirmed that Lü Chengyi had died in the Resurrection Vortex. General Zhi couldn't have seen wrong, so who was this?

Above the Resurrection Vortex, having sent Wei Chengxiang away, Zhi Xiu looked down at the shambles his rebellious disciple had left behind—it was his sword energy that had stirred up the whirlpools in the Resurrection Vortex during its calm period. If he only withdrew the sword energy, the Resurrection Vortex would soon calm down and the shipment convoy could leave.

But for some reason, his spiritual sense was faintly holding him back from withdrawing the sword energy; and he still couldn't divine anything.

As he was hesitating, a Heavenly Question came from Pang Jian; it turned out to be quite a long letter.

Zhi Xiu read through it quickly. His eyelids began to twitch.

In Pang Jian's letter, he said that he had discovered a special kind of puppet in the southern mines. Its aura, speech, and appearance were absolutely identical to a real person's. If he hadn't caught and soul-searched them, even Heaven's Design Pavilion's Assistant Commander wouldn't have been able to tell that they weren't human. But these puppets, apart from being particularly realistic, didn't have any other use. It seemed that they were only there to stand in at the mines for their masters when those masters were away. Lü Chengyi had such a stand-in, and so did many other cultivators involved with Liang Chen. They were hidden in a village inhabited by Turmoilers.

Pang Jian had dismantled one of the stand-in puppets, found its core array, and searched all over the southern mines for similar objects...which had brought him to digging up graves: in the two hundred years since the southern mines had been established, quite a few of the mine cultivators had either died naturally when their lifespans had come to an end or had died in the line of duty from injury or illness. The miners had set up a small place for these seniors to sleep peacefully, called the Thousand Autumns Forest. The Thousand Autumns Forest contained the remnants of countless arrays. Pang Jian went straight into the earth to investigate and found that among the corpses buried here, nearly half were stand-in puppets!

In other words, in two hundred years, nearly half of the cultivators in the southern mines hadn't died; they had disappeared, leaving their stand-in puppets to act in their place in the mines for a time, then find a suitable opportunity to die a natural death.

A majority of the missing cultivators were surnamed Zhou—imperial kinsmen.

Zhi Xiu rapidly glanced over the names of the Zhou family imperial kinsmen that Pang Jian had picked out. He still couldn't divine anything about them. And when he tried to touch these people's fates, the Resurrection Vortex at his feet abruptly began to surge.

The Zhou clan...

There was only one place in the world that the Sea of Stars couldn't look into, and that place was closely connected to the Zhou family.

The Impassable Sea in ancient legend, sealed in some unknown place.

Beneath the surging whirlpools, the bloody aura exhaled by the demons was sickening. Xi Ping's face paled. The fierce pain that the elixirs had suppressed earlier seemed to be making a comeback. He grabbed a handful of wound healing and mind calming pills and said to the heart demon, "If you're sincere, first make them keep away. I'm going to throw up."

The heart demon waved a hand, and the members of the demon host under the trees obediently withdrew from the reincarnation wood forest. They only kept their gloomy eyes wide open, covetously watching the flesh and blood body.

Xi Ping continued selling out his teammate: "My san-ge says that if my spirit is polluted by you, the best outcome for me will be turning into a walking corpse. I can't accept that."

The heart demon said, smiling, "He's much too guarded. He'll miss out on many friends. I only want to borrow your body to leave this awful place, escape the demon seal. There's a whole world out there, five nations and thousands upon millions of people, no telling how many of them confused by the seven emotions, buried in the six desires—which one among them isn't more enticing than a young man like you whose reason hasn't even fully developed? Why would I leave all the delicacies in the world untasted to drink a bowl of flavorless gruel like you?”

Xi Ping’s eyes moved. “Even if you don’t down me in one gulp, I won’t be able to withstand a single lick, either.”

At the same time, he quietly wrote in the mustard seed: San-ge, how did you get out of here last time? Point the way.

Prince Zhuang’s words nearly caught in his throat: “Don’t ask me, I can’t shoulder the responsibility. As a mere mortal, I didn’t dare to let the heart demon take a single step onto my spirit. I can’t match the boldness of a talented immortal.”

From familiarity, Xi Ping handled him far more ably than he handled the heart demon: So you don’t care about me anymore?

Prince Zhuang: “...”

Oh, is that the game we’re playing? Fine.

Through the spiritual bones in the mustard seed, Xi Ping heard the person speaking in his spirit stay silent for a while. Then his voice suddenly became weak. “My spiritual bones were stripped from me before I was even born.

After all these years, I'm used to it. Even if you really do bring those spiritual bones out, I won't be able to bear them. What would I want them for? If I let you die here today, how am I supposed to face my uncle and grandmother?"

Xi Ping hadn't expected that this person who had always been reserved and self-possessed would suddenly dig out his heart. He froze, then argued: I used shifu's sword energy to set off the whirlpools in the Resurrection Vortex. My shifu must have found it by now. As long as...

Prince Zhuang interrupted him: "Can you be certain that General Zhi will come in person?"

"I..."

"You can't. And even if the master of Flying Jade Peak comes in person, he still won't find the Impassable Sea. For thousands of years, only members of the Zhou family have known where the entrance to the Impassable Sea is. I was able to escape back then because my true body was still in the mortal world, and the heart demon could only keep a grip on my spiritual sense. As long as I kept my spirit clear and didn't get distracted, he would have nowhere to strike. To disturb my intellect, while I was leaving the Impassable Sea, he suddenly launched an attack and tried to use illusions to trap me... I got out because there was someone who kept watch beside my feverish body all night, who played the qin the whole night through, who brought me out. This...I've never spoken of this to anyone else.”

Xi Ping's breath caught.

“Xiaobao,”⁴⁶ Prince Zhuang called his long-unused pet name, “do you know how I feel right now? Can't you...can't you have some pity on your san-ge? What would I want those rotten bones for, to make up an intact corpse to bury?!”

A little brother's shamelessness could pierce a person's weak spot, but a strong person showing weakness gouged out the heart.

Their internal strife was silent, but it drew blood.

The heart demon watched Xi Ping with great interest. Seeing him bite into a mind calming pill with a crack, he asked, smiling brightly, “So what do you want?”

Prince Zhuang said, “Leave my spiritual bones behind. Come back in one piece. Leave me a way to survive, can't you?”

For a time, it was as if Xi Ping was being compelled by two heart demons, one internal and one external; he was trapped.

Only after having stabbed right through him did Prince Zhuang slightly moderate his tone. He instructed, “Think of a way to get him to take you to the inscription exit. The heart demon is full of suspicion. You have to make him think that you’re taking every possible precaution against him. There can only be sincere cooperation if there are precautions.”

Xi Ping tossed one pain relieving pill into his mouth after another. His lips went numb.

After a moment, he seemed to finally come to a decision. He said to the heart demon, “First you have to take me safely to the exit inscription, Senior Heart Demon. You’re very powerful. You can control the demon host, kill seventy or eighty of me in the blink of an eye. You don’t have to worry about me escaping right under your nose, right?”

The heart demon nodded, smiling brightly, and said, “That’s reasonable. What else?”

Xi Ping, in accordance with what Prince Zhuang had told him, continued: “Back then, Bai-da-ge used a demon subduing talisman to defeat you. I want to place a demon subduing talisman on my spirit. He was a half-demon, and part of the Zhou bloodline. This place couldn’t restrict him much. I’m different. I can only use talismans once I leave, so you don’t need to worry that I'll launch a sneak attack. I'm only agreeing to take you out of the Impassable Sea. If you refuse to clear out once we're out of the Impassable Sea, then it'll be time for the demon subduing talisman."

The heart demon's eyes narrowed in a smile. "That thing is truly fresh in my memory. That brother of yours is so wicked."

Xi Ping said, "Do you agree?"

The heart demon put on an act of being backed into a difficult position, thinking it over for a long time. Then he said, "Well, since you're so charming."

Prince Zhuang said, "Anything can go wrong. Don't delay, go now—right, you're injured, aren't you? Bear up with some hardship, spill some blood from your wound. That way, even with the heart demon there, the other demons will still follow in secret. When the time comes, you'll attach a demon subduing talisman to my spiritual bones. When you toss out the spiritual bones, you'll be able to activate the demon subduing talisman using the spiritual energy in my bones. The effect will be limited. It can only hold him off for a moment."

Xi Ping didn't answer.

“Hurry,” Prince Zhuang urged, “I’ll teach you how to draw a demon subduing talisman.”

In a final struggle, Xi Ping said, My shifu really will be outside.

Prince Zhuang said, “How else do you want me to beg you?”

The heart demon suddenly drew close. He took hold of Xi Ping’s chin. “Haven’t I agreed already? Why do you still seem so heartbroken?”

Prince Zhuang said, “Shiyong!”

“There’s one more thing.” Xi Ping’s eyes reddened. He babbled, “After I get out of here, I have to report this place to the immortal sect, announce it to the whole world. My san-ge and Liang-shixiong...”

“Oh, hey, shh... It’s all right, it’s all right, don’t get excited. Settle down.” The heart demon gently patted him on the back. A cheerful light shone in his smiling eyes. Just as the other demons couldn’t resist the allure of blood, the heart demon couldn’t resist the hatred and hopelessness of humans when they abandoned themselves to despair. He greedily inhaled those feelings from Xi Ping and quietly said, “You have a long life ahead. In the future, you’ll have plenty of opportunities to see filthier things than this. If you only take me out of here, this awful place—I want nothing more than to see it destroyed. I'll help you.”

CHAPTER 61 - The Mountain Falls (13)

“I’m not human. As soon as I leave the demon seal, I’ll no longer be affected by this place’s prohibition.” Radiance burst from the heart demon’s eyes, as if he was yearning for something outside the Impassable Sea. That face, every angle of which was familiar to Xi Ping, began to look a little inhuman in its greed. “Don’t worry. As soon as I get out, I’ll make sure everyone in the world knows.”

Xi Ping frowned, and the heart demon immediately changed his face once more, like turning the page of a book. He lowered his eyelids, and his rapacious gaze vanished. He once again seemed human. The heart demon waved his long sleeve and took Xi Ping lightly down from the treetop.

The demons that didn’t dare to get too close followed after, unsatisfied, grumbling and swearing in horrifying fashion, cursing the heart demon to a bad end for not sharing his meal.

Perhaps the demons’ curses came from affection and thoughtfulness; before they landed, the heart demon suddenly seemed to sense something. He came to an abrupt halt and pushed Xi Ping aside, then grabbed a demon that was tailing him. Before that captured scapegoat demon could express its views, it was frozen by something. It struggled twice as if in its death throes, then silently disappeared right before Xi Ping’s eyes.

Xi Ping, tossed aside by the heart demon, went weak at the knees. If not for the heart demon pulling him up, he would have fallen—he had felt himself brush shoulders with the Impassable Sea’s great demon with the unspeakable name.

Unprecedented terror nearly crushed his guts. This terror came out of nowhere, so there was no way to overcome it with reason. Xi Ping’s back was instantly soaked in sweat... What had the Zhou family raised?

Did they really believe that they could control this thing? Did they really believe it could give them justice?

“That was close,” said the heart demon that looked equal parts male and female, beaming and smacking himself on the chest. “We were nearly caught by him.”

Xi Ping looked at him in incomprehension. “Trapped in this kind of place all the time, how can you always be so joyful? How can you still laugh?”

The heart demon said, smiling, “How could I be qualified to be a demon if I wasn’t joyful? Those who experience both joy and sorrow are ordinary, and those who sigh endlessly are gods and buddhas. We demons are born with nothing. Each day we survive is another day of happiness. Watching you humans go through all the stages of life, experience your sadness, happiness, and anger, is like watching colored glass scatter rainbow light. Why shouldn't I be joyful?"

"You aren't afraid of death?"

"As long as humans don't become extinct, demons will live forever." The heart demon breathed a laugh. "At worst I'll become a demon seed and lay silent for some hundreds or thousands of years. There will always be someone presumptuous enough to come along and stir me up. Do you think that this demon host in the Impassable Sea is made of the remnants of ancient days, or the hatred of the Zhou family given form?"

As he spoke, he landed in the depths of the reincarnation wood forest, holding Xi Ping under his arm. A reeking wind blew past. An inscription one chi square appeared on the ground.

"Tell your brother to have a look and see whether this is the right inscription." The heart demon turned and licked his lips. He said to Xi Ping, "I won't lie to you. After all, I'm not like other demons. I can't bear to see people being miserable..."

Xi Ping was about to reach into the mustard seed when he heard the heart demon lower his voice: "...or A-Ying suffering. Though he has wronged me, after all, I did watch him grow up.”

Xi Ping’s hand paused. Hiding it from Prince Zhuang, he quickly asked the heart demon, “Suffering how? What do you mean?”

“The Impassable Sea’s great demon will soon be restored. That will bring disaster and turmoil upon all creation. Not one of the members of the Zhou family who have sustained this demon will be able to escape this sin. The owners of the other spiritual bones died long ago, their souls departed. Isn’t he the only one left? If he’s lucky, perhaps he can go before the great demon is restored, suffer a little less...”

Xi Ping bristled. “What nonsense are you talking!”

“I’m not talking nonsense. Of the skeletons on the altar, the youngest are no more than seven or eight years old, and those who were fortunate enough to reach adulthood are still hardly older than twenty. After losing their spiritual bones, a person can’t live long... You must have felt that, too, or else you wouldn’t have been seized with an impulse and snatched his spiritual bones in this place where you can’t even fly your sword. Him, well, I figure that he has maybe a year or two left.” The heart demon sighed and stuck up one finger. “Shh—don’t tell him I was the one who said so. If he knew that I had told you the truth, he would certainly hate me to no end.”

Xi Ping grasped Prince Zhuang's wrist bone in the mustard seed. Before he could speak, Prince Zhuang said, "The heart demon takes pleasure in toying with human hearts. No matter what he says to you, you can't believe a word of it."

The heart demon stood in front of Xi Ping, tapped the mustard seed hanging around Xi Ping's neck, and silently shook his head, mouthing, Lies.

Xi Ping: "..."

Prince Zhuang said, angrily, "In a bottomless den of demons, are you going to trust a heart demon, or trust me?"

The heart demon couldn't hear the private conversation between the two of them, anyway; he only put his hands behind his back and shook his head, sighing, as if regretting something.

These two between them had nearly driven Xi Ping mad. They were both taking advantage of the fact that he was new to cultivation—he lacked common knowledge and was easy to trick!

Prince Zhuang got right to the point: "Do what I told you. I have no close friends or relatives in the mortal world. I don't have a shred of care apart from debts. If you dare to let him touch your spirit, I'll end myself on the spot at once.”

Xi Ping said involuntarily, “San-ge, don't...”

The heart demon's fascinated gaze came his way. Xi Ping immediately shut his mouth.

As if he had been pushed into a corner and had no way out, he took out Prince Zhuang's finger bone, shaking. As soon as the finger bone left the mustard seed, a blanketing inscription flashed on the ground. The demons nearby immediately became restless. One was bewildered and actually took no heed of the heart demon's presence, brazenly throwing itself forward.

Without so much as taking a look, the heart demon casually snapped his fingers, and the demon's head was instantly separated from its body. Then it disappeared, “swallowed” by the Impassable Sea.

“It must be here,” the heart demon said. “You can draw your talisman.”

Xi Ping took a whole bottle of mind-clearing pills from his mustard seed and miserably swallowed half of it. He felt that these things weren't even as bracing as strong tea. He inspected his own spirit inside and out to confirm that the heart demon hadn't stealthily tampered with him. Then he steadied himself and concentrated, using his consciousness to draw a demon subduing talisman on his spirit—this was his first time drawing an unfamiliar talisman on something other than talisman paper. Presumably because, when forced by circumstances, a person's latent potential is limitless, Xi Ping, an amateur who messed up half the time when drawing a contamination-avoiding talisman, actually succeeded on his first try.

The demon subduing talisman that he had no way to activate settled on his spirit with a rumble, solemn and sinister, then turned invisible.

Prince Zhuang gave him no breathing space: “Now that you've learned to do it, draw a demon subduing talisman on my spiritual bones with blood from your fingertip.”

Xi Ping's hands were shaking.

The heart demon calmly asked him, “Better now?”

Prince Zhuang said, “Hurry, don't make me urge you a third time.”

Xi Ping clenched his teeth, pricked his finger, and drew the talisman on Prince Zhuang's spiritual bones—regardless of everything else, he first had to stabilize san-ge.

He thought: I have to get these spiritual bones out of here.

In that moment, this insufficiently shrewd young man showed all his thoughts on his face; meanwhile, perhaps because he had let his mind wander, his stroke went wild midway through the talisman.

Prince Zhuang's spiritual sense felt it at once. "You got it wrong. Draw it again!"

Under the heavy pressure, Xi Ping at last collapsed. He drew back his bleeding finger, held his head, and knelt beside the hopeless inscription.

The heart demon keeping watch over him was like a faithful and reliable comrade-in-arms, protecting him perfectly in the ring of the demon host. He said kindly and understandingly, "The demon subduing talisman is a Zhou family secret that has never been passed down. You aren't part of the Zhou bloodline. It's too much to expect for you to succeed on your first try. Try a few more times. I'll wait for you."

Xi Ping ignored him, eating the rest of the elixirs.

The overdose of elixirs narrowly steadied his mind. Xi Ping opened bloodshot eyes, and a thought suddenly appeared in his mind: wait, would his san-ge, who could pry open a nest of demons centuries old with a single crack, really kill himself?

Even if he really did correctly draw the demon subduing talisman on the spiritual bones, wasn't the decision to toss the bones out a matter of an instantaneous decision? San-ge was far away on the mainland. He couldn't do anything to control him. Even when he couldn't walk, Xi Ping would openly comply but secretly disobey—was it possible for san-ge not to know what he was like?

Xi Ping broke away from the spiritual bones, went behind Prince Zhuang's back, and quickly asked the heart demon. "He wants me to draw a demon subduing talisman on his spiritual bones. Will the demon subduing talisman harm them?"

First, the heart demon froze. Then he began to laugh in disbelief.

Xi Ping said urgently, "What are you laughing at?"

The heart demon clapped and said, "I'm laughing because Zhou Ying was born in a lightless world, grew up in the Impassable Sea, has been at odds with his parents and his siblings, is fickle and immoral, with less common human feeling than even we true demons possess—he would be unimaginably happy as a star of calamity bringing turmoil upon the world. But, of all things, he has you... You pull him back to the human world.”

Not only was there no happiness in being human, you were also doomed to die.

The heart demon narrowed his eyes craftily. Then his expression became solemn. He said, “Did he also tell you that the spiritual energy in his spiritual bones could activate the demon subduing talisman, but that the effect would be limited, and it could only shield you for a moment?”

There was no need for Xi Ping to speak. It was all written on his face.

The heart demon said, “The spiritual energy on his spiritual bones can indeed activate the demon subduing talisman. But over the years, he has been placed on the altar consecrated to the demon host. Spiritual stones and spiritual energy can only become nourishment for the demon host by passing through his spiritual bones. What do you think will happen when the ‘spiritual energy’ that has nourished demons touches the demon subduing talisman? If you successfully draw a demon subduing talisman on them, his spiritual bones will simply explode your mustard seed and detonate the demon host.”

Xi Ping's eyes popped: he'd known it! San-ge had been tricking him the whole time!

He didn't listen to any more of Prince Zhuang's lies. He abruptly stood up and planted the finger bone right onto the exit inscription. The long-expectant heart demon turned into misty smoke and seeped into the center of Xi Ping's brow, entering his spirit.

"A-Ying, this little brother of yours isn't easy to trick." Landing in Xi Ping's spirit, the heart demon laughed heartily and immediately broke his promise. With a wave of his sleeve, he was ready to wipe away the demon subduing talisman on that spirit. "I've won! You..."

But he couldn't finish speaking. The moment the heart demon touched Xi Ping's spirit, the invisible talisman suddenly revealed itself. The heart demon saw the talisman clearly, and his laughter abruptly cut off.

This was no demon subduing talisman!

Xi Ping had no idea what a demon subduing talisman looked like. The talisman that Prince Zhuang had taught him to draw on his spirit was a primer for activating an array, tied to the demon seal. When the heart demon reached out to wipe it away, it was as if he had brazenly slapped the demon seal that he had been racking his brain to escape for thousands of years!

Zhou Ying!

In the Impassable Sea, the ten point demon seal immediately noticed that a demon was attempting to escape. It instantly connected with the primer on Xi Ping's spirit.

Like a handful of dust, the heart demon was swept away by the demon seal without making a sound.

Xi Ping felt his mind buzz. A brutal aura charged through his spirit, passing right through him, but it didn't hurt him one bit. For a moment he couldn't work out what had happened. Meanwhile, now that the suppression of the heart demon was gone, the fearless demons around him immediately threw themselves toward him.

“San...san-ge?”

“Hurry!” This time Prince Zhuang's aggravated fury wasn't a pretense. “I knew that if you could obey orders, your name wouldn't be Xi. Just you wait, Xi Shiyong. When you get out of there, I'm going to beat you up!”

Xi Ping's bloodshot eyes were lit up by the exit inscription. He jumped down. "Even if you beat me to death, I still won't regret it!"

"Really?" Just then, a quiet and gentle voice sounded while Xi Ping was completely unguarded. The heart demon that had clearly been swept away by the demon seal reappeared in his spirit. "Xiaobao, if I were you, I wouldn't have spoken so soon."

Xi Ping's pupils abruptly contracted—how could the heart demon know his pet name?!

Could it be that he had been able to "hear" everything just now...?

"A-Ying, you left your spiritual bones here with me for nine years." The heart demon reached out a hand and picked up a withered seed—what the demon seal had scattered just now had only been a heart demon seed.

"Because I missed you so much, I couldn't resist leaving a tiny bit of my consciousness on your spiritual bones. Such profound brotherly love. Truly touching."

Now, Xi Ping's spirit was completely undefended. When the heart demon easily walked in, Xi Ping became a puppet in the heart demon's hands.

The heart demon laughed heartily. With Xi Ping's hands, he grabbed Prince Zhuang's bones inside the mustard seed. "A-Ying, you've disdained these spiritual bones of yours for a long time, haven't you? Since you're so eager to destroy the good and bad together, why don't I help you..."

The Impassable Sea opened wide. The salty smell of the sea poured in.

The heart demon laughed wildly. He could already smell the aura of an ascended spirit.

He had "heard" Xi Ping and Prince Zhuang's private dialogue perfectly—right now, outside the Impassable Sea, there was a completely clueless ascended spirit cultivator, the master of the Sword that Mended the Heavens from two centuries ago.

These brats in their teens and early twenties were no more than appetizers. Life and death seemed like important matters to them. Their flavor lacked depth.

The Way of the Heart of an ascended spirit cultivator, refined for hundreds of years—now that was a delicacy for a heart demon...

But right at the moment that the heart demon was about to use Xi Ping's hands to smash Prince Zhuang's spiritual bones, he went stiff.

He was stuck at the exit to the Impassable Sea. He opened his eyes wide and slowly lowered his head, like a rusted machine. He looked at Xi Ping's hand—Xi Ping's flesh was cracking bit by bit. A rumble began to sound in his ears, and his spirit began to quake.

“What...did...”

You just do?

The spirit was the foundation of the consciousness. Since he had infected Xi Ping's spirit, Xi Ping had stopped talking. Therefore, he didn't answer—inside his mustard seed, the bottle containing the established foundation pill that had been put there like a lucky charm was empty, its contents mixed in with the large quantity of mind-clearing pills. It had passed straight through his meridians and spiritual bones!

Xi Ping already had spiritual bones. Through hundreds of years of accumulation by the Zhou family, the bottom of the Impassable Sea had spiritual energy as plentiful as Flying Jade Peak. The conditions were perfect for establishing a foundation. If he only took an established foundation pill, he would immediately establish a foundation by force.

A vast spiritual wind rose throughout the whole valley of the Impassable Sea and poured into Xi Ping's spiritual bones and spirit.

But he had no Way of the Heart. It was the Way of the Heart that was the key to an established foundation!

How could anyone on earth be so arrogant as to dare to establish a foundation without a Way of the Heart!

Without a sufficiently firm Way of the Heart to stand guard, even if your spiritual bones were as complete as could be and all else was ready, your spirit would still shatter the moment you established a foundation by force. Was he done with living? Didn't he want Zhou Ying's spiritual bones anymore?

But the heart demon that had thought he had won a complete victory would never know the answers to these questions. The spiritual wind that rose when a half-immortal established a foundation was enough to change the weather; it completely blocked the heart demon's line of retreat. When the spirit that had no Way of the Heart went to pieces, the heart demon that had stepped onto that spirit was annihilated without a sound.

Far away in Guzhou, Prince Zhuang's expression changed abruptly. He lost his footing—

Prince Zhuang had known from the start that his and Xi Ping's "private" conversation could be overheard by the heart demon: he had cut off his connection to his spiritual bones nine years ago; if the heart demon hadn't tampered with them, it wouldn't have been worthy of being called a heart demon.

Hearing Xi Ping repeatedly say "Shifu is outside the Impassable Sea," he had known what audacious notion Xi Ping was getting at.

The more powerful a master, the more dangerous it would be for him to encounter the heart demon. Suppose that General Zhi, a person who so rarely descended to the mortal world, really had come in person to look for Xi Ping in the mess of the East Sea on account of a beam of sword energy; then, given Xi Ping's temperament, he would rather break himself at the bottom of the Impassable Sea rather than drag his shifu down.

Prince Zhuang had only played along with that brat because he had thought that he had some magic weapon for controlling demons; but instead, he had taken an established foundation pill right in front of them without either of them knowing!

What kind of lousy idea was this!?

CHAPTER 62 - The Mountain Falls (14)

The heart demon was one of the most ancient demons in this world. It had once spread among cultivators like a plague.

With just one sentence to make a person waver, just one crack, the heart demon could silently invade anyone's spirit and Way of the Heart. Whether an ascended spirit who could fly through the sky or burrow into the earth or a shed skin cultivator, they might from then on enter an endless loop of wrestling with themselves again and again, be lost forever.

This was why, though Xi Ping had guessed that Zhi Xiu had likely reached the Impassable Sea, he was unwilling to bring this demon out to let his shifu deal with the problem—General Zhi had been taught by the Dignitary of Fate High Elder; in all these years, given how smart he was, he might have guessed at the darkness behind the Wan-He War back then. In two centuries, he hadn't taken a single step into the Land of Turmoil. The fact that he had only sent his unreliable disciple to investigate the southern mines went to show that he was still tied up about this. He was simply a perfect target for a heart demon.

Xi Ping simply didn't know his own limits. No natural force could stop him. He thought every day of rising to heaven. This time, he had for once made an accurate assessment of his opponent, so Prince Zhuang had thought that he could finally be relied upon, just this once.

The spiritual bones far away in the Impassable Sea once again lost contact with their owner. From somewhere came the sound of a hand cannon firing. Prince Zhuang looked out the window, his unique eyes seeing murderous energy rising from the black clouds.

Early that morning, it was the sound of the yamen's bailiffs opening fire on workers carrying coffins that tore through the dawn. The shrill wails put one in mind of the starving demons at the bottom of the Impassable Sea. Prince Zhuang swayed. It was as if something were blocking his throat, choking him so that he coughed incessantly. Under Bai Ling's panicked gaze, bloody saliva seeped out from between his fingers.

The spirit—the heart of the spiritual sense, the source of consciousness, said to be the location of the human soul.

Apart from oneself, only heaven, earth, gods, and demons could reach it; it was the end point of a lunatic attempting to snatch a body—and Xi Ping had used it as a grave offering for the great heart demon.

But before his consciousness could disperse, Xi Ping immediately knew that he had placed his bet right.

As soon as he'd heard from the heart demon's mouth that Liang Chen's Way of the Heart had been broken, he'd gotten this idea—since the heart demon had been unable to possess Liang Chen, it showed that after his Way of the Heart had broken, that senior's spirit had been so destroyed that there was nowhere to set foot. Xi Ping assessed himself; he believed that his circumstances were a little better than Liang Chen's had been back then.

If even Liang Chen could leave the Impassable Sea alive, then was it possible that he wouldn't be able to?

Ridiculous. Such a thought had never crossed Young Master Xi's mind... All that remained was how to distract the heart demon and take him by surprise.

After his consciousness lost its shelter, most of it dispersed in the reincarnation wood forest.

This was just what he had anticipated.

When he had first landed here, Xi Ping had tried to call to A-Xiang. He hadn't reached her, because his connection to A-Xiang had been blocked by the Impassable Sea, but he had clearly felt at the time that his voice had gone through the reincarnation wood forest around him—in other words, these reincarnation wood trees had some connection to his spirit.

Now that his consciousness had completely integrated with the trees, Xi Ping had a strange sensation, as if these trees were his hands, feet, and torso. With a thought, the reincarnation wood trees shook their limbs in a rhythm contrary to the spiritual wind, sending the demons approaching his physical body flying away.

But the strange thing was, the exit to the Impassable Sea had evidently been opened by san-ge's finger bone, but his body was still stuck in the middle of the inscription, going neither in nor out.

“I got in pretty smoothly. How could I get stuck going out? I only ate an established foundation pill—I can't have gotten fat just from that, right?” As Xi Ping pondered in confusion, he controlled the reincarnation wood trees, using their vines to push his body out of the Impassable Sea.

Just then, an enormous attractive force in the depth of the forest drew in his consciousness.

Xi Ping had the feeling that a sucker was attached to the back of his head. His consciousness, roaming through the reincarnation wood trees, was abruptly pulled into the earth. In the blink of an eye, he passed through the vast root network, feeling his mind being squeezed by the increasingly narrow root tips. At last, he ended up at the terminus of the roots of the reincarnation wood trees...

And encountered half of a skeleton.

Seeing the skeleton buried under the reincarnation wood forest, Xi Ping was startled. It looked as if the skeleton had been cut in half by a sharp weapon. There were fractures from the cut left behind on the bones. The former owner of the bones had been dead for ages, yet the spiritual energy on the bones hadn't dispersed. One of the skeleton's hands was turned palm upward, supporting the roots of countless reincarnation wood trees... He seemed to be the origin of this reincarnation wood forest.

Xi Ping didn't have time to think closely. The moment his consciousness met that skeleton, it was sucked in by the bones. There was a huge sound in his ears. In a daze, countless fractured images appeared before his eyes—collapsing mountain ranges, raging floods, tidal waves and huge whirlpools, rocs and dragons, gods and demons, unclaimed spiritual mountains concealed in hidden realms, the ancient sages stirring the star-filled sky with their hands...

All the figures in these images were so large that the only idea they inspired was the desire to prostrate yourself in worship.

All the points of the compass were spread out before him. All antiquity flowed past beneath his feet. Time and space were confounded. Everything known and unknown turned to emptiness in that chaos, dissolving into impermanence, enough to drive a mere mortal to madness. Xi Ping felt that he had become a tiny speck of dust that knew neither where it had come from nor where it was going. For a time he lost awareness, until he was pushed by the wind and landed before a blurred divine image.

Before this, Xi Ping had only heard his seniors explain what a “Way of the Heart” was. He had never especially understood.

In that moment, standing in front of the divine image whose age and sex were indistinguishable, he suddenly understood without being taught: the so-called “Way of the Heart” was like a frame that could contain all that chaos and disorder.

A person could fumble around for their own Way of the Heart, create a very small, yet very steadfast, framework. Then, they would constantly temper their Way of the Heart, constantly expand that framework, until it could integrate all things and all creatures, become one of the three thousand paths of the Great Way. This was the road to becoming a god, becoming a sage.

They could also follow a way that a predecessor had felt out before them, inherit an already fixed framework, slowly fumble for understanding under the protection of that predecessor. This was the road that the majority of people took.

Lin Zhaoli-shixiong had assembled the ancient sword and obtained the Way of the Heart of the ancient sword's previous owner. The Way of the Heart that Exalted Zhao Yu in Jinping had been searching for was hidden inside an ancient painting...and the skeleton beneath the countless reincarnation wood trees here had a Way of the Heart, which was inviting Xi Ping to step forward.

He tentatively touched the blurred divine image and instantly felt that he had fallen into a boundless scroll. Xi Ping only took a half-hearted glance, didn't even have a chance to consider closely before he felt his whole soul being filled by that Way of the Heart. A tremendous sense of comfort enveloped him: all that was irresolute could find an explanation here; all that was unstable and uneasy would find a place to rest. He wanted to belong here forever...

Wait, that was wrong! There was something he had left unfinished!

He hadn't brought san-ge's spiritual bones out yet.

Xi Ping came back to himself with a start, his consciousness abruptly escaping the blurred divine image, putting him at a distance from it.

There was only half of a skeleton left here. His mind worked quickly: the other half must have been taken away by Liang Chen nine years ago.

The most senior supervisor of the southern mines had ended up in the Impassable Sea by mistake and witnessed the shameful undercurrent beneath the era of steam power. His Way of the Heart and his spirit had broken here, leaving his consciousness with nowhere to go. It must also have sunk into the hidden bones of the ancient demonic god. This was precisely the peculiar aspect of the “way of death.” Apart from the hidden bones, everything else in the body could be swapped out—this could explain why Liang Chen had left his body on the wooden platform and gone out with the hidden bones to search the world for a corpse to wear; the spirit of his original body could no longer sustain his consciousness.

The half-skeleton of mysterious hidden bones had confused the peak masters of Green Pool and Flying Jade Peaks to no end, because there was too great a difference between the way they acted in Xi Ping’s body and the way they had acted in Liang Chen’s body: cloaked in the hidden bones, regardless of whether his own cultivation level was up to the mark, Liang Chen had been able to feign being a near-shed skin, had even been able to hamper Zhi Xiu, who hadn't dared to exert all his strength so close to Jinping City.

But when this great magical weapon had come to Xi Ping, it had degenerated to its owner's amateur level. The hidden bones hadn't raised Xi Ping's cultivation level, and they hadn't given him any kind of additional magic powers. Even in dealing with those idiots who had offered up their flesh and blood to the reincarnation wood, his bone qin only worked against mortals—a half-immortal who had opened his spiritual eyes was already a world apart from a mortal; there was nothing glorious about this.

Xi Ping quickly summarized the differences between himself and Liang Chen: first, when he'd obtained the hidden bones, he had coincidentally just opened his spiritual eyes, and his meridians had been destroyed by the inscription; in order to save his life, Duanrui-shishu had indiscriminately pinched him and the hidden bones together—but that only meant that he was better fused with the hidden bones than Liang Chen had been... Being better fused together meant he couldn't get any use out of them? How did that make sense?

The second difference was that Xi Ping had no Way of the Heart.

Liang Chen had had a Way of the Heart, which had broken; so when his consciousness had found rest in the hidden bones of the ancient demonic god, had he readily inherited that demonic god's Way of the Heart?

This great master had reached the pinnacle of the shed skin stage. Carrying on along his way, your future would be boundless. For an outer sect cultivator who'd had no one to guide him, it was simply an irresistible lure.

But Xi Ping wasn't an outer sect cultivator. He had even refused General Zhi's Way of the Heart, and he didn't think the way in these lousy bones was any more brilliant than his shifu's—cultivating the way of death...that sounded much too auspicious. He'd be better off spending four shichen every day practicing the sword with shifu in the northwest wind.

"I don't want it," he thought. "Anyway, I'm not going to die right away. At worst I'll live off the trees and be a tree spirit. Maybe I'll be able to accumulate some virtue by saving some would-be suicides trying to hang themselves. Shifu can take care of the rest."

Having thought of this, Xi Ping decisively pulled his consciousness away, planning to follow the roots up. If his body really couldn't leave the Impassable Sea, he would first think of a way to get the mustard seed containing san-ge's spiritual bones out.

This great master's Way of the Heart had never been ignored like this. It was infuriated by this proud and ignorant brat. The blurred divine image hurled itself forward, trying to force his consciousness to merge with it. Parting without hard feelings was all right, but what Xi Ping had always hated most was a forced sale. He thought, You want to seize a beautiful man for yourself, or what?

His spirit had cracked, and he had been somewhat dazed and sluggish to begin with. Now he was energized. A rebellious heart was far more effective than swallowing a whole bottle of mind-clearing pills dry.

Xi Ping uprooted his consciousness from that half-skeleton and charged into the surrounding reincarnation wood trees. The reincarnation wood trees twining around the bones moved in answer to his thoughts, quickly twisting around the half-skeleton of the demonic god's hidden bones.

Xi Ping said, "Get lost, now."

He had just wanted to use the tree roots to hold the hidden bones back for a moment. He hadn't expected that, because he had used too much force or something, the half-skeleton would be broken to bits by the twisting roots!

Xi Ping: "... "

I didn't do it on purpose...

No, this couldn't have been his mistake. How could an ancient demonic god's hidden bones be so fragile? And weren't these reincarnation wood trees the old fellow's accompanying plant?

Before he could react, the bones that had been twisted to pieces by the tree roots turned into a handful of green mist that seeped into the tips of the roots of the reincarnation wood trees—Xi Ping, whose consciousness was clearly wandering outside of his body, had a sudden feeling like his ankles were itching. For a moment, he couldn't tell whether the feeling was coming from his own ankles, or whether the tree roots were giving him the impression of having feet!

The peculiar itching quickly went up from his ankles and climbed over his whole body. Xi Ping simply had no idea where to start scratching.

Then, his chest was hollowed out. His consciousness, previously scattered throughout the reincarnation wood forest, suddenly twisted together and was pulled back into his body, hitting the vast spiritual energy that had shattered his spirit head on.

Xi Ping was nearly knocked unconscious by the crash. At the same time, his body, stuck in the inscription, struggled unnaturally.

Every bit of his bones was constantly breaking and reforming. When the bones regrew, they interlocked, making cracking sounds. The reincarnation wood trees around him grew like mad.

Now all the demons in the Impassable Sea were unable to approach. Even the demon seal was trembling incessantly amid this momentum.

Demonic energy that had been concealed for nearly a thousand years leaked out of the crack in the inscription. In the Resurrection Vortex, black shadows appeared at the bottom of each whirlpool and went upward against the rotation of the whirlpools. The sky suddenly clouded over with heavy clouds. Next, a bolt of lightning split the surface of the sea.

In the distant Xuanyin Mountains, the foggy Sea of Stars turned over, and there was a huge sound at the Principal Peak as the Bell of Tribulation moved without a wind!

Above the Resurrection Vortex, Zhi Xiu narrowly dodged the heavenly tribulation. His heart beat like thunder. But then, his consciousness caught a faint passing sliver of...Xi Ping's aura!

Without any hesitation, the sword cultivator made a hand seal and cut right through the ominously seething enormous whirlpool. Avoiding the lightning flashing through the water, he chased after that aura.

On the ice boat skimming over the waves, Wei Chengxiang suddenly felt something. She took out the reincarnation wood amulet she kept close to her body.

The amulet was now charred black, as if it had been burnt, now restored to as good as new. Soon after, from the charred and then restored wood grain, tiny twigs and buds grew, became long and slender, and wrapped around the amulet. In the blink of an eye, the tender leaves turned deep green, then yellowed and fell away. The amulet was once again as smooth and clean as before...

Wei Chengxiang had spent the whole way chatting with the amulet, talking out all the words she'd held back for days while being the holy woman, yet she hadn't gotten any reaction from it. Now, seeing the reincarnation wood amulet behaving strangely, she involuntarily became wild with joy—any reaction was better than no reaction. “Uncle! Uncle!”

The amulet in its constant alternation of the life cycle wrapped around the girl's cry and sent it surging into the den of demons.

Xi Ping's consciousness, nearly broken apart by the wheeling spiritual energy, was called back to wakefulness by her.

A-Xiang...

If A-Xiang's voice could get in, then wasn't the exit to the Impassable Sea completely open?

San-ge's spiritual bones...

The seal on the Impassable Sea that had existed for nearly eight hundred years was on the point of collapse from his struggles. Xi Ping's constantly spasming joints gave a final crack. Where the foot he himself had cut off had been, a new foot grew...though it was only of bone.

Then there was an enormous sound—

The thread of clear consciousness he had maintained landed firmly on something. The spiritual wind that had scattered both his spirit and the heart demon settled; his spiritual foundation had been forged.

Xi Ping felt all his meridians grow countless times wider. All of the spiritual energy surging in was channeled into his spiritual foundation.

But on that spiritual foundation, there was still no Way of the Heart.

Next, the inscription under him collapsed altogether.

The Impassable Sea... The Impassable Sea, sealed in an unknown place since ancient times, where the eight-hundred-year-old great demon was about to take shape at any moment—the demon seal on it had been broken ahead of schedule by Xi Ping!

The hundreds of thousands of demons trapped there once again saw the light of day. Spiritual energy and demonic energy surged out together. A tidal wave dozens of zhang high rose in the East Sea.

Xi Ping, completely exhausted, fell into the deep sea, all the spiritual energy around him scattered by the broken demon seal.

The demon host, suppressed for ages, threw themselves forward with fangs bared and claws extended as soon as they were free, planning to enjoy the taste of this first mouthful of human flesh.

Just then, a stroke of sword light as bright as snow swept over. Zhaoting fell and tore a gap among the densely gathered demons.

Zhi Xiu grabbed hold of his disciple, who had pierced through the “underworld.”

The Marquis of Yongning hadn't yet left Guangyun Palace. He was thinking that the weather was unusually stuffy today, making it hard to catch his breath. Then he heard an enormous sound.

Fierce light dazzled the Marquis so he couldn't open his eyes. He looked back in terror and saw that Guangyun Palace's Jinluan Main Hall had been struck by a bolt of lightning. All the gas lamps nearby had been destroyed. There were flames on the coiled dragon columns.

In the seven Azure Dragon Towers in Jinping City, the bells began to ring incessantly all at once. A sudden wave on the Lingyang River overturned the pleasure boats floating there. The Dragon Vein was quaking!

CHAPTER 63 - The Mountain Falls (15)

Guangyun Palace was in chaos. Several blue-clothed half-immortals from Heaven's Design Pavilion appeared out of thin air, went through the main hall, which had been turned into a chimney by the fire, and charged right into the emperor's living quarters.

Before Zhao Yu's feet had even touched down, he saw a eunuch fall onto the ground. He broke his front tooth when he fell. The eunuch, his face all bloody, scrambled out. "His Majesty...His Majesty, he..."

Zhao Yu pushed open the door to the heated room. The wind carrying the scent of burning surged in half a step ahead of him, scattering the withered petals of the unseasonable peonies all over the ground.

Emperor Taiming Zhou Kun was sitting upright inside the room. On the top half of his face there was a mixture of surprise and fury, his eyes popping; but the bottom half of his face was fixed in a contorted yet relieved smile. His exposed face, neck, and hands were covered in sinister inscriptions, like tattoos that had come up from the cracks in his bones, publicly exposing this final sinner of the Zhou family to offer his own family as sacrificial offerings to demons.

A chill went through Zhao Yu's spine. He stared blankly for a long moment and found to his surprise that the person inside the heated room was no longer breathing. He quickly took out a pair of protective gloves and put them on, then stepped forward to investigate.

Before he could touch Zhou Kun, Zhou Kun's skin began to crumble bit by bit. The tyrant who had spent half his life playing politics fell with a crash.

At the same time, the demon seal under the Resurrection Vortex also crumbled altogether.

With one hand, Zhi Xiu carried his disciple with his exposed bones, and with the other he held up his sword, firmly holding back thousands upon millions of demons under the East Sea. In the midst of his many pressing concerns, he also quickly checked Xi Ping's wound... Then the master of Flying Jade Peak nearly breathed in a lungful of seawater.

An established foundation?!

An established foundation, just like that? Had he accidentally lost track of time in seclusion and opened his eyes a hundred years later?

Where on earth had this brat found a Way of the Heart?

Never mind that, even if he had a Way of the Heart and spiritual bones, with Xi Ping's attitude, he couldn't memorize Detailed Account of Meridians in a whole sixty year cycle; did he even know how he was supposed to direct spiritual energy to establish a foundation?

The immortal sects had a long history, and now and then they would turn up an idiot. As a precaution against these people, who could get any kind of thought into their heads, taking something by mistake, the seals on all bottles of ungentle medicines had prohibitions on them, especially established foundation pills. Reasonably speaking, only those at the peak of the open-eyed stage, who could control spiritual energy flawlessly, whose meridians and spiritual bones were already completely ready, would have the ability to break the prohibition on a bottle of established foundation elixir.

Which tooth had his rebellious disciple used to gnaw the bottle open?!

General Zhi had lived for over two hundred years, and this was his first time finding himself at a complete loss.

But this situation left him no time to think carefully. All the demons in the Impassable Sea had gone mad. Faced with the biting cold light of Zhaoting, they were boldly charging out with no fear of death.

All prohibitions had disappeared. The sword cultivator's consciousness poured through the demon host and went straight in, sweeping through the Impassable Abyss that hadn't seen the light of day in thousands of years. He saw the altar that had already collapsed.

Zhi Xiu's pupils contracted sharply.

With an ascended spirit spiritual sense, he had no need to look things up and make blind guesses like Xi Ping had done. With just a glance, Zhi Xiu could see all the long-buried lives of these nameless skeletons.

He saw the unsightly stains behind their age of prosperity and, one after another, met each of those children of royalty who had been pressed to death in the Impassable Sea; he saw a series of successive lunatics and sacrificial offerings who had no way to escape, and under the strangely beautiful skeletal remains that were like statues carved of white spirits, he saw the ground littered with fragments of the resentful ghosts of miners and the consciences of slaves...and he also saw a little half-immortal who couldn't even draw a talisman properly recklessly taking on the heart demon single-handed, for the sake of defending him.

As if the master of Xuanyin's one and only snow-capped mountain could be injured, could die.

For a time, Zhi Xiu clearly felt his heart and mind waver.

He thought, If the heart demon were still here, I might really be doomed now.

Zhi Xiu closed his eyes and called, Zhaoting!

At his thought, Zhaoting pierced through the broken demon seal, the sword energy making its way right into that reincarnation wood forest. The ancient demonic god had after all been dead for over a thousand years; his remnants vanished at one sweep from Zhaoting.

Zhi Xiu put his palm on the center of Xi Ping's brow. In the name of the Dignitary of Fate's lineage, he set down a prohibition against prying—from now on, unless someone overcame the Sea of Stars, no one would be able to catch a glimpse of Xi Ping's history and background.

Opening your spiritual eyes with the help of a half-skeleton of hidden bones was one thing; as for the question of a half-immortal not having a Way of the Heart, at most others would say that the young fellow's fate was unusual.

But establishing a foundation in a den of demons, carrying off the hidden bones of the demonic god of the way of death—now that was too much.

In fact, Zhi Xiu didn't think there would be anything wrong with a demonic god's Way of the Heart... A so-called "ancient demonic god" was only a great master who had failed in the struggle for the full moon positions. Since they had reached the peak of the shed skin stage, their ways would be no more evil than the vast majority of "orthodox Ways of the Heart" that existed today.

But he couldn't control what other people thought. Establishing a foundation less than a year after entering the Way—this was unprecedented among the four great sects. All miracles were alien; they might not necessarily be accepted by the world.

When the prohibition fell, faint sword aura flitted over Xi Ping's horrifying bones, covering up the slightly odd air about him. The impression Xi Ping gave immediately became that of an orthodox sword cultivator.

Just then, Zhaoting let out a buzzing sound like a warning. Zhi Xiu abruptly sensed something and sent a Heavenly Question back to the immortal mountains.

Then he quickly took a leaf from his sleeve, which he curled toward Xi Ping. "Take him back to Flying Jade Peak."

The immortal tool in the shape of a willow leaf expanded to a zhang square. On the tail end of its flowing light, a small “Lin” character appeared—it was an ascended spirit grade immortal tool. It wrapped tightly around Xi Ping like a cocoon. White light floated over the tool. Both the demonic energy and the sword energy nearby gave way to it. Holding Xi Ping, it surged at full speed toward the surface of the sea.

As soon as Zhi Xiu had sent his disciple away, the demon host in the Impassable Sea began to boil over, throwing themselves against Zhaoting’s light as if fighting with their lives.

The sword energy spilled out. The water dragons that had already withdrawn outside the Resurrection Vortex were so startled they rose into the air, colliding with their own convoy.

Lin Zhaoli was the first to sense it. The established foundation sword cultivator’s spiritual sense sent frantic warnings. Using tremendous strength, he managed to pry apart his trembling teeth; then, with a wave of his sleeve, he pulled back and knocked out Xi Yue, who was trying to jump into the water. “Suicidal little thing... Flee south at full speed!”

As he shouted the final words, his voice broke off.

Lin Zhaoli, who had always valued saving face over heaven, no longer cared about concealing his terror in front of his colleagues. “Hurry!”

Wei Chengxiang and the ice boat were thrown up high together by the enormous waves. The new half-immortal who had just thought that she “had hold of her destiny and no longer deserved to make a wish before a celestial being” was instantly knocked back to her original form. She once again became a little ant at the whim of the elements.

Wei Chengxiang couldn’t open her eyes. She could only clutch tightly to the ice boat with all her limbs, tossed up and rolled wildly by the huge waves.

An invisible beam of sword energy spilled out of the water, splitting the sea in two. Wei Chengxiang’s vision went black. She fell toward the sword energy along with the ice boat.

Fortunately, the ice boat and the sword energy had the same origin. The sword energy didn’t harm her. There was a loud and clear clang, and the ice boat was bounced back intact, landing on the surface of the sea. The sword energy seemed intent on escorting her for a certain distance. It gathered up a gale and pushed the boat away.

Wei Chengxiang’s legs went weak, and she went to her knees. Panicked, she turned back to look. Only now did she realize how ignorant and fearless she had been.

Had she seen that sword aura before, she might not have dared to look that grey-clothed immortal in the eye!

Just then, the tumultuous surface of the sea congealed. Then it was as if a hand forcefully smoothed out the gullies and huge waves made by the sword energy.

Time and space held still for a moment. The East Sea became unnaturally calm.

The ice boat slid at full speed along the mirror-like surface of the sea and overturned, tossing Wei Chengxiang into the sea. Luckily, she hadn't let go.

But while she was climbing with difficulty back onto the ice boat, her chest suddenly ached.

In that moment, all the living creatures throughout the East Sea heard a single thump, like the beat of a heart.

The sound of that heartbeat was large and distinct. It seemed to come from the depths of the sea, and it also seemed to sound in each person's chest.

The cultivators, the mortals...even the half-puppet Xi Yue—all of them were so shaken that they nearly suffocated.

The water dragon animal spirits instantly disappeared, shaken back into their array by the heartbeat.

The dazed Xi Ping, as if hit in the chest by a nightmare, sat up with a start inside the immortal tool.

At the bottom of the Impassable Sea, Zhi Xiu watched as the densely packed demons seemed to be collectively released from a freezing spell.

Next, like light mist on a slab of stone gently wiped away by a silk cloth, they disappeared where they were in large swaths. Demonic energy, spiritual energy, sword energy...even the mysterious inscriptions in the Impassable Sea that stretched as far as the eye could see, and the unstoppable Resurrection Vortex, were all wiped away together.

It was as if the Impassable Abyss had never existed.

Some invisible force pressed Xuanyin Mountain's most preeminent sword cultivator firmly to the bottom of the sea. For a moment, Zhi Xiu had the feeling that all of the vast East Sea was bearing down on his shoulders. The ascended spirit cultivator's spine, as steadfast as a frozen mountain, let out an ominous groan, as if on the point of being crushed to pieces.

Then he heard a sigh sweep through the East Sea. "I hadn't thought that with the world's spiritual energy so diminished, it could still produce a personage like you."

The thing inside the demon seal that had once left the full moon sages helpless...had awoken.

The seawater began to vibrate faintly. The ripples in front of him arranged themselves into a human face hundreds of zhang high; the eyes of that face were lowered to gaze at the minute human.

For some reason, this face looked very familiar to Zhi Xiu, but at first he couldn't remember why.

"A two-hundred-year-old ascended spirit sword cultivator. With this sword aura, had you been born some thousands of years earlier, there would have been a full moon position with your name."

"I don't deserve such flattery." Cracks formed in the seafloor at Zhi Xiu's feet, but he remained courteous. "I just sent away an established foundation cultivator who began cultivating less than a year ago. I may only be an advance wave hitting the shore.”

“That little devil,” the familiar face in the water said softly. “His destiny carries tribulation. It is right for him to take Yuan Hui’s way.”

Zhi Xiu lowered his eyes. He knew that after the immortal sect received word, they would need time to come. So, intent on playing for time, he asked, “Is ‘Yuan Hui’ the senior who cultivated the way of death?”

“Way of death?” As expected, the demon that had been sealed for thousands of years was drawn into conversation. His laughter raised ripples in the sea. “Who picked that name? It has no style.”

This laughing face... A light suddenly went on in Zhi Xiu’s mind. He remembered where he had seen this visage—this was the Southern Sage’s face!

Zhi Xiu had always treated all kinds of unnecessary formalities with perfect courtesy, carelessly muddling through. He had never given a single thought to any ritual or offering paying respects to the sage. If the image on the incense altar had one day been swapped out, he might not even have noticed. Had that big face’s posture, looking down and smiling, not been identical to the statue of the Southern Sage that received offerings on Xuanyin's Principal Peak, he wouldn't have recognized the founder of his own sect!

Why would the head of the demon host use the face of the Southern Sage? The implied metaphor here was bone-chilling.

Zhi Xiu focused. "Please instruct me, senior. If it isn't called the way of death, then what should it be called?"

"His way has no name." In the water, the demon that coexisted with chaos, using the Southern Sage's face, said, "I would rather call it the ungovernable way."

Zhi Xiu: "..."

That sounded like it would be more suitable than the plain and unremarkable way of the sword for his rebellious disciple, who could bring down the sky and split open the earth.

Longing appeared on the Southern Sage's face, as if recalling an old friend. "Yuan Hui was a remarkable person. His cultivation was comparable to that of the true full moon gods. The reason he didn't reach the full moon stage was that his way wasn't among the three thousand paths of the Great Way. Heaven and earth couldn't abide his way."

“Why is that?”

“Because this way has no Way of the Heart.”

Zhi Xiu said, “What?!”

Xi Ping was boundlessly daring and lacked any general knowledge, because his shifu hadn't gotten around to teaching it to him yet—no teacher would start a student on the Four Books⁴⁷ before he had even finished memorizing a thousand characters.

A cultivator needed to have a Way of the Heart when establishing a foundation, because in this step, a person would be completely remade. The spirit that had previously held the consciousness would certainly be shattered by the spiritual energy drawn into the body; the establishment could only be called complete once the spiritual energy had once more collected and formed a spiritual foundation. During this process, the cultivator had to remain clear-headed.

The Way of the Heart was what gave the consciousness a temporary resting place after the spirit shattered.

Without a sufficiently complete Way of the Heart standing guard, the consciousness would simply scatter, and the person would naturally go to see the sages. For this reason, a disciple whose Way of the Heart was patterned after their teacher's had to pass through the “three inquiries and three examinations” of their elder before establishing a foundation, to ensure that their Way of the Heart was steadfast enough—this was also the reason that nearly all inner sect disciples would follow the Way of the Heart of their teacher: a Way of the Heart they had felt out themselves, or a Way of the Heart from a predecessor that they had hunted down outside the sect, wouldn't have this step; they would have to undertake the risk themselves.

Without a Way of the Heart, how had Xi Shiyong established a foundation?

Even if the demonic god's hidden bones were particularly mysterious and had temporarily sheltered his consciousness, what about after the foundation was established?

Without a Way of the Heart, what would he bring his inquiries to? What would he refine? What would be his next step? Which way would his spirit ascend?

“In Yuan Hui's way, with each step forward, he had to be completely destroyed and to cast aside the past. The opportune moment for being completely destroyed had to be precise. Otherwise, it was only a hair's breadth from breaking through the cocoon and being reborn to dying and having his way extinguished. What the opportune moment was, apart from Yuan Hui himself, no one knew. I have kept company with his remains for all these years at the bottom of the Impassable Sea, and yet I've never been able to understand his way.

“The Zhous came and went. They all thought that reincarnation wood forest was only an ancient relic. Only when looking death in the face could you touch the hidden bones beneath the reincarnation wood forest. Nine years ago, there was a person who got by through coincidence. He encountered the heart demon, and his Way of the Heart shattered, letting him encounter and inherit the hidden bones in his hopeless position...but he didn't take the opportunity.”

Zhi Xiu knew at once that he was talking about Liang Chen. “But didn't he take away half of the skeleton of hidden bones and get a new Way of the Heart, succeed in establishing a foundation?”

“He was enticed by the false Way of the Heart within those hidden bones and thought that he had seized his last hope. He was in a hurry to throw himself in,” the demon said, smiling. “With a will like that, how could he be accepted by the ungovernable way? He didn't take that half skeleton of hidden bones. It was the half skeleton of hidden bones that used him to leave the Impassable Sea.”

Zhi Xiu had entered the Way on the cliffs above the Sea of Stars. He was extremely sensitive to the threads of karma. Hearing this, he was frightened: no wonder that in a moment of emergency, Xi Ping had coincidentally been able to pry open the prohibition on the established foundation pill bottle!

No wonder that after swallowing the established foundation pill, he seemed to have instinctively known which way to draw in the spiritual energy!

So...it hadn't been Liang Chen misappropriating the ancient demonic god's hidden bones; it had been the half skeleton of hidden bones becoming a parasite in his body, using him to find a successor.

So Xi Ping accidentally falling into the Impassable Sea from the Resurrection Vortex—had that really been an “accident”?

Or rather, was it that since he had obtained those hidden bones...no, since he had made an instant wrong decision and hadn't handed that birthday jade over the Heaven's Design Pavilion, he had been doomed to end up here and now?

And what about the demon seal in the Impassable Sea, which had torn ahead of schedule because he had established a foundation by force?

The Zhou family had made their arrangements for eight hundred years, completely hiding them from Xuanyin's Sea of Stars. At the last moment, he had broken all the arrangements, making them fall through just before they came to completion. Could this also be someone's secret plan?

In that instant, Zhi Xiu had the trembling feeling of sinking into the Sea of Stars for the first time, seeing all the interlinked cause and effect of heaven, in which he himself was as tiny as a game piece.

“Just a little bit more. I only need one little bit more for my demonic soul to be complete.” The Southern Sage's face in the sea sighed again. “It seems that this is the fate of the Zhou family, and my fate as well. But your Xuanyin has only gained a reprieve from death. A tiny ascended spirit like you shouldn't overestimate your strength. There's a familiar aura about you, quite dear to me. It would be a pity for you to die here. Why don't you retreat?”

Zhi Xiu raised his head and drew back all his lines of thought. For a long time, he didn't speak.

Then, holding Zhaoting's hilt, he slowly stood upright.

The demon that had been irrigated by bitter rancor for eight hundred years looked at him with the Southern Sage's face and tranquilly said, “Sword cultivator, demons arise from the human heart. Even if you give all you have to keep me in the East Sea today, will that bring peace to the human world?”

When you risked your life to protect Jinping’s Dragon Vein, thinking that you were fighting for the nation and the people, whose was the hand wielding you in the long run? What did you protect?

Half of the spiritual stones that have gone to fill the Impassable Abyss can be set down under your name. Those who followed in your footsteps—what ends have they come to now?

High General, your name passes from mouth to mouth, but have you heard the unending mourning songs of the Turmoilers as they devour the corpses of their loved ones?

Have you heard their curses, night and day?

Zhi Xiu threw back his head to look at the sage’s face, facing the interrogation of heaven and earth.

Then he slowly smiled. “I am but a mere sword cultivator. My natural endowments are poor. I am no god, no sage. Why should I overreach myself by trying to attend to the big picture?”

His gaze was distant and calm, as if responding to his own Way of the Heart. “For the time being, if I am able to have a clear conscience in the present, that is good enough. I have no time to regret the past, and no strength to reach a perfect conclusion.”

“And now, what are you going to do?”

Zhi Xiu softly said, “Now, I am in the East Sea, and my sword is in the East Sea. That is all.”

With his sword in his hand, the master of Flying Jade Peak always had a precipice at his back.

Since he had joined the lineage of the Dignitary of Fate two hundred years ago, the Sea of Stars had only taught him to consult celestial phenomena at the last moment when he had forgotten some detail, to spare him from humiliating himself in front of his juniors.

In the end, it hadn't taught him to look to the past or consider the future.

Zhaoting was still Zhaoting.

Laughing, the demon said, “The lineage of the Dignitary of Fate has actually produced a person like you, who doesn't see the past and disregards cause and effect!”

Xi Ping was now floating on the surface of the sea. The terror he had encountered once close-up at the bottom of the Impassable Sea passed through the immortal tool and pricked his back like a fine needle. His first reaction was to reach into his mustard seed to check on san-ge’s spiritual bones. Seeing that the spiritual bones were safe and sound, he let out a sigh of relief.

But before he could report his own well-being to Prince Zhuang, Xi Ping’s breath caught again—he had just clearly sensed shifu. Where was he?

There was something unknown surrounding him. Xi Ping looked all around without finding an exit, only heard the sound of water outside the immortal tool. “Shifu?”

The echo of his voice vibrated in the immortal tool.

Xi Ping punched the immortal tool. “How do I get out of...”

Before he could finish, something happened beneath the East Sea. Xi Ping was tossed up by the waves without warning. His head collided with the immortal tool.

But the immortal tool surrounding him gently cushioned his head.

“Shiyong.” He heard Zhi Xiu’s voice in his ear. It seemed to be coming through the immortal tool. His shizun said in a very calm tone, “I haven’t taught you a single thing about striving for your way. After all these years, my own inquiries to heaven and earth have borne no fruit. Truly, I shouldn’t rashly lead young people astray.”

Part of Xi Ping’s body was bone that hadn’t even grown flesh and blood. His center of gravity was a little unsteady. Flailing his limbs, he could keep his balance with difficulty, but his heart suddenly missed a few beats.

Why did this speech sound like...

“When you became my disciple, you said, ‘Everyone takes their Way and uses it to make inquiries to heaven and earth. Heaven and earth must be sick of it.’” There seemed to be a slight smile in Zhi Xiu’s voice. “Children are innocent. You were right. It’s the rest of us who have gone too far. We often forget the way we have come.”

“Don’t worry, shifu, we’ll talk about it when we get back.” Xi Ping’s throat went dry. “Now...now, can you let me out?”

“I have nothing to pass on to you. I’ve only taken a bit of a detour, so you can learn from my mistakes,” Zhi Xiu continued, ignoring him. “Don’t ask heaven and earth, even if heaven and earth can’t abide your way—ask yourself. Also...”

“Shifu!”

“Don’t let others pry into your way.”

CHAPTER 64 - The Mountain Falls (16)

Xi Ping searched for the exit to the immortal tool in a panic. “Shifu, let me out... Shifu!”

Zhi Xiu didn’t answer.

Zhaoting wove an all-encompassing net, overreaching its own strength trying to trap the demon in the East Sea.

“Shifu...” The ascended spirit grade “leaf” was still a leaf. In the midst of the turbulent waters, it was blown around wildly.

Inside it, Xi Ping was like a ball of yarn in a cat’s paws, rolling around so much that he couldn’t find his own head. Through the immortal tool, he could feel the sword energy under the East Sea, as weak yet as steadfast as an ant trying to shake a tree.

Xi Ping closed his eyes, letting the immortal tool toss him around here and there.

His eyes were bloodshot. In an instant, all his thousand thoughts emptied out, and the only one that remained was: No.

As soon as he had this thought, a seven-stringed qin appeared in his hands out of nowhere. Perhaps because it was influenced by the sword energy left with him by the sword cultivator, the qin was rather narrow, its shape like a sword's at first glance. As yet, it had no name engraved on it. White light floated dimly at one end, as if waiting for its master's first song asking the way to determine the nature of its music.

Will you take a direct approach, or make an unconventional sideways stroke?

Or...

Xi Ping exchanged a look with his vital weapon for a moment, then snatched up the nameless qin and swung it heavily against the immortal tool trapping him.

Ask your own fucking way, let me out!

The qin collided with the ascended spirit immortal tool and let out a sky-shaking lamentation. With a clang, the seven strings vibrated.

Xi Ping's chest also seemed to have been hit by a sledgehammer. The taste of blood rose in his throat.

But he ignored that completely.

This exceedingly arrogant young master had never been willing to obediently do what he was told. His father hadn't beaten the habit out of him with a discipline rod in twenty years; what could his good-tempered shifu do, when at his angriest he would only punish him by making him sweep snow?

A vital weapon was tied to its master's thoughts, closely joined. Some weapons that were closely entangled with their master's fate would at a certain boundary be refined into vital weapons—for example, Zhaoting; others, meanwhile, were created through the Way of the Heart, growing in the spiritual bones, like Pang Jian's Barrier Dispeller Bow, whose every arrow was his own life energy, shot with great exertion.

Never had there been a vital weapon that, upon first emerging into the world, had suffered this kind of treatment from its master.

Xi Ping knew that as long as he didn't die, his vital weapon couldn't be damaged. Though with his cultivation level, he certainly wouldn't be able to break open an ascended spirit grade immortal tool, this lush green immortal tool had a gentle nature; it seemed to come from the same source as the heart-protecting lotus he had given san-ge. It was evidently a tool for defense and protection. It couldn't very well allow the person it was protecting to die trapped inside it.

So, completely unstinting, he used that qin to hit the immortal tool trapping him again and again.

The debt in the Impassable Sea had its debtors. For thousands of years, the immortal mountains had laid down the soil; eight hundred years ago, the martial emperor had planted the cause.

So what if He had been annihilated—could the heart demon seed have come out of nowhere?

Southern He had been deluded by Moon Plated Gold. Lancang had reaped what it had sowed. Renzong was the bastard!

Why should the evil consequences of all this fall to his shizun to sort out?

Just because those lunatics had kicked the bucket?

Did the predestination of gods and demons bully the weak while fearing the strong? Go flog the corpses if you're up to it!

For a time, he couldn't work out the sequence of cause and effect, and he didn't know whom to hate. All he could do was vent all his indignation on the immortal tool trapping him.

The qin strings sounded wildly. Xi Ping spat up a mouthful of blood, staining the qin with mottled bloodstains. The white light dispersed, and a name engraved in flourishing cursive appeared at the end of the qin.

The engraving read: Tai Sui.

The qin once again hit the protective immortal tool. The incessant drone of the strings actually pierced through the ascended spirit immortal tool, pierced through the spirits of hundreds of thousands of poverty-stricken people.

There was a huge sound in Wei Chengxiang's ears that instantly overcame the roar of the sea and nearly struck her deaf.

The sound of the strings, which was like tearing silk, sank into her chest like a hook and suspended her bleeding heart, clogging her throat with emotion and igniting all her grief and indignation. It was more choking than the restless chimneys of the southern outskirts, even more choking than the conflagration that had burned Rat Alley to the ground.

At the same time, strike after strike of the qin dispersed throughout the mortal world. Everyone who had touched reincarnation wood and prayed to the evil god for a miracle heard it simultaneously.

His anger passed through the spirits of thousands upon thousands of people and was magnified thousands upon thousands of times.

Some people covered their ears in agony and sobbed. Others, red-eyed, clutched the weapons in their hands tighter.

In a secluded little town in Guzhou, a grimy-faced teenage boy threw himself down beside a worker who had been shot dead by a bailiff with a hand cannon. The deceased may have been his father, brother, or teacher—perhaps even his mother; half of the head had been blown up by the hand cannon, and the person's features were no longer visible. On the remaining half of the shattered face, all that was left was a single eye, unwilling to close peacefully in death.

The boy opened his mouth but couldn't shout. A protection amulet made of reincarnation wood slipped out of the front of his jacket and was stained with blood. It couldn't protect him. He heard an enraged heartbeat and didn't know whether it came from his own chest or whether he had struck up a resonance with someone else. The crashing sound of the qin that exploded in his ears was like a spark falling into oil.

The boy screamed and threw himself at the bailiff who had fired the hand cannon, raising the iron rod in his hand.

The bailiff with the hand cannon shrank back in spite of himself, retreating in panic, and accidentally pulled the trigger. The inadvertently discharged hand cannon sent grit flying, then was knocked out of his hand by the iron rod. The iron rod swung vengefully at the bailiff's head.

With a clang, the destitute boy's iron rod and the Tai Sui Qin together struck the prisons that held them.

The ascended spirit immortal tool didn't move a hair, but the mortal bailiff fell.

The bailiff's colleague was appalled and, flustered, fired at the boy carrying the iron rod. The boy hit the ground without a sound.

Clang—

Amid endless yelling, an iron shovel came flying and hit the killer, sending him running.

Then someone picked up the dead bailiff's hand cannon and fired at the other side.

The demons were about to rise to the heavens, and calamity would befall the earth.

The rallying cattle and sheep heaved at the iron hoof oppressing them, and the tigers and wolves shivered.

The Guzhou mob was fighting back.

On the East Sea, the Tai Sui Qin raised sparks as it scratched against the immortal tool. In the Suling factories, a signal flare made a welt in midair, lighting up the barebacked workers as they surged toward the high threshold like the tide.

Uncrossable inscriptions dimmed and went out. The spiritual stones of damaged arrays, already half grey, bounced wildly and were trampled unstintingly into the mud by countless straw sandals.

Then it was Yuzhou, Jingzhou...even Ning'an.

Jinping's Dragon Vein was in imminent danger.

The wildly sounding strings of the Tai Sui Qin even reached the seabed of the East Sea. The reincarnation wood trees flattened by Zhaoting straightened their necks and revived, like seaweed.

The ancient demon easily pushed aside the sword that could hardly hold out. Irresistible demonic energy rolled toward the sword cultivator who had dared to hinder his steps.

“Two hundred years ago, with a single order, you could make millions follow you and wait upon you. In this way, as a mortal, you defended Jinping City from the Lancang Sword,” the demon said pityingly. “Two hundred years later, you are still you, but the others have gone.

“When luck is with you, heaven and earth are on your side. When luck passes, even a hero has no freedom...”

At the same time, Zhi Xiu heard the horrifying sound of the smashing qin strings. His already slackening consciousness was dazed in the midst of that violent, wild sound. A series of images flashed before his eyes with matchless swiftness. This was the future!

The lineage of the Dignitary of Fate was incompatible with the way of the sword. It had never before turned out a sword cultivator. Zhi Xiu was unconventional. Apart from when he had gone through the motions to accord with his shifu's inherited way and instruction when he was young, the vast majority of the time, he had fumbled around for himself. Observing fate and judging fortune were skills he had never especially picked up.

But perhaps because he was so closely tied to the only other living creature on Flying Jade Peak, in that moment, Zhi Xiu glimpsed Xi Ping's fate.

This was a horrifying wrong road. Bearing the evil way that couldn't be permitted by the world, he spent his whole life passing through tribulations, being broken and rebuilt, ultimately becoming a tribulation himself.

There was no one to pull him back onto the right track.

No...

Get back here, you brat.

At last, the immortal tool holding Xi Ping backed down in the face of his frightening struggles. A tiny crack appeared in it where the end of the qin had struck.

The engraved name "Tai Sui" pricked Zhi Xiu's spirit like a needle.

I said, no!

The great demon swatted at him, too lazy to even give him another look.

The demon turned and headed toward the surface of the sea.

Then, suddenly, he froze.

The mountain of spiritual stones sealed in the Impassable Sea collapsed.

Thousands upon thousands of jin of spiritual stones crumbled and turned grey as the rock snow on them before they even hit the ground. The sword light in the water rose sharply, heading straight for the center of the demon's brow.

In the water, the Southern Sage's face was broken to pieces by that beam of sword energy.

This was a sword thrust of the middle ascended spirit stage...no, of the late ascended spirit stage, even capable of jumping a grade to force a shed skin cultivator to retreat!

Cracks appeared on Zhaoting's blade.

The flood of spiritual energy had nearly numbed Zhi Xiu's meridians, but there was no sign of pain in his face. His hand holding the sword didn't move a sliver. "Scoundrel!"

The next moment, the Resurrection Vortex reappeared in the East Sea.

Countless whirlpools surrounded Zhi Xiu. Each of the whirlpools had the face of the demon.

The numerous visages of the Southern Sage gazed upon the sword cultivator at the bottom of the sea and said at once with many mouths, “Oh, your sword aura has changed.”

Before, he had been a hero at the end of the line, facing conflict head on but in search of a clear conscience.

Whether he succeeded or failed, he would have died for a cause, coming and going graciously.

But in the sword thrust just now, he had found another preoccupation. That sword thrust seemed to cut through predetermined fate. It had a flavor of fighting to the last gasp, unexpectedly falling in line with the “Dignitary of Fate” track.

When a person’s cultivation reached the ascended spirit level, never mind becoming a pedantic stick-in-the-mud, he would long ago have fallen into a finalized mold. Yet at this critical juncture, he could change his sword energy, cross a boundary by force!

Could an expectant gaze truly have such power?

“Interesting,” a thousand mouths said at once. The ancient demon beheld this tiny ascended spirit sword cultivator. “Your name is Zhi Jingzhai.”

Zhi Xiu’s form abruptly split into hundreds upon thousands of forms in the water, and Zhaoting’s sword aura also became omnipresent.

The whirlpools were constantly expanding outward and being forced back by the wrestling sword aura. Heavy murderous intent swirled through the seawater, crushing both the human figure and the sword figure resisting together.

Zhi Xiu’s sword figure was constantly being destroyed, then regenerating after annihilation... His human figure took on more and more wounds, and the cracks on the blade of his sword became denser and denser.

The whole seabed of the East Sea was covered with sword cuts, taking on the appearance of the solitary peak of the snow-capped mountain in the confusion.

The sword aura that disregarded boundaries and risked everything on a single throw passed through the crack Xi Ping had knocked into the immortal tool and hit the rebellious disciple head on. Xi Ping was shaken. The threateningly vicious Tai Sui Qin vanished from his hands.

Xi Ping lost his balance and fell face first inside the immortal tool. He was splashed all over by the seawater seeping in.

He instinctively reached out a hand to prop himself up. The remaining sword energy was still circling in the seawater. It cut a light and shallow wound in his palm.

Xi Ping, who had just nearly crushed his own breastbone, actually felt the pain. He hissed and drew back his hand, raising his head in astonishment... It was as if shifu had smacked him on the palm.

Slander and praise, gratitude and resentment, friends and enemies, smooth sailing and rough seas, joy and indignation—all were hatchets imposed by fate.

No matter where it took you, you had to take it like iron and stone, be unmoved.

That was the path his shifu had personally shown him.

Xi Ping's overexcited consciousness was splashed sober by the seawater. Through the reincarnation wood, screaming noise poured into his ears. At the same time, he felt a faint barrier between himself and the reincarnation wood... Shifu had put a prohibition there.

Xi Ping was excellent at understanding others' intentions. He took one look at this prohibition and understood shifu's apprehensions and protection.

He thought, Since no matter what fate comes your way, you should meet it all with a heart like iron and stone, then what is the difference between a smooth road and a wrong one?

And what was the difference between love and hate?

No one should be making arrangements for him, not Liang Chen or the heart demon, not Jiangli or san-ge...and not shifu, either.

With the first note that the Tai Sui Qin played, Xi Ping simply broke Zhi Xiu's prohibition from within. The noise in his ears instantly multiplied countless times. At the same time, his consciousness, unlimited and unobstructed, linked to all the world's reincarnation wood, alive or dead.

Almost instantly, someone noticed. The Dignitary of Fate High Elder Zhang Jue landed in a white mist in front of a reincarnation wood tree and reached out to touch its trunk with a grave expression.

A couple of figures landed beside him. One of them said, grimly, “Yuan Hui?”

Xi Ping simply channeled the hither seal into his spirit and stamped it on his spiritual foundation. The hither seal instantly crumbled to pieces, and Xi Ping seemed to have been carelessly squeezed into a ball.

Reincarnation wood grew easily and wasn't useful for timber. It liked to grow wildly in the cracks between the stones of cliffs. The hither seal only fell on Xi Ping's spiritual foundation for a moment, and for that moment it brought all the world's reincarnation wood “hither.” For shed skin cultivators, this was already sufficient.

Calamitous waves seethed in the East Sea. The whirlpools assembled into one.

Eight centuries of resentment surged toward the sky. The faces of all those who had died on the altar appeared in the whirlpool, screaming as they collided with Zhaoting.

At this, Zhaoting shattered. But the sword light didn't disperse. It cut through the center of the whirlpool.

The demon that was about to struggle free of the seawater halted. The next moment, the regenerated reincarnation wood forest caught the sword cultivator's sinking body. The three extant shed skin high elders of the Xuanyin Mountains flew out of the reincarnation wood forest. Acting in unison, they temporarily cut this area of the sea off from the mortal world.

Time and space stagnated. The Bell of Tribulation rang.

CHAPTER 65 - The Mountain Falls (17)

The Hither and Yon Seal couldn't be stamped onto a living person. This, like the fact that shooting a hand cannon at someone's head would kill them, belonged to the category of blatantly obvious common sense. Shifu hadn't even wasted words instructing him not to do it.

But Xi Ping had not only done it, he had placed the stamp on his own spiritual foundation.

The Hither and Yon Seal that the swords of Flying Jade Peak had scorned came to a bad end. And after the seal had brought together all the reincarnation wood in the world, Xi Ping's consciousness also dispersed into fine sand, pouring out all over the world.

He had just established a foundation. His consciousness wasn't so steadfast. Soon he lost all sense of time.

In a daze, he thought he was now wandering through fields, now roaming through ruins. Reincarnation wood grew all over abandoned villages and scorched earth, and his blurred consciousness was scattered all over.

After floating for he didn't know how long, by the shore of the East Sea, Xi Ping saw A-Xiang climbing up a reef.

A-Xiang was as good as her word, constantly calling to him. The little amulet she carried drew Xi Ping's consciousness. Xi Ping was shaken. He suddenly remembered who she was, and only then remembered who he himself was.

Then, countless voices crying for "Tai Sui" swept his consciousness into heap after heap like a broom. Xi Ping had no time to say anything to A-Xiang before his consciousness was pulled from the seaside back onto the mainland.

He was like a scrap collector. Following these voices, he picked up bits of his brain along the way. With each piece he got back, his consciousness became a bit clearer.

There were many people who worshipped "Tai Sui," and the vast majority of them weren't Indignant Cicadas.

When people were no longer willing to worship the Southern Sage, wild ghosts and goblins and all their ilk would naturally ascend a level, rise to the incense altar—this "Tai Sui" Xi Ping stood shoulder to shoulder with deities like the Yellow Immortal and the White Immortal,⁴⁸ lifted onto the shrine by swindlers to give to people who would try anything in their desperation something to worship.

He heard a child asking an adult, “Why should we worship a yellow weasel? When I see a yellow weasel snatching a chicken, will I have to bow and give up the chicken?” He was just thinking that this was funny when he heard the child continue: “So what’s a Tai Sui?”

The adult answered: “Everyone says it’s a kind of magic meat fungus.”

“And what’s a magic meat fungus?”

“A big mushroom that gives you immortality if you eat it.”⁴⁹

Xi Ping: “...”

The “big mushroom” miserably picked up his consciousness and left, grumbling and swearing as he cursed these idiots to get diarrhea next time they ate mushrooms.

Anyway, it wasn’t like any of his curses would work.

He went deeper and deeper among the multitude, picking up more and more memories—Xuan Yin Mountain, the southern mines, the Impassable Sea... One after another, and with every bit he remembered, his steps became more hurried.

He hadn't returned san-ge's spiritual bones yet.

How was shifu doing?

Finally, he was no longer in the mood to listen to what the people were saying. He was in such urgency that he would have loved to sprout wings and fly back.

But these ragged people kept weeping and droning prayers, tangling him up and not letting him go.

Xi Ping wanted to beg them to go worship someone else—he couldn't work miracles, anyway. Had he been able to work miracles, the first thing he would have done would have been to curse all these prattling people into becoming mute.

But the people piously lighting incense couldn't hear the voice of his mind. His consciousness was bounced from one group to another. Xi Ping couldn't clearly hear what they were saying. He struggled to the point of exhaustion amid the noise that didn't seem like human speech.

The "big mushroom," nearly nagged to death, could do nothing but hold his head, cover his ears, and run off to find a relatively quiet place to squat, then strain himself to think of something to do.

Just then, he heard a person next to him say to herself, “Does the lilac look pretty, or does the indigo look pretty?”

Xi Ping glanced over weakly and saw that this was a girl of seventeen or eighteen, taking advantage of the confusion. While others were piously worshipping, she was kneeling off to the side, making a knotted bag...no wonder it was so unusually quiet here.

Xi Ping thought to himself that neither color was right. He languidly said, “Pick the blue one.”

The girl chose the lilac cord, hid it in her sleeve, and began tying knots.

Xi Ping clicked his tongue, then heard her whispering from time to time. “Tai Sui, I pray, please let me find an ideal husband.”

Xi Ping rubbed his temples miserably. “I’d love to help, but I can’t. You’ll have to find one for yourself.”

“He doesn’t need to be very beautiful. He can be neat and tidy like Da Cheng-ge. The important thing is that he needs to be kindhearted, filial, and friendly. He doesn't need to be very talkative, but he has to be reliable. When you ask him for something, he can always do it..."

In the midst of all the gloom, the girl's lively chatter was like a spoonful of clear dew. After listening to it for a while, Xi Ping's splitting headache eased considerably. Resting his head in his hand, he began to look her over.

The girl had talked herself into embarrassment. She covered her face with a cry.

The daughters of the poor went out without makeup and were a little cramped in form. She wasn't as smooth-skinned as the young mistresses and wealthy wives, but she wasn't at all plain. She had made herself a flower hair ornament with a rag that was both beautiful and unique. Her flushed face had a pair of eyes like grapes, dark and radiant, sparkling no matter where she looked. The look in her eyes made Xi Ping recall a puppy his grandmother had had when he was little. She became unusually amiable and adorable to him.

"You're pretty good-looking," Xi Ping said. "If you like someone, just try going up to him and saying so. I don't think you'll have much of a problem."

The girl put her palms together. Holding a double handful of colorful cord between them, she shook her hands. "Tai Sui, please let the person I admire admire me as well.”

“Fine, then,” Xi Ping said, calculating on his fingers, “I’ve observed the celestial phenomena at night, and I’ve seen that your...your ruling star is bright and sparkling, in the...the what-do-you-call-it, anyway, it’s in a good position, you’ll have good fortune for three years, marry happily just as you wish, be safe and wealthy...”

The girl couldn’t hear what he was saying. Before he could finish, she sighed. “But Da Cheng-ge has also gone with the Master of Fealty. They say the Master of Fealty used to be a bandit and doesn’t even want to get justice for anyone, he only wants to seize the chance to stage a rebellion... You can get beheaded for that. I told him not to go, but he wouldn’t listen to me.”

“What’s all this nonsense?” Xi Ping’s long brows flew upward. “That’s what you call ‘reliable’? Are you as blind when it comes to picking men as you are when it comes to matching colors?”

The girl whispered, “There’s fighting and chaos all day long. Tai Sui, when will this end?”

The false Tai Sui, who could hardly protect himself, froze. He had nothing to say. All he could do was sit to one side and stare blankly along with her.

Suddenly, as if something had startled her, the girl hurriedly gathered up the colorful cords in her hands and straightened her posture.

Xi Ping followed her gaze and saw a person whose face was veiled walk in surrounded by attendants. There was a putrid stink about him. Xi Ping knew as soon as he saw him that this was an evil cultivator who had taken damage when his spiritual eyes had opened.

This evil cultivator wasn't an Indignant Cicada, either. He seemed never to have heard the phrase "better to die in frost than to forsake one's convictions"—these individually packaged evil cultivators would pick up a name at random and go around making trouble. They'd change their game a few times, get taken for immortals aiding the needy, and collect disciples; even the Indignant Cicadas were better.

Xi Ping saw this guy start to talk, all of it nonsense, teaching the way of "Tai Sui" right in front of "Tai Sui," yammering a lot of blather. The people prostrated themselves as they listened, all of them calling him an immortal envoy.

Only the person welcomed by Heaven's Design Pavilion to oversee the Grand Selection and mend the Dragon Vein was called an immortal envoy! Did this stinking piece of shit deserve the title?

Xi Ping clenched his fist as he watched, wishing he could get up to some haunting.

The bullshit “immortal voice” came to a temporary pause, enjoying the adulation of the crowd. A short, skinny man with a stooped back devoutly poured tea for him, eyes radiating zealous light. He was about to bring it up personally, then shrank back out of a sense of inferiority. He brushed his own clothes a few times. Suddenly, he saw the girl who was furtively making a knotted bag. His eyes lit up. He beckoned with his hand. “A-Hua, come over here!”

Xi Ping frowned and reached out to hold her back. “Slow down.”

But his body was far away in the East Sea. He couldn’t touch real people.

The girl stood up uneasily, not even noticing when her half-finished knotted bag fell to the ground. She passed right by Xi Ping’s hand to step forward and mumbled, “Second Uncle.”

The short, skinny man gave her the cup of tea and ordered her to look after the shameless old evil cultivator. “Go on, offer the immortal envoy a cup of tea.”

Then he brazenly turned to the evil cultivator and said, currying favor, “This is my niece, my big brother’s child. She’s pretty decent looking, and she’s quick-witted, not yet betrothed.”

The evil cultivator’s gaze shot out from beneath the rag covered his face and licked the girl like a snake’s tongue. He seemed to be smiling.

The short, skinny man was wild with joy. He gave the girl an impatient shove.

She stumbled helplessly, trembling, and fell beside the evil cultivator, then was grabbed by an ice cold hand covered in snakeskin scars.

What an outrage!

Xi Ping stood up at once, but a voice calling for Tai Sui sounded somewhere else. He flew away, pulled in that direction.

Wait, I don’t want to go! I have to kill that bastard first!

But it wasn’t up to him. He was only a consciousness being dragged here and there by sham shrines. The girl’s panicked gaze sought help all around, and the numb onlookers answered her with empty, gratified smiles. The colorful cord knotted bag she had just half finished knotting was trampled by countless feet... The cheaply dyed cords were as humble as dust.

Xi Ping's eyes popped. But he couldn't work a miracle.

His curses had no effect, and neither did his blessings.

The wind swept him away. Xi Ping attempted to remember this place, remember the evil cultivator who had dared to use Tai Sui's name. In the future, he would cut him down. But he soon found that this was futile. He had no idea where anywhere was.

Wherever he looked, it was about the same. The stench of evil practices was everywhere.

The recuperative powers of the hidden bones of the ancient demonic god were astonishing. His reestablished spiritual foundation began to draw back Xi Ping's drifting consciousness.

The unbearable noise became more and more distant. Xi Ping seemed to miss a step in a dream. He fell all at once back into his body.

He abruptly opened his eyes. He was still inside that immortal tool in the shape of a leaf. The immortal tool was covered in cracks. It shattered at a touch.

Xi Ping climbed out and found that he was on the seabed of the East Sea.

It was the seabed, but he wasn't in the water. The nearby water seemed to be kept back by an invisible high wall. Occasionally a whirlpool would approach, then leave at a touch. When some foreign object hit it, faint inscriptions would flash on the invisible "wall." These inscriptions made you not dare to look at them directly. Xi Ping was horrified—shifu had taught him that only the legendary first-class inscriptions would make you feel the force of their might.

Oh, right, where was shifu?

Xi Ping started to run, following the inscriptions. He vaguely remembered that shifu had fallen into the reincarnation wood forest...

He soon found the reincarnation wood forest, but after walking circles around it like a headless fly, he still couldn't find a trace of Zhi Xiu.

"Shifu! Shi..."

Xi Ping abruptly came to a halt. On the other side of the reincarnation wood forest, the mysterious first-class inscriptions surrounded an empty space. There were three people sitting on the ground around a deep pit one chi square.

The pit seemed to go right down to the center of the earth. Because it was too deep, it appeared to be pure black. Looking fixedly at it would make you dizzy.

Of the three people sitting in a ring around the deep hole, there was a middle-aged person with his eyes closed, a round-faced and ordinary-looking man, and a delicate youth whose mouth was sealed with white satin.

When Xi Ping barged in, the three of them turned their heads toward him simultaneously. Two gazes fell on Xi Ping. In an instant, it was as if someone had shone a light straight through him.

Right, Xi Ping remembered. After he had broken through shifu's prohibition, he had sensed a strong aura. At the time, he had stamped the hither seal on his spiritual foundation without a second thought...so whom had he summoned?

The middle-aged person whose eyes were closed beckoned to him and called out, "Come."

These three seemed less alive than the divine image in Southern Sage Temple. Xi Ping had an impulse to arrange incense and present offerings before the three of them. He didn't dare to act rashly. In the posture of offering incense, he gave each one a bow, then said, "Seniors, I am Xi Ping of Xuanyin's Flying Jade Peak..."

The middle-aged man smiled. "I know. Jingzhai is my disciple."

Xi Ping was startled: the Dignitary of Fate High Elder!

Right, the Dignitary of Fate High Elder who was said to stand guard over the Sea of Stars didn't open his eyes outside of the Sea of Stars. So the other two who were sitting with him as equals...

The round-faced man nodded and said, "I am the Dignitary of Rites."

Saying so, he pointed to the youth whose mouth was sealed and said, "He is the Dignitary of Rule."

The rarely seen Dignitary of Rites who was behind the main hall of the Xuanyin Mountains' Principal Peak, High Elder Zhao Yin; and the Dignitary of Rule who was said to always be in seclusion, Lin Zongyi.

Xi Ping's heart, suspended in midair, landed with a thump. The three shed skin elders of the Xuanyin Mountains!

Never mind the great demon from the Impassable Sea, they were a sure bet even if the sky fell and the earth cracked.

So he looked eagerly at the Dignitary of Fate. "Elder, has my shifu been..."

The Dignitary of Fate extended a hand. A sword that had been smashed to pieces floated over his emaciated palm.

Xi Ping clearly saw the sword's hilt and the engraving of its name. His mind instantly roared: Zhaoting!

The same Zhaoting that had had smacked him on the back countless times when he had started to doze off, that had hung over his head when he was just starting to learn to fly a sword—the same Zhaoting that was just like shizun's hand!

Zhaoting was shifu's vital weapon. If a vital weapon broke, then...

For a moment, Xi Ping couldn't catch his breath.

Then he heard the Dignitary of Fate say, “The sword aura of Jingzhai’s last thrust touched the edge of the shed skin stage. The sword aura reached it, but his cultivation level was still far away, and that is why his vital weapon broke—I suppose you know what the shed skin stage entails?”

In fact, Xi Ping did know, though right now he couldn’t speak: Luo-shixiong had taught them at the Latent Cultivation Temple that the biggest difference between “shed skin” and “ascended spirit” was that the way of the shed skin cultivator had already been accepted by heaven and earth, becoming one of the three thousand paths of the Great Way. Past the boundary of the shed skin stage, a cultivator would already be halfway assimilated into heaven and earth—for example, Zhi Xiu was the Dignitary of Fate High Elder’s direct disciple, and the Dignitary of Fate’s lineage basically had only one heir per generation; reasonably speaking, Xi Ping actually ought to have called the Dignitary of Fate “shizu”; but faced with this middle-aged man, the word “shizu” didn’t even come to his mind. If his shifu had been speaking so pompously, Xi Ping would have answered back rudely by now. But at the moment, while he was obviously anxious enough to want to crack a whip behind the high elder’s words, he still didn’t dare to rush him.

At a uniform speed, the Dignitary of Fate slowly said, “That stroke of the sword has already left a mark on the way of the sword. He is not yet destined to die. He might be described as gaining a blessing through misfortune.”

Xi Ping only heard the words “not yet destined to die”; his emotions fluctuated sharply. He nearly broke his spine letting out a sigh of relief.

Only then was he in the mood to back up and think over what the Dignitary of Fate had said, struggling for ages to understand. Afraid of getting the wrong idea, he asked, “So you’re saying that my shifu registered his sword with the three thousand paths of the Great Way...like how once you’ve deposited your silver in the treasury in exchange for silver certificates, you can report a loss and be paid back for damaged banknotes?”

Since ancient times, the people of Wan had been tasteful and reserved, deliberately leaving empty spaces in art and writing; they did not speak in long and pompous speeches but only came right to the point. Only a small child or a barely literate member of the lower class would pick words apart and seek verification like this. But the Dignitary of Fate didn’t scorn him for having such a shallow understanding of cultivation. He nodded patiently and went along with what he had said: “Only it’s a little complicated to report the loss and be paid back. His vital sword has been damaged, and his consciousness has been seriously injured. I have already sent him back to Flying Jade Peak to enter seclusion.”

Xi Ping thought about it, then asked, “Then what about that...that demon whose name no one can say?”

“He’s here.” The round-faced Dignitary of Rites Zhao Yin pointed at the pitch-black abyss the three of them were surrounding. “This is a demon seed.”

While the Dignitary of Fate Elder Zhang was rather amiable, his face looked forlorn. The Dignitary of Rule Elder Lin simply had his mouth sealed with cloth; he probably wasn’t ready to talk.

Only the Dignitary of Rites Elder Zhao was a little more human than the other two; when he smiled, he even seemed rather benevolent.

Elder Zhao said, “This demon’s body was made from the resentment of the Great War of Gods and Demons. The masters of the five great sects were powerless against him, so they brought in a demon subduer. Had his demonic soul been permitted to become complete and break the seal, things would have gone badly. The human world no longer has full moon great masters or demon subduers. It would have been a catastrophe. When you by chance broke the demon seal ahead of time, it was like...tearing open a silkworm cocoon ahead of time. The moth inside could not fly yet. This won us a chance of survival. Child, you may claim great credit.”

Xi Ping put on a very decent false smile and said “you flatter me”—Elder Zhao was clearly imitating the tone that the Dignitary of Fate Elder Zhang had just used to speak to him.

But Elder Zhang had spoken that way out of consideration for his soaring and plummeting emotions as he worried about his shifu, while Elder Zhao’s speech made him feel uncomfortable; he seemed to be condescending to explain something to an idiot.

Xi Ping asked, “Is there some other lurking danger?”

The Dignitary of Fate Elder Zhang Jue said, “Beneath the Impassable Sea, the demon host has run wild for eight hundred years, and countless natural spiritual bones have been buried here. It will be hard for their resentment and hatred to dissipate. It will take the East Sea some time to digest it. We will stand guard here.”

“Oh, that’s all right, then,” said Xi Ping.

Earlier, the broken Zhaoting had given him such a scare that his legs had gone a little weak. Now, as he stood, his knees were still shaking uncontrollably.

In front of three shed skin elders, he was only a witless ant. Xi Ping presumed that these three elderly men wouldn't nitpick an ant's manners, so he went ahead and gracelessly sat down crosslegged on the ground.

“Now it's time to talk about me,” Xi Ping said. “How are you three elders planning on dealing with me?”

CHAPTER 66 - The Mountain Falls (Final)

The Xuanyin Mountains were normally managed by the thirty-six ascended spirit peak masters, and absent a great matter like an internal conflict or turbulence in the Sea of Stars, even those peak masters usually wouldn't see the shed skin elders.

Shifu had already been sent back to Flying Jade Peak, but the elders had kept him here alone. Xi Ping couldn't think of anything they could want to talk to him about. It probably couldn't have been just for the sake of praising him for taking a shovel to the Zhou family ancestral tomb in the nick of time.

When he had broken through shifu's prohibition, Xi Ping had known what he would have to face. He was ready.

There was nothing to regret about his own choices. He had been purely forced into taking the ancient demonic god's hidden bones; there had been nothing deliberate about it. If the elders wanted to punish him, he would have plenty to say. When it came down to it, apart from privately giving Wei Chengxiang a bag of spiritual stones and permitting her to walk the path to becoming an evil cultivator, he had nothing on his conscience. So what if he had wanted to kill Zhao Zhenwei? The evidence was conclusive, and the guy hadn't been much of a prize, either; if Zhao Zhenwei's own father showed up, even he wouldn't have the face to demand repayment from Xi Ping.

The Dignitary of Rites Elder Zhao paused. He looked at Zhang Jue.

Zhang Jue always kept his eyes closed; it was unclear whether he was awake or sleeping. He didn't respond.

So Zhao Yin amiably asked Xi Ping, "Are you aware of the full history behind those ancient demonic god's hidden bones that you carry?"

Xi Ping figured that they weren't good news at all, or else Zhi Xiu with his nature of "there's nothing that can't be spoken of" wouldn't have gone straight to putting a prohibition on him.

"Not especially," he said lightly, and calmly tried to clear shifu of any responsibility. "On Flying Jade Peak, even my shifu couldn't work out what the hell those things were good for—apart from being able to listen in on evil cultivators talking. That's why he sent me to investigate the evil cultivators. Who'd have thought that I'd run into the other half of the skeleton in the Impassable Sea and it'd come chasing after me without another word. It nearly killed me."

Elder Zhao seemed not to have noticed what he was doing. He nodded and said, “These are very old matters. They are in fact rather distant from you juniors.

“The original owner of the hidden bones you carry was called Yuan Hui. Tradition has it that he was cut down and dropped into the Impassable Sea by the Southern Sage. In fact, that isn’t the case. When I was young, I heard the venerable Southern Sage himself say that in fact he had no way to defeat Yuan Hui back then. That ancient demonic god died in a heavenly tribulation because heaven and earth could not abide him. While living, his cultivation level was extremely high, no worse than the Southern Sage’s, but he had gone along an evil way. Since his hidden bones reemerged into the world, the Bell of Tribulation has rung three times, more than during the last several hundred years. The bones fixed their attention on you from outside Jinping City. Up to the present, you could say that every step you’ve taken has been through chance and coincidence. With our level of cultivation, we are unable to see the ancient demonic god’s way clearly. We only know that it has been secretly altering the fortunes of heaven and earth.”

Xi Ping nodded. He had used the reincarnation wood to bring the elders here. The elders must know perfectly well by now how he had gotten the hidden bones.

Elder Zhao continued, sighing, “Establishing a foundation after a hundred years already indicates superior natural endowments. Even your Duanrui-shishu with her innate spiritual bones took most of a decade to get there after opening her spiritual eyes, entering the inner sect, and inheriting a Way of the Heart. Establishing a foundation less than a year after beginning to cultivate is unheard of. Too great haste has always been a calamity, not a blessing. You have mistakenly entered the way of the demonic god. You have no Way of the Heart on your spiritual foundation. This cannot be sustained in the long run. Fortunately, it’s early days yet. There is still room for you to escape.”

Xi Ping stared. With all the evil schemes he was brewing, he was forced to acknowledge now that everything Elder Zhao had said was reasonable.

“Please tell me what I ought to do, elder.”

Zhao Yin said, “Remove those spiritual bones.”

Xi Ping: “...”

Xi Ping had heard the story of Lancang’s Hui Xiangjun having her spiritual bones removed and her cultivation failing. The removal of spiritual bones had always been the immortal sects’ heaviest punishment. Elder Zhao’s words were tantamount to saying, “There’s a tumor growing in your head, the prognosis looks bad. Fortunately, it's early days yet. There's still time to chop off your head.”

A sneer was about to appear on his lips when he heard the Dignitary of Fate Zhang Jue suddenly put in a word: “The half-skeleton of hidden bones in his body had already fused with his own true bones when he opened his spiritual eyes, never mind now, when he has established a foundation. An established foundation cultivator has already formed his heart, fixed his way. Removing his spiritual bones will shatter his vital weapon. At best he will never be able to cultivate again. At worst, he will be utterly destroyed.”

Zhao Yin said, “He is unlike others. Others form their hearts and fix their ways when they establish a foundation, but his way has been forced on him by the hidden bones. He himself can't say what way it is. How can you call it forming his heart? Removing his spiritual bones may not necessarily damage his spirit.”

Shaking his head, Zhang Jue said, “There is no precedent for this. It is only ‘not necessarily.’ Matters concerning the ancient demonic god do not appear in the Sea of Stars. Neither you nor I know what the outcome of removing his spiritual bones will be. Though he has no Way of the Heart, he does have cultivation. Even mortals with natural spiritual bones cannot live long after losing their bones, so what will happen to him?”

“The Sea of Stars may not be able to see matters involving the ancient demonic god clearly, but it is still an established truth that ‘what accords with heaven’s will is auspicious, what is contrary to heaven’s will is inauspicious.’” Though Zhao Yin was debating with Zhang Jue, his eyes were watching Xi Ping. He said, “For example, forcibly removing a mortal’s natural spiritual bones is ‘contrary.’ Naturally the victims will die young, unless their spiritual bones can be restored to them, returning to what ‘accords’...”

Hearing this, Xi Ping’s heart gave a fierce leap. Ignoring everything else, he said, “If a mortal loses their natural spiritual bones, can they still be returned?”

Zhao Yin nodded. “As long as they aren’t dead.”

Xi Ping said, “So how...”

Zhang Jue interrupted him: “That’s beside the point.”

Zhao Yin’s expression didn’t change. “Shiyong did this unintentionally. The demonic god’s hidden bones forced themselves onto him. For him, having the spiritual bones is what is ‘contrary,’ while getting rid of them will be restoring what is natural. It is evident at a glance what accords and what is contrary. Regardless of what the outcome of removing the spiritual bones is, surely you aren't going to tell me it wouldn't be better than letting him continue on a wrong path?"

Zhang Jue turned to ask Elder Lin, "What does the Dignitary of Rule say?"

With the gazes of both Elder Zhang and Elder Zhao on him, Elder Lin pulled the seal over his mouth down a little. It turned out the old fellow wasn't mute.

Emphasizing each word, Lin Zongyi said, "Yuan Hui's hidden bones are inauspicious."

When he opened his mouth, Xi Ping felt all his bones give a fierce shake and nearly jump out of his body on the spot.

No wonder Lin Zongyi kept his mouth sealed. Every word that came out of his mouth was a judgment, taking effect at once. Xi Ping had a sense that if Elder Lin had found him guilty of a crime not even death could atone for, he might have been struck down by a bolt of lightning on the spot. He didn't make a sound, only listened to all his bones clattering, as if he were being squeezed in the palm of a big invisible hand.

The folds in Zhang Jue's brow deepened. Zhao Yin cast his eyes down indifferently.

But Lin Zongyi paused briefly, then went on: “The great service this disciple has rendered is indelible. He may not be forced to undergo the punishment of the removal of spiritual bones.”

As soon as he said this, the pressure on Xi Ping’s body disappeared. He was wholly uninjured, but all his strength was exhausted. He narrowly kept himself from falling face first by holding himself up with his hands.

Elder Lin treasured his words like gold. After these two sentences, he resealed his mouth; he became one more a mute, keeping himself to his mouth seal.

“Lin-shixiong’s word is final, so this matter has been decided,” Zhang Jue said. “Shiyong, it is up to you whether the spiritual bones stay or go.”

Zhao Yin also turned to Xi Ping and said, nodding, “As it ought to be.”

Xi Ping was silent for a long time. Finally, he said, “I didn’t finish what I was saying earlier. I would like to ask Elder Zhao to instruct me on a certain matter. You said that a mortal whose innate spiritual bones have been removed can have them restored. How can this be done?”

Zhao Yin answered, “It only needs a cultivator of the ascended spirit level or higher to keep the meridians from breaking during the opening of spiritual eyes, as happened with you. Then, at that opportune moment, the spiritual bones can be merged back into the original body.”

It had to be an ascended spirit cultivator or above...

Xi Ping threw his head back slightly, glancing toward the nearby reincarnation wood forest. The reincarnation wood forest at the bottom of the sea was moving without a wind, the limbs and leaves shaking incessantly. He clenched his teeth, and the reincarnation wood trees, like his own tense back, instantly calmed down.

“The rest doesn’t matter, but my san...His Highness Prince Zhuang’s spiritual bones were the last to be placed by the Zhou family into the Impassable Sea. He didn’t voluntarily choose to allow the demon host to suck his marrow. All these years, the Impassable Sea has kept him silent. It wasn’t that he didn’t want to expose that awful place.”

Zhao Yin said, “I know.”

Xi Ping thought, It doesn’t matter that you know.

He turned to look at the Dignitary of Rule Lin Zongyi.

But Elder Lin didn't say a word.

“Poor child. This is indeed a difficult choice.” Zhao Yin sighed and turned to Zhang Jue. “I don't believe this matter is urgent. How about this— Zhang-shixiong, you seal his meridians, and when Jingzhai's wounds have healed and he leaves seclusion, we will make a ruling. After all, this is his only direct disciple.”

Xi Ping slowly looked at Elder Zhao's kindly-looking face, and the blood pumping through his heart turned to ice—evidently it was no good trying to be clever in front of a shed skin elder.

Zhao Yin clearly knew what Zhi Xiu had done. Fair enough. What was Xi Ping? It was an insult to the high elders' precious energy to give him a second look. It took a two-hundred-year-old sword cultivator whose thrust of the sword had touched the boundary of the shed skin stage to be worth them wasting their spit.

For a moment, out of nowhere, Xi Ping thought of Duanrui-shishu.

After the forebear who had died for a cause, she was the first instance of innate spiritual bones in the whole Zhou clan. It was easy to imagine how pampered she must have been from childhood. A precious princess like this, forced into the way of clarity—she was no human-shaped punching bag, either; hadn't she resisted back then?

Back then, she must also have been questioned by the sect in this kindly fashion, in this same calm atmosphere: Are you Great Wan's princess, or the Zhou clan's princess?

The Zhou family possesses all under heaven. With Xuanyin Mountain to rely on, they are sure to continue throughout the ages, generation upon generation. With the imperial family's power, it is easy to control Xuanyin's Grand Selection. If they are not held back, over time, it is certain that they will become the sole great family. When that time comes, will they still be able to follow the old teachings of the demon subduers, value the nation above all? If you say they will, then, Zhou Xueru, won't you be the one to prove it to the immortal mountain now?

In Xuanyin Mountain, everyone had a Way of the Heart; some were brave, some were pure, some cherished the nation. Elder Lin was just, Elder Zhao spoke of what accorded with heaven's will... In sum, Xuanyin Mountain couldn't produce those comic characters in operas who were base and shameless, who bullied others for their own ends. Everything had to be his own choice.

Right now, he had rendered an indelible great service, but if he wouldn't give up his cultivation, insisted on holding on to the ancient demonic god's hidden bones, would he still have rendered an indelible great service?

Lax teaching is the fault of the teacher. Zhi Xiu had wished to cover up the hidden bones with a prohibition. When he came back, would he be able to escape the accusation of letting his disciple run free and fostering a demon?

What position would his shizun be in when the time came?

Never mind that there was no telling how long shifu would be in seclusion. It might be a hundred years...and even if it was only three years or five, there was someone who couldn't wait that long.

Starting from when he had concealed Jiangli's birthday jade, the whole way here, he hadn't consulted anyone's opinion. Why should he let someone else make the decision to wind it all up? Even if he were facing a coffin, he would still have to choose to lie down in it himself.

Xi Ping suddenly smiled. "There's no need."

The three elders simultaneously turned their heads toward him.

Xi Ping took a deep breath and sat up straight. He said, "His Highness Prince Zhuang's constitution is special."

Zhao Yin responded, “That’s correct. Natural spiritual bones cannot coexist with a paramount spiritual sense, unless the individual opens his spiritual eyes and becomes a half-immortal. In the history of this nation, there has never been an emperor of the mortal world who practiced cultivation. But in his circumstances, even if he becomes a half-immortal, he is unlikely to have a lifespan as long as that of others. If he is willing to accept certain restrictions, it would be possible to make an exception.”

Xi Ping instantly distinguished several layers of meaning in his words.

“That may not be necessary. It will depend on whether he is willing to sit on the throne.” Saying so, he took out the mustard seed that held Prince Zhuang’s spiritual bones. “Thank you, elder. I have nothing else to say.”

This time last year, he had still been fooling around at the House of Overflowing Splendor under the name of Mr. Yu Gan. His parents had been fretting about how to make him settle down, get married, and embark upon a career. No one in his whole family had had a thought of that selection card.

A year later, he had attended the Latent Cultivation Temple, gone into Demon Country, been broken to pieces, and even established a foundation. It was all like a wild dream.

Even in his dreams he wouldn't have been able to imagine that he would see General Zhi, fly a sword on Flying Jade Peak, and by coincidence break san-ge out of his hopeless game. It truly had been a busy year.

The immortal path...

He raised his head and looked up. In the depths of the sea, he couldn't see the light of day.

In fact, you couldn't see the light of day on dry land, either. The legendary sages who had ascended to heaven never spoke, and the gang that was left behind...ha.

What about this immortal path was worth clinging to?

"The damn things aren't mine to begin with. They just keep chasing after me without any shame." Xi Ping withdrew his gaze and spreads his hands carelessly. He said, smiling, "Go ahead, remove them."

Wei Chengxiang had veiled her face and was staying in a little fishing village on the shore of the East Sea.

In the middle of the night, as she was wrapped up in wild dreams, she suddenly heard refreshing qin music playing in her ears.

She knew nothing about music and couldn't tell whether it was good or bad. She only felt that when that music sounded in her ears, all the secret anxieties and alarms in her heart calmed down. Her muscles and bones, not yet accustomed to being scoured by the spiritual energy of heaven and earth, suddenly stopped aching.

Wei Chengxiang abruptly opened her eyes. "Uncle, you're back!"

The music stopped. "Hey."

"Where did you go before? I kept looking for you, I..."

"I went to dig up a grave. There was a seal on the damn place, I couldn't contact anyone on the outside. I know you've opened your spiritual eyes. That's good." This person's voice sounded directly in her spirit, his tone just as lively as when he had egged her on into pretending to be a holy woman in a den of evil cultivators. "What do you think of the qin?"

Toward outsiders, Wei Chengxiang seemed like a hedgehog, but toward those she knew, it was just the same as the way she had tolerated Chunying—no matter how unpleasantly the person behaved, she would only speak nicely. Without any hesitation, she praised, "It's lovely. It sounds better than all the qin music on the Lingyang River!"

The person in the reincarnation wood bragged shamelessly: “Of course. Those musicians are worthless. My qin can turn a donkey into a famous singer.”

Wei Chengxiang: “...”

Then she heard him continue, “Though this may be the only performance. A qin dug up out of a grave is very inauspicious. I’m playing it for you as a treat. I won’t play it again. You’re a half-immortal now, the same as Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s walkers in the mortal world. No one will be able to casually bully you again.”

Wei Chengxiang went blank, suddenly having a bad feeling. “Uncle, what do you mean?”

“Didn’t I say so before? You aren’t a little girl anymore. It’s inappropriate for me to always be watching you.” The person in the reincarnation wood laughed. “And I’m too lazy to keep watching you. The circumstances were special before. Now you’ve gotten past your obsession. Take care of yourself in the future.”

Wei Chengxiang’s eyes opened wide. “Uncle, wait...”

“Walk the path ahead on your own. We won’t meet again.”

Wei Chengxiang stood up at once and seized the reincarnation wood.

She called out, prayed, and finally, at wit’s end, she once again spilled blood on the reincarnation wood amulet.

But there was no answer.

She didn’t hear that voice again.

Meanwhile, Xi Yue had returned to the southern mines along with the spiritual stone shipment convoy. When Xi Ping’s voice suddenly came from the dragon-taming chain, the half-puppet abruptly rolled over and stood up.

“Everything’s fine, I’m going back to the inner sect,” the scoundrel young master said to him. “But I have other things to do, so I don’t have time to take care of a weak little encumbrance like you. So, anyway, I’m entrusting you to Pang-shixiong. Don’t be polite about eating his spiritual stones. Tell him to go to the Marquis Manor or the Prince Zhuang Manor to get them back.”

Xi Yue: “...”

Was he making any sense?

The resentment that had been held down by worry instantly surged up. He wanted to bite him again.

“Xi Yue.” The scoundrel young master suddenly became serious. “Xi Yue was my little brother’s name. He never grew up, and you...you also nearly died young. But you were a little luckier than him. Whether your arms and legs are made of wood or iron, at any rate you’ve survived. Even I haven’t treated you like a straw child or a puppet. If anyone dares to in the future, kill them for me.”

Xi Yue’s pupils contracted sharply. Where are you? What are you saying, you...

Crack. There was a chill on Xi Yue’s neck. His scoundrel young master had somehow improved his skills. Across a vast distance, he had still been able to break the dragon-taming chain.

When a dragon-taming chain had been crushed by its master, there was no way to repair it.

The billowing waves on the canal pushed away the haze of the southern mines. He no longer had a master.

BOOK 3 - Passing Through Tribulation

CHAPTER 67 - Indignant Cicadas (1)

Both Xi Yue and A-Xiang had in one way or another gotten where they were now because of him, so Xi Ping owed them an explanation. He wasn't going to take the time to worry about anyone else—Xi Ping thought it was rather fortunate that when the great demon had been about to break out of the East Sea, he hadn't had time to say anything to san-ge, or else it would be truly hard to cover up.

He used his left hand to write a crooked note on the white jade proximal: "I am alive and well. Take care and do not worry about me. I am returning to Flying Jade Peak."

The note looked like it had been written by a seriously injured person. As for what kind of injury and why he hadn't gone through the spiritual bones and used his spirit to tell him directly, let san-ge make his own guesses; anything else Xi Ping said would be a mistake.

Anyway, there was a consensus among mortals that as long as you were still breathing, the immortals could save you. With that premise, whatever san-ge guessed, he wouldn't be too heartbroken.

This way, if removing the spiritual bones went smoothly, he would go back to being a mortal. First he would go to Prince Zhuang Manor to take his beating; then he would continue being a wealthy lordling. In the future, he would marry a beauty who wouldn't disgrace the family so he could keep the family line going. When shifu left seclusion, he could send his sons and grandsons to be decorations at Flying Jade Peak.

In case... Whatever "in case" there was, he could pretend shifu had taken him back to the inner sect to go into seclusion. Immortals, after all, could be in seclusion for a hundred years, long enough to fool a mortal's longing.

The rest, Xuanyin Mountain would smooth over. He had handled the situation appropriately enough.

Elder Zhang took out a stone only slightly larger than a broad bean, dull grey. Looking closely, Xi Ping saw that the stone was actually transparent, but its whole surface had been polished into smooth hexagons, as if it had been inset with hundreds upon thousands of little mirrors. Each mirror reflected light, so the stone seemed clouded.

"This is a star stone that comes from the Sea of Stars," Elder Zhang said. "The punishment of the removal of spiritual bones normally falls onto a master. You opened your spiritual eyes too recently. Your consciousness won't be steady enough. You can temporarily shelter in the star stone."

Zhao Yin said, “When your consciousness hides in the star stone, your sensations will be cut off. You won’t feel pain. The three of us will oversee the process. We will temporarily seal your spiritual eyes. We will not harm your meridians. We’ll use the best quality bone jade from the Beijue Mountains to replace your spiritual bones. It is tougher and more resistant than real bone. You won’t have any difficulty getting around in the future... Is there anything else to explain?”

“Nothing,” Xi Ping said, seeming careless. “I’ll have to trouble you elders to send me back home to Jinping afterward... Fortunately I haven’t been cultivating long.”

Fortunately he wasn’t yet a hundred-year-old immortal. His grandmother in her seventies was still living. His parents were concerned that he was holding up his future prospects. They didn’t say it, but inwardly they were in fact hoping that he would come back. The Marquis telling him before he had left “you’ll have no protection in the immortal sect, don’t cause trouble” still reverberated in his ears. Fortunately these people were fastened to his feet and could drag him back into the mortal world to live as a mortal in peace.

He thought rebelliously: if that hadn’t been the case, then however powerless he was today, he would have to stab right through that bullshit Sea of Stars in the future.

“Quite right.” This time, Zhao Yin didn’t see what wickedness was brewing beneath the young master’s skin. “These things pose a looming danger for the nation and for you yourself. The earlier you’re rid of them, the better.”

Zhang Jue sighed to himself, then lightly tapped the center of Xi Ping’s brow. Xi Ping’s vision went dark. His consciousness poured at once into the star stone.

The countless little mirrors on the star stone reflected countless versions of him throughout his life—Xi Ping’s own memories of infancy were vague, but all the little details of peeing and shitting appeared clearly in the star stone. He seemed to have returned to his carefree teenage years. Waking up, he was once again in the Yongning Marquis Manor, which was transformed by spring breezes. In a daze, he rolled over and fell off of a stone bench onto the ground covered in fallen petals and sneezed from the smell...some public nuisance must have swept them into a pile there on purpose to catch him.

Madam Cui’s maid, holding back laughter, ran over to call him, saying that her mistress was calling the young master to come taste some freshly made snacks. Xi Ping, covered in fragrance, had to get up. He had quite a few veiled complaints against his mother’s tricks, which hadn’t changed in twenty years. Each time he had to pretend to be taken in, let himself be “coaxed,” then dress up in all kinds of ridiculous outfits to pose for his mother's drawings... She never changed the wording, as if he were some kind of greedy guts.

Seeing that the star stone had his consciousness firmly wrapped up, Zhao Yin nodded and said, "Not even an ascended spirit could struggle free of the life inside the star stone. Let's begin."

Zhang Jue ignored him. He sat to one side, holding the star stone that contained Xi Ping's consciousness in his palm, standing guard.

Since he had entered the dim star stone, it had taken on a coating of white fluorescence, like the fog lamps of Jinping City—only a young man just out of the cottage could provoke this kind of light from the star stone: only recently grown up, with his heart still at home, his loves and hatreds both shallow—the star stone would be as limpid as a mountain stream.

How long it had been since the immortal sect had seen such a thing.

Zhao Yin wasted no more words. He molded a few inscriptions out of thin air and placed them over all of Xi Ping's senses. Then a realistic human skeleton appeared from the palm of his hand.

Xi Ping floated in midair, and the skeleton quickly adjusted its size beside him. In hardly any time, it was identical to his own skeleton. Next, the skeleton made of bone jade turned into white light, which “spread” itself flat over Xi Ping’s body, slowly seeping into his skin and flesh. Meanwhile, dazzling silver light “poured” from Xi Ping’s back, as if he had grown a pair of quicksilver wings.

As the spiritual bones were forced out of his body, they gradually took on the form of a skeleton.

Indeed, Elder Zhang very meticulously avoided his meridians. Two full ke later, when the demon seed on the ground had shrunk to half its previous size, Xi Ping’s spiritual bones had at last been fully substituted by the bone jade.

There didn’t seem to be anything wrong with him. Only his aura had suddenly changed. The somewhat unsteady spiritual energy around him had gone with the spiritual bones. He had become a mortal.

Zhao Yin inspected his spirit. “With no Way of the Heart, his spiritual foundation has naturally collapsed upon losing his essence. Otherwise, he is unharmed. Soon enough we will be able to restore his consciousness.”

Normally, the removal of spiritual bones was nowhere near this gentle. This was Xuanyin Mountain according dignity to a disciple who “understood the big picture.”

The wrinkles in Zhang Jue's forehead relaxed slightly. The Dignitary of Fate High Elder reached out and pulled over Xi Ping, who was floating in midair, as if he suspected Zhao Yin of tampering with Xi Ping in some way and he was planning on personally inspecting Xi Ping's meridians.

Zhao Yin didn't squabble over this trivial detail with him. He lowered his eyelids and pretended not to see, his gaze falling on the ancient demonic god's spiritual bones.

Perhaps it was his mistake, but it seemed to him that there was a peculiar smile on the skeleton's face.

How could a skeleton smile?

But as soon as Zhang Jue touched Xi Ping's wrist, it was as if he had accidentally grabbed a seven-stringed qin.

The strings twanged as soon as they were touched, letting out a drone.

As soon as this human-shaped qin sounded, the whole seal at the bottom of the sea shook. The demon seed that had been subdued by three shed skin masters working together instantly swelled to twice its size!

As if he had been burned, Zhang Jue quickly drew his hand back. Without hesitation, Zhao Yin smashed the removed spiritual bones.

But cracking noises came from Xi Ping's body. His flesh sank and twisted bit by bit, then returned to its original form, as if all the bones in his body had broken and regrown! Then he seemed to become a lamp. Fine white light trickled down from him continuously. When the white light hit the ground, it became shard after shard of bone jade.

Zhao Yin had spent two ke substituting his spiritual bones with bone jade, and he spent two ke "spitting out" the top quality bone jade after crushing it.

The bone jade mixed with the dust of the spiritual bones on the ground, and another set of spiritual bones grew inside Xi Ping's body!

The young man's aura suddenly altered greatly: this young man who had evidently established a foundation hardly any time ago had drawn the remaining spiritual energy in the East Sea into a newly-created essence and broken through into the middle established foundation stage!

Lin Zongyi abruptly stood up, personally rolled up his sleeves to reveal a pair of emaciated hands, and once again removed Xi Ping's spiritual bones.

His actions were far firmer and rougher than Zhao Yin's. It only took him one ke to remove the spiritual bones, simply smashing Xi Ping's spiritual foundation.

The smile on the face of the removed spiritual bones was increasingly evident. The angle of the lower jaw was too great, no longer matching Xi Ping's appearance... As soon as the bones left him, without waiting for Lin Zongyi to act, they went to pieces. Then there was a repeat of what had just happened. Xi Ping's body once again grew another set of spiritual bones.

This time it only took one ke, and his aura came right up to the late established foundation stage!

Meanwhile, as if bouncing back the roughness with which Lin Zongyi had removed the bones, the demonic energy in the agitated demon seed rose sharply. The inscriptions all around flickered. In the distance, the reincarnation wood forest grew wildly!

Xi Ping's consciousness was obviously residing in the star stone just fine, but his body turned slowly in midair and gave Lin Zongyi a mocking smile identical to the one on the spiritual bones.

For a moment, Zhao Yin had the impression that they weren't removing spiritual bones; they were personally helping the ancient demonic god return to the human world!

“Yuan Hui’s way of death has no Way of the Heart. Each time he was destroyed was an opportunity. After they were crushed, the hidden bones would regrow flesh.” Zhao Yin quickly reckoned on his fingers. “Why would it be the exact opposite with him—the body regrowing spiritual bones? Could it be the his spiritual bones are not the true hidden bones...? So where are the demonic god’s hidden bones concealed?”

The three shed skin high elders looked at each other in dismay for a moment. Suddenly, without warning, Lin Zongyi reached out and aimed a blow at Xi Ping.

Zhang Jue quickly stood up, but it was already too late.

Though Xi Ping was currently in the late established foundation stage, it was after all only the established foundation stage. A hit from this shed skin elder, who was nearly as old as the earth and whose every speech was like a heavenly commandment, scattered him like a puff of smoke. Before his flesh could disperse, it simply turned to dust.

Zhang Jue said, “What are you doing!”

But Lin Zongyi and Zhao Yin simultaneously looked at the star stone in Zhang Jue's hand.

A cultivator's consciousness could find a temporary resting place, but it would only be temporary. In fact, it was about the same as a mortal breathing in anesthetic gas. Once the body was destroyed, the consciousness would immediately be annihilated.

In other words, right now, the star stone ought to have become grey once more.

But the star stone in Zhang Jue's hand was still glittering brightly.

Zhang Jue also realized something. He quickly hid the star stone in his palm.

Zhao Yin said grimly, "Zhang-shixiong, these hidden bones... If my guess is correct, they are attached to his consciousness."

The way of death was born out of death. It had no Way of the Heart. It was visible but not tangible. Before, they had only thought that this young disciple had been possessed by the demonic god's hidden bones; they hadn't thought that he had managed to inherit them completely.

In other words, Xi Ping hadn't entered the "way of death" by mistake; he himself was the "way of death." No wonder that when his hither seal had smashed his own spiritual foundation, his consciousness had been able to return calmly once the spiritual foundation had been restored. The demonic god's hidden bones, which could multiply endlessly, were with his consciousness.

Zhang Jue coldly said, "So now you two want to kill him? The Dignitary of Rule himself said that this disciple had rendered an indelible great service. Do you mean to say that it would accord with the Way of Heaven to kill without cause a person who has rendered a service? Gentlemen, are your Ways of the Heart yet steady?"

Zhao Yin pursed his lips, his expression becoming very unpleasant for a moment.

Just then, the demonic energy in the demon seed began to blaze. Black fog rose toward the sky and nearly broke the seal at the bottom of the sea.

For a time, the three shed skin elders had no attention to spare for their internal strife. They joined hands to suppress the demon seed. They felt that the intensity of the demon seed's resistance was hardly less than that of a living, breathing eight-hundred-year-old great demon.

And at the same time, the dust hovering in the area once again gathered together. Right before the eyes of the three hard-pressed shed skin elders, it was about to join into a human form.

Zhao Yin said, “You saw that, Zhang-shixiong!”

Lin Zongyi pulled down his mouth seal. “The demonic god must be eliminated.”

When his judgment fell, the star stone in Zhang Jue’s hand shook.

And almost at the same time, outside of the Sea of Stars, the Dignitary of Fate elder abruptly opened his eyes. His pupils were white, identical to the white light in the star stone. With a glance, he kept Lin Zongyi’s judgment away from the star stone.

“Dignitary of Rule,” Zhang Jue said with emphasis, lowering his voice, “if you eliminate demons without reference to guilt, are you still worthy of being the Dignitary of Rule?”

Zhao Yin said, softly, “Zhang-shixiong, can you not have noticed that Lin-shixiong’s verdict was ‘the demonic god must be eliminated’?”

Zhang Jue’s white pupils trembled slightly.

Lin Zongyi said grimly, “Dignitary of Fate, look to the human world.”

No sooner had he spoken than countless scenes flashed on the four walls of the seal at the bottom of the sea, over the scar-riddled inscriptions: the sound of a qin being smashed echoed all around. The people who heard that enraged twanging seemed to have their hatred ignited. They attacked without a thought for the consequences, dying in droves by hand cannon, sword, and arrow.

“Yes, if you are able to reach the shed skin level, there is no right and wrong Way of the Heart. We all understand this. Never mind this child who has just come of age, the historical records say nothing of Yuan Hui himself committing frenzied misdeeds,” Zhao Yin said. “But even if Jingzhai doesn’t know what it means that the demon seed has reappeared in the human world, do you mean to say that you don’t know either?”

Zhang Jue was silent.

“When the five sages achieved the full moon positions, the remaining masters were eliminated one by one by the Way of Heaven. Since then, the sects have operated on the foundation of the five sages. The spiritual mountains were divided, and in the human world, pure and impure were also separated. There was order. Only with this order in place can the immortal sects and the mortal world have peace,” Zhao Yin said. “Southern He stirred up the flames of war, and one of the five great spiritual mountain ranges was lost. Since then, the demons at the bottom of the Impassable Sea have multiplied by leaps and bounds. In the last two hundred years, how much instability has entered the human worlds, how many citizens have died as victims of injustice? Even now, the people’s resentment over Moon Plated Gold—in the final analysis, hasn’t it all been because of a loss of order among the spiritual mountains?! Can the Dignitary of Fate High Elder need someone else to explain this reasoning to him?”

Lin Zongyi said, “When those who have been cast aside by the Way of Heaven return to the world, it must do injury to the righteous path. Karma is involved here. Human strength cannot overcome it. Dignitary of Fate, it isn’t as simple as ‘without cause.’”

“In the future, when Jingzhai leaves seclusion, if he is truly able to attain the shed skin level, he will also see this reasoning. What choice do you want him to make?” Zhao Yin pointed. “Zhang-shixiong, look there.”

The demon seed that had been suppressed by the shed skin elders was constantly overflowing with demonic energy. Thread after thread of demonic energy, as if drawn in by an attractive force, poured toward that gathering human figure.

“I trust that none of the masters involved in the war of gods and demons wanted to see the people suffer, but do not forget that it was because of them that the demons in the Impassable Sea were born.”

Xi Ping’s form had mostly taken shape now and faintly gave off the aura of a consummate established foundation. One more time, and perhaps he would go straight to an ascended spirit.

On the young face that was gradually becoming clearer, there was a faint smile, as if he were mocking all of nature’s laws and rules: the sun and moon rising in the east and setting in the west, the day and night divided into twelve shichen, men and beasts living and dying, reincarnating and multiplying without end, water flowing into the east, trees growing up toward the sky, only establishing a foundation after forming your heart, only becoming a god while following the righteous path...

Zhang Jue at last closed his eyes once more. The star stone slipped out of his hand.

A faint clash came from the Dignitary of Fate High Elder’s sleeve, and the shard of Zhaoting that bore the engraving of its name flew straight out and entered the center of Xi Ping’s brow.

When he had been at Flying Jade Peak, the Sword that Mended the Heavens had been assigned by Zhi Xiu to be a loyal nursemaid, helplessly flying circles around his rebellious disciple to keep him from destroying the whole frozen mountain.

Now the sword had broken, but its instinct to protect the young disciple remained.

The star stone shattered, and the pure white consciousness inside it, the indolent Marquis Manor and Jinping's late spring, all vanished along with it.

And by coincidence, just at that moment, Xi Ping's body assembled completely. The mocking smile on his face was gone. All his aura dimmed.

The East Sea calmed. The demon seed once again became silent. The demonic god had been eliminated.

CHAPTER 68 - Indignant Cicadas (2)

The west side of the Xia River, Tao County.

This place was on the border of Western Chu. Southern Wan was just across the river. The two places were close, and people came and went between them. There was frequent commerce and intermarriage. Adding in Southern Wan's civil unrest some years back, there had also been quite a few people from Wan coming to seek refuge. The longer the people of the two nations mixed together, the more this area took on a "Wan atmosphere."

Everyone spoke a mixed language, and they learned each others' funeral and marriage customs.

In Tao County's Seventeen Li Town, a rather well-off household was having a funeral. Perhaps the deceased's ancestors had come from Wan; the officiant had been asked to sing a Soul Calling Melody from Great Wan, but the instrumentation and the procession were all according to Chu custom.

"Raise the casket, hang two mats, shelter it fully seven days. The Great Way touches Heaven and sends you back home!"

The officiant overseeing the funeral claimed to have been born and bred in Southern Wan and to have done this work since he was young; he knew all the ins and outs. The upshot was that he was some kind of eccentric. His voice was hoarse, and he sang off tune.

His beard was scraggly, his age unclear. His arms were bare, revealing weathered, sinewy flesh. His singing turned the perfectly good Soul Calling Melody into a work song for laborers breaking ground. Listening to it, the steps of the men carrying the casket were unusually uniform, resonant and firm, as if determined to make the person inside the casket roll over and borrow another five hundred years from heaven.

The casket needed to make three circles around the town, bidding farewell to the deceased's fellow townspeople, before being taken to the ancestral tomb.

The torment of the eccentric officiant's sandpaper voice nearly sent off all the town's elders as well. As he led the procession, he calmly took in the terrain and scenery of Seventeen Li Town. He saw the "Immortal Palace" that cut across a patch of favorably situated land. There were a number of doors into the Immortal Palace, and he got a clear look at all of their rough orientations and so on. The officiant gave his colleagues carrying the casket a look.

A casket bearer knocked on the casket a few times in a regular pattern: Each door has a pair of guards, and inside there are sure to be mechanisms and arrays. We'll need someone to show us the way.

The officiant nodded almost imperceptibly: Got it.

This officiant's goal in coming here was the Immortal Palace.

This area of Tao County was remote and out of reach of the government, no matter which country you used as reference.

Border areas have always been cherished by the hosts of evil.

In recent years, the title of Pang Jian of Great Wan's Heaven's Design Pavilion had changed from assistant commander to general commander, and he seemed in the process to have gone from a wolf dog to a mad dog. His treatment of evil cultivators was ruthless; he seemed ready to kill the innocent rather than risk the guilty getting away. This had forced quite a few roaming common cultivators to run to other countries.

Comparatively speaking, Chu's Sanyue Sect had a much more lenient attitude toward roaming common cultivators. As long as there were no obvious instances of pilfering heaven's order or black market trade in spiritual stones, they could turn a blind eye; if the people didn't complain, the officials wouldn't investigate.

So Seventeen Li Town, with its well-developed waterways and roadways, had gradually accumulated a black market that traded in magic weapons, spiritual stones, and immortal elixirs. It had been given the nickname Wild Fox Country.

Wild Fox Country's local thug was called the Snake King, who took his name from the snakeskin scars that covered his whole body.

This Snake King had great powers and was highly skilled in making his own way. Some years ago, taking advantage of Great Wan's civil strife, he had gone around everywhere hoodwinking people and collected a considerable amount of wealth. When Xuanyin Mountain had used thunderous methods to pacify the rebellion, the Snake King had turned around and sought shelter in Chu.

At their nearest, Chu and Wan were separated only by a river. Chu's Xiang clan had always cast covetous eyes on their wealthy neighbor and naturally had wanted to take advantage of the commotion to reap some benefit. The Snake King had been Chu's guide in crossing the river and going south. Then a dozen or more of Xuanyin Mountain's thirty-six peak masters had come down to the mortal world. An old, long-established sect's knowledge ran deep; as soon as they acted, they stewed the whole crowd of hyenas. Sanyue didn't dare to publicly fall out with Xuanyin, so in the end it all came to nothing.

Chu had failed to take advantage, but the minor figures mixed into the plot were like weeds; as soon as a tumultuous wind began to blow, they grew wildly. Through his service, the Snake King had struck up a connection with Chu's orthodox sect.

This person had many peculiar methods. He was extremely skilled at turning everything to his advantage. He had perfectly bribed Sanyue's outer sect, and he had collected a crowd of evil cultivators in Tao County who had nowhere to go. In hardly any time, he had gotten real results. Here in Wild Fox Country, he had become a local tyrant.

It was said that in Seventeen Li Town, each and every insect and bird was this Snake King's eyes and ears. He presided over an Immortal Palace that took up a hundred mu of land. Inside the palace, there were third-class inscriptions everywhere. Not even cannons could have brought it down.

The officiant looked at the magnificent Immortal Palace for a while, then averted his eyes and lowered his thick lashes to hide the murder in his eyes.

He took a worn out wine pot from his belt, moistened his throat, and, in a voice as jubilant as if he were sending a couple to their bridal chamber, he cried out, “The living make way! The family of the deceased bestows—money!”

Paper money scattered on the wind. The funeral procession continued west, piping and drumming.

The old gentleman inside the casket was said to have been over seventy. He had said many years ago that he was going to die, yet in all this time, he hadn’t died. The family’s filial son had gotten fed up long ago. Now that he had finally outlasted the old bastard, he wanted to go through the motions and get everything over with. He had deliberately chosen an officiant that cost half what other officiants did.

This officiant didn’t seem very dependable, but unexpectedly there were no major problems with the procession. As for the tune of the Soul Calling Melody running off to the Beijue Mountains—if the Beijue Mountains didn’t object, why couldn’t his dad make do? The filial son was very satisfied. Having buried his dad, as custom directed, he gave the officiant a red packet to get rid of bad luck.

The officiant took the red packet and glanced inside. He saw a meager handful of copper coins and hit upon an idea.

Without warning, he gave a cry and began to wail, startling the filial son.

“Brother, I’ll tell you, while I was overseeing your family’s funeral procession today, I remembered my old father back in my hometown.”

The filial son said in astonishment, “What, do you mean your esteemed father also passed recently?”

Then the officiant, holding the filial son’s hand, expressed at length that he wasn’t a proper officiant to begin with. It was only that his father back home had passed on, and he had been working away from home and hadn’t been able to get back in time to attend the funeral; this was a regret that would gnaw at him for the rest of his life. By coincidence, just as he had been passing through here, he had come across a wealthy family making funeral arrangements, and he had been unable to resist wanting to make up for his eternal regret, sing a round of the Soul Calling Melody for his father. How could he possibly take the family’s red packet? He was already doing well if he wasn’t paying his customer for the privilege.

As he spoke, he unnoticeably tampered with the money.

Hearing this, the filial son took the money back in satisfaction. This was wonderful.

He took another look at the officiant. While he was sloppy, what showed of his features was quite regular, and he was nicely muscled. So the filial son, very pleased, took back the red packet and in the process touched the officiant's clear-knuckled hand. He thought that even the crescent moon scar on the back of this person's hand was very manly. Weepingly, he said, "Oh my, then the two of us are fellow sufferers!"

This eldest filial son had once been an opera actor who played female roles. How good his singing was no one knew, but his looks truly weren't bad. He had a feminine look, even more feminine than a woman. His nickname was Misty Willow.

The Snake King was lecherous and enjoyed men and women equally; he especially liked those who were neither one nor the other. He had liked Misty Willow on sight. Hearing his nickname, he had been even more convinced that this was destiny and had decided on the spot to keep him around—"misty willow" was the name Chu's commoners called reincarnation wood, and for some reason, the Snake King had a particular love toward reincarnation wood. It was said that he privately worshipped a statue of an evil god carved from reincarnation wood and said that this wood had brought him luck.

Therefore, Misty Willow had become the Snake King's favorite, and everyone called him "Lady Willow."

Lady Willow had been in favor for several years, and he had plenty of money. He was also a miser. The officiant who had overseen his father's funeral had returned his red packet, and he, not minding the bad luck, casually put the money into his own purse. The next day, as usual, he went to the Immortal Palace to serve.

Before going into the palace, he first took a deep breath—with the Snake King's countenance, it would scare your soul out of your body to wake up and see him in the middle of the night. Misty Willow had spent a lot of time with the Snake King, and he had seen that each of the “immortals” who came from afar had their own magic power, and also their own unsightliness. Appearances were secondary, anyway; there was no ugliness in the world that wealth and rank couldn't overcome. But the “ugliness” of the immortals was different; all of them had an inhuman air. Misty Willow often thought he was waiting upon a talking lizard.

From habit, he adjusted his own mental state, smoothed the hair at his temples, put on a smile, and slowly walked inside.

A faint breeze brushed the hems of his clothes and branded invisible marks where his footsteps fell.

It was night, starless and moonless.

The patrols in the immortal palace had just finished swapping shifts. The mortal guards at the door heard a bell ringing and at once seemed to turn into human puppets whose souls had been removed. They didn't move a muscle. A few figures landed silently. These were the officiant who had overseen Misty Willow's father's funeral procession and his colleagues.

The assassins went right around the dumbstruck guards and slipped into the Immortal Palace. The "officiant" in the lead took out a talisman and crushed it in midair. A faint set of footprints appeared on the ground. He gestured to his colleagues and flew in following the footsteps. In less than an incense stick of time, they found the main hall of the Immortal Palace.

Incense smoke curled through the main hall; it was congested with song and music. The "officiant" thrust his hand into his clothes and grasped a half-finished lilac knotted bag. He closed his eyes.

A colleague, as if in consolation, gently bumped his shoulder.

The "officiant" clenched his teeth and focused. He placed all his spiritual sense in his ears and listened intently.

A drunken male voice was delivering a harangue inside the main hall: "... the south has been no-go these past couple years. Better slow down.

Xuanyin is all wound up. Old Taiming ended up on the path of evil in his old age. Never mind making life unlivable for the people, he also cooked up something big in the East Sea. That battle back then! Ha, none of you guys saw it! Of course, it takes a nation in turmoil to make a hero's qualities shine. It was back then that I made my little fortune..."

When the Snake King put together a feast in his own domain, he didn't cover up at all, exposing all of his snakeskin. Amid the voices of his guests, joining in his story to humor him, he hiccuped, unsatisfied, and squinted toward the dance floor. Pointing to the most attractive dancing girl, he said, "You, come here."

The music stopped at once. The young dancing girl was alarmed.

From behind the Snake King, Misty Willow gave her a look, telling her to smile. The young dancing girl understood his expression and falteringly put on a stiff smile, stepping forward to curtsy. Before she could speak, she was dragged over by an ice cold hand.

She felt herself pressed to the big python's body and had a clear look at the Snake King's frightening face up close. She trembled uncontrollably.

"Why are you shaking?" The Snake King gently pinched her chin. Grimly, he said right into her ear, "While you were dancing just now, you didn't raise your head once. What, do you think I'm ugly?"

The young dancing girl shook even more violently, instinctively closing her eyes.

A rough hand like a reptile's covered her eyelids. "Do you know what happens to stupid women who close their eyes after seeing my true face...?"

Before he could finish, just that moment, a beam of snow-white light from a knife pried open the door to the main hall. The scream caught in the young dancing girl's throat at last broke through the soft music.

"Bold criminals!"

The assassins descending from the heavens made the drunken ghosts and goblins attending the feast collectively sober up. Misty Willow saw that the situation was going badly and dove under a table without another word.

It turned out that these assassins weren't mortals. For a time, the immortal tools and talismans shone on each other inside the room, and curses and screams both flew.

Misty Willow carefully stuck his head out from under the table and saw the Snake King puffing out a mouthful of white mist at the head assassin. He remembered this white mist. Once, a girl who had dared to cry in front of the Snake King had had half her face dissolved by this white mist; her features had all melted!

But the assassin was fearless. He took out a chopper without a handle, drew his palm over the edge of the blade, and instantly activated the talisman on the blade. With a hum, wind from the knife cleaved through the man-eating white mist and went straight toward the Snake King.

There was a crescent moon scar on the back of the person's hand—he had touched it just the day before!

Wasn't this that unreliable officiant?

Misty Willow was startled and retreated in terror back under the table.

The Snake King whistled. Seven or eight open-eyed evil cultivators leapt into the room and held up the assassins. He himself turned and went through the wall.

The “wall” was actually an invisible door.

Some of the assassins assembled an array and stopped the Snake King's reinforcements, calling to the head assassin: “Go after him, Xu-xiong!”

The “officiant” said “thank you” and leapt to follow the Snake King through the invisible door.

He went into the wall and out of it, and before he could stand firm, he heard a rumbling from all around. A huge spiritual beast that had escaped its chains threw itself toward him.

The chopper in the “officiant”’s hand met it unwaveringly and stabbed right into the huge beast’s bloody maw. The huge beast gave an earthshaking roar. Then he gave a low shout and tossed out a talisman that went right into the huge beast’s mouth. Spiritual energy exploded and opened up the huge beast’s chest.

Following inertia, he kept going forward. He took out a very impure jade stamp stone and dissolved it into his palm. When he had pushed away the body of the huge beast, the Snake King was nowhere to be seen.

This was a secret room with a vulgar-looking reincarnation wood divine image in the center. On the spirit tablet was written the name “Tai Sui.”

Dangerous inscriptions and arrays flashed all around.

The “officialant” gripped the chopper tightly. He rubbed a talisman between his fingers. The talisman quietly caught fire. Blue light swept the floor and ceiling beams, turning up countless hidden arrays and inscriptions...as well as a line of hurried footsteps.

Blood went to the “officialant”’s head. He was just about to follow the footsteps when, suddenly, he glimpsed something out of the corner of his eye. He quickly turned his head—he kept thinking that the reincarnation wood divine image seemed to be moving, even slightly shaking its head.

The “officialant” broke out in gooseflesh. He raised his talisman and lit up the face of the Tai Sui image with the blue light. There was a peculiar, mysterious smile on the statue’s face. It was looking at him quietly.

The “officialant” quietly cursed to himself. “Playing tricks.”

Then he averted his gaze and chased after the footsteps without hesitation, chopping toward the wall where the footsteps vanished.

Before the point of the knife could fall, he had already felt that something was wrong. There was an array to reflect spiritual energy on that wall that shot back his knife blow in its entirety.

The officiant twisted backward and dodged the knife light. The knife light hit the wall but touched another array.

In the blink of an eye, the whole secret room filled with knife light and sword images. In a moment of desperation, the “officiant” grabbed the reincarnation wood statue to shield himself. As he rolled, a half-finished lilac knotted bag fell from his waist and got caught on the statue’s wrist.

Just then, a languid voice sounded in his ear: “I told you it wasn’t there. Look out up above.”

The “officiant” looked up and saw a huge image of a fierce beast on the ceiling. The drawn beast escaped the picture and snapped its jaws toward him. The man didn’t have time to think carefully. He rolled desperately, holding onto the statue. He heard that voice say with a smile, “The entrance to the secret passage is in that thing’s mouth, believe it or not.”

“What the hell are you?”

The voice answered, “You’re rude, aren’t you? Whatever the hell you are, that’s whatever the hell I am.”

CHAPTER 69 - Indignant Cicadas (3)

Even a person who stepped up to answer before you asked a question rarely had good intentions, so what about a strange divine image in this den of evil cultivators?

There was drowsy mischief in that voice; he sounded like bad news.

The fake officiant was evidently a practiced hand. He knew that untimely curiosity could kill. He raised a hand, planning to toss the weird divine image away. But the wicked wood just happened to have a rather deep crack in its grain that had caught the knotted bag inside it. The cords used to make the knotted bag weren't very solid or high quality to begin with, and they were starting to wear out after all these years. The fake officiant didn't dare to hastily yank it out.

While he was tugging, the beast that had come out of the painting came right up in front of him.

The voice in his ear faintly said, "All you see before you is false..."

The fake officiant didn't listen to his nonsense. He took a breath and stabbed forward with his knife. The knife seemed to hit stone; it nearly shattered. He flew forward after his knife, about to hit the array on the wall.

This fake officiant's reactions in the face of danger were very quick. He instinctively wanted to toss away the divine image he was holding to suffer in his stead. But as the divine image flew, the side the knotted bag was caught on was facing the wall. A small colorful cord was just about to get pulled in by the array. The fake officiant cursed quietly and bent in half in midair, shielding the divine image with his body, taking the hit.

From the disturbed array, another identical beast appeared and snapped its jaws toward the fake officiant's shoulder, its fangs leaving a bloody mark on his back.

If he hadn't ducked quickly, that thing might have bitten off his shoulder.

The divine image tsked feelingly and gave a huge, elaborate yawn, sounding even more in need of a beating.

One beast was already enough to get rid of him, never mind a pair; the fake officiant couldn't stick this out. All he could do was race around the room, tossing out all kinds of talismans as though they were free, hitting the beasts. But the two animals weren't injured at all.

The divine image slowly announced his new observation: "Those who do not listen to their elders will always come to grief. Haven't you realized that those two look like they were birthed by the same mother?”

The fake officiant automatically looked where he indicated and saw that the two beasts surrounding him were indeed identical. Even the decorative patterns on them looked like rubbings from the same source!

The divine image said, “You understand now, right?”

The fake officiant: “...”

Understand what?

“Ah,” the divine image sighed at length as though profoundly moved by the fact that he’d woken up to find that there were so many more simpletons; there was truly no hope for this world. “Which one of us hasn’t woken up yet? Listen, did you come here to be an assassin, or did you come to sleepwalk? All the arrays in this place are like mirrors. They reflected the knife light and the beast. Since it’s a reflection, naturally the decorative patterns are reversed. How could they be facing the same direction? It’s because you heard what I said and got the idea that they were identical, so they became identical in your eyes. These are illusions—illusions! How much clearer do you want me to be, Brother Da Cheng?”

Hearing this, the fake officiant went blank. “Da Cheng” had been his pet name in his hometown. No one had called him that for many years. “How did you...”

“Look out, don’t get distracted!”

In the nick of time, the fake officiant crouched down and threw himself forward, his chopper striking out in front of his chest, dodging an attack from a huge beast on each side, one after another.

He falteringly backed up a few steps and hit the array, and in the limited space, two more huge beasts appeared!

Indeed, the fake officiant saw that the decorative patterns on these new beasts were reflected. He had been distracted by the evil god in the divine image; his mind was a little confused. As soon as he thought, “Why were they not reflections before, but now they’ve gone back to being reflections?”, the decorative patterns on the four beasts changed once again, bewilderingly.

The divine image said, “The five colors blind men’s eyes. If I were you, I’d stop looking.”

The fake officiant said, “Shut—up!”

Just then, a little metal ring clamped to the helix of his ear began to vibrate, a sharp whistle that only he could hear coming from inside it—this was a warning from his colleagues.

A series of short, rapid sounds meant that more help had arrived for the other side.

Wild Fox Country was the Snake King's domain, and all the evil cultivators who came and went in it were his people. The so-called "Immortal Palace" was complex and intricate on the inside. Their ability to infiltrate it depended entirely on luck. If they couldn't win a decisive victory quickly, infiltration would become difficult.

For this assignment, their superior wanted to take down Wild Fox Country on the Wan-Chu border and had sent more than one team. Their colleagues had presumably already infiltrated Wild Fox Country's business transactions. In fact, he shouldn't have been taking part in such a big matter. He was here because that gentleman had remembered his vendetta and gone out of his way to give him this opportunity as a special attention. He knew that neither his experience nor his cultivation were equal to those of the others, and his plans couldn't be as comprehensive as the plans of his colleagues; that was why he had gone the route of direct assassination... If he failed now, never mind getting his brothers in trouble, he was afraid he would also impact the overall plans of his other colleagues and his superior.

The fake officiant threw caution to the wind and braced himself. He abruptly closed his eyes.

But while he could close his eyes, his nose and ears didn't have lids. He could still smell the reeking wind, could still hear the breathing of those huge animals. All the hairs on the back of the fake officiant's neck stood on end and began to tremble. He was about to be buried in the mouths of the beasts.

Damn it! In a rash moment, he had been deluded by that evil god of unknown origin!

But the "evil god" coldly said, "Such a nice young woman—what was she thinking liking you? Alas, blind at such a young age... You closed your physical eyes without closing your mental eyes, and you're still standing there remembering the illusions you just saw, idiot!"

"Who are you talking about?" For a moment, the fake officiant's mind and soul were shaken. The murderous illusions were immediately forgotten.

"What young woman?"

“I’m telling you,” the evil god said with emphasis, “there’s a secret passage here, and the entrance is in the mouth of that beast.”

The fake officiant instantly opened his eyes. In front of him was the big, bloody maw of a beast.

In that moment, he became strangely calm—at the speed these animals moved, if they had been real, they would have run over and bitten off his head in the blink of an eye; they certainly wouldn’t have let him talk to the evil god for so long!

They really were illusions.

Faith, firm as a rock, steadied his spirit. Without turning a hair, the fake officiant stepped up and walked into the huge beast’s big, bloody maw. Its fangs nearly touched the top of his head!

But the next moment, the reek disappeared. His vision went dark. When he came back to himself, he was in a narrow corridor.

The evil god egged him on: “Thank heaven and earth, finally you’ve wised up. Go on, slaughter that ogre!”

The fake officiant: “...”

Wait, with this evil god's esteemed countenance, how could he have the face to call someone else an "ogre"?

As the fake officiant dashed forward, he quickly untied the knotted bag from the reincarnation wood divine image. "Aren't you the evil god that the Snake King worships? Why would you bite the hand that feeds you?"

These words enraged the indolent evil god. The evil god cursed at length in genuine local vernacular. "You're the evil god, you're the one biting the hand that feeds you! What am I supposed to have eaten of his?"

"...incense ash?"

"And what part of my body would I use to eat incense ash? Do you think you could grow some more brains if you ate incense ash? I think I should stick some incense up your nose," the "evil god" who was unusually adept at swearing said angrily. "Every time that ogre has a big business deal, he brings me out and torments me until I wake up so I can watch them sell their dads, sell their moms, sell themselves. It's even worse during the New Year celebrations. He brings in some good-for-nothings to make music and fumigates me all day with his lousy incense burner, then nauseates me with a pile of raw meat, and he still has the face to ask me to bless him with good luck for the coming year. Bah! My blessing is for him to die soon and reincarnate soon! Hurry up, deliver retribution. If you dare to disappoint me, I'll curse you, too.”

“Who are you, anyway?”

“The ogre calls me ‘Tai Sui.’ That lousy name doesn’t sound very auspicious, but I’m used to it by now, you can call me that, too,” the evil god said. “I am an old tree spirit.”

“Bullshit!” The fake officiant stuck the divine image under his arm. “There are three thousand ways in the world, and mountains of ancient texts. Not one of them has a record of a tree that could cultivate a spirit!”

In that tone that was asking for a dozen beatings, Tai Sui said, laughing, “Well, pardon my lack of manners, brave warrior. May I ask how many of those ancient texts you’ve read?”

The fake officiant: “...”

“Whether there are mountains of ancient texts or oceans of them, what have they got to do with you? Ignoramus. Look out for sneak attacks, Xiao Chengcheng!”

Hardly had he finished speaking than the fake officiant slid, narrowly avoiding a shot from a sniper.

The fake officiant tossed the divine image aside and took out a talisman. An invisible shield immediately took shape in front of him, blocking the dense sniper fire.

There were both shots from hand cannons and talismans coming his way. The hand cannons couldn't pierce through the spiritual shield, but the talismans mixed in with the dense fire made crack after crack in the shield. It was about to give out at any moment.

The fake officiant gave a loud cry. Going against the direction of the sniper fire, he nearly turned into a gust of wind.

The spiritual shield broke!

The hand cannon fire exploded right on the fake officiant. Even if this fire power couldn't kill a half-immortal, it still nearly tore most of the flesh off his shoulder. As if he had no sense of pain, he activated the array on his knife's blade with a handful of blood. Instantly, the knife seemed to become a magic weapon that could press forward indomitably.

It was cast viciously by its owner in the direction the talismans were coming from.

The Snake King, seeing the sniper attack succeed, had just relaxed when, without warning, the knife cut straight through his chest!

Tai Sui, trying to stir things up more, called out in praise, “Nice hit!”

Back draped in blood like some god or demon, the fake officiant charged forward, grabbed the handle of the knife, and pushed it forward on the strength of inertia, pinning the Snake King to the wall!

Tai Sui laughed heartily.

The fake officiant stared fixedly at the Snake King’s horrifying face and kept his voice very low. “Five years ago, in Yuzhou, you pretended to be the ‘immortal envoy of Tai Sui’ to fool the people. All the people who followed you, who believed you, were common people with nowhere to go. You didn’t just swindle them out of all their money, you squeezed their marrow dry, then sold them to the Chu, turning them into cannon fodder in the war between the two nations. You also...you also violated a young woman, just seventeen years old—do you remember her?”

Tai Sui’s laughter came to a sudden stop.

The chopper had broken all of the Snake King's meridians. He was pinned to the wall by the little knife like a mortal...no, like a gecko, desperately struggling with all four limbs, his single glaring eye like a bronze bell.

“She couldn't bear the disgrace and escaped out of your hands...then she was brought back by your lackeys. A mortal woman beaten black and blue actually dared not to submit to you—you were beside yourself with rage. In front of everyone, you yelled ‘Tai Sui delivers your punishment,’ and in front of the whole village, you burned her to death.”

The tendons in the fake officiant's neck stood out. His eyes were red. He quietly roared, “Do you remember?!”

Tai Sui interrupted him: “Hey, he's almost finished his array.”

The fake officiant suddenly came back to himself. He glanced down. The hand seal that the Snake King seem to have been drawing at random had already formed a complete array. He was about to raise a hand to press it to the wall.

The fake officiant reacted extremely fast. When he broke the Snake King's hand with a kick, a white spirit rolled out of the reptilian paw. The array had half-activated, but it died down without going further.

“Don’t be in a rush to collect on a debt, Xiao Chengzi. His left front tooth is a mustard seed. Look out for secret plots.”

“I have a full name, show some respect!” the fake officiant, at the end of his tether, howled at the divine image of Tai Sui. At the same time, his hand didn’t rest. With one punch, he broke the Snake King’s chin, narrowly avoiding a mouthful of poison mist.

The mustard seed disguised as a front tooth rolled several chi away and landed beside the divine image of Tai Sui.

The joyously smiling divine image met the Snake King’s panicked and desperate eyes. The fake officiant heard Tai Sui say softly into his ear, “First cripple him. He has plenty of resources and is skilled in all kinds of tricks. Don’t let him take you at a disadvantage again, fool. Then tell him...”

Just then, the fake officiant finally realized that the Snake King couldn’t hear the “divine oracles” of this Tai Sui that he worshipped.

The evil god he had worshipped for years could in fact work miracles, and the first miracle he worked was to help an outsider kill him. What kind of bizarre karmic retribution was this?!

The believer didn't hear the "divine oracle" say: "Just say, 'Imposter, Tai Sui delivers your punishment.'"

The fake officiant broke out in gooseflesh. Before, this Tai Sui had been speaking in the local dialect that mixed Wan and Chu speech; his swearing had been especially authentic. So without noticing it, the fake officiant had actually lowered his guard and had even started to talk back.

But these last words had been spoken in perfect, sweet Jinping official language.

"If you continue along this secret passage, you can find the underground rooms where he keeps his private collection of treasures and spiritual stones. I haven't been to that place, but I have my guesses," Tai Sui said grimly. "There'll be enough to set on fire and send him on his way."

The fake officiant didn't listen to this. His hands tightened. The light of his chopper blazed, and he cut the Snake King right in two, splitting his spirit.

He was utterly dead.

Tai Sui tsked. "How dull."

After killing the Snake King, the fake officiant drew several rough breaths, then took out a whistle, brought it to his mouth, and blew hard several times. The whistle was voiceless; only those wearing a special item would hear it.

Having notified his companions outside “I’ve succeeded, clear out,” he tore the Snake King’s body off the wall, took out a “cloth” as thin as a cicada’s wings, and covered the body with it.

As soon as the cloth fell on the body, it melted, and the body of the Snake King under it took on the appearance of the fake officiant. The fake officiant scrutinized it for a moment, then stepped forward to pinch together the body’s knife wound and use his fingertip to draw a few strokes on the body’s shoulder.

The knife wound disappeared, and marks from a wild beast’s teeth appeared on the body’s neck, so it seemed as if a beast had chewed off its head.

Then the fake officiant took out another cicada wing and draped it over himself. In the blink of an eye, he took on the Snake King’s appearance.

“Oh,” said Tai Sui, looking on, “so you aren’t just here for private revenge. You have quite the appetite, and you’re pretty daring.”

The fake officiant's manner had become considerably more respectful. He introduced himself: "My name is Xu Rucheng. May I ask what your connection to me is, senior? How do you come to know my pet name from my hometown?"

Tai Sui didn't answer for a long moment. He really did seem like an old tree, caught in a memory that was too old.

Only when Xu Rucheng thought that he had left the divine image did he hear the evil god's voice in his ear: "I heard A-Hua say it. I guessed it was you."

Xu Rucheng abruptly raised his head.

Tai Sui softly said, "So A-Hua is dead?"

"How...how do you know her?"

"Oh, I saw her once." The voice of the evil god in the reincarnation wood became low; it made you weary to listen to it. "I've slept too long. Apart from the ogre occasionally waking me up with his noise for a while, only you...only that ugly knotted bag you're carrying has woken me up."

Xu Rucheng took out the knotted back. “Her mom secretly picked this up when those people sold her to the evil cultivator—A-Hua was a mortal. She never had any contact with an immortal sect. And she wasn’t...she wasn’t some kind of peerless beauty. Why do you remember her, senior?”

“I don’t remember anymore.” The evil god was silent for a while, then dully said, “I was always dreaming about her. I kept thinking that she’d asked me for something, and I hadn’t done it yet.”

Saying so, he yawned. His voice became fainter and fainter. “I suppose it might have been getting revenge for her. I slept badly whenever I dreamed of her. Now I’ve finally done it...”

“Wait, senior!” Xu Rucheng stepped forward and went to one knee before the divine image. “You said before, ‘Such a nice young woman—what was she thinking liking you?’...Senior, what did A-Hua say to you before she died? Senior?”

The divine image didn’t speak again. Xu Rucheng looked down. The wooden carving was the same, but strange, mysterious aura from before had disappeared. Now it was only a lump of wood.

“Senior?”

Xu Rucheng waited for a long time and tried hanging the knotted bag on the wooden carving again.

But this time, there was no response.

Dressed in snakeskin scales, he knelt on the floor, staring blankly into space for a while. Hearing voices in the secret passage, he thought that the evil cultivator's companions were coming. He carefully put the lilac knotted bag away and gathered up all his focus to go deal with these people.

“As heaven wills it,” he thought, kneading the wound on his shoulders into the form of a knife wound, pulling it all the way to his neck—this way, he wouldn't need to talk for a while and could avoid slipping up—then lay down on the ground and picked up the divine image.

The evil cultivators who charged in ran toward their “Snake King” with exclamations and carried him and the divine image away together.

Xu Rucheng pretended to be seriously injured. Late at night, when all the interlopers had left and Misty Willow, who was looking after the invalid, had let his mind wander, Xu Rucheng silently let out some bewildering scent. Misty Willow went down without a sound.

Xu Rucheng looked at him, then took a very small jade proximal from his mustard seed and wrote on it: “The Snake King is dead.”

After a moment, the writing on the proximal disappeared.

From the other end came an answer: “I have notified our other brothers. They will cooperate with you.”

Xu Rucheng let out a sigh of relief.

Then the writing on the proximal changed again: “The dead can rest peacefully now.”

Xu Rucheng stared blankly at this line of writing for a long time, his lips beginning to tremble faintly—Mr. Bai remembered why he had entered the Way.

The Latent Cultivation Temple had sent away its disciples and become increasingly quiet. It was an ideal place to cultivate without distractions.

After over five years, the bamboo and the trees in the repaired Qiu courtyard had grown back.

Straw children swept the fallen leaves in the courtyard. In the meditation chamber of the northern rooms, a pair of eyes quietly opened and looked at the Heavenly Question unfolding in front of them.

On the scroll was Bai Ling's familiar handwriting: Seventeen Li Town has been taken.

CHAPTER 70 - Indignant Cicadas (4)

Zhou Ying responded: Understood. I will set out shortly.

When he had just sent this Heavenly Question, he heard a shriek from outside the window. The black cat had missed its footing on the courtyard wall and tumbled down.

Zhou Ying waved his sleeve. The wind from his sleeve flew out through the crack in the window and firmly kept the stupid cat upright.

The blue luan that had been teasing the cat flew off flapping its wings, leaving a rainbow behind its butt. The black cat ran inside, its fur bristling, furiously coming to lodge a complaint.

It had gotten old. For a cat, it was already very elderly. The fur around its eyes and next to its mouth had faded slightly, making its expression look considerably more solemn. Living in the Latent Cultivation Temple with its owner for five years, it had steeped in the abundant spiritual energy of the mountains and was still quite robust; it could perhaps live to nearly two decades. But even if it lived another thirty years, it still wouldn't make any progress. It was still dimwitted and full of fight. All the auspicious animals in the mountains liked to run over to annoy it when they were idle—especially that blue luan, which came every day, rain or shine, to tease the cat and yank its tail.

Zhou Ying was about to pick it up. He had reached out halfway when his gaze floated outside. He raised his hand and put a finger to his lips. “A guest is coming. Quiet down.”

Having said this, he stood upright and went out to welcome the guest. Just as he opened the door, Princess Duanrui landed at the gate of the Qiu courtyard.

Zhou Ying saluted her politely. “Your Highness Duanrui.”

In terms of blood relationship, Princess Duanrui was his aunt...some unknown number of generations back, but Zhou Ying never called her “ancestor” the way other members of the Zhou family did; neither did he call her “shishu.” He spoke like an outsider who belonged to the same generation as her—he hadn’t properly joined the Xuanyin Sect.

Five years ago, the plot in the Impassable Sea had fallen through. Dozens of generations of the Zhou family had conspired for eight centuries, and all of it had failed just on the point of success. The great demon with its incomplete demonic soul had been scattered and suppressed once more by Xuanyin’s three elders working in concert, and the last set of sacrificial spiritual bones in the Impassable Sea had been recovered and returned into the hands of their owner.

But Great Wan hadn't had a change of dynasty on account of these events; at present, the Zhou family still ruled.

For one thing, it was because Green Pool Peak was firmly standing watch in the Xuanyin Mountains; Princess Duanrui, a near-shed skin, could still hold up the Zhou clan. For another thing, when the matter of the Impassable Sea had taken place, the resentment of Great Wan's people had accumulated to a certain degree and exploded, bringing all kinds of filth behind all the great families to the surface. Of the thirty-six peak masters, apart from a small number who, like Zhi Xiu, stood alone, the rest were all covered in dirt. Everyone had made fools of themselves; how could a crow have the face to call a pig black? They didn't have the capacity to investigate the Zhou clan.

Anyway, after the demon seal had broken, the spirits of all those with a criminal brand on their spiritual image had shattered along with their brands; not one survivor had been left for Xuanyin Mountain.

Zhou Kun had died in the backlash from the demon seal and taken along a whole card table of people with him. The old fellow certainly wouldn't be lonely on the road to the underworld—the number of those who had died in the revolt alone was uncountable, and the immortal mountains had been unable to suppress the upheaval on every level of society. After the fact, to calm the people's anger, they had been forced to hold their noses and put the necks of their own worthless juniors under the knife, knocking down another big batch.

In the last five years, there had been changes in personnel at all the chambers of commerce. Authority over the Water Transport Office, which had nearly become the personal property of a few individuals, had reverted to the court. The Southern Factory Laws, the Land Laws, and other sets of laws and tax reforms had been put into effect immediately and resolutely—these had all been ready-made; they were all government decrees that Emperor Taiming had wanted to put into effect before his death but which in the end had come to nothing. The drafts had been reworked several times and were already quite perfect. They could simply be copied out with minor revisions.

The villagers who had lost their land might not be able to take it back, but at any rate their ancestral tombs had been safeguarded; the factory workers might not all be appropriately housed, but for the moment no one would dare to offer up human lives because they were too stingy to offer up spiritual stones; minor merchants naturally still didn't have any say, but at least they could manage to get a seat.

Emperor Taiming had exposed the wealthy families' coverup by force, so no one could hold the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon back from running everywhere.

In fact, looking back on it, when Emperor Taiming had used the fire in the southern outskirts as an excuse to send his troublemaking third son out of Jinping to set fires everywhere, it seemed that he had predicted everything and had been acting with intent.

Why else, on that night that lightning had flashed and thunder had rumbled in Jinping, would Zhou Kun, when everything was going just fine, have laid out all of the Zhou family's secrets to the Marquis of Yongning?

He had been the last of the Zhou family's demon subduers to go mad, and he had been the one bound to reveal it all.

Had he already dimly predicted that the Zhou family's fate was to fail?

Back then, had he no longer cared about whether the great demon in the East Sea could get justice for the Zhou family? Had he only wanted to deal with Great Wan's chronic illness?

Of the different expressions on his face in death, which had been true?

In the fifth year of Taiming, Zhou Kun had placed his own son's spiritual bones on the altar and stolen a heart demon seed; even now, it was unknown where he had used it. Not long after, there had been internal strife in Xuanyin Mountain. One of the four elders had gone into seclusion, and the spiritual bones of one ascended spirit peak master had been removed. Emperor Taiming, still young at the time, had taken the opportunity to unleash a bloody wind upon the court.

Twenty-four years later, he had seen off his full blood sister, pierced the heavens, carried off everyone who had been involved, and forced Xuanyin to come out and clean up the aftermath. His whole life seemed to have been nothing but failed attempts, but after his death, everything succeeded.

This tyrant had held the throne for twenty-nine years, and he seemed to have spent the whole time struggling, searching for an opportunity to stab through the canopy above his head.

But a person's death is like a fire being extinguished. What the truth was, no one would know now. His accomplices were departed or dead, he hadn't been close to his wife, and he'd had no trusted aides. There was only the Marquis of Yongning, who drank a cup of bitter wine with him every year—the two old men didn't talk; the words were all held in the wine: the Marquis of Yongning wanted him to hurry up and die.

No one on earth had heard Zhou Kun's inner thoughts, so whether he had been a repentant sage or a sinful lunatic, it would be up to the ghosts in the underworld to judge.

In these five years, while Great Wan had experienced internal strife, its vigor had increased considerably. The better part of the six ministries and nine officials had been replaced with civilian officials who had done well in the imperial examination. The new emperor was a generous and benevolent sovereign who carried on the successes of his predecessors. He listened to counsel and was himself industrious, nothing like his old lunatic of a father—the throne had gone to the Crown Prince Zhou Huan.

When the three high elders had brought back Zhou Ying's spiritual bones, the Dignitary of Rites Zhao Yin had personally met Zhou Ying in Xuanyin Mountain's main hall and given him two choices: if he wanted to succeed to the throne, he would need to seal his meridians after opening his spiritual eyes and taking back his spiritual bones, not use spiritual energy for the rest of his life; the body of a half-immortal would only let him survive. He would from then on live out the lifespan of a mortal. Or he could cast off the mortal world and enter the immortal sect, have no more association with the court; only there was no precedent for spiritual bones being restored over twenty years after being removed. No one knew how far he could be able to go along the immortal path in the future.

Having heard this, Zhou Ying didn't choose either option. He only very calmly said: "I was trapped at the bottom of the Impassable Sea for twenty years. My temperament is paranoid and narrow-minded. I certainly couldn't be a generous and benevolent wise sovereign. Moreover, the human heart is contrary. If I agree now to seal my meridians for the sake of stabilizing the nation, in a hundred years my ambition might swell. I can't guarantee that I wouldn't go looking for an unorthodox method to extend my lifespan. If the same thing that took place eight hundred years ago should happen again, what will you do? Does the immortal sect have so much confidence in me?"

Of course the immortal sect didn't have confidence in him, but the high elder's Way of the Heart was watching over him, forcing him to practice what he preached; he had promised Xi Ping to let Prince Zhuang choose, so he had to hold his nose and undertake this risk, then think of a way to strictly oversee the outcome.

"As for the inner sect," Zhou Ying said with a smile, "Her Highness Duanrui has natural spiritual bones, and she entered the way of clarity and unfeeling. Apart from spiritual bones, I also have an unusual spiritual sense. What plans does the sect have for me? High elder, no one who had been held at the bottom of the Impassable Sea since birth would want to be restrained again."

Zhao Yin asked, “You want to join an outer sect? Which one?”

“None of them would have me,” Zhou Ying said. “I’ve heard that in the present chaos, many of the common people have been led astray by evil cultivators and eaten spiritual stones to become amateur evil cultivators. What is the immortal sect planning to do about these people?”

This instigator actually had the face to ask!

His question in fact shut Zhao Yin up.

According to Great Wan’s previous laws, those people must all be brought down as evil cultivators.

But the law does not punish the majority. There had truly been too many people involved this time. And these people who had entered the evil way by eating spiritual stones and had led the rebellion were seen as heroes by the common people. If they were all treated as evil cultivators, then the real evil cultivators waiting to take advantage of the situation would happily take them, and the people’s resentment, just barely suppressed, would once again erupt.

It was even more impossible to accept them. Where would they go?

Xuanyin's inner sect was so strict that even imperial kinsmen had to rack their brains to get invited. Heaven's Design Pavilion had extremely high requirements for the endowments of its recruits; it wasn't unusual for the blue-clothed half-immortals to go above their grade and kill established foundation cultivators. In the past, Liang Chen and the others had become mine supervisors precisely because their abilities had been inadequate. Before, all these cultivators no one knew what to do with had been placed in the southern mines, and the upshot was that an event of such scope had taken place there, so Xuanyin Mountain no longer dared to let outer sect cultivators muddle around blindly. They had simply dissolved the mining office, and in the future the thirty-six peak masters would take turns sending specially chosen people to oversee the mines.

Zhou Ying said, calm and composed, "I was indirectly responsible for these people taking the wrong path, and like me, they have nowhere to go. Isn't that predestination? If the sect has faith in me, you can entrust making arrangements for them to me."

In this way, today's Kaiming Cultivators had come to be.

Xuanyin promulgated a new law. Cultivators from among the common people needed to register and place Xuanyin's spiritual seal on themselves, becoming Kaiming Cultivators. They would then no longer be considered evil cultivators. After affixing the spiritual seal, the immortal mountain would be able to strictly monitor and control every spell the Kaiming Cultivators used. If they committed a crime, even if they ran to the ends of the earth, Xuanyin Mountain's discipline hall would be able to break apart their spirit with a single talisman.

These legally operating Kaiming Cultivators were dispatched to various regions according to their registered permanent residence to perform tasks that mortals would be incapable of on assignment from the court—repairing inscriptions, maintaining the arrays on Moon Plated Gold gold smelters, looking after medicinal herb fields, rescuing people if they came upon natural disasters, and so on. According to their labor, they could obtain between one and two jade stamp stones every month.

Apart from this, Kaiming Cultivators were also cultivators. In a real emergency, they had the means to “bring their complaints to higher authorities.” If there were once again crafty sycophants who defied natural and moral law using the immortal sect's authority, they would have to have some qualms on account of the Kaiming Cultivators; they amounted to protection talismans for their hometowns.

In this way, any “evil cultivators” within Great Wan who weren't willing to register had become true evil cultivators. They increasingly had nowhere to shelter, because as soon as the Kaiming Cultivators got involved with evil cultivators, they would be noticed by the spiritual seal and punished as “evil cultivators”—after thousands of years, the immortal sect had at last condescended to give common cultivators a narrow and barren patch of open ground on which to gain a foothold. It was too precious. No Kaiming Cultivator could stand to put their own and their family's safety at risk. Finally they became the most energetic in opposing evil cultivators, lest they be taken for one of them.

Blind suppression would only arouse rebellion. Categorization was the correct principle.

It was no wonder that Prince Zhuang Zhou Ying was the person Green Pool Peak had settled on to inherit the throne at the outset. He stayed in the Latent Cultivation Temple looking after his spiritual bones and showed no signs of being busy. Relying solely on remote control via the Heavenly Question, he arranged the common cultivators within Great Wan into a perfect order. Countless evil cultivators who had wildly expanded their influence in the conflict lost any place to shelter overnight. Within a year or two, they were practically torn up by the roots by Heaven's Design Pavilion. Any who could run had run.

Therefore, apart from the “Kaiming Cultivators,” Zhou Ying had also singlehandedly established the Luwu⁵⁰—they mixed in among evil cultivators who had fled abroad and quietly seeped into the surroundings. They could conceal themselves much more easily than Heaven's Design Pavilion's blue-clothesers, who basically couldn't leave the country unless they were in disguise.

Zhou Ying never did anything in a hurry. Only after living in the Latent Cultivation Temple for nearly two years, when his body without its spiritual bones had nearly failed, did he at last unhurriedly open his spiritual eyes. Princess Duanrui had come down in person to oversee his fusion with his spiritual bones. It was so steady that not even the newly grown buds outside the window trembled. All of the Latent Cultivation Temple's stewards had been overwhelmed with gratitude—they had been on tenterhooks for two years, all of them ready to repair the Qiu courtyard once more.

Zhou Ying had been in poor health since birth. He needed to adjust to merging with his spiritual bones. Duanrui had placed three hundred bone nails in his body and removed a few periodically.

After five years, Princess Duanrui inspected his spiritual bones and at last removed all the bone nails. "Your spiritual bones have been restored. You can leave the mountain."

"Thank you, Your Highness," said Zhou Ying. "I'm grateful to you for personally overseeing this all these years."

“No need. I was involved in this to begin with,” Duanrui said. “The Zhou family’s business has nothing to do with the younger generations. Go and look after yourself. The immortal sect will handle affairs justly.”

“Yes, Your Highness.” Zhou Ying humbly accepted her instruction. Seeing that Duanrui was about to go, he called her back. “Before I leave the mountain, would it be possible to see Shiyong on my grandmother’s behalf? He hasn’t written home in five years. The old lady is very concerned.”

Princess Duanrui shook her head. “I passed by Flying Jade Peak on my way here. The mountain is still sealed.”

Hearing this, Zhou Ying lowered his eyes, then quickly stood up as though nothing were the matter and politely saw her out. Smiling, he said, “Indeed? That is unfortunate.”

Just then, out of the corner of her eye, Princess Duanrui glimpsed a wooden carving of a karma beast standing on the windowsill.

Zhou Ying followed her gaze and said, “When Shiyong was at the Latent Cultivation Temple before, he thoughtlessly asked for that to play with. I believe Your Highness made it?”

“Did Steward Su tell you that?” said Princess Duanrui.

Zhou Ying shook his head. “No, I can sense that its aura is similar to Your Highness’s.”

Princess Duanrui’s steps paused. She turned her head and looked at Zhou Ying. In a rare occurrence, she voluntarily asked, “How does all that you see appear to your eyes?”

“Well, this paramount spiritual sense,” Zhou Ying said, raising his eyebrows and shaking his head, “I was born with it. I have nothing to compare it with. There’s nothing unusual about it. I suppose my eyes and ears are a little keener than an ordinary half-immortal’s. If there is a very strong karmic bond—for example, if this little figurine created by Your Highness is placed beside you—I can sense it a bit.”

In his eyes, the adorable karma beast figurine and the unapproachable Princess Duanrui both had a layer of clear haze over them.

Without so much as blinking, Zhou Ying said, smiling, “You both share the same just and stainless air.”

Duanrui never listened to this sort of flattery, which was like a New Year’s greeting. She only waved a hand and instructed him, “An ordinary cultivator’s spiritual sense corresponds to their cultivation level. Only you are different. The senses cause turmoil in the human heart. Too strong a spiritual sense is not necessarily a good thing. Though you have taken back your spiritual bones and so will not die young, you are still frailer than others of the same cultivation level. You must continue to take preservative elixirs.”

Zhou Ying nodded in agreement and watched her retreating figure as she left, his smile steady and unremarkable. He thought, “A near-shed skin, yet her Way of the Heart is exposed.”

The princess was always in seclusion. The heart demon seed that Zhou Kun had stolen twenty-nine years ago couldn’t have been planted on her. But it was clear that even she had been impacted. Evidently the demonic seed had grown in the immortal mountains.

He gently tapped the joints of his fingers, calculating his plans like the Dignitary of Fate’s lineage observing celestial phenomena. There was no rush. The life of a half-immortal was long.

The black cat came over, wanting to rub against his legs. When it looked up and saw his smile, for some reason, it backed up a step.

Prince Zhuang looked down and met the cat’s eyes. The smile that seemed to be carved onto his face disappeared.

Fourteen years ago, when he had struggled free of the Impassable Sea, narrowly escaping with his life, his physical body had been gravely ill in the mortal world. There had been a little scoundrel who, judging others against himself, had thought that he was heartbroken over the death of an old dog and had picked this little thing up from somewhere and snuck it into his study.

The kitten had been scared to death and had peed on a set of the Four Books annotated by a great scholar of a previous reign...completely ruining them.

“I commit you to Elder Su’s care.” Zhou Ying leaned down and picked up the cat. “You can live some years longer in the immortal mountains. I no longer need your company.”

A fourteen-year-old cat could more or less understand a bit of human speech. It opened its eyes wide and looked at him.

Zhou Ying flicked out a talisman, and a few straw children came inside in answer to the summons and pack for him.

“Don’t touch that.” When a straw child picked up a brocade box on the table, it was knocked open by a talisman. Zhou Ying coldly said, “Don’t touch anything with a brocade carp on it. Pack up the other things.”

Inside the brocade box whose lid had been opened was a stack of contamination avoiding talismans.

The technique was clumsy. It was evident at a glance that these talismans weren't very expert. They had been meticulously preserved. None of the spiritual energy had drained away. They were identical to what they had been five years ago...in the eyes of an ordinary person.

But in the eyes of someone with a paramount spiritual sense, that person's aura had vanished long ago from the contamination avoiding talismans.

CHAPTER 71 - Indignant Cicadas (5)

There was a Kaiming Department in every region of Great Wan. Because its personnel were so numerous and had such a jumble of trivialities to deal with, the number of Kaiming Departments was more than three times that of Heaven's Design Pavilion branches.

The Kaiming Department of Jinping belonged to the south of the city. Currently, in the courtyard, a small batch of Kaiming Cultivators preparing to assist with water transport were clumsily learning to draw water dragon talismans.

These Kaiming Cultivators were dressed very tidily—the tidiness was overly solemn, each one looking ready to take part in some grand ceremony paying homage to heaven and earth. Dressed in so many layers, toiling away at talismans on a sweltering summer day, they were soon covered in sweat.

But no one ridiculed them. When the Kaiming Department's registrar came in to take a look, he only quietly ordered more ice brought to the courtyard.

The majority of people permanently stationed at the Kaiming Department were also Kaiming Cultivators. Having just washed the mud off themselves, they hadn't yet forgotten their origins. Naturally they wouldn't ridicule these brothers who came from the same background as them...and even if they did forget their roots after a few years, they probably still wouldn't dare; His Highness Prince Zhuang, who watched over them, was no Buddha incarnate.

When the Kaiming Departments had just been established, there had been few people and many things to do. They hadn't had enough manpower. Xuanyin Mountain had just dissolved the Mining Office, and they transferred the outer sect cultivators who had originally been at the southern mines to the Kaiming Departments.

The Zhou family brother and sister had muddied the waters in the southern mines. Those who managed to get out intact were practically all children of the wealthy, proper products of the Latent Cultivation Temple who had opened their spiritual eyes but hadn't been chosen by Heaven's Design Pavilion. These people weren't humiliated by their own worthlessness; instead, they were unhappy about being forced to associate with these lower class bumpkins. In the southern mines, at least there had been Princess Anyang to keep them at bay. After coming to the Kaiming Department, they stuck their nostrils up high enough to grow several rows of sunflowers in them.

This bunch of sunflower pots had never had anything to do with established foundations in their lives, and they weren't planning on forging ahead in their cultivation. They were extravagant and pampered, drinking snow wine like water. The more reason-clouding fragrant jade miasma they imbibed, the more disgraceful their conduct became. When the Kaiming Department had just opened, a few “senior cultivators” got drunk and took advantage of a female Kaiming Cultivator, driving her to commit suicide by swallowing a talisman. Grieving and furious, her companions and fellow countrymen had demanded justice. No one had acknowledged it; the superior “seniors” had closed ranks. The local Kaiming Department had been at the end of their rope. All they could do was report it to their superior while pursuing a futile investigation.

The upshot was that as soon as they reported it, that very night, the southern mine cultivators involved had been strung up in the courtyard like salted fish, all their meridians yanked out. At the feet of the corpses, a karma mirror had been placed upright, their crimes vividly carved into it. On the back of the mirror was stuck a piece of paper, laying out which of Great Wan’s laws these people had violated.

When it came to business, His Highness Prince Zhuang was attentive to detail, working slowly but surely, never in a hurry; when it came to killing people, he was swift and decisive. Having killed them with his left hand, with his right, he sent a Heavenly Question to Xuanyin’s main hall with polite notifications inviting the families to come collect the bodies.

The civil strife had just ended. The thirty-six peak masters had to keep their tails between their legs and behave. The families' people in the inner sect collectively asked for forgiveness in front of the Dignitary of Rites High Elder and didn't dare to make the least bit of a stink.

Interestingly enough, the four sets of laws in Great Wan that Liang Chen had once mentioned had been joined into one under the half-demon Bai Ling's knife.

The "instructor" who was teaching them to draw talismans watched more ice being brought and only then realized something. He didn't use talisman paper; right in midair, he drew a very little known talisman and gently tapped it with his finger. In the yard filled with the screams of cicadas, a cool breeze rose, immediately blowing away the fierce summer heat of Jinping.

All the sweat-covered students collectively breathed a sigh of relief. The Kaiming Department's registrar saluted the instructor repeatedly—except in a place that was especially full of spiritual energy, an open-eyed cultivator needed to burn spiritual stones to draw talismans. To tell it plain, just now, the instructor had pulled out his purse and treated them all to a cool breeze. Cultivators who came from rich families never cared about this; after all, they even dared to go to the Phoenix's Perch Pavilion for an ordinary meal. But the Kaiming Cultivators had to scrimp and save. Apart from when they used “public funds” for official assignments, no one could stand to casually draw talismans for private use. They were very much obliged.

The instructor waved a hand. He looked like a young man, dressed in the sapphire blue robes of Heaven’s Design Pavilion; these looked like the winter uniform, too. He was also wearing gloves. Only his face was exposed. He must have had some kind of magic power; he actually wasn’t hot at all.

He had been requested by the Kaiming Department from Heaven’s Design Pavilion. All the people in Great Wan who were best at talisman-drawing were in Heaven’s Design Pavilion.

When the instructor had first arrived, the Kaiming Department had been sick with nerves—this person wasn’t easygoing at all. He had a pair of black eyes twice as large as normal, his whole appearance a stark contrast between black and white. When that cold gaze came your way, even the most gifted conversationalist couldn’t strike up a casual chat. He never went to social events. Since coming, never mind feasting, he had never even touched a drop of tea. He spoke as little as a mute. When others offered lengthy greetings, at best he would nod. When teaching talisman drawing, if he could demonstrate, he wouldn’t speak; if one word could express his meaning, he would never use a full sentence.

Anyway, this was a blue-clothed half-immortal from the head office, said to have worked with General Commander Pang; he had to be far more expert than those people from the mines, able even to enter the imperial palace; could he be an ancestor?

But as time went on, everyone found that this instructor was unusually easy to get along with.

It seemed that he just wasn't very used to opening his mouth to speak. He wasn't ignoring anyone. When people flattered him, he didn't smile, and when country bumpkins cracked jokes, he also didn't react. Many of the Kaiming Cultivators were illiterate. They had an extremely hard time when they started learning to draw talismans. Sometimes the registrar would be watching from the sidelines, wiping away sweat, but the instructor had never once lost his patience. If a person couldn't learn something after being taught a hundred times, he would demonstrate it just the same for the hundred and first time, his manner as natural as though this were just right and proper, not forced at all.

It took three days to get through teaching the water dragon talisman; the registrar breathed a big sigh of relief and was just about to see the instructor out when one of his subordinates ran in breathlessly. "Registrar! Big news! Mister... Mister..."

The registrar frowned. “What big news? Stop panting.”

“M-m-mister Bai! Mr. Bai is here!”

Hardly had he finished speaking than a person wearing a bamboo hat walked in. All the Kaiming Department’s veteran stewards instantly quieted down and stood up in unison. The students didn’t know what great personage had come. They hurriedly stood as well, so nervous they didn’t know what to do with their hands.

Then the department head of Jinping’s Kaiming Department, having also received word, came trotting out to meet him. “Mr. Bai!”

Only the senior figures in the Kaiming Department had seen Mr. Bai, who served His Highness Prince Zhuang. After the Kaiming Department had gotten on the right track, he had gone to the Luwu, becoming increasingly mysterious.

The students, not daring to breathe too loudly, carefully began to size up this founder of the Kaiming Department. They saw that he appeared to be in his twenties or thirties, with a gaunt figure, extremely agile. Under the bamboo hat was a face that seemed to have been chiseled with a hatchet.

“No need to muster the troops, I’m not here on official business. I’ve just returned to Jinping and have come in my lord’s stead to pay a visit to a young relative of his.” Mr. Bai casually exchanged greetings with the department head, then familiarly raised a hand and greeted the blue-clothed instructor: “Xi Yue.”

The department head was startled. “What, Instructor Xi is...”

Mr. Bai said, smiling, “Part of the Marquis of Yongning’s family.”

Instructor Xi—Xi Yue—saw him, and a slight smile at last appeared on his always indifferent face. He quickly walked over and saluted the department head to take his leave.

Mr. Bai lightly slapped him on the back and said in exasperation, “Talk.”

Only then did Xi Yue speak: “Department head, I’m going to step out.”

This was the department head’s first time hearing him say such a long sentence. He was so overwhelmed with flattery that he began to stutter. “Oh, oh, good, t-take care, instructor.”

Xi Yue followed Mr. Bai out of the Kaiming Department and at once impatiently made a series of rapid hand gestures.

Mr. Bai said, “Yes, my lord has left the mountain...but Flying Jade Peak is still sealed. He didn’t see the Viscount.”

Xi Yue stared blankly. The light in his eye faded.

Five years ago, that scoundrel Xi Ping had abandoned him in the southern mines and broken the dragon-taming chain. He’d had no alternative but to follow Pang Jian. It was General Commander Pang who had personally altered his core array. From then on, he had been able to direct spiritual energy like an open-eyed cultivator. With this foundation, Xi Yue had taken care of the rest of the arrays himself. He remembered everything he saw and had scarfed down the whole pile of books General Zhi had given them when they had left the mountain; he learned arrays by analogy. Pang Jian had valued his talents and covered up his half-puppet identity for him. When they returned to Jinping, he had stayed with Heaven’s Design Pavilion.

In the last five years, Xi Yue had reworked his puppet body. He looked older and more human. But while he could speak, he was still used to using hand signs most of the time.

After being silent for a while, Xi Yue’s sign language continued, slower: I know. The General Commander just wrote a letter to ask Immortal Lin Zhaoli. Immortal

Lin also said that Flying Jade Peak was still sealed...but the old lady's birthday is coming up.

Mr. Bai sighed. "There's still nothing to be done about it. There will be time later."

Xi Yue anxiously signed, This year is different.

The old lady was turning eighty this year, a full decade birthday. How many full decade birthdays could a mortal have?

Mr. Bai said, "The old lady will live to a ripe old age. There'll be another decade. Open-eyed cultivators don't remain in seclusion longer than a decade. Whatever happens, the Viscount will return then."

Xi Yue lowered his head desolately. Then it's good that His Highness has come back...

"My lord isn't returning to Jinpinging."

Xi Yue stared.

"Oh, the Luwu have some business." Mr. Bai paused, his smile becoming somewhat forced. "Wait...wait until your Viscount leaves the mountain, and maybe then my lord will find some time to come. I'll ask you to continue looking after the Marquis Manor. Take this back with you."

Saying so, Mr. Bai took out a mustard seed and gave it to Xi Yue. "For the old lady's birthday feast, the birthday present from Prince Zhuang Manor has been prepared by me according to specifications. In here is the present my lord picked out himself. I am a half-demon, and it is unsuitable for me to call at people's homes on auspicious days, so I won't be going. I'll wish the old lady a happy birthday ahead of time. May her happiness be as boundless as the eastern seas, may she live as long as the mountains, and may her most prosperous days lie ahead of her."

All Xi Yue could do was force a smile. Mr. Bai patted him on the shoulder, exchanged a few more sentences with him like a big brother, then turned into a piece of paper and floated away on the wind.

Xi Yue clutched the mustard seed and sighed soundlessly. Suddenly, he noticed something. When he turned his head, he saw that Pang Jian had landed behind him undetectably.

"There's nothing wrong," Pang Jian said. "That half-demon Bai Ling must have passed the established foundation barrier recently. As soon as he arrived, the Azure Dragon Towers became nervous. I went out to have a look—what, I heard Zhou Ying has left the mountains?"

Xi Yue nodded.

“My god, that demonic star. My eyelids will be twitching for a month.” Pang Jian rubbed the center of his brow and said with a sigh, “The Luwu has been getting up to something in the north these last few days. Yuzhou’s Heaven’s Design Pavilion branch reports that they’ve sent at least another four teams across the Xia River... It makes it seem like we at Heaven’s Design Pavilion have been pretty incompetent all these years. No wonder the immortal sect actually dares to use him. I hope it won’t blow up in their faces.”

Xi Yue frowned.

“Oh, all right, I’ll stop.” Pang Jian raised a hand. “Bai Ling gave you a present for Old Madam Xi, right? Run along. On the day of the birthday feast, I’ll come by to ask for a drink.”

After sending off Xi Yue, Pang Jian narrowed his eyes and turned his head to look north. He saw a white figure flash in midair and nod in greeting toward him from afar.

Pang Jian cupped his hand and watched Bai Ling rise and fall a few times, then disappear. He must have gone back to Prince Zhuang Manor to attend to some business. The cynical expression on Pang Jian's face dimmed.

He had heard practically everything that Bai Ling had said to Xi Yue just now.

That brat Zhou Ying hadn't stepped out of the Latent Cultivation Temple for five years, and it hadn't kept him from turning everything upside down. What could require his personal attention? Were the Luwu planning to assassinate the sect leader of Dongheng's Sanyue Sect or something?

He just didn't want to return to Jinping.

It would seem that perhaps Xi Shiyong really was...

Back then, even General Zhi had nearly folded in the East Sea. With the situation so perilous, it was probably only that stubborn half-puppet who was foolishly still waiting for Xi Ping to come back.

Pang Jian thought, When the old lady at Marquis Manor's lifespan comes to an end, I'll have to find that half-puppet some more to do.

Just then, he sensed something. He took Heaven's Design Pavilion's token out. Seeing that the message once again came from the Yuzhou Heaven's Design Pavilion branch by the Wan-Chu border, his head instantly swelled.

He touched the messaging token and saw that Yuzhou's Heaven's Design Pavilion had reported: Xiang Zhao confirmed dead, killed by Qiu Sha.

Pang Jian's expression became grim.

Western Chu was unlike Xuanyin. Chu was ruled by the Xiang family, and the capital of Dongheng was built at the feet of the immortal mountains. The Sanyue state sect was dominated by the imperial family. Theirs was the final word.

Though they were both cultivation sects, Sanyue was far more relaxed than Xuanyin. Sanyue didn't have such a complicated power structure, and naturally it also didn't have so many regulations and taboos.

At Xuanyin, even Zhi Xiu had to go to the Principal Peak to request a token if he wanted to leave the mountains. No established foundation cultivator or above in the inner sect was permitted to go beyond the Latent Cultivation Temple unlawfully. The thirty-six peak masters all watched each other, worried that someone would give cause for gossip. At Sanyue, no one cared. Never mind established foundations, in recent years they'd had an ascended spirit master leave the mountains to fool around; he'd gotten his passions aroused and disastrously gotten married and fathered a child. The child of an ascended spirit cultivator wouldn't be a mortal baby to begin with; the mother and child dying together was the best outcome. The ascended spirit himself had had his Way of the Heart damaged over this and had passed away not long after, becoming the laughing stock of all four nations.

Sanyue was lax toward its own disciples and sloppy and incompetent when it came to dealing with outsiders. From top to bottom, the whole nation was easygoing. The spiritual stone black market in Western Chu was half public, with quite a few influential figures mixed in. Those with significant family property even dared to sit on a hill of spiritual stones and open their spiritual eyes without authorization—anyway, if they found someone to make an exception after the fact and greased a few palms in the immortal mountains, Sanyue would turn a blind eye.

The other three nations all thought that if they went on messing around like this, something was sure to go wrong sooner or later. But as long as Dongheng's Dragon Vein didn't break and Sanyue's great array remained intact, apart from squabbling from a distance, there was nothing the other nations could do about Chu's domestic affairs.

And then something had indeed gone wrong.

Two years ago, Sanyue's various black markets, which seemed to be raising venomous insects, had finally turned out a big one—an ascended spirit evil cultivator had surfaced. Not a shoddy product using a demonic god's spiritual bones to boost his cultivation level like Liang Chen—this was a genuine article ascended spirit. This person called herself Qiu Sha. The day she had reached the ascended spirit stage had been the fifteenth day of the eighth month, and all four nations had stood by watching as the mammoth full moon was dyed blood red.⁵¹

This unprecedented evildoer made all the great sects nervous. If not for her, Zhou Ying's Luwu wouldn't have been able to obtain approval from the immortal mountains so easily.

Sanyue had thoroughly humiliated themselves. Going all out in pursuit of her for two years, they hadn't caught a single hair off the great evildoer's head.

At the end of last year, Dongheng's Sanyue's greatest sword cultivator Xiang Zhao had personally left the mountains but later had mysteriously disappeared. With there being no word about such a great ascended spirit cultivator, it wasn't long before unusual phenomena began to occur—Dongheng's mountain range had an earthquake. At the time, people said it was because Xiang Zhao had passed away.

But this was Xiang Zhao... Before General Zhi had reached the ascended spirit stage, Xiang Zhao had been called the Sword of the South. And he had died at the hands of an evil cultivator who had reached the ascended spirit stage only two years ago!

Meanwhile, Xu Rucheng, who had just put down roots in Seventeen Li Town, also received the word.

Xu Rucheng responded to his colleague with “received,” organized his words, then wrote: In the Snake King’s secret underground labyrinth, there is a divine image carved from reincarnation wood that calls himself Tai Sui. He is extremely strange. He can speak with people. It was he who brought about the death of the Snake King.

Xu Rucheng paused, then added: Everything he says is a mixture of truth and falsehood.

This Tai Sui now said that he was an old tree who had cultivated a spirit, and then he said that he had seen A-Hua. If he had seen A-Hua, then he ought to have been a tree in Yuzhou. How could a tree from Yuzhou speak upper class Jinping official language? And according to what this Tai Sui had said, he had always been fast asleep inside the divine image, only occasionally woken by the Snake King’s offerings. So where had he learned all that authentic mixed language?

The first time Tai Sui had spoken to him, though he had been foul-mouthed and mixed up his accents, he had in all been rather normal, reasonable and able to communicate, and he had saved Xu Rucheng's life. Afterward, he had stopped speaking, and in order to figure out what was going on, imitating the Snake King, he had burned incense and worshipped in front of the divine image every day—Wild Fox Country's Great Market was just coming up, a magnificent gathering that took place once a year. All kinds of evil cultivators would come here to trade. Reasonably speaking, the real Snake King would also have been incessantly burning incense and praying for protection.

Hard work pays off. One night, his "worship" really did wake Tai Sui up.

But this time, this Tai Sui was for some reason extremely irritable. He only spat out the word "scram" at him and viciously left the wood.

Xu Rucheng considered, then added a sentence: His conduct is eccentric and unreasonable, his moods fickle.

But before he had stopped writing, all the writing vanished as if carried off by a great wind, not leaving a single word behind.

Tai Sui's voice, for some reason somewhat hoarse, sounded in his ear: "Who are you spilling the beans to?"

CHAPTER 72 - Indignant Cicadas (6)

This was just as if he had told someone “Here there be ghosts,” and when that person had turned away, a ghost’s face had popped up and asked him “Where?”

Had Xu Rucheng not been young and vigorous, his heart might have split open on the spot.

All the blood in his body whizzed toward his limbs, his liver went cold, and his pupils dilated enormously. Then he heard Tai Sui say in an extremely weary voice, “You can’t write the name of a person with a higher level of cultivation than you on an open-eyed grade immortal tool, hasn’t anyone taught you?”

Of course Xu Rucheng knew that, but while the Luwu’s communication tools were open-eyed grade, having undergone special modification through inscriptions, while they perhaps couldn’t match up to a Heavenly Question, as long as you didn’t get too close, you could even mention the full name of an ascended spirit cultivator directly. But this Tai Sui could easily spy on it and could even simply erase what he had written without saying a word. What must his cultivation level be?

Xu Rucheng had never heard of such a thing.

Besides, he had been burning incense and calling to him every day, and Tai Sui had barely given him a response—it wasn't that he had heard him and ignored him, it was that the reincarnation wood divine image had seemed to be dead, as if his consciousness wasn't there at all. That was why Xu Rucheng had let down his guard.

But there seemed to be something wrong with this evil god. He wouldn't come if you called him to his face, but if you discussed him behind his back, he would show up at once!

Moreover, the Tai Sui divine image wasn't even next to him now. What was the evil god attaching himself to in order to speak? Was he omnipresent?

If this kind of unfathomable entity had found the Snake King unpleasant, why hadn't he gotten rid of that evil cultivator long ago?

“I had no intention to offend,” Xu Rucheng answered cautiously. “I am merely inexperienced and lacking in knowledge. I have many doubts. After speaking to me that day, you vanished from sight, senior, and I only wanted to ask my companions for advice because I truly couldn't think of anything else to do. I didn't know I would violate your taboo, senior. Forgive me. After this, I certainly won't mention your name to others without permission.”

Tai Sui didn't speak for a long time. Then he gave a weary "sure." "If you do say something, it won't matter. You won't be able to say it aloud, anyway."

Xu Rucheng thought: What does he mean I won't be able to say it aloud?

How could this Tai Sui also simply keep him silent?

But he acutely sensed that he wasn't angry. The sluggishness and indifference in his voice didn't sound like bad temper on being woken up; rather, there was a sense of exhausted weakness.

Tai Sui was once again silent for a long time. Then his voice became a little clearer than before. "What do you mean my moods are fickle? That wasn't aimed at you, last time."

Then who had it been aimed at? Who else was there?

Xu Rucheng was just about to ask when his spiritual sense was suddenly touched. He heard faint footsteps and had to restrain himself for the moment. After a while, Misty Willow quietly opened the door and came in. As soon as he appeared in the doorway, he gave a very flirtatious smile, making Xu Rucheng break out in gooseflesh.

Raising his voice a little high, Misty Willow gently said, “Immortal, it’s time to change your medicine.”

“Put it there.” Xu Rucheng felt awkward as soon as he saw him. He put on the Snake King’s voice, which sounded like a broken gong, and coldly said, “Leave.”

Misty Willow’s smile froze. He didn’t dare to say anything else. All he could do was give a sinuous bow and shuffle out.

Xu Rucheng was watching Misty Willow in bewilderment: were there that many bendy places in a human body?

Then he heard Tai Sui unexpectedly say, “He’s already noticed that you’re an imposter.”

Xu Rucheng: “...”

His heart stuttered. He was afraid that sooner or later this evil god who wouldn’t be content unless he was saying something shocking would scare him to death.

Xu Rucheng automatically blurted out, “Stop.”

Misty Willow stiffly stopped in his tracks. Xu Rucheng's gaze became grave. He saw that this man's legs were shaking so hard that it was visible through his robes—he was afraid.

Tai Sui continued: "Think about it yourself, how many days have you been here? All this time, you haven't used him or hit him, and you haven't passed him on to anyone else. Is that normal behavior?"

Xu Rucheng thought to himself, What kind of people are these that they'd think not being humiliated was abnormal? Then he lowered his voice and asked, "Why are you shaking?"

It was all right before he asked. As soon as he spoke, Misty Willow's legs went weak, and he fell straight to his knees. His knees hit the stone floor so heavily that Xu Rucheng also became alarmed. Xu Rucheng was afraid he would cry out and quickly sealed his mouth with a talisman and tied him up. Misty Willow's eyes rolled up, and he lost consciousness.

Tai Sui said, "The Snake King's evil cultivator confidants will also be thinking it's unusual that there haven't been any wounds on Misty Willow for several days. If you have other companions, I think you'd be better off taking care of all those evil cultivators at once."

Xu Rucheng went blank. When Tai Sui said the words “evil cultivators,” his tone was so natural he simply seemed like one of Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s walkers in the mortal world; but at the same time, he made killing people sound even simpler than killing chickens. Hearing it made Xu Rucheng, a cultivator who came from a good family, feel a chill go up his spine.

Tai Sui changed the subject: “Though you can spare Misty Willow. Give him something to eat, he won’t give you away.”

“This is a seducer kept by the evil cultivator.” Xu Rucheng raised his eyebrows and examined Misty Willow. “This person is evidently a well-grown man, but he relies on sexual wiles, flatters and fawns. He’s unfilial and undutiful...”

“His problem isn’t contagious,” Tai Sui interrupted him impatiently. “That father wasn’t his birth father, either. He was the head of a theatrical troupe who bought him when he was little and sold him a hundred eighty times in all. Truly a small investment that brought ten-thousand fold returns. You want him to be filial? If it had been me in his place, I’d have cut that asshole to pieces and fed him to the dogs long ago.”

Having heard this, Xu Rucheng was even more disbelieving. How could this evil god know even the full history of an insignificant male favorite?

Tai Sui seemed to notice that he had let his words get away from him. He deliberately softened his vicious tone, saying, “Don’t mind him for now. Reckoning the date, I think the Great Market is coming up soon. In the next few days, the Snake King’s major customers ought to all be arriving in Wild Fox Village one by one. You certainly won’t be able to pretend to be injured to get out of seeing them.”

In fact, Xu Rucheng had just been worrying about this matter. He quickly said, “Please direct me, senior.”

“Easy enough. He has a secret account book. Without that, you won’t be able to handle those old customers,” Tai Sui said. “Tell me your background and your purpose in coming, and I’ll tell you where the account book is... I suppose your elders have taught you not to try lying to those whose cultivation is higher than yours?”

Xu Rucheng was silent.

“A half-immortal with no eye-opening wound on you. Clearly you had plenty of spiritual stones when you opened your spiritual eyes. You use immortal tools and talismans casually. The financial resources behind you are nothing to sneeze at,” Tai Sui said unhurriedly. “No one so rich would mobilize such forces just to scheme against Wild Fox Country, where the birds don’t even come to shit. I suppose you’ve come for that legendary monster Qiu Sha? All kinds of evil cultivators avoid her like the plague. They wouldn't rush to get close to her. Are you...a spy sent from Great Wan?"

In a few words, he had guessed pretty much right about Xu Rucheng. Xu Rucheng's eyelid twitched.

"Fine, I won't ask about anything else. I'm only curious about how you opened your spiritual eyes," Tai Sui said. "You don't seem like an evil...like a 'common cultivator.' Has Great Wan's immortal sect started enlisting from among the common people?"

Xu Rucheng could only say, "Yes, I am a Kaiming Cultivator. That so-called Snake King led the Chu across the border and killed hundreds of people in my hometown. Back then, I impulsively consumed a large quantity of spiritual stones and nearly died. But when I'd just managed to survive, before I'd had time to open my spiritual eyes, the immortal sect pacified the rebellion, and my enemy ran to Western Chu. Afterward, the immortal sect took pity and registered Kaiming Cultivators in our town. Though I hadn't yet opened my spiritual eyes then, having consumed the spiritual stones, my body was already different from an ordinary person's, so I also ended up on the list. Later, with the guidance of an eminent person, I had the good fortune to enter the Way entirely intact. In fact, I am no evil cultivator."

For a time, Tai Sui was bewildered by his words. "...what kind of cultivator?"

The Kaiming Cultivators weren't any kind of secret. Everyone in Great Wan knew about them. So Xu Rucheng explained in detail.

After listening to him, Tai Sui didn't speak for a long moment, so Xu Rucheng couldn't resist saying, "I have answered you. Please instruct me, senior. Where is the account book you mentioned?"

Tai Sui laughed. "Of course such an important thing has to be kept close—he sewed it into the skin of his belly."

Xu Rucheng said, "What!"

He had used an immortal tool to disguise the corpse and to take on the Snake King's identity. It was fine when he was wearing it, but placed on the corpse, the immortal tool would lack a supply of spiritual energy over time and would certainly fall off. If someone had seen the body then, they would immediately have known who was disguising himself as Wild Fox Country's Snake King.

For safety's sake, Xu Rucheng had already had the body removed and burned!

Had it really...

No...wait, that was wrong.

Xu Rucheng quickly restrained himself. There was a faint warning in his heart, telling him to be wary of this lying evil creature.

“Senior, I’m not a three-year-old child to be tricked just like that. That evil cultivator has been getting benefits from both sides in Wild Fox Country all these years. He’s collected countless spiritual stones and strange treasures. How could he sew something important into the skin of his belly like an ordinary person?”

Anyway, his Luwu colleagues were all very careful. How could they not have closely inspected the body before burning it?

Completely insincerely, Tai Sui said, laughing, “Pretty quick reaction there. Haha, I was teasing you.”

Xu Rucheng: “...”

He noticed that his mental state was unsteady and determined not to speak to this mysterious Tai Sui again. This thing was very strange, simply like a demon out of legend. If he let down his guard just a little, he would be dragged into a ditch.

Xu Rucheng had already worked out that this Tai Sui was definitely bound by certain rules, and for some reason, Xu Rucheng was the only person he could even speak to—otherwise, given that his mouth alone was enough to kill, the Snake King certainly couldn't have hung around in Wild Fox Country for so long. Xu Rucheng even suspected that his own inability to mention Tai Sui in a letter to his colleagues probably wasn't because of Tai Sui's magic powers, but because the rules that bound him meant he couldn't be spoken of.

As long as he didn't listen and didn't waver, even a heart demon couldn't do anything to him.

Tai Sui noticed his caution, laughed, and didn't try again to disturb his intellect.

Xu Rucheng concentrated, mentally recited a mind calming spell, and dragged the unconscious Misty Willow into the secret room. He wasn't planning on killing him—though he was revolted, he in fact didn't understand whether this little actor's conduct had been good or evil; it wasn't up to him to mete out extralegal punishment.

But dealing with this person was still a problem, so Xu Rucheng called over a few reliable people hiding out in Wild Fox Country cooperating with him to discuss strategies for dealing with the situation.

The lead Luwu was the most experienced person among them, called Lao Tian. Had Xu Rucheng not been impatient for revenge and simply gone in by a side door to carry out a large-scale attack, Lao Tian would have been the one making the greatest progress—his fake identity had already put down roots in Wild Fox Country. He was the most familiar with this place.

As soon as Lao Tian walked into the secret room, his expression went blank. Pointing to the unconscious Misty Willow, he said, “Why have you tied him up?”

Xu Rucheng said, “I had to, Uncle Tian, he found me out. I called you over to discuss this matter, to see how...”

“Slow down.” Lao Tian waved a hand and gravely said, “You say he found you out. How did he find you out? With the Snake King's hot and cold temper, he might have a nightmare and wake up to drag the person in his bed out and bury him alive. There's nothing surprising about him doing any kind of insane thing. Even if your behavior and manner in impersonating him is a little different from before, it still isn't likely to make people suspect that you're a replacement. A mortal like him naturally can't see through an immortal tool... Don't be hasty, tell me in detail, what is it that we've overlooked?"

Xu Rucheng: "..."

That was true.

He suddenly remembered—he had been knocked a little silly by Tai Sui's sudden statement and had automatically believed it when the evil god said "He's already realized it."

As for Misty Willow trembling when he stopped him... That Snake King had beat him and tormented him for no reason; it was normal for him to tremble!

Tai Sui's hateful laughter sounded in his ear. No good, he'd been duped!

Xu Rucheng's expression changed abruptly. He took a step forward and quickly scanned Misty Willow with his consciousness. In the blink of an eye, he turned up three or four surveillance devices on the male favorite's body.

The Snake King's subordinate evil cultivators, seeing that the Snake King was injured, had conceived evil intentions and had put surveillance devices on the Snake King's favorite. The upshot was that he had taken fright and rashly knocked Misty Willow out, then called over his colleagues...that was giving himself away!

“Who doesn't want a gold mine like Wild Fox Country?” Tai Sui said softly. “When the wolf king is injured, of course all the crows who serve him will be itching to replace him. Only a little thief who's stolen someone else's nest will stupidly worry that others have realized he's an imposter. Young man, let me give you a word of advice: whatever you fear will come to pass.”

Lao Tian took one look and understood. He held down Xu Rucheng. “Don't panic! We would have had to gradually replace these evil cultivators with our own people anyway. It's no big deal to act early!”

But Tai Sui said, laughing, “That's optimistic. They've already run off! They must be nearly out of Wild Fox Country by now. I wonder who they wrote to before they left, hm?”

Xu Rucheng was at the end of his tether. “What the hell do you want?!”

Lao Tian only saw his lips moving. “What are you muttering about?”

Only then did Xu Rucheng realize that the sentence he had shouted had been voiceless... That wasn't right. He had been talking to this Tai Sui when he had killed the Snake King, and it had scared the Snake King witless.

What was going on?

Xu Rucheng's scalp prickled. For a moment, he felt like an insect that had stepped into layer upon layer of spiderweb; all he could do was let himself get pushed around.

"It's simple. I need an errand runner. I want you to make a heart demon oath upon your spirit to carry out tasks for me in the future. Then I'll tell you where those people are." Tai Sui seemed to be able to see into his mind. "First, the tasks I give you won't harm your colleagues and companions; second, they won't harm your conscience; and third, they won't spoil your lord's plans. If something violates the preceding three conditions, you don't have to do it."

As Xu Rucheng followed Lao Tian's instructions in a muddle, he tightly clenched his teeth. The first thing Mr. Bai had taught them was to mind your blood and your horoscope and not let people easily obtain them, and also not to readily consent to any vow whose contents were the least unclear.

Tai Sui said, “This is bad. I think someone’s already left Wild Fox Country.”

Xu Rucheng’s temples pounded.

Tai Sui said, “Oh no, he’s already contacted an accomplice outside. The earth is vast, how are you ever going to catch up with them...”

Xu Rucheng said, “First, you can’t harm my colleagues and companions in the slightest. Second, you can’t go against my conscience in the least bit. Third, you can’t hinder my lord’s plans in any way. If your orders don’t violate the preceding three conditions, I swear on my spirit that I will carry them out. If I violate this oath, I will be annihilated body and spirit! All right?!”

Tai Sui paused. For some reason, the irreverence and ridicule in his voice faded somewhat. “I thought you would add another condition, that I can’t harm your family or your life.”

Xu Rucheng said angrily, “I have no more family, and you’re welcome to my life!”

The evil god sighed softly. As if placing a stamp on his spirit, he said, “So be it.”

Two days later, nighttime.

Alone, Xu Rucheng disguised himself anew and silently left Wild Fox Country to go to a slaughterhouse in Tao County's county seat. He suspected that Tai Sui was playing him again—last time, when he had forced him to swear the heart demon oath, Tai Sui had falsely led him to believe that the flames were about to burn up to his eyebrows, but the upshot had been that in fact the evil cultivators who had placed surveillance devices on Misty Willow had all still been in Wild Fox Country.

They couldn't hear Xu Rucheng's conversation with Tai Sui. When they had "seen" him tie up Misty Willow and drag him into the secret room, they had simply thought he wanted to play some new game. When Xu Rucheng had brought Lao Tian and others into the secret room for a discussion, it had already been late at night. All those spying evil cultivators had already drunkenly gone to fool around. They hadn't noticed what was happening! In less than two incense sticks, they had been quietly captured by his Luwu colleagues.

Xu Rucheng was so wrathful that the roots of his teeth itched.

He didn't even know what Tai Sui was attached to that let him speak to him, but at any rate that male voice that kept him running around in circles always seemed to follow him like his shadow, deceiving him whenever he wanted to amuse himself!

“...look out for the inscriptions on the ground.”

Following instructions, Xu Rucheng drew back his foot and found that he had nearly stepped on a rather covert inscription—his expression became serious. Why would there be an inscription in a slaughterhouse?

“They’re everywhere,” Tai Sui said languidly. “Don’t let your mind wander, keep yourself alive. Fifty steps forward, there's an array. When you activate it, there will be a secret passage under it. Watch out. If you’re discovered, you’ll be silenced at once.”

Xu Rucheng couldn’t resist asking, “What kind of place is this?”

Tai Sui said, “A slaughterhouse.”

Xu Rucheng: “...”

Obviously!

But he walked forward in accordance with Tai Sui’s instructions. He hadn’t yet walked fifty steps when Tai Sui called him to a halt. “Why, you’ve passed it. Listen, Cheng-bao'er, why are you taking such long steps? Doing the splits?"

Xu Rucheng had to back up a little. As expected, he found an array.

He had studied this array in the Luwu. It really was a gateway.

As Xu Rucheng carefully activated the array, he silently criticized: while he was fairly tall, he still didn't exceed average height for an adult man. He was no giant, and his stride was naturally of ordinary length... Had this Tai Sui counted the steps wrong? Or was his original body a dwarf?

After quietly prying open the array, Xu Rucheng stuck a stealth talisman onto himself and slipped inside like a fish. The smell of incense hit him in the face.

The incense smell was mixed with a rancid reek, as well as the smell of grease. Breathing in a mouthful made you feel sick. Xu Rucheng's spiritual sense sent frenzied warnings. He put his hand into his clothes and clutched his chopper.

Tai Sui seemed to be very familiar with this place. He knew inside out where there were traps and where there were guards, as if he had been here countless times.

Xu Rucheng snuck in with alarms but no danger, then heard Tai Sui sigh, practically with a touch of absolving himself. “It’s in there.”

Xu Rucheng placed his spiritual sense in his eyes and, in the dark, looked in the direction he had indicated. He went blank.

In this slaughterhouse for livestock, there turned out to be a deep prison. Inside were twenty or more emaciated boys and girls, from those who were twelve or thirteen to those who were fifteen or sixteen, all huddled together.

In the center of the round prison was a stone platform. The bloodstains on the platform hadn’t dried yet. Beside cutting tools and ropes, there was...a pair of dismembered limbs.

CHAPTER 73 - Indignant Cicadas (7)

Xu Rucheng blurted out a line of Yuzhou slang: “What in blue blazes...?”

He remembered Tai Sui’s seemingly pointless answer earlier—this was a slaughterhouse.

Xu Rucheng had joined the Luwu to dedicate himself to his country and to get revenge. He had known he would have dealings with all kinds of evil cultivators; he had been ready to conceal his identity and go underground. But now he was still chilled to the bone. The ghost stories adults had told to scare children when he was little surged up one after another—human meat buns, medicine made with human organs...

“Don’t move.”

Xu Rucheng had been about to take a step forward and was called to a halt by Tai Sui. He came back to himself, touched his face, and struggled to shake the wild thoughts out of his head.

Total nonsense... That was all total nonsense repeated by villagers...

Human meat was no tastier than pork, beef, or lamb—who would eat human? Anyway, was there any meat on these children’s bodies? And there were so many spiritual beasts for making elixirs in Southern Shu—weren't they all more useful than mortals?

“Who are these people?”

Tai Sui said, “A specialty of Wild Fox Country's black market. They're called spiritual image dolls.”

“...what kind of dolls?”

“A spiritual image doll is a kind of insurance,” Tai Sui said unhurriedly in the gloomy prison. “All of Chu's wealthy people want to prolong their lifespans, live hundreds of years without aging. Many of them open their spiritual eyes without authorization. Anyway, when it comes down to it, all they have to do is pay Sanyue some protection money every year. But spiritual energy is scarce in the mortal world, and unevenly distributed. If your meridians haven't been infused with spiritual energy, you'll end up with an eye-opening wound if you're lucky. If you're unlucky or in poor health, forget about prolonging your lifespan, you'll go see your ancestors right on the spot. Opening your spiritual eyes is like gambling with your life. The wealthy treasure their lives. So even if they've made all kinds of preparations, they still give themselves insurance—spiritual image dolls.”

Xu Rucheng had never heard of this. He asked, “How does that protect them?”

“Buy a living person whose spiritual image is similar to yours, usually between twelve and sixteen. Too young is brittle, too old is unclean. Then a secret art of Western Chu is used to connect the buyer’s spiritual eyes with the teenager. That’s a spiritual image doll... You can think of them as a sort of stand-in. When the buyer opens their spiritual eyes, half of the spiritual energy that pours into their body will be split off by the doll. This way, even if there’s a part of the buyer’s body that hasn’t been fully soaked in spiritual energy, the impact on them will be much smaller. It will hardly leave any eye-opening wounds.”

Xu Rucheng was struck dumb.

Evil cultivators were nothing. Evil cultivators themselves were covered in scars from eye-opening wounds; they couldn’t compare to these wealthy Dongheng people!

“Close your mouth, stop looking like a country bumpkin.” Tai Sui tsked. “At the Wild Fox Country Great Market, there’s more demand for spiritual image dolls than the supply can meet. The Snake King hadn’t heard of this convenient forbidden art when he opened his spiritual eyes, so he ended up covered in eye-opening wounds. He was always brooding about it. This is the business he took the highest percentage from. It's your main financial backing."

Xu Rucheng thought, Some motherfucking financial backing.

"When the buyers open their spiritual eyes, what happens to these kids?"

Tai Sui said, impatiently, "A mortal's completely unprepared meridians have a large quantity of spiritual energy poured into them—what do you think happens? If their deaths looked pleasant, do you think that the buyers would leave these spiritual image dolls in the slaughterhouse instead of taking them away?"

Xu Rucheng's mind roared—in other words, the children being used as spiritual energy vessels were shut up in here and had no idea when they would explode and die.

"The buyers...the buyers know this and can't bear to see it?"

"Obviously," Tai Sui said. "Haven't you heard the saying 'a gentleman stays away from the kitchen'?"

Hearing this, the hotheaded Xu Rucheng, who had taken part in a revolt five years ago, had an urge to take up his old profession once more here in Western Chu. His eyes slowly fell on the stone platform in the center of the prison.

“Oh, that. That’s for dealing with the bodies. The spiritual image dolls die through the impact of a great quantity of spiritual energy. Their bodies are valuable. You can’t let money go to waste,” Tai Sui said. “Flesh and blood mixed with a great quantity of spiritual energy can be used as fodder for spiritual beasts. The organs can be used to make elixirs, cheaper than using spiritual beasts. With luck, you can even get a little bit of spiritual bone out of it, the best product for toolmaking. Also...”

Xu Rucheng was starting to feel sick. “Also?”

Tai Sui paused. There seemed to be a peculiar laugh suppressed in his voice. “You can use them as offerings to evil gods during festivals. They’re full of spiritual energy—isn’t that more respectable than horse meat or beef?”

Xu Rucheng covered his mouth, holding back his retching.

Tai Sui had said before that the Snake King had made offerings of “raw meat” to the reincarnation wood divine image... He was absolutely certain now that this so-called “Grand Duke Tai Sui” was trapped in the reincarnation wood. If he had been able to move a single fingernail, he would have cooked the Snake King into jerky long ago.

“Using human flesh as tribute, wasn’t he afraid of being struck by heavenly lightning? Or was he tacitly accepting that he was worshipping a monster... Wait, no, I didn’t mean you, senior...”

Tai Sui, his mood unreadable, said, “No, actually. That ogre believed that all gods eat humans—if the gods didn’t eat humans, what else would they eat? Would they eat the five grains the same way humans do?”

Xu Rucheng: “...”

Goodness gracious, what that evil cultivator had said actually made some sense. For a moment, he actually couldn’t refute it!

“Can’t they die?”

“Great Warrior Da Cheng, do you think everyone is like you, able to hack through gold and jade as soon as they pick up a chopper? Take a look at these little ghosts. They’ve hardly eaten a good meal since they were born. On a good day they might not have the strength to stab themselves to death, never mind that their food and drink is drugged. Even if they manage to get hold of a weapon and pull it across their necks, they still need to bleed for a while before they die, right? An elixir will bring them right back.” Tai Sui said, “Do you want me to describe in detail what the outcome is if they don’t manage to die?”

Xu Rucheng didn’t want that at all. “Senior, if you had told me this before, I wouldn’t have hesitated to come even without the heart demon oath. What should I do?”

“You?” Tai Sui paused, then indifferently said, “Oh, whatever you like. I’m all right.”

Xu Rucheng let out a breath. “...didn’t you bring me here to rescue them?”

“You think I brought you here to get yourself killed?” Tai Sui sighed. “Big brother, there’s at least one established foundation cultivator keeping watch here, and I figure there are around ten open-eyed evil cultivators. You want to steal the kids? You couldn’t even steal a couple dozen buns.”

Xu Rucheng didn’t quibble with his ruthless diction. He quickly reckoned: he remembered the way he had come. If he went back and requested reinforcements, what would their chances of taking down this den of evil cultivators be? An established foundation... They had an established foundation cultivator... If there was really nothing they could do, it would still be better to give these children easy deaths. That would also be a good deed...

Tai Sui seemed to know what he was thinking. “If you kill off this batch, they’ll find new spiritual image dolls. Or if you’re powerful enough, you might be able to get rid of this whole gang of evil cultivators... Ha, this bunch has a monopoly on Wild Fox Country’s trade in spiritual image dolls. If you kill them, those other envious evil cultivators may be so pleased they’ll build a temple in your honor.”

Xu Rucheng was at a complete loss after having this bucket of cold water dumped on him. “Wait, senior, so what did you actually bring me here to do?”

Tai Sui said, “The third kid from the left, the one with the shaved head, and the rightmost girl sitting staring into space. Each of them has an amulet made of reincarnation wood... Oh, there’s also one that’s fallen under the butchering platform. Take them all and destroy them for me. That’s all. The rest has nothing to do with me. You can do whatever you like.”

Hearing his incomprehensible instructions, Xu Rucheng became even more bewildered. Relying on the stealth talisman he had on him, he went to the butchering platform. His eyes avoided the not fully grown severed limbs on the platform. Indeed, there was a reincarnation wood amulet sticking out of a crack under the stone platform.

There was a rather coarse divine image carved onto the wooden amulet, called “Tai Sui”—this was a Tai Sui amulet.

Reincarnation wood liked darkness and damp. It was one of the most common trees along the banks of the Xia River, on the border between Wan and Chu. Seeing the local tyrant of Wild Fox Country worshipping Tai Sui, many locals had blindly imitated him, praying that this deity of unknown origin would bless them as he had blessed the Snake King. You could buy Tai Sui amulets at quite a few miscellaneous goods stands.

After he turned the amulet over, he sucked in a breath as though his eyes had been stung. On the back of the wooden amulet was a very small bloody handprint, with one deep scratch made by a fingernail. Xu Rucheng could easily imagine how, when the overwhelming spiritual energy had come surging in, this frightened child had had nowhere to run and could only pour all their will to live into this wooden amulet...hoping that there was someone who could save them.

On the point of death, how much strength could a person exert? This little hand had even left a mark on the wooden amulet, had even kept holding on in death. Only when the body had been hauled away and dismembered had the bloodstained amulet dropped under the stone platform, unnoticed.

Why would this evil god want to destroy his own amulets?

“Senior...”

Before he could ask, Tai Sui interrupted him. “It has nothing to do with you. It won’t harm your conscience to destroy a few pieces of wood, will it?”

The heart demon oath was hanging over his head. However much this stuck in Xu Rucheng’s throat, he could only act according to orders and go remove the other two amulets.

Concealing himself from the eyes and ears of these mortal teenagers took less effort than blowing away dust. He didn’t even need to approach the iron cage to get the amulets. He quickly reached out across empty space and took the one from the boy. Then he came up in front of the girl.

Whether it was coincidence or something else, through the iron cage, the girl’s hollow eyes were looking directly at Xu Rucheng. The two gazes met, one falsely and one truly.

Xu Rucheng’s extended hand stopped in midair.

Tai Sui said, “Don’t you know how to use a sleep spell?”

“I do.” Xu Rucheng didn’t break eye contact with the girl for a moment. After being silent for a while, he whispered, “Senior, I don’t know why you want to destroy your amulets, but do you have to take away the only thing they have to rely on?”

Tai Sui said, with a cold laugh, “Isn’t it stupid to rely on a piece of rotten wood?”

The corners of Xu Rucheng’s mouth tensed at once.

Tai Sui said, “No nonsense...”

“It is stupid.” Xu Rucheng abruptly jerked his gaze away from the girl’s dried up eyes and faced upward toward the chilly inscriptions on the ceiling of the prison.

Of course it was stupid. Back then, his parents, his uncles, his grandparents, his fellow townspeople...and the girl in his heart, hadn’t they all been this stupid? Pitiful insects vainly wishing for a god or buddha to come carry them through their troubles?

“Incredibly stupid. Everyone who comes to the end of their road is stupid. I know I’ve sworn a heart demon oath, so I’ll take the amulets for you, and you can stop rushing me! Aren’t you disgusted that one of your believers would give you another believer’s flesh and blood as an offering?!” Xu Rucheng abruptly raised his voice, which only he and the evil god could hear. “Do you know what it means to come to the end of the road? Do you know what it feels like to have had no freedom since birth? You don’t know anything. Can’t you at least leave them a bit of dignity when you speak?! Have a heart, your divinity!”

Tai Sui was stony-hearted. He was entirely unmoved by these words. “Heart demon oath.”

“Fuck!” Xu Rucheng swore angrily. The rims of his eyes turned red. He raised a sleep talisman in midair and aimed it at the little girl’s brow.

Still hugging her knees, the girl’s head fell sideways. She fell asleep like that.

Xu Rucheng crooked his fingers across the distance, and a reincarnation wood amulet flew from the girl and landed in his hand. The veins rose on the back of his hand. The three amulets instantly turned to fine dust. “All right?!”

“Good boy.” Tai Sui seemed to breathe out a long sigh. After a moment, he resumed his odious tone of voice: “Even if you muster reinforcements when you get back, you won’t be able to destroy this bunch of evil cultivators without anyone knowing. If you’re exposed, your lord’s plans in Seventeen Li Town will get nowhere.”

Xu Rucheng clenched his teeth with a click. “There is no need for you to remind me of that.”

Tai Sui didn’t bicker with him. He laughed softly. “Western Chu is some awful place. There are many mountains and many wrong roads. Natural disasters are frequent. It’s rare for a whole family to suffer no disasters within a given year. All these little ghosts were taken from disaster-stricken places. You can buy the cheaper ones for a single copper coin. But when they’re made into spiritual image dolls, each one will cost at least a box of white spirits. Who wouldn’t be envious of a trade that brings such big returns on investment? Established foundation cultivators can have whatever they want in the mortal world. When have you seen them be cautious?”

Xu Rucheng stopped in his tracks.

“This is ‘Tao’ County—‘tao’ as in ‘flee.’⁵² There’s no shortage of desperate criminals. What are you waiting for? Hurry up and spread the word, get someone else to do your dirty work for you. If you wait for the trouble to come when they get to Seventeen Li Town, it'll fall on you," Tai Sui said in a tone that seemed to be angry that a piece of wood couldn't reach enlightenment. "Which prince did you say your lord was before? Where did he dig up a walking, talking, brainless club like you? Why didn't anyone teach you how to be an evil cultivator before you came here?"

Xu Rucheng took to his heels and ran.

"Hey, look out. If you step on a trap, I won't save you. I just taught you a lesson for free, so it won't be asking too much for you to do something else for me, right?"

"What?" said Xu Rucheng.

Then he heard Tai Sui say, "I want you to cut down the reincarnation wood trees within a hundred li radius of Wild Fox Country and from now on forbid everyone in Tao County to worship Tai Sui or to privately keep a Tai Sui amulet."

Xu Rucheng's eyes flashed. He thought to himself, It's true. He is trapped in the reincarnation wood. It sounds as if, if he wants to escape, he can only do it by destroying all the reincarnation wood in the vicinity.

With this guess in mind, he tentatively said, “So about the statue in the Immortal Palace...”

Tai Sui interrupted him in a sincere tone: “Cheng’er, I think that lovely head of yours is sitting on your neck just to help you carry on with little girls. Don’t try getting clever with me. Or else I’ll make fun of you and you’ll start crying again, and it’ll be very tiring for me to hold back from laughing at you.”

Xu Rucheng: “...”

This son-of-a-bitch of an evil god.

“I’ll leave it up to you how to handle it. If you’re afraid I’ll go out haunting if the divine image is gone, you can go ahead and keep burning incense for it,” Tai Sui said indifferently. “Only when you burn the incense, remember to bathe in incense ash, be sure not to have any injuries or illnesses...and you can’t eat spicy food, garlic, or preserved or cured meat, and if you violate any one of those conditions, the heart demon oath will backlash against you.”

Xu Rucheng was all at sea. He had no idea what this evil god’s problem was.

Three days later, on the night of the new moon, in a place no one knew about, bloody light lit up a slaughterhouse in Tao County.

The concealment inscriptions the slaughterhouse used were second-class. Even if an ascended spirit immortal came in person, they wouldn't be able to break them apart silently. The evil cultivators inside the slaughterhouse had never thought that this perfectly safe place would be exposed. They were taken by surprise. And in the midst of the fierce battle between cultivators from several sides, someone took advantage of the commotion to carry off all the spiritual image dolls. This person had been prepared. Not waiting to be pursued, they immediately broke the spiritual seals on the spiritual image dolls and made a clean getaway.

Wild Fox Country's black market strictly prohibited private fights, but until they reached Wild Fox Country, everyone had to rely on their own abilities. Evil cultivators were always killing each other and plotting for the sake of snatching treasures. This massacre could only count as an especially large incident involving especially fertile loot...and probably making the wealthy people counting on this method to open their spiritual eyes despair.

Meanwhile, Seventeen Li Town's Snake King, without any reason, suddenly issued an order forbidding anyone to worship Tai Sui again.

In the area of Wild Fox Country, perhaps the Snake King's word wasn't an imperial edict, but it was close enough.

The locals said that he had a special magic power that let him understand the speech of birds, beasts, and insects. Even mosquitoes were his scouts. If he only wanted to hear it, not even pillow talk could be hidden from his ears—but of course, this was an unfounded rumor. Even if the Snake King had been able to understand the speech of mosquitoes, he probably wouldn't have heard any news apart from "I'm going to sting you." The Snake King only had numerous lackeys and had planted over a hundred listening arrays in the streets and alleys of Wild Fox Country.

In sum, when the Snake King said they couldn't worship, no matter how unwilling the common people were, they still didn't dare to disobey. As soon as the order came down, they immediately no longer dared even to say prayers in private. The Snake King said they were forbidden to keep Tai Sui amulets, so overnight, practically all the Tai Sui amulets in Seventeen Li Town—even in all of Tao County—vanished without a trace.

And as Xu Rucheng watched anxiously, the mysterious reincarnation wood divine image showed no changes.

The sly evil god had used him and dropped him. He didn't speak to him again.

When Tai Sui had said he was a “tree spirit,” he hadn’t been entirely deceiving this talking club.

He had indeed been born in the reincarnation wood. Since his awareness had sprouted, he had always been trapped in the unprepossessing divine image, faced every day with the Snake King’s ugly face, which made him angry whenever he saw it.

He didn’t know what he was, couldn’t say whether he was dead or alive, and didn’t know what he was doing. Most of the time he was in a daze. Sometimes he would dream of a fragmentary scene, but before he could look at it closely, it would disappear like a bubble.

In Great Wan’s Yuzhou, the Snake King had frequently brought crowds of idiots to weep and drone while prostrating themselves before him; they called him “Tai Sui.”

For no reason at all, he hated this name. But it was no use hating it. Later, as people kept calling him that, he got used to it and gradually took “Tai Sui” as his name.

There was turmoil and war in Yuzhou. Tai Sui was trapped in the reincarnation wood, unaware of the passage of time—until it became popular among the people who worshipped Tai Sui to carve reincarnation wood into amulets and hang them up around the house or on themselves.

The amulets seemed to have a resonance with him. Gradually, Tai Sui found that his “consciousness” could “flow” through the amulets into the bodies of these people, so he could get a taste of what it was to be human.

Being human wasn’t very good—while Yuzhou was part of Great Wan, it was just across the river from Western Chu, and their dietary habits resembled those of the people of Chu. Their food was heavily salted and heavily seasoned, and they particularly liked pickled foods. Forced to “share in their joys and sorrows,” Tai Sui at first found it novel, but after a few days was nauseated by all the pickles and seasonings.

So he came to his first conclusion about “himself”: he didn’t like to eat like humans ate.

Wood didn’t have eyes. Tai Sui was like a blind man. Only when his consciousness rippled back after extending to others could he slowly work out what he was.

When his consciousness was attached to an urchin, he would get beaten along with them. The urchin would scream and cry, and he would feel a “bottom” and “palm” that he didn’t have. He was more afraid of having his palm hit than his bottom; he didn't know where the thought came from, but he thought that an adult was only truly angry when they hit your palm.

If his consciousness landed in the body of an adult, it would be a little more painful. Doing the same thing over and over day after day was all right for these people, but Tai Sui's consciousness would fragment from time to time. In the lightless factories and fields, he felt wrists, backs, waists...and knees that felt like pincushions.

He knew that when humans were happy, their bodies would feel like they were floating; when they anticipated something, their chests would itch; when they were angry, their heads would heat up and their hearts would pound against their ribs. He felt the floating, the itching, the pounding along with them, but he couldn't empathize with their emotions—there was nothing for it; his attention was always drawn by the insistently painful places on these people's bodies.

But though this was torment, mortals could endure it, so he could also make do with it and live. At least it let him recognize all the human sense organs.

At first, this Tai Sui born of reincarnation wood didn't understand anything. After his consciousness got a little more deeply entangled with these people, he became a little more clear-headed. While learning the Yuzhou dialect, he inexplicably “learned” another accent and dimly remembered a great deal of common knowledge...

That was before that ogre covered in snakeskin brought the Chu across the Xia River.

At that time, he still wasn't sure how many countries there were in the world. He didn't know who was an immortal and who was evil, and he didn't know why the person who “worshipped” him was covered in monstrous snakeskin scars.

Then the Chu came east, Xuanyin pacified the rebellion, the immortals fought, and the corpses of the nobodies were strewn over the ground.

The people who had “believed in” him had been sold out by his “immortal envoy.” The deaths and the resentment of the dying rebounded mercilessly onto his consciousness. Again and again, he struggled. Again and again, he “died.” This continued for months. When he opened his eyes again, he had come to Chu.

Having been forced through this campaign, his consciousness, confused as a small child's, grew up overnight. Without being taught, he knew the terms “immortal sect,” “evil cultivators,” “Xuanyin,” “Sanyue.”

Before, the snake-skinned evil cultivator had only used him to trick others. Later, he must have figured he had been blessed. Somehow, he had begun worshipping in earnest. So at last, through the Snake King's consciousness, Tai Sui tasted all different flavors and only then found that he didn't dislike eating; he even thought that the flavor of Chu food was all right...he only disliked the food those people whose shoulders, backs, and knees hurt had eaten.

It was much more pleasant to attach his consciousness to the Snake King, especially after that ogre put down roots in Wild Fox Country and could have anything he wanted—Tai Sui indulged in a life of luxury along with him and sometimes remembered a few more refined, more tasteful scenes.

But these trifles were useless. He had no interest in what shop had made the Snake King's precious stone studded belt, whatever Cui Ji or Yao Ji it was—all he wanted was to kill that ogre.

When he had been in Yuzhou, he had found that the more he sent his consciousness out, the clearer it would be when it rebounded, and the clearer it was, the stronger it was. Tai Sui had the feeling that when his consciousness reached a certain degree of strength, he might even be able to influence real people.

As more and more people in Wild Fox County worshipped Tai Sui, he started wildly sending his consciousness out—the easily frightened common people of Tao County, the trembling servants, the evil cultivators dying in battle, the extravagant wealthy people of Chu...as well as the “livestock” they feasted on. At first it was voluntary, but later, he could no longer control his consciousness. If there was someone holding his amulet and praying, he would involuntarily be drawn by it.

His consciousness, previously curled up weakly in the divine image, became stronger and stronger, but also more and more confused. He would often be trapped in the bodies of unknown people, confuse them with himself like Zhuangzi dreaming of being a butterfly. Fortunately, his desire to kill was steady enough. In five years, “kill the Snake King” had become a clear road marker, firmly holding him in place, dragging him back from the edge of madness countless times.

Until that assassin charged in.

As soon as that big idiot came in, Tai Sui’s muddled spiritual sense was suddenly touched. His scattered consciousness instantly returned to its original place. Then he found to his astonishment that there was a long-lost piece of his consciousness on the knotted bag that big idiot was carrying!

When the knotted bag got caught on the divine image, his consciousness fused, and a segment of distant memory floated up clearly. He remembered a teenage girl named A-Hua, remembered that his consciousness had once “travelled” through reincarnation wood.

He remembered that he wasn't a tree. It seemed that he was also a cultivator. Someone had taken his consciousness from his spiritual foundation and placed it into an illusion. But his consciousness, wandering through all the reincarnation wood, had been much stronger than that of an ordinary person. He had known perfectly well that it was an illusion. Though he had gone in obediently enough, he had from start to finish been concerned about A-Hua's fate. He had secretly snuck out a sliver of consciousness and headed against the current through the reincarnation wood to find her.

He had found the girl's lilac knotted bag, trampled into the dirt, but he hadn't found her. He had been going in circles in the divine image when it was as if something had abruptly shattered his consciousness. He hadn't known anything more.

The moment his previously broken consciousness fused, Tai Sui clearly felt that his original body was held in some place he couldn't reveal, and there were heavy rules restraining him like shackles.

But he hadn't had time to think it through carefully—the big idiot had a karmic connection to the knotted bag that went down to the bone, and he had spilled his blood on the reincarnation wood divine image. He could finally talk to someone!

He could finally kill the person he needed to kill!

All at once, he realized his long-cherished wish of the last five years, but the stabilizing force on his consciousness also disappeared.

The Tai Sui amulets had long ago become a specialty product of Tao County. Even the spiritual image dolls had gone along and believed in them. When his consciousness was attached to the spiritual image dolls, it would fall to pieces along with them, then scramble back to the divine image. He'd had enough.

Luckily, the big idiot was useful and easily tricked. Using his hands, Tai Sui took care of the reincarnation wood in the area that was constantly pulling away his consciousness. At last, his scattered consciousness assembled. He could sleep.

Perhaps this time, he could dream of what had actually happened five years ago.

If he couldn't dream of it, that was fine. He'd had enough of being human these last few years. He wasn't curious about his original body at all. He wanted to rest.

Plish—

In a daze, Tai Sui was startled by the sound of water. Something was pulling his consciousness.

He went through the quiet Seventeen Li Town and "looked" in the direction of the water. He "saw" a little boat floating in the Xia River.

What the hell? Where had the big idiot gone to burn his incense?

Before he could get a clear "look," a strange yet familiar female voice sounded in his ear: "So this is Western Chu."

CHAPTER 74 - Indignant Cicadas (8)

Oh? Who was this?

Tai Sui's disorderly consciousness concentrated slightly and passed through the mist on the river. He "saw" that the little boat had no propeller and there was no one rowing it, but it could still travel in a straight line in spite of the rapid flow of water in the Xia River.

A tall, slender "man" was standing at the prow, holding a small pot.

"He" was raggedly dressed, with a thin layer of skin and flesh stretched over the bones of the face and a nose bridge so high it was nearly projecting. On the left side of her face, there was a scar in the shape of an arc from the corner of the eye down to the jaw—it was completely uncovered, but exposure to the elements had made it less obvious. There were several rounds of bandages tied around her neck. Perhaps because she was so thin, there really did seem to be a slight protuberance on her neck when she raised her head.

Had Tai Sui not "heard" her speak before, at first glance, he practically would have mistaken her for a man.

Her appearance wasn't especially attractive, the direct opposite of "bright and lively" or "round as pearl and smooth as jade." From top to toe, she looked like a homeless drifter, with an air of bitterness.

But somehow, at first glance, Tai Sui had a friendly feeling toward her.

This woman convincingly dressed as a man drank a mouthful of wine, took out a reincarnation wood amulet, and rubbed it a few times—this was different from the amulets popular in Wild Fox Country; it was a protection amulet with nothing carved on it.

She herself was messy, but the wooden amulet was very clean. Even the cord it hung from was new.

Tai Sui "heard" her say, "The immortal mountains have boundaries. Chu isn't a place without a master, like the Land of Turmoil. Once I cross the Xia River, I'll be in Sanyue territory. Your consciousness won't be able to cross. Is there anything you want me to do for you?"

Tai Sui couldn't hear whatever the person in the reincarnation wood answered. He saw the woman wait for a moment, raise her eyebrows, then put the amulet away. "All right, I've got it."

Tai Sui looked at her in some surprise. There was wine in her mouth. She hadn't opened her mouth to speak just now.

Was she going straight through her spirit to communicate with someone's consciousness?

Communication devices usually didn't have geographical restrictions, but a consciousness couldn't casually cross a national border.

The present national borders hadn't been determined by humans; they had been determined by the immortal mountains. The five great spiritual mountain ranges coordinated with each other and repelled each other, acting in concert with the great sects' major arrays, making clear divisions in the mortal world. If someone ignored the boundaries and casually sent their consciousness into another country's territory, they would have to be prepared for a backlash from the local great array. Otherwise, all of the ascended spirit and shed skin masters would be able to send their consciousnesses out to pierce through mountain and river. If they could spy on the secrets of other nations at will, wouldn't it be a mess?

From what she said, it sounded as if the person communicating with her through the reincarnation wood wasn't in Chu—judging by her accent, they were likely from Wan.

“Strange,” Tai Sui thought. “Why would I hear this young woman on the border between the two countries speaking to someone in Wan? Because they’re using reincarnation wood as a contact medium?”

This was a very peculiar feeling, as if he had accidentally opened someone else’s private letter.

Tai Sui didn’t rashly start up a conversation. He only watched this woman dressed as a man in secret.

She unhurriedly crossed the river and made landfall mixed in with the people coming and going between the two countries on business. Her forged documents were a little slapdash. But this close to Wild Fox Country’s Great Market, Tao County frequently had all kinds of evil cultivators coming and going. The border guards didn’t dare to be too strict; they all turned a blind eye.

Perhaps thinking it would be too expensive, she didn’t find lodgings in Seventeen Li Town. Instead, she stayed in a rather remote part of Tao County. In fact, this place was beyond the limits Tai Sui’s consciousness could reach, but for some reason, Tai Sui could still easily locate her.

She could make a boat move without wind and had what was likely an eye-opening wound on her face; she was definitely a cultivator. But she didn’t act like a cultivator. Tai Sui watched her for a few days without seeing her draw a single talisman.

Every day, she walked through the streets of Tao County with a little carrying pole over her shoulder, selling Silver Tray Lottery tickets. The prizes were candy bars, cheap candied fruit, little things like purses... whatever it was, there were no lottery tickets that didn't win anything; all of them came with a bit of a prize. There were also a few exquisite little wooden carvings pinned to her racks. The carvings were of various spiritual beasts, extremely lifelike, and they seemed to be able to run around when you put them on the ground. It was said that only one in a thousand tickets would win one. In a few days, she had a gang of ragged little kids running after her, calling her "Wei-laoban."⁵³ Business was pretty good.

Seventeen Li Town seemed to be in the eye of a storm. The atmosphere around it became more and more tense. Only this foreigner was perfectly at ease, going to different places every day to cry out "Open the tray and see the prize!"

Tai Sui had never seen a trade like this. Having finally managed to temporarily struggle free of the endless amulets, he could relax for the first time in five years. At first, he had only casually glanced her way because his consciousness had been disturbed. The upshot was that after watching kids win prizes for a few days, it started to go to his head a little. He didn't sleep; he would have loved to buy a handful of tickets himself.

After several days of selling Silver Tray Lottery tickets, no one had yet won one of the limited number of carvings.

This evening, Wei-laoban packed up her stall and picked a tea house to rest in. At the table next to her sat three very firmly wrapped up people; it was clear at a glance that they were covering up eye-opening wounds. They glanced at the shabby peddler and lost interest, continuing their conversation. "There's never been an ascended spirit before, no one even thought about doing it. The most they could do in their lifetime was pour all their efforts into finding a Way of the Heart and establishing a foundation. Then you could become a solid backer for others. All you could do afterward was try to think of a way to live some years longer, put off losing your mind. Who would have expected there to be... At first when she showed up and seemed to be doing all right, the common cultivators in all four nations went crazy. Just that I know of, several powerful established foundation masters have gone into seclusion in the last few years... I can't say whether it's a good thing or a bad thing. Aren't we going to have ascended spirits running around everywhere?"

Another person said, "That's absurd. Can the spiritual energy and resources in the mortal world support several ascended spirits?"

“That’s just it,” his companion said anxiously. “Before, established foundation masters didn’t come forward easily, precisely because they were worried they would have to fight over resources to take the next step. Won’t people like us have even less of a means of survival now? Hey, have you guys heard that she sent word saying that at the Wild Fox Country Great Market she’s going to sell Xiang...that sword god’s spiritual bones?”

“She’s too arrogant. Will Sanyue stand for that?”

“I’m afraid the Wild Fox Country Great Market will be eventful this year...”

Wei-laoban slowly drank her tea as she listened to these people discussing the unprecedented and unrivaled evildoer. Before she had finished drinking one bowl of tea, a kid with his hair in childhood knots skipped up in front of her, chewing on a piece of straw. “Laoban, I want a Silver Tray Lottery ticket.”

Then his eyes moved. His gaze went around Wei-laoban and glanced up. By coincidence, it just happened to meet the gaze Tai Sui was sending out.

Tai Sui froze. This child’s face had a pair of long, narrow, upturned eyes, like the crafty eyes of an adult stuck onto a child. It looked very strange...

Most importantly, he seemed to have seen these eyes somewhere before.

Wei-laoban took his coin and offered the Silver Tray. The child picked and chose for a long time before finally taking a ticket. “Open it and see what you’ve won.”

He opened the ticket, but it was empty inside.

Tai Sui had watched Wei-laoban sell over a hundred tickets. This was his first time seeing an empty ticket.

“Ooh, an empty ticket, an empty ticket-wicket.” The strange child began to dance and gesture in joy. “Get whatever’s written, get whatever you want.”

Wei-laoban drank the remaining half bowl of tea in one gulp, packed up the Silver Tray, and sighed. “Very well, creditor. Let’s go.”

The child, skipping and hopping, took her by the hand, jumped two steps ahead, then looked back. He pulled his eyelid down with his finger and made a face at the three ignorant common cultivators who were talking on and on. “Bleh.”

Tai Sui suddenly remembered—it had also been at Wild Fox County’s Great Market. His consciousness had been trapped in the body of a half-puppet about to be sold, blearily baking under the scorching sun so people could examine his quality. While Tai Sui had been in a bit of a daze, he had suddenly met a pair of crafty eyes.

Just one glance, and Tai Sui's consciousness, which had nearly fused with the half-puppet, had awoken.

This had been a pale-faced and beardless middle-aged man, forgettable in the crowd, except that his eyes were like monsters that had crawled out of some abyss. One glance could make a person feel chilled all over. Through the crowd, the middle-aged man had pulled down his eyelid and made exactly the same face toward him across the distance.

Supposing that person hadn't had a screw loose and just happened to like making faces at half-puppets...then he must have been the only outsider who had had contact with Tai Sui's consciousness in all these years.

Tai Sui was about to chase after them when his consciousness was held back by something. He couldn't go another step forward.

Just then, noises came from beside the reincarnation wood divine image, yanking his consciousness back at burning speed.

Tai Sui's consciousness was abruptly drawn back into the divine image. As soon as he opened his eyes, he smelled an acrid scent and instantly wanted to dig a hole and bury whoever was lighting the incense—Xu Rucheng had the heart demon oath hanging over him and indeed didn't dare to neglect it. He really had "bathed in incense ash." Who knew how many jin of scent he had used? While he hadn't been eating cured meat, he had thoroughly cured himself.

Wearing snakeskin, Xu Rucheng gravely placed incense before the reincarnation wood divine image, mentally reciting the name of the evil god. Before he had stuck the incense into the censer, he heard a dour voice say into his ear: "Cheng-bao'er, if you died right now, your body wouldn't rot for five hundred years."

Xu Rucheng's hands shook. He snapped the incense holder.

"Move, move, move, move aside. Don't light it. You're enough to keep the insects away on your own," Tai Sui said irritably. "Say whatever you have to say."

Xu Rucheng concentrated and said, "Senior, the Qilin Guard just came to see me."

The Qilin Guard was Sanyue's outer sect, Chu's equivalent to Heaven's Design Pavilion.

“So? You got a scare and want me to pet it better?” Tai Sui yawned indifferently. “What’s so exciting about the Qilin Guard? Wild Fox Country pays a considerable protection fee to the Qilin Guard every year. The Qilin Guard’s people come in disguise each time there’s a Great Market to look for a good deal. Their general commander is completely shameless. If he sees something he likes, he won’t even pay. He’ll just leave a note and have it sent over. All you need to do is give them a good bribe. The Qilin Guard don’t want to look at your ugly face any more than they have to. The relationship is built on trade in money and power, there’s no deep friendship. It won’t be easy for you to expose yourself.”

Xu Rucheng said, “They brought an ascended spirit master from Sanyue. They want me to hand over a map of all the inscriptions and arrays in Wild Fox Country. Wild Fox Country is only a black market where common evil cultivators trade. An established foundation would be plenty. Why does an ascended spirit cultivator need to come in person? Unless the rumors are true, and Qiu...”

“Shh,” Tai Sui interrupted him. “If you know she might already be looking this way, how can you still dare to mention an ascended spirit’s name?”

Normally it was all right to mention an ascended spirit's name, but supposing that Qiu Sha really did want to come to Wild Fox Country, her consciousness might very well already be scanning it—so even when going to see a creature like the Snake King, who couldn't show himself in public, the Qilin Guard had still come under the protection of a master from their inner sect as a precaution against being “overheard” by Qiu Sha.

Xu Rucheng automatically lowered his voice: “There are borders here. Sanyue certainly won't let her leave Chu alive. There's going to be a lot of chaos when the time comes... Senior, have you seen Qiu Sha? How should we deal with her?”

Just then, Tai Sui fell strangely silent. Xu Rucheng waited for a long moment, then couldn't resist saying, “Senior...”

Tai Sui hesitated, then asked, “Are you carrying something you use to contact your lord?”

Xu Rucheng froze. He pressed down on the place where his mustard seed was kept.

Tai Sui sighed. “Stupid baby, why don't you take it out and have a look?”

Xu Rucheng, bewildered, took out the communication device and was instantly startled. “What...”

The immortal tool that had been lying safely in the mustard seed had activated on its own. There seemed to be an invisible hand using his immortal tool to contact the Luwu headquarters right before his eyes.

And if the evil god hadn't warned him, he wouldn't have noticed.

This person didn't take any trouble to imitate his handwriting. The Great Wan characters were broken and crooked, starting and stopping stiffly with each stroke, as though they were being chiseled with a hatchet. When Xu Rucheng discovered it, the writing only paused briefly. Then the aggressive handwriting continued to appear, all at once writing:

Seventh month, seventh day. Help me out in Wild Fox Country, and afterward I'll lend you the Riverward⁵⁴ for one use—Qiu.

Xu Rucheng's hand shook. He nearly dropped the immortal tool.

In this infiltration of Chu, they had made their plans clear to Xuanyin Mountain. In consideration of the great disorder in Chu, all the immortal tools they had brought were “superior grade.”

The skin Xu Rucheng was wearing didn't look prepossessing, but in fact it was a genuine product of Moon Plated Peak—something he couldn't buy even if he sold himself. There were sixty-four second-class inscriptions inlaid under the skin. As long as he kept his tail between his legs and didn't use spiritual energy, and the master he was facing didn't have any ill intentions toward him and didn't choose to search his body and soul, not even an ascended spirit would notice that he was in disguise.

Even that ascended spirit from Sanyue's inner sect had been fooled face to face. But there was someone here who could see through all their tricks!

“Qiu Sha is preparing to appear at Wild Fox Country's Great Market. Southern Wan's Xuanyin won't be the only ones to have sent people here. Does she want to start an ascended spirit war in the mortal world?” Tai Sui recalled the face that child had pulled and thoughtfully said, absent-minded, “I wonder who the fox in Wild Fox Country is this time. And also...what the hell is this ‘Riverward’?”

Jinping's outskirts, the Sage's Road, at the horse-tying post.

Zhou Ying was reclining inside a dull grey carriage. His eyes stopped on the word “Riverward” for a moment. Then he tossed the immortal tool aside and said with a cold smile, “What an investment she's willing to make.”

Bai Ling asked, frowning, “The Luwu’s disguises can even fool Sanyue’s inner sect. How could she see through them so easily? Who is she, anyway?”

“Most of the immortal tools the Luwu carry come from Moon Plated Peak. The things Lin Chi’s disciples make can’t escape his influence,” Zhou Ying said slowly. “Rumor has it that this Qiu Sha is closely connected to Lancang’s Hui Xiangjun. It’s normal for her to see through the little toys that come out of Moon Plated Peak.”

Bai Ling was startled. “Hui Xiangjun, who had her immortal bones removed eight hundred years ago because of Moon Plated Gold?”

Zhou Ying didn’t answer. He suddenly sat slightly upright and pulled the carriage curtain aside a crack.

There was a carriage team coming their way, planning to switch to sedan chairs at the horse-tying post.

Leading the way on horseback was the Marquis of Yongning. The Marquis himself dismounted and took an old lady by the arm to help her out of the carriage.

There were hardly any black hairs left on the old lady’s head. She seemed to be even shorter than in memory. She got out tottering, barely coming up to the Marquis's chest. She looked as though she were about to shrink to nothing.

Just the few steps from the carriage to the sedan made her pant for breath. The sound of her cane hitting the ground was very urgent... One wondered what she had come to ask for in person at Southern Sage Temple when it was so hard for her to walk.

Bai Ling tactfully shut his mouth.

When Zhou Ying had watched the old lady get into the sedan and disappear on the unstained Sage's Road, Bai Ling at last quietly said, "The old lady is quite energetic. She seems to be hale and hearty."

"Let's go back." Zhou Ying expressionlessly let down the carriage curtain and picked up the previous conversation naturally, as though he hadn't been silent in the meantime. "Since she's come to us, we might as well do our bit. With her acting in such good faith, I'll help her out—send a Heavenly Question to Xuanyin's inner sect. Tell all the immortals that Qiu Sha is preparing to appear at Wild Fox Country's Great Market on the seventh day of the seventh month to sell Xiang Zhao's remains. Also, contact the Luwu."

"Yes, my lord," Bai Ling agreed. Then he asked, "What does her letter mean? Forgive my ignorance, but what is this 'Riverward'?"

Zhou Ying laughed softly. “One of the most mysterious works left behind by Hui Xiangjun. Tradition has it that it can ferry you across the Wangchuan River and let you infiltrate any forbidden place on earth.”

For example, the Impassable Sea.

The Luwu’s Heavenly Question soon reached the Principal Peak of Xuanyin’s inner sect. When the disciple who received it finished reading it and was about to report it up the chain, a hand suddenly reached over and took the Heavenly Question scroll.

The disciple turned to look and was surprised. “Lin...Lin Chi-shishu?”

The most reclusive peak master of Xuanyin’s inner sect waved a hand. “Relay a petition to the Dignitary of Rites on my behalf. I want to request a token to leave the mountain.”

CHAPTER 75 - Indignant Cicadas (9)

Wei-laoban—Wei Chengxiang—yanked her hand away from the “child.”

The “child” took no notice, walking two steps ahead of her while stretching out. The flesh and bones of that body expanded. Soon, this person’s height surpassed that of Wei Chengxiang, who was already very tall, and continued to grow upward.

After another ten steps, she had become a woman nearly nine chi tall.⁵⁵

If she had been standing in a crowd, she would have been head and shoulders above everyone else!

Her long hair alone was over six chi long, so black it seemed as though it didn’t reflect light. The child’s small clothes had been stretched to rags by her big frame. She didn’t care at all. Walking through the street full of people coming and going, she simply tore the rags off.

All the passersby seemed to be blind, walking right past her without even looking up. None of them saw that there was a young woman streaking right in the middle of the street. Wei Chengxiang alone had the chance to appreciate this “scenery.”

Sadly, Wei Chengxiang couldn't quite stand this "treat for the eyes." Her eyelids twitched a few times, and she averted her gaze, lowering her head to look at the dirt.

The young woman calmly took a light grey robe from her mustard seed and wrapped it around herself. She twirled her fingers, and her heavy-looking head of long hair coiled itself into a bun, held in place by a plain peach wood hairpin. Her outfit was extremely plain and neat. From behind, she seemed like a nun who had gone into a monastery hundreds of years ago.

But as soon as she turned her head, she revealed a face that was so gorgeous it was almost demonic: long, thin brows, up-tilted eyes, scarlet lips that may have been natural or may have been painted. The contrast between her white face and black hair was too strong. When this face hit your eyes, it would certainly make you blink several times.

"Why are you looking down?" said the gorgeous nun with a laugh. "What I have, don't you have as well?"

Wei Chengxiang came from a poor family. When she had been little, she could only eat and drink her fill on mixed grain flatbread and cold water. It was already a blessing that she had been able to grow to her full height. Where would she have had room to grow anything extra?

“Senior Qiu Sha,” she said helplessly, cupping her hand, “you flatter me—I really don’t.”

It turned out that this gorgeous nun was actually Qiu Sha, who had turned both the righteous and the evil cultivators upside down.

At this time, an unknown number of ascended spirit and shed skin cultivators from Sanyue were intensively patrolling the area of Wild Fox Country with their consciousnesses; they had even sent an ascended spirit master down in person. Dongheng’s great array itself would have loved to get up and walk over to sit on Tao County. Yet this woman who was being targeted by all sides openly streaked through the street in Tao County, and a whole crowd of Chu masters couldn’t catch her!

As expected, the first ever ascended spirit evil cultivator was out of the ordinary.

As for Wei Chengxiang knowing her, that was a long story.

Five years ago, during the chaos in the East Sea, she had killed White Amaranth, the chief of the Exonerators, and that bunch of mad dogs had hunted her for two whole years.

Those two years had been awful. Before refining their spiritual bones, an open-eyed cultivator mainly relied on external objects. Without immortal tools, they were as good as unarmed. And the three disciplines of talismans, arrays, and inscriptions were broad and deep; there were many people in the spiritual mountains who'd had these disciplines poured into their heads by force by their elders yet could still hardly remember any, never mind her, with no one to teach her. Even the person who had guided her in swaggering around and bluffing was gone. She didn't want to join the Kaiming Cultivators, either—everyone said that the “Kaiming Cultivators” were meant to speak on behalf of their fellow countrymen. Had her grandpa been alive, he probably would have been very pleased for her to have such future prospects. But her grandpa had died without a bit of intact skin on him, and she had no more fellow countrymen. She had nothing to say. She could only go into hiding in Demon Country, the Land of Turmoil. For her, living was cultivation.

Two years ago, she had been besieged by the Exonerators working with another group of evil cultivators and had escaped to the neighborhood of the Lancang Spiritual Mountains. She had come to the end of the road. Her meridians had been exhausted, and she had fallen into a hidden realm. When she woke up, she found that she had fallen into a patch of late-autumn red. Late-autumn red was an unusual type of tree that grew high in the mountains. It was rare in Great Wan, so it had no formal name. This type of tree was parasitic, only budding after the beginning of autumn. The leaves were dark red, like blood, when they grew in. Tradition had it that as soon as late-autumn red “caught fire,” the frost would come. It was often seen as a bad omen.

How could a hot and humid place like this, which didn’t even have “autumn,” have late-autumn red growing in it? Before Wei Chengxiang could work it out, the malevolent vines had twined around her. Then there was a sharp pain in her head. The fiery red vines were boring into her skull like a steel awl.

She saw a big group of people appear from the late-autumn red thicket like ghosts. There was a vine with blood red leaves growing from the top of each person’s head. These people whose bodies had been snatched by the trees stood by in identical postures, observing her or waiting to welcome her as their new companion...and her meridians were exhausted. She couldn’t move a muscle. The only thing in her head was the echoing of her skull cracking.

This scene had been unbearable. Up to now, it still regularly played out in Wei Chengxiang’s nightmares.

But just when the vines began to bore inside her skull, the reincarnation wood amulet she carried that had been silent for many years suddenly heated up and sent the late-autumn red vines wrapped around her flying away.

“Hss...” A voice echoed among the late-autumn red thicket, sounding like someone throwing a coquettish temper tantrum. “There’s already the mark of another tree on your spirit. How annoying.”

That place was the strangest and most frightening hidden realm Wei Chengxiang had ever been in.

And Qiu Sha, the hidden realm’s master, was the most fickle monster she had ever met.

This great monster had been living off the Lancang Spiritual Mountains for untold centuries, since before Southern He had been extinguished, so she was completely clueless about the Lancang Spiritual Mountains being split up among the four nations. When an occasional unlucky wretch wandered in by mistake, she would stick a tree branch into their head.

The great monster hadn’t been in a hurry to kill her. Apparently she had been in a good mood because she was soon to leave seclusion, so she had kept Wei Chengxiang to talk to and relieve her boredom.

Wei Chengxiang was on tenterhooks while dealing with her every day. As soon as her injuries improved slightly, she started looking for an opportunity to escape. The great monster was an absolute good-for-nothing. Like a cat playing with a mouse, she let her struggle, deliberately waiting until she thought she had successfully escaped to reach out a paw to hold her down.

Wei Chengxiang simply couldn't describe the despair that filled her heart the moment she heard her laughter in her ear. But just as the late-autumn red vines twining around her pulled her down, a bracelet suddenly dropped out from among the vines. By some coincidence, it fell onto Wei Chengxiang's wrist.

All the vines instantly went limp and dropped Wei Chengxiang onto the ground.

While she was dizzy from the fall, she heard a grim voice behind her say, "I've spent eight hundred years searching for it, and it would never appear. Instead it's taken a liking to a little girl like you."

This bracelet was called the Law Breaker. It was the only immortal tool in the world that had no grade. When it had been born, even the Lancang Mountains' great array had trembled. Apart from Moon Plated Gold, it was the work of the era's legendary toolmaking master Hui Xiangjun that Lancang most coveted. Unfortunately, it seemed to have its own ideas. It only appeared before those for whom it had an affinity. When its master had died and her way had vanished, the Law Breaker Bracelet had gone out of control—Qiu Sha claimed to be Hui Xiangjun's direct disciple, but Wei Chengxiang thought that she was just talking big. She figured that this Qiu woman was most likely a somewhat addle-brained saddle horse of the type that couldn't take in new ideas even after eight hundred years of cultivating to enlightenment.

Because the Law Breaker Bracelet had unexpectedly chosen her as its master, Wei Chengxiang had become the first person in eight hundred years to survive the great monster's clutches.

The great monster not only didn't kill her, she also casually healed her injuries and gifted her a complete set of ancient books that the Lancang Sword Sect's inner sect had used, and even shamelessly claimed to be halfway to being her teacher.

Not long after Wei Chengxiang left the Lancang Spiritual Mountains, she heard the news about the emergence of an evildoer. That great monster had deliberately left seclusion to go reach the ascended spirit stage within Chu's borders in showy style, delivering a fierce slap in the face to Sanyue, luring them into sending down a master. Then she had killed Xiang Zhao.

Now that she was announcing all over the world that she was going to sell Xiang Zhao's spiritual bones, Wei Chengxiang thought that she was going to play the same old trick again, though she didn't know who her target was this time.

Qiu Sha looked her over for a moment, then clicked her tongue. "I see that you haven't improved at all."

Wei Chengxiang politely answered, "The same to you."

"Damn girl. You're really unlikeable." Qiu Sha rolled her eyes at her. "I suppose you know what kind of ascended spirit battlefield Seventeen Li Town will become? Yet an open-eyed ant like you actually dared to come crawling over here."

Wei Chengxiang said, "Low cultivation and going back on your word are two different things. I took your things, senior, and I owe you. Since you called me, it's appropriate for me to come settle my debt."

Qiu Sha said, "You see how bitter it is to be an 'evil cultivator' with no one and nothing to rely on? Inexplicably accumulating debt and being summoned across thousands of li to come give up your life—I said before that you should be my disciple."

Wei Chengxiang, not turning a hair, said, “I beg to be excused. Though I owe you a debt of gratitude, senior, you must forgive me for being unable to agree with the way you conduct yourself. It would be a waste of breath for the two of us to debate our views. There is no need.”

Qiu Sha’s long, shapely eyebrows rose. “Wei Chengxiang, you dare to find fault with me. You’re quite bold.”

Wei Chengxiang said indifferently, “Supposing that I had a favor to ask of you, senior, naturally I would want to be nice to you. But now, while I am offering my services to you of my own free will, it is because you have some use for me. Wouldn’t you say that makes sense?”

Like a difficult child, Qiu Sha instantly abandoned shame and lost her temper. “I hate you!”

Wei Chengxiang figured that she couldn’t smack her to death. Not indulging her in the least, she said, “Isn’t that a coincidence? I feel the same.”

Qiu Sha: “...”

She sulked for a long time. Then her eyes turned, and she gave a mysterious smile. “You’ll regret that, little devil. There’s a big secret I meant to tell you, but now that you've made me mad, I'm not going to say it."

This erratic great monster hardly ever said anything sensible. If you let her get to you, you would lose. What she called a big secret was most likely something like "There's a tea leaf caught in your teeth." Wei Chengxiang, who had plenty of experience, checked her teeth and didn't take it to heart. "With my negligible cultivation, I am afraid I am unqualified to aid you in a fight, senior. I wonder what assignment you have called me here on?"

Qiu Sha waved a hand and said, "At least you have the wisdom of self-knowledge. I want to use the Law Breaker Bracelet."

Wei Chengxiang froze. She clamped a hand over her wrist.

An invisible bracelet appeared on her skinny, bony wrist, suffused with warm light by the setting sun. Because it was so exquisite, it looked out of place next to her ragged clothes.

The bracelet was made up of an inner and an outer ring inlaid together. On the outer ring were carved complicated openwork designs that revealed the inscriptions on the inner ring. Looking closely, the inscriptions were constantly changing. Looking at them made you dizzy.

“Now that Xiang Zhao has died by my hand, presumably Sanyue won’t underestimate me. They’re probably getting ready to turn out in full force. My resources are limited. I can’t get the better of those immortals. So I’ve already sent letters to Kunlun and Lingyun’s people. Xuanyin... Ha, Xuanyin will probably be rather on their guard against me, though fortunately the demon they’ve been sheltering will bring that son-of-a-bitch Lin Chi here for me. When all four great sects gather together at once, won’t that be exciting?”

Wei Chengxiang frowned, then saw Qiu Sha lift her wrist almost tenderly and stroke the Law Breaker Bracelet. At a slight touch from her fingertips, the Law Breaker’s inner ring began to move quickly. Soon, an inscription floated out of it, perfectly passing through the openwork designs on the outer ring to appear.

Wei Chengxiang’s spiritual sense was immediately touched; she dimly sensed the scant spiritual energy swarming in the vicinity begin to spin.

Qiu Sha smiled and stretched out her hand to take a lottery ticket from Wei Chengxiang’s Silver Tray. When she tore it open to look, it turned out that inside was the “ultimate” prize that hundreds of children hadn’t been able to pull.

“It’s mine.” Qiu Sha rudely took a wooden carving of a gold-armored zheng from her shelves and put it away in her clothes. Then she said to Wei Chengxiang, “They’re all slaving over Xiangjun’s relics, all of them with bad intentions. The situation will be as chaotic as you could want. But it still won’t be enough. I want you to bring all of Tao County inside the Law Breaker Bracelet and make this damn place even more chaotic.”

Wei Chengxiang said, “The Law Breaker Bracelet can change a place’s fortunes. A place enveloped by this bracelet won’t be seen by the eyes of any immortal mountain, won’t be divined by any stars. All kinds of abnormal things will happen here. All natural and divine laws will loosen—inscriptions will suddenly cease to be effective, arrays will leak spiritual energy in places people don’t expect, the spiritual energy around one cultivator might suddenly flow to another cultivator... I can activate the Law Breaker Bracelet, but I won’t be able to control what happens after it’s activated.”

“Obviously,” Qiu Sha said impatiently. “You stole that bracelet from me. Don’t I understand it better than you do?”

“I didn’t steal it. It was the Law Breaker Bracelet that chose me,” Wei Chengxiang retorted calmly. “After all, no one wants to end up in the hands of a deranged master—senior, don’t get angry. What I mean is that there’s no saying whether it will choose to help you or your enemies.”

Having heard this, Qiu Sha actually didn't get angry. With a wave of her sleeves, she stood and put her hands behind her back. She looked up at the sky. For a moment, the evil air about her vanished, and there was an appearance of still pools and tranquil mountains about her. At last she seemed like an ascended spirit riding the clouds.

“Girl,” Qiu Sha said, “do you know why ascended spirit cultivators cannot emerge outside of spiritual mountains?”

Wei Chengxiang raised her eyebrows.

“Because it's one of those divine laws. Never mind an ascended spirit, even a late stage established foundation will be observed by your Great Wan's Xuanyin's Sea of Stars and Chu's Heaven Viewing Platform. That asshole 'fate' pushes its lackeys to leave the mountains and take down these people. At the same time, it doesn't rest; in the shortest time possible, it brings down all possible disasters on those ants who dare to violate divine commandments, not letting the ants pass the barrier to an ascended spirit,” Qiu Sha said coldly. “If I can't break those bullshit 'heavenly commandments,' I'll be buried in Wild Fox Country.”

Wei Chengxiang wanted to say something, but when the words came to her lips, she sighed and swallowed them.

“I don’t care whose side it stands on,” Qiu Sha said. “I came here to play for high stakes, so shut the fuck up. If I die, I don’t need you to follow me into the grave.”

CHAPTER 76 - Indignant Cicadas (10)

The Wild Fox Country Great Market began on the fifteenth day of the sixth month and ended on the seventh of the seventh month.

Though it had nearly become a local holiday, the “black market” was still the “black market”; the Wild Fox Country Great Market took place at night.

On the fifteenth of the sixth month, the night of the full moon, the Snake King’s Immortal Palace would begin holding “night feasts,” admitting up to fifty people every day. During the feast, apart from a menu, each guest would also receive a “treasure list,” detailing the treasures that would be sold that night. If a guest liked something, they would check off the item they wanted and place spiritual stones and the treasure list into one of the mustard seeds prepared to hold goods at the feast; it would be up to them how much to pay.

When the night feast ended, the puppet attendants would return the mustard seeds to all the guests. If the deal was successful, the item would be in the mustard seed. If they had offered a lower price than someone else, the precise number of spiritual stones would be returned with thanks. The buyer and seller never saw each other, and the buyers at the feast had no need to haggle until they were red in the face. While the money the Snake

King could make as a middleman in this way wasn't as much as he could have made through haggling, it saved on a great deal of conflict.

For a bit of money, you could buy the night feast treasure lists in advance—though they wouldn't necessarily be complete. Some people sold things that couldn't stand up to the light of day and often only revealed them once they had entered the night feast.

Each night's entry fee fluctuated depending on whether there were any "big-ticket items." Usually it was one or two liang of jade stamps.

As soon as the middle ten days of the sixth month began, the "admitted" sellers began sending "notes" to the Immortal Palace one after another—they chose for themselves which day they wanted to shill their wares. The slots were first come first serve, and once a particular day's treasure list was filled up, the rest would be postponed according to the order their requests came in. The "notes" had to include a down payment in advance for the Snake King, and on the night they were to be sold, the goods had to be handed over to the Snake King for inspection. If the goods weren't up to standard, they would be withdrawn from the treasure list. The down payments generally weren't returned; they were used to pay back the entry fees paid by the buyers who chose those items.

All of that was big business. There was also small business.

The majority of people weren't up to the trade at the night feasts. During the Great Market, every day when the sun set, a night market would appear in the streets of Wild Fox Country. All sorts of people mixed together at the night market, trading in all kinds of little knickknacks. There were also local commoners peddling Chu specialties. Each vendor had to buy that year's Ghost Market Certificate from the Snake King to hold a space and guarantee their safety. It would cost anywhere from one or two liang of silver to one jade stamp stone.

Petty profits were subject to all kinds of quibbling; any coin that could be saved counted. Big business was cowardly in following the rules, not daring to be too greedy even if it meant missing out on profits. The Snake King had amassed his fortune through trickery and had built Wild Fox Country single-handed. He'd had some tricks up his sleeves—if that idiot Xu Rucheng hadn't come in and beaten the master craftsman to a pulp, it probably really would have taken the Luwu a few years to infiltrate.

This year, Wild Fox Country began to bustle unusually early. At the start of the sixth month, before the mats had been laid for the night feasts, all kinds of vendors started coming one after another to set up their stalls. When Xu Rucheng went out for a stroll, he could feel the oppressive spiritual energy. For a moment, he became even more worried in spite of himself. He secretly had a discussion with his colleague Lao Tian: "Is there some way we can come up with to make the mortals evacuate this place? If what's-her-name really does appear and ascended spirit masters start fighting, never mind the evil cultivators who value resources more than their lives, what will happen to Seventeen Li Town's common people?"

Lao Tian tactfully reminded him, "The common people of Seventeen Li Town belong to Chu. I thought that our brothers from Yuzhou hated the Chu most of all?"

What does it have to do with you? Have you forgotten that you're a spy from a foreign country?

Xu Rucheng was silent for a moment. "Yes, my whole family died at the hands of the Chu. But that was done by the Qilin Guard leading Chu soldiers. It had nothing to do with the common people. Those bastards at the Qilin Guard are all nasty pieces of work. They wouldn't balk at exploiting mortals."

There were many common cultivators from every country in Tao County. The mortals who did business here more or less all had some spiritual stones. The Qilin Guard would periodically buy them all up, supposedly offering less than half the price of what spiritual stones cost on the market. It was all the same if someone didn't want to sell. Never mind that the Qilin Guard turned a blind eye on real evil cultivators; they kept an extremely careful watch over mortals attempting to sell spiritual stones on the black market.

Lao Tian then said, “Don’t worry. Since she’s announced herself so early, she won’t necessarily come—won’t she be walking right into a trap if she comes? We recently received reliable information that that individual’s traces have appeared in several places in Chu. Sanyue’s inner sect masters are hunting for her all over the country right now. I think this is a feint. It’s likely her goal is something else.”

Having heard this, Xu Rucheng thought it made sense. He nodded hesitantly, then said doubtfully, “Isn’t what’s-her-name supposed to be completely on her own? How can she be in several places at once?”

Lao Tian shook his head. “Being completely on her own is information that she herself released. When she’s being mysterious, she’s too mysterious, and when she’s being arrogant, she’s too arrogant. You can’t rely on rumor. But at any rate Sanyue’s inner sect belongs to the orthodox path. They’re different from the Qilin Guard, who don’t have to answer to Ways of the Heart. The inner sect masters of any country must abstain from harming the common people. Even if there really is a clash, they’ll still contain the battlefield within a mustard seed. Haven’t you seen that all those evil cultivators have dared to come get in on the fun? This damn Tao County—nothing planted here grows, and whether you can get any fish from the river depends on the weather. Wild Fox Country is the only thing that's made this place turn slightly for the better. The minor merchants and peddlers have to use this month to cover the costs of their whole family's daily expenses. If you keep them from coming, do you expect them to fill themselves up drinking the northwest wind?"

Was your life more important, or was money more important?

There was no saying for sure. It depended on who you asked. No two lives had the same price.

Xu Rucheng understood only too well. Hearing this, he sighed and didn't mention it again.

As the fifteenth of the sixth month approached, the group of Luwu didn't even dare to meditate and practice their lessons anymore, because dozens of Qilin Guardsmen in disguise had established themselves at the Immortal Palace, and just from what Xu Rucheng could tell, there were a dozen inner sect established foundations and four or five he suspected of being ascended spirits. On the inside of the snakeskin Xu Rucheng wore, the inscriptions heated up painfully every day. Unless it came down to absolute necessity, no one would dare to use spiritual energy.

They were as careful as possible when sending routine reports, even having three or four people standing guard. They were already using a backup second-class encrypting inscription that they had brought along, and they changed their array and location every day.

On the fourteenth of the sixth month, the blue moon in the sky was only a sliver away from being full. The treasure list for the first night's feast had already been revealed, and the entry fee had been raised to one blue jade.

Apart from daily operations, the Snake King's Immortal Palace was basically under the control of the Qilin Guard. The treasure lists, the guest lists...all of it had to pass through the hands of the Qilin Guard before the "Snake King" Xu Rucheng got his turn.

A Kaiming Cultivator like Xu Rucheng, who came from a common background, always kept count when using spiritual stones and couldn't resist converting spiritual stones into gold, silver, and copper, then automatically thinking of how many centuries you would need to labor in a factory to earn that money, how many families it could keep well fed for how many years.

When he got the treasure list, Xu Rucheng looked at it for a while and went numb all over: a flood dragon tendon worth a hundred liang of jade stamps, a paramount grade elixir worth thirty liang of blue jade, cloth of gold armor worth ten liang of white spirits...

White spirits! Oh, mother, he'd never even touched a white spirit!

All the sellers' listings were crowded into the first few days of the night feasts; they were afraid of bumping into the great personage who would be presenting the final item in the later stage.

There was only one solitary item on the list for the seventh day of the seventh month: Set of spiritual bones of an ascended spirit prick cultivator,⁵⁶ excellent quality for toolmaking; total cost one thousand jin of white spirits; the weight of the bones is 20 jin 6 liang, the price to be divided according to weight.

Chu's writing and Wan's writing were similar. Many characters were used interchangeably. This seller's listing was written in Chu characters, but Xu Rucheng recognized at a glance that this was the handwriting of the person who had used his immortal tool that day.

Just then, Lao Tian ran over and said to him, "Half of the ascended spirits in the Immortal Palace just left."

Xu Rucheng quickly asked, "What's going on? Didn't they just receive Qiu...what's-her-name's listing?"

Lao Tian said, “When an ascended spirit dies, the leftover spiritual bones will weigh at least a few hundred jin. There won’t only be this little bit. I hear that traces of Xiang Zhao’s spiritual bones have suddenly appeared all over the place. Presumably the Sanyue inner sect doesn’t have enough people... How dishonest. She’s too dishonest. Can she actually have more henchmen than there are masters in Sanyue’s inner sect? You must remember to report this matter to our lord.”

“Oh?” Just then, the evil god Tai Sui’s voice suddenly sounded in Xu Rucheng’s ear. “The seventh day of the seventh month?”

In recent days, no matter how he burned incense, the evil god had ignored him. Finally hearing him speak, as soon as Lao Tian had left, Xu Rucheng hurried to ask, “Senior, is there something wrong with that date?”

Tai Sui was silent for a while.

After that mysterious young woman from Wan had sold the empty Silver Tray Lottery ticket, she had disappeared from his line of sight. Before, he had been able to find her with a thought, but now, no matter how he searched, it seemed as though there was a haze before his eyes. Someone was obscuring his vision.

Of course, Tai Sui didn't absolutely have to see her. If he couldn't see her, then he would drop it. No matter how anxious everyone in Wild Fox Country was, it wouldn't hinder him in any way. He had been planning on returning to the divine image to rest. But as the Wild Fox Country Great Market drew near, all of a sudden, something fiercely prodded his spiritual sense. He suspected that if he had been human, his eyelids would have been twitching to the tune of the "Ambush from Ten Sides."⁵⁷

"It's nothing," Tai Sui said slowly. "Let me give you a free bit of advice. Starting today, when you correspond with your lord, you had better write the date on your letters."

"Why?" Xu Rucheng said doubtfully.

The communication device was only so big. Normally it didn't matter if a message was a few words more or less. If you couldn't write it all at once, you would send a few letters, in order of priority. But lately the Luwu had had to keep their tails tucked between their legs and proceed with caution, cutting down the number of letters sent back and forth as much as possible. Each time they sent a letter, several people had to rack their brains to stuff increasingly more information into a limited space—where would there be room to write the date?

There was only the Xia River between them; wasn't it the same day in Chu as in Wan?

Tai Sui said impatiently, "You don't have to listen to me."

This "divinity" was especially loathsome; he was only pleasant when he wanted to swindle Xu Rucheng or order him around. This was his usual behavior.

Xu Rucheng wanted to ask more questions, but there was once again silence on the other end.

Though Xu Rucheng was completely puzzled, through some mysterious urge, he still went along with the evil god's instructions that day and wrote the date in a corner.

As soon as the letter was sent, he regretted it, suspecting that Mr. Bai would think there was something wrong with his head.

Meanwhile, in a small farmyard in Great Wan's Yuzhou, a man so pale he was almost transparent had been sunning himself in the yard all day.

Yuzhou was hot and humid, and the sun of the sixth month was especially vicious, but this man seemed to be made of snow and ice that had frozen over thousands of years. The scorching sun couldn't leave a single mark on him. While the cicadas shouted themselves hoarse, not a drop of sweat fell from him.

The sun was setting in the west. His eyes were closed. A kite on a broken string fell out of the sky and landed in the yard.

The man in the rattan chair opened his eyes and saw a piece of white paper float out of the kite and change to human form. "My lord, the Luwu have sent a report."

The man in the rattan chair—Zhou Ying—nodded to him almost imperceptibly and listened as Bai Ling went over the contents of the letter.

"The letter is in Xiao Xu's handwriting and tone," Bai Ling said. "My lord, since sending that letter, Qiu Sha hasn't contacted us again. The Great Market is about to begin, and now different parts of Xiang Zhao's spiritual bones have appeared in various places in Chu. What is she planning?"

Zhou Ying absent-mindedly said, "Lin has reached the South Sea. She will come."

Bai Ling said, "Sanyue has sent a group of ascended spirits to hunt for her everywhere, and people have come from Northern Li and Southern Shu.

Most likely they are coming for Hui Xiangjun's relics, not to help her. I truly cannot imagine how she plans to escape."

Zhou Ying muttered to himself for a moment. "The mist has been very heavy over the Xia River these last few days. This mist is quite strange, and I am unable to see the weather conditions on the opposite bank... The Luwu are there—have they noticed anything unusual in Tao County?"

For safety's sake, Bai Ling inspected Xu Rucheng's letter once more. "Nothing... Oh, wait. For some reason, Xiao Xu wrote today's date at the end."

After hearing this, Zhou Ying froze, then actually sat up slightly straighter. "The date?"

Bai Ling said, "Yes, my lord... What is it?"

"Give it to me," Zhou Ying said with interest. "Who is this Luwu who wrote the letter?"

Zhou Ying treated everyone with indiscriminate indifference. He never took any "unnecessary" care—he had little care to give to begin with. Only when he was plotting against others did he pay attention to what they were thinking. He felt very secure in handing the Luwu over to Bai Ling and normally only used them. Had Bai Ling not prevented him, he might have given each Luwu a number for a codename. This was his first time asking about one.

“His name is Xu Rucheng, a native of Yuzhou...” Bai Ling could recite the life history of each Luwu. On being asked, he briefly told him about Xu Rucheng’s background.

Zhou Ying nodded casually; it was unclear how much of it he had listened to. “He noted the date... How did he ever think of that? Xiao Bai, this batch of Luwu you’ve trained is remarkable.”

Bai Ling: “...”

Remarkable?

He thought that Xu Rucheng was fairly unremarkable. The young fellow had a broad nose and wide eyes and even a mouth twice as large as normal. Any thought that passed through his head appeared on his features. He was excessively loyal and righteous. In fact, he wasn’t very well suited to infiltrating a foreign country as an “evil cultivator.” It was only that Bai Ling had taken pity due to the debt of blood he carried and had specially approved this opportunity for him... Could he have appraised him wrongly?

While His Highness wasn't very good at conducting himself as a person, he was quite sharp when it came to judging people. Bai Ling knew he fell short in this respect and involuntarily began to doubt himself. He didn't dare to say anything more, only asked, "My lord, what is the use of the date?"

Zhou Ying said, smiling, "Wait and see."

The next day, the day of the fifteenth of the sixth month, reasonably speaking, the Snake King's Immortal Palace ought to have become a busy mess. But Xu Rucheng's letter seemed to come even a little earlier than usual. He detailed everything that had happened during the first night feast without reference to importance. He described Chu's Qilin Guard setting up defenses; the night feast seemed to have gone very smoothly, without any abnormalities.

But starting from the sixteenth of the sixth month, all news from the Luwu in Wild Fox Country ceased.

The seventeenth, the eighteenth...for three full days, it was as if all the Luwu had died overnight. They didn't convey a single word.

Bai Ling couldn't help starting to worry: had they been exposed? Had something gone wrong?

But in fact there had been more than one batch of Luwu sent to infiltrate Wild Fox Country, and there were even some Xu Rucheng and the others didn't know about, mixed in among the ordinary evil cultivators and acting on their own. Even if Xu Rucheng and his companions had been exposed and wiped out, how could the other Luwu not have sent any word?

Bai Ling couldn't resist saying to Zhou Ying, "My lord, why don't I go across the river and take a look?"

Zhou Ying waved a hand. "Not today."

Bai Ling stared. "Not...not today? Then what day?"

Why did he need to choose an auspicious time?

Meanwhile, it was obvious that they weren't the only ones who had lost contact with Wild Fox Country.

On the nineteenth of the sixth month, masters from every country who were waiting and watching from the sidelines could no longer hold themselves back. One after another, they went into Wild Fox Country.

At the same time, news came that parts of Xiang Zhao's spiritual bones had been found in various places in Chu. The priceless spiritual bones of the ascended spirit sword cultivator had been tossed all over the place by Qiu Sha. Piecing them all together, there were precisely 20 jin 6 liang missing.

Starting on the twentieth of the sixth month, the Sanyue cultivators who were hunting everywhere for Qiu Sha converged from all directions on Tao County, preparing to besiege the bold evildoer.

The strange thing was that the people who entered Tao County later also seemed to vanish into thin air. Whether they were established foundations or ascended spirits, as soon as they went in, there was no more news of them.

Apart from Zhou Ying, no one could hold out and keep watching from the sidelines.

At the end of the sixth month, even Lin Chi came on shore from the South Sea and proceeded alone toward Tao County's Seventeen Li Town.

And meanwhile, the Luwu in the eye of the storm felt that they were dreaming. In Wild Fox Country, from the sixteenth day of the sixth month to the seventh day of the seventh month, twenty whole days had disappeared.

Time had disappeared!

CHAPTER 77 - Indignant Cicadas (11)

The end of the sixth month to the beginning of the seventh month spanned the transition between summer and autumn. Wild Fox Country—as well as the rest of Tao County—had had neither wind nor rain, yet out of nowhere, the weather cooled; even the steam on the Xia River faded.

For ordinary people, this wasn't too big of a deal. Most of them thought some clouds had floated over and brought a cold wind. They closed their eyes, opened their eyes, and a day had passed. Whether today was the sixth month or the seventh, it didn't impact their two meals a day.

But those who were caught just on the line between life and death were stunned.

Those who had been on the point of death vanished silently: all the items they used daily were in their original places, their residences remained, and their bedding still bore a human imprint—only the people themselves were gone.

Those who had been on the point of life were tossed into the human world without warning: women who had been close to the end of their pregnancies woke up and found that their children had somehow come out —they could even open their eyes, just in time to stare back in confusion at their mothers!

But for cultivators, dates were very important.

The state of the whole universe influenced the spiritual energy in the human world at every instant. Even a person's spiritual image had a great deal to do with the time and date of their birth. The times at which elixirs, immortal tools, and other such objects could be taken from the furnace were all strictly limited; they couldn't be disarranged. Some special inscriptions even had to be altered slightly depending on the date. So the great majority of people carried a calendar block with them.

Xu Rucheng, a half-immortal who didn't dare to meditate under the eyes of the Qilin Guard and Sanyue's inner sect masters, had to lie down and sleep like a mortal—as soon as he opened his eyes, he thought there was something wrong.

Before he could fully wake up, he heard Tai Sui's grim voice: "I was just wondering whether I would need to request a bolt of lightning from the high heavens to strike you awake. Not bad, Cheng-da-bao. Not even diamond is as sturdy as your slumber."

Xu Rucheng's tongue hadn't smoothed out yet. He mumbled, "Do you have any orders, senior?"

"Stupid baby, why don't you take a look at your calendar block?"

In a daze, Xu Rucheng looked up according to his instructions and saw that the calendar block that ought to have said "the sixteenth of the sixth month" unexpectedly said "the seventh of the seventh month"!

Xu Rucheng: "..."

What was wrong with this calendar block?

"Senior..."

"Shh, shut up!"

He was just about to speak when Tai Sui shouted at him to stop. One of his Luwu colleagues, almost disheveled, charged into the bedroom. "Your calendar block... Hey, were you saying something just now?"

Xu Rucheng gave a start and woke up completely: wait, weren't outsiders unable to hear him talking to Tai Sui?

Luckily, his colleague quickly redirected his attention toward his calendar block. "...Yours also says the seventh day of the seventh month."

"What?"

"Nearly half of the arrays in the Immortal Palace without supplemental spiritual stones 'died' because they had exhausted their spiritual stones, and quite a few inscriptions have been damaged or destroyed for no reason. Several of the spiritual beasts the Snake King kept have simply vanished. The Magpie Bridge flowers⁵⁸ nurtured with green ore in the rear court hadn't grown buds yesterday, and today there are so many flowers it's flesh-crawling...those things don't bloom until Qixi! What the hell is going on? Did we just lose twenty days for no reason?"

Xu Rucheng and his colleague looked at each other in dismay for a moment, then suddenly said "oh no" and ran for it.

The treasure list! The seventh day of the seventh month was the day Qiu Sha was planning to appear!

The Luwu, the Qilin Guard...not even the masters of Sanyue's inner sect had seen this level of combat. They were caught unawares and for a time completely at a loss.

In fact, Tai Sui was the first to have noticed something odd—and not because he had looked at a calendar block.

After taking back the piece of his consciousness that had been left behind in the knotted bag Xu Rucheng carried, he had finally remembered that he had once been human. Along with the memories had come a peculiar sense of oppression: his original body was in some extremely secret place, and he was bound by irresistible rules that seemed determined to obliterate all evidence of his existence. Apart from those with karmic ties to him, no one could mention him.

But just now, the binding sense of oppression had vanished.

It was hard to describe this feeling. It wasn't that the force binding him had ceased to exist, it was that his connection to his distant body had been broken. He had become untethered, but within a certain range, he had also become "free."

Of his escaped consciousness, one part had been in the Snake King's divine image, and another part had been in A-Hua's relic—that knotted bag. Therefore, he had originally only been able to go to those two places.

Apart from that, Tai Sui's consciousness had only been able to roam through living people: when people believed in Tai Sui and whispered to him through the amulets, they would draw Tai Sui's consciousness to their bodies, because worship was a "tie" in itself. Only it was rather weak; the "Tai Sui" these people spoke of was after all only a construct of their own imaginations. With this weak tie, Tai Sui could only unilaterally sense their joy and pain as well as their appeals. He had no way to respond, and he couldn't act for himself.

After Xu Rucheng had destroyed all the amulets, while people wouldn't say anything aloud, when they ran into trouble, they would still repeat "Bless me, Tai Sui" in their minds. This kind of connection was even weaker. It couldn't even draw his consciousness. It only amounted to noise in his ears.

But now, Tai Sui suddenly found that, like in his vague memories, his consciousness could move at will through reincarnation wood!

But even better than in his memories, he could not only move at will, he could also control the reincarnation wood as if it were his own body!

He could move!

It had been too long since this lonely divine image had known what it felt like to be his own master. Inside the reincarnation wood, he stretched his "arms" and "legs," all but running a few laps. For a moment he forgot what form he was in and accidentally pulled up the roots of a reincarnation wood tree, nearly bringing down the house next to him. Then he no longer dared to indulge at random.

The only inconvenience was that his existence was no longer unmentionable. If he spoke to Xu Rucheng without restraint again, the big idiot would probably be taken for a real idiot.

Tai Sui had the feeling that if someone picked up one of his amulets and spoke to him now, he might simply be able to answer...though he was worried about scaring them—Tao County's citizens had already had enough scares today. So he hadn't had a chance to try it out.

His consciousness circled the surroundings in a blink and found that Tao County was the limit of his freedom.

Something had cut Tao County off from the outside world.

“That Qiu Sha has some object,” Tai Sui thought.

His logic in telling Xu Rucheng to write the date had been very simple: one person couldn't defeat the whole Sanyue Sect. If she had dared to come to Wild Fox Country, she must have been prepared to be ganged up on. In a group fight with people whose cultivation level was similar to yours, the simplest strategy was to control the number of your enemies, ensure that you would only be facing opponents you were capable of facing; you couldn't let them get together. And there were two ways of not letting them gather: separate them in space, or create a time difference.

It was hard to meddle with space. Even if she had done it, she wouldn't have been able to keep it out of sight of the "Snake King," the local tyrant. But evidently she hadn't. So it had to be time—when she had deliberately sent the listing in ahead of time, making an appointment for the seventh day of the seventh month before the Great Market had even started, that had substantiated his guess.

Tai Sui had at first thought that the seventh day of the seventh month was a cover-up, and that she had some kind of superior immortal tool that could create an illusion related to time. That was why he had casually brought it up and told Idiot Xu to remember to mark the date when he communicated with the outside world, as a precaution.

But it seemed that it wasn't an illusion at all.

She had really thrown Tao County's time into disarray!

If this had been done by an immortal tool, what grade must it be at? Shed skin? Or was it a divine tool at the heart of a mountain, of the grade of the Bell of Tribulation?

Odd...what exactly was the “Bell of Tribulation”? Why had such a thing suddenly popped into his head?

As Tai Sui wandered through all the reincarnation wood trees in the county, getting some fresh air and exercise, he considered this “Bell of Tribulation.” Suddenly, his spiritual sense gave a signal.

A reincarnation wood thicket moved on its own in answer to his thoughts, the trees collectively raising their canopies, “peeping” up at the sky. He saw that the sky, where day had just broken, was changing rapidly. The sun, which had just risen in the east, “ran” restlessly toward the western sky as though there was a steam engine attached to its ass. It leapt below the horizon, leaving a freshly-washed starry sky.

The bewildered cultivators at the Immortal Palace hadn’t even finished washing their faces when the lanterns at the gates lit up!

Tai Sui caught a familiar female voice. It was saying: “In a place where the Law Breaker Bracelet is operating, there must be one fixed rule. The fixed rule here is that ‘Qiu Sha will appear at Wild Fox Country’s night feast on the seventh day of the seventh month.’ Apart from this rule, everything else here is up to the will of heaven. You’re best off helping yourself.”

The Law Breaker Bracelet?

Tai Sui scanned with his consciousness and found the mysterious young woman who had been selling Silver Tray Lottery tickets before. The prohibition preventing him from seeing her had also disappeared in the disorder in Tao County.

The young woman dressed as a man was standing facing a female “iron pagoda.” Tai Sui was in a tree, but his line of sight was level with hers. When he met those evil eyes, Tai Sui understood at once who had been blocking his vision: this was Qiu Sha!

Qiu Sha said, “Thanks. Go hide yourself. It doesn’t matter if you die, but don’t get in my way.”

The young woman dressed as a man called her to a halt and said, “Don’t forget what you promised me. I don’t care whether you want to hunt and kill shed skins or whether you want to hack apart the Golden Hand. If you pierce the sky, pierce the bit above your own head. Don’t involve the innocent.”

Qiu Sha gave an affected tsk. “Just listen to that. Is that how an ‘evil cultivator’ ought to talk? Are you from that...what the hell does Southern Wan call them? Oh, right, Heaven's Design Pavilion—are you some kind of irregular salaried worker from Heaven's Design Pavilion?"

“‘Evil cultivator’ is a name they’ve forced onto me. I can’t control what other people think, but I don’t think I am an evil cultivator. Why should I talk like one?” the young woman dressed as a man said. “You’re an ascended spirit master. Heaven and earth record what you say. If you have the audacity to renege on your promise, take care that the Law Breaker Bracelet doesn’t strike back against you.”

“How can a little person like you be so talkative?” With these last words, Qiu Sha turned and left.

She licked her lips, her long, narrow eyes glinting like a starving wolf’s. She turned into a windstorm, swirling aggressively, tearing off half the canopy of the reincarnation wood tree next to her.

Good heavens!

Tai Sui, eavesdropping from the reincarnation wood tree, applauded the excellence of this feat. He had the feeling that she had plucked him bald, his “head” going from verdant green to chilly and bare.

This person's speech and mannerisms were precisely the way common folklore described a demon. Tai Sui had heard the young woman dressed as a man mention that Qiu Sha wanted to "hunt and kill shed skins" and "hack apart the Golden Hand"; he didn't know whether she had just been exaggerating, but when he'd heard it, even the trees had broken into gooseflesh!

He'd never even seen a living shed skin!

Without any hesitation, Tai Sui passed through the reincarnation wood thicket next to him, chasing after Qiu Sha.

But a pair of eyes appeared in the windstorm and turned his way with a false smile, looking at the reincarnation wood trees that were moving on their own.

The great monster extended a finger that was a joint longer than other people's and pulled down her eyelid, making a face at him. "Worth—less—wretch."

Tai Sui: "..."

What, I came over to watch the fun, and that's pissed you off?

After Qiu Sha finished insulting him, she laughed heartily, her laughter echoing in the sky over Tao County like thunder, scaring a bunch of babies who ought to have been in their mothers' bellies into crying...along with the babies' mothers.

Tai Sui's troublemaking voice sounded in Xu Rucheng's ear: "The monster's coming, call your colleagues, get out of the way."

While others were frozen in place by that laugh and had no attention to spare to look his way, Xu Rucheng quickly asked, keeping his voice low, "Senior, what's going on?"

Tai Sui didn't have time to answer. An ascended spirit master could turn distance into nothing. In the time it took them to have this exchange, Qiu Sha had already landed in front of the Immortal Palace's gate.

Compared to her, the subdued and dignified great gate of the Immortal Palace seemed a little poky in height. If she were to cross the threshold, she would even have to bend her head a little!

Unfortunately, she didn't know what it meant to bend her head. She examined the glazed lantern at the gate and waved her sleeve. There was a huge sound, and the stone gate of the Immortal Palace went to pieces. The third-class inscriptions were no match for her slap. They all disintegrated.

“That’s much lighter and more spacious,” Qiu Sha said, smiling. She turned her head and beckoned to a dumbstruck peddler nearby. “There’s no limit on guests for tonight’s feast. Why not come watch the fun?”

The peddler had gone out first thing in the morning and hadn’t noticed that there was anything out of the ordinary about the date. He was peddling his three-wheeled little cart, going to sell breakfast as usual. But before he could open up shop, the sky got dark. He thought he was dreaming. Now that he had been unexpectedly pointed out by the great monster, the peddler knocked the roller chain off his cart, so scared he put both feet on the ground and ran off with the cart using brute force.

Qiu Sha cleared her throat. Imitating the tone of a peddler crying his wares, she called, “Spareribs! Cheap spareribs! Five hundred liang of white spirits per jin—”

Before she could finish her patter, a voice gave a loud shout: “You dare, evildoer!”

One of the Sanyue ascended spirits who had been left to look after the Immortal Palace was also a sword cultivator. No sooner had he spoken than his sword flashed like moonlight on snow, aiming a blow right toward Qiu Sha.

The blow seemed to split all of Seventeen Li Town in half. Never mind the place where the tip of the sword pointed; in the aftershocks of that sword energy alone, Xu Rucheng and the other half-immortals were forced to take out protective instruments.

And the unfortunate peddler from before hadn't gotten far!

A gnarled and twisted reincarnation wood tree shot out a vine toward him at lightning speed, rolled up the petrified peddler, and tossed him aside, narrowly throwing him out of range of the wind from the sword.

The tree that was the width of a person's arm span and the three-wheeled cart were broken up by the aftershock of the sword energy. Flatbreads and dipping sauce rolled all over the ground.

The peddler fell several zhang away and heard a faint disdainful grumble in his ear: "Listen, brother, you've been having some excessive internal heat lately."

The confused peddler blankly held onto a length of reincarnation wood, rolling on the ground with his face covered in blood. He muttered, "Tai... Tai Sui?"

Almost at the same time, another one of the Sanyue ascended spirits left behind at the Immortal Palace came onto the scene. An enormous ascended spirit grade mustard seed opened up in a flash. Before the earth-shattering blow of the sword could fall, the mustard seed wrapped up the sword energy and the ascended spirits to keep them from razing all of Tao County to the ground.

As the blow from the sword fell, Qiu Sha turned into a sandstorm, dispersing throughout the inside of the mustard seed. “You’re even worse than Xiang Zhao. Watch me.”

Next, the sandstorm coiled up into a vortex, and a beam of cruel and forceful sword energy exploded, heading straight for the Sanyue sword cultivator. Astonishment appeared on the sword cultivator’s face. He hastily raised his sword. There was a long groan, and a chip actually broke off that vital sword!

The Sanyue sword cultivator instantly retreated several steps. “Xiangshixiong’s Xiuluo sword!”

This sword was Xiang Zhao’s vital weapon. The technique was Xiuluo’s authentic technique... For a moment, he had practically believed it was Xiang Zhao facing him!

The sandstorm congealed into the tall form of a woman. She beckoned, and a pitch-black sword fell into her hand.

“That’s right,” said Qiu Sha, smiling. “I ate him, so now the Xiuluo sword is mine.”

Tai Sui had already moved from the reincarnation wood tree that had been struck down into another tree a little further away—fortunately, during the years the Snake King had been here, it had been popular among the locals to plant reincarnation wood trees. That was the reason he had room to maneuver now. That ogre had done some good after all.

But what way was this great monster cultivating?

The way of the tiangou?⁵⁹

She could eat anything, then take the place of whatever she ate?

Before Tai Sui could work it out, a very familiar hothead ran out of the Immortal Palace.

That idiot Xu Rucheng had stripped off the Snake King’s skin and shoddily disguised himself at random, dressing in the clothes of one of the Immortal Palace’s servants.

Just as that unfortunate wretch came to the gate, the Sanyue ascended spirit who was supporting the mustard seed took a hit from Qiu Sha, and the mustard seed slackened. Only a sliver of the horrifying spiritual energy leaked out, but for a half-immortal like Xu Rucheng, it was like a mountain flying right at his face.

His breath caught. He only had time to raise his chopper and cover his head.

Just then, a talisman full of the distinguishing characteristics of Western Chu appeared out of nowhere and shielded him, dispersing and dissolving the line of ascended spirit spiritual energy.

Tai Sui's voice sounded in Xu Rucheng's ear: "If you're tired of living, can't you go find a rafter to hang yourself from? Do you have to come here and let them cut you up?!"

"This is wrong." Xu Rucheng miserably rolled out of the bounds of the ascended spirit battlefield. "Wild Fox Country's night market only starts when the sun sets, so the minor merchants in the area come out early to set up shop and leave when it gets dark. But on this damn day, it got dark so fast that they didn't have time to get out of the way!"

As he spoke, he took to his heels and ran. He took out a signal flare and tossed it into the sky. With a sharp whistle, it exploded into a big red firework—this was the Immortal Palace’s signal for an emergency evacuation, telling all unrelated people to get away at once.

Then Xu Rucheng stepped onto his chopper and flew on it to disperse the nearby crowds. When he had flown a full hundred zhang, he belatedly recalled something and said in shock, “Wait, senior, was that you just now? You...you can use talismans?”

Tai Sui said, “...Is this the time to study me?”

He was also very shocked.

He had seen this talisman inadvertently. Dongheng’s Sanyue was unparalleled in talismans, arrays, and inscriptions; none of the three other great sects could match them. Here, both righteous and evil cultivators all knew some peculiar talismans and arrays. While hanging around Wild Fox Country, Tai Sui had seen many of them and had inadvertently remembered quite a few. Though he had forgotten many things, he seemed to know instinctively how to control spiritual energy. Just now, he had gotten worked up and had actually managed to send out a talisman.

These reincarnation wood trees, apart from not letting him pick up and run, otherwise really were like a real body—they let him operate spiritual energy!

“I can disperse the leftovers of ascended spirit spiritual energy with a single talisman...but my original body is still sealed in some unmentionable place?” Tai Sui thought. “I’m not also some great evildoer who can shake the mountains by stamping my foot, am I?”

He raised his sightline and looked at the ascended spirit battlefield in front of him and indignantly came up with a “Xu-ism”: “What in blue blazes! That Qiu woman is so impressive, how have I ended up like this?”

Tai Sui was worried that Idiot Xu would get himself killed here—this person was a rarity; it wouldn’t be easy for him to find another one so dimwitted. He followed him closely with his consciousness, watching him shouting and herding, even using talismans, gambling with his life to shoo off all the merchants and peddlers who hadn’t had time to get away.

Soon, the other Luwu took his example and went out after him.

But Tai Sui suddenly frowned. A beam of spiritual energy flew out of the reincarnation wood and broke up one of Xu Rucheng’s talismans.

That talisman had been carrying established foundation level power. If it had actually fallen onto a mortal, it wouldn't have pushed them away; it would have flattened them.

Xu Rucheng and the rest of this batch of Luwu, whether they kept their brains in their skulls or not, were all fairly reliable when it came to talismans. They must have trained remorselessly before coming here. But now, some of their talismans worked and others didn't, and sometimes they would incredibly surpass their cultivation levels.

Xu Rucheng had noticed it himself. He quickly drew back his hand.

“Be careful,” Tai Sui said. “Time isn't the only thing that's in disarray in Tao County.”

CHAPTER 78 - Indignant Cicadas (12)

“According to tradition, Hui Xiangjun had three things. One was called Gold Imitation, one was called the Riverward, and one was called the Law Breaker.” Zhou Ying, with his hands behind his back, was slowly pacing along the flagstones at the Xia River ferry crossing, the stealth talisman on his wide sleeve flickering in and out of sight. Mortals looked right through him. “The Gold Imitation Technique has already entered the mortal world. Qiu Sha reached the ascended spirit stage under the eyes of the four great sects without having been noticed before—where was she hiding all that time? My guess is that the Riverward must have played a part. Now it would appear that the Law Breaker, the most incredible of them, is also real. “

At present, all the Xia River steamships had returned to port. The riverside was forbidden territory. A seal had been put up preventing the common people from approaching. Rows of cannon shone under the sun; the gunners switched shifts every two shichen, on guard against the opposite bank. If anything unusual happened, they could open fire at any time.

This was a more or less fixed procedure in Great Wan every year during the Great Market in Chu’s Wild Fox Country.

After listening to this, Bai Ling suspected that he had been lax in carrying out his Luwu assignments—the Luwu were hidden in all four nations and ought to have had their ears open to everything, but he hadn't so much as heard of this "Law Breaker" or "Rule Breaker" or whatever it was; he needed his lord to tell him. That was outrageous.

So he carefully asked, "Is that recorded in the ancient texts of the Latent Cultivation Temple's Yanhai Building?"

Zhou Ying looked at him in amusement. "Of course not. Leaving aside the Gold Imitation Technique, do the other two sound like things an orthodox sect would talk about? Hui Xiangjun was the person those demons in your hometown of the Impassable Sea most loved to discuss."

Bai Ling: "... "

Something had gone wrong with the half-demon Bai Ling; he had too much humanity, his seven human emotions more complete than in any human. He had been out of place in the Impassable Sea. He had been rejected by the demon host, and he had rejected the demons in turn. Before meeting His Third Highness, he had never spoken. Not even the heart demon had paid attention to him—there was no agreeable conversation to be had with him, and he couldn't be eaten. Only His Third Highness, when the wind of the Impassable Sea had dropped and the demon host had disappeared, had made him come out of his seclusion, so he could briefly pass the time with this little child of royalty who had suffered so much from the pain of the demon host sucking his marrow... Now it seemed that His Highness had perhaps thought that talking to him was boring; at first he hadn't even been able to speak smoothly, and he hadn't understood anything.

But...a faint uncertainty rose in Bai Ling's mind: after the demon seal on the Impassable Sea had been broken and then restored by the three elders of Xuanyin, they had sealed it even more firmly; not even members of the Zhou family could enter anymore. While the words "Impassable Sea" could appear in a text, the "demon seal" couldn't be mentioned, and neither could any person, creature, or thing under the seal. Only people like the two of them, with their profound connection to the Impassable Sea, could hear each other speaking of it.

Except that this was after all a sore spot. His Highness usually avoided it in private. Why would he go out of his way to mention the demon host in the Impassable Sea now?

"My lord, do you mean that the abnormality in Tao County now is caused by an immortal tool?"

"It isn't an immortal tool. Let's call it a 'demonic tool'," Zhou Ying said.

"Tradition has it that where this Law Breaker is, there is only one axiom; all other cause and effect and fixed constants no longer exist. The road of an ascended spirit evil cultivator leads to death. If she wants to survive, she must rely on disorder. The Law Breaker is truly tailor-made for her.”

“Does such an immortal...demonic tool really exist?”

“Why else do you think Hui Xiangjun had her immortal bones removed? Could it really have been because of the Gold Imitation Technique? Then how could Lin Chi have made it out in one piece?”

Bai Ling hesitated for a moment. “Because Master Lin belongs to the main branch of Xuanyin’s Lin family and has backing?”

Zhou Ying was amused by him. “You... Whenever there’s something you don’t understand, without exception you explain it as ‘having backing.’ Why do you sound so much like that bunch of penniless evil cultivators?”

Bai Ling rubbed his nose. “My knowledge and experience are insufficient.”

Since taking control of the Luwu, he had mixed with people from all walks of life, and he had indeed picked up gossip from the mortal world.

“There’s no rush, you can take your time learning. You’ve only been in the mortal world for fourteen years.” Zhou Ying waved a hand. “Sanyue’s Xiuluo sword, along with Kunlun’s Wanshuang and Xuanyin’s Zhaoting, make up the three famous swords. Wanshuang and Zhaoting had both been tempered in the mortal world and risen along with their masters; only Xiuluo was a broken ancient sword. The genius of the Xiang clan was drawn into the remaining way of the sword in that ancient sword. His consciousness was trapped there. He would have perished, unless the ancient sword could be repaired and he could obtain a complete Way of the Heart. Many tool masters looked and said there was nothing to be done. Sanyue was willing to turn to anyone in their desperation, so they turned to Western Chu's special product—its 'common cultivators'—to solicit unorthodox methods in exchange for a place in the inner sect. That was the opportunity that allowed Hui Xiangjun to enter Sanyue. She had just established her foundation then, not to speak afterward, when she reached the ascended spirit stage in the Lancang Mountains and single-handedly repaired Sanyue's three great ancient relics. Had I been the Lancang sect leader, if she had wanted to dig up my ancestral tomb, I would have cleared the way for her. If she had wanted to go out slaughtering and setting fires, I would have given her my own son for a scapegoat. What does a member of the Lin family's main branch have on that?"

Bai Ling: "..."

And this is why an ambitious man such as yourself shouldn't marry and have children.

“Take a close look at her history. She spent over two centuries at Sanyue, yet she didn’t formally join a lineage. She simply vanished into the crowd, ignored, as soon as she entered the inner sect. Later, when she came to Lancang, it took her only fifty years to reach the ascended spirit stage. Evidently, while she was a ‘disciple of record,’ Lancang Mountain in fact treated her well. I believe that the Lancang sect leader wanted to protect her, he just couldn’t manage it.”

Bai Ling was startled. “Lancang Mountain couldn’t even protect an ascended spirit?”

Zhou Ying raised his head and gave him a meaningful look. “That’s right. Why would that be?”

It was said that Hui Xiangjun had come from an unorthodox background and practiced heretical ways, but in flipping through classical texts, you wouldn’t find any arrogant and presumptuous words or deeds from her; there were even reports that said she had been of a kind and gentle disposition, gentle to the point of being somewhat easily bullied. When she had been forced to leave her native soil, it had been because she had rejected Xiang Zhao’s marriage proposal, and he had brought his influential connections to bear to compel her into the marriage.

All of her outstanding qualities had been in her works: the Law Breaker that the demons in the Impassable Sea had discussed with relish, the Riverward that was supposed to be able to come and go to an unreachable place three times, the Gold Imitation Technique that had allowed mortals to ascend to the skies and burrow into the earth while downgrading immortal tools...

“But I had been wondering, if such a thing as the Law Breaker truly existed, what ‘axiom’ would Qiu Sha use? It was one of your Luwu who pointed me toward the answer.”

Bai Ling said, “Time?”

“That’s right, time. She sent separate messages to me, Sanyue...and probably Kunlun and Southern Shu as well, repeatedly mentioning the seventh day of the seventh month. If my guess is correct, the axiom within that Law Breaker must be something like ‘On the seventh day of the seventh month, Qiu Sha will appear at Wild Fox Country’s night feast,’” Zhou Ying said slowly. “This way, as long as she’s there, it will forever be the seventh day of the seventh month in Tao County.”

Bai Ling’s head swelled when he heard this—what did it mean that it would forever be the seventh day of the seventh month?

He couldn't resist looking toward the opposite bank. There was nothing unusual on the Xia River, but the opposite bank was wrapped in mist; an established foundation half-demon's gaze couldn't pierce it. "You mean that...Tao County...all of Tao County, is currently..."

"Likely no longer in the human world," said Zhou Ying. "It's in the seventh day of the seventh month."

"Wait, but on the opposite bank..."

"In the place where Tao County used to be, there ought to be only a passage to the hidden realm contained within the Law Breaker."

Bai Ling was all at sea. He thought that the wind off the river was a little chilly.

What kind of unbelievable weapon was this? That kid Xu Rucheng must have made an unbelievably lucky blind guess—if he'd really had that kind of brain, his parents would have given up anything to send him to take the imperial examinations. How could he have wound up only starting his schooling after joining the Luwu?

"When the people inside realize that something isn't right, they'll send word outward at once, but we out here must wait until it is the seventh and the date here has caught up to them to receive the letters. Prior to this, Qiu Sha used some method to scatter Xiang Zhao's spiritual bones all over the place, sending a crowd of Sanyue masters scrambling throughout the country. I'm afraid that was so that they would miss their chance to come charging back to Tao County."

Bai Ling muttered to himself for a long moment. "Unless each person who enters Tao County does it at exactly the same moment, the 'road' to 'get' from their own point in time to the seventh day of the seventh month will be a different length. If they aren't on the same 'road,' they won't be able to communicate with each other. And no matter what they do after they go in, time will push them at a uniform speed toward 'the seventh'... It's as if she's trapped each master hunting her in a different transport array. Neither ascended spirit nor shed skin cultivators can escape."

Zhou Ying gave a sigh of profound emotion. "Yes. An unprecedented and unrivaled superior among ascended spirits. She's truly insane."

Bai Ling: "..."

Though that's a little irreverent, the two of you seem to think very much along the same lines.

After pondering it for a long time, suddenly, Bai Ling noticed a terrifying problem. “Wait, my lord. When we’ve passed the seventh day of the seventh month, what will happen to Tao County?”

“A good question.” Zhou Ying smiled. “There are two possibilities. One is that Qiu Sha can’t hold out until the last and someone kills her. Once its master dies, the Law Breaker will be removed, and Tao County will return to the human world—from our point of view, all of Tao County will return intact on the seventh day of the seventh month, with everything as normal. The people in it will probably think they’ve had a strange dream.”

Bai Ling was a little appalled. “What does ‘hold out until the last’ mean...?”

Zhou Ying asked a question in turn: “When Tao County lost contact with the outside world, who was the first person to enter? You have eyes in the vicinity of Tao County, did you see?”

Bai Ling said, “I believe it was Sanyue’s Xiang Jing, known as ‘the one who reverses Yin and Yang with one stroke.’ This person is Xiang Zhao’s full blood brother. He was lured away to the place where Xiang Zhao’s skull appeared. When he couldn’t capture Qiu Sha, he immediately returned to Tao County. Our eyes in the vicinity of Tao County said that in the small hours of the sixteenth of the sixth month, when the mist had just risen in Tao County, before they could even report it, the Yinyang Reverser went in —he’s an ascended spirit master of inscriptions. Those proficient in inscriptions usually think they can understand the language of land and water. They feel secure facing any hidden landscape.”

“The ‘Yinyang Reverser.’ What an unusually apt nickname,” Zhou Ying said. “Those inside Tao County will be in the seventh day of the seventh month the whole time, not knowing what time it is outside. But for those who only entered Tao County after the Law Breaker was activated, before they reach the seventh, time will flow the same for them as for us. If this Yinyang Reverser was the first to enter, then he’s the furthest from the seventh and has the longest ‘road’ to travel to get to Tao County. When he reaches Tao County and encounters Qiu Sha, it will be just as we are about to reach the seventh. Qiu Sha only needs to hold out a for a while longer, and time in the outside world will overtake Tao County...and then, ha, Tao County won’t come back again.”

Bai Ling only understood the last sentence. His expression abruptly changed. “What?!”

“Within the Law Breaker, all laws are nullified, but outside the Law Breaker, cause and effect and natural law still can’t be violated. Time cannot be turned back. No one can return to their own past. Once we’ve passed the seventh, no one from the outside will be able to enter Tao County again. And once that time has gone by, Tao County will also lose its connection to the human world forever. No one will ever receive letters sent out by those inside again. Even if the Law Breaker is removed, they will still be stuck in that single day. Isn't that the same as disappearing from the human world?"

Zhou Ying laughed. "Just that we know of, half of Sanyue's ascended spirit masters have gone in, as well as three people from Kunlun. Southern Shu... ha, a few little islands that raise beasts—they can't muster ten ascended spirits all together, and four or five have come. There's also our Xuanyin's precious Golden Hand. Single-handed, Qiu Sha has dug Sanyue up entirely by the roots and seriously injured all four great sects. Since the five sages divided up the spiritual mountains, has the cultivation world experienced such a heavy blow? It will be a heady draught."

Bai Ling's mind roared. "But she... Isn't she also going to be stuck inside?"

"Not necessarily," Zhou Ying said. "She also has the Riverward. The Riverward can pass through anything. Can it pass through time? We can wait here to bear witness. Will Hui Xiangjun's 'spear' be more powerful, or will the 'shield' be more powerful?"

Dong—dong—

Bai Ling gave a start and quickly raised his head—the big steam clock in town was tolling the hour. Twilight had begun; it was you hour.

It was you hour on the sixth day of the seventh month!

His Highness had known about the Law Breaker from the beginning, had guessed what Qiu Sha was planning from the beginning, but he hadn't said anything about it until now.

The Law Breaker could break all heavenly regulations and natural laws; presumably the gazes of the great spiritual mountains would also be cut off. But that wasn't the case outside the Law Breaker.

As soon as Zhou Ying spoke, it amounted to bringing the secret of the Law Breaker out into the human world; all the great sects would sense something. Places like the Sea of Stars were undoubtedly showing waves.

He had deliberately waited until the four great sects had sent all their masters inside and then deliberately exposed the secret of the Law Breaker at this moment. When they realized what was happening, there would be a seismic reaction at Sanyue; even the shed skins would be drawn out of the mountains. This way, if Qiu Sha won her gamble and used the Riverward to return to the human world, as soon as she came out tomorrow, she would run headfirst into the might of Sanyue. It was a perfect situation for someone standing on the opposite bank watching the flames burn to win an advantage.

And what was more, just now, he had first tied the Law Breaker and the demon host in the Impassable Sea together. The “unmentionable” prohibition on everything under the demon seal had become his protective umbrella. With the interference of the demon seal, the great spiritual mountains could only sense the information; they wouldn’t be able to overhear their conversation!

“This Senior Qiu Sha has everything planned to the last detail. She used me to lure the Golden Hand here, and if she doesn’t keep her promise when the time comes, an open-eyed nobody like me won’t be able to do anything about it. I’ll have to borrow someone else’s strength and think of a way to get the Riverward.” Bai Ling heard Zhou Ying, sighing, say in a slightly exasperated voice, “This thing can only be used three times. I hope she hasn’t used it up, or else I’ll have to...go part of the way with her.”

In the sultry late summer evening, Bai Ling was chilled all over. He couldn’t speak.

But...what about the county full of mortals?

And the Luwu caught up in this?

Bai Ling abruptly raised his head to look at Zhou Ying. His eyes were as tranquil as the Xia River at this moment.

Bai Ling's heart sank.

All the ominous premonitions Bai Ling had felt over the last five years were now coming true—His Third Highness's refined skin covered bones that had been steeped in the poison of the Impassable Sea.

And the only person in the world who could stop him was gone.

“That's...that's not for sure,” Bai Ling forced his voice out of his dry throat. “Even if it is as you say, Qiu Sha has only been an ascended spirit for two years. As a still unstable early stage ascended spirit taking on a group of Sanyue's...or even of all four great sects' masters one after another, while she'll be in a somewhat better position than if they were all besieging her at once, she still won't necessarily...”

“Won't necessarily live to the end, yes, but who knows?” Zhou Ying said noncommittally, smiling. “Tomorrow we'll take the lid off the dice cup. Be patient.”

At the gate of the Immortal Palace in Wild Fox Country, where it was eternally the seventh day of the seventh month, no more mortals dared to linger; it had become altogether an ascended spirit battlefield.

After leading the Luwu in dispersing the mortals, Xu Rucheng, in accordance with Tai Sui's instructions, rushed at full speed to the boundary of Tao County.

Thick fog had risen at the boundary. The Luwu Lao Tian tried tossing out a stone and didn't hear the sound of it landing. He tossed out miasma dispersing and mist clearing talismans, and they also sank like stones into the deep sea.

"I'm afraid that outside is... Xiao Xu!" After tossing out the talismans, Lao Tian shook his head with a grave expression and was about to say something else to Xu Rucheng, but when he turned his head, he found that that hothead had already walked into the fog. He was instantly so scared he broke out in cold sweat.

Xu Rucheng had tried sticking his leg in. When he drew it back and saw that his foot was still in place, he gathered his courage and charged into the fog.

He walked for a while, squeezing a small length of reincarnation wood inside his clothes—Tai Sui had told him to smear his blood on the reincarnation wood so they could temporarily speak through his spirit, to avoid him drawing suspicion by muttering to himself.

“Senior, there’s nothing at all outside the boundary.”

Through the reincarnation wood, Tai Sui said, “Turn back and take a look.”

Xu Rucheng turned his head, and his eyes opened wide. He knew the length of his own stride; he felt that he had just walked half a li of distance. But when he looked back, Tao County was still not far behind him!

Xu Rucheng walked backward. After counting ten steps, he had already left the thick fog and returned to Tao County.

Lao Tian seized him by the shoulder and gave him a fierce scolding, but he saw that Xu Rucheng seemed not to be listening, staring blankly as he received Lao Tian’s flying spit. “Tian-xiong, outside is gone...”

Lao Tian said, “What the hell?”

“Ten steps beyond the boundary of Tao County, there’s total emptiness.”

Tai Sui's heart sank slightly. This was about what he had guessed: in the mortal world, the sun and moon were rising and setting; in other places, the days were following their prescribed order. Only Tao County was in a hurry, striding right into the seventh day of the seventh month in one step, leaving other places far behind.

From what that young woman dressed as a man had said, it seemed that it was the seventh day of the seventh month forever here. Then how would Tao County "return"?

Tai Sui pulled his consciousness from the Luwu back to the gate of the Immortal Palace. A rain of blood came right toward him.

This place had just gone through a crushing battle of ascended spirits. The corpse of the sixth ascended spirit master had turned into a rain of blood, sprinkling Qiu Sha's plain-colored nun's robe with stains.

The Sanyue sword cultivator whose single stroke had cut down the reincarnation wood tree was already dead as a doornail. His head had rolled to the base of another tree. If no one came to bury it, it would soon turn into fertilizer for the tree. It rather spoke of the wheel of fortune turning.

The mustard seed separating the ascended spirit battlefield from Seventeen Li Town was still in place, but the mustard seed's owner was already cold.

The other four ascended spirits who had died at Qiu Sha's hand hadn't been at the Immortal Palace to begin with. Apart from Xuanyin, the remaining three great sects were all represented.

As for the established foundations and so on, Tai Sui didn't have a chance to count—generally speaking, before he could get a clear look at their faces, they would have already been taken care of by Qiu Sha.

Tai Sui found that these people all seemed to appear out of nowhere inside the Immortal Palace, and if the first words out of their mouth weren't "It's moving again," they were "I can touch things now," as if these were some prearranged code words.

In other words, previously, they had been unable to touch anything here, and everything around them had been static to their eyes.

They could see it but not touch it.

Tai Sui considered it for a while and roughly understood what the situation was for these people who had come from outside: on the sixteenth of the sixth month, Tao County had vanished from the human world and gone to the seventh day of the seventh month. During the twenty days in between, people had arrived every day and decided to run the risk of entering Tao County to investigate. What they saw after entering must have been a static Tao County at the moment that the Law Breaker Bracelet had activated. Because they weren't at the same point in time, for these outsiders, Tao County would be like a mirage; they couldn't touch anything.

At this point, an ordinary person's thinking would definitely be that Qiu Sha was playing tricks. After discovering that they were trapped, they would rush to Wild Fox Country's Immortal Palace, thinking that the mechanism for breaking free of the trap would be there. It was easy for an ascended spirit master to go into seclusion for a century; they had plenty of patience—and this place didn't require so much patience. Soon, their own time would reach the seventh day of the seventh month, and they would reach the real Tao County.

In the eyes of these outsiders, Tao County would suddenly “come to life.” Before they could catch up, they would have fallen into Qiu Sha's hands.

For the people inside Tao County, the closer to the seventh day of the seventh month that the outsiders had entered, the earlier they would appear; the people who had come in at the beginning on the sixteenth of the sixth month, on the other hand, would be the latest to arrive. When everyone had come, it would mean that in the human world to which Tao

County had previously belonged, time had also reached the seventh day of the seventh month.

And then what? What would happen?

Tai Sui was appalled—he realized that when Qiu Sha had been talking about wanting to kill this person and that other one, that probably hadn't been empty boasting.

At first, the people arriving in Tao County had been the ones who had come in during the last few days; by that point, the people outside must have realized that there was a big problem in Tao County, and there would have been increasingly few people who would dare to run the risk of going in. From the point of view of the people inside Tao County, the later it got, the more outsiders would drop into the Immortal Palace. When that happened, Qiu Sha wouldn't have such an easy time dealing with them.

But she didn't need to defeat these people. If she only did her best and held out until the last person came in, Tao County wouldn't return anymore—it would be as if she had cooked all these masters at once!

Just then, as if Qiu Sha had noticed something, she raised a sword and looked up, meeting Tai Sui's gaze coming out of a reincarnation wood tree. She smiled meaningfully.

That crazy woman!

Tai Sui cursed and quickly used his consciousness to search for the young woman dressed as a man who had the Law Breaker. He quickly fixed on her: Hey, are you the one controlling that bracelet? Can you stop it? What did that great evildoer promise you? You seem pretty clever. She must have tricked you!

But just as he was about to speak to that young woman, Tai Sui paused.

Wait. If Tao County disappeared from the world...how would that harm him?

He had been locked up in some unknown place to begin with, so constricted that his consciousness could hardly move.

But now that Tao County had broken away from the human world, he could at least be a free “tree spirit” inside the county.

Tai Sui’s consciousness stopped quietly inside a reincarnation wood tree. He was only a few chi away from that young woman dressed as a man, but she didn’t notice him at all.

He suddenly saw the light: no wonder Qiu Sha had known of his existence but hadn't taken any care to avoid him.

That great evildoer had been certain that he would be on her side.

CHAPTER 79 - Indignant Cicadas (13)

“Bless me, Tai Sui...”

A prattling voice came from a nearby residence, stealing a thread of his consciousness.

At the door of a dilapidated residence was a stooped old woman of Western Chu, wearing glasses, carving an image of Tai Sui on a piece of reincarnation wood by starlight.

“Tai Sui, please let this chaos pass quickly. I’m scared of dying,” the old woman rambled on to herself. “These immortals and divinities come every year, and when they come, people always die. It makes me want to dig a hole in the ground and bury myself inside, then crawl back out when they’re gone...”

There was a reincarnation wood tree by the window of her house. Tai Sui went to it. Its branches rested against the lattice of her window. He thought, If you’re so scared, why don’t you move away?

Then he examined the old woman’s home. There was only one room in it, with a worn-out table, chairs, and bed inside, all missing feet and cushioned with mud. There was an oil lamp on the table, but she hadn’t wanted to waste of lighting it, instead working by the light at the door. A basket hung from a roof beam to protect it from mice. Inside the basket was half of a rice cake, and something black and pickled... It was the thing from back in Yuzhou that he would rather have died than eat. In a corner were some little things like rattle-drums, as well as a pile of wicker baskets, crudely made, much worse quality than those turned out by machines; he didn't know who would be willing to buy them.

All right, he understood why the old lady hadn't moved away.

“Before, when I was sick and nearly died, it was Tai Sui who saved me. I don't believe in anyone. Whenever anything goes wrong, I only believe in Tai Sui. I have to carve the amulet in secret, because the Snake King won't let us worship... Ah, I can't afford to offend the immortals. Do not blame me, Tai Sui...”

Reincarnation wood was soft and well-suited to carving. She soon finished her amulet and blew the wood shavings away.

The moment the amulet was complete, a peculiar and faint attractive force came from it, but unlike in the past, Tai Sui's consciousness couldn't be pulled by force into other people's bodies.

“I heard recently that some people wanted wicker baskets. I’ve been waiting for them to come every day, but they haven’t. Tai Sui, please let them come soon... Please let me get some things from Wild Fox Country this time. Last year I was late, this time I’ll have to go earlier... And please let grain be a little cheaper. My teeth are no good, I won’t be able to chew fourth-grade rice much longer...”

As the old woman chattered, Tai Sui’s consciousness continued along the little alley. He saw a bare-chested man beating some children.

This was a Chu theatrical troupe. The people along the Xia River all liked the local plays; there wasn’t anything in them about kings and princes, generals and ministers, scholars and beauties—they were all comical farces. Their distinctive characteristic was the very last scene. All the characters—including those who had just died in the play—would turn somersaults together.

Out of some strange interest, the Snake King had liked to watch people turn somersaults; he would only laugh and clap when children around ten years old turned somersaults until they were foaming at the mouth. So all the Chu theatrical troupes along the Xia River bank had started desperately practicing somersaults and intensively studying how to make them look more impressive. The bare-chested man was probably the teacher. He was beating a group of children seven or eight years old until they screamed and wailed. The teacher, red-eyed, was wishing desperately that they could improve at once. As he hit them, he shouted, “Why are you running? Am I doing you harm by hitting you? None of you understand anything, what can you do? If you suffer hardships, you improve, don’t you get it?!”

His voice couldn’t rise to the pitch of the last words; in his excitement, his voice broke.

Tai Sui went past the theatrical troupe’s door, sneering.

If you suffer hardships, you improve... As if it would come true if he said it loud enough.

When Tao County disappeared, the cultivation world’s losses would be catastrophic.

What about the mortals?

On the ground was the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragon, on the Xia River were the steamships, but those had little to do with mortals who lived hand to mouth. The greater part of people were like weeds, narrowly eking out a living in a wasteland, growing when the wind blew, withering in the autumn chill, dying easily. For eight parts out of ten of them, the county seat was the furthest place they would go in their lifetimes. What difference did it make to them whether Tao County was in the mortal world or not?

Well, perhaps there was a bit of difference. With Tao County's evil cultivators running amok, the factories that burned spiritual stones would avoid this area; without the products of the big machines, the old lady's business might improve a bit. The spiritual energy of so many ascended spirits dying within such a short time in this little county wouldn't dissipate; maybe the soil where nothing grew would improve.

Wouldn't that be to everyone's satisfaction?

So why should he go sticking his nose into other people's business?

Did he really want to get locked back up in the divine image with no control over himself, his consciousness constantly shunted around by the joys and pains of others?

Tai Sui's consciousness dispersed among all the reincarnation wood in the county, extending to its furthest limits. With one end in the knotted bag Xu Rucheng carried and the other end in the reincarnation wood railings of Tao County's Xia River ferry crossing, he stretched himself out to the length of all of Tao County. With a thought, all the treetops began to sway gently in the exact same way. When observant common people noticed this peculiarity, they were greatly amazed, prostrating themselves in worship toward the trees one after another.

He hadn't been this happy in a long time.

Then Tai Sui turned around, quickly gathering and shrinking his consciousness. When he passed a certain place, he sent out a very slender beam of spiritual energy.

The spiritual energy made a precise stroke on the amulet the devout old woman had just carved.

The old woman gave a cry, startled into dropping the amulet onto the ground. When she looked at it again, a number of symmetrical whiskers had appeared on either side of Tai Sui's face on the amulet; the divine Tai Sui had turned into a divine cat!

Then an authentic local accent sounded in her ear: "Don't depend on me. You got better on your own, what's it got to do with me? Something good happens today, you plant it on me, and if something goes wrong tomorrow, you'll plant that on me, too. My head's covered in grass from all of you planting things on me. Wretches!"

Before his words had completely fallen on the mortal's ears, he had already returned to the yard with the young woman from Great Wan.

Qiu Sha, a mere ascended spirit who clearly had no idea what she was doing, wanted to make arrangements for other people's destinies.

He thought: Does she really take herself for one of the five sages?

And who cared about the five sages, anyway? They'd become gods free from the dust of the mortal world after attaining the full moon positions and gone walking off through the air, and hadn't the mortal world they'd left behind reached its current pitiful condition?

Blazes!

He called out to the familiar-looking young woman dressed as a man:
“Hey.”

The young woman dressed as a man—Wei Chengxiang—abruptly opened her eyes. It was as if she had been struck by lightning.

“I mean you no harm, don't be nervous.” Facing someone from Wan, Tai Sui instinctively changed back to the accent he was most familiar with. “I just wanted to ask, do you know that that big idiot Qiu is planning to use you to destroy Tao County?”

Wei Chengxiang was stunned and speechless. She didn't hear what he was saying at all.

This voice... This voice was...

She clamped a hand over the Law Breaker Bracelet. Her first thought was that this eerie immortal tool was pulling some trick. "...Uncle?"

Tai Sui: "..."

Wow, what were Great Wan's customs like now? Were all young women this polite?

"Sure," he casually agreed, since there was no point in missing out on taking advantage, "any kind of uncle will do."

Huh?

As soon as he said this, Tai Sui went blank: these words were also familiar. Hadn't he said something like this before...?

He carefully examined the young woman's thin, weatherbeaten face. He saw the eye-opening scar that looked like a tear track at the corner of her eye. Something seemed ready to come to his call.

"I didn't notice it last time," he heard himself blurt out. "How come you ended up with an eye-opening scar after all?"

Why would he say "last time"?

Which time was "last time"?

Wei Chengxiang's eyes turned red all at once.

It had been five years.

Back then, he had only told her "walk the path ahead on your own" and said they wouldn't meet again; since then, they really hadn't met again.

She had been terrified, had been resentful; later, she had dreamed for a time that the senior in the reincarnation wood wasn't ignoring her, he was injured or dead. Then she had begun to worry.

She talked to the reincarnation wood amulet every day. When she was sad she would talk, when she was uncertain she would talk, and when she had reached an impasse, she would also talk...but apart from that one time with the late-autumn red, the reincarnation wood amulet hadn't given her any response.

But as she'd talked on and on, she really had gotten used to walking on her own.

The reincarnation wood amulet seemed to have turned into a dream from her teenage years, a faint consolation.

"I must be dreaming," she thought. "Otherwise, why would this voice be exactly the same as back then? Not even the tone has changed."

Wei Chengxiang squeezed her eyes shut. The thin corners of her mouth trembled a few times as she struggled to raise them into a smile.

She had to behave properly. She was no longer the wet-behind-the-ears, inexperienced little girl who didn't understand anything. She was a cultivator. She couldn't disappoint the senior.

But when Wei Chengxiang opened her mouth, she couldn't keep her voice steady. It reeled and slipped into a tearful tone. "I...ahem, I'm sorry, uncle...senior..."

Her mind and mouth seemed to be split, each doing its own thing. Her brain was wandering around blankly: How could I be crying? Didn't the fire in Jinping's southern outskirts burn up all my tears?

But her mouth was babbling: "I'm just...I'm just a little surprised..."

Tai Sui watched her a little helplessly. "Don't cry."

Do you know me?

So before I was sealed away somewhere, I really did exist?

Who am I?

"I'm not, no, I'm not crying." Wei Chengxiang roughly wiped away the tears that had rolled to her chin following the eye-opening scar. "I was just remembering. Senior, you said that all the musicians on the Lingyang River didn't amount to anything, and your qin could turn a donkey into a famous singer... That was true, you weren't just talking big. I've heard many famous instruments since then, and none of them could match up to yours."

The inside of "Tai Sui"'s head roared: yes, it seemed that he'd once had a qin.

The qin was named...

In all of Tao County, the quiet voices of the Chu people came through the uneven reincarnation wood trees along the roads.

Tai Sui...

Tai Sui, bless me...

Tai Sui, please help us...

The qin was named “Tai Sui.”

Wei Chengxiang took off the reincarnation wood amulet hanging around her neck. The tears from her fingers accidentally seeped into the amulet. The person residing in the reincarnation wood tree a few steps away instantly tasted salt.

Salt, like the turbulent waters of the East Sea.

In a daze, he was swept up by a salty sea breeze, swept back to the fathomless Resurrection Vortex, the lightless bottom of the Impassable Sea, and to the inside of a leaf, where the Sword that Mended the Heavens had cut his palm.

There, the demon host had met its end, the sages had broken faith, and the Bell of Tribulation had tolled for someone unknown. Amidst a huge sound, he passed through the rippling songs of the Lingyang River and the snowy skies of Flying Jade Peak; he missed a step amid all this beauty and fell to the bank of the Xia River, into an abandoned village, and as he fell became a wandering ghost...mixed in among the mortals, almost indistinguishable from their minds, congested with the flavor of pickles.

He remembered. He wasn't a great monster like Qiu Sha, far from it; he didn't deserve to be mentioned in the same breath.

He was only an eccentric young master, born in Jinping's Dangui Lane, in the deep courtyards of the Yongning Marquis Manor.

His name was Xi Ping, courtesy name Shiyong, alias Mr. Yu Gan; the most renowned specialist in elopements among the brothels, the most embarrassing rebellious disciple of Flying Jade Peak... It was all like something from another lifetime.

He had once disobeyed the three thousand paths of the Great Way, claimed the ungovernable way for his own; now that was the only thing that hadn't changed—it turned out to be just enough.

“A-Xiang.” After many years, Xi Ping pronounced his old acquaintance’s name like a sigh. “I see your taste hasn’t gotten any worse, so how did you get mixed up with that goblin?”

Wei Chengxiang smiled tearfully. “But the two of you use almost the same tone when you’re making fun of people.”

Constant and unfailing self-confidence that seemed to be based on nothing at all.

Xi Ping: “...”

She’d learned to talk back!

The connection between the two of them was quite marvelous. On the one hand, their fates were deeply entangled, able to bridge life and death; on the other hand, their relationship was very weak, held together only by a small reincarnation wood amulet. When it came to speaking of the past, naturally they couldn’t lay out much about the sorrow of separation. Whether it came to drifting through the cracks between Wan and He, between righteous and evil, or wandering among the common people on both sides of the Xia River, these things were both profoundly heavy; light words couldn’t describe them.

Xi Ping cut a long story short: “I’ve been in seclusion.”

Wei Chengxiang said, “I’ve mainly been active in the Land of Turmoil.”

The reincarnation wood tree rustled. Wei Chengxiang slowly pulled herself together and told him about the changes in Great Wan and of the late-autumn red beneath the Lancang Mountains.

Xi Ping rarely interrupted. As he listened quietly, he raked together all the odds and ends of information he had come across in the last five years: the Crown Prince had inherited the throne; the Yao family must have breathed a sigh of relief. Perhaps Ziming-xiong no longer got diarrhea.

The country was safe and sound. San-ge was also safe and sound... Putting together this Kaiming Department, he was spending Xuanyin Mountain’s money to support his own people, propping himself up on the strength of many evil cultivators who believed themselves to have sentiments—wasn’t that superior to the Zhou family ancestors digging around in the Impassable Sea? It was the seventh month now, time for the old lady’s birthday. He would have gone back to Jinping.

Five years. The old lady would be eighty...

As soon as the thought arose, Xi Ping decisively broke it off—he couldn't go back, so there was no use in thinking about it; he would only be pointlessly depressing himself. It was better to focus on what was in front of him. “You say that Qiu Sha can use late-autumn red to kill people, and she can merge with those trees?”

Wei Chengxiang said, “That's why I always suspected she was a tree spirit.”

Xi Ping: “...”

A-Xiang had more or less introduced to cultivation by reincarnation wood, so she wouldn't think there was anything unusual about “plants with magic powers.”

In fact, supposed “nature spirits” were only dreams of the common people. The nearest thing on earth to those spirits were probably the spiritual beasts raised by the Shu. Ordinary plants and animals couldn't “cultivate to enlightenment”—not even if they were constantly fed spiritual stones; at most you would get a bit of material for elixirs. The differences between magic plants and ordinary plants were in “Can you eat it?” and “How do you eat it?” Intelligence couldn't appear out of nowhere.

There was only one circumstance in which you could use a plant as your own body—that was an “accompanying plant.”

Xi Ping had only learned about this after fusing Yuan Hui's complete set of hidden bones.

A few masters, upon shedding their skins, would produce a type of plant that hadn't existed in the world before; this plant was called "accompanying." For example, Yuan Hui's reincarnation wood. Even after he died, the plant could still find surroundings that were suitable to its existence and keep on growing without end.

If someone afterward coincidentally acquired a certain key inheritance, they could "succeed to" that accompanying plant.

And the strange aspect lay in the fact that all the great sects were overseen by shed skin forebears, yet Xi Ping had never heard of any of them having an "accompanying plant." So he had thought it was peculiar to Yuan Hui.

Now it seemed that reincarnation wood wasn't a singular instance. It was likely that late-autumn red was also a type of accompanying plant.

No wonder Qiu Sha could sense his existence. It turned out that they really were alike.

And no wonder her way seemed so strange—Xi Ping had observed a few battles. She didn't seem to have her own weapons or techniques, but she could “swallow” the essence of a person who had died at her hands and use it as if she were the real thing. That person's vital weapon wouldn't miss a beat; it wouldn't even know that its master had become someone else...until she had exhausted that person's essence.

Late-autumn red was a parasitic vine—looking at it that way, it did make sense.

Xi Ping said, “Let's not talk about her for now. That ‘Law Breaker’ has recognized you as its master? Can you turn it off?”

Wei Chengxiang shook her head. “It's known as the tool without a grade, so anyone can use it. But I think its grade is too high. Perhaps current cultivators can't understand it. I can only activate it and set the ‘axiom.’ I arranged with her that the Law Breaker would cease to operate when either the axiom was broken, or the axiom came true. Uncle, don't worry, I know where to draw the line. Tao County won't disappear.”

Xi Ping paused. “What does it mean for the axiom to break or the axiom to come true?”

“The axiom here is that ‘On the seventh day of the seventh month, Qiu Sha will appear at the night feast in the Immortal Palace.’ Once Qiu Sha arrives at the Immortal Palace, the time here will be the time of the Immortal Palace’s night feast. If she dies there or leaves midway, the night feast will be there, but she won’t be. The condition that ‘she’s at the Immortal Palace night feast’ will no longer hold up. That’s called the axiom breaking. The axiom being realized means that the axiom will also have been realized outside of the Law Breaker. The link between the inside and the outside of the Law Breaker will naturally conclude then—in other words, when the human world reaches the Immortal Palace’s night feast on the seventh day of the seventh month, the Law Breaker will put Tao County back.”

But after he heard this, Xi Ping didn’t stop worrying. He kept feeling that there was something wrong.

CHAPTER 80 - Indignant Cicadas (14)

There is no doubt that everyone judges others by their own standards—otherwise, they would have no basis for understanding others. But there are two circumstances in which you must carefully consider how you judge another by your own standards: one is when there is too great a difference between your positions and temperaments; the other is when there is too great a difference between your knowledge and abilities.

Qiu Sha undoubtedly fell under the latter heading. For example, when Xi Ping had been confused and muddleheaded before, he'd had absolutely no idea that such a thing as the Law Breaker existed.

Now that Xi Ping's consciousness had been restored, if not for the fact that trees had no such capability, he would have broken out in a cold sweat—he'd actually thought he was an evildoer of Qiu Sha's sort and had been using his knowledge, which could just fill the bottom of a vase, to ponder the motives of an old monster several hundred years old!

“No, A-Xiang, you and I won't be able to work this out. We're not likely to see through what she's come up with. We don't even know whether she has some magic power similar to the Law Breaker,” Xi Ping said seriously. “You have to look at her goals. The further in time, the more opponents she'll have. All it would take is one master putting up a difficult fight, and the enemies coming in will become more and more numerous as time goes on. If the Law Breaker breaks under those circumstances and Tao County returns to the human world, anyone could be waiting out there to kill her. Won't she be in for it? If Qiu Sha genuinely intended to return Tao County intact, she couldn't have failed to consider her own plight, and she wouldn't have agreed to an arrangement with you that was going to get her killed."

After hearing this, Wei Chengxiang stared blankly for a moment. Then she was terrified. "Yes, senior. I've been careless... I shouldn't have come, should I?"

"Indeed," Xi Ping thought.

It wasn't that he was cold and indifferent, an advocate for not repaying kindness—it was that it sounded to him as though there was something very off about Qiu Sha letting Wei Chengxiang go.

That A-Xiang hadn't noticed anything wrong was because her temperament was like that to begin with: stiff quills and a soft belly.

But Xi Ping considered it, putting himself in Qiu Sha's position. If his shifu died and Zhaoting spent eight hundred years hiding from his sight, then ran off with a stranger right in front of his eyes, he might explode from anger; it would take pounding the two-timing sword and person into smithereens together to vent his resentment.

Of course, Qiu Sha wasn't him, but the murderous aura coming off her made your head hurt when you passed by her. Could she really be more magnanimous than him on this front?

Xi Ping said, "You're already here. It's pointless to talk about whether you should have come or not."

All of a sudden, neither of them was in the mood to think of or lament the hardships of fate. They put their heads together and rapidly combed through the rules of the Law Breaker several times but came up empty—Wei Chengxiang was the master of the Law Breaker Bracelet; while she couldn't completely control the Law Breaker, all ambiguities such as "How is the boundary of the Immortal Palace's night feast to be delimited?" and "Does it count if Qiu Sha doesn't go in person but her consciousness is there controlling late-autumn red?" were resolved according to Wei Chengxiang's ideas. She hadn't even told Qiu Sha what those ideas were, so she certainly couldn't rule-lawyer her way out.

Furthermore, it was sufficient for either of the two conditions, the axiom breaking or the axiom being realized, to be established; if they could both be established at the same time, then there would definitely be no problem. Wei Chengxiang had Qiu Sha neatly walled up.

Just as Xi Ping was beginning to suspect he was being too mistrustful and paranoid, his spiritual sense was touched.

A master was approaching!

Xi Ping quickly split off half his consciousness and flew out of the small yard through the reincarnation wood. He saw a man in convict's garb standing several zhang away. He was so pretty he was a little feminine, gentle and scholarly.

Oh?

There was actually a person who had entered static, timeless Tao County and hadn't followed his instinct to go find the Immortal Palace?

Xi Ping had never seen this person, but he thought there was a familiar aura around him. Through his consciousness, he said to Wei Chengxiang, "One of Xuanyin's."

Wei Chengxiang went blank: before, when the senior had talked about "Xuanyin," he would say "Xuanyin Mountain" or "Xuanyin's inner sect" to distinguish those from outer sects like Heaven's Design Pavilion.

Occasionally he would let slip a "the immortal sect." To listen to him, it was clear he was an immortal from Xuanyin—only Xuanyin's own people would distinguish between this and that part of the sect.

But just now, when he'd spat out the word "Xuanyin," it had carried an indescribable chill and distance.

What had happened?

Before she could think carefully about it, the man came to the yard's gate. But he didn't knock. First, he took out a pair of glasses and put them on his nose.

There just happened to be a reincarnation wood tree behind him. Xi Ping silently bent a tree branch and looked out through the lenses from the gap between the man's face and the glasses. To his surprise, he saw that the courtyard wall was covered in invisible inscriptions.

These were prohibitions Qiu Sha had laid down.

Xi Ping had spent five years hanging around Chu's black market. He'd seen countless strange and rare instructions. But he couldn't quite get a handle on these. He could only sense through the lenses that there was a cold murderous aura about these characters.

The newcomer examined these inscriptions for a while. Presumably he also couldn't find his way around them. So he sighed, took a step back, and loudly said, "I am Lin Chi of Xuanyin Mountain. I request an audience with the master of the Law Breaker."

What, the Golden Hand?!

"Him?" said Xi Ping.

"Who?" said Wei Chengxiang.

Xi Ping: "... "

Hadn't he just said?

Then he realized something. "Wait, you can't hear him?"

Wei Chengxiang was perplexed. "Did he say something?"

Woman and tree looked at each other in dismay. Wei Chengxiang's expression became somewhat grim.

Xi Ping wiped away his freshly provoked sense of good fortune—Qiu Sha wasn't only protecting Wei Chengxiang, she was also cutting her off from outsiders. The only thing that hadn't been restricted was him, the “tree spirit” in the reincarnation wood. Qiu Sha, who also had an accompanying plant, had known that he could speak to A-Xiang directly through her spirit, and that nothing external could prevent it.

There was no doubt about it. Qiu Sha believed that, being like her, his interests would be the same as hers, and she had even been relying on him to help her from the shadows.

Lin Chi waited patiently for a while, saw that there was no response, then said, “I heard on the South Sea about the abnormality in Tao County and thought then that it sounded like the Law Breaker, but I didn't dare to believe it. Because the Law Breaker is the fussiest tool I've ever seen, capable of altering all surrounding rules, not to be found unwillingly even by a shed skin cultivator. Back then...”

At this point, he paused delicately and changed what he was going to say. “There is no way she would choose a brutal and murderous person like Qiu Sha. Fellow cultivator, the Law Breaker has chosen you, so I trust that no matter what your position may be, you must hold yourself to upright and honorable standards and keep your conscience clear in all matters. I have no ill intent. Would it be possible for you to come out and see me?”

Xi Ping conveyed this speech to Wei Chengxiang without missing a word.

Goddamned late-autumn red. It had turned him into an aping myna bird.

When he was finished aping, Xi Ping at first wanted to say something, but he suddenly noticed Wei Chengxiang’s appearance—her wrists lay on her knees. She was naturally long-limbed. The knuckles of her dangling fingers protruded slightly, and there were many calluses on them.

He froze, suddenly realizing that she wasn’t a little girl anymore. He swallowed his words.

Indeed, Wei Chengxiang didn’t seek his opinion in a panic like she had when she was a girl. She very composedly tapped her knee with her fingers, not answering, waiting to hear what Lin Chi would say.

Not receiving a response after a long moment, Lin Chi pursed his lips, an expression of suffering appearing on his face, as if being forced to sing this ridiculous one-man comical act was torture to him. Watching him, even Xi Ping felt embarrassed on his behalf.

After a moment, Lin Chi sighed, steeled himself, and said, “You have chosen to stand on Qiu Sha’s side. Naturally you are on your guard against me and likely do not trust me. In the days since I entered Tao County, I have searched everywhere and found that the Law Breaker’s axiom here seems to be connected to time. I do not know whether my conjecture is correct... I would only like to inform you that time is very dangerous. As soon as a divergence occurs, Tao County may disappear forever. Am I correct in assuming that Qiu Sha has not divulged that apart from the Law Breaker, she also possesses the Riverward?”

The Riverward!

Xi Ping suddenly remembered that Qiu Sha had written san-ge a letter through Xu Rucheng, where she had also mentioned this thing.

Wei Chengxiang shook her head gently. Her fingers stopped tapping her knee. When she spoke, it was in a practiced, deep masculine voice. “Please instruct me, Golden Hand. What is the Riverward?”

Xi Ping had intended to pass these words on for her, but he saw that when she spoke, two inscription characters on the courtyard gate evaporated. Her voice passed without obstruction through the gap in the gate.

True—there were no laws inside the Law Breaker. Anything could happen. It was very random. There was of course nothing surprising about a mere half-immortal like her puncturing with a single sentence inscriptions that could hold back the master of Moon Plated Peak.

Xi Ping knew that immortal tools could repel each other due to conflicting properties, and that immortal tools of the ascended spirit grade and above could even repel people who were incompatible with their properties. But he had never seen a thing so...impossibly spirited as the Law Breaker.

For a moment, Xi Ping even felt that it was alive and had its own will.

At last getting a response, Lin Chi acted as though he had been granted a general pardon. He breathed a sigh of relief. “The Law Breaker destroys the natural laws and rules within a certain range. The Riverward, on the other hand, can convey a person to any place.”

Wei Chengxiang sat up straight. “Including taking them into or out of the Law Breaker?”

“No one has yet tried it,” Lin Chi said quietly. “The Riverward can only be used three times.”

The Law Breaker also had limits on its use—at its utmost, the largest area it could cover was basically the size of Tao County, but at least it could be used repeatedly. The Riverward, however, could only be used three times. These two immortal tools were both things that scraped the lowest levels of natural law; they seemed to be divine or demonic products, not susceptible to being distinguished by grade. No doubt the more exacting the conditions of use were, the more high-grade they became.

In other words, it was very likely that the Riverward could pierce through the Law Breaker.

Wei Chengxiang concentrated. Through her spirit, she quickly said to Xi Ping, “No, this must only be a means of escape she’s left for herself, so she can get out any time if it turns out the Law Breaker is working against her. The Riverward shouldn’t pose a danger to Tao County. When the Law Breaker reaches a certain point, it will have to conclude, because no matter where Qiu Sha is, if the axiom isn’t broken, it will be realized, and if it can’t be realized, the axiom will break, even if she uses the Riverward to leave at that point in time.”

But Xi Ping slowly sucked in a breath. “A-Xiang, that’s not how it goes... Damn it, what kind of person was this Hui Xiangjun? No wonder the five great sects joined hands eight centuries ago to kill an ascended spirit.”

“What?”

“If the Riverward really can take her to any place, she can make it so the axiom doesn’t break but can’t be realized either—she only needs to activate the Riverward a moment before that point, so it will take her past that point in time. The Immortal Palace’s night feast won’t end in an instant; she’ll still be at the night feast, so the axiom won’t be broken, but at the instant of the join, there will be no Qiu Sha, so the axiom won’t be realized.”

Hearing this, Wei Chengxiang’s forehead ached. Maintaining a taciturn and profound bearing in front of Lin Chi, she silently said to Xi Ping, “The Riverward can take her through time? No, wait, senior, I’m confused... That’s impossible. If the Riverward was so powerful, why wouldn’t she return to the past, when Hui Xiangjun was alive, and rescue her? Or simply return to before the five sages had established the spiritual mountains—wouldn’t she know all of history for centuries past and centuries to come, be able to satisfy her every desire?”

“The Riverward certainly can’t. Time is a fixed law of cause and effect. But...”

Xi Ping’s next sentence nearly coincided with Lin Chi’s.

“This is inside the Law Breaker,” said Xi Ping.

“Furthermore, this is inside the Law Breaker,” said Lin Chi.

Inside the Law Breaker, apart from the “axiom,” all fixed laws became ineffective.

Layering the two tools on top of each, you really could reverse nature and time.

Lin Chi said softly, “When this is over, she can use the Riverward to return to the human world. If my reckoning is correct, the Riverward must have been used once before. There will be two uses left.”

And Tao County would disappear, taking half of the cultivation world...as well as the Law Breaker Bracelet that had betrayed her with it.

A chill began to come up from the soles of Wei Chengxiang’s feet. She bit down on the tip of her tongue. With her mouth full of the taste of blood, she closed her eyes and calmed down as fast as possible. She said to Xi Ping, “This is my fault. If Tao County truly disappears, I won’t be able to atone for it with ten thousand deaths. But once the Law Breaker is activated, no one can stop it. Unless I die... Senior, on the border between the Land of Turmoil and Great Wan, there’s a little village sixteen li south of what used to be Bajing County in Southern He. I gave shelter to some intelligent Turmoilers there. Because of me, they worship reincarnation wood, and they've planted many trees, you..."

Xi Ping interrupted her: "Drop the heroics. I can't do anything about it."

Outside the Law Breaker, he couldn't even leave the divine image, and here she was sending him all the way to the Land of Turmoil. She really knew how to hand out work.

"Unless you die, you said?" Xi Ping asked grimly. "Have you tried that out for yourself?"

Wei Chengxiang: "..."

True, that was what Qiu Sha had always been subtly hinting at: as the master of the Law Breaker Bracelet, she had to preserve her life; if she died, the Law Breaker would conclude.

"You can't even control that lousy bracelet while you're alive. You think it cares whether you live or die?" Xi Ping said. "Stop talking nonsense. You're a bracelet rack who's overthinking things. Hurry up and ask Lin what to do."

Wei Chengxiang accordingly turned to Lin Chi and explained the Law Breaker Bracelet's axiom and conditions of concluding. "Master Lin, do you know what to do?"

After listening to this, Lin Chi didn't speak for a long time. Finally, he smiled bitterly up at the sky and, without a word, turned and left.

Wei Chengxiang said, "Master Lin?"

"I am no master," Lin Chi's voice came from nearby. "Compared to her, I am only a craftsman... I cannot comprehend her relics. There's nothing to be done. On the list of those Qiu Sha wants to kill, I probably rank even ahead of Xiang Zhao. That being the case, I shouldn't delay any longer."

Wei Chengxiang said, "Wait..."

Xi Ping: "..."

These two were really something. When they came to a problem, they didn't solve the problem, but on the other hand they were both quite proactive when it came to committing suicide.

In a moment of desperation, the roots of some reincarnation wood trees beside the road all came out of the ground and got under Lin Chi's feet, tripping him. At the same time, a talisman flew out of a reincarnation wood tree and slapped Lin Chi right on the back.

“Hold it right there!”

CHAPTER 81 - Indignant Cicadas (15)

Meeting with an unexpected sneak attack, Lin Chi only had time to hastily reach back and raise a thin layer of spiritual energy to shield himself from behind. The talisman of unknown origin pierced his defense and only dispersed when it hit his protective robes, giving him a violent shove forward. Adding in the tree roots tripping him up, the mighty master of Moon Plated Peak nearly fell flat on his face. Lin Chi reeled drunkenly for over a zhang and bumped into a wall.

Wei Chengxiang, who could only hear through the cracks in the inscriptions: "..."

What was that noise?

Xi Ping: "..."

Had Master Lin just swapped out his limbs? Why did they seem brand new?

He was simply astonished: was there something else he'd forgotten? He really was an established foundation, right...? The kind that had established himself without a Way of the Heart?

Back then, in the East Sea, he'd been able to make Lin Zhaoli go weak at the knees with a single beam of shifu's sword energy; just now, the established foundation cultivators who had wandered by mistake into the ascended spirit battlefield had been like drops of water on a hot pan, evaporating as soon as they fell—so how could he not only travel freely through the ascended spirit battlefield, but even dare to hit the master of Moon Plated Peak?

Lin Chi, leaning miserably against the wall, found his footing. “May I ask what manner of divinity you are?”

Master Lin wasn't a Tai Sui believer, and he hadn't poured blood onto reincarnation wood. Xi Ping couldn't speak to him directly, so he collected his disorderly thoughts and used spiritual energy to write on the ground: “Please wait, Peak Master Lin.”

Lin Chi looked down. These were pure standard Wan characters...and for some reason, the handwriting looked familiar.

Before he could recall why, he saw the rapid and flourishing writing become a little more careful and restrained, continuing: “I may have an idea we can try. If Your Excellency isn't in too great a hurry to reincarnate, could you help out?”

The Immortal Palace in Seventeen Li Town—

It was clearly midsummer, the sixth month...no, the beginning of the seventh month. But as far as the eye could see, there was late-autumn red all around the Immortal Palace. The parasitic vines growing out of season had cleared away all the flowers, grasses, and trees in the vicinity of the Immortal Palace; not even the reincarnation wood had survived.

If not for the fact that the late-autumn red seemed to have some scruples and was confining its activities within the scope of the mustard seed's cover, it would have occupied all of Tao County by now.

At present, a red-eyed sword cultivator from Northern Li's Kunlun Sect was slashing in the direction of the late-autumn red.

This Kunlun sword cultivator was named Cheng Yu, a figure who had been famous in the north for a long time. When his sect had sent him to Chu to "expel evil," he hadn't taken Qiu Sha seriously—an early ascended spirit "two-year-old" who probably wasn't even steady on her level yet. The fact that Xiang Zhao's boat had capsized in a sewer only went to show that hardly any of these southern sword cultivators knew what they were doing—coming here, he had also brought along a number of promising established foundations under a hundred fifty years old to get some experience. Who would have thought that a whole generation of virtuosos would die here because of his rashness?

With one stroke of his sword, Cheng Yu cut ten chi deep into the ground; the peculiar late-autumn red was torn up by the roots. When he saw the roots of those damned vines, his scalp prickled—the parasitic vines hadn't randomly taken root on vegetation. The protruding root systems were wrapped around human corpses, and he recognized several of the faces!

Of the established foundations who had died here, only their spiritual bones remained. Those whose flesh still was still present were all ascended spirits. Cheng Yu saw that one of the corpses near him belonged to a person who had studied under the same teacher as him.

But before entering Tao County, he had received word that this person was still on his way. How could he have reached this place before him...? What the hell was going on here?

Before he could calm his agitated brain, the parasitic vines growing on his fellow disciple's body threw themselves at him ferociously, powerful sword energy coming right toward him. Cheng Yu gave a loud cry and narrowly managed to block, a crack appearing in his vital sword. He retreated several chi in a row, panic-stricken—even with his eyes closed, he couldn't have failed to recognize that sword energy. It was the unfailingly orthodox ninefold sword of Kunlun.

The parasitic vines clinging to his fellow disciple's body seemed to have absorbed all of his essence and cultivation!

Cheng Yu's pupils dilated slightly as he scanned the late-autumn red that lay as far as the eye could see: if each cluster of vines was growing on a corpse, that was as much as to say...that all the people who had died here before had become Qiu Sha's puppets! She had an honor guard of ascended spirits!

How could that be?

Even if there was such a thing as an evil way that allowed you to swallow other people's cultivation, she was also at the ascended spirit level; how could she sustain so many essences of the same grade as her?

Just then, a slightly deep female voice crooning "The Fisherwoman of Chu" came through the faintly trembling red leaves: "The Xia runs south, on the east bank is Yu. The waves are soft, as they ferry we two—"

"I don't believe it!" Cheng Yu abruptly squeezed the sword in his hand, brazenly facing the vines growing everywhere. "Come out here!"

In response, a person walked out from among the vines. Qiu Sha was stained with blood from head to toe, holding the vital sword of a dead man. The two Kunlun ninefold swords of the same origin collided. Her singing suddenly became sharp, the tail end turning into a whistle. There was no time for Cheng Yu to react. A hole opened in the vines behind him, and a spiritual beast of Southern Shu that was controlled by the whistling snapped its jaws toward him.

Cheng Yu braced himself, the point of his sword not deviating. Without sparing a sliver attention for what was behind him, he brought the heavy sword down double-handed. The blade nearly came down on the tip of Qiu Sha's nose, the gust from the sword bringing down several strands of her long hair, and the spiritual beast's fangs were just about to touch the top of the sword cultivator's head.

Just then, there was a shout, and a brilliant flame came out of nowhere. It didn't land; it inserted itself precisely between the spiritual beast and Cheng Yu.

The sword in Qiu Sha's hand broke. The essence in the corpse of the Kunlun sword cultivator wrapped in late-autumn red was exhausted; the corpse instantly disintegrated. And Qiu Sha, like a rusty moth, floated backward, dodging the sword gust. The aggressive late-autumn red hastily shielded her and was cut down by the pursuing frost of the Kunlun sword. The sword energy just reached her, leaving a bloody welt on the face of this demonic beauty.

When the spiritual beast she was controlling landed, its nose brushed the flames, and it roared in pain and retreated. It would no longer obey the whistled commands. It curled up inside the circle of flames and didn't dare to move again.

“A fire cage...” Qiu Sha stuck out her tongue and licked the blood on her cheek—even her tongue was longer than normal; she could easily touch the tip of her nose with it. Firelight was reflected in her long, narrow eyes, as if they were about to burst into flame. She stared scorchingly in a certain direction. “At last you dare to show yourself, coward. Have you picked out a thigh you're willing to hug?”

Cheng Yu looked in the direction of her gaze and saw a man in convict's clothes come down from the sky riding a blue luan that was the height of two people. He was paler than all the dead on the ground.

Cheng Yu had never seen such a big blue luan. The auspicious bird's eyes were a pair of translucent white spirits... It was actually a realistic immortal tool.

“My thanks.” The sword cultivator from Kunlun rapidly evened out his breathing and saluted the newcomer. “My thanks. I am Cheng Yu of Kunlun.”

The man in convict’s clothes met his gaze for a moment, then rapidly averted his eyes. He gave a cold and formal nod. “Lin Chi of Xuanyin.”

Cheng Yu was startled. “The Golden Hand?”

Qiu Sha laughed. “Does he deserve that title?”

Lin Chi didn’t retort. He took a talisman between his fingertips and stuck it to his throat. His voice instantly spread throughout the mustard seed. “Everyone...”

As soon as he spoke, Qiu Sha threw herself at him, like a falcon that had caught the scent of blood. The blue luan spiraled upward carrying Lin Chi. Indeed, an immortal tool that burned white spirits was something out of the ordinary. Even a real blue luan couldn’t fly like this!

As fast as Qiu Sha could move, that was how fast the blue luan immortal tool could move. It didn’t need anyone to control it. It could adjust its speed and direction in response to its pursuer. Lin Chi, as though reciting a memorized text, spoke in a voice as level as the Xia River at midsummer:

“We currently find ourself in the midst of a tool known as the Law Breaker. The Law Breaker has taken us all to the seventh day of the seventh month. If Qiu Sha is not dead before time in the outside world reaches the Immortal Palace’s night feast on the seventh day of the seventh month, Tao County will be unable to return to the human...”

Before he could speak the last word, the late-autumn red inside the mustard seed began to run riot, a dozen vines reaching toward the sky, each of the vines as thick as a person’s arm span transforming into a Qiu Sha. Sword energy gobbled up from some unlucky sword cultivator surged from all around.

Lin Chi didn’t panic. The wings of the blue luan he was riding extended and changed shape, wrapping him up like a flower bud, narrowly blocking Qiu Sha’s blow.

“You—rotten—coward!” Qiu Sha didn’t let up. At each pause, she set off an earth-shattering sword gust, smashing the immortal tool wrapped around him, each blow fiercer and heavier than the one before—how could this be an early stage ascended spirit!?

Lin Chi hid in the pitch darkness inside the immortal tool. Watching the great evildoer smashing a crack in the immortal tool and the white spirits becoming fainter and fainter, he neither fought back nor worried. He quietly examined the crack.

“It was your fault that she died and her way was extinguished, and you still had the face to use her things to win fame you didn’t deserve. Shameless braggart of a Golden Hand, get the hell out here! Meet your death!”

Lin Chi only sighed—Xi Ping suspected that this Master Lin had spent too much time at his forge, and there was something wrong with his lungs. It was all sighs and lamentations with him, as if he were a widower whose whole family had just died.

At this time, Xi Ping had split off a part of his consciousness and was hiding in a reincarnation wood amulet in Lin Chi’s sleeve.

This peak master of Moon Plated Peak was without exception the most easily bullied ascended spirit Xi Ping had ever met. When he’d told him to drip blood on the reincarnation wood amulet, Xi Ping had had a bellyful of words prepared for haggling with him, but before he could say a single word, Lin Chi just took some blood and dripped it onto the wood, openly displaying his attitude—go ahead and plot against me in secret; plotting in the open is fine, too; I’ve had enough of living, anyway.

Now, Xi Ping couldn’t resist saying, “Peak Master Lin...”

“Alas,” said Lin Chi, “she’s right.”

Xi Ping: “...”

Who cares whether she’s right!

You can die after you’ve said what I told you to say! Just try a little, Peak Master Lin, I’m begging you!

There was a cracking sound as the immortal tool protecting Lin Chi was split open by Qiu Sha. Biting cold sword energy came right toward him. Fortunately, the other cultivators trapped in the Immortal Palace reacted now. Kunlun’s Cheng Yu’s blow was the first to come flying, shielding Lin Chi.

Next, an unknown spiritual beast from Southern Shu came flying at the same time as a talisman. The talisman swept away the fierce late-autumn red, and the spiritual beast caught Lin Chi as he fell through the air. The cultivators trapped in the Immortal Palace by late-autumn red, who had been running around all over the place like headless flies, gradually gathered.

Xi Ping was about to lose his temper. “Talk already!”

The spiritual beast carrying Lin Chi passed by a reeking wind. Master Lin finally remembered what he was supposed to be doing and continued his recitation. “The Law Breaker isn’t in her hands. The master of the Law Breaker is her accomplice, of low cultivation, hidden at the boundary of Tao County and protected by inscriptions.”

After this, he told them Wei Chengxiang’s location. “If there are those among my fellow cultivators who are experts in inscriptions, please go have a look.”

The inscription masters among the cultivators exchanged looks and withdrew from the battlefield. Sword cultivators and talismans quickly came to fill the vacancies, holding off Qiu Sha in a rather well-coordinated fashion.

Wei Chengxiang was alerted by the inscriptions in the yard lighting up and knew that the people coming to “save her” were here.

The first step Xi Ping had planned was to get her out of the yard.

Xi Ping had guessed that while Wei Chengxiang’s death wouldn’t necessarily mean that the Law Breaker Bracelet would cease to operate, losing its master would still have an impact on the immortal tool. Otherwise, Qiu Sha would have silenced her as soon as the Law Breaker had activated; she wouldn't have left her alive to reveal the Law Breaker's axiom. She had certainly made a ring around Wei Chengxiang in order to protect her until the moment of the Immortal Palace's night feast arrived.

Qiu Sha had placed A-Xiang in a yard far from Seventeen Li Town. Once the fighting in the Immortal Palace began, it was unlikely that she would be able to attend to both ends. So what would she do if Wei Chengxiang's hiding place was discovered, or if Wei Chengxiang herself betrayed her?

Qiu Sha must have made other preparations. The great evildoer was too crafty. Xi Ping had advocated against acting rashly; they would let this bunch of orthodox cultivators go ahead and sweep for mines.

Now, a few inscription experts from Sanyue were surrounding the little yard, all their expressions very grave. They were thinking that the inscriptions on the courtyard wall were ones they had never seen before.

They cautiously consulted for a moment, then began trying to break the inscriptions. Xi Ping watched through the reincarnation wood. As soon as a single crack opened in the inscriptions on the outside of the courtyard wall, a spiritual energy cyclone swirled up inside the yard. On the walls, on the ground, and even on Wei Chengxiang were layer upon layer of inscriptions, and neither of the two of them had noticed them being laid down!

There was a huge sound. The masters were unexpectedly sent flying away by an explosion; it was unclear whether they were dead or alive. The ground at the courtyard gate had nearly collapsed into a well!

Had Wei Chengxiang herself tried to leave, she would have been standing at the gate right now. With her puny half-immortal's cultivation, she would have been broken to pieces.

The next moment, Wei Chengxiang vanished into thin air. Xi Ping said "What luck" to himself and followed her closely with his consciousness through the reincarnation wood.

As expected, his guesses had been very near the mark. Wei Chengxiang's death would have an impact on the Law Breaker, but it couldn't make the Law Breaker stop. If others tried to capture her, she certainly wouldn't approach the gate, so Qiu Sha's "backup plan" would transport her somewhere else; but if she herself betrayed Qiu Sha, the disadvantages of leaving her alive would have outweighed the advantages, so Qiu Sha would simply kill her "dismembered tail."

Wei Chengxiang, having escaped a calamity, was transported to the other side of Tao County, arriving at a place that was nearly as far as possible from Seventeen Li Town's Immortal Palace. She stumbled, then found her footing. The inscriptions on her disappeared. Her hands were still shaking.

Xi Ping scanned with his consciousness. This place just happened to be near Xu Rucheng.

Divine will!

He immediately passed word to Xu-da-bao: "Come over and pick someone up for me!"

In the Immortal Palace, Cheng Yu dodged a late-autumn red vine while holding onto Lin Chi and quickly asked, "Master Lin, how will we know what the time outside is?"

Lin Chi said, "The earlier someone entered Tao County, the later they will arrive. If I recall correctly, Tao County disappeared in the early hours of the sixteenth of the sixth month. The people who entered before sunrise that day will be the last batch to arrive. When we see them, we'll have very little time left."

No sooner had he spoken than a Sanyue cultivator abruptly became agitated. "I...I came in on the night of the sixteenth!"

“What?!”

For a moment, even Lin Chi was slightly stifled.

Xi Ping quickly asked, “How can it be so fast?”

According to his expectations, while they had no way to accurately sense the passage of time outside the Law Breaker, twenty whole days still couldn't pass in the blink of an eye. Lin Chi had only entered Tao County toward the end of the sixth month. When he had found Wei Chengxiang, there ought to have been at least half the time remaining!

Lin Chi considered it for a moment. “I'm afraid it's because of the Law Breaker. She doesn't like to be broken by force and prefers ‘realization.’ Therefore, she will quietly change the rules in favor of attaining ‘realization.’ On the sixteenth day of the sixth month, no one knew what was happening. There were many cultivators who entered Tao County that day. For Qiu Sha, the closer it gets to the point of realization, the more danger there is. So the Law Breaker will try to compress time as much as possible. Also... I'm afraid it's because of you and me, as well.”

Xi Ping, crumbling, said, “How can I have anything to do with it?”

“When that little Brother Wei told you what the axiom was, it imperceptibly added to the risk of the axiom being broken, leading to the Law Breaker compressing time a step further.”

Xi Ping: “...”

How could a lousy immortal tool have its own likes and dislikes?! How could it make so much trouble?!

When he had been forced to receive worship for five years, who had cared that he hated eating pickled foods?

Hardly had Lin Chi spoken than the sounds of talking and cursing came from nearby.

The greatest number of people had charged into Tao County on the sixteenth of the sixth month. A big batch of cultivators had arrived, and the hidden Law Breaker was still speeding up time!

In Great Wan’s Yuzhou, the sun was setting. The cicadas of late summer and early autumn were clamoring fit to boil.

Zhou Ying took out a pocket watch and glanced at it. “The people inside must be about to meet Xiang Jing... ‘Xiang Zhao’ and ‘Xiang Jing’—those two brothers have quite interesting names. It's as if their fates lie in their names.”⁶⁰

Bai Ling was a little restless from worry, repeatedly taking out his communication device to look at it. He had prepared a whole stack of paper substitutes. “My lord, Master Lin is also inside. It's said that he was once close friends with Hui Xiangjun. He must know about the Law Breaker, right? Will he be able to guess the Law Breaker's axiom?”

“Perhaps. There are few total idiots in the toolmaking path.” The heart-protecting lotus at Zhou Ying's neck flashed, as if it didn't like him talking about its creator like this. Zhou Ying ignored it and continued, “So if Qiu Sha hasn't died yet, the people inside must be going crazy.”

The cultivators in Tao County were in fact going crazy. The people who entered the Immortal Palace one after another reported that they had come in at xu hour on the sixteenth, at shen hour...in the blink of an eye, the reports reached noon and went on getting earlier.

In an instant, it was as if a whole shichen's worth of sand had run out.

And Qiu Sha seemed to know that the Law Breaker was helping her. She simply “dissolved” into the late-autumn red filling the Immortal Palace. She was everywhere yet nowhere!

The mustard seed containing the ascended spirit battlefield kept expanding. Now it had nearly reached the edge of Seventeen Li Town, stretched almost to breaking point. Inadvertently, Cheng Yu, red-eyed with murderous intent, lost control of his thrust, and the sword gust broke through the edge of the mustard seed.

Meanwhile, apart from Xu Rucheng and the others who had gone to test the boundaries, the other Luwu had just finished dispersing the weak and elderly from Seventeen Li Town and hadn't yet had a chance to catch their breaths.

To dodge the blow of the Kunlun sword cultivator, the late-autumn red reached out from the mustard seed. It squeezed and snapped the roots of an old reincarnation wood tree, sending it crashing down on the head of an old man who couldn't walk well.

Xi Ping said, "Fuck you, Qiu Sha!"

As the shadow came down, the old man looked up in astonishment, then saw the reincarnation wood tree about to hit his head stop in midair at a weird angle.

The old man, dumbstruck, opened his clouded eyes wide. "Tai Sui..."

“Move!” said Xi Ping.

The Luwu rushing over quickly pulled the old man away, and the tree fell with a crash.

The next moment, a bolt of lightning flashed over Tao County, striking the late-autumn red vine that had escaped the mustard seed.

The whole crowd of ascended spirit masters were startled by this bolt of lightning.

What tricks was the Law Breaker getting up to now? How could there be a heavenly tribulation all of a sudden?

Xi Ping looked up: right—Qiu Sha had sworn not to harm the innocent, or else she would suffer backlash from the Law Breaker.

Lin Chi whispered, “So if she harms mortals, she will suffer backlash from the Law Breaker...”

“Lin Chi!” Xi Ping shouted sternly.

But it was too late. Lin Chi had already said it.

“Huh? What’s...” Before Lin Chi could catch up, he saw cultivators from Southern Shu and Sanyue simultaneously attack the edges of the mustard seed.

After holding out this long, the mustard seed was already on its last legs. How could it hold out against a joint attack from so many ascended spirits? It collapsed at once, and the aftershocks of the ascended spirit battlefield sent Seventeen Li Town’s veins of the earth into convulsions.

Lin Chi’s expression altered. “My fellow cultivators!”

What are you doing? Are you finished with your Ways of the Heart?

“Tai Sui”’s cold laugh came through his spirit. “Anyway, if they can’t kill Qiu Sha soon, Tao County will disappear. As they see it, sacrificing a few nobodies in the vicinity of Seventeen Li Town to save the whole county is perfectly justified. How could that go against their Ways of the Heart? Their Ways of the Heart are doing just fine.”

Cheng Yu didn’t turn his head to look outward. He slashed at the late-autumn red in the Immortal Palace.

At the same time, all the weapons held by the ascended spirits fell like rain on the vines where Qiu Sha was sheltering, and the earth shook inside and outside of Seventeen Li Town. Heavenly lightning hung above their heads and thunder rumbled, warning Qiu Sha not to violate her oath.

Qiu Sha laughed, her laughter echoing throughout the Immortal Palace, almost forming a resonance with the thunder. “Fine! Righteous, orthodox cultivators! Nicely done!”

Boom—

Ignoring the heavenly lightning, she brazenly fought back, and the lightning fell with a deafening rumble right on the late-autumn red.

Ascended spirit spiritual energy crashed together and flew outward, about to raze all of Tao County to the ground!

Just then, all the reincarnation wood trees around Seventeen Li Town began to grow madly. All the spiritual stones stored in the Immortal Palace surged toward those trees.

The late-autumn red instinctively began fighting over the spiritual energy in order to heal its wounds, but Qiu Sha stopped the restless vines with a thought. “Cough-cough...oh, wow...cough, had enough of watching the fun? You couldn’t keep from joining in any longer?”

The bent and crooked reincarnation wood trees by the roadsides seemed to have come alive, their roots bursting out of the ground, cord after cord of their dense root systems spanning the broken earth, narrowly keeping the cracks from opening and holding up houses on the point of collapse. The trees were wildly soaking up the spiritual energy leaking from the ascended spirit battlefield.

Qiu Sha said, smiling, “All right, you can have it.”

As the people gaped in astonishment, the poor quality reincarnation wood trees that normally only grew to a little over a zhang high grew vast and towering, as though they had cultivated spirits, surrounding the battlefield.

Next, the canopy of one of the trees shook, and without warning, a talisman flew out, knocking a Sanyue cultivator right out of the air.

Apart from sword cultivators and the like, who trained their bodies, cultivators who followed other ways weren’t especially proficient in martial arts. In battle, they relied on their spiritual senses, so when the majority of cultivators got into fights, they only had their cultivation level to rely on.

But inside the Law Breaker, the talismans these trees tossed out were like the wrath of heaven. They didn't touch the cultivators' spiritual senses at all.

For a moment, all the ascended spirits became like Lin Chi, who had nearly fallen flat on his face. They couldn't work out what was happening. All the spiritual energy they had just expended was "returned" to them by the reincarnation wood trees. They were in a miserable plight.

A cicada that had perhaps been scared witless clung to the trunk of a reincarnation wood tree, not flying away even now. It fluttered its wings and gave a cry.

One of the Chu residents realized what was happening and cried out, "Look, the misty willow! It's Tai Sui!"

"Tai Sui!"

Having survived the calamity, the people knelt.

"Tai Sui has worked a miracle!"

The late-autumn red deliberately avoided the reincarnation wood trees. Qiu Sha raised her head and looked at the sky above the Immortal Palace, eternally stuck in the evening. She smiled. "Tai Sui... Ha, this place will soon be yours, and you can be the true god of Tao County. It truly makes me envious.”

No sooner had she spoken than a completely bewildered man appeared in the Immortal Palace, looking in shock at the ruins and the monstrous vines everywhere.

Xiang Jing, who had entered Tao County before dawn on the sixteenth day of the sixth month, had arrived.

The last one.

CHAPTER 82 - Indignant Cicadas (16)

Sanyue's Xiang Jing had been trapped in the unpeopled silence from the sixteenth day of the sixth month until the seventh day of the seventh month. If not for the staunch will of an ascended spirit master, he would certainly have gone mad. Now that he had landed all of a sudden among the late-autumn red, from which the reek of blood rose to the skies, Xiang Jing had no time to react in any way before familiar sword energy approached him.

Da-ge?

No, that was wrong!

Xiang Jing flew up and dodged. An obscure human figure wielding the Xiuluo sword slashed at him three times.

As he dodged in haste, he tried at all costs to see who this was. When the three lightning-fast blows fell, the Xiuluo sword shattered without warning. Xiang Zhao's essence had been consumed and completely destroyed.

The inside of Xiang Jing's head roared. His mind was shaken. He was unguarded when a crash sounded in his ear as a pair of huge cymbals from Southern Shu nearly knocked the soul from his body. Xiang Jing was frozen in place. The next moment, several late-autumn red vines pierced his torso and brow, snatching his essence away.

Then he heard a soft, low female voice in his ear: “For my late-autumn red to have taken a liking to you, you must have accumulated several lifetimes’ worth of blessings. And you dare to be insolent before me? To be brutally honest, you are a mere collateral relative of the Xiang clan, who may have profited off anyone’s resources to reach success, who may have entered the Way based on anyone’s precedent—if karma were truly to investigate you, would your background be clean?”

This was...

Xiang Jing’s eyes nearly burst from their sockets. All his facial features were open to their full extent.

These were the wild utterances he himself had pronounced, very long ago: “For a member of my Xiang family to have taken a liking to her, she must have accumulated several lifetimes’ worth of blessings. And she dares to be insolent before me? To be brutally honest, she is a mere common cultivator, who may have walked any evil path to enter the Way—if the sect were truly to investigate her, would her background be clean?”

“Dongheng’s Sanyue is named Xiang, and Great Chu is named Xiang. This land belongs to my family, and so do the spiritual mountains.”

“Tao County is named Qiu, and the seventh day of the seventh month is also named Qiu.” Bright red lips drew close to his ear. Qiu Sha had to bend down to reach him. Her hair, knocked loose, fell on Xiang Jing like snakes. “Your essence is mine now, and so is your life...hahaha.”

As soon as Qiu Sha showed her face, the ascended spirit cultivators’ attacks came whistling toward her like an avalanche.

Not caring at all, she pulled Xiang Jing’s corpse down to the ground and hit the raging spiritual energy with all the essence she had accumulated in the late-autumn red.

In the Immortal Palace and in the sky, the ascended spirit cultivators fell like snowflakes. Underground, the corpses wrapped in late-autumn red disintegrated one after another. She took no notice of whether the surrounding reincarnation wood forest could absorb so much spiritual energy, and she took no notice of whether the heavenly tribulation inside the Law Breaker would burn her to a crisp.

Let the heavens and the earth cleave. Let all the gods perish. All living creatures could look after themselves. She didn’t give a damn!

Unfortunately, that miserable coward Lin Chi was curled up like a tortoise in its shell, hiding in the reincarnation wood forest.

Cheng Yu was tossed into the sky by the late-autumn red and watched helplessly as a Southern Shu cultivator was half-eaten by one of Shu's own spiritual beasts. His meridians burned with pain, and his essence was nearly exhausted.

Just then, he heard Lin Chi's voice from behind: "Move aside."

Cheng Yu moved aside without even thinking. Spiritual energy like a tidal wave brushed past him. The sword cultivator from Kunlun raised his head in astonishment and saw a figure in convict's clothes flash. Lin Chi formed a double-handed seal, and a talisman slipped from his fingers.

All the spiritual energy the reincarnation wood forest had absorbed from the ascended spirit battlefield surged through that talisman to blanket the late-autumn red.

The ground of Seventeen Li Town suddenly sank. The late-autumn red occupying the whole town had been forced underground by Lin Chi's talisman!

Cheng Yu was astonished—the Golden Hand was controlling this weird reincarnation wood forest!

Xuanyin Mountain's Golden Hand rarely appeared in public. His fame spanned eight centuries. As expected, he was unfathomable!

The “unfathomable” Golden Hand shook all over, and his face became even paler. The “Tai Sui” in the reincarnation wood roared toward his spirit: “A killing stroke! Master Lin! Wasn't that a suppression talisman? Why would you want to suppress her? So you could stick her in a pen and feed her until she gets big? Pardon me for being frank, but if she gets any bigger, she'll be twice your height!”

Lin Chi's meridians had nearly been snapped by the aftereffects of the talisman. He weakly said, “That's the only ascended spirit grade attack talisman I could remember...”

“How could Luo Qingshi have let you graduate from the Latent Cultivation Temple?!”

They'd have been better off using the unorthodox talismans he'd picked up from those evil cultivators!

“Who?” said Lin Chi.

Xi Ping: "..."

He'd forgotten Lin the Bashful's age. Luo the Giant hadn't even been thought of eight hundred years ago.

Just then, Xi Ping heard a snort. He was alarmed. The spiritual energy coursing through the forest suddenly stagnated.

The blanketing reincarnation wood forest was withering without warning, parasitic flame-red vines multiplying on the withered trees. Xi Ping had no body, but for a moment he still had the feeling that his marrow was being sucked out... When had the great evildoer buried late-autumn red seeds around the reincarnation wood?!

"Isn't it enough to be a true god in Tao County? You want to get out, too? What did Lin promise you?" The parasitic vines were constantly boring into the root systems of the reincarnation wood trees. Qiu Sha's sorrowful voice sounded in his ear: "What bottomless greed, Yuan Hui's successor. But...did you really think I took no precautions against you?"

Meanwhile, in a little town near the border in Yuzhou, the big clock tolled loudly, reporting the hour. Rolling steam rose from the top of the clock tower.

Bai Ling stood abruptly.

“Don’t be in a rush.” Zhou Ying didn’t so much as raise his head from looking at his pocket watch—the installations in this little place by the border had fallen out of repair. The town’s worn out clock ran fast when it had just been wound. It would only be the hour when it had struck five times.

In Seventeen Li Town, Wei Chengxiang had already reached the edge of the reincarnation wood forest, but for a moment she couldn’t take another step forward—the towering trees in the forest all had late-autumn red vines twined around them. If she flew over, she would be brought down by the vines.

Oh no. How was she going to get through?

“This damn place is about to disappear,” Qiu Sha thought. “Then all these great personages will leave the land blessed by the five sages forever and have to eke out a living under the rule of this supposed evil god.”

How fun. Anyway, Tao County was only so big and had only a little drop of spiritual energy, and yet it still seemed to be raising venomous insects. After some years, who would eat, and who would be eaten?

She felt the Riverward she carried in her clothes burn slightly, branding a place slightly to the left on her chest, as if her heart were also burning.

Just then, she hissed and sent her consciousness to Seventeen Li Town.

A thread of smoke rose. Then, she felt a sharp, stabbing pain—a Chu resident had lit the late-autumn red on fire!

Wait, how could a mortal light her vines on fire?

Why were the flames only burning her and not the reincarnation wood?

The despairing mortals quickly found that the vines wrapped around their sacred trees were afraid of fire. Ignoring the Luwu trying to stop them, they crowded around one after another.

“Burn it! Burn it!”

After staring blankly, Xi Ping began to laugh. “That’s because we’re inside the Law Breaker.”

Inside the Law Breaker, time and space could be turned upside down, substance could be turned into nothingness, ascended spirits and shed skins could become worthless, and the rage of mortals could set white spirits and blue jades alight.

As if to validate what he had said, a wind rose among the reincarnation wood forest, where hot and cold were unevenly distributed. Xi Ping promptly added a talisman, and the obedient wind raised the flames a zhang or more high, curling around the evil vines wrapped around the trees.

The clock in Great Wan's Yuzhou tolled for a third time: Dong—

Wei Chengxiang put a hand over the Law Breaker Bracelet she couldn't remove from her wrist. She couldn't sense the time, but as the master of the Law Breaker, she sensed that the Law Breaker's "point of realization" was approaching. The troublemaking bracelet was excited... She couldn't think too closely about this; how could a bracelet be "excited"?!

Wei Chengxiang paid no more attention to anything else. She threw herself in among the fire and the thick smoke. "Senior, there's no time!"

No sooner had she spoken than a reincarnation wood tree with flames running along it blocked her path. Wei Chengxiang handed herself over to him without hesitation. She ran toward the tree, speeding up.

An array appeared on the reincarnation wood tree, absorbing her entirely!

Xu Rucheng, following her, was dumbfounded. “You can do that?!”

Then, disregarding the facts of the matter, he also threw himself right in... not noticing when a branch beside him took his mustard seed off him.

The clock in Great Wan’s Yuzhou tolled for a fourth time: Dong—

Qiu Sha’s expression first chilled, then relaxed. Whatever. It was already time anyway.

A thread of thin smoke poured from her chest.

The thin smoke quickly sketched the outlines of a person—thin, with sloping shoulders and a long neck, with five or six faintly visible exquisite bracelets stacked on her wrists; she was dressed in the old traditional costume of Chu women... It had been eight hundred years. The clothes had fallen out of fashion long ago.

Qiu Sha looked up and stared at the smoke, unblinking.

Just then, something flew toward her, leaving a bloody trail in the air.

As soon as Xu Rucheng charged out of the transport array, he saw the brother who said his surname was Wei, without so much as blinking, simply chop his hand off at the wrist; then a reincarnation wood tree next to him used a talisman to toss the dismembered hand!

Xu Rucheng only had time to say the word “You” before the spurting blood, flying downwind, hit him in the face.

You must be crazy!

What kind of magical “defeating the enemy at your own expense” move was this?!

Wei Chengxiang’s dismembered hand was caught up by the talisman and hurtled straight toward Qiu Sha. Qiu Sha’s senses were all blocked by the fierce fire and dense smoke; she didn’t have time to react.

In that moment, Qiu Sha watched helplessly as the hand pierced through the thin smoke in the air.

“Qiu Sha only seems crazy. A person who is skilled in arrays can’t really be deranged. Thinking about it carefully, her arrangements are actually very thorough.” Earlier, when Wei Chengxiang had been hiding in the yard, Xi Ping had spoken to her and to Lin Chi, who had just dripped his blood on the reincarnation wood. “Don’t listen to how she brags. If she didn’t have a surefire guarantee, she wouldn’t be gambling with her life. It won’t be easy to kill her. Let’s do this—Peak Master Lin, you go over there first, tell them what the Law Breaker is, and let those orthodox...let those people who charged in here try joining forces against her. But remember not to mention the Riverward, or anything about the axiom being realized. There’s no need for them to know about those things. If they can’t kill the monster, we’ll think of a way to snatch the Riverward from Qiu Sha.”

Lin Chi, not afraid of humiliating himself, said candidly, “I don’t think that would work. In recent years, I’ve gone increasingly astray along the toolmaking way. My cultivation hasn’t progressed. If my fellow cultivators can’t defeat her, I’ll be even more useless. As for the Riverward, she takes different forms in the hands of different people. For Xiangjun, she was an eternal spring brocade flower. Now, I don’t know. I probably wouldn’t recognize her even if you put her right in front of me.”

Wei Chengxiang added, “We can try killing her, but it would be too hard to try taking something from her. Never mind us, shed skin elders wouldn’t necessarily be able to do it.”

Xi Ping then said to Lin Chi, “Peak Master Lin, immortal tools all have their own properties. When incompatible immortal tools are put together, they’ll impede each other, right? I remember that there are some immortal tools such that when you bring them out, all the items of the same grade in the vicinity will beat a retreat...”

Hearing this, Lin Chi frowned. “There are those who say that, but ‘impeding each other’ only means that they will be a little less effective than anticipated. It’s not as severe as you say. Making all the tools of the same grade beat a retreat... Such obnoxious immortal tools are quite rare.”

Xi Ping: “...”

So there had only been a few universally loathed open-eyed immortal tools in the Xuanyin Mountains back then, and he had picked out all of them.

“The immortal tools I’ve brought with me have no temper at all,” Lin Chi said with another sigh. “Alas, even if they did, they still wouldn’t deserve to be mentioned in the same breath as the Riverward.”

Xi Ping hadn’t been depending on him, anyway. Master Lin’s heart-protecting lotus hadn’t had any problem being on friendly terms with the hither seal and the spirit-winding silk, those two unprincipled tools. His things were as easily bullied as the man himself.

Xi Ping said, “What about the Law Breaker?”

Lin Chi and Wei Chengxiang simultaneously said, “The Law Breaker?”

Lin Chi said hesitantly, “Well...I don’t know about that, she...she never said that the Riverward and the Law Breaker were incompatible.”

“There’s something I don’t quite understand,” Xi Ping said. “Qiu Sha has been so thorough. Why would she put the master of the Law Breaker so far away? Wasn’t she afraid that she wouldn’t have attention to spare once the fighting started? This place is close to Tao County’s border. I don’t think she’s too poor to afford somewhere closer—also, Peak Master Lin, how did Hui Xiangjun die?”

Lin Chi’s expression altered abruptly, as if someone had slapped him in the face.

Xi Ping was afraid he would commit suicide on the spot and quickly added, “Wait, I wasn’t asking why she... What I meant was, the Law Breaker and the Riverward on top of each other completely defy the natural order. Qiu Sha can’t control the Law Breaker, but she can still use it to send off half the cultivation world. This...er, Senior Hui Xiangjun, she was the original master of the Law Breaker and the Riverward. Under pressure, she should have been able to send off all five spiritual mountain ranges. How could the sects capture her and put her to death?”

Lin Chi was silent for a long time, then at last caught his breath. Weakly, he asked, “You mean that it’s likely the Law Breaker and the Riverward are too powerful to coexist?”

Xi Ping said, “Have you ever seen the two of them in the same place?”

Lin Chi stared blankly.

Xi Ping said, “We’re best off taking a gamble and giving it a try.”

The clock in Great Wan’s Yuzhou tolled for a fifth time: Dong—

On Wei Chengxiang’s dismembered hand, a plain and unadorned bracelet appeared. It completely dispersed the thin smoke, which hadn’t yet fully taken on human shape.

The two tools were each only in too much of a hurry to avoid each other. The thin smoke flew away in desperation, instantly leaping to Wei Chengxiang’s side. Then it seemed to be startled by a whiff of the hateful aura of the Law Breaker’s master. It stopped abruptly in midair, avoided her, and threw itself at Xu Rucheng, standing nearby staring stupidly.

Xu Rucheng: “...”

What the hell? What just happened?

He instinctively reached out to grab and found that what he had caught was a tiny likeness of a person, with the apparent texture of colored glaze. But inside the transparent stone, thin smoke seemed to be billowing.

Seeing the likeness, Xu Rucheng trembled—the features were clearly identical to the great monster's!

But before Xu Rucheng could take a close look, he was picked up and tossed away by reincarnation wood vines. “Tai Sui”'s voice suddenly sounded in his ear: “This is the thing your lord wants. Take it and go!”

In Tao County, the Law Breaker Bracelet hit the ground. Outside Tao County, the tolling of the clock faded. The pocket watch in Zhou Ying's hand instantly jumped to you hour.

Before the raised corners of his mouth could form a smile, his expression froze. He raised his head and looked at the communication device Bai Ling had set aside.

Bai Ling had yet to figure out what was happening when he saw his lord, who rarely used spiritual energy, flicker in and out of sight and grab the immortal tool.

In that moment, a line of handwriting so familiar it was unbelievable flashed on the immortal tool. But it was only a shadow; it couldn't manifest entirely before it was erased.

A fierce wind surged up on the opposite bank of the Xia River, nearly loosening Zhou Ying's coiled hair.

The gunners on the bank were in an uproar. The fog that had lingered for twenty days abruptly dispersed. Tao County had reappeared in the human world!

What had that been just now? What had been written there?!

Blood nearly dripped from Zhou Ying's eyes.

Why would a letter from the Luwu in Tao County have his aura?

Wasn't he...

The hundreds upon thousands of lines of thought in Zhou Ying's head broke off simultaneously—he suspected he was going mad.

“My lord... Careful!”

Bai Ling grabbed Zhou Ying, who seemed to have lost his soul. All the inscriptions along Great Wan's border lit up brightly. The great array far off in the Xuanyin Mountains swept along Southern Wan's buried veins and blocked the better part of the assault from the opposite bank of the Xia River.

Out of nowhere, the waters of the Xia River rose to peaks dozens of zhang high, as if a huge dragon were crossing the river. The waves hit both banks and were blocked by the inscriptions of the national border.

In the midst of his many concerns, Bai Ling glanced at the immortal tool and saw on it the slightly frantic report of the Luwu from after the abnormality in Tao County had started. Though it was frantic, the characters were still neatly written, and it was as regular as a formal document, with everything in its place. At a glance, it was clear it had been written by the reliable Lao Tian.

What was the matter?

Bai Ling was astonished. There was nothing here that exceeded His Highness's expectations.

The next instant, the half-demon's spiritual sense was abruptly touched.

Bai Ling quickly raised his head and saw that a pair of moons had risen in the sky. One was a half-moon, and one was a full moon.

And on the full moon, a human figure had been branded.

“Has Sanyue...brought out the Silver Moon?”

Sanyue’s Silver Moon was just like Xuanyin’s Bell of Tribulation. Taking it out of the mountains would incur a heavenly tribulation. Without a shed skin forebear standing guard, it was certain that it couldn’t appear in the human world!

A shed skin had truly descended to earth!

Xi Ping had been ready. As he tossed Xu Rucheng away, without any hesitation, he dispersed what remained of the spiritual energy he had absorbed from the ascended spirit battlefield through the root systems into the earth.

Tao County—whose land was well known for its barrenness—flourished.

Even the weeds grew to over the height of a person. Not even Southern Shu’s ancient Miasma Forest had ever been so lush. The earth of farmland that had been abandoned for many years glistened; its texture had something of the appearance of green ore fields.

And the reincarnation wood trees mixed in among the vegetation were no longer towering!

No sooner had he dispersed the spiritual energy than the familiar oppressive sense of shackles came upon him again. Xi Ping knew at once that the Law Breaker's axiom had been realized. Tao County had returned to the human world!

His free and easy consciousness was once again restrained—but this time, apart from Xu Rucheng's knotted bag and the divine image in the underground secret room of the Immortal Palace, he also had the reincarnation wood amulets on A-Xiang and Lin Chi to go to.

In fact, Xi Ping felt that having gone through all this, his consciousness was considerably stronger than before, but he didn't try to resist at all. He obediently returned to confinement—his spiritual sense was shouting itself hoarse telling him to run. A great personage had come. Freedom wouldn't be a good thing now.

Indeed, no sooner had his consciousness been pulled back from the reincarnation wood trees than a beam of "moonlight" fell from the sky.

When this “moonlight” fell, all the cultivators who had managed to hold onto their lives closed their eyes under the gentle light.

As the “moonlight” flowed over them like water, the unusually flourishing plants withered, and the glistening green ore fields became even duller than before. The sweep of that moonlight nearly turned all of Tao County into a desert!

Finally, the “moonlight” came to the Snake King’s Immortal Palace. The menacing vines of the ubiquitous late-autumn red, as if they had been struck by frost, stiffened in midair. Bright and clear light fell on the nine-chi-tall woman.

All around was dimness. Only her form was fixed in the light. It made one think of the lights that followed the famous actors around the stages of the most resplendent performance halls in Jinping.

At this moment, the whole universe was her stage. This was her solo.

Her hand was still outstretched, her head raised, her eyes open wide, as if reaching for something wished for but unattainable. All around her was silence.

After a moment, a heavy sigh came from the skies. The woman's form, as though it were a mound of sand, scattered.

All of Tao County was deathly still. All that remained were the cries of the cicadas.

CHAPTER 83 - Indignant Cicadas (Final)

The waters of the Xia River were drawn by the moonlight like the tide, quietly rising, then falling like a sigh.

The fish underwater were suspended blankly in place. The substitute papermen planted ahead of time by the half-demon floated out of the fishes' mouth. Before they could float up to the surface, they had disappeared one by one.

Not only Tao County, but everything within a hundred li radius of Tao County was swept by the "moonlight." The papermen that had quietly infiltrated Chu riding on the bodies of mortals were also destroyed one after another.

On the opposite shore, Bai Ling seemed to be burning. If the national border hadn't stood in the way, this filthy half-demon might have been carried off by a moonbeam from the Silver Moon.

He bore the burning pain without making a sound, grabbing Zhou Ying around the waist and holding him back. "My lord, if it had only been a shed skin who had come, we could still have a chance. But the Silver Moon is the Way of Heaven. Sanyue has brought down a heavenly tribulation—" everything that is outside the Way will be killed! No matter what thing you want to get, there will be ample time for it later. My lord!”

What thing could he still want...

Zhou Ying whipped his head around. “He’s in Tao County.”

Bai Ling stared blankly. “Who? Who’s in Tao County?”

“Shiyong...Shiyong... Let go of me!”

“Huh? But...” In a moment of desperation, Bai Ling’s pupils turned white. The substitute paperman stuck to Zhou Ying to ward off disaster expanded. Taking advantage of Zhou Ying’s shaken mental state, it quickly plastered itself to his chest.

Zhou Ying was frozen in place, as if cold water had been poured into his bones.

“I deserve to die a thousand deaths.” Bai Ling pulled him back and quickly said, “If the Viscount were still living, how could he fail to return to the Marquis Manor for five years? And how could you fail to sense him? Even if his remain...remaining possessions of some kind are out there, they still wouldn’t be in a backwater like Tao County. What association can this place have with him? Never mind Chu's border, he probably wouldn't know where Great Wan's Yuzhou was!"

Zhou Ying turned a deaf ear on this. He stared unwaveringly at the opposite bank.

He couldn't move, couldn't reach him. In that moment, he seemed to return to the bottom of the Impassable Sea—a plaything in the hands of fate, his heart full of rage enough to smash mountains, but utterly powerless.

Utterly powerless.

Bai Ling instantly understood the profound murderous rage in his eyes. He shut his mouth and knelt wordlessly.

And the desolate "moonlight" swept by.

Sanyue's Silver Moon was a great divine tool of the same grade as Xuanyin's Bell of Tribulation; they were both embodiments of the immortal mountains.

Xi Ping had had the "good fortune" to see the Bell of Tribulation twice, but he hadn't had a close look at it either time: the first time, he had overplayed his hand and only avoided being crushed to dust thanks to Princess Duanrui; the second time, he had been unconscious, and when he had opened his eyes, only aftershocks had remained of the Bell of Tribulation, and the demon that dozens of generations of the Zhou clan had raised had already been pounded into the earth by the big bell.

Only now, after hastily drawing his consciousness out of the reincarnation wood, when he brushed shoulders with the “moonlight,” did Xi Ping at last understand why, for a hundred generations, from antiquity to the present, no desperate criminal had ever dared to openly challenge the Way of Heaven.

Why the Zhou clan had produced generation after generation of geniuses and lunatics but had only been able to come up with the lousy, unbecoming idea of raising demons at the bottom of the sea.

The Way of Heaven was unassailable, uncounterable, unfathomable, like a thunderstorm falling upon the earth, irreversible.

It was both omnipresent and unknown.

Those who lived within it were used to all this and thought that the sun, moon, and stars were all a matter of course; in their frivolity, they did not know to revere it. But it turned out that when a true heavenly tribulation fell, even the proudest and most unruly souls could find not the least thought of resistance.

After Qiu Sha had been wiped away by the moonlight like a shadow, everyone present was dazed. It was as if the last twenty frightening days in Tao County had been a dream.

The ascended spirits retained their wits. The established foundations' eyes blurred. And nearly all the half-immortals' expressions went blank.

The mortals who had burned the evil vines closed their eyes as night fell.

The Law Breaker had been an absurd dream. In the dream, they had grasped their own destinies, been wildly joyful for a span. When they woke, they would have forgotten it all and would once again be as docile as oxen and sheep.

The only exception was Xu Rucheng. The human likeness he had just grasped turned into a thread of smoke and seeped into his palm. It was as if an icicle had been jabbed into his palm. As soon as the "moonlight" swept past, he awoke and looked uncomprehendingly at the blank faces of his companions. As he was about to stand up and call to them, Tai Sui's low bellow sounded in his ear: "Don't move!"

At the same time, a piece of gauze fell over Wei Chengxiang.

Lin Chi's voice came through the reincarnation wood to her eardrums:
“Hide yourself, don't look, don't be curious!”

Wei Chengxiang gave a start. Her wits and memories were abruptly restored. Only then did her wound began to ache unbearably.

But “evil cultivators” who lived every day with their heads hanging from their belts all had a sense of proportion. Wei Chengxiang held back and didn't cry out. She huddled under the “gauze” Master Lin had given her, not moving a muscle.

The extra full moon in the sky seemed to be getting eclipsed. It faded bit by bit, turning bronze. It still hung in the sky above Tao County.

Finally, a ray of moonlight fell like smoke and dust, then turned into a human form.

Next, rustling footsteps stepped over the ground covered in withered grass. This person slowly walked out of the forest, reaching out to touch each one of the dead reincarnation wood trees as though searching for something.

This person was tall of stature, with a build that suggested a man. There seemed to be no color anywhere on him. His head of unadulterated white hair hung loose over his back. There was no distinction between the deathly white of his robes and the hands that extended from his sleeves. On his face was a mask with the texture of paper.

This mask was very peculiar. There were no holes for breathing or looking out in it. It was plastered firmly to this person's face, as if he were a living ghost who had died from waterboarding. Features had been drawn on the paper mask with an exaggerated technique, and the drawn on features could actually move. They showed now displeasure, now happiness; the expression was constantly changing.

“He's looking for me.” Xi Ping was terrified. He instantly had a kind of instinctive impulse to withdraw all his consciousness to the divine image in the Immortal Palace's underground secret room, to hide rather than face this frightening shed skin cultivator.

But his consciousness had “died” too many times attached to the bodies of mortals. Then, he had been unable to escape; he could only stay where he was and wait to endure it. The desire to flee and the action had been separated in him. The habit had become natural. Xi Ping simply didn't remember than he could move his consciousness now.

A Sanyue cultivator with only half a breath left called in a trembling voice:
“Xuanwu-shishu...”

When the ascended spirits heard this name, they collectively sucked in a breath, their expressions not flickering—this was Elder Xuanwu⁶¹ of Dongheng’s Sanyue, the shidi of Sanyue’s sect leader.

Elder Xuanwu coming with the Silver Moon practically amounted to the spiritual mountains personally strolling over from Dongheng. Tao County’s landforms and climate were going to change drastically. Many people would be impacted by it in the coming year.

And this muster of force had come for the sake of a “two-year-old” ascended spirit!

Elder Xuanwu waved a hand. Faintly discernible spiritual energy swirled out of his sleeves, which floated as though in the wind. The ascended spirits felt their chests ease. Their essences, which had nearly been pushed to the point of drying up, began to flow once more.

Only then did Xuanwu say flatly: “You have all come to Chu to aid me in expelling evil. Sanyue has treated its guests inconsiderately. I hope you will forgive us.”

After his single speech, the ascended spirits apart from those of Sanyue could no longer raise their heads.

It was an absolute taboo for foreign ascended spirits to scout within another country's borders, never mind coming in person and being caught red-handed by a shed skin elder of Sanyue.

At its gravest, a matter like this could set off a war among the four nations.

Elder Xuanwu probably didn't want to provoke chaos under the heavens, so he had set the tone as soon as he opened his mouth, saying that they had come to "help expel evil." While this was said for the purpose of smoothing things over, it sounded extremely grating at the moment—had Sanyue not brought out its great divine tool, it was unclear who would have been expelling whom.

"We shall not speak of it." The expression on Elder Xuanwu's mask landed on an angry look. He said coldly, "There is still some foreign matter here."

Xi Ping, the foreign matter in question: "..."

While the ascended spirits didn't know where the reincarnation wood trees had come from earlier, they had all seen Lin Chi using the spiritual energy the trees had absorbed to send out a talisman, so their gazes collectively fell on Lin Chi.

Elder Xuanwu's figure flashed. Almost at the same time as those obvious or concealed gazes, he landed in front of Lin Chi.

A protective tool immediately flashed over Lin Chi, faintly revealing the aura of the Dignitary of Rule High Elder behind him.

The two great shed skin elders met across the distance. Elder Xuanwu paused slightly, stopped some paces away from Lin Chi, then withdrew his hands, which were like a dead man's.

The features on the paper mask fluctuated for a moment. The look of anger changed to a slightly peculiar smile. Xuanwu nodded slowly. "You honor us with your presence, Golden Hand. We are fortunate."

Lin Chi gave the salute appropriate from a junior. "Elder Xuanwu."

"There is no need for such formality, Master Lin," said Elder Xuanwu.

"You seem to know what the foreign matter is. Will you instruct me?"

Xi Ping calculated wildly: the three Xuanyin elders who had used the demon seal to seal him were shed skins, and Sanyue's "unsightly" elder was also a shed skin. A demon seal set down by the three elders wouldn't necessarily be able to stand up to someone of the same grade. Furthermore, Xu-da-bao was a half-immortal who had just opened his spiritual eyes. The disparity between a half-immortal and an ascended spirit... It was probably equivalent to the disparity between a hundred or so people and an ant—Xu Rucheng couldn't speak of his existence, but that wasn't necessarily the case for Lin Chi.

What should he do?

Xi Ping simply went numb. He had just finished dealing with the great evildoer and that pair of unnatural tools. Before he could catch his breath, a shed skin elder had come. He wondered whether he had burned and pillaged a city in his past life; if he didn't have eight lifetimes worth of wickedness to make up for, why would the Way of Heaven be so determined to come after him and wipe him out?

In a moment of desperation, Xi Ping finally remembered that his consciousness was comparatively more at liberty now. He instantly wanted to flee back to the Immortal Palace, but just then, Lin Chi's fanlike eyelashes drooped, and he took something out and offered it to Elder Xuanwu. "Is this what you mean?"

Xi Ping: "..."

Huh? What?

What Lin Chi had taken out was a brush. The shaft of the brush was made of a wood Xi Ping had never seen before. It was smooth as stone, lustrous as jasper. It must have been stroked many times; some places were so bright they reflected light.

Elder Xuanwu reached out a hand. The brush landed in his palm. An astonished expression appeared on the features of his mask. He said, “Eternal spring brocade wood? This is an ancient thing.”

Elder Xuanwu tapped lightly on the tip of the brush. A thread of spiritual energy swept out of the tip, and a dead reincarnation wood tree next to them came back to life, gently waving along with the tip of the brush as if it had developed a spirit. Spiritual energy curled through the wildly shaking branches.

Xi Ping was startled. For a moment, he had the feeling that his consciousness was still in the tree.

What kind of immortal tool was this? Even Sanyue’s white-haired old monster was marveling at it... Also, why would Lin Chi shield him?

“Most ingenious,” said Elder Xuanwu with an admiring sigh. Meaningfully, he said, “Using eternal spring brocade to defeat late-autumn red. As expected, the Golden Hand is a rare genius, even capable of thinking of this. But I wonder whether this item can bring out the legendary Law Breaker and Riverward?”

Before Lin Chi could say anything, Elder Xuanwu’s ice cold spiritual energy flowed out through the tip of the brush, and the evidently already withered broken twigs of late-autumn red, like corpses “awakened” by that pen, stiffly churned in layer upon layer like ripples.

But while those dead evil vines plowed all of Seventeen Li Town, there was no trace of the two great divine tools that could defy space and time.

Only then did Lin Chi look down and say, more dead than alive, “This item was created by me. It is unworthy of being mentioned on equal terms with the Law Breaker.”

Xuanwu clicked his tongue rather regretfully. “While this is a good thing, eternal spring brocade is inauspicious. With it here, the Silver Moon will not be tranquil. This thing should not remain in the mortal world. I suppose you have no objection, Master Lin?”

Lin Chi didn’t respond. His fists, hidden in his sleeves, clenched.

Xuanwu had only been being polite. He didn't really care whether he objected. The mouth drawn on the mask turned up at the corners, and the brush was destroyed.

Lin Chi didn't move a muscle. Another part of his already scant soul seemed to disperse.

“Two great demonic tools have appeared and disappeared. This may be this world's fate, or it may be a tribulation—the Qilin Guard have been lax in their work. The good and the bad have mixed in Tao County. We have embarrassed ourselves in front of you all. Today's drama has concluded, and Seventeen Li Town had been turned into ruins. I suppose there's nothing left to buy? The Silver Moon cannot remain in the human world for long. I won't see you off.” Having said this in a loud voice, Xuanwu turned into a ball of light and disappeared where he was.

He was connected to the Silver Moon in the sky. It was as if that full moon had been spat back out by the eclipse; without warning, “moonlight” surged in all directions, for a moment so bright that no one could open their eyes.

For a moment, nearly everyone's outlines were pressed into sketches made by the sweep of that fierce light.

Xi Ping tensed. Enduring the might of the shed skin elder, he split off his consciousness to Wei Chengxiang and Xu Rucheng. He saw that for some reason Xu Rucheng was very safe. Mixed in among the crowd of mortals, he was easily passed over by the snow bright moonlight. Presumably it was the work of the Riverward. But the fierce light seemed about to pierce the gauze covering A-Xiang. Wei Chengxiang didn't move a muscle. Her pupils contracted sharply.

It seemed that the gauze was about to be eroded by the light. It began to dissipate from above, becoming thinner and thinner... Just as the light was about to pierce through the gauze, Xuanwu must have noticed that this was only an open-eyed ant, and she was protected by Lin Chi. He lost interest in following up and let her go.

Before Xi Ping could breathe a sigh of relief, he saw a familiar object fly out from under the ground—it was the Tai Sui divine image hidden underground in the Immortal Palace!

Elder Xuanwu's voice came through the moonlight: "An evil god worshipped by the ignorant masses of the borderlands."

Xi Ping went cold all over. The divine image broke into bits in the moonlight. Before he could feel frightened, the Silver Moon and Elder Xuanwu had vanished together, leaving Tao County devastated by the full moon.

After a high elder of Sanyue had personally shown them the door, no one dared to object. Everyone collected the bodies of their disciples and companions as quickly as possible and all returned dejectedly to their respective homes, leaving Dongheng's Sanyue's people to clean up the aftermath.

That night, Xu Rucheng mixed in with the evil cultivators who had survived the calamity of Seventeen Li Town's Great Market and were leaving Tao County in a panic. When he wormed his way into the port, a paperman silently plastered itself to him. Xu Rucheng's figure flashed. A moment later, the paperman substitute took his place in undergoing an interrogation, while Xu Rucheng himself had already silently passed through the half-demon's paperman, crossed the Chu-Wan border, and returned to Great Wan's Yuzhou.

Then he and the knotted bag he carried both saw the person reputed to be behind the Kaiming Department and the Luwu.

CHAPTER 84 - Traveler Abroad (1)

They had been ferried by the Riverward from the bank of the Wangchuan River, so upon seeing that familiar figure, like something from another lifetime, both Xu Rucheng and Xi Ping were almost simultaneously dazed.

“Mr. Bai!”

“Bai Ling-da-ge...”

Even though Xi Ping had already known that the “Mr. Bai” behind the Luwu was Bai Ling from Prince Zhuang Manor, the moment he saw him in person, he couldn’t avoid feeling a surge of emotions.

Unfortunately, he couldn’t speak, couldn’t say hello.

Once over the Wan-Chu border, Xi Ping had felt the invisible shackles on him tighten further. In Chu, it had only been that others couldn’t hear it when he spoke to Xu Rucheng, but here, so long as a third party was present, Xu-da-bao’s voice speaking to him would disappear, and the words he said wouldn’t reach Xu Rucheng’s ears.

Reincarnation wood also couldn’t act as a medium—however deep a karmic connection there was, only an item he had used to bear his consciousness could establish a connection. And as soon as Tao County had returned to the human world, Xi Ping had lost his freedom to move through reincarnation wood. There were only a few places his consciousness could reside.

Before, when Xi Ping had been misleading the idiot for fun, he had deliberately not told Xu Rucheng that his consciousness was on the knotted bag he carried. Now, however, he found that he actually couldn't say it even if he wanted to. Never mind directly telling Xu Rucheng, even if he wanted to obliquely hint to Xu Rucheng that there was something the matter with the knotted bag, or have Xu Rucheng take someone else's blood and try it on the bag, Xu Rucheng "couldn't hear" anything related to it.

The demon seal had his mouth tightly sealed indeed. It hadn't left him any room to maneuver.

Xi Ping scrutinized Bai Ling. Bai Ling-da-ge was no longer the paper secret guard who couldn't show himself in public. His aura had become far more restrained. At a glance, there was hardly any difference between him and a mortal. But Xi Ping could see at once that he had already established a foundation...that was good.

But for some reason, there was a crease between Bai Ling's brows now. He looked a little unsettled.

Xu Rucheng stepped forward to kneel, but before his knees could bend, Bai Ling held him up. “You’ve worked hard, brother.”

Xu Rucheng nearly burst into tears, but thinking that he still had something important to say, he forced himself to hold back. After a simple greeting, he said, “The reason I was so bold as to ask you to ferry me back across the border is that I wanted...”

But before he could finish, he saw Bai Ling, who had been listening patiently to him, suddenly look alarmed. He abruptly stood up.

Xi Ping thought, Huh? How come after five years, Bai Ling-da-ge was less steady than he had been as a secret guard?

“There’s...there’s no rush.” Bai Ling glanced fretfully toward the courtyard and forced himself to say to Xu Rucheng, “There’s chaos in Tao County. From observing the atmospheric conditions there, Dongheng’s Sanyue has left at least four or five ascended spirits to patrol, so for the next few days, don’t be in a hurry to return. It’s already past zi hour tonight. I’ll have someone prepare a place for you to rest. We can talk tomorrow.”

At you hour on the seventh, by the river, for some reason unknown to Bai Ling, his prince had seemed to go mad, firmly convinced that the Viscount was in Tao County. He had wanted to fly his sword across the border on the spot, right in the face of the Silver Moon. No one knew what those with a paramount spiritual sense could see; no one could know whether they had seized on a true sign or only their own deranged obsession. In sum, Bai Ling couldn't stand by and watch him go to his death, so, taking advantage of the fact that Zhou Ying wasn't on his guard against him, he had used a paperman to seal his heart meridian, temporarily restraining him.

But when the Silver Moon had swept over Tao County, Zhou Ying, with no thought for his heart meridian, had tried to shatter the paperman sealing him by force. Bai Ling had been scared out of his wits. All he could do was knock him unconscious.

And just now, he had felt His Highness dispel his paperman!

Within Great Wan's borders, Xi Ping's consciousness was limited. He couldn't probe outward. He thought there was something strange—with such a big commotion taking place in Tao County, reasonably speaking, Bai Ling ought to have been only too anxious to question Xu Rucheng about what had happened, and it wasn't as though cultivators absolutely needed to sleep... What could be more important than the great divine tool of Dongheng's Sanyue?

Xu Rucheng was also at a complete loss. "I see, but..."

But before Xu Rucheng could finish, Bai Ling's expression abruptly changed.

His Highness had just destroyed all the protective papermen on him!

This meant he didn't want him to follow. Where was His Highness going? Across the river? But he was a prince of the first rank of Great Wan...and Sanyue's ascended spirits had yet to leave!

Looking at his expression, Xi Ping suddenly realized something.

No, it couldn't be...

He shouted at Xu Rucheng: "Stop him! Hurry!"

Xu Rucheng didn't hear—with someone else present, the two of them couldn't communicate.

Xi Ping: "..."

Death by a thousand swords to Xuanyin Mountain!

Bai Ling had no more attention to spare for Xu Rucheng. He only had time for a brief word before flying off in pursuit.

If he didn't hurry, he would be too late.

Once an open-eyed cultivator's spiritual bones were complete, they would be in the consummate open-eyed stage and obtain a vital weapon and a magic power. But perhaps because his innate spiritual bones had steeped among the demon host, or for some other reason, Zhou Ying was very special. He seemed not to have a vital weapon, and the magic power of his spiritual bones was also unusual: he could vanish into thin air anywhere, easily obscuring others' senses. Cultivators of the same grade, established foundations...even some ascended spirits whose spiritual senses weren't especially sharp were susceptible to being fooled by him.

If Xi Ping had had a heart right now, it probably would have leapt out of his throat—who in the world could make Bai Ling lose his head like this? Well, who else could there be?

But...but it was already the eighth. How could san-ge still be here?

How would he have time to return to Jinping by the tenth?

Great Wan didn't have a custom of juniors coming travel-stained to the door. That was for hurrying home for a funeral. He would at any rate need to leave a day or two to bathe and rest... Could it be that he wasn't planning to go back?

Xi Ping went cold all over: how many more full decade birthdays could the old lady have left to her? Was she already so senile that she wouldn't be hurt, or...

He unconsciously cried out, "Bai Ling!"

Wait, tell me...

"Hm?" As soon as Bai Ling left, the prohibition on speech lifted, and Xu Rucheng "heard" his cry. "Senior, do you know Mr. Bai?"

Before, it had seemed that he had never even heard of the Kaiming Cultivators and didn't know who His Highness Prince Zhuang was.

"Of course I do. I'm about to lose my temper with you. Hurry and chase after..."

Halfway through, Xi Ping's words were cut off.

Xu Rucheng went blank, then suddenly realized: there was someone nearby!

And with his half-immortal's spiritual sense and hearing, he hadn't noticed anything.

Xu Rucheng abruptly stood up and looked all around. "Who's there?"

"Oh?" A voice came from behind him. "And who are you? How did you know I was passing by?"

Xu Rucheng was taken by surprise. He jumped.

But for Xi Ping, it was as if he had been struck by lightning.

His agitated heart stopped with a crash. As Xu Rucheng turned, he met a pair of strange yet familiar eyes.

For a half-immortal, five years were as light as a breeze. Zhou Ying's appearance hadn't changed one bit. He seemed merely to be striking up a casual conversation in passing, his expression relaxed and cheerful, but the look in his eyes was extremely unfamiliar. When his glance turned on them, he recalled to Xi Ping the heart demon at the bottom of the Impassable Sea, saying "How could I be qualified to be a demon if I wasn't joyful?"

Xi Ping was stunned.

What had happened? With his spiritual bones restored, shouldn't he be all better? Why was there less living energy about him than when he had been a sickly mortal?

“San-ge,” he called out from the knotted bag where his consciousness was trapped, “what...”

Then he noticed how far his voice travelled, making no echoes.

In all the vast universe, no one could hear him.

San-ge was close enough to touch, but he was only using that cold, fed up, lofty look to examine Xu Rucheng...to examine him.

Xi Ping, at a loss, shut his mouth.

At Xu Rucheng's rank, he wouldn't have seen Prince Zhuang before. All he saw was that the young man who had landed in front of him was dressed as a scholar, smiling brilliantly and looking very amiable. But for some reason, Xu Rucheng instinctively feared him. He kept thinking that if he said a word out of place, his life would be in danger.

“I...” Xu Rucheng opened his mouth, but the words he was about to say automatically became voiceless.

Damn it. He couldn't say it.

Zhou Ying clearly looked pleasant and kindly, but Xu Rucheng felt like a fledgling caught in a cobra's gaze. Cold sweat poured off him. Just then, a white figure flashed by. A paperman landed in a flurry and separated the two of them. “My lord!”

Xu Rucheng: “...”

Who? My lord?

His Highness Prince Zhuang?!

Oh, mother! Xu Rucheng's legs went weak.

Bai Ling quickly said, “This is the Luwu Xiao Xu who wrote the date on his letter before. I called him back to report on matters in Wild Fox Country. Please listen, my lord...”

“Oh, one of your people. Then there’s no need for this.” Zhou Ying restrained his smile that hid a knife and waved a hand expressionlessly. Paying no further attention to Xu Rucheng, he said dully, “I’ll go myself. I ought to be the one to collect the corpse of the one I killed.”

The wheels of Xi Ping’s consciousness, which seemed to have rusted, at last began to revolve a hundred years late: who was he talking about?

His mind roared: Wait....wait a moment, this couldn’t be because of that letter?

In Wild Fox Country, when Xi Ping had sent A-Xiang out at the end, exhausting all the “human resources” he could figure into his plans, all that had remained was to obey the will of heaven. He had picked up Xu Rucheng’s communication device and scribbled a sentence. This way, if Tao County didn’t return, he would perhaps have a chance to leave a few words for Bai Ling, to warn him that the Riverward had been used up and that he should beware of Qiu Sha.

With Bai Ling’s sense of propriety, even if he had realized that the letter came from Xi Ping, even if he knew...he still ought to have handled it appropriately.

Had that letter really ended up in san-ge’s hands?

But afterward, Tao County had returned... Once the Law Breaker was broken, shouldn't that letter have been erased?

What did he know? What misunderstanding was he laboring under?

But, no... Were those three old geezers from Xuanyin Mountain completely useless? They couldn't even handle this trifle properly—they'd left it so that even an open-eyed cultivator could catch a trace!

Before Xi Ping could sort out his many disordered thoughts, he saw Bai Ling go to one knee and say in a low voice, almost imploring, "I have been disrespectful to my superior. A thousand deaths will not atone for my crime. I request your punishment, my lord. Even if you want to go to Tao County in person, at least wait half a month..."

Xu Rucheng was bewildered. Hearing this, he began to quake with terror: Mr. Bai had committed a crime?

Every cultivator who had started out in the Kaiming Department was grateful to Prince Zhuang. While out and about, they usually claimed to be His Highness Prince Zhuang's loyal followers. But if you wanted them to say they weren't afraid of him, that would be impossible—the deepest impression Prince Zhuang had always given them was that he would be especially quick to kill.

This wouldn't do. He had a debt of gratitude to Mr. Bai.

Having thought this far, Xu Rucheng clenched his fist. A small transparent stone like colored glaze jumped out of his palm. There was thin smoke billowing inside the stone; its form seemed to be constantly changing.

“My lord,” Xu Rucheng said, taking a deep breath and gathering his courage, “Mr. Bai brought me back so I could present the item you wanted.”

In his youth, he had been accustomed to shouting across villages and fields. When he opened his mouth, his voice came out as a bellow. Bai Ling shuddered at the sound.

Zhou Ying raised his eyelids indifferently and glanced at him, but his gaze froze on that stone.

The next moment, he floated over like a ghost and reached out to take the Riverward stone. He saw something in the smoke inside the stone. Zhou Ying's pupils contracted sharply.

Bai Ling said, “Xiao Xu, what...what is that?”

“Oh, I was told it’s called the ‘Riverward.’” In fact, Xu Rucheng had no idea what the Riverward was. He responded ignorantly and fearlessly. “It’s the thing Qiu Sha mentioned in her letter to my lord.”

Bai Ling: “...”

Brother, is your head broken, or are my ears broken?

A shed skin elder from Sanyue descended to the mortal world, bringing with him the Silver Moon; a dozen ascended spirits from the four great sects were present—and the Riverward, held by the foremost evildoer under heaven, was carried off without anyone knowing by a mere half-immortal like you? Who are you? The Way of Heaven’s sugar daddy?

Then he heard Zhou Ying ask with some urgency, “Who said that? Who told you this was the Riverward?”

Xu Rucheng opened his mouth, but it was as if his tongue had stuck. After a moment, he let out a breath. “My lord, I cannot say.”

Bai Ling felt suffocated. “You...”

“Cannot say, cannot say...” Zhou Ying quietly repeated these words a few times, the tips of his brows moving. A fearsome light appeared in his pitch-black eyes. “The person who told you to bring this back, did he tell you what to do when you could not say?”

Xu Rucheng responded, “Say whatever I can say and let Mr. Bai figure out the rest.”

Hearing this familiar diction, Bai Ling swiftly turned his head, realizing something. He saw the corners of Zhou Ying’s mouth tremble uncontrollably.

In that moment, he was no longer joyful, no longer qualified to be a demon.

Watching Xu Rucheng, Zhou Ying asked softly, as if afraid of startling something, “Are you still in contact with him? Is he well?”

Xu Rucheng opened his mouth, then closed it helplessly.

Xi Ping’s consciousness was in the knotted bag, quietly looking back.

Zhou Ying squeezed the Riverward in the palm of his hand. He was silent for a moment, then said hoarsely, “I understand. When you have the chance, tell him that everyone at home is doing well and there's no need to worry."

"Then why haven't you gone back?" said Xi Ping.

Zhou Ying couldn't hear him. He only said almost inaudibly, "I'll get him out soon."

Xi Ping suddenly realized what he wanted the Riverward for. Before he could recover, Zhou Ying had disappeared right before his eyes like the wind.

Wait, san-ge! It's been five years, I'm already used to it, a few more days won't hurt, but Grandmother can't wait for you any longer!

Go and see her first. I haven't written for five years, and if you don't come home either, the old lady will know. She isn't that senile... I'm begging you, ge!

But his words couldn't stop anyone.

Autumn came early to Jinping. At the start of the seventh month, there were already chill breezes morning and night.

The old lady of the Yongning Marquis Manor was celebrating her eightieth birthday. On account of Prince Zhuang, who was the master of the Kaiming Cultivators, and the Viscount, who was reputed to have become a disciple of Flying Jade Peak, the Marquis Manor was as bustling as a marketplace, the commotion going on until the sun sank into the west.

The married ladies and young mistresses who had joined the old lady in listening to opera had all gone. The singers had sighed, the tune had ended, and the audience had dispersed; the fan in the old lady's hand fell to the ground. She had just woken up in a muddle.

She was too old. When she was listening to opera, she would fall asleep several times. Madam Cui, seeing the old lady open her eyes, quickly stepped forward and said, "Mother, why don't you go back to your room to rest?"

The old lady shook her head. "Tell them to sing it again. I'm not sleepy. Let me see, what should I order..."

"Mother..." said Madam Cui.

"It's not dark yet. It's still early." The old lady's eyes were dim-sighted from age and took the light of the gas lamps for daylight. Chattering on, she instructed, "Bao'er and Ying haven't come home yet... Ying's... His Highness's appetite is poor. Heat up the thickened rice soup. Xiaobao...

Ha, there's no need to worry about him, he'll eat anything..."

The opera singers in the rear court of the Marquis Manor sang through the night, until the gas lamps of Dangui Lane dimmed.

At the bottom of the Impassable Sea, beneath the demon seal, in the place no one could reach, the Wangchuan cut a small rift.

Zhou Ying at last came in person to the place where he had been imprisoned for over twenty years. For a time, the familiar pain seemed to surge up from the cracks in his bones once more.

As far as the eye could see lay a forest of reincarnation wood. As if they knew who the newcomer was, the trees sympathetically cleared a path.

Zhou Ying saw at a glance what was in the depths of the thicket. It was as if his feet had been glued to the ground.

CHAPTER 85 - Traveler Abroad (2)

That day, before Xi Ping's boiling brains had chilled in the breeze, Zhou Ying had simply vanished before his eyes—just like that. His spiritual sense couldn't catch up to him at all.

Xi Ping had just had it with everyone from Prince Zhuang Manor. If they weren't turning into the wind, they were turning into paper; why did every last one of them belong to this furtive, creeping type?

Putting a gate on that manor was just for decoration!

In that ignored knotted bag, Xi Ping frantically went around in circles. Had he not been restricted by the demon seal, he probably would have twisted Miss A-Hua's unfinished knotted bag into a round brocade knot.⁶² on one hand, he was worried about the old lady; on the other hand, it was clear that san-ge wanted to go to the Impassable Sea to steal his body.

Wasn't that total nonsense?! The Riverward could open the door to ferry a person, but it wasn't designed to haul goods...bah, to haul people, that was.

The demon seal at the bottom of the Impassable Sea was so big, and in total it was suppressing only two things: one demon seed and one him. If san-ge reached out and took one... Xi Ping even suspected he might want to take both.

Was it possible for the three great Buddhas at Xuanyin Mountain not to notice?

As a half-immortal, was he really planning to simply commit treason and be pursued by the Bell of Tribulation to the ends of the earth?

The whole Zhou family was like this. Normally they were happy and well-fed on whatever they ate, not even taking an extra mouthful of soup, regular as clockwork, comprehensive and reliable in everything they did—and then they would lose their minds just like that, without a single omen preceding the explosion.

Xi Ping's scalp went numb. Zhou Ying vanishing into thin air had looked very much like Qiu Sha being erased by the Silver Moon. In exasperated frustration, he abandoned Xu Rucheng and went chasing after the reincarnation wood amulet holding his consciousness that Lin Chi was carrying—he had to go to the Xuanyin Mountains.

He had no Riverward. He couldn't go down into the Impassable Sea. He couldn't even speak freely. All he could do was think of some way to observe Xuanyin Mountain's reaction and conjecture based on that what san-ge had done.

He hoped Peak Master Lin hadn't thrown the reincarnation wood away.

Lin Chi may have forgotten; he hadn't thrown that piece of wood away. He was sitting on the "wounded" blue luan immortal tool, using a leaf to whistle an unknown tune. But when Xi Ping's consciousness had just landed in the reincarnation wood in his sleeve, the tune suddenly stopped.

Without warning, Lin Chi said, "This is already less than a hundred li from the Xuanyin Spiritual Mountains. You're very bold."

Xi Ping had meant to secretly sneak in with him. He hadn't thought that the most worthless of ascended spirits was still an ascended spirit. As soon as his consciousness arrived, without him saying a word, he had been perceived by Lin Chi's spiritual sense. All he could do was brace himself and say something. "Peak Master Lin, thank you for what you did in Wild Fox Country."

"No need," said Lin Chi. "If not for you, we would have vanished from the human world along with Tao County. We're even."

Xi Ping thought that this accounting was truly simple, so he babbled, “Aren’t you afraid that you’ve saved an evil cultivator like Qiu Sha, and in the future I’ll carve some other place out of the map?”

Lin Chi was silent for a moment. “The Dignitary of Fate’s lineage is prudent in action. While I’m not very well acquainted with General Zhi, I’ve heard that he’s a pretty good person. In two hundred years, he’s taken only one direct disciple. I don’t think he could have made a mistake.”

His words nearly sent Xi Ping out of the reincarnation wood.

A-Xiang didn’t know Xi Ping’s real name, and Xu Rucheng was even more clueless, not even knowing where his consciousness was hidden...how come when it came to Lin Chi, he even knew his lineage?!

Was Lin really naïve, or was he pretending to be naïve?

Xi Ping’s wariness rose at once.

But Lin Chi continued, “I remembered afterward where I’d seen your handwriting before.”

Xi Ping said, “...oh?”

Lin Chi said, “In the twenty-eighth year of Taiming...or was it the twenty-ninth year? I’m too old. I can’t remember clearly—on New Year’s Eve that year, you were the one who set off the fireworks on Flying Jade Peak, right?”

Xi Ping stared blankly for a moment. For him, New Year’s Eve of the twenty-ninth year of Taiming was truly “another lifetime.” With some difficulty, he spent ages recollecting before he remembered. Back then, when he had been an ignorant young master from Jinping going to the south for the first time, he had felt helpless seeing the extreme misery of the Turmoilers and had suddenly thought that shifu on his snow-capped mountain was very lonely, so he had dispatched a karma beast to deliver some small fireworks to the mountain as New Year’s greetings for shifu and to relieve his boredom.

How had Lin Chi happened to see them?

Xi Ping, neither admitting nor denying, only said, “Peak Master Lin, aren’t you always in seclusion? From what you say, how did you end up paying a visit to another mountaintop?”

“That wasn’t the case,” Lin Chi said scrupulously. “It’s only that your fireworks were excessively showy. They flew up a hundred zhang high. All of Xuanyin’s thirty-six peaks saw them. I heard that the north slope of Flying Jade Peak even came down in an avalanche. A disciple on Moon Plated Peak got distracted watching the fireworks and ruined a furnace full of nearly completed immortal tools.”

Xi Ping: “...”

A hundred...a hundred zhang high?

He had spent five years mixed in among the evil cultivators in Wild Fox Country, picking up all kinds of talismans, arrays, and underhanded methods from evil paths. He'd learned both the things he should have learned and the things he shouldn't have learned. He truly couldn't remember what he'd drawn in that amateur array of his five years ago.

But he'd known that Flying Jade Peak's north slope couldn't take too much noise. The fireworks were supposed to have quietly laid themselves out on the snow. How come they had flown up?

And they'd taken his “great work” a hundred zhang high?!

For a moment, Xi Ping rejoiced that he was “dead.”

He didn't want to go to Xuanyin Mountain alive ever again!

Lin Chi continued, “I very rarely leave seclusion, and there are many things I don’t understand clearly...but I suppose that you’re like this now because of the reincarnation wood? Accompanying plants are inauspicious. They are taboo to the immortal sects.”

Xi Ping quickly recovered from his inexpressible shame. “Please explain, Peak Master Lin.”

Lin Chi said, “Before the spiritual mountains took form, shed skin masters frequently appeared. Normally, when they shed their skins, their Ways of the Heart ought to have merged with heaven and earth, becoming one of the three thousands paths of the Great Way, providing an example for posterity. But there was a tiny minority of people whose Ways of the Heart couldn’t be accepted by the Great Way. When each Way that the world couldn’t abide was born, a type of ‘accompanying tree’ would emerge.”

Xi Ping was slightly surprised—only shed skins whose Ways of the Heart couldn’t be accepted by heaven and earth had accompanying plants. No wonder none of the great personages among the four great spiritual mountain ranges standing at the peak of the shed skin stage had one!

But while he listened, he didn’t completely believe this. He calmly said, “I suppose you aren’t all that old, Peak Master Lin. How do you know of these details?”

Lin Chi didn't respond for a long moment. "...She also had one."

Who?

"Xiangjun's toolmaking way was different from all the rest of us. She established her foundation in the mortal world, and her Way of the Heart came from one the ancient demonic gods. That ancient demonic god's accompanying plant was eternal spring brocade... You may not know this, but late-autumn red isn't actually a parasitic vine. It once lived in symbiosis with eternal spring brocade. Late-autumn red is poisonous. It could draw nutrients from the eternal spring brocade, and it could also protect it from attack by birds, beasts, and insects."

Xi Ping said, "Where does eternal spring brocade usually grow? I don't think I've ever heard of it in Wan, Chu, or He..."

"You've never heard of it because it ceased to exist long ago." Lin Chi focused on the distant horizon. The first rays of daylight were already visible there.

The Master of Moon Plated Peak in his convict's garb said softly, "Eternal spring brocade...was a very fragile tree that only grew on high mountains over a hundred zhang high with abundant spiritual energy. It couldn't be easily transplanted. If it were taken into the foul mortal world, it wouldn't grow even if it were planted in a green ore field. Starting in the spring, its exquisite flowers would be like snow. They bloomed through spring and summer. When they fell during the autumn frosts, the late-autumn red would come to life and give the trees a 'red dress' to wear amid the frost and snow. In all four seasons, its colors were the finest around. Its timber was valuable. It was very conspicuous. The places where eternal spring brocade grew had to have auspicious animals and medicinal herbs. It was very easy to find...and very easy to destroy in its entirety."

Xi Ping: "..."

No wonder even Sanyue's Xuanwu had said that eternal spring brocade wood was an ancient thing. He thought he ought to rejoice that reincarnation wood was so indiscriminating; it could grow in any nook or cranny.

Xi Ping suddenly remembered something. "Then wasn't that brush of yours..."

The last of its kind?

"It's nothing. That brush was made of eternal spring brocade. I had wanted to call it 'Hui Xiangjun,' but I felt too embarrassed to, because it was useless.”

Likely Lin Chi had lived too long. No matter what he said, it was always slow and plodding, like his blue luan after being torn to shreds by Qiu Sha.

They flew east into the morning sun, which burned with the remnants of summer heat.

“It could channel spiritual energy through plants and remove the remnants of consciousness in the plants. If your cultivation was strong enough, you could make all the plants within a hundred li radius move according to your will... I had to think for a long time before I made this. Had I had this back then, perhaps I could have concealed the fact that eternal spring brocade was her accompanying plant,” Lin Chi said. “But it was no use. By the time I made that brush, her immortal bones had already been removed. I don’t have your quick wits. I can only act in hindsight. I only brought the brush out to imagine that time had reversed itself... It’s just as well that I’ve used it now. I can say it didn’t come into this world for nothing.”

Hui Xiangjun had also had the inheritance of an ancient demonic god, and her spiritual bones had been removed on that account?

What had happened back then?

Xi Ping waited for a long moment, but Lin Chi didn't continue, and he didn't feel like he could follow up—he still remembered Lin Chi's expression when he had mentioned Hui Xiangjun in Tao County.

The blue luan flew a while longer, and all the drifting mist and fog around them dispersed. They saw the outlines of the thirty-six peaks of Xuanyin.

Then Lin Chi said, "Though I'll do my best to avoid people, the Sea of Stars is in the Xuanyin Mountains, as well as the great mountain array, and I don't know whether the three elders will notice you. Are you sure you won't leave? Why would you run the risk of going to Xuanyin Mountain?"

Xi Ping thought, To see how those three old geezers react.

But what he said was, "I want to see my shifu."

I'm sorry, shifu, but you owe me a thrashing for the fireworks anyway; too many lice don't itch, and too large a debt isn't a concern.

Lin Chi had no suspicion that he was lying. The master of Moon Plated Peak treated others with sincerity and believed whatever they said. Hearing this, he very gently said, with profound emotion, "Direct disciples truly are different. There's no one on Moon Plated Peak who...alas. I'll pass by Flying Jade Peak, but the snow-capped mountain is sealed. General Zhi has yet to leave seclusion. I'm afraid you won't get to see him very soon."

Wasn't that just perfect—Xi Ping was about to say something when someone suddenly caught his spirit. A-Xiang's voice said, "Uncle, have you ever seen this?"

Wei Chengxiang had remained in Tao County alone.

For one thing, she couldn't find the Law Breaker Bracelet—reasonably speaking, with a half-immortal's spiritual sense, whether it was the immortal tool that had recognized her as its master or her own severed limb, it should have been easy for her to fix on them, but the Law Breaker's temper was truly fierce. Perhaps the bracelet was enraged at being abandoned by its master at the last moment. It had run off and "eloped" with Wei Chengxiang's severed limb; their whereabouts were unknown.

For another thing, she thought that she had played a part in the chaos in Tao County, so she ought to stay behind to help make arrangements for the Chu residents who had been impacted. This young woman was a blockheaded gentleman, raised by a foolish scholar who had never passed the local imperial exam. In her youth she had rebelled, but the older she got, the more she resembled her grandpa. She wouldn't renege on a debt of a single copper coin. Xi Ping couldn't dissuade her, so he'd had to go after her.

Through the reincarnation wood, Xi Ping saw Wei Chengxiang holding a child's little hand. There was a small stiff scar like a fish's scale on the back of the child's hand. At a glance, it looked like there was a full moon tattooed there.

“This is the landlord's son. He has lots of spending money and was always coming to buy Silver Tray Lottery Tickets, so I know him. He didn't have this on his hand before the Great Market,” Wei Chengxiang said grimly.

“This isn't a mortal injury... I think it has the aura of Sanyue's Silver Moon.”

Xi Ping frowned. He had never seen this. Then, using his consciousness as a medium, he had her ask Lin Chi.

After listening carefully, Lin Chi sighed and said, “Little Brother Wei's impression is right. This is the result of the Silver Moon.”

Wei Chengxiang asked, “Peak Master Lin, can you tell me whether it will endanger his life?”

“Hard to say. Xuanyin Mountain’s Bell of Tribulation can’t go beyond the Latent Cultivation Temple except in a matter of absolute necessity—five years ago, the three elders took the Bell of Tribulation to the Impassable Sea, and the elders are still resting in seclusion to this day. That is the impact it has on shed skin elders, never mind mortals,” Lin Chi said gravely. “The Silver Moon is the same. I’m afraid that this won’t be the only disaster that comes to pass as a result of Qiu Sha appearing in the mortal world...”

Before he could finish speaking, he was interrupted by the tolling of a bell.

At this point, the blue luan immortal tool had already entered the Xuanyin Mountain Range. Xi Ping instantly had an ominous premonition. “What’s happening?”

“It’s coming from the Principal Peak,” Lin Chi whispered. “The Dignitary of Rites Elder Zhao has left seclusion... You’ve come at the worst possible time.”

Xi Ping: “...”

At the same time, his heart stopped for no reason. His spiritual sense had been touched, but he had no idea what direction the touch had come from.

Xi Ping quickly looked toward the southeast: had san-ge already reached the Impassable Sea? What had he done?!

Five years ago—

In the Impassable Sea, the three great shed skin elders of the Xuanyin Mountains had shattered the consciousness of an established foundation disciple who had trusted them and so had been willing to obediently enter the star stone and have his spiritual bones removed. All that remained was a dangerous body half a step from an ascended spirit.

The demonic god's inheritance had been cut off at this point, and the demon seed at the bottom of the Impassable Sea had also fallen silent. The calamity was done and dusted.

After Zhao Yin broke the star stone, he went on to aim a blow at Xi Ping's body.

There was a clang, and a sword gust shot out from the brow of the body with its faint aura—an echo from the shard of Zhaoting, weak yet sharp.

The Sword that Mended the Heavens had shattered because it had touched the shed skin boundary too early. The sword aura had merged with heaven and earth, and the sword gust remaining in the human world cut off Zhao Yin's blow and opened the Dignitary of Fate's eyes.

Zhang Jue dodged aside and shielded Xi Ping. His snow-white eyes were revealed. He knocked Zhao Yin away and said sternly, "Zhao-shixiong, which heavenly commandment has he violated? Don't you think this is enough?"

Zhao Yin came back to himself and abruptly drew back his hand. The shard of Zhaoting had cut a slit over a cun long in his sleeve, and there was blood on the back of his hand.

He was instantly petrified, cold sweat pouring off him.

Zhao Yin's expression altered several times. After a moment, he restrained his murderous aura and said in a low voice, "I am ashamed of myself. The Bell of Tribulation is truly treacherous when it leaves the spiritual mountains... I failed to notice that my heart and mind were unsteady, and I was apprehensive over the demonic god's remnants. My temperament nearly altered. Thank you, Zhang-shixiong."

Zhang Jue coldly said, "You should go into seclusion when you return."

Lin Zongyi resealed his mouth.

The three of them once again tightly sealed the demon seal. Before leaving, Elder Zhang Jue hesitated a moment. He had meant to pull the shard of Zhaoting from the corpse, but when he put his hand over Xi Ping's forehead, his spiritual sense was suddenly touched.

Before the Dignitary of Fate High Elder's eyes, the chaotic star paths of the Sea of Stars appeared all of a sudden, with countless ties wound among them. For a time, he couldn't see clearly, only felt that Zhaoting was denying him. Zhang Jue sighed involuntarily and at last withdrew his hand.

The Great Way has three thousand paths; heaven always leaves a last gleam of hope.

Perhaps the shard of Zhaoting was that gleam, though he didn't know what it pointed to. The Dignitary of Fate could not see it clearly.

Zhang Jue waved a hand, opening the ground, and interred Xi Ping's corpse. Then the demon seal fell, and the Impassable Sea was utterly silent, once again becoming forbidden ground. All that remained were the half-dead reincarnation wood trees.

Reincarnation wood was a "worthless" type of tree. You could scratch a mark in the soft wood with your fingernail. It wasn't proof against insects, and it wasn't especially proof against corrosion. Apart from the poor who had no choice, no one was willing to use it. It was generally used for making decorations of little value, and sacrificial offerings. But it wasn't picky about where it grew, didn't care whether the temperature was colder or hotter, whether it was by a river, on a mountain, in the wilderness, or even on the eaves of an abandoned house; it could always put down roots and sprout. Even brush fires and lightning couldn't burn it all away.

On the wide and barren bottom of the Impassable Sea, the felled and withered reincarnation wood trees quickly sprouted new shoots from rotten stumps, struggling unendingly, growing. After five years, they had once again formed a forest.

The branches reaching out from underground had bit by bit raised the person Zhang Jue had buried in the earth.

When Zhou Ying saw Xi Ping, the corpse's limbs were tangled among branches soft as willow boughs, wrapped up. Likely because the body had stepped over a major boundary in the blink of an eye, his hair was over half a chi longer than in Zhou Ying's memories, falling like a heavy curtain along with the leaves.

This reincarnation wood forest seemed to have dug deep to bring up all the remaining spiritual energy at the bottom of the Impassable Sea, offering it to this near-ascended spirit body. The trees stubbornly refused to believe that they could die, and they wouldn't believe that he could die, either.

They followed the wind and the water, growing naturally, obeying no discipline, admitting only their own logic.

Plants have roots; no wonder they are far more steadfast than the human heart, which can easily drift away.

When Zhou Ying touched the body, the reincarnation wood trees around him rustled without a breeze. Then, a beam of sword light flew from the center of Xi Ping's brow.

Likely because it sensed no malice, Zhaoting only slashed gently in warning, but after all, it was still Zhaoting.

Blood at once began to cascade from Zhou Ying's palm. He didn't even blink, bent on "plucking" that body from among the branches. His hands kept shaking—it wasn't from pain; it was because there was still lingering warmth in that body.

Blood from Zhou Ying's palm dripped along his wrist and fell onto the ground, where it was absorbed by the messily interwoven reincarnation wood trees. For an instant, the whole Impassable Sea hummed, all the demon seal inscriptions covering the ground startled awake by the blood of the demon subduers. Zhou Ying's gaze became grim.

A forebear of the Zhou clan had been able to find the demon seed and release it; he could do so as well.

He had once been shut away beneath the demon seal for two decades; each and every inscription here was as familiar to him as his own hands and feet.

He could...bring the demons into the world, destroy the demon seal from within, and use the ensuing chaos to take him away.

CHAPTER 86 - Traveler Abroad (3)

“They’ve been throwing their weight around, haven’t they?” Zhou Ying said to himself, speaking toward Xi Ping’s body. “Why?”

The hollow body didn’t answer.

Zhou Ying smiled. “The immortal sect...the immortal sect...”

Supposing that Xi Ping had been killed by the demons in the Impassable Sea, his death couldn’t have been any more just and honorable; Xuanyin Mountain wouldn’t have hidden that. Now, seeing how the reincarnation wood clung to Xi Ping, what more did Zhou Ying need in order to understand?

While his spiritual bones had been sealed on the altar, he had heard vague discussions among the demons of the ancient god’s bones in the reincarnation wood forest. He had only taken it as an anecdote, listening to it and letting it go. He hadn’t thought that many years later, he would end up entangled with that anecdote in this fashion.

It turned out that he had never escaped the Impassable Sea.

The thin smoke of the Riverward now gathered and now dispersed, following him closely. When it dispersed, it was like mist. When it gathered, it would show the indistinct form of a person. Landing beside Zhou Ying, it looked more like a living person than the one Zhou Ying had brought down from the trees.

Zhou Ying didn't turn his head. He coldly said, "Scram."

He sent the smoke of the Riverward scattering in alarm.

The Riverward would change its shape depending on who was using it. This unnecessary adornment meant that when it had wrapped around Zhou Ying and taken him down into the Impassable Sea, it had nearly given him the impression that it was Shiyong himself guiding him, having once again gotten up to mischief somewhere, taking him to come to the rescue. If only Zhou Ying made it in time, he could return him intact to the Marquis Manor before the tenth.

And if he didn't make it in time, he would indeed regret it, but it would be no big problem, either. If he missed the old lady's birthday, at worst he'd send that brat to put on a show to make it up to her; he was shameless, anyway.

Except that...

“Was it really you who helped me get the Riverward in Tao County? If any bit of your soul is still in this world, will you give me some answer?”

But Zhou Ying waited amid the demon seal inscriptions on the ground for he didn't know how long, and there was only silence all around.

When a near-ascended spirit body was constantly supplied with spiritual energy, it would preserve its appearance, would even have residual warmth; it was even normal for it to have a heartbeat. But Zhou Ying couldn't sense a sliver of Xi Ping's aura; this body was “empty,” the consciousness so shattered that it had vanished without leaving a trace. Only the sword aura that cut anyone who came near still showed a bit of life.

Zhou Ying closed his eyes.

“You blame me for not blocking that selection card, right? That's fine... that's all fine, go ahead and blame me if you want. Anyway, you've never hesitated to throw a tantrum when you were mad at me.” He softly deliberated with the corpse: “Ge will smash this damn place for you and take you home, and then you'll come visit me in a dream, okay?”

The empty shell didn't speak.

“Not even a couple of sentences?”

Not even the reincarnation wood trees were moving anymore.

As if his negotiation had fallen through, Zhou Ying, slightly helpless, gently put the warm body into the undergrowth. He rubbed Xi Ping’s head with force. “Scoundrel.”

Then he walked forward, following the demon seal.

Carving inscriptions was different from writing. Whoever was carving them had to do it according to standard; they couldn’t exhibit their own “handwriting.” Sometimes two inscriptions that looked identical to the naked eye might have completely opposite effects because one stroke was a fraction longer, or simply because they were put in different places. So the inscription characters covering the ground looked like they had been birthed by the same mother.

Many contemporary figures who claimed to be inscription masters—for example, shoddy goods of Sanyue’s Yinyang Reverser’s ilk—wouldn’t even dare to fly over a rare first-class inscription like the demon seal at three zhang high, never mind stepping on it; but Zhou Ying was totally nonchalant.

There was only one type of person on earth to whose eyes inscriptions were different.

Princess Duanrui had asked how the world looked to a person with a paramount spiritual sense.

It looked like this: to his hearing, the fluctuations in people's pupils, the flow of their blood, their heartbeats, were as raucous as though all of them were shouting their desires through a trumpet; since opening his spiritual eyes, cultivators' probing consciousnesses and roaming spiritual senses had been visible to him; in his eyes, all inscription characters were three-dimensional, dynamic.

Even if Zhou Ying wasn't familiar with an inscription, there was still no need for him to worry that he would blow something up if he tampered with it—he could “see” how inscriptions clashed and merged with their surroundings.

This was why he had dared to learn inscriptions from the demon in the Impassable Sea. In this respect, no demon could fool him.

As Zhou Ying walked straight toward the demon seed the three high elders had sealed, the dangerous first-class inscriptions didn't move a hair, as if they were only ornamental designs on the ground.

The inscriptions on the demon seal had been carved by Xuanyin's three elders working in concert. Zhou Ying could see who had written each inscription—because to his eyes, those inscriptions were nothing alike; they even had the remnants of different people's auras.

One part belonged to the Dignitary of Rites Elder Zhao Yin, whom he had seen once; one part had a slight, faint echo of the sword energy attached to Xi Ping and perhaps belonged to the Dignitary of Fate Zhang Jue; the remaining inscriptions had mainly been written toward the end, with a faint character of holding the line and making a decision, which seemed like the work of the Lin family's Dignitary of Rule, who only spoke to pass judgment.

Inscriptions carved by different people all had subtle exclusion zones at their boundaries; this was especially clear between Zhao Yin's and Zhang Jue's.

Even more subtle was unevenness to differing degrees in the auras of the inscription characters left behind by the three elders, especially serious with Zhao Yin's; a part of the inscriptions that were near the demon seed had practically reached the point of "weakness."

As expected...

Zhou Ying stopped beside the demon seed.

When he had seen the Dignitary of Rites Zhao Yin five years ago, he had sensed a familiar aura on Zhao Yin. But back then he had only been a mortal whose spiritual bones hadn't yet been restored. He hadn't seen clearly. But when he had found that there were indications of an exposed Way of the Heart on Princess Duanrui, it had already been after he had opened his spiritual eyes.

In other words, Zhao Yin's situation was far graver than Duanrui's, who was an ascended spirit. The influence of the heart demon was coming from the top down.

Zhou Kun had gone down into the Impassable Sea twenty-nine years ago, and not long after there had been internal strife in the Xuanyin Mountains. An ordinary person would perhaps suspect the internal strife had been triggered by a heart demon seed. But afterward, Zhou Ying had carefully looked into that history and had felt that when it came down to it, the internal conflict had been caused by the Zhao and Li families having too many people; the Xuanyin Mountains only had thirty-six mountaintops—there weren't enough resources to go around; that had given the Zhou family an opportunity to go fishing in troubled waters. The people involved had all behaved very rationally; there hadn't been anyone involved who, like the Lancang sect leader, seemed to have lost their reason.

With Zhou Ying's understanding of his own lunatic father, he'd made a guess back then that had now been confirmed: from the inscriptions of the demon seal, it seemed that the Xuanyin Mountain elders had all been impacted by the heart demon. Of those three old bastards, Zhang Jue was frequently submerged in the Sea of Stars, Lin Zongyi had spent more than half his life in seclusion, and Zhao Yin, who oversaw Xuanyin Mountain's Principal Peak and had comparatively more opportunities to make an appearance, was still a rare creature that only the ascended spirit peak masters could occasionally see—what opportunity would a mortal like Zhou Kun have had to gather the three of them together?

Only one—when he was struck by heavenly lightning and the existence of the great demon in the Impassable Sea was made known.

When that happened, it was certain that the Bell of Tribulation would sound; the three high elders of Xuanyin Mountain would be certain to come to the Resurrection Vortex.

So back then, Zhou Kun probably hadn't taken the heart demon seed away at all; he had used some means to leave it on the demon seal...likely even on the head of the demon host with the unspeakable name.

When the Bell of Tribulation sounded, the Ways of the Heart of the three high elders would have to suffer questioning; the heart demon would take that opening to sneak in without anyone noticing.

The reason Zhao Yin had been the most deeply harmed among them was likely that the Bell of Tribulation was usually exhibited at Xuanyin Mountain's Principal Peak.

This was the last means of fighting back that Zhou Kun, as a mortal, had had when he had dimly sensed the fetters of the will of heaven.

It was also the true "legacy" he had left for his descendant.

In single-handedly establishing the Kaiming Department and the Luwu, Zhou Ying had originally meant to slowly bury his game pieces in the four nations, wait for the heart demon Zhou Kun had planted to mature and bear fruit, then follow the example of Renzong and provoke a war.

He had wanted to use the chaos of the four nations and everything under heaven to sound the Bell of Tribulation on Xuanyin's Principal Peak and see which of the sages who had contracted a heart demon the tolling of the bell would carry off.

When one of the people who had laid down the demon seal was consumed by a heart demon, that would be his chance to open the demon seal once more and rip this world to shreds.

Who could have expected that Qiu Sha would give him an unanticipated surprise, let him avoid having to work so indirectly and be brought here ahead of schedule by the Riverward?

Wasn't this destiny urging him on?

Zhou Ying half knelt and reached out to touch the demon seed.

Stimulated by the blood of the descendant of the demon subduers, the demon seed pulsed like a heart. Some inscription characters near it were immediately inundated; the other inscription characters automatically bore down, forcing the demon seed to retreat.

And while the demon seed drowned those inscriptions whose aura had already been fragile, Zhou Ying took the opportunity to calmly pour spiritual energy toward his fingertips, carve out two of the inscriptions, and quickly swap their positions.

The exquisite inscription characters were like two automatic, obedient ropes; as he pushed and pulled, the misplaced inscriptions linked together.

When the wave of demonic energy had subsided, there was a new little crack in the perfectly dovetailing demon seal.

The wound on Zhou Ying's hand was torn open once more. The demon seed greedily absorbed his blood and expanded into the gap.

He took a pill from his mustard seed and swallowed it. A bit of color returned to his face. He cycled his breathing for a moment. He had deliberately picked out Zhao Yin's inscriptions as his target, cleverly avoiding the inscriptions of the other two.

And because the inscriptions that had come from three different people's hands each had their own separate functions, the inscriptions of the other two were as undisturbed as if nothing had happened.

The heart demon seed, the Bell of Tribulation, and the addition of the Silver Moon appearing in a neighboring country now—was Elder Zhao Yin still well?

Currently, on the Principal Peak of the Xuanyin Mountains, an inner sect disciple who was sweeping the floor had yet to recover from the ringing of the bell when he saw a stream of smoke fly up from behind him, heading straight toward the Sea of Stars.

The disciple stared blankly for a moment, came back to himself, and simply dropped the broom. “Dignitary of Rites High Elder?”

Shed skins couldn't spy on neighboring countries, but Xuanyin Mountain couldn't avoid being alerted when a place by the border was swept by the Silver Moon. The moment that the Silver Moon's moonlight had fallen on Tao County, on Xuanyin Mountain's Principal Peak, Zhao Yin had opened his eyes—once again, he “saw” the “future” that he had glimpsed before through a crack in the Bell of Tribulation: society falling into disarray, the power of the immortal mountains waning, the demonic gods that had once been suppressed in throughout the world emerging one by one, causing the mountains to crumble and the earth to crack.

As if to validate his secret worries, the first ascended spirit evil cultivator in the thousands of years since the spiritual mountains had formed had towered into view. After Xuanyin Mountain's Bell of Tribulation had rung several times within a single year, Sanyue's Silver Moon had been forced to descend to the mortal world.

Five years ago, Zhao Yin had known that his Way of the Heart was unsteady after being shaken by the Bell of Tribulation. After this long in seclusion, there had not only not been the slightest turn for the better, his condition had become aggravated.

While on the Principal Peak, he always thought that he could hear the incessant chatter of the Bell of Tribulation in his ears, repeatedly saying to him: The crisis in the Impassable Sea hasn't truly calmed; it was a colossal mistake to compromise with the Dignitary of Fate back then and spare that corpse that had inherited the demonic god Yuan Hui's tradition; sooner or later, it will lead to disaster.

And neither before nor after that, at just that time, he suddenly sensed the demon seal being touched!

Once an inscription took shape, it would break away from its carver; only the loss of a first-class inscription, which was a matter of vital importance, would alert the spiritual sense of the carver.

Zhao Yin was startled and furious: who was it?!

The Sea of Stars was agitated by the entrance of a shed skin. The Dignitary of Fate Zhang Jue, disturbed, frowned and held down the undulating mist. "Zhao-shixiong?"

"Someone has broken into the Impassable Sea," Zhao Yin said without preamble. "The inscriptions on the demon seal have been touched. I can't reckon who it is. I need to use the Sea of Stars to observe."

Zhang Jue looked at him in astonishment.

“Hurry, this is a matter of utmost importance. There can be no delay!”

Zhang Jue scrutinized him closely for a moment, not responding. He pinched his fingers together and sent out a beam of spiritual energy. Waves rose once again in the Sea of Stars. The image of the Dignitary of Rule Lin Zongyi appeared in them.

Zhang Jue asked, “Lin-shixiong, have you noticed any changes in the demon seal in the Impassable Sea?”

Lin Zongyi didn’t remove his mouth seal, but his voice came through the Sea of Stars: “No.”

“Me, neither.” Zhang Jue turned to Zhao Yin. “Zhao-shixiong, you...”

Like tying a rope knot, Zhou Ying followed Zhao Yin’s inscriptions and cleverly swapped two more characters.

Then it was as if he had been drained dry. For a time, he was a little unsteady on his feet. Zhou Ying put another pill in his mouth and saw that the inscriptions Zhao Yin had laid down were shaking even more fiercely than he was; at the edges, they were even showing a tendency to merge with the demon seed.

Zhou Ying drew close to those inscriptions and quietly said, “The Bell of Tribulation rang recently, and now the Silver Moon has lit up. The spiritual mountains are shaking, Zhao Yin, can you feel it?”

Zhao Yin...

Zhao Yin...

The malicious demon’s voice pricked Zhao Yin’s spiritual sense from the abyss.

Can you feel it...?

“Zhao-shixiong? Zhao-shixiong!”

Zhao Yin turned and left.

“Wait.” Zhang Jue came out of the depths of the Sea of Stars and blocked his path. “Zhao-shixiong, where are you going?”

“To the East Sea to expel demons,” Zhao Yin said stubbornly. “We left behind a lurking danger back then, and now it has become a calamity. It must be expelled.”

Across space, Lin Zongyi and Zhao Jue exchanged a look, their expressions both becoming grave.

“Slow down. First take a look.” Zhang Jue swept his sleeve—the Impassable Sea had been a place that the Sea of Stars couldn’t see into, but five years ago, it had been the Xuanyin high elders who had replaced the demon seal, so with the inscriptions Zhang Jue had left behind as a thread, it peered into the Impassable Abyss.

When the “starlight” fell, the Riverward immediately became a clump of mist, covering the uninvited guest under the demon seal.

And the inscriptions Zhang Jue had left behind were all calmly lying in their original positions. When the “starlight” swept past, it showed a scene of total tranquility.

Zhang Jue said, “You saw?”

Zhao Yin was bewildered for a moment. He abruptly closed his eyes and pinched the center of his brow.

After cycling his breathing for a moment, Zhou Ying opened his eyes and saw that the differences between the inscriptions belonging to the three of them had become even more pronounced; the other two's inscriptions were even more obviously repelling Zhao Yin's now.

Dongheng's Sanyue's Xiang family was its only big family, so no matter what foulness they got up to, no one could do anything about it; Xuanyin was fussy and full of checks and balances, with four elders working together—though there were only three left now, there was still discord among them.

The demon seal was like a dam a thousand li long, and he was a tiny termite that had crawled into a crevice and chewed it up until it was on the point of bursting.

Zhou Ying took a breath and held it, reaching toward the third pair of inscription characters. In a low voice he said, provoking, "Among the thirty-six peaks of Xuanyin, nine peaks answer to you, and besides that there are three near-ascended spirit cultivators waiting to become peak masters. The Zhao clan's main bloodline is everlasting. Its collateral branches are spread throughout every province. The spiritual mountains are your great wall. What does a loner like the Dignitary of Fate understand?"

Meanwhile, the Dignitary of Fate Elder Zhang Jue waved a hand to disperse the starlight. "Dignitary of Rites, five years ago you were impacted by the aftereffects of the Bell of Tribulation and nearly destroyed the corpse. How has your Way of the Heart failed to stabilize in the least after five years in seclusion? Can the corpse of an established foundation truly become a stumbling block for your heart?”

In a flash, Zhou Ying swapped a fourth pair of inscriptions. “Previously, the Lin clan was the head of the four great families. But after the decline of the Li clan, the Zhao family rose to prominence through sheer numbers. How do you think the Dignitary of Rule regards you?”

In the Sea of Stars, Lin Zongyi’s voice came from his image. He said, “Dignitary of Rites, if your Way of the Heart is swaying, you can temporarily withdraw from the Principal Peak, and the Dignitary of Fate and I can take turns minding the Bell of Tribulation.”

Zhao Yin abruptly raised his head, the area around his eyes reddening slightly. “First the Bell of Tribulation, then the Silver Moon. The demons have risen on all sides. Though the two of you have your selfish motives, ought you not place the highest value on the overall situation now? How can you still be angling for the authority to speak on the Principal Peak at a time like this?!”

Once a person walks into paranoia, they fall out of alignment with the outside world. The things they are firmly convinced of and believe to be obvious at a glance appear incomprehensible to others, totally disconnected.

Right now, Zhang Jue and Lin Zongyi thought that Zhao Yin seemed to have gone crazy: it was a great matter that the Silver Moon had come down to the mortal world, but it was a great matter for the nation of Chu. Was it connected to the Impassable Sea? How could he talk about them in the same breath? The Sea of Stars had even shown that everything was completely peaceful in the demon seal, and of the three of them, two thought that Zhao Yin was just making trouble out of nothing. Lin Zongyi had sensed that his Way of the Heart wasn't very firm and had made the well-intentioned proposal that he stay away from the Bell of Tribulation. How had that turned into "angling for the authority to speak on the Principal Peak"?

Zhang Jue said, "Dignitary of Rites, what are you saying!?"

Zhao Yin began to laugh coldly.

Lin Chi, who ought to have gone to the Principal Peak to return his token to leave the mountains, paused abruptly. The blue luan that was flying at a crawl suddenly leapt up, dodging the wake of a beam of spiritual energy. In the sky above Xuanyin's thirty-six peaks, the wind rose and the clouds began to roil. A beam of black energy surged up from the Sea of Stars and swept toward the Principal Peak.

Lin Chi wasn't the type who liked getting in on the action to begin with, and he was even less inclined to do it now, when he was carrying the reincarnation wood and had a somewhat guilty conscience. Seeing signs of a problem, he didn't return the token. He urged the blue luan to rise. "The Dignitary of Rites? What's the matter?"

After Zhao Yin, two figures flew out one after another, one from the Sea of Stars, and one from Xuanyin's Yuntian Palace—the discipline hall. They followed close after him to the Principal Peak.

Xi Ping's consciousness was hidden in the reincarnation wood in Lin Chi's sleeve, but he could still feel the breathless sense of pressure.

"Wow, how come they're fighting?" At first, Xi Ping was bewildered. Then he reconsidered—let them fight, the harder the better. It would be for the best if the three old men were busy clawing at each others' faces; no one would have time to pay attention to the Impassable Sea.

Xi Ping's original body had been tightly sealed by the demon seal, or else he wouldn't have ended up not even knowing who he was for five years. But as Zhou Ying wore down one side of the demon seal, Xi Ping began to establish a weak link to his body, held by the Impassable Sea.

But Xi Ping wasn't pleased about this in the least—this wasn't a good thing. This clearly showed that san-ge really didn't just want to snatch a corpse; perhaps from the very start, he'd been coveting the Riverward so he could tear up the demon seal!

Lin Zongyi brought his long sleeves together, shielding all the nearby inner sect disciples below an ascended spirit in his sleeves. Zhang Jue opened his eyes and cut Zhao Yin off with a hand seal. "For established foundations and ascended spirits to leave the mountains, they must request a token from the Principal Peak. Shed skins cannot take a single step outside the Xuanyin Mountains without authorization; the other elders must unanimously agree. Never mind what is necessary to ring the Bell of Tribulation again. Dignitary of Rites, have you abandoned even the rules of our forebears?"

Zhao Yin grimly said, "Move—aside!"

As Xi Ping struggled to connect to the bottom of the Impassable Sea, he split off some attention for his puzzled musing: what did all of this mean? Zhao Yin wanted to carry the Bell of Tribulation off the mountain, and the other two wouldn't let him? Why was Zhao Yin the only one in a rush?

What was san-ge doing to the demon seal?

Also, wasn't the Dignitary of Rites Zhao Yin a pretty good talker? Of the three of them, the most loquacious was the Principal Peak's bell ringer; he was full of smooth patter. Why had he suddenly become unreasonable?

Did he have a screw loose...?

In a flash of brilliance, Xi Ping remembered that the heart demon at the bottom of the Impassable Sea had said that in the fifth year of Taiming, the former emperor Zhou Kun had stolen a heart demon seed, and the heart demon didn't know whom he had planted it on.

Just then, lightning fell, lighting up the carved railings and stone pillars of Xuanyin Mountain's Principal Peak's great hall. In the dazzling white light, the visages of the auspicious animals on the stone pillars were blurred. There was only one coiled dragon glowering up at the firmament. It instantly made Xi Ping remember the imperial robes Emperor Taiming had worn when Xi Ping had left home to go to the Latent Cultivation Temple.

Xi Ping gasped... A heart demon? No way!

The Zhou family's father and son had both overreached themselves!

With a burst of energy, Zhou Ying swapped the fifth set of inscriptions. His open-eyed cultivation level couldn't hold out any longer. His meridians ached fiercely, and his ears rang. He had just spat out a mouthful of blood into his palm, which had alleviated the pain slightly.

But he felt carefree. He absorbed a handful of spiritual stones through his palm and began to laugh quietly, looking toward his next target.

But just then, amid the ringing in his ears, he heard an auditory hallucination.

“San-ge!”

Zhou Ying’s laughter came to an abrupt halt. The lightning above the Xuanyin Mountains’ Principal Peak seemed to have crossed the vast distance to strike him.

The reincarnation wood trees behind him rustled, as if they were impatient to say something.

Zhou Ying’s figure flashed, and he instantly landed beside Xi Ping and seized him by the shoulders.

But it had been too long since he had “plucked” that body from the branch. The false warmth maintained by spiritual energy had dispersed, and it was cold to the touch. Xi Ping's head drooped lifelessly as he moved him, and even the broken sword was too lazy to give him a response.

Zhou Ying stared blankly. His spine lost support, and his back bumped into the reincarnation wood tree beside him, where the bloodstains had yet to dry.

The spiritual stones he carried with him slowly scoured his dried up meridians—he had been chronically ill as a mortal, and his body was still slower to recover than those of other half-immortals. He was a bit exhausted.

So, leaning back against the tree trunk, Zhou Ying slid down, the frenzy and the hope in his eyes both going out.

But the next moment, as if he was frozen in place, he turned his head bit by bit and looked at the tree behind him in disbelief.

A familiar voice was coming from that reincarnation wood tree, distant and vague, intermittent...

The brat seemed to be scolding him.

CHAPTER 87 - Traveler Abroad (4)

Xi Ping hid inside Lin Chi's sleeve. As he listened to the world-shaking battle of Xuanyin Mountain's shed skin elders, trembling along with the thirty-six peaks, he could also clearly feel the fetters that restrained him slackening.

He went numb all over.

In fact, Xi Ping could think of a way to use Lin Chi to let Xuanyin Mountain know that the demon seal was under attack, but that would trap san-ge; but if he looked on without lifting a finger, leaving aside for the moment what would happen to san-ge afterward, how would Xi Ping have the face to speak to his shifu?

Heavens above, he was only a rotten tree spirit who couldn't fend for himself. Why did he have to be caught in such a dilemma?

Just because he hadn't thought things through and had told that Idiot Xu to take the Riverward to give to his wastrel master!

Whether Zhao Yin went mad or became senile, Xi Ping would be delighted to see it, but tearing open the demon seal was no good...that was where his shifu had nearly given up his life!

Was there no one to mind him?

Xi Ping had followed Zhou Ying around like his shadow since he was little, had grown up smelling the medicinal odor on him thickening year by year. Even when scolding him, he couldn't bear to say anything harsh, so he had to readjust his aim and pour a flood of invective onto Emperor Taiming, whom he hadn't known very well—poor childrearing was the fault of the father; he had been ruthless and unfeeling himself, and he'd fathered a son without bothering to teach him properly, instead tossing him into the Impassable Sea to let the heart demon instruct him.

What a fucking dog of a father! Today he's blowing up the demon seal, and just you wait, tomorrow he'll send your ancestral tomb up to the sky like a firecracker, and it'll be just what you deserve!

Zhou Ying said, "...Who did you say is a wastrel? Who's a dog?"

All kinds of thoughts were frantically going through Xi Ping's mind. For a moment, he didn't realize who had answered him. He blurted out, "Who else could it be but Zhou Ying?"

Zhou Ying sucked in a breath. He raised a hand and gently touched the trunk of the reincarnation wood tree, then realized with a start that his hand was covered in blood and timidly drew it back.

His features seemed not to know how to arrange themselves, contorting in anger and grief both, at a loss.

Too pathetic, Zhou Ying...too pathetic.

So, as if venting his anger, he looked up and kicked Xi Ping's innocent body.
"How impudent!"

A corner of the demon seal had been pried up. The sounds and images there came intermittently to Xi Ping. He just happened to see that kick. Half-bitterly, he gave a grim laugh. "Ha, guess what? It doesn't hurt at all."

Zhou Ying: "..."

Xi Ping suddenly realized something: Wait, aren't I just quietly lying there? Even if my posture is indecent, that isn't my fault. Why would he call me "impudent"?

Can he...hear me?

In the chaos of Xuanyin Mountain, Xi Ping's consciousness turned into a stutterer. "San...san-ge?"

Zhou Ying forced his breathing to become extremely slow, as if there weren't enough air at the bottom of the Impassable Sea, and he needed to save each mouthful. "Don't you mean 'Zhou Ying'?"

He really can hear!

For a moment, the two of them simultaneously became mute.

At the end of the twenty-eighth year of Taiming, Xi Ping had been on his way to the southern mines in the Land of Turmoil on his shifu's orders. Before leaving, he had stopped over in Jinping and gone to visit Prince Zhuang Manor, impatient to display the magic powers he had just learned.

Back then, the only kind of talisman he had learned was a contamination preventing one. Flying a sword, he was even slower than Master Lin's blue luan. And the Tai Sui Qin was still mixed in with the bones of his fingers; he only ever played vulgar tunes about people bringing dishonor on their family names... Back then, he'd thought that the most dangerous circumstance on earth was being bullied by a miserable wretch named Liang Chen.

At the start of the twenty-ninth year of Taiming, Xi Ping had by a series of coincidences fallen into the Resurrection Vortex, had seized the offering from the altar out of the mouths of the demon host. He had broken the Zhou clan's eight-century-long conspiracy in the Impassable Sea, and then, as though it was karma, when all the dust had settled, he had been buried there himself. Fancying himself clever, he had even written home to report his safety...but it turned out that he hadn't fooled anyone.

Now, over five years had passed. Seeing Zhou Ying again, Xi Ping at first forgot how to speak to him.

He was a local thug from Wild Fox Country, a cunning and irascible evil cultivator, the mystifying Tai Sui... The masks he usually switched between with the ease of practice fell out all at once, and he was flustered, feeling that none of them was appropriate to take out to show his ge. He nearly blurted out the mixed language he had picked up in Tao County.

Just then, there was a rumble, and Zhao Yin was knocked down from the Principal Peak's cliff by Zhang Jue and Lin Zongyi working in concert. The usually invisible Xuanyin great array emerged from underground. The Principal Peak's main hall vibrated, establishing a resonance with the Bell of Tribulation.

Xi Ping gave a start. He came back to himself and forced himself to find the proper accent for Jinping official language. He dully tried to make up for himself: "Just...j-just now, what was that? I-I-I was just about to say hello, I hadn't said anything yet."

Zhou Ying seemed exhausted. He sat crosslegged under the reincarnation wood tree, leaning back against the bloodstained wood, quietly gazing at Xi Ping's empty body in front of him. "No need to hold back, speak your mind. Anyway, you won't feel a beating... 'It doesn't hurt at all', right?"

Xi Ping: "..."

A loose tongue is its own punishment; the proverb doesn't lie.

"Back then, you used an established foundation pill to shatter your spirit in this reincarnation wood forest and obtained the inheritance of the demonic god. That's why they wanted to kill you, right?" Zhou Ying paused. "Where have you been?"

Xi Ping had a natural gift of gab, but now he didn't know where to start. He was speechless for a moment. "I...I was in Western Chu... Well, it's a long story..."

Zhou Ying interrupted him: "Have you been mistreated?"

Xi Ping was stunned by his question.

He hadn't thought of this question, and no one had asked him this question before.

A-Xiang, Xu Rucheng, Lin Chi, Qiu Sha... They had all either listened to his instructions or made allowances for him in their plans. Some people believed in him, some people took precautions against him. He was the “Tai Sui” hidden behind the weird divine image, not to be spoken or written of, with countless ties to the ancient demonic god, seen as a fellow creature by the late-autumn red—what relationship could he have to being “mistreated”?

That was a word to describe a child.

Xi Ping considered for a while, then responded, “No, actually.”

This was the truth. In the last five years, he hadn’t known that he was the Marquis Manor’s Viscount, and he hadn’t thought it was mistreatment to eat just enough scraps to get by every day along with the toilers of Yuzhou, hadn’t thought there was anything unusual about the internal injuries and grave diseases everywhere—everyone had them.

Attached to the exiled refugees, to the spiritual image dolls in the prison, to the slaves bought and sold on the black market...he had lived and died with them again and again, fully experiencing abuse and humiliation, yet he hadn’t known that this had been forced on him so he could learn by comparison; these had been the fates of other people.

He was only a person roaming through some rotten wood, accompanying them as they lived and died.

Since everyone was accustomed to this, he naturally also grew accustomed to it.

It's clear to see that there are no natural princes and nobles on earth; "delicacy" is nothing but self-pity.

"Well," Xi Ping said carelessly, "I'm just a little restricted in Great Wan. In Western Chu, it's pretty good. Isn't it all down to me that Bai Ling-da-ge's subordinate Idiot Xu successfully seized power in Wild Fox Country? Heh-heh, I'm the Snake King's backer, Tai..."

Before he could finish his bragging, he was interrupted by a long cry in the valley, almost a dragon's roar.

Next, a number of figures landed beside Lin Chi. The ascended spirit peak masters near the Principal Peak had all been alerted by the sound of the elders fighting.

Rosy Cloud Peak's Peak Master Wen Fei swished his fan open. Hurried cursive script appeared on it: What's going on?

Lin Chi shook his head. "The Dignitary of Rites Elder suddenly left seclusion and went down into the Sea of Stars with a strange expression. Then they suddenly started fighting. I don't know..."

“Zhang Jue! Lin Zongyi!” Beneath the Principal Peak, Zhao Yin’s voice came like a shout. “I’ve always known that the two of you were lusting after the Principal Peak!”

Zhang Jue said, “Utter nonsense! Are you confused...? Dignitary of Rule, request the Vitex Branch from Yuntian Palace!”

The “Vitex Branch” was Xuanyin Mountain’s Dignitary of Rule High Elder’s foremost divine tool. Tradition had it that this was the vitex branch that the Southern Sage, on seeing living things suffering during the Great War of Gods and Demons and becoming aware of his own sinfulness, had worn on his back in penitence. When the Southern Sage had departed the mortal world, he had left the Vitex Branch in the Yuntian Palace Discipline Hall. The tail end of a lash from this thing could scare an established foundation or below out of their wits. At the least, it could kill an ascended spirit; at the most, it would bind a shed skin.

Lin Zongyi accordingly raised a hand. A burst of purple lightning came flashing through the air. Wen Fei and Lin Chi, respectively a medicine maker and a tool maker, within their grade both belonged to the “too weak to truss a chicken” category of noncombatants. Both quickly dodged. The realistic feathers on the blue luan even stood on end!

Lin Chi waved his sleeve to clear away the hissing sparks all around. He formed a hand seal, and an immortal tool like a thin cloud floated out of his sleeve to cover Moon Plated Peak, protecting its many inner sect disciples whose names he didn't even know. Only then did the other peak masters come back to themselves and organize a defense for their peaks one after another.

The nine peak masters under the influence of the Zhao family arrived one after another. As soon as they beheld this scene, they read too much into it—after all, it was less than thirty years since Xuanyin's last internal strife. The leading peak master surnamed Zhao couldn't hold back. He asked, “Dignitary of Fate, Dignitary of Rule, could you please tell us what you are doing?”

He didn't get a response, only saw the Vitex Branch descend. There was a thunderclap in the valley like the sound of tearing silk, then the lightning rolled up a mass of turbid energy and flew out.

The Zhao peak masters exchanged looks in mingled shock and anger. Though the Xuanyin Mountains were managed by the thirty-six peak masters, anyone without the backing of a shed skin elder—the Zhou family, for example—would be hindered at every turn; they were inferior to others. If the Dignitary of Rites Elder fell, never mind the Zhao family having nine peak masters—even if all thirty-six peaks had been under their rule, they would afterward still be reduced to mere stewards; what future prospects could they have?

The leading Zhao peak master clenched his teeth and led the others in a charge as if seeking death.

Nine great ascended spirits began to pull and tear the Vitex Branch simultaneously. The Dignitary of Rule's mouth seal floated down, and he shouted angrily, "Move aside!"

The lightning of the Vitex Branch rose angrily, and the nine of them were sent flying like fallen leaves swept by an autumn wind. But with this pause, a human form took shape within the turbid energy bound by the Vitex Branch. In an instant, it swelled to several times its previous size. It struggled free of the Vitex Branch and went east!

High among the clouds, when sudden thunder struck, what came tumbling out was always selfishness.

Wen Fei smacked his fan. A beam of spiritual energy entered snow-capped Flying Jade Mountain, which was far from the Principal Peak, and knocked on the mountain seal—Sword god, wake up! There's a fire burning in your backyard, it's no time to sleep!

“San-ge!” Xi Ping had no attention to spare for anything else. “Leave the demon seal without delay, hurry! There’s a shed skin on the way to the East Sea!”

Zhou Ying unhurriedly finished swallowing the last pill. When Xuanyin Mountain was mentioned, his faint air of fed up indifference returned. “So you have your consciousness in the Xuanyin Mountains, too. It’s two against one—how did he run away? Did some ascended spirits get mixed up in the shed skin battle?”

Xi Ping: “...”

His guess was very accurate. As soon as these mighty people showed their true colors, others could guess how they would behave. Maybe they ought to go into seclusion and reflect on themselves.

“It’s all right, it won’t be so fast. The other two will give chase,” said Zhou Ying. “Anyway, won’t it be just right if he comes? We’ll be able to witness a shed skin elder consumed by his own heart demon personally tearing open the demon seal.”

Xi Ping’s heart sank.

Since he was a child, he had heard the servants gossiping, saying that His Third Highness's ties to his blood relations were weak, that he had an inborn deficiency, that he was unlikely to live to adulthood. Everyone was living for the future, but His Third Highness had no “future”; aspirations and ambitions alike were all transient for him. Others who were frail and sickly might perhaps have other joys, could pick up a lifetime’s worth of karma with their family and friends, leave a bit of something behind in the human world, and some would think their life had been worth living. But what could Zhou Ying leave behind? Since birth, he had been only...an extraneous sack of skin attached to a set of spiritual bones.

He was a meaningless person. Meaningless people were all like legendary chaos, devouring heaven and earth not to strengthen themselves but only because they wanted to drag everything beautiful and ugly into the chaos.

In order to prove that they existed, and that their existence was justified.

“San-ge,” Xi Ping asked tentatively, struggling to calm down, “these last five years, have you not been to see Grandmother?”

Zhou Ying’s expression didn’t waver. “I’ve seen her. The old lady’s doing pretty well.”

Xi Ping was no more relaxed now than he had been when Tao County had hung by a thread, but his voice was still very soft. “But I haven’t seen her. San-ge, cut a piece of wood off that tree and give it to the old lady. Take me to see her, please.”

Zhou Ying said, “When the demon seal has been broken, you’ll be free. Even if you can’t return to your real body, you’ll still be able to travel through reincarnation wood, right? Then you can ask Bai Ling to gift the Marquis Manor a potted reincarnation wood tree. You can go yourself.”

Xi Ping: “...”

If he were still a useless layabout in Jinping, as much trouble as the cats and dogs he’d dropped of at Prince Zhuang Manor, making trouble as soon as no one was keeping an eye on him, wouldn’t san-ge be a little more concerned?

Xi Ping's regrets came too late: blazes, he ought to have wailed just now, made himself sound as miserable as possible; if there wasn't enough misery, he could have just made something up. What had he been playing the big shot for?!

No...he shouldn’t have accepted that selection card back then.

Zhou Ying's fingers stroked the coarse grain of the reincarnation wood. "If I insist on breaking the demon seal and throwing the world into turmoil, will you hate me?"

Xi Ping paused, not answering at first.

Zhou Ying waited for a moment, then smiled. "Oh, you've grown up. You've even learned to hide your words."

"I don't hate you," Xi Ping said after a moment of silence, his voice deepening slightly—this was the tone he used as "Tai Sui." "I know you."

If even I hated you, wouldn't that prove that you were right?

"I was the one who brought out your spiritual bones, and I was the one who told Xu Rucheng to give you the Riverward. You being here now is something I brought about through a sequence of chance and coincidence," Xi Ping said slowly. "Anyway, it's the same as the friend I left back in Tao County. If the sky springs a leak, I'll mend it, and if there's retribution, I'll be waiting to meet it for you. You...you go ahead and do just as you like."

The corners of Zhou Ying's eyes twitched slightly.

“If I’d known before, I probably would have sunk the Riverward...but all the same, if you took me back to the Resurrection Vortex in the East Sea five years ago, I’d still take your spiritual bones out. San-ge, even if you beat me to death, I still won’t regret it.”

Zhou Ying abruptly turned his head away, his false calm breaking. He seemed unable to take any more.

“Bastard. Using all the rhetoric I taught you when you were young against me.”

Zhou Ying waved his sleeve and chopped the blood-stained reincarnation wood tree down. He rolled the tree up in his mustard seed. He raised a hand to lift Xi Ping’s body and dragged it into the depths of the reincarnation wood forest. He took a pearl from his mustard seed and clapped it against the pit of Xi Ping’s stomach.

The pearl merged with the body and immediately condensed into a layer of brilliance on the body’s surface—this was a “dragon pearl” left behind from before the Great War of Gods and Demons, when the water dragons had yet to be subdued and turned into animal spirits by the Southern Sage; the water dragon clan had used these pearls to protect their young during natural disasters. Even if the sky fell and the earth cracked in the East Sea, it would probably be enough to leave him with an “intact corpse.”

Then Zhou Ying turned and went back. A bag full of white spirits disappeared into his palm. One after another, he pushed the misplaced inscriptions back where they belonged.

There was no one to see when, behind Zhou Ying, sword light flashed on the brow of Xi Ping's quiet body; soon after, everything once again became still.

CHAPTER 88 - Traveler Abroad (5)

Zhao Yin struggled free of the Vitex Branch and recklessly flew toward the East Sea.

In fact, impulses are like great joys and great sorrows; none of them will last very long. The evil flame, once gone, was gone. Zhao Yin had noticed that there was something wrong with his thoughts: even if Zhang Jue, out of consideration for Zhi Xiu, wanted to protect the descendant of their lineage at every point, Lin Zongyi still ought to have approved of expelling demons.

The moment the Vitex Branch had caught him, he had been bewildered. How had he provoked both of these people into standing against him?

However, some impulses are like writing the wrong word—you just need to cross it out; while other impulses are like killing the wrong person—once dead, they can't come back to life.

With the thirty-six peaks as witness, Zhao Yin had wished to use the Bell of Tribulation and had been obstructed, then cried out “The two of you are lusting after the Principal Peak.” What was done was done.

Upbraiding others on the basis of virtue while lacking virtue, spitting upon others while being contemptible, accusing others of selfishness while himself bewildered by selfishness—as Xuanyin Mountain’s Dignitary of Rites High Elder, Zhao Yin couldn’t fail to understand this obvious reasoning.

So today he had to prove that the demon seal was under attack and he was right, or else he would lose all standing and reputation after what he had said.

In an instant, Zhao Yin passed by the thirty-six peaks and arrived at the Latent Cultivation Temple, which formed the barrier between mortal and immortal.

A storm raised by a shed skin sage was no small matter. Where Zhao Yin passed, a waterspout appeared. The straw children, still performing the routine actions of repairing the residences of the disciples, collectively had their heads separated from their bodies and rose into the air.

Luo Qingshi heard the noise and thought it was someone fooling around with talismans. He stuck his head out of the Qiankun Tower ready to scold. Unexpectedly, as soon as he looked up, he was alarmed. Showing great adaptability, Immortal Luo leapt out of his chair. Before he hit the ground, he had already squeezed into a protective mustard seed. He went rolling down the Qiankun Tower’s high stone steps.

The next moment, there was a faint crack as a snow bright whip cleaved the black clouds raised by Zhao Yin, trickling out like daylight.

When the dreadful “daylight” swept over it, the Latent Cultivation Temple’s Qiankun Tower was cut down the middle by fierce wind, and the third-class inscriptions on the tower didn’t even light up—Princess Duanrui was here!

“How lucky that I rolled quickly... My goodness, why are they fighting?” Luo Qingshi, who was usually very eager to enrich his experience, didn’t even dare to stay to observe this time. He nimbly fled the Qiankun Tower, rolled up a pile of straw children with missing limbs, and began to run like mad.

Duanrui showed no mercy. As soon as she joined the battle, she delivered a killing blow. Where her vital weapon, the Remorseless Whip, passed, the Latent Cultivation Temple’s lush green vegetation instantly withered. Half the valley took on a lifeless hue.

Zhao Yin was caught off guard. The lash of her whip hindered him, giving the two elders behind him the chance to catch up.

The princess knew that however much she might be the foremost person below the shed skin level, she was still “below the shed skin level.”

Therefore, she didn't try to show off. She rolled up the Remorseless Whip and withdrew.

Zhao Yin gave a furious shout. The waterspout at his feet swept across the Latent Cultivation Temple. The huge valley that disciples of each year broke their legs running across to get to morning class was covered in an instant.

In Zhang Jue's snow-white eyes, the even whiter irises changed positions like the movements of the stars. There was a humming in the ears of all the people and auspicious animals in the Latent Cultivation Temple. Even the wind stagnated.

In that moment, all persons and objects lost their origins and destinations; they were severed from their own cause and effect, cast all over at random—stones that had been rolling down rose into the sky; the straw children thrown up into the sky by the wind ended up half-buried in the dirt; Luo Qingshi and his protective mustard seed “parted ways” out of nowhere, ending up over a zhang apart in the blink of an eye; Princess Duanrui's figure was snatched up to the pinnacle of the split Qiankun Tower; Zhao Yin froze in midair—the people on the ground craned their necks until they nearly broke to see his enormous sleeves, his figure as grand as the southern mountain.

The mountain was collapsing.

Lightning wrapped around inscriptions slammed into Zhao Yin like a natural disaster. He was knocked out of the clouds by the two great shed skin elders. The Vitex Branch came down, pressing directly against the spirit at the center of Zhao Yin's brow.

The Dignitary of Rites High Elder's cheeks were sunken in. There was a frightening elderliness in his face. His eyes were fit to burst out of their sockets, he glared at Duanrui at the top of the Qiankun Tower.

Under the force of three great shed skins, Princess Duanrui's breathing was rather unsteady, but she herself was very steady. With the Remorseless Whip curled up, she nodded from afar toward Lin Zongyi and Zhang Jue.

The Zhou family...

Zhao Yin thought: The Zhou family, suppressed for over a thousand years by the immortal mountains—their methods were truly excellent. On one hand, raising demons in the Impassable Sea, and on the other, cultivating in seclusion on Green Pool Peak, the immortal and demonic sides not hindering each other. Xuanyin Mountain had four great families; for the sake of equilibrium, for the last thousand years, only the Zhou clan hadn't had a shed skin, but within a single generation, they had managed directly or indirectly to pull two shed skin elders down from the spiritual mountains—what scheming!

After five years of growth, the heart demon, which had already put down deep roots, covetously enveloped the shed skin elder's Way of the Heart, neatly tying all the unrelated coincidences in Zhao Yin's mind into a conspiracy. Darkness appeared on the Vitex Branch holding his spirit.

At the bottom of the Impassable Sea, Zhou Ying came to the last pair of inscriptions whose sequence he had disrupted. He couldn't hear Xi Ping's voice for the moment, so he took the opportunity to brush the spiritual energy extending from the weak inscriptions. As if talking to himself, he said in an almost inaudible low voice, "Power is like the tide. If you try to wash away your bad reputation, when the tide recedes, you'll be dried out on the shoal of disgrace."

Blood churned in Zhao Yin's eyes—before the Great War of Gods and Demons, there were no spiritual mountains, no immortal sects, and naturally there had also been no such thing as so-called "family protection." Each cultivator was a lost wanderer, finding their own Ways of the Heart through repeated fumbling, how far they could walk solely dependent on their individual luck and aptitude.

Only Zhao Yin had taken a shortcut.

Back then, he had been only a puny open-eyed half-immortal, stuck at the two-century threshold, already showing signs of coming to the end of his lifespan, not making the slightest progress in his cultivation, his hopes growing more and more remote. Once, when he went to sea to seek an opportunity, he happened by chance to be caught up in a struggle between masters. Zhao Yin came close to death, but his luck was good. Amid the violent storm, he survived.

When he woke up, he found that he had been thrown up onto a nameless little island. With him was half of the corpse of a master, along with that person's intact vital weapon. Zhao Yin was very surprised, because in that era, very few cultivators died natural deaths; it was vanishingly rare for a person's weapon to survive after their death. So he curiously stepped forward to investigate.

At first sight, he found that, like the most perfect inscribed memorial tablet, the vital weapon, loyal to the last, was carved with all the paths its master had walked while living—it was a polished, complete Way of the Heart!

Zhao Yin had searched bitterly without finding the threshold to an established foundation; his heart began to beat wildly. He thought, Why can't I use someone else's Way of the Heart?

He did want to find his own way, but the lifespan of a half-immortal was too limited. They were hardly better off than ephemeral mortals. He was nearly out of time!

But while he lived another day, succeeded in establishing a foundation and becoming immortal, he became for a time the laughingstock of the cultivation world.

All his fellow cultivators knew that his Way of the Heart was “stolen.”

Now, thousands of years had passed, and it had been a long time since anyone had talked about a “stolen Way of the Heart.” Inheriting a Way of the Heart from an elder or a deceased master was now seen as a matter of course; it was fumbling around for yourself that was rare...even a little unorthodox—if your teacher didn’t have some breadth of mind, they were likely to be somewhat embarrassed.

For the Zhao family, which had been the first to implement this method, their patience at the outset had been repaid; from the laughingstock of the cultivation world, they had gone on to become one of the great families of Southern Wan, had even dared on the strength of overwhelming numbers to claim themselves as equals to the Lin clan, which had turned out so many geniuses. Everyone fell over themselves to follow their example, racking their brains to come up with a way to join the Zhao clan.

But the human heart isn't floating duckweed. Even when the direction of the wind changes, deep-rooted humiliation remains in place.

If you whitewashed the road you had climbed to turn it into a heavenly pathway to immortality, you still couldn't fool yourself after having crept up that road step by step—his Way of the Heart was stolen.

A crack opened in the Way of the Heart of the Dignitary of Rites High Elder, which had been impregnable as a fortress for thousands of years, just like a thousand-li dam bursting because of an ant hole.

Zhang Jue suddenly sensed something. He cried out, "Dignitary of Rites!"

Without hesitation, Princess Duanrui shunned the Qiankun Tower. At the same time, she tossed out a huge mustard seed, wrapping up herself and all the half-immortals in the Latent Cultivation Temple.

The next moment, an enormous impact slammed down from above. Luo Qingshi and the others like him for a time didn't know what had happened; they only thought that the sky seemed to have fallen.

The mustard seed maintained by the princess, who was half a step from the shed skin boundary, shattered at this single attack. She went to her knees on the ground, her posture very unnatural—her spiritual bones had snapped!

But she no longer had attention to spare for that.

Duanrui hastily stabilized her fractured vertebra and ribs with spiritual energy. She turned her head away, her pupils contracting sharply—what had shattered her mustard seed just now had been an astral wind.

The other two great shed skin elders had held down Zhao Yin, but they hadn't held down the fallout of his Way of the Heart being crushed. The wind that had cast heaven and earth into darkness, like a waterspout, was rushing lightning fast toward the edge of the Latent Cultivation Temple, about to fly out carrying the irresolvable obsession...fly out into the mortal world, where even a falling brick could kill!

Damn it!

Just then, there was a drone. The Bell of Tribulation suspended over Xuanyin Mountain's Principal Peak was struck by a beam of sword energy carrying the aura of frost and snow. It resonated throughout the thirty-six peaks.

The tolling of the bell instantly smashed the better part of the waterspout with its towering resentment. The astral wind that seemed about to destroy the world was downgraded at once, changing into an ordinary hurricane, pitifully and contemptibly continuing on its way east.

Meanwhile, the demon seal in the East Sea was restored, and the excited demon seed unwillingly fell back into the abyss. But while the portion of the inscriptions belonging to Zhao Yin remained loyal to their post, the spiritual energy swarming over them, as if suddenly rudderless, became clumsy, only swept along by the inscriptions of the other two, moving mechanically.

Zhou Ying extended a hand and allowed the thin smoke of the Riverward to envelop him. Finally, he looked toward the reincarnation wood forest—without the cover of great chaos in the world, a twenty-something near-ascended spirit cultivator was too shocking. Even if he took Shiyong away by force now, he would only be another Qiu Sha, wiped away by the Way of Heaven.

It wasn't time yet...

Meanwhile, in the Xuanyin Mountains, Xi Ping, hidden in Lin Chi's sleeve, and Wen Fei simultaneously recognized the beam of sword energy that had struck the Bell of Tribulation.

Xi Ping was pleasantly surprised. "Shifu!"

But Wen Fei was so startled that his fan slipped out of his hand.

Lin Chi deftly caught the fan with the blue luan's tail and saw a heap of disorderly writing climb over it as if flying: I kneel before you, Zhi Jingzhai! I wanted you to come out of seclusion to have a look. I didn't want you to clean up the shed skin battlefield! Aiming the Bell of Tribulation directly at a shed skin—General Zhi, pardon me, are you the Southern Sage reincarnated? What do you think your cultivation level is? Do you really think you're on a par with a full moon grade divine tool from the heart of the mountains...

The first stroke of a final line of scrambling writing had just appeared when the messy writing on the fan suddenly paused. Then it was wiped away.

Then, a few characters very slowly appeared on Immortal Wen Fei's special fan. It looked like the dying testament of a person on the brink of death, written on a final breath, each stroke shaking.

These characters were nearly falling apart, barely holding their shape. The handwriting was scarcely discernible. It said: Shifu is here.

Lin Chi was slightly startled. In the reincarnation wood, it was as if Xi Ping had been struck by the heavenly calamity in the sky over the Xuanyin Mountains.

Only Wen Fei was bewildered, thinking to himself, Whose shifu is he calling himself?

It was all over. He was starting to rave.

Wen Fei took back his fan, and the three crooked words melted like snowflakes. The master of Rosy Cloud Peak waved the fan somewhat anxiously a few times and aimed it at Lin Chi: Lin-shixiong, is there anything you can do about Zhaoting?

Lin Chi shook his head. “Zhaoting is one of the three famous swords of the era. It won’t be so easy to repair. Moreover, there was a piece missing when Elder Zhang brought it back. Forgive me, I can’t do it.”

Xi Ping was trapped in the reincarnation wood and couldn’t put in a word. Hearing this, his mind filled with questions: Zhaoting was missing a piece—what had happened? Had the Dignitary of Fate High Elder who kept his eyes closed all the time groped around blindly and missed a piece?

No...that was wrong!

Just now, on Peak Master Wen’s fan, shifu had obviously been talking to him.

But...shifu had been sent away before the demon seal in the East Sea had descended, and he hadn't left Flying Jade Peak in five years. He shouldn't know what had happened after the arrival of the three elders.

By normal reasoning, supposing that his inheritance from the demonic god hadn't been exposed, the elders ought to have tossed him back into the Xuanyin Mountains, and now he would only be a puny established foundation. In a situation like this, he would either have been gathered up into some master's sleeves, or he would be hiding somewhere not daring to raise his head. How could he end up in company with some ascended spirit peak masters watching the fun...having specifically chosen these two, who were least able to fight?

How could shifu know he was here?

Xi Ping suddenly remembered the bloodstains on his san-ge's hand. They didn't look as though he had picked them up somewhere—they looked as if a sharp weapon had cut him. Was the missing shard of Zhaoting in his corpse?!

So when shizun had been startled awake by Peak Master Wen just now, if he hadn't convinced san-ge to stop...

Just then, he saw writing continue to pop up on Wen Fei's fan: Five years ago, he was seriously injured, lost his vital weapon, and was forced to enter seclusion. In five years, he may just have accumulated the strength for that one blow. He's courting death!

Before Xi Ping could finish reading, Wen Fei suddenly turned and left.

“Wait! My shifu, he...” Xi Ping's heart trembled. He hurriedly said to Lin Chi, “Peak Master Lin!”

Lin Chi was very understanding. “I'll take you over to have a look.”

Just then, Lin Zongyi's voice sounded in the sky above Xuanyin's thirty-six peaks: “The Dignitary of Rites's Way of the Heart has been damaged. There is something abnormal about this. The Dignitary of Fate and I will leave the mountains to investigate. Xuanyin's thirty-six peaks will be sealed.”

Zhou Ying had just been brought out the Impassable Sea by the Riverward. He had yet to leave the area of the East Sea when he heard Xi Ping's urgent voice come from the reincarnation wood he was carrying: “San-ge, Xuanyin's shed skin elders are almost here!”

Zhou Ying clicked his tongue and drew back his hand, which had been about to put the Riverward away. “It would seem that Zhao Yin has truly gone to see the sages?”

One of the whirlpools in the Resurrection Vortex swept by, rolling up the Riverward and Zhou Ying inside it. The Riverward covered all his traces and aura; he became one with the East Sea.

Next, the slowly billowing thin smoke of the Riverward changed into a vague human form and landed beside him. It pointed a finger at him and put it to its lips—be quiet, be careful.

The consciousnesses of the shed skin elders came sweeping over.

Zhou Ying was accustomed to ditching his benefactors once he no longer needed help. He ignored the Riverward, only leaning back languidly against the thin smoke. He said to Xi Ping, “You won’t make it by the tenth. When the storm has passed, I’ll pare off a piece of reincarnation wood and have Bai Ling take it to the Marquis Manor.”

Xi Ping said, “...aren’t you going?”

Zhou Ying was silent for a moment, not answering. He only continued his instructions: “That half-puppet footman of yours is currently at the Marquis Manor. I’ll have Bai Ling explain things to him, have him think of a way to get some of the old lady’s blood—if someone’s blood is spilled on reincarnation wood that has held your consciousness, you’ll be able to communicate through their spirit, right? Be careful when you talk, don't scare her, just say it's a new kind of immortal tool... Oh, right, I suppose I can't mention you to outsiders, that'll be annoying..."

Before he could finish, his gaze froze—the human form in the Riverward's thin smoke had come clear.

This time, the Riverward hadn't turned into Xi Ping again. The old lady with her head full of silver hair was sitting upright nearby, looking at him and smiling.

CHAPTER 89 - Traveler Abroad (6)

When the Riverward was activated, the smoke inside it would run everywhere, changing into all kinds of forms, reflecting the user's preoccupations like a mirror.

But, after all, it was only an immortal tool. It couldn't speak. The outcome depended on whom it turned into—mirroring Xi Ping, it was a little out of luck. The living Xi Ping didn't have so much "mysticism" to him; anything too mystical didn't look like him, but like a recollection of him after death. But when it turned into old Madam Xi, it was unusually convincing, because in Zhou Ying's impressions, this was just what his grandmother was like.

If he only went to see her, no matter when he turned his head, she would always be watching him like this. Sometimes she was keeping an eye on him, and sometimes she was looking through him to his mother, trapped in Guangyun Palace.

The old lady was very forgetful, always repeating herself, but it wasn't annoying. This was probably because she never complained, only reminisced about good things. It was like the way spring flowers always followed the same pattern, blooming just the same year after year, but no one would get tired of them.

She was clearly an old mortal woman without the strength to truss a chicken, but in her little garden, she could create a paradise like the inside of a mustard seed or an illusion, able to ease worries and cure all poisons. When he was little, Zhou Ying had been very curious—when people got old, would they all harden into a shell like this? Too bad he wouldn't live long enough to get old.

But later he no longer regretted that, because he found that people had hundreds upon thousands of ways of growing old—many people grew old and became crafty, became deceitful, became scourges.

Zhou Ying's expression changed several times. This time, he didn't bicker with the Riverward.

He hadn't been to see her in five years, even having Bai Ling write the present list for holidays in his place; he had coldly become an ingrate, even skipping the old lady's eightieth birthday. In fact, Zhou Ying didn't dare to go, but he couldn't reveal that in front of the little brat.

Under the attention of the shed skin masters, amid the graveyard of the surging sea, this demon who had single-handedly stirred up Xuanyin's thirty-six peaks until the mountains were sealed concentrated his thoughts and dispelled his preoccupations, closing his eyes in meditation.

The last thought to slip over his spirit was a feeble notion. He thought:
What if...what if after I'm done here, I go see her?

But the aftereffects of a shed skin high elder going mad couldn't be calmed so quickly.

The Dignitary of Rule Lin Zongyi's first order was to seal the mountains. It came just as Xi Ping's mind was split in two, half tied up with shizun, half hung up on san-ge, hard pressed from both sides. At first, he didn't realize what Elder Lin's intention was.

Until someone stopped Lin Chi.

"Zisheng, don't wander around," another ascended spirit surnamed Lin, a sword cultivator, quietly said to Lin Chi. "Hurry back to Moon Plated Peak and seal the mountain."

Only then did Lin Chi realize with a start that something was wrong.

Right now, apart from a few individuals who, like him, couldn't read the atmosphere, all the ascended spirit peak masters gathered near the Principal Peak had now separated into two distinct parties. One party consisted of those whose surname was Zhao, the other of those whose surname wasn't Zhao.

Nominally, the Xuanyin Mountains had "thirty-six peaks," but in reality this was an approximation. Not every mountaintop had a master. There were also positions that were empty after the original peak master had passed away, waiting to be allotted to a new ascended spirit. Apart from that, there were still three or four people of the Li clan's lineage who always kept their peaks sealed; normally, unless there was a summons by the high elders, they wouldn't go out to get in on the fun. Excluding these, as well as those who happened to be in seclusion right now, there were around twenty ascended spirit peak masters who had come over.

All nine of the Zhao family peak masters were present; the two parties were practically evenly matched—the Zhaos were obviously more highly strung, while the other party had people of Lin Chi's ilk, who didn't know what was going on, mixed in.

Xi Ping glanced at the field along with Lin Chi, thinking that if the proportions of inner sect peak masters were like this, then the proportions of the disciples under them would be about the same, and the same for the walkers in the mortal world in the outer sect.

Was there...going to be a mutiny?

“Peak Master Lin,” Xi Ping dryly advised amid the atmosphere thick with the promise of battle, “I think you should stay away from them.”

There was no need for him to give this advice. Without another word, Lin Chi ran away without so much as a look back. “Are they really going to fight with members of their own sect?”

Xi Ping was silent for a moment. “All inner sect peak masters have their dignity. They won’t necessarily come to blows after a single disagreement. There may be a deadlock for a few days. But...”

“What?” said Lin Chi.

Xi Ping slowly said, “I’m afraid that the Dignitary of Rule may have sealed the mountains too late.”

He tried to probe as far outward as possible with his consciousness, calling his shizun in his mind.

Shifu, how are you?

The Dignitary of Fate has gone to the East Sea. If the shard of Zhaoting you’ve left behind really is in my body, have him bring it back. Maybe Master Lin can think of a way to repair it.

You look after yourself. You can't even keep accounts right, how can you have attention to spare to fret so much? Don't pay attention to them, and don't pay attention to me, either, okay?

But the demon seal was already back in place and the fetters were upon him. He had no way to make shifu hear him.

Xi Ping's crow's mouth had uttered a prophecy—when Zhao Yin had thrown off the Vitex Branch and flown toward the Latent Cultivation Temple, there had already been Zhao peak masters stealthily sending out the news.

Xuanyin Mountain's Heavenly Questions connected the inner and outer sects and fell under the protection of the great mountain array; you could mention the true name on an ascended spirit or shed skin's spiritual image without being noticed. The great mountain array was no one's private property; according to regulations, a Heavenly Question could only be used for official business.

But Xuanyin's big families all had private Heavenly Questions and could contact their forebears in the inner sect to get word as soon as something happened.

The Zhao family's Heavenly Question instantly spread through Xuanyin's inner and outer sects. Like wild wind and driving rain, it caused chaos in the human world.

Pang Jian had said he was going to the Marquis Manor to wish the old lady a happy birthday, but he didn't make it. He was buried under news coming in from Heaven's Design Pavilion branches all over the country.

"A wind with no origin flew out of Xuanyin Mountain's Latent Cultivation Temple. While passing through Lanchuan, it rang the evil-expelling bells."

"When the wind passed Canglang, it sent stones flying and rang the evil-expelling bells."

"Ning'an is experiencing torrential rains. There are abnormalities in the spiritual energy of the Ning'an Zhao clan. They have shut their doors and won't come out."

"Zhao Wei, Zhao Qishan, and others of Guzhou's north branch have stolen immortal tools and are slaughtering fellow sect members!"

The incident had taken place behind a screen, but the disaster was spreading throughout the country.

Once again, Guzhou was the first to see upheaval, the same as five years ago. This damn place must have been cursed.

In the North Guzhou branch of Heaven's Design Pavilion, two half-immortals surnamed Zhao had "gone mad" without warning, stealing what was entrusted to their care, moving a large quantity of immortal tools without authorization. Of the walkers in the mortal world who had been guarding the storehouse that day and came first to assist when they heard the noise, one was dead and another gravely injured.

Evil cultivators were all desperate criminals. The walkers in the mortal world contended against them in wits and strength year in and year out; colleagues and comrades-in-arms trusted each other to fight back-to-back and guard each other's lives. Attacking a fellow sect member could be called deranged.

When the commander of the North Guzhou branch received the news, he flew into a rage and issued warrants for their arrest—dead or alive.

Karma beasts followed residual spiritual energy to chase down the Zhao family branch in Guzhou. The Zhao family tree was big and deep-rooted; apart from the main family in Jinping, its kinsmen were spread throughout Great Wan. Nearly each province had a branch of the Zhao family; such was their power. The commander of the north branch, out of his mind with anger, wanted to launch a search at once; how could the Guzhou Zhao family with their lofty aspirations be willing to comply with this? The two sides came to blows at once. Immortal tools and downgraded immortal tools flew wildly, unexpectedly exposing the unregistered cultivators that the Guzhou Zhao family had been supporting in private.

If these weren't evil cultivators, then who was!?

North Guzhou requested support from other branches of Heaven's Design Pavilion, but this matter was difficult to handle everywhere. There were too many Zhaos among the walkers in the mortal world. At this clash in Guzhou, all the other branches, whether there was anything the matter or not, began to split apart and stretch taut.

Just as Pang Jian was facing this pressure, on the night of the tenth day of the seventh month, a gale blew into Jinping City.

Rickshaws carrying people ran along Jinping City's newly constructed carriage roads. The rickshaw pullers, facing into the wind, were so tired they panted for breath like oxen; their drunken pleasure-seeking customers were slapped by the furious evil wind and opened their eyes in confusion.

In Heaven's Design Pavilion's head office, the calendar block wavered wildly between the states of "clear" and "windy." The dozing karma beasts all stood up with their fur bristling.

Before Pang Jian could work out precisely what the trouble was in Guzhou, he heard that the Suling Heaven's Design Pavilion branch couldn't be contacted—the commander of the Suling Heaven's Design Pavilion branch was related to the Zhao family by marriage!

The wild wind that had reached Jinping swept over Heaven's Design Pavilion's head office. The bronze evil-expelling bells on the eaves rang with a crash.

Pang Jian's heart tensed, but the evil-expelling bells only rang once. Then the tongueless bronze bells seemed to hesitate over whether to ring or not, only shaking with a rustle, like ominous chatter.

"General commander!"

A blue-clothed walker in the mortal world flew straight into the courtyard. "The Heart Tower's Captain Zhao has disappeared!"

Pang Jian said, "Didn't I tell all of you to keep an eye on him?"

“Yes, general commander,” said the blue-clotheser, “but he had an unregistered immortal tool from the inner sect...”

Pang Jian waved a hand and interrupted him. There was no time for explanations. “The Azure Dragon Towers cannot go unattended. Go to the Yongning Marquis Manor and call Xi Yue, tell him to go oversee the Azure Dragon Heart Tower for me. Report to the court and find some brothers at once to enter the palace and protect His Majesty. Surround Jinping’s Zhao family, activate all the city defense arrays in Jinping. Call everyone from the Kaiming Department you can get to come assist, and also...”

“Yes, general commander?”

Pang Jian deliberated for a moment, then said grimly, “Send a letter to Prince...send a letter to Bai Ling. No matter what that bunch of Luwu shit-stirrers are doing, have them suspend it and return to calm the situation!”

The walker in the mortal world gave an affirmative and left.

Pang Jian took a deep breath and took from his mustard seed a box of established foundation pills and his protective talisman—the voucher Zhi Xiu had written for him when he had entered Heaven’s Design Pavilion. He used this action to calm himself down, then put the things away.

General Commander Pang hadn't spent a hundred years in Heaven's Design Pavilion for nothing. Apart from the news that came in on the surface, he had in fact also received two horrifying secret letters; he didn't know whether they were true or false.

“There is a rumor that the inner sect has been sealed; the circumstances of this are unknown.”

“There is word that the Dignitary of Rites High Elder has passed away!”

A shed skin elder passing away—if that were true...if that were true...

Pang Jian shuddered. In the thousands of years since Great Wan's spiritual mountains had formed and the nation had been founded, this was unheard of.

Hadn't the matter in the East Sea been put down five years ago?

When Xi Yue received the order, he was sitting alone in the gate house of the Marquis Manor.

The old lady's birthday feast had broken up, and all the guests had taken their leave. Apart from the opera still being sung in the rear courtyard, the manor had quieted down. Xi Yue had sent the servant standing watch at the gate house to rest and was reading a book of arrays by lamplight; halfway through the night, he hadn't turned a single page, and he had curled a corner of the page into garlic skin.

When he sensed that someone was approaching flying a sword, Xi Yue abruptly raised his head. Before joy could appear on his face, he got a clear look at the newcomer's sapphire robe, and the look in his eyes dimmed.

After hearing the blue-clotheser's message, Xi Yue, as usual, didn't say a word, only gave a calm and collected nod. Then he took out a handful of spiritual stones and quickly laid a circle of arrays inside and outside of the Marquis Manor. But when he came to lay arrays at the side door, he saw the Marquis standing there alone.

The Marquis of Yongning's hair was grey, but his back was still upright. His glorious youth had passed, but his charm still remained. The night wind violently whipped his wide sleeves around. He had his head raised, looking toward the top of the wall over the side door.

Xi Yue walked over and bowed to the Marquis.

The Marquis of Yongning didn't turn his head. Without preamble, he said, "Every time your useless big brother came back in the middle of the night after fooling around, he would only dare to use the side door. I'd be waiting here with servants to catch him. I got him every time....but not today. I'm afraid he won't be coming.”

Xi Yue's long brows shook slightly. His calm expression nearly faltered.

“You have something to do, right?” The Marquis turned—he only seemed a touch elderly when he moved, his movements not as firm as before. He patted Xi Yue on the shoulder. “Go on...go on. I was thinking that this evil wind doesn't smell right. Take care of yourself, send word home when you're through to let us know you're safe, okay? Don't grow up to be like that scoundrel...”

Xi Yue was just about to say something when he suddenly sensed a peculiar spiritual energy fluctuation.

The half-puppet's sustenance was spiritual stones; he was far more sensitive to spiritual energy than humans...or even ordinary cultivators. He abruptly raised his head and saw that all the spiritual energy in Jinping City was rapidly converging on a single place—Guangyun Palace!

Xi Yue didn't have time to say anything more. He unloaded his mustard seed, pushed the downgraded immortal tools he had collected over the years toward the Marquis all at once, and hurried toward the convergence of spiritual energy, but he was cut off midway by Pang Jian.

Pang Jian grabbed the half-puppet one-handed by the back of the neck, easily lifting this body that was one third lighter than a mortal with the same physique. He pushed him in the direction of the Heart Tower. “I told you to go oversee the Azure Dragon Towers. Don’t come this way, there’s someone violating the rules and establishing a foundation in the mortal world!”

There was a pop as the wild wind shattered a gas lamp. Heavy clouds appeared above Guangyun Palace, with lightning faintly flicking through them.

Zhao Yu, the captain of the Azure Dragon Heart Tower, was inside the imperial treasury in Guangyun Palace. He had put the final fragment of the Mount Fu Mirage Drawing in place—the current emperor was restrained and frugal; his only hobby was collecting ornaments and ancient artworks. When the previous emperor had been living, he hadn’t dared to, but since succeeding to the throne he had relaxed slightly, and the flatterers all knew about it and frequently hunted high and low for him. This painting fragment was one of the items from Jingzhou’s tribute for this year.

To mortal eyes, this was only an antique worth a bit of money. After admiring it a few times, Zhou Huan had tossed it into the imperial treasury. Though it would have been easy for Zhao Yu to infiltrate the emperor’s treasury, he had never dared to act—Prince Zhuang knew that he was looking for this painting.

Fortunately, the heavens were on his side; Prince Zhuang hadn't returned to the capital.

Zhao Yu took a deep breath and used his spiritual energy to assemble the torn up pieces. When the spiritual energy swept over the thousand-year-old ancient painting, the light and shadow drawn in it began to flow. On misty Mount Fu, monstrous shadows flickered. The whole painting “came alive”; he had taken possession of this master's vital weapon. Zhao Yu took several deep breaths, took out the established foundation pill he had prepared, and swallowed it.

He couldn't delay any longer. Word had come from the inner sect that the Zhao family's sky—the Dignitary of Rites High Elder—had fallen. This would be the whole Zhao clan's great tribulation. The old forebears had told them to prepare for this. Anyone who could establish a foundation should do so and not stint on the spiritual stones they normally kept hidden.

There were many downgraded immortal tools in the palace, and a great deal of blue jade in the emperor's treasury, which Zhao Yu absorbed in one gulp. He didn't even spare the elixirs and medicinal herbs that the nobles used for keeping in good health.

His consciousness became unprecedentedly fierce. It swept out from Guangyun Palace. Heaven's Design Pavilion's blue-clothed half-immortals, just arriving, all toppled off their swords as soon as they encountered him. For a time, Zhao Yu had the impression that the whole human world was only a painting, and he was suspended high above the canvas and could have complete power over it as soon as he took up his brush!

Jinping...

The next moment, he quickly located the emperor Zhou Huan in the "painting."

With a single thought, the established foundation cultivator had already cheated his way beside the new emperor, who had been startled awake by the wild wind!

Just then, an arrow that seemed to be carrying flames pierced Zhao Yu's outstretched hand. The arrow passed by the mortal emperor, leaving the stupefied Zhou Huan unharmed.

Pang Jian gave a long whistle. Several blue-clothesers landed around Zhao Yu, closely surrounding him.

Zhao Yu swung his hand slightly, and the palm that had been pierced by the Barrier Dispeller Bow healed on its own. “General commander.”

“Zhao Yu.” First Pang Jian protected the mortals with a mustard seed, then turned to his former colleague with his hands behind his back. “You joined Heaven’s Design Pavilion just after I did. We were both taught by Elder Su himself and can be considered veterans now. Not having received an invitation, you have established a foundation in the mortal world without authorization and nearly injured a mortal. That is a crime.”

Zhao Yu smiled. “Lord Pang, don’t play dumb. I know you’re very canny. Don’t you know what has happened in the inner sect? What has happened to the Zhao clan all over the country?”

Pang Jian said, “What does that have to do with you? Your Zhao family’s kinsmen and relations by marriage are everywhere. Never mind Guzhou—not even the Ning’an Zhao family can lay a claim to you through nine degrees of kinship. Have you gone mad?”

Having heard this, Zhao Yu only laughed. “What do you know?”

This Pang Jian was only a carefree watchdog whose parents had been bumpkins from some unknown mountain village, nothing you would find in a genealogical record or on an ancestral tomb. His whole life, his field of vision had been confined to the mortal world. He was the same as that Su Zhun, nominally part of Xuanyin's outer sect, but in reality unable to even find the door to the immortal mountains.

The mushroom that grows in the morning doesn't know the passage of time. He couldn't understand what a "shed skin" meant to a family.

"It is pointless to speak further." Zhao Yu shook his head. "I know you have many tricks and have gone above your grade to kill an established foundation more than once. Come and give it a try."

No sooner had he spoken than the two of them were already somewhere else. Pang Jian dropped into the earth without warning and emerged where Zhao Yu had just been standing. Zhao Yu had known what he would do. As soon as Pang Jian showed his head, his spiritual sense was touched; he felt as if everything around him had been gently twisted by an invisible hand. An abyss appeared behind the emperor, whom he had shielded with his mustard seed. Alarm appeared on Zhou Huan's face. He was about to fall.

In the space of a breath, Pang Jian located Zhao Yu, but all the talismans he tossed out were dispelled in midair one after another by Zhao Yu.

The other blue-clothesers were quite well-coordinated. Some went to protect Zhou Huan, and some cooperated with Pang Jian. But presently the mountains and mists of the Mount Fu Mirage Drawing emerged around them, and Zhao Yu easily enclosed them all in the painting.

All the established foundations they had gone above their grade to kill before had been evil cultivators. Despite having high cultivation and their own magic powers, their resources were limited, after all, unable to match up to Heaven's Design Pavilion, which had a yearly supply of weapons from Moon Plated Peak. But this didn't apply to Zhao Yu. After standing shoulder to shoulder to defend the Azure Dragon Towers for a hundred years, the walkers in the mortal world knew each other's cultivation and tricks better than they knew their own; when they fought, it was simply like the left hand wrestling with the right hand—and the left hand had just taken a strengthening pill!

At the same time, all of Heaven's Design Pavilion's branches activated their local city defense inscriptions. News of the Zhao clan's mutiny floated toward the capital city like snowflakes; in Xuanyin's inner sect, which was sealed up tight, the two forces at the Principal Peak had temporarily been fairly calm when Lin Chi had seen them before. He returned to Moon Plated Peak and hid for a day, then finally couldn't resist Xi Ping's repeated urgings anymore and quietly snuck out. He had just flown up behind Flying Jade Peak by a detour when a huge sound came from the Principal Peak. The blue luan's feather's nearly fell off from fright.

After a two-day standoff, they had begun to fight after all.

CHAPTER 90 - Traveler Abroad (7)

The chaos was like flying sparks, exploding throughout the country. Three major provincial seats fell out of contact one after another. The Guzhou Heaven's Design Pavilion and the local Zhao family branch fought heedlessly, triggering a local earthquake that warped a section of track between Guzhou and the capital, stopping all the Cloud Soaring Flood Dragons loaded with people or goods on their way. The summer heat of the south, which had yet to fade, quickly melted the ice; stinking sea fish covered the ground, and the fish sellers raged without daring to speak.

Soon, even Yuzhou by the border was affected. The part of Xi Ping's consciousness that was with Xu Rucheng "saw" it. Spiritual energy scattered everywhere as the half-immortals began to fight; the arrays surrounding the Moon Plated Gold gold smelters all encountered interference, and countless factories were forced to stop work. The people, like insects smelling the soil before a storm, all found somewhere to hide. The fishing boats and steamships on the Xia River all vanished overnight.

"Are all these Zhaos deranged?" Xi Ping had seen the madness inside the sect and outside of it. "Are you going to tell me that all the ones who joined the inner sect were using Zhao Yin's Way of the Heart, so the whole family is committing suicide because his heart broke?"

“In fact, the majority of them were.” Lin Chi stabilized the blue luan and sighed. “That’s why there are comparatively more ascended spirits from the Zhao clan.”

Xi Ping: “Tsk.”

No wonder. Mass-produced factory goods.

Lin Chi took another glance at the ascended spirit battlefield near the Principal Peak. He said, “The Dignitary of Code Elder Li Fengshan’s Way of the Heart didn’t shatter. The elder is still living, only nominally ‘in seclusion’, confined for a thousand years. But on that account, the Li clan, as well as the Zhang, Qi, Wu, and Tang families attached to the Li clan, all collapsed. The Dignitary of Rites Elder passing away is even more serious. We can’t know at present why Elder Zhao went mad and his Way of the Heart burst, but even after his death, the remnants of his soul were dispelled by the Bell of Tribulation. That isn’t very glorious, after all. They’re afraid.”

Xi Ping said, “Afraid of what? The Crown Pr...the emperor’s mother is named Zhang, isn’t she, but it didn’t keep her from becoming the Dowager Empress. The previous emperor was so fierce, but even he didn’t cut down just anyone.”

Lin Chi paused. “Though it isn’t stated in writing, the sect has tacitly agreed that since then, the descendants of those five families will no longer take part in Xuanyin’s Grand Selection. They’ve come to the end of the road at sunset.”

Xi Ping gave a laugh when he heard this. “Peak Master Lin, not being allowed to cultivate is the same as ‘coming to the end of the road at sunset’? So it would seem that all of you immortals know that at the feet of the immortal mountains, being human is no better than being a dog? Here I thought you all thought pretty highly of yourselves.”

Lin Chi never disputed with people. He only said, “Alas, you’re right.”

Xi Ping had failed to pick a fight, but they were already near Flying Jade Peak. While he knew perfectly well that shifu couldn’t hear him, he still shut up, swallowing all his radicalism and sarcasm. Holding his breath, he turned to go scratch at his san-ge’s spirit.

Zhou Ying had just received Bai Ling’s message when he heard Xi Ping say, “San-ge, there are too many Zhaos in Heaven’s Design Pavilion. Can’t you bury your kills?”

“Within their capacity to provide support, the Kaiming Department can obey Pang Wenchang’s orders, but don’t move the Luwu.” Zhou Ying, temporarily trapped in the East Sea by the shed skin consciousnesses, evenly responded to both of them at the same time. He said, “The Zhao family has come to a dead end. It’s hard to guarantee that they won’t request foreign aid. Shu, Li, and Chu are three wolves watching from the sidelines, just waiting to come lap up the leftovers. I’m not doing this for their benefit.”

Xi Ping froze, suddenly realizing that san-ge had perhaps anticipated this situation.

Zhou Ying asked Bai Ling, “Pang Jian’s Way of the Heart and spiritual bones are all complete, and his natural endowments are one in a million—is he still unwilling to establish a foundation? Is he that poor?”

In Guangyun Palace, Pang Jian said, “Damn it.”

In a flash, he shielded the emperor, and a monstrous claw reaching out from the Mirage Drawing nearly tore a hole in his chest. A karma beast emerged from the subtle embroidery on the front of his blue robes. It opened its mouth and roared, and the monstrous claw only cut a hole in Pang Jian’s outer robe. The karma beast vanished, and the “monstrous claw” turned into a flabby human hand—Pang Jian’s Way of the Heart was “barrier dispelling”; he already knew that the monsters in the Mount Fu Mirage Drawing were all mortals Zhao Yu had snatched up at random, so he had been increasingly overcautious since the fight had begun. He would have been better off if he hadn't seen!

Zhao Yu understood him too well.

“General commander!”

At a critical moment, a walker in the mortal world tossed a mustard seed to him. Pang Jian remembered that this child was named Zhou Xi; it was said that he was...what, Zhou Ying's little brother, with the same father. It was fucking unbelievable.

Pang Jian said, “What's this?”

“There are spiritual stones in the mustard seed, and established foundation pills!” Zhou Xi hauled his terrified big brother the emperor away and called to Pang Jian, “The Zhao family wants to take advantage of their numbers to seize Great Wan before the immortal mountains can respond, force the immortal mountains to come to terms! General Commander Pang, everyone says you're just a step away from establishing a foundation. A time of emergency means you can act without authorization. Stop hesitating!”

“A time of emergency means you can act without authorization.” Pang Jian spat these words out and showed his snow-white teeth in a sneer. He tossed back the mustard seed. “Little brat, that’s just what the mutinying Zhaos all think.”

No sooner had he spoken than the Mount Fu Mirage Drawing enshrouded them. An established foundation cultivator’s talismans, obviously a level higher, came toward him head on like snowflakes. Arrays rose one after another on all sides, swapping with matchless speed between reality and illusion. Zhao Yu crushed Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s token. His vital weapon, the Panguan Brush, shot out without warning, pointed at Pang Jian’s back.

Like a leopard, Pang Jian crouched down and nimbly dodged. Then, he took advantage of the instant the painting swapped truth and falsehood to escape it. Before he hit the ground, using his body as a bow, he shot an arrow!

With an astral wind coming at him head-on, Zhao Yu gave an angry shout. Relying on his cultivation level, he dispelled the arrow by force.

“Before, I couldn’t match up to you,” Zhao Yu said with a cold laugh. At this moment, he felt that the ancient Mount Fu Mirage Drawing had completely merged with his spiritual foundation. The vast ancient inheritance inside it washed down his meridians, which had widened a hundredfold. “But one person’s strength can defeat ten people’s skills!”

“Fine, you’re a man of integrity.” Far away, beneath the Resurrection Vortex, Zhou Ying directed a taunt at Jinping’s most steadfast protector.

At the same time, Bai Ling’s scrupulously exact handwriting suddenly flashed before Pang Jian’s eyes. Bai Ling wrote: The Kaiming Department will cooperate however it can, but the borders are insecure, and the Luwu cannot get away. We will send General Commander Pang another helper. Receive him and put him to good use.

A helper—who?

Pang Jian didn’t know what he meant at first. He thought, If Zhou Ying dares to say the “helper” is his dim-witted little brother Zhou Xi, when I get through with this, I’ll go knock down his manor!

Then he saw the rapidly approaching Zhao Yu stop less than half a chi from him as if a freezing spell had been cast on him. Suddenly, he no longer moved.

For a moment, Zhao Yu’s eyeballs seemed to get stuck. Then they began to move once more. He smiled at Pang Jian.

Pang Jian: “...”

What was wrong with him?

At the center of Zhao Yu's brow, the Mount Fu Mirage Drawing flashed. The demons and monsters, as well as the fog and the fake mountains, all disappeared. The palace maids and eunuchs that Zhao Yu had snatched up fell unconscious all over the floor. Because Pang Jian had been unwilling to use force in fighting back, these mortals were all completely uninjured.

A corner of the wretched drawing peeled off and turned into a paperman when it landed. The paperman bowed urbanely toward Pang Jian, then disappeared between Zhao Yu's brows along with the drawing.

Zhao Yu became calm and composed. With perfect etiquette, he said to Zhou Huan, "This subject is guilty of frightening His Majesty."

Having said this, before His Majesty could respond, a stream of thin smoke came from his palm, knocking His Majesty down without explanation.

Only then did Pang Jian, who was staring dumbfounded, come back to himself. "You're... Bai Ling?"

"Zhao Yu" smiled at him. "Not exactly. I am still Zhao Yu. But earlier, I didn't look closely when I established my foundation. The vital weapon I incorporated had a substitute paperman mixed into it, and I inadvertently fused that paperman with my spiritual foundation.”

He was actually still using Zhao Yu’s identity and tone to speak!

This scene was beyond description. The whole crowd of walkers in the mortal world collectively broke out in gooseflesh.

Bai Ling’s appearance was gaunt and upright—upright as in honorable. When he wasn’t speaking, he hardly had any sense of presence. Even his handwriting was somewhat more solemn than usual. He exuded austerity, an absence of selfish desire.

This was Pang Jian’s first time finding that as soon as he swapped that extremely ascetic face for a different one, that deeply concealed, peculiar evil air in Bai Ling’s bearing and manner was revealed... It was chillingly demonic!

Pang Jian calmed himself down. “What vital weapon?”

“Zhao Yu” said, smiling, “The Way of the Heart I have been gathering was in a weapon known as the Mount Fu Mirage Drawing. Six years ago, while investigating the case of the sleep paralysis imps, I came to see His Third Highness. His Highness treated me as a friend from the first. He bestowed a painting fragment upon me on the spot. Now I have borrowed the final painting fragment from the Jingzhou tribute, putting it all together.”

Pang Jian was disbelieving. “Zhou Ying pulled such a big trick back then, and Zhao Yu didn’t...wait...you didn’t know? Damn it, my tongue is all tied up in knots. What the hell are you supposed to be, anyway?”

“I am the established foundation cultivator Zhao Yu, who takes his orders from a paperman,” “Zhao Yu” answered evenly. “Nothing was done to the painting fragment from six years ago. For one thing, His Highness was still a mortal then, and Bai Ling had yet to establish a foundation. Second, it was a chance encounter between strangers; of course I had to take precautions. The paperman was stuck to the final painting fragment. I spent nearly sixty years searching for fragments of that ancient painting; the matter wasn’t urgent. Since His Highness knew about the Way of the Heart I was seeking, with him in the way, naturally I wouldn’t act rashly. Unless it was perfectly safe or my hand was forced, I wouldn’t come here to take it. Taking without asking, and from the imperial palace at that—naturally I was both happy and guilty when I saw the ancient painting come together and neglected to take a close look at it. That can be excused from the standpoint of emotion, no? Evidently it is true that for all tasks, the last bit is the hardest to complete.”

The top of Pang Jian's skull rattled as he listened to this. He gasped. "Don't say that it was your prince who arranged for that painting to come to the palace."

Zhao Yu smiled without answering; since he had been told not to say it, he wasn't going to say it.

Pang Jian: "..."

Selling the painting to a flatterer to make money under false pretenses and having it delivered to the palace, enticing Zhao Yu to come to the imperial treasury to steal it...even the spiritual stones Zhao Yu had spent to establish his foundation had come at his older brother's expense!

However you figured it, Zhou Ying had been taking advantage at both ends!

No, the fact that he had started burying his pieces so long ago showed that Zhou Ying had expected this upheaval.

When a great family revolted, there would be internal strife in Heaven's Design Pavilion; they would be at a loose end. Reaching an impasse, they would have no choice but to request help from the independent Kaiming Department; the Kaiming Department would have a chance to expand!

Pang Jian remembered a type of oil poplar in the Land of Turmoil. The stronger a wildfire, the more obvious its fire resistant superiority became. While the plants around it were in tatters, it could take the opportunity to expand. It was said that sometimes the tree would even attract lightning to come set fire to the forest. With just one spark, it could sooner or later spread over a whole mountain!

Pang Jian said, “Zhou Ying, are you even human?!”

When would heaven open its eyes and send a bolt of lightning to take care of this great calamity? He was willing to be a vegetarian for ten years—he would even give up the Phoenix’s Perch Pavilion’s duck!

“I will certainly pass that on for you, general commander, if I have the chance.” Saying so, Zhao Yu raised his head. This established foundation body, which had merged a substitute paperman with its spiritual foundation, earnestly perused its memories, then said with a sigh, “Alas, as is to be expected, my family is rigidly stratified. Currently, the branch families everywhere will follow the directions of the main family in Jinping. No wonder I was in such a rush to establish a foundation.”

Pang Jian’s head ached. “Bai-xiong...no, Paper-xiong, have a heart, can’t you speak more normally?”

“As you command.” The paperman-controlled Zhao Yu shook his sleeve, and a Heavenly Question flew out of his clothes. “Then I will ask for everyone’s cooperation in playing dead. I’ll say that Jinping has already been taken. Let’s see what secrets this deep-rooted famous family has, and how it is any different from some nobodies on the point of death.”

The city of Jinping was mysteriously sealed.

The wild wind swept by, smashed the glass of around ten gas lamps on both sides of the Lingyang River, broke a few plaques that hadn’t been hung up properly, and left Jinping City completely unharmed as it headed toward the East Sea.

Zhou Ying had not only cut down the tree, he had also laid a net under the tree, waiting to catch the fleeing monkeys and all the wealth they had accumulated over many years in one fell swoop.

Without showing his face, he had the Zhaos coming and going.

Xi Ping looked on, feeling that the Impassable Sea’s false master had been nameless and faceless, wrapped in mystery, but in fact he had only been a glutton who couldn’t fill himself up in eight hundred years; his “premature birth” had made a big commotion, but he’d croaked before even breaking the surface of the water. The Impassable Sea’s true master had his name attached to the Xuanyin Mountains and could collect spiritual stones, elixirs, and immortal tools from Xuanyin at regular intervals; he had quietly put down roots in the human world.

Fortunately...fortunately san-ge was human, not a demon.

Just then, Rosy Cloud Peak's Peak Master Wen Fei landed at the foot of Flying Jade Peak. Xi Ping collected his consciousness and waited to hear this medicine-making expert's brilliant views.

Wen Fei glanced indifferently at the fight on the Principal Peak. His eyes didn't pause there. He opened his fan and quickly swept a line of writing onto the foot of the snow-capped mountain: Just a trivial matter among ascended spirits. Let them fight it out. There is no need for you to exert yourself. Mind your own business.

Xi Ping said, Peak Master Wen is right!

His wave of the fan raised thin snow on the mountain, as if someone had sighed.

Wen Fei continued to wield his fan: Zhi Jingzhai, I'm warning you, I've been keeping an eye on the mists of Flying Jade Peak, and there are signs of burnout. If you struggle again, I'd like to see whether you reach a shed skin first or die first. Isn't Zhaoting your vital weapon? Where did you put it? You aren't dead yet, can't you pick up the shards of your sword?!

Xi Ping said, What?!

But Wen Fei was standing too close now. Lin Chi couldn't hear it when Xi Ping spoke.

Xi Ping would have loved to climb out of the reincarnation wood and kick Peak Master Wen down the cliff—you can't even talk, and you're keeping me from talking by standing there. All you can do is get in the way!

Lin Chi looked up at Flying Jade Peak and said to Wen Fei, "Have you looked through your stock of pills?"

Wen Fei nodded helplessly. It's no use. These sword cultivators are like beasts of burden. They have nothing to do with talismans, arrays, inscriptions, elixirs, or tools. Any pill is only an aid for them. Moreover, the boundary he's reached isn't one I can comprehend. I think we'll have to rely on you if we want to save him.

"Zhaoting shattered for a reason. He stepped over a major boundary in the space of a breath, so the body of the sword could no longer sustain his sword aura. Even if we took all the shards and restored the sword to its original form, I'm afraid it would break again if he picked it up... Otherwise, I don't think General Zhi would have gone so far as to abandon Zhaoting and enter seclusion on his own despite getting only half the results for twice the effort.”

Wen Fei shook his fan: So in your opinion, would it help to knock him down a level?

Xi Ping, forced to keep his mouth shut, felt the roots of his teeth begin to itch. Bullshit, what was this rotten mute thinking?!

Lin Chi said, “Don’t joke.”

Careful, his disciple is listening.

Wen Fei considered at length, then used his fan to say: I remember now. I heard that before Sanyue’s Xiuluo sword was repaired, it was also only an incomplete broken sword. The sword aura of that ancient god’s sword was extremely aggressive, nothing that Xiang Zhao could be a match for. But precisely because the sword was incomplete, there was latitude for Xiang Zhao to refine it into his own vital weapon, and the man and the sword made do together after that, so Zhi Jingzhai and Zhaoting will certainly be able to! You’re right, Zhaoting shattered for a reason. It’s just as well it’s missing a piece—perhaps he’ll be able to refine it anew!

Seeing these words, the bleak misery resurged on Lin Chi’s face. “It isn’t Zhaoting that’s the problem, it’s me. I’m only a by-the-book...”

Wen Fei saw that he had accidentally caused Lin Chi to cast himself into despair and hastily tried to backtrack: No, that's not what I meant. Hey, right, I heard that back then, when that...great master repaired Xiuluo, she used a divine tool to forge the sword.

Lin Chi said, "The Unbound⁶³ Furnace."

Wen Fei wrote: Right, right, where is that thing?

Lin Chi was silent for a moment, then nodded and said, "The Unbound Furnace was hers. After she...left, it fell into the hands of Southern He's Lancang Sword Sect. After Lancang was destroyed, Dongheng took the Unbound Furnace away on the basis that it had originally belonged to Western Chu. It must be at Sanyue now."

Wen Fei wrote, I heard that that divine tool can make you one with heaven, let you perceive the Way beyond the highest heavens. Do you think there's any hope in using it to repair Zhaoting?

Xi Ping's ears pricked back up.

Lin Chi shook his head. "I...I don't know, I'm not worthy of using the Unbound Furnace..."

Wen Fei wrote, If you aren't worthy, then is that bunch of toads lusting after swan meat at Sanyue, who would force a woman into marriage, worthy?

Xi Ping said, Wen-shishu is right!

His consciousness impatiently ran off, half back to Tao County, half to Zhou Ying. "San-ge, I need a favor!"

For a dazed moment, it was as if he had returned to that time when he had gotten up to mischief in Demon Country, wasted all his spiritual stones, and written a letter bemoaning his poverty and asking for money.

San-ge would take him home, and with some work, he would be able to "write letters" to his old grandmother again, would be able to see the all seasons garden at the Marquis Manor whenever he wanted.

For some reason, though the Yongning Marquis Manor was clearly only a small compound in the mortal world without divine beings or divine instruments inside it, though it couldn't rescue him from the Impassable Sea or let him shed his skin and become a god overnight, without fear of the Bell of Tribulation or the Silver Moon, it could still give him an unusual sense of confidence in himself.

As though so long as his soul was placed there, there would be no mountain he couldn't climb, no place he couldn't go.

If only he wanted it, Dongheng's Sanyue's Unbound Furnace could also be his.

CHAPTER 91 - Traveler Abroad (8)

Zhou Ying very patiently finished listening to Xi Ping, then asked with a slightly peculiar expression, “When you were in Western Chu’s Tao County, did you see the Silver Moon with your own eyes?”

“I did,” said Xi Ping, “don’t mention it. I nearly got caught and sent off by that opera singer.”

Zhou Ying: “...”

He couldn’t quite tell whether this brat had finally learned to avoid the name of a shed skin or whether he was purely being loose-tongued.

He had seen the might of the Silver Moon and brushed shoulders with Xuanwu, yet he still dared to think like this... Amazing.

Fair enough. It was just like when he had only recently opened his spiritual eyes and knew fewer talismans than the disciples at the Latent Cultivation Temple, yet had dared to steal an offering from the mouths of the demon host and engage in a battle of wits against the heart demon at the bottom of the Impassable Sea. Now, having narrowly escaped death, he was still fearless, daring to hang around the Xuanyin Mountains right in front of the shed skin elders who had nearly killed him.

Zhou Ying sighed toward the thin smoke in the Riverward. “No matter what, I never should have let you accept that selection card.”

Xi Ping thought, If I hadn’t accepted the selection card, I wouldn’t have had a chance to go to the southern mines, and I certainly never would have found the Impassable Sea. Who would have fished up your spiritual bones? You’d be dead by now.

So he calmly took this as san-ge praising him.

Xi Ping added, “I’ll ask Lin Chi to think of something to do for disguises. There’s no need for the junk his passel of nominal disciples turns out—the skins Xu Rucheng and the others wear can only fool common evil cultivators. They’ll be easily seen through if they meet a master.”

Zhou Ying frowned. “Since when are you so familiar with the Golden Hand?”

“Everyone loves me,” Xi Ping said flippantly. “Of course it’s because he wants the Unbound Furnace even more than I do. If not for the fact that he can’t keep up in a conversation, he might even want to go himself.”

In an insipid tone, Zhou Ying poured a bucket of cold water over him. “This is so you can repair your shifu’s broken sword and help him become a shed skin? A word of warning to you. While ascended spirits are called ‘people among the high heavens’, they’re still ‘people’ in the end. At the shed skin level...well. Your luck is unusually bad. Thus far, you’ve seen quite a few shed skins. Has any one of them seemed human to you? They are bound by the Way of Heaven. They have practically become a portion of heavenly law. The one who leaves seclusion in a hundred years won’t necessarily be the person you know. If your old acquaintance changes beyond recognition and you regret it, don’t come crying.”

Without so much as thinking about it, Xi Ping said, “What would I have to regret? That’s his business.”

Zhou Ying paused.

“When it comes to lecturing on doctrine, imparting knowledge, dispelling doubts, my shizun...well, while he’s not really any good at teaching, he’s still protecting me even though Zhaoting has shattered. Shifu hasn’t let me down,” Xi Ping said. “As for whether he wants to merge his way with heaven and earth, what stage he wants to reach, whether he decides to keep his eyes closed or never open his mouth in the future, that’s for him to take up with his Way of the Heart. Shifu didn’t interfere no matter what classics I departed from or what orthodoxies I rebelled against. Can I control what he does? Anyway, that's all a question for later. Haven't we come upon the chance of lifetime here? It would be pointless not to take it. San-ge, don't you think it would be a pity to waste this opportunity?"

Zhou Ying was trapped in the Resurrection Vortex. Hearing this scoundrel say "It would be pointless not to take it," his chest began to hurt immediately. "Scram."

"Great! Then it's settled, san-ge." Xi Ping took advantage of his weakness. "I'll go consult with Master Lin!"

Zhou Ying: "..."

Xi Ping had been gone for many years and had become like a dragon's reverse scale.⁶⁴ Even a gust of wind could incite the vicious dragon's fury. Apart from when he was ruminating over his revenge, Zhou Ying normally didn't think of him; it exhausted his strength.

So had he always been this annoying?

The thin smoke of the Riverward descended and became Xi Ping...looking somewhat younger than he did now.

Zhou Ying looked at him blankly for a moment, and the taboo-like, unmentionable memories came crashing back into place, then calmly unfolded before him, brushing away the smoke and dust.

Zhou Ying, who hadn't coughed since his spiritual bones had been restored, suddenly felt his throat begin to itch.

Yes, he remembered now—he really had been this obnoxious!

It was night. The Zhao clan that covered all of Great Wan had received the news that the city of Jinping had been sealed and thereupon had celebrated—with the Dragon Vein and the capital under control, they had the country!

Zhao Xi, commander of the Hongyin branch of Heaven's Design Pavilion, climbed the city gate tower and looked down from on high.

Hongyin was located at Great Wan's northern border, next door to the Hong River. Across the river was Northern Li. This area, along with Suling and Ning'an, had been one of the first three provinces to fall to the Zhao family.

At this time, all of Hongyin was temporarily under curfew; no one could go out as they pleased. They held the provincial yamen and the garrisons. In the eyes of half-immortals, mortals were all made of clay, to be molded at will. They would belong to whoever took the initiative first. At present, the arrays in all the counties and regions had been altered. There were fifty large cannons aimed at Hongyin. With just a thought, they could level it.

Zhao Xi was a half-immortal and cared nothing about Ways of the Heart. If he wanted to go higher in the future, he would think about it then—after all, if you put down your butcher’s knife, you could become a Buddha. He didn’t believe that the shed skins and ascended spirit peak masters in the inner sect could ignore the eight million mortals in Hongyin.

The stars and moon were hidden. A letter from Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s head office flew up in front of him. As soon as Zhao Xi opened it, he saw that this was the handwriting of the main family’s Captain Zhao Yu of the Azure Dragon Heart Tower. When he began to read, he saw that the first line was: Pang has been taken. The capital is secure.

Before the smile on Zhao Xi’s face could take shape, he saw that his relative in Jinping had gone on to write calmly: The inner sect has been sealed. The shed skin elders are in the human world. You must not lower your guard. You must prepare for all eventualities.

Zhao Xi quickly inspected himself; indeed, he had been somewhat beside himself. He quickly calmed down and tore open the attached secret letter.

The secret letter instructed him to send a portion of his family members and family property to Northern Li in case of accident. There followed a map of Northern Li, with a few places marked with special inscriptions—these were all the Zhao family’s own inscriptions.

Though the points on the map were clearly indicated, without the connecting inscriptions, others wouldn’t be able to find anything in those places even if they paced them flat.

There were various degrees among the powerful people of the mortal world. Those with money and connections often indirectly asked people to draw arrays in their homes, whether they were useful or not; what they wanted was to make it conspicuous that their resources were out of the ordinary; in Cui Ji’s big compound in the capital, for example, there were many of these gaudy things. Those who had some kinship with the immortal sect or even had a half-immortal relative, on the other hand, believed themselves to be a “higher class” of person and viewed these people who played with arrays as “upstart amateurs”; though they had performed no service to their country, they would go against regulations to acquire inscriptions—for example, the local thugs Zhou Ying had killed on his inspection tour of the south; their stealthily obtained inscriptions were much the same as those that the immortal mountains bestowed upon imperial kinsmen and meritorious individuals, some of them even more slipshod, all leftovers that the immortal mountains hadn't awarded to anyone—so Zhou Ying could work out how to break them even with his eyes closed.

But direct descendants of the big families turned their noses up at all of these.

They flaunted their position as so-called “true nobility with a thousand-year inheritance”; they had long family traditions and a profound store of secret information; each brick in their houses had its history, and even the cracked tiles had once borne the footstep of a person now in the high heavens. The clan had turned out countless inscription masters. Generation by generation, they had constructed a highly secret body of inscriptions that only their own family could use.

In other words, there was a whole set of secret inscriptions on earth that didn't belong to heaven and earth; they belonged to the Zhao family.

It was these special inscriptions that gave the members of the great family's main bloodline the confidence for their bone-deep sense of superiority, distinguishing them from commonplace people who shamelessly sought personal gain.

As soon as Zhao Xi saw the secret letter, he felt a chill. He thought that, as expected, the main family's considerations were profound. It was true—no matter how smoothly things were going, they should still prepare a line of retreat.

Therefore, he went to give orders for preparations to be made. At the same time, he asked the clan leader to personally write to the Zhao family's old friends in Northern Li and Kunlun.

The Zhao clan's collateral branches all over the country received more or less the same warnings and secret letters. Yuzhou in the west had always had secret passages connecting it to Chu, and Shuozhou and Hongyin's Zhao clans in the north arranged to meet in Northern Li, while Guzhou by the sea had already prepared ships, ready to set sail for Southern Shu's Three Islands if anything went wrong.

At the same time, with a thousand-year-old great family of Xuanyin in revolt, Northern Li's Kunlun, Western Chu's Sanyue, and Southern Shu's Lingyun were all watching closely. As soon as they received signals, they crowded around like hawks and vultures that had scented meat.

The two sides acted together—the Luwu invisibly and untraceably scattered across the three countries put on their skins and picked up the Zhao family's secret inscriptions that had been transmitted from Jinping, then anonymously acted as a Magpie Bridge for the “immortal clan” of nobles on both sides.

“Good heavens, ‘Zhao family inscriptions.’ Thank you, Paper-xiong, you’ve opened the country bumpkin Lao Pang’s eyes.” Pang Jian watched “Zhao Yu”’s series of arrangements, gaining experience along with him. Laughing, he said, “Those who have just attained enough status to put on long robes want to fasten their belts and go eat like they do in Dangui Lane, so they go give long-winded speeches at the Phoenix’s Perch Pavilion every day; meanwhile, the true wealthy and noble people have long since disdained making an issue of living expenses. What they want instead is to claim ties of blood or friendship with Xuanyin’s big families, scrambling and fighting to become farm animals that have ascended to the heavens and use a few irrelevant leftover inscriptions... Heh, after all this fuss, farm animals are still farm animals. Like a favorite concubine imitating the formal wife—nothing but a joke.”

“Zhao Yu” politely praised, “Well said, general commander.”

Pang Jian raised his eyelids and glanced at him. He said, “But the Luwu could have done this more covertly.”

With the Zhao family moving a large quantity of spiritual stones and immortal tools out of the country in so organized a fashion, the immortal mountains were sure to notice after the fact. Such open tactics didn’t seem like Zhou Ying—unless he didn’t want to gain any advantage from it.

“Zhao Yu” spoke with the force of justice: “While the Luwu shamefully act in secret, their actions are for the sake of the nation and the people. It’s enough to be secretive when facing the enemy. We ourselves are very open. How could we covet the paltry wealth of criminals? Obeying the orders of Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s General Commander Pang, the Kaiming and the Luwu are assisting Heaven’s Design Pavilion in putting down the revolt. If we take these things, we’ll have to hand over exactly the right amount to the sect when this is over. We do rely on the sect for support.”

Pang Jian gave an exclamation. “Pardon my lack of manners. Your lord truly is loyal and righteous down to his guts.”

How shameless.

“Zhao Yu” was unmoved. “We are only doing our duty.”

Pang Jian said, “What, it’s not enough for you to expand the Kaiming domestically, the Luwu is also looting the burning house? You’ve turned your noses up at the spiritual stones, so where are you trying to worm your way in while the Zhao family escapes abroad? Which sect’s possession has Zhou Ying set his mind on? What is it?”

“It might be a furnace,” “Zhao Yu” said, smiling. “You’re joking, general commander. His Highness naturally acts for the sake of Great Wan. The Kaiming and the Luwu are willing to be their country’s watchdogs. As long as Great Wan is at peace and its people can live safely and be happy in their livelihoods, what more can we ask?”

General Commander Pang commented: “Bah.”

Meanwhile, in the midst of their night of revelry, the Zhaos were silently sliding into the abyss via the ditch others had dug.

It seemed that they already had Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s head office under control. In a single night, they had left the Kaiming Department and Heaven’s Design Pavilion with no strength to fight back, sending them retreating again and again in defeat. In secret, they had also taken the opportunity to send half of their property out of the country, taking double precautions; they thought they were perfectly safe.

In Chu, the first batch of Zhaos to cross the Xia River made landfall and silently infiltrated the sparsely peopled mountains by the Xia River and matched their family’s secret inscriptions.

Among the mountains, a mobile hidden realm accordingly appeared. It opened its mouth and absorbed them.

After that came batch after batch of spiritual stones and dazzling immortal tools. Dongheng's Sanyue's great mountain array was soon alerted, and Sanyue soon dispatched an ascended spirit.

Under the East Sea, Zhou Ying told Bai Ling: "That's fine. Haul in the nets."

Early in the morning on the eleventh day of the seventh month, Jinping abruptly broke off contact with the Zhao family forces throughout the country. All the letters burst into flames. At the same time, the smug Zhaos suddenly discovered that those Kaiming Cultivators who hadn't even washed the mud from their feet seemed to have grown up from underfoot, silently infiltrating their impregnable circles of arrays, cooperating from the inside with Heaven's Design Pavilion on the outside!

Before the Zhaos could work out what was happening, they had been caught by the throats, their spiritual stone warehouses seized.

In their haste, they only had time to send a final batch out of the country.

CHAPTER 92 - Traveler Abroad (9)

Endangering mortals was naturally directed at Xuanyin Mountain's inner sect. The shed skin elders and ascended spirit peak masters with their Ways of the Heart couldn't stand by and watch the unjust deaths of millions of mortals. The Zhao family's forces covered the whole country; the Bell of Tribulation, which would cause a three-year drought if it rang once, absolutely couldn't sound from Hongyin to Guzhou.

Mid-level cultivators and walkers in the mortal world were Xuanyin Mountain's foundation, and the Zhao family had occupied half of that "foundation." They believed that as long as they could keep things under control, they would be able to grapple with the inner sect based on the accumulated wisdom of a thousand years.

As for the Kaiming Cultivators... No one had considered the Kaiming Cultivators.

Could the "Kaiming Cultivators" count as cultivators? Could they count as human?

These country bumpkins had started out as laborers and farmers. The women were coarse and the men were vulgar. The weapons they used were each more absurd than the next, and they couldn't speak official language properly. They were like idiots. In the Kaiming Department's classes, the first thing they taught wasn't talismans or meridians, it was the Thousand Character Classic, a primer for small children! Really, it was disgracing yourself to give them an extra look.

Hearing that Pang Jian had requested help from the Kaiming Department, many people laughed their heads off, thinking that Jinping's mad dog had come to a dead end and was even willing to eat shit.

He dared to call them, and the Kaiming Department really did dare to come.

When the Kaiming Department joined the battle, both sides of walkers in the mortal world couldn't quite keep their countenance. It was as if two noble scholars had been matching each other's strength playing weiqi when, all of a sudden, a filthy peasant came in driving a steam-powered bulldozer and flattened everything in a billow of smoke.

Because communications had been cut off out of nowhere, everyone thought that it was only an isolated incident for them. Hearing that Kaiming Cultivators had somehow found their way into the spiritual stone warehouse, Hongyin's Zhao Xi was so disgusted he broke out in gooseflesh, as if he'd heard that the rice granary was infested with rats and thought that all the rice was dirty now.

Then he flew into a rage: the spiritual stone warehouse wasn't tangible storage like a granary or a reservoir. It was like an invisible, untouchable "hidden realm"; only using specific means and carrying a special "key"—usually a magic tool or an inscription—could you open it and enter. The Zhao family's spiritual stone warehouse needed at least three layers of keys and the inside was packed with traps; you couldn't put a step out of place. How had they gotten in?

"Investigate thoroughly! Each family's maids, pages, coachmen, crones, if their behavior is unusual, seize one and all and perform a soul-searching!"

"Commander, those spiritual stones..."

"You don't have private stores?" Zhao Xi twisted his head and coldly glared at the person who had been asking him. Red light flashed through his eyes, an indication that he might lose his mind. "Use your own, you'll be paid back later. When we've killed off these rats, have them spit out the spiritual stones..."

No sooner had he spoken than he saw the eyes of the "Zhao family member" speaking to him flash strangely. Zhao Xi suddenly found that when this person cupped his fist in a salute, the thickness of his hands didn't match his slender physique, and the joints of his middle fingers were so crowded with calluses that they were nearly deformed...

Zhao Xi's reaction was extremely fast. He gave a shout, his spiritual sword already out of its sheath. The imposter Zhao calmly took out a big, round iron saw. The saw blades began to spin with a hum. Before the blades hit, the fierce wind had already reached Zhao Xi. This thing had previously been used to fell timber. It was very loud, making a racket as it knocked his spiritual sword aside.

The "Zhao family member" wiped his face and removed a skin as thin as a cicada's wings, revealing an honest, dark square face. Smiling, he said, "Commander, we can't spit out those spiritual stones. The Kaiming Department has kindly accepted them on behalf of the spiritual mountains. Thank you for looking after them."

No sooner had he spoken than his shadow on the ground began to move. Countless figures hidden in it appeared, surrounding Zhao Xi.

In Jinping City, "Zhao Yu" crushed the battle report he had finished reading with a twist of his fingers. He turned and said to Pang Jian, "An 'immortal clan' still needs to perform the basic functions of life. They still need people to plant crops, drive carriages, clean up after them and wait on them. There's nothing mysterious about it. The cultivators of each Kaiming Department station are born and bred locals, excellent at seeing an opportunity and taking it. Set your mind at ease, Commander Pang, they won't let the cannons pointed at their own fellow countrymen go off."

But Pang Jian's expression was grave. Shaking his head, he said, "Don't get careless. While it's true that the Kaiming Department can get in by every opening, the thousand years of accumulated wisdom of a great family of Xuanyin is nothing to fool around with. Otherwise, would the Zhou family have been incapable of raising their heads for eight hundred years?"

On Xuanyin Mountain, Xi Ping was just bringing up all kinds of unreasonable requests to Lin Chi, making Peak Master Lin, who hadn't personally created tools in centuries, look miserable as he listened. Suddenly, a warning from his spiritual sense interrupted Xi Ping's voice.

Lin Chi and Wen Fei, the latter in the middle of a unilateral argument with the snow-capped mountain in the distance, simultaneously flew up.

Their eyes met across the distance in surprise and confusion. Accumulated snow was rolling down the sealed Flying Jade Peak. The localized avalanche precisely hit the valley where the two of them had just been standing.

Wen Fei was shocked: Hey now, Zhi Jingzhai, you've developed a temper after five years in seclusion!

Xi Ping was astonished: “My shifu finally couldn’t resist smacking that chatterbox mute?”

Lin Chi cocked an ear and listened for a moment. “No...no, it’s not Flying Jade Peak. I think the thirty-six peaks are quaking.”

In Hongyin Province, Zhao Xi, surrounded by Kaiming Cultivators, glanced around at the visible and concealed figures. Heaven’s Design Pavilion’s karma beasts no longer listened to his orders. They were mixed in among the Kaiming Cultivators, their big eyes glaring at him with hatred, as if glaring at an evil cultivator.

“Commander Zhao,” said the middle-aged-looking head Kaiming Cultivator, “the spiritual mountains protect the populace. As one of the four great families of Xuanyin, the Zhao clan’s collateral branches in the mortal world ought to take their part in defending it, yet you unworthy descendants have brought calamity upon the country and the people to this degree. It does make one sneer.”

“What the hell are you?” Zhao Xi said almost inaudibly. “Are you worthy of scolding me?”

A young and aggressive Kaiming Cultivator couldn't resist shooting off at the mouth: "The stray dog barks in such a bombastic tone."

Zhao Xi quietly began to laugh grimly, the red in his eyes strengthening. "Stray dog..."

Then, on the fair skin that came from a life of comfort, each and every vein popped up. The veins that ought to have been purple appeared to be a strange bright red, crawling all over his body as though they had come to life, thicker and thicker, as if trying to break through his thin skin.

A karma beast howled and jumped onto a Kaiming Cultivator's clothes. Fur bristling, it arched its back. A Kaiming Cultivator who had been a boatman at the docks suddenly thought that the forms of those veins looked very familiar. His eyes opened wide, and he blurted out, "That...that looks like the course of the Hong River around here!"
